HEALTH INSURANCE AND SERVICES

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider allowing the provinces greater flexibility in the provision of health insurance and services.

She said: Mr. Speaker, the request in my motion is simple. The Reform Party, like all Canadians, Canadian political parties, Canadians working in health care and a multitude of other Canadians, including the provincial premiers, recognizes the provinces have been delegated legal and constitutional responsibility to provide health insurance and services in Canada.

As the provision of health services and insurance has been delegated to the provinces, I am asking they be given the authority to achieve it or to carry it out.

The actual delegating of this task is not the hard part. The giving up of the authority over the actual control of how the task is carried out is the hard part. Unless the delegator, the federal government, is willing and able to devise the plan, update it as necessary and authorize each aspect of it prior to its implementation, in which case this is not feasible, the delegator must be prepared to delegate out some authority and in order to achieve what they want they identify what is to be achieved by the provinces, what components or principles are to be included and what standards of performance are expected. Then they give the authority necessary for the provinces to achieve this.

As a national government we can legislate these guidelines, standards or principles, or both, or whatever else we should call them. We have done this via the Canada Health Act. We have established five fundamental principles to be incorporated by each province in its approach to providing health insurance and services. The principles are accessibility, comprehensiveness, portability, public administration and universality.

The Reform Party believes these are sound national principles. The problem is not the principles themselves but the accompanying description or definition applied to each of them. For example, in the act the definition or interpretation of accessibility includes only one aspect of what access to care can actually mean, based on a person's ability to pay. That is commendable, as it opens the door for all Canadians regardless of their personal financial position to receive or have access to health care.

However, another aspect of access is when does one have the access to the actual treatment necessary for the condition one is presenting. I am thinking now in relation to the when part from a clinical or medical point of view. If a person requires a hip replacement, for example, or finds a lump on their body in some area it should not be, to get access to treatment can take sometimes weeks or months. Access to treatment from a medical and clinical aspect is extremely important, sort of the stitch in time premise.

Early intervention in many situations saves future grief and discomfort for the individual as well as saving health care dollars in the long run, as one is addressing or presenting a condition much earlier than one would be by leaving it for months or weeks and so on.

There are other problems with the Canada Health Act. There are restrictive clauses that create these problems. Portability comes to mind as another one.

These problems must be addressed and resolved. The act needs revising and updating, allowing for more flexibility for the provinces not only in the administration and management of the service but also in the actual meaning or interpretation of the five principles. The meaning of decentralization of authority must play a much larger role in our health care system to preserve it.

In the Financial Post on April 22 of this year an article was written by Alan Toulin entitled "Decentralization Appeals to Canadians' Desire for Control". Alan Toulin is saying Canadians want more control over the things that directly affect their lives, and governments at all levels are feeling the pressure of this growing public sentiment.

He also quotes a leading business figure from Quebec, André Bérard, the National Bank chairman and chief executive officer.

Mr. Bérard apparently delivered a speech in Ottawa on how the process of decentralization is an inescapable force for both businesses and governments at all levels.

Mr. Toulin makes reference that Mr. Bérard argues that those levels of government responsible for the spending of the money are the ones who should decide how health care, education and income security should be organized:

> Citizens are more vigilant and can have more direct control over the actions of provincial and local governments when it comes to the spending decisions on behalf of the public interest, Mr. Bérard believes. In a country as large and diverse as Canada it is clear that many citizens feel Ottawa is a remote, lumbering government that cannot be controlled by them.
> "The nearer the level of government is to the citizens, the more merciless these citizens are when they see public waste. They know that they are the ones who will ultimately pay. They are merciless because they know that they will have real power; that their voice will be heard; that their vote will not be diluted by millions of others", Bérard said.

He goes on further to sing the praises of decentralization.

That is basically what we are saying in this motion. There needs to be more flexibility. That kind of authority can go to the provinces and they can get on with providing health care according to the five major principles. Then they will be evaluated by the people in the province.

• (1115)

Another component in the health care system that needs some serious revamping is funding. The initial agreement between the federal government and the provincial governments was a 50:50 split. Over the years that has eroded. We have a system of tax points and cash payments known as established program financing. Because the tax points grow over time as the economy grows, the cash portion of EPF is shrinking. It is down to 23 per cent now from 50 per cent.

Established program funding was introduced in 1977, replacing the cost sharing of post–secondary education and health care with a fixed per capita block funding transfer. That was the first time federal funding growth was unrelated to provincial program costs. It was designed to increase the rate of growth in population and in the national economy.

Over the years further amendments were brought into the EPF system. In 1986, Bill C–96 reduced the growth of the EPF transfer. The payments were still tied to economic and demographic growth but their annual per capita growth rate was 2 per cent lower than what it would have been under the old formula.

In 1991, Bill C–69 froze the EPF transfers at their 1989 levels. That was to be applicable for two years. In 1991 Bill C–20 extended the freeze on the per capita transfers to provinces for another three years. Therefore the provincial entitlements will continue to increase at the same rate as the population.

Beginning in 1995–96 the rate of increase of the EPF entitlements will be limited to per capita rates of increase in the GNP minus 3 per cent. We continue to play little games in the funding component of our health system.

Instead of just health and post–secondary education in the block transfers, government has added welfare into the block. From an article on April 13 in the Globe and Mail entitled "Ottawa is trying to heal health–care strife", by Edward Greenspon, he says:

> Part of the logic of lumping the three programs into a single fund was to allow Ottawa to blur their minds of where cuts fell and to pass to the provinces the hot potato of how to distribute the pain.

Further along in the same article, he goes on to say:

> Figures in the budget show that Ottawa will, in fact, reduce its cash transfers over the next three years to $10.3 billion from $17 billion, a rollback of almost 40 per cent. And the government has given no assurances of when it will end.

Federal funding in support of health insurance and services should be unconditional and should recognize different levels of economic development in the provinces.

The federal government has established five fundamental principles via the Health Care Act. It needs to be looked at from the point of view of interpretation. It is a little ambiguous in that the government can interpret it one way and the provinces can see a different interpretation. We also need to look at whether we actually need the cash component of the EPF as a whip to keep the provinces in line. Is that really necessary?

In the article to which I made reference, I beg the question whether it is actually necessary to have that kind of control over the provinces. If one decentralizes it into the provincial area, the people will rise up and say what they want. If they are not happy with what they are getting, especially if they have the five guiding principles from the national government to make some sort of evaluation judgment, they will rise up and tell their government to spend their health care dollars with less waste or they can vote the government out and get one which will provide the services.

Put the control there. Let the provinces establish the methods of providing health care according to the five basic principles, and define them a little better so they are not ambiguous interpretations, and let the people judge whether they are satisfied.

In the Ottawa Citizen on May 1 an article entitled, "Time for a tonic" stated: "The provinces—are demanding more leeway in controlling their costs. And increasingly, provincial cost–cutting measures are running afoul of the federal government's reading of the Canada Health Act".

To my mind the word "leeway" in that article is very suggestive of flexibility. The provinces are asking for flexibility. The article also makes reference to the government's reading of the act. That could be interpreted as suggesting different methods of interpreting how one can read the act; the federal government reads it one way and the provinces may read it another way. That again points to the need for revision of the act, allowing for broader and more flexible definitions. At the same time the need for using the cash payment as the whip should be addressed.

The government must do something concrete and substantial. It must take some positive action to preserve the health care system for Canadians. It has been stated it is a priority of the government by both the Prime Minister and the health minister. However, when we consider the financial threats which our health care system is facing and the lack of action by the government to diminish those threats we wonder what kind of a priority it is.

The most apparent action to date has been on a reactive or defensive basis. With respect to the user fee situation in British Columbia and the private clinic situation in Alberta, the government's action was based on its interpretation of the ambiguous accessibility clause of the health care act That has to be addressed. So far that is the most assertive or aggressive type of behaviour we have seen from the government in relation to health and it has been in a defensive mode.

Other actions taken by the government tend to leave us confused and without a sense of direction. It campaigned in 1993 on no cuts to health care. During its first year in office it continued to say that it would protect the health care funding to Canadians. However, earlier this year we started hearing things like "cuts to social programs, including medicare. We have to address all social programs. If they are all going to be cut, then health care will be rolled in there with them".

We also heard the system needs to be reformed, that there are problems with the health act and those problems must be addressed. We also heard from various ministers the provinces should be given more flexibility to manage their affairs.

• (1125)

Block funding was set up, including the three components: health, post–secondary education and welfare. This is being sold, to my mind, as an opportunity for provinces to have more flexibility but in a sort of backhanded way. They are given less money and then told they have three components where they can be flexible applying that money.

That is not what we are saying in our flexibility plan. It is what the government is trying to sell when it says that flexibility must be given to the provinces. I think it was Ted Byfield who said we have inflexible flexibility, which is basically what we are looking at here.

Reformers believe that the provinces are fully capable of providing quality health care to their residents as long as they are allowed the stable funding to do so. They need the resources. A workman is only as good as the tools he has.

The leader of the Reform Party said it best in Toronto last November to the Ontario Hospital Association. I would like to quote him. "It is the provinces, not the federal government, that have the constitutional jurisdiction to operate on our health care system. It is the provinces, not the federal government, that provide the bulk of health care funding. And it is the provinces, not the federal government, that have the greatest experience in health care delivery".

I suggest a prescription. If the decision is to devolve health care to the provinces what does this mean in a detailed type of prescription? I would like to make three suggestions: first, transfer tax room to the provinces; second, define core health services; and third, amend the Canada Health Act with those things in place on a national basis. The provinces would have the guidelines and authority to get on and provide a health care program that we can not only afford but want as well.

The Reform Party taxpayer budget outlined how we could decentralize health care by ceding addition tax room to the provinces. This would ensure more stable funding for provincial health care over time. The provinces would not have to worry about what new legislation, steps or cuts the federal government would be making from year to year or the interpretation that each different government would make to the various components of the health act.

At the end of the process of the transferring tax room, provinces would present the revenue levels and flexibility necessary to fund health care according to the demands of the electorate and within fiscal restraints.

Decentralization of health care would ensure that services were delivered and funded by the level of government closest to the people. I made reference to that earlier.

From the point of view of defining—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The member's 20–minute period is up. I wonder if she might give us some indication of how much more time she might need to conclude her remarks, and I say this respectfully, as the mover of the motion. Will the member for Surrey North give us some indication whether she could summarize and close within the next minute or so? I am very reluctant to cut off anyone who moves a motion, but the rules are very clear that the mover has 20 minutes.

Ms. Bridgman: I will be about a minute, Mr. Speaker.

In conclusion, I proposed this motion because the federal government seems unwilling to address the fundamental problems facing health care in Canada: declining federal financing, combined with the lack of provincial manoeuvrability. The government has ruled out amending the Health Care Act and the minister has portrayed herself as a defender of it and thus medicare. This is not so and we must defend it.

• (1130)

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to speak to the motion of the hon. member for Surrey North. I have worked with her on the standing committee on health and have great respect for her thoughtfulness.

The hon. member raised the issue of more flexibility for the provinces. The provinces already have flexibility. The provinces are responsible for managing the whole system of health care for people in their provinces. The flexibility depends on the needs of their people. The provinces decide where the services go, how they are done and by whom and the payment for people who deliver those services. They have all the flexibility they need within the parameters of the Canada Health Act and within the parameters of the five principles of medicare which the member has just agreed that she supports wholeheartedly.

The member said that she supports those five principles. Then in the next sentence she said that she disagreed with them because she does not like what they mean. How can one support the principles and then not like what they mean? It is inherent that a principle means something. I find that a little confusing.

Those five principles have helped our health care system to become one of the best systems in the world. If we want to judge the best systems in the world, we should judge them by the outcomes. Canada ranks second or third in the world depending on how we look at the outcomes of some of those services. Canada has one of the best health care systems in the world. That is not only in terms of mortality, how people live or die, but also the quality of their lives. This defines the kind of system we have. We stand tall in terms of our health care system.

The member talks about problems of accessibility. Accessibility has made our system what it is. Accessibility means that as Canadians we all have access to health care services when we need them, regardless of the size of our wallets. That is probably the single most important thing about our health care system that makes it unique. The size of a person's wallet does not dictate the kind of health care received or the kind of health care we have access to. The only thing that dictates the kind of health care received is the clinical symptoms, depending on whether it is needed, how urgently, and when and how much is needed at the time. A very appropriate way to deal with health care services is to define them according to clinical methods rather than pocketbooks.

The member also talked about problems of portability. The whole idea is that Canada is one country and this is a national system and Canadians move across borders daily, weekly and yearly. Our parents may live in one province, our children in another and our grandchildren in another. The fact that we can move across the country knowing that we have health care coverage when we get sick no matter where we are in the country is one of the most important strengths of the Canada Health Act and of medicare. To ask that portability be removed and try to balkanize medicare would do the country a great disservice. It would destroy the strength of the program.

The member also said there are decreases in funding of programs. Every reputable study done around the world tells us that money is not the major and only criteria for a good system of health care. If it were, the United States would have the best health care system in the world but it does not. At the moment Japan has the best health care system in the world according to outcomes and it spends the least amount of money on health care. Money is not the only criterion. There is also how and when the service is delivered.

Eventually we must look at issues like health promotion, prevention, the quality of life, poverty, and other things that define health care. Those are the things we need to look at, not costs. All of us know and all the studies tell us that we could spend a lot less money on our health care system. If we provided proper services and managed them appropriately we could have an even better health care system.

When we talk about accessibility and outcomes, let us look again at the United States where there are such poor outcomes. The United States spends the most of any country in the world in percentage of GDP on health care and it has the worst outcomes of any developed country. In fact, the United States sits among the developing countries somewhere between Cuba and Czechoslovakia in terms of its outcomes.

I do not understand what the member means when she talks about the fact that she disagrees with these issues because they are not borne out by fact nor by statistics.

The member is also concerned about the health and social transfer, the fact it has become one massive block fund and that it is a negative thing. This strengthens and interdigitates services that rely upon each other. We know poverty is one of the major determinants of health. It stands to reason that in a block transfer, social assistance should be lumped alongside and close to health. If we are going to concentrate on prevention then one of the issues we are going to have look at is the issue of poverty and how people should live in this country to give them a better health status.

Another thing the member says is that she wishes the Canada Health Act would recognize the different economic development of provinces. We do. It already does. When we look at transfer payments and equalization payments it is built in to ensure that provinces which are not as wealthy as others have been brought up to a level at which they can provide these services.

I do not understand what the hon. member is concerned about when all of these things are already being addressed in the system of medicare and within the Canada Health Act.

Decentralizing, as the hon. member suggests, will give us less control and will completely decrease, diminish and eventually kill medicare.

The hon. member talked about evaluation. That is exactly what the Canada Health Act does. It evaluates the system to see whether or not it does follow the five principles of health care. Again, I am a little confused as I try to understand what the member wants when these things are already in existence. Perhaps the member is not familiar with what these things really mean.

The provinces are asking for more flexibility. The whole Canada health and social transfer has been made to give the provinces more flexibility. The provinces already have total and complete flexibility in how they deliver services.

For example, not one single principle or clause of the Canada Health Act prevents innovation and renewal of the health care system which is what we are talking about today when we talk about the health care system. It allows the greatest flexibility.

If we look at some of the other provinces like British Columbia, it is moving closer to home. New Brunswick has closed down hospitals and brought community care to the forefront. Ontario is looking at regionalization and is looking at how it can provide services in different ways.

Some provinces provide different providers to give care and other provinces do not. Who gives care, when they give care, where they give care, how they give care is completely under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Therefore, the hon. member perhaps needs to reconsider her motion and wonder if she is asking for things that are not already built into the system.

The strength of this system is that the provinces can manage a system and deliver the care. They are able to respond better in terms of practical availability to the needs of their own regions. Within each province there are differences between regions including the urban and rural regions whose needs are very different. Provinces have the ability to do all of that.

The only thing the federal government does is to enshrine the five principles within the Canada Health Act which says this is one country. We will all have certain principles that will ensure every Canadian has access to health care regardless of ability to pay and regardless of how chronically ill they are or what genetic illnesses they have. All of that does not make any difference to the quality of health care or their access to it.

In the United States it does happen. Those who have a chronic disease are uninsurable. No matter how wealthy they are, they cannot buy insurance. That does not happen in this country. The strength of this country is the fact that each province does what it does best in its own local way, providing good services for the community. At the same time the federal government ensures medicare, which is the heart and soul of what Canada is, is kept sacrosanct across the country so we can continue to have universal, accessible, portable, comprehensive and publicly administered health care.

If we listen to the member's motion, actually she does agree with the system the way it is.

• (1140)

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the House for the next few minutes and comment on the motion presented by the hon. member for Surrey North. The motion seeks greater flexibility and thus greater autonomy for the provinces in the provision of health insurance.

For some time now, the Canadian health care system has been at the centre of a wideranging debate on its current, disturbing state, its uncertain future and indeed its very survival. There are many who maintain that our health care system has reached a critical point in is history. We on this side of the House deplore the fact that Canada's Department of Health is consciously absent from the debate, since we believe that the main cause of the sorry state of health care in this country is the federal government's decision to make drastic cuts in funding.

We must not forget that federal cutbacks in health care funding have serious consequences for the public finances of Quebec and other provinces. Quebec Finance Minister Jean Campeau told Quebecers last week about the impact of federal offloading on Quebec's commitments, commitments the Quebec government cannot ignore. The federal government, however, is doing just that, with predictable consequences for the provinces.

The federal government saved several billion dollars at the provinces' expense by unilaterally imposing a freeze on transfer payments for health care.

Moreover, in the last budget, Minister Martin made it very clear that the government would continue to save money at the provinces' expense by cutting $2.5 billion in 1995–96 and about $4.5 billion in 1997–98.

By the end of 1998, $8 billion will have been cut since 1982. And people are surprised to see Minister Rochon cutting millions of dollars in order to be able to keep providing health care services. Eight billion dollars, Mr. Speaker, can you imagine? What can the provinces do in the face of this kind of offloading?

It should come as no surprise that a motion is before this House, asking the federal government to give the provinces more flexibility so they can decide how to meet the challenge of providing adequate care services to their people.

Members of the Bloc Quebecois cannot support this motion because we feel this would let the government off the hook for the harm it is doing to the entire system. It would be too easy.

It has been some time since the federal government met the commitments it made to its provincial partners in 1977. Today, however, we are being asked only to seek more flexibility which, at best, would mean privatizing certain services or approving the use of private clinics and double billing.

For us there is only one solution: the federal government must withdraw altogether from this provincial jurisdiction and give the provinces fair compensation in the form of tax points.

It is clear that the federal government has reneged on its initial commitments to the provinces. It is also clear that by continuing to apply its standards to an area that falls under provincial jurisdiction, while refusing to pay the real cost, the federal government is like someone who asks you out to dinner and leaves you with the bill.

Although at the time it was very critical of the policy initiated by the previous Conservative government, the present government is accelerating the advent across Canada of a two–tier health care system, with on one side, basic services covered by medicare and on the other, specialized care and advanced technology available to those who can afford it. This means waiting lists for some, but no waiting if you can afford to pay.

Without comprehensive reform and the vision that is necessary for a balanced health care system, excessive funding cuts will set the new standard for the health care system.

• (1145)

They can promise deep reforms all they want, and a national forum presided over by none other than the Prime Minister, it will mean nothing until they go beyond those empty promises.

The problem is that the Minister of Finance could not wait to impose his reforms. In addition, just like his predecessors, he coupled his unilateral, insidious and heavy cuts with mandatory health care system reforms.

You would have to be naïve not to realize that the Canada social transfer is just a veiled attempt to slash funding for education, social assistance and health. You would also have to be naïve to believe the Minister of Health when she says that the Canada social transfer will actually ensure that the health care system stays the way it is, yet give Quebec and the provinces more room to manoeuvre. How can the minister actually say such things, and believe them?

Let us be serious now; there is a paradox in the federal government talking about giving Quebec and the provinces more room to manoeuvre so that they can dispense quality health care services yet all the while continuing to increase the burden placed on the public finances of the provinces.

In 1977, when the federal government created the Canada Health Act, it agreed to assume 50 per cent of the cost of maintaining the health insurance system. Over the years, we have seen that contribution shrink to 38 per cent. Betraying the campaign promises made in the red book, the current government would reduce its share to 28.5 per cent.

The federal government still does not understand that all of these years of offloading to the provinces has aggravated their financial situations as much as it has jeopardized the survival of social programs. What is more is that by imposing overlaps in areas that its own constitution does not give it powers, and by continuing to cut funding, the federal government is preventing Quebec and the provinces from finding real solutions to the financial crisis they are fighting.

As many studies have shown, the federal government's financial intransigence is propelling our health care system towards radical changes. Nevertheless, Quebec and the provinces are all trying to come up with solutions to forestall the disappearance of the current quality standards.

The very essence of the motion before us today bears witness to the will of Quebecers and Canadians to pull out all stops to find a solution. Everybody is working towards this goal, except the centralist government which refuses to live by its own constitution and to respect the provinces' exclusive power over health care.

What is sad, and history proves it, is that the federal government has always had the same ambition: being the only government in Canada.

In conclusion, the Bloc Quebecois cannot support the Reform Party's motion. Although this motion supports certain principles that we defend and denounces to a certain point the federal government's unilateral pull–out from the Canada Health Act, the contract it signed with the provinces in 1977, it does not get to the crux of the matter.

In our opinion, the provinces should be the only operators in the area of health care. From parliamentary commissions to consultations of all kinds, Quebec and the provinces have demonstrated that they are capable of rising to the health care challenge. If only the government would stop penalizing them with cut after cut without any financial compensation, they would be able to guarantee dignified health care services which treat people with respect. That is the real solution.

[English]

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of private member's Motion No. 424, tabled by my colleague from Surrey North.

The motion is straightforward. It asks that the government allow the provinces greater flexibility in the delivery of health services. The motion before us recognizes that we have reached a watershed in health care funding in Canada. The old system is becoming increasingly unsustainable as federal and provincial governments groan under the weight of a $72 billion doctors' bill.

The challenge facing these governments, which the hon. member for Surrey North addresses in the motion, is how to reduce funding without threatening the fundamental principle of medicare, which is that no Canadian will be denied access to health care based on an inability to pay. What we now have to ask ourselves is how this can best be done. I believe that Motion No. 424 identifies the proper course.

Before discussing the motion, I would first like to provide you with an explanation of how the health care funding crisis came to pass. The starting point in all of this is to acknowledge that health care falls exclusively under provincial jurisdiction. No one disputes that fact. The only reason the federal government is involved at all in the funding of health care is that 30 years ago it promised the provinces it would pay 50 per cent of the tab if they played by some of the rules. The culmination of this dollars for influence funding arrangement was the Canada Health Act, which was passed in 1984.

While the Canada Health Act may have been enacted with the best of intentions, it effectively restricted the ability of provincial governments to innovate and experiment in delivering health services. Creative ideas and efforts in cost control were automatically excluded from consideration. The straitjacket of the Canada Health Act was not so onerous to the provinces when the federal government was paying up to 50 cents of every provincial health care dollar. However, beginning in 1977 the federal share of health care spending began to decline. First the government shifted to a block grant, then it imposed restrictions on the grant's rate of growth, and finally, in the last budget, the federal government announced that the cash portion of the grant would be reduced by 39 per cent over three years.

Today the federal share of health care spending in Canada has shrunk from 50 per cent to only 24 per cent. The cash portion of that share is only $7 billion, which is 10 per cent of the $72 billion we will spend on health care this year alone.

In coping with cuts of this magnitude the provincial governments face three stark choices: they can try to make up the lost federal dollars by raising their own revenue; they can cut the level of quality of their health care services; or they can find newer, leaner ways of providing the level of services constituents deserve. Clearly, the first two are not options. Provincial governments are just as financially strapped as is the federal government. Raising taxes simply is not a viable solution any longer. Indiscriminately slashing programs is not an option either. The only realistic avenue open to the provinces is to come up with new ways of providing these services more cheaply, more quickly, and better than before. However, the Canada Health Act is standing in their way. The provinces do not have sufficient flexibility and freedom to institute the kinds of reforms that can put medicare back on a sound financial putting.

This places the ball back in the federal government's court. It has two options: either continue to insist on preserving the rigid interpretation of the Canada Health Act, in which case Ottawa will have to resume picking up 50 per cent of the cost, or amend and reinterpret the act to give the provinces the freedom they need in order to meet the funding challenges ahead. No party can pretend that the first is a realistic option. The federal government cannot now nor will it ever again be able to pick up half the tab of medicare as it exists today. Health care consumes 10 per cent of our nation's GDP, a greater proportion than any other nation except for the United States.

What this motion is saying is that the federal government can no longer have it both ways. The longer we insist on having it both ways the greater the chance that our national health care system will collapse under its own weight. The only realistic course of action is the one this motion recommends; that is, giving the provinces the ability to redesign their health care services, allowing them to experiment and to improve on old ways of doing things, and ultimately letting the voters of each province decide how much health care they are willing to pay for. This is the approach taken by Reform.

What we have said in our blue book and what we have reiterated in the taxpayers budget is that a Reform government would provide unconditional federal funding in support of health care services. While our taxpayers budget proposed reducing current funding levels by $800 million, it also included a pledge to turn over to the provinces additional tax points, which would grow along with the economy.

What the present health care debate comes down to is the question of trust. Reform is saying that provincial governments can be trusted to uphold the fundamental principle of Canadian health care: that nobody will be denied adequate health care based on inability to pay. By refusing to amend or reinterpret the Canada Health Act, this Liberal government is effectively saying that the provinces cannot be trusted to uphold this principle.

My question for the government is this. Why on earth can the provinces not be trusted? After all, medicare was not dreamed up in Ottawa. It originated from one province experimenting with new and better ways of caring for its people. Medicare itself was born precisely because the federal government of the day provided provincial governments like Saskatchewan with flexibility in the field of health services.

I would also ask the government why it questions the provinces' commitment to health care at a time when the federal government itself is steadily reducing its own share of the burden. Cash transfers for health amount to less than 6 per cent of total federal program spending. Yet the provinces typically devote between 30 and 40 per cent of their budgets to health care.

Who are the true guardians of health care in this country? It would seem to me it is the provinces. From a more pragmatic viewpoint, why would this government doubt for a moment that the voters of any province would allow a provincial government to undermine the fundamental principles of medicare?

In closing, I would like to point out that the governments closest to the people are held closest to account. Ultimately, in a democratic society it is the people who should decide how a province fulfils its constitutional duty to provide health care services, not a federal bureaucracy.

I hope everyone will give their support to Motion No. 424.

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I an indeed pleased to be able to participate in this debate. I personally believe very strongly in the principles of medicare and I know that they are also of great importance to people not only in my own riding but across the country.

The Canada Health Act is a brief, simple act. It sets out the five principles: public administration, universality, accessibility, portability, and comprehensiveness. It has a few definitions and deals briefly with penalties for failure to achieve these principles. It does not, could not, and should not set out how provinces operate their systems.

The preamble of the Canada Health Act is clear on this. Provinces are free to build their own systems within the broad framework of the Canada Health Act.

The guiding principle of medicare has long been that Canadians' health and access to quality care should not depend upon their financial means. In 1984 the Canada Health Act was introduced by a Liberal government and passed unanimously. The preamble of the Canada Health Act recognizes that "Continued access to quality health care without financial or other barriers will be critical to maintaining and improving the health and well–being of Canadians". This concept is also brought out as the primary objective in Canadian health care policy: "to protect, promote and restore the physical and mental well–being of residents of Canada and to facilitate reasonable access to health services without financial or other barriers, as described in section 3 of the act". It is within this framework that I wish to address the motion before us today.

Contrary to what some members in the House would have us believe, the government does not have a rigid view of how health care should be organized in Canada. The provinces already have a large degree of flexibility in the organization and provision of health insurance and health services. They have had this flexibility for many years. The only conditions the federal government assigns are that the provinces respect the requirements of the Canada Health Act.

Within the requirements provinces can experiment and change the way they deliver care, and many have been doing so. Nothing in the Canada Health Act limits the flexibility of provinces to realign the delivery and organization of their health care systems. Almost all provinces have embarked over the last few years on major reforms of their health systems.

The public administration criterion of the Canada Health Act presents a good example of the flexibility inherent in the act both in the provision of health insurance and in the delivery of health services by the provinces. The criterion applies to provincial health insurance plans and not to the administration of individual components of the health care system such as hospitals. This means, for instance, that private sector management of publicly owned hospitals is permitted. In addition the criterion allows administration authority of a provincial health insurance plan to be delegated to an agency if that is the wish.

Another example of flexibility inherent within the Canada Health Act relates to hospital services. These services are not directly tied to an institutional setting. Thus it is permissible for acute care to be provided in the community in a patient's home, for instance. It is always the provinces, not the federal government, that determine which services will be given in which setting.

The extramural hospital in New Brunswick is an example of provincial use of the flexibility. Under the program the patient is formally admitted to the acute care program. However, all required services are brought to the patient's home and not to the most expensive operating unit within the hospital structure called the emergency ward.

I emphasize, however, that the government recognizes the need for flexibility. On other hand it will not compromise on the fundamental values upon which the Canada Health Act and medicare in Canada are based. We are and we will continue to be flexible in our approach to health care, but we will not permit financial barriers to impede access to health services. If flexibility means turning our health care system into a private one that profits from the misfortunes of Canadians, the government wants no part in it. We will not tolerate direct charges to patients for medically necessary care.

During this period of constraint creative processes are being produced by creative individuals in every province in handling these fiscal problems. There are solutions and money can be managed much more effectively than it is at the present time.

One of the most cherished services enjoyed by Canadians is the health care system. Health care issues constantly rank as number one across a variety of polls. The federal government is the ultimate torch bearer of the one of the last truly national programs. The central government, therefore, is morally obliged to defend the Canada Health Act against policies that seek to destroy it.

I believe as do many Canadians that the Canada Health Act should be kept as it is. Undoubtedly any changes to the fundamental principles upon which health insurance is founded would cripple the most notable gains attained by the Canadian health care system.

We need only look south of the border to realize how fortunate we are to enjoy the health services we do. In the United States approximately 35 million people are without adequate health coverage. Health care horror stories abound south of the 49th parallel. Even Americans who have medical insurance can be hit by very high medical bills. In some cases, because of poor family coverage, if a family member has a serious illness or an accident the extra bills can be financially devastating. Moreover American company medical insurance plans lock many Americans into their jobs. This is because once a person develops a chronic illness no other insurance company will provide insurance at reasonably affordable rates.

Certainly wealthy Americans can receive the finest possible health care. However this is certainly not the case for the middle and lower socioeconomic classes. It is interesting that the opposition in the House is advocating a very similar system to that of the Americans.

Some detractors of our health care system indicate that we can no longer afford medicare in its present form as a result of our fiscal situation. However most health economists agree that it is not our medicare policy in and of itself we can no longer afford, but the inefficiencies in the manner in which medicare is implemented and delivered.

Significant improvements could be made in a number of areas without compromising national standards. For example, the unbridled growth of unproven and costly new medical technology has ballooned health care costs without any apparent return on the money spent. Another problem pertains to the manner in which drug prices have skyrocketed over the recent past. As well it appears supply and distribution of our medical manpower need improvement.

These are but a few of the areas where efficiencies, if introduced, could reduce the cost of delivering health care in Canada. Above all, provinces must listen to those who deliver and maintain health care services as well as those who receive the services. Although some problems exist we must do what we can to improve the system without destroying it. In a nutshell, the difficulties facing our health care system are the result of unlimited demands upon a limited pool of resources.

I feel compelled to rise today before the House to speak against a motion that would ultimately lead to the dismantling of the health care system that is dear to the hearts of many Canadians. In sum, Canadians demand and expect direction from the federal government for the preservation of our most sacred national program. The government has a moral right and the legal authority to ensure that this is the case. That is why we must vote against the motion before us today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CN COMMERCIALIZATION ACT

On the Order:

May 5, 1995—The Minister of Transport—Second reading and referral to the Standing Committee on Transport of Bill C–89, an act to provide for the continuance of the Canadian National Railway Company under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the issuance and sale of shares of the Company to the public.

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That Bill C–89, an act to provide for the continuance of the Canadian National Railway Company under the Canada Business Corportions Act and for the issuance and sale of shares of the Company to the public, be referred immediately to the Standing Committee on Transport.

[English]

I am pleased to open debate on Bill C–89, an act to commercialize the Canadian National Railway.

This is an historic occasion, one that marks a very clear turning point in the history of transportation in Canada. In 1923 the federal government completed the amalgamation and takeover of five privately run railways: the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, Canadian Northern, the Transcontinental and the Intercolonial. CNR was the result. With the help of the deep pockets of Canadian taxpayers, CN grew into what it is today.

Rail is not the only transportation method available now. Our shippers have other choices: the trucking industry, which has taken on a large part of the business; air freight; or through the seaway and the Great Lakes by ship. There is potential for strong competition in transportation in Canada, which is absolutely essential in any modern economy.

The legislation is part of our government's intention to have the private sector operate in areas where it can do the job best. The Minister of Finance said in the budget last February:

> Our view is straightforward, if government does not need to run something it should not, and in the future it will not.

Under this bill, 100 per cent of the government's share in CN will be sold in a public offering. All Canadians, including CN employees, will have a chance to buy shares. A maximum of 15 per cent of shares may be held by any one individual or company; there will, however, be no restriction on foreign investors.

CN employees will continue in their current positions in the new CN, and their pensions will be protected under the Pension Benefits Standards Act. A standard stock savings plan will be offered to CN employees to encourage their participation in the new company.

The Head Office will remain in Montreal, and the Official Languages Act will continue to apply to CN employees. These provisions will have not impact on CN's "saleability", because they have both been in place for a long time and have served the CN and its customers well.

We believe that putting CN on a solid and viable financial footing is the best way to ensure that it will be able to maintain coast to coast rail service. CN must have every opportunity to compete fairly and aggressively with all its competitors, primarily, the trucking industry, CP Rail and the U.S. railroads.

To achieve these objectives, we have struck a balance between the obligations we wish to impose on the new company and the negative effects these could have on both the viability of CN and on the value of our equity.

The size of the public offering of CN stock is the largest in Canadian history and makes this balance a very delicate one. We need to be careful about imposing too many restrictions on CN. We must attract international investors, especially those in the U.S., with positive experience in rail investment. We want to ensure that the CN is free to function and finance its operations as its competitors do.

[English]

It is not our intention to impose onerous foreign ownership and service obligations on the new CN that do not apply to CP. We want to make sure that control of CN is broadly based so that no single individual or company controls more than 15 per cent of the shares.

CN has to be put on a sound financial footing. To achieve this, CN's current debt of $2.5 billion will have to be reduced to approximately $1.5 billion. CN's debt will have to be reduced to a level where it will receive an investment grade rating similar to that of its main Canadian and U.S. competitors. Our goal is to have CN in a capital position that would allow for at least a BBB bond rating.

The company is expected to raise funds to reduce debt prior to the sale by selling assets such as CN Exploration, which it has recently done, and the Scribe hotel in France which is currently being marketed. CN is also currently pursuing the sale of CANAC and its AMF maintenance shops in Montreal as well as some leasehold interests. CN's Canadian non–rail assets are not part of the deal. They will be retained by the crown. Our intention is to put the new company in a competitive position, not to tip the level of the playing field in CN's favour.

The legislation represents the government's firm commitment that both the company and the taxpayer must be treated fairly when the shares go to market. We have put together a unique structure to manage what will be the largest initial public offering in Canadian business history.

We have an agreement with three investment banks, ScotiaMcLeod Inc., Goldman, Sachs and Company of New York and Nesbitt Burns Inc., to form a consortium for the purposes of leading the deal. The arrangement will allow the Government of Canada and CN to draw on the resources and experience of these institutions in the decision making process.

Competition and a viable railroad system from coast to coast is burdened by the current regulatory environment. It is my intention to present to the House legislation that will chart the way to major reforms of our regulatory regime before summer. The legislation will provide the regulatory framework for the future of transportation in Canada. It will encourage the creation of short line railways and it will provide for real competition.

The regulatory process will ensure there will be no abandonment of service unless no one, private sector or government, wishes to take up the line. That will be the most obvious benefit of the reform but it will go much further. It will also provide the framework to allow all modes of transportation to perform efficiently and effectively without needless government intervention.

The aim is to put in place the framework for integrated transportation based on a policy that is consistent, transparent and fair for everyone. Transport Canada will focus its efforts on maintaining and improving the world class safety record enjoyed by our transportation industry, whether on the surface, in the air or on the water.

Our transportation system must be modern, dynamic, innovative, growing and as unrestricted as possible. We must constantly move forward to find newer and better ways to move our goods and our people if we are to remain competitive as a nation.

The air sector has been modernized with a national air force policy, open skies, bilateral agreements with the U.S., the international air routes policy and the commercialization of the air navigation system that will take place in April 1996. We will also announce the marine policy initiative the government intends to pursue before the end of 1995.

I support the motion to refer this legislation to the Standing Committee on Transport for review prior to second reading. I believe the Standing Committee on Transport will be well able to handle this task, as evidenced by the national marine strategy report tabled recently by the chairman, the member for Hamilton West. I look forward to hearing its suggestions and views on this legislation.

Over the years successive governments have attempted to maintain a reasonable level of competition in our rail transportation system. That strategy has only been relatively successful. It is time now for the government to withdraw from the direct operation of railroads and let the private sector do its job. It is time to put the private sector entrepreneurial skills we know exist to work to make CN a viable, successful and competitive operation.

I have every confidence that with this legislation the government is taking another step in its commitment to providing for an integrated, affordable, viable and competitive transportation system in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before following up on the debate, I remind the House the debate will be at the maximum 180 minutes—three hours—before the question is put. Interventions will be no more than 10 minutes without questions or comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois approves in principle the government's proposal to sell CN to private interests. However, it has serious reservations about certain provisions of Bill C-89.

I will propose amendments to these provisions in committee. We object to clauses 8 and 16. We will also recommend an amendment to clause 6 regarding CN property that may be transferred to the Minister of Transport so that he can put it up for sale later.

Let us start with clause 8. One purpose—undoubtedly laudable—of its seven subsections is to prevent any individual, corporation or associate as defined in subsection (4) from holding more than 15 per cent of voting shares.

Notwithstanding these provisions, subsection (5) allows two such associates to disassociate, so to speak, from each other for the purposes of the act by submitting a statutory declaration stating that they are not acting and will not act in concert with respect to their interests in CN.

Each of the declarants may acquire voting shares up to a maximum of 15 per cent as if he or she was not associated with the other person. This dispensation, which broadens the pool and purchasing power of potential buyers, is probably necessary given the size of the operation. However, CN administrators must still be able to check if, in fact, declarants comply with the terms and conditions of their statutory declarations.

We feel that such control would be difficult to exercise in the case of foreign buyers. We are therefore proposing an amendment under which subsection (5) respecting the statutory declaration would be restricted to Canadian buyers. As a result, two or more foreign associates will not be able to exceed the 15 per cent limit by submitting statutory declarations.

If clause 8 aimed at preventing an individual or corporate takeover of CN must be approved in principle, the same cannot be said of clause 16. Regrettably, even in this bill whose provisions should have been purely financial in nature, the government could not resist, once again, one of its old demons: trying to invade an area of provincial jurisdiction.

Clause 16 may appear harmless. It reads as follows:

> (1) The railway and other transportation works in Canada of CN, of every subsidiary of CN and of every corporation formed by any consolidation or amalgamation of any two or more of those corporations are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

The catch is that, once they are declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, these works will be subject to federal legislation. If CN reaches a joint ownership agreement with a short-line railway, this railway will shift from provincial to federal jurisdiction, as suggested in the Nault report, we should point out. And the deed will be done.

Not only is the principle of this federal encroachment on a provincial jurisdiction unacceptable, but so are the economics of it, as we all know that one of the main reasons short-line railways can operate on sections considered non profitable by major companies is that they are not subject to cumbersome federal railway regulations. Short–line railways need the operating flexibility provincial regulations give them, at least in Quebec.

This federal initiative is therefore likely to discourage the creation of short–line railways and limit their numbers. We must realize that each one of these railways is a section saved from abandonment. If the government now interferes with the development of short–line railways, this will mean that a larger part of the rail network in Quebec and Canada will be abandoned. So, we suggest that only interprovincial works of CN and its subsidiaries, and not those works which are entirely comprised within a province, be declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

Moving on to the intention expressed by the minister to purchase and sell separately CN non–railway assets, including AMF, a Quebec company. This company employs some 1,300 people whose jobs could be endangered if the company's ties with CN were severed. Under clause 6 of the bill, the minister may, while CN is a Crown corporation, direct CN to transfer such property. We will move an amendment providing that, before selling these companies, the minister, to protect jobs, will ensure that they are viable and, if need be, will take steps to ensure that they are.

To conclude, while agreeing in principle with privatizing CN, the Bloc Quebecois cannot help but notice that, far from resulting from a rail policy based on the requirements of the economy, this transaction pursues the purely budgetary goal of bringing in a lot of money very quickly. It is not a rational choice. It is a fire sale by a hard–pressed government.

Pressured by creditors, obsessed by Moody's downgrading of its rating, the federal government is putting up for public sale one of our crown jewels, a national treasure, because it desperately needs money to pay the interest on the accumulated debt caused by 20 years of mismanagement. There may be no other way out, but what an admission of failure.

We are witnessing, stunned by such incompetence and the misfortune of being governed by such poor leaders, the decline of a government that had its heyday before the current Prime Minister began, some 20 years ago, as the then finance minister, to dig this bottomless grave into which our national debt is dragging us, and the proceeds from the sale of CN will be but a shovel full of dirt in this grave.

In the face of this failure, how can one resist the temptation of comparing the Canadian federal system to a father who has to sell the family furniture and silver to pay household bills after getting deep into debt because of profligate spending and improvidence? No wonder, Mr. Speaker, that we, Quebecers, are anxious to get out of the house.

[English]

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when I made my first speech in the House I stated I was not here to oppose for opposition sake. If the government brought forward good legislation I would be the first to congratulate it. I also stated if I thought the legislation was not good I would offer constructive alternatives as to how the legislation could be made better. Bill C–89 covers both of these situations.

There is no denying the primary concept of the bill, to privatize CN Rail, is a good move. It is something the Reform Party has been pushing for since before the election. I spoke strongly in favour of privatization during transport committee hearings with the NEWCO concept and again when I made a presentation to the all Liberal task force on CN Rail.

The tone of the discussions by the members of the all Liberal task force raised the concern with me they might not be working toward the privatization of CN Rail. I am very pleased to see the government finally got around to doing the right thing. It is certainly better late than never.

In keeping with the first part of my maiden speech, I congratulate the government for accepting yet another Reform policy. However, as it seems to be a constant pattern with the Liberals as they adopt Reform ideas and policies, they lose most of the common sense in our ideas when they put their own stamp on them. This brings me to the second part of my first speech, constructive alternatives needed to make a badly worded concept a viable reality.

The Reform Party will support Bill C–89 at first reading so it can be sent to committee where I hope the government will be as receptive to amendments necessary to make this legislation work sensibly and fairly as it was in following our idea on the concept. In supporting the bill at first reading, I can assure the House it is the concept and not the content we are in favour of.

With regard to the content, there are many problems I will be addressing at committee. Areas of concern include the minister's unrestricted power to reduce or even eliminate CN Rail's debt. In this there is a potential for disaster for both the Canadian taxpayer and the rail transportation industry. If the minister plans only to do what is reasonable then he should not mind restrictions in the bill to confirm this. If he plans to go further than is reasonable then he must be stopped.

In the same area of concern is the question of the real estate assets of CN Rail being separated from the rail operation to be sold. The sale of these assets should be the primary method of debt reduction of loans carried by CN Rail. That sale should go to the private sector, not from the taxpayer owned corporation to a department of the government using the taxpayers' money to buy their own assets from themselves. This action would bring us to a new height of creative accounting.

There seems to be some confusion between government departments, the Liberal dominated Standing Committee on Transport and the minister as to what is really planned. The Reform Party is quite prepared to help them sort that out in committee.

I am also concerned about the section which limits the share of purchases to a maximum of 15 per cent of the total shares. In marketing the shares of CN Rail to the public there are only two types of investors who would look at such an offer. One is the common investor made up of individuals, companies or investment groups. This type of investor buys shares primarily for a return on investment. CN Rail's track record does not provide a very rosy picture for this sort of investor unless they feel a new private sector operator can run the company much more efficiently than it has been run in the past.

This brings us to the second type of investor: a company or a group of individuals who believe they can operate the rail company much more efficiently than in the past, thus raising the value of their investment. Such an investor would be far less likely to invest if they felt they could not purchase a large enough portion of the company to ensure that the needed new operating efficiencies would be implemented. Let us not kid ourselves, the general investors are not going to be lining up to purchase a company with such a losing track record as CN Rail has had.

Two provisions contained in the legislation that would create restrictions on a new company when formed are neither common to their competitors nor necessary. These two restrictions are the requirement to maintain the corporate headquarters in Montreal forever and the requirement to maintain the current official language policy of the government. It makes no sense to require a company to maintain its headquarters in any one city, nor to require it to follow any other restrictions that are not followed by the rest of their industry. As I said earlier, this company is going to be hard enough to market without placing a bunch of ill–conceived restrictions in the way of the sale.

Other concerns involve items that are not contained in the legislation. These include some measure of protection for Canadian investors, including individual workers and unions in the company. The rail industry in Canada has occupied a special part in the building of this country. Many Canadians may want to try to be part of the revitalization of one of our national rail companies and certainly should be given every opportunity to participate. One way to ensure they would have this opportunity would be to restrict the sale of shares upon introduction to Canadian individuals and companies before opening it up to the international market. I know that it will likely take an international market to sell off all the shares of CN Rail, but what is wrong with offering a little benefit to the Canadian people who we are here to represent in the process?

Another area to be considered is the suggestion I made in my presentation to the all Liberal task force last year. That idea involves the consideration of selling only the rolling stock and buildings of CN Rail and retaining the track infrastructure to form a common rail system that would be open to all railway operators on a cost recovery basis. This would include revenue from diesel fuel taxes paid by the rail companies. To be successful this would have to incorporate CP Rail's track as well, but it would not have to be government owned. It could be set up as an industry and user operated system, just the same as we are in the process of doing in the aviation sector with air navigation services. This would open up the track to any rail operator, which would greatly enhance the potential for short line operators.

These are some of the concerns I will be bringing to the committee stage of the legislation. The government has shown good sense in accepting the concept of Reform policies on this issue. I hope the good sense will continue, so that they can also accept the amendments necessary to change this from a good concept to good legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C–89, particularly after hearing the objections made by the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke to the CN head office's remaining in Montreal. I simply want to thank the hon. member, because he is helping us win the upcoming referendum. We often hear members from English Canada say that Quebec gets too much and that the federal government is too generous with our province. It is just incredible to hear such comments.

That being said, my purpose is to tell those Canadians who are watching us today about this important bill.

This will only be a foretaste, if I can put it that way. Indeed, the real fight will come in committee, where our party intends to condemn this bill. The Minister of Transport will appear before committee members tomorrow afternoon, at 3 p.m. We hope that he will answer our questions in a more explicit manner than he has usually done in the House, where he is arrogant and often hurls insults at the opposition.

As well, I can hardly wait until Wednesday, when the transport committee will welcome CN's president, Paul Tellier, the one who benefited from a generous interest–free loan of $300,000 to buy a $345,000 house in Westmount. This will be my first encounter with Mr. Tellier, since that generous loan was granted to him.

And now for the most important aspects of this bill. In committee, our party, the Bloc Quebecois, will seek amendments because of two major objections we have to this bill. The first one concerns clause 8. This clause is very important because it imposes limits on the total percentage of shares that may be owned by a person or a group of persons.

Let me tell you about some of my concerns. For instance, I am afraid of an indirect U.S. takeover through company affiliates. Presumably, the minister or the parliamentary secretary will say that they plan to cap the percentage of shares held by Canadian or foreign companies at 15 per cent and that this point is very well covered. My point is that, as happens from time to time, some companies might have certain agreements. I am not talking about collusion. Certain agreements might be made under the table, as they say where I come from, in order to do indirectly what they could not do directly.

Clause 8 also contains the provision that CN shall maintain its head office in the Montreal urban community. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, unlike the Reform Party, our party cannot object to this recommendation.

Subclause 2 of clause 8 refers to strict provisions that will be enforced in the case of non–compliance with the 15 per cent limit. Of course, there is no restriction on shares held by the Government of Canada.

Subclause 4 provides a detailed definition of the term associate. The Standing Committee on Transport will have to consider this point later on. We find subclause 5 very disturbing because it provides for exceptions to subclause 4. That is something we will have to discuss in connection with the 15 per cent ceiling on ownership of CN shares.

Another point that will also gain by further study is the provision that the directors of CN shall determine whether persons in the group comply with the statements in a statutory declaration and are acting independently and not in concert. The reason the government included this paragraph is probably that it did not want to exclude companies which are part of vast financial consortiums with independent subsidiaries from becoming shareholders in CN.

I will give you an example. Could Bell Canada Enterprises buy a 15 per cent share; Northern Telecom, 15 per cent; Montreal Trust, 15 per cent; and Bell Canada itself, another 15 per cent? This would be tantamount to the situation I mentioned earlier in which one interest could indirectly achieve what it is prohibited from doing directly. The related companies I just named could take a 60 per cent share of CN. That is food for thought. In itself, this exception is certainly important, but it is not particularly worrisome because clause 8 prohibits companies from associating to form a controlling interest in CN.

Another paragraph of clause 8 defines control. Essentially, "control" means control in any manner that results in control in fact, whether directly through the ownership of a majority of shares or through negotiations between shareholders. Regarding the definition of a voting share in clause 8, I would like to ask what is the technical implication of the stipulation that a voting share is a share carrying voting rights, including a security currently convertible into such a share and currently exercisable options and rights to acquire such a share or such a convertible security? The Standing Committee on Transport will have to get answers to these questions.

With respect to clause 8, I have set out our party's position very clearly for you. The Bloc Quebecois will propose an amendment to close the gap we found in the bill.

We also strongly disagree with clause 16. We disagree with it completely, because we believe it gives the federal government the option of getting involved in what we in Quebec call the CFILs, local trains, or what the rest of Canada calls short lines.

We consider this clause particularly underhanded, because it declares Canadian National works and subsidiaries to be works for the general advantage of Canada and implies that these subsidiaries and works will remain under federal jurisdiction. Thus, under any joint ownership agreement CN concludes with CFILs, these short lines will come under federal jurisdiction. In Quebec, a CFIL was set up for the lines linking the Abitibi and the Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean regions, where employees agreed to operate the CFIL according to an agreement with CN.

Therefore, we consider that clause 16 flies in the face of CFILs as an intraprovincial form of transportation, one that operates within the province, which are thus currently under provincial jurisdiction.

I do not claim to have a monopoly on truth. The people at Transport Canada, the minister and Mr. Tellier will tell us the opposite, but our understanding of clause 16 is that it will make this means of intraprovincial transportation—that is, within the province—, currently under provincial jurisdiction, come under federal jurisdiction.

As you no doubt know, Mr. Speaker, our party, which has repeatedly had occasion in this House to reject all the federal government's attempts at centralization—what the Prime Minister calls flexible federalism—will not let the federal government try to lay its hand on this field of provincial jurisdiction. In any case, this also came up in the Nault report, which suggested that CFILs should come under federal jurisdiction.

You remember the Nault report, the work of a partisan group comprising only Liberal members and one Liberal senator and excluding the opposition parties, the democratically elected

Bloc Quebecois and Reform Party. This is part of what we consider totally inadmissible, and we will call for amendments to clause 16.

In closing, there is a third point where we require more information. It concerns the future of CN's current subsidiaries such as the AMF locomotive works in Montreal or the Can–Car plant. We also want reassurance about the future of these subsidiaries with a privatized CN.

With that being said, the best is yet to come on Tuesday and Wednesday before the Standing Committee on Transport.

[English]

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to make my contribution as one of the first speakers on Bill C–89, which would privatize CN's rail assets, including their track, rolling stocks, buildings, et cetera.

Unfortunately, the bill excludes a major part of CN's assets, such as non–railway real estate assets, probably the most valuable part of the company. Reformers would like to see these assets sold off before the privatization effort takes place, in order to reduce CN's debt load.

My hon. colleague has described a number of flaws with the bill that need to be fixed. These include prohibiting the government from arbitrarily cancelling all or part of CN's debts prior to privatization; removing the requirement to leave CN's headquarters in Montreal; removing the requirement that CN comply with the government's policy of official bilingualism; and removing the 15 per cent ownership restriction.

I want to use my time today not just to point out the obvious flaws in this bill but to talk about privatization in general and introduce a number of ideas for consideration by the government before this bill is sent to committee.

The privatization of CN is a good thing, but the government has an opportunity to make it a great thing. I want to suggest the government use this, its first effort at privatization, as a testing ground for the privatization of all crown corporations.

In 1987 Madsen Pirie, president of the Adam Smith Institute in London, a world renowned expert on privatization, spoke at a Canadian symposium on privatization organized by the Fraser Institute. He had this to say about the fundamentals of privatizing a crown corporation:

> When government engages in an activity such as privatization, it is speaking to several audiences. Among the audiences that government speaks to are the managers of crown corporations, the workers who are employed in them, the members of the general public who are customers of crown corporations, the general public who are taxpayers and who pay subsidies to support the losses of those corporations, potential investors who might buy shares in those corporations, the financial and business community which takes an interest in their performance, and the media commentators who observe this process and comment on the results and declare it to be a success or a failure. Every act of privatization speaks to all of those audiences, and every act should be tailor made to maximize the support of each of those different groups.

When reviewing this bill we should test it against Dr. Pirie's list of vested interests or audiences. Bill C–89 must address each of the groups affected by the privatization: the managers, the workers, the customers, the taxpayers and the investors. If Bill C–89 does not specifically address each of the needs and interests of these groups, amendments will be necessary.

Dr. Pirie also outlined three key principles of privatization. First, never cancel a benefit. If people are deriving a benefit from the public activity of a crown corporation, never cancel it, however unjust it is.

Second, make friends out of your enemies. Find out who the people are who might lose on the privatization process and structure the policy to make sure they gain instead.

Third, disarm the opposition. Identify all possible objections to privatization and tailor make the policy so every single one of these objections is dealt with in advance. The government should ensure it has considered each of Dr. Pirie's three principles in planning for the privatization of CN and the necessary legislative measures are included in Bill C–89.

Based on these audiences and principles I believe that every privatization initiative must have a list of groups with a vested interest in the sale of CN and give them the first opportunity to buy CN shares. CN employees should be given the first opportunity and the highest priority. CN customers come second on the priority list and Canadian taxpayers and investors are third.

I would also like to explore some new ideas for consideration by the government before Bill C–89 becomes the law of the land. What about linking two or more government objectives into one?

For example, the government is giving landowners in the west a one–time payout for eliminating the WGTA subsidy for the railways, commonly known as the Crow rate. Would it be possible to give western farmers the choice to have their Crow rate buyout in the form of shares rather than cash? Farmers could then have a direct financial interest in the economic performance of CN. If done properly, the government could overcome opposition to both the Crow rate buyout and the privatization of CN with one move. I offer this idea to be explored by the government to lessen some of the negative effects of both programs.

In 1986 the Economic Council of Canada published the report: "Minding the Public's Business". In chapter five titled "Government Enterprise and Business" the economic council made the following recommendations:

> Entry into rail carriage could be promoted in different ways. The provisions in the proposed legislation could be expanded to make running rights more easily available and to open entry into rail carriage to anyone who can meet the basic requirements related to safety and liability coverage. Instead of regulating the activities of CN and CP in their capacity as providers of the roadbed, the management of all track could be assigned to a new publicly owned track authority. This would require the nationalization of CP's roadbed and the separation of CN's track from the other components of its operation. Alternatively, a public track authority could be created, based exclusively on the infrastructure of CN.

This is an idea whose time has finally come. The government should give serious consideration to establishing a public track authority which would operate similarly to our highway system. This would eliminate the tax disadvantage placed on rail companies because while they pay fuel taxes, they also have to pay the full costs of maintaining their own railbed. Trucks on the other hand pay fuel taxes but their roadbed, the highways, are maintained at public expense.

Such a public track authority could charge user fees to rail companies based on the use they make of the tracks and as a result could be self–financing. At some point in the future even the public track authority could be privatized.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce supports a fully user pay rail infrastructure. It had this to say in its 1994 submission to the special joint committee reviewing Canada's foreign policy:

> Canadian businesses are increasingly pointing to an unlevel playing field between the Canadian and U.S. commercial environments—.One tangible example among many can be found in the Canadian transportation industry. Rail, for example, provides the most economic mode of transportation for a large part of Canada's freight and for many shippers is the only cost effective mode. It is fundamental to Canada's trade, moving 40 per cent of Canada's exports and provides a fully user pay infrastructure not liable to ongoing public funding.

Finally, I would like to comment on the importance of the port of Churchill to the farmers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The privatization of CN should be seen as an opportunity to privatize, expand markets, modernize and increase exports and imports through the port of Churchill.

This will take more than just the privatization of CN. It will take the co–operation and likely the privatization of both VIA Rail and Ports Canada. It will take the co–operation of the federal government, the governments of the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and the co–operation and support of every community and producer whose future will be improved by taking advantage of the most cost effective shipping route for bulk commodities to our customers in Europe, Africa and South America.

I respectfully ask the government not to look at the Churchill line and the port of Churchill as a liability but as an opportunity requiring creative thinking and a co–operative creative privatization strategy. I hope to have an opportunity to comment on a few of these ideas in future debates on Bill C–89.

I would like to close with the comments Dr. Pirie made at the 1987 Fraser symposium. He describes the most exciting part of the privatization process. He said:

> You will find privatization enables you to bring opportunities to ordinary people. It gives your citizens a chance to take part in the wealth creating process. It speeds up economic growth. It cuts the costs of government. It turns losses into tax revenues. In Britain, it is ending the old politics of division—the old politics of "us who don't have it and them that do".

These are the real reasons that Reformers support privatization of crown corporations.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by commenting on the process here. As I understand when the procedure for referring a bill to committee before second reading was thought about in the standing committee on procedure some time ago, frankly I do not think this was the kind of bill we had in mind for referral to committee so early on. In my judgment this is the kind of bill on which there should be a full second reading debate on the principle of whether or not CN should be privatized.

I would like to register my objection to what I would consider to be a misuse of this particular procedure. Presumably it is in order to avoid just that kind of full scale debate about the privatization of CN, although I do not know why the government would bother to avoid it. Obviously there is a great deal of agreement between itself and at least the Reform Party on this measure.

Also, the government has an obligation to instruct or ask the committee, whatever is appropriate, to consult with the communities and other stakeholders that will be affected by the privatization. Just to have the hearings in Ottawa without going to Winnipeg and other places where people have good reason to be anxious about the effect of the privatization of CN is a mistake. It is certainly something the government should reconsider although I do not expect it too. It seems to be in an unholy rush to have this all over and done with, a rush which I do not understand.

This is a very sad day for me. I will have been in this House 16 years come next week. I have spent those 16 years defending and promoting the role of CNR as a publicly owned railway company. I had hoped and for many years I had thought that this day would never come. I certainly did not expect it to come under the auspices of a Liberal government.

At times I felt if the Conservatives had been re–elected that at some point they would have done this. I remember back in 1978 when I was just a candidate for Parliament and had not yet been elected. I was critical of Harvie Andre, then a Conservative member of Parliament for Calgary for his proposal to privatize the CNR. I always thought that this was something in the back of the collective Conservative mind. The fact that it is happening now under a Liberal government to me simply makes the point—I wonder if the Bloc Quebecois could have their caucus meeting somewhere else, Mr. Speaker. I am trying to make a speech.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. Our colleague is seeking the co–operation of the House. I would ask those who wish to talk to do so outside the House if possible.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: The fact that this is now happening under a Liberal government is proof positive to me of the consistency and the continuity of the corporate agenda which involves deregulation, privatization and free trade. I have to say that even I, and I have been here for a long time and know just how devious and how flexible shall we say the Liberal Party is, find the initiative taken by the government for the privatization of CN to be deeply surprising and deeply wounding.

In my own case, I do not think there is a person in my family for three generations who has not worked for the CNR at one time or another or worked there their entire life. That is true of a lot of people in my home town of Transcona where the main back shop for the CNR is.

I understand the position of the Bloc Quebecois in defending that part of the legislation which calls for the retention of Montreal as the location for the headquarters of the new privatized CN. However, I hope it will be equally understanding when it contemplates my anger that my community is not protected in the same way. Transcona is every bit as much a part of the history of the CNR as Montreal, going back to pre–CNR days when the shops began to be constructed in 1908 and 1909 around which the town of Transcona was created.

I object to the notion some people are protected by this legislation and others are not, that Montreal is protected; where the headquarters of the CNR is and will be is protected. Transcona's role in the life of the CNR is not protected. Presumably Transcona shops can be sold, cannibalized, balkanized, anything can happen to them. This legislation does not even acknowledge the existence of that place. Therefore I would like to register my objection to that.

I find it doubly insulting, offensive and tragic that not only is CN to be privatized but it could very well be sold to a variety of foreign interests. I see the solicitor general across the way. I remember being inspired when I was yet a high school student by the Gray report on foreign ownership of the Canadian economy. We have come a long way since then. We have come a long way since we hoped to repatriate elements of our economy that were under foreign ownership. Now we have a Liberal government, of which that same member is a member, privatizing and at the same time making it possible for foreign interests to own significantly Canadian National.

There is nothing in the bill to prevent the wholesale dismantling of the CNR or its being broken up into a number of fragments and sold off. I just finished reading this bill carefully and there is nothing in it to prevent an informal alliance of interests by which four or five American railways or other companies could buy 15 per cent each of the CNR and through that natural convergence of interests that does not fit any of the legal descriptions we find in the bill manipulate the future and the nature of the CNR to their own advantage in a way that may not be to the advantage of Canada.

Perhaps that is the point. Perhaps it is passé to talk about Canada. Perhaps it is passé to talk about making the economy or the marketplace accountable to something called the country or something called the public interest. Over time we have seen that notion erode and finally, I think with this bill, completely fall away so that voices like mine sound vaguely romantic or unrealistic in this context.

Nevertheless, I think I speak for a notion of the country which many people still cherish and which they regret seeing disappear as a result of this.

There is no provision in here for the future of VIA. It says the new CN can continue to charge VIA whatever it pleases. I would like to have seen something in here which would have demanded some accountability for what the new company would charge VIA. Is this to be the way VIA will disappear because the new company will charge VIA rates not tenable and therefore the next thing to go will be VIA? I would like not to have seen any of this but if it has to happen I would like to have seen consideration of the notion of having all the track in Canada owned by the government so that at least the government would continue to have a stake in our transportation system.

Finally, I believe none of this had to happen. I believe with the proper reregulation of our railway system the CNR and the CPR could have been healthy and viable. Instead, thanks to deregulation, thanks to imitating things happening south of the border we allowed ourselves to evolve to a point at which our railways are no longer viable.

With the appropriate policy changes on the tax side and various other changes we could have built a transportation system publicly owned on one side by CNR and privately owned on the other by CPR which would have been environmentally friendly because it would have been in favour of the railways. We have failed to do that. This will only lead to more trucking and to a transportation system which in my judgement will be less fit for the future than the one we have now.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in the debate on Bill C–89. You may wonder why the health critic is interested in privatization or in Bill C–89. I am interested in this matter because CN trains go through my riding; they even go through one of the largest cities in my riding.

This bill would allow the government to privatize the most symbolic of Crown corporations: CN. It is surprising, to say the least, to see how fast symbols are disappearing from Canada these days. Institutions that were previously considered a sacred trust are now faced with the sorry state of government finance.

The CBC's mandate has gradually eroded, since the government no longer gives this corporation the financial resources needed to meet its original goals. The Canadian health care system is also caught in our government's financial mess. While some still see our health care system as the great Canadian unifying project, many realize, in the light of what is happening across Canada, that the provinces can only do so much given the federal government's unilateral cuts.

Privatizing CN would remove another page from our album of Canadian symbols. No other institution has done so much to help shape Canada as we still know it today.

How many towns and regions took shape and developed around the railways? Yesterday's symbols are being destroyed by the government's financial impasse. Through this bill, the government wants to establish a mechanism that would allow it to remove one of these symbols from its public accounts.

By and large, we agree with this move. We will, however, monitor this operation very closely so that privatization does not become a mess like the recent shady deal relating to Pearson airport in Toronto. We clearly cannot let the interests of the government's wealthy financial backers prevail over those of taxpayers, who own CN. There are some justified fears that the Pearson airport mess does nothing to allay.

The bill says that the shares of CN will be transferred to the Minister of Transport, who will hold them in trust for the Government of Canada. On the direction of the Minister of Transport, CN will have to submit an application for a certificate of continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act. In fact, CN will cease to exist as a crown corporation and become a business corporation.

The bill imposes certain constraints on the new articles of continuance of CN. First, the voting shares that an individual or group of persons can hold is limited to 15 per cent; second, the head office is to remain in Montreal; and third, once privatized, CN will remain subject to the Official Languages Act.

If passed, this bill would authorize the Minister of Transport to deal with shares of CN with the approval of the Minister of Finance. The Bloc Quebecois has nothing against the principle of privatizing CN. However, we hope that CN will really see its efficiency and competitiveness increase as a result of privatization, as the government claims it will. To ensure that the transaction will produce the expected level of competitiveness for the new owners, CN should not be sold at reduced price. We intend to monitor the government closely in that regard, to prevent taxpayers from making a nice big gift to a privileged few.

So, reviewing the provisions of this bill, we find certain flaws that we would like to see remedied before final approval. Clause 8 of the bill imposes a constraint on the total percentage of shares that an individual or group of individuals can hold. The limit is set at 15 per cent. On the other hand, under clause 8(5), a group of individuals known to be associates would be allowed to hold more than 15 per cent of CN shares on presentation of a mere solemn declaration to the effect that these individuals will not act in concert.

It would be up to CN management to determine whether the group in question stood by their solemn declaration and really acted independently rather than in concert. Our main concern is that this leaves the door wide open for a foreign takeover, since a holding could meet these conditions. Several companies operating independently may in fact have the same majority shareholder. This provision, combined with the lack of constraints on foreign ownership, makes us fear a possible loss of Canadian control.

It is the minister's responsibility to keep this asset, built with money from the taxpayers of Quebec and Canada, under Canadian control. It would be unacceptable, after investing billions in public funds in that railway network, to let it fall into the hands of foreign interests. CN must remain under Canadian control to avoid a rerouting of its traffic to feed American railway companies.

Clause 8(5) is unacceptable in its current form, since it allows a foreign group made up of related companies to acquire a majority of CN's shares. The only protection against an effective takeover is a decision by CN's board members to the effect that these businesses comply with their pledge not to act in a concerted manner.

As you know, a company acts first and foremost with its shareholders' interests in mind. If the companies which own CN's stocks are all owned by the same shareholder, they do not have to act in a concerted manner to do the same thing. Consequently, Clause 8(5) must be reviewed or, at least, its application should be restricted to Canadian groups.

We also object to clause 16, where railway and other transportation works, as well as every subsidiary of CN, are declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. That clause would allow the federal government to interfere in areas which fall under provincial jurisdiction, such as short–line railways. It would be totally unacceptable, as well as economically inefficient and unjustifiable, to have these railways come under federal jurisdiction.

These companies successfully operate sections which are considered to be unprofitable by major railway companies. They can do so because they are not subjected to the numerous federal regulations on rail transport. These companies need the flexibility afforded by provincial regulations to operate successfully. This attempt by the federal government could deter the development of such companies and could limit their number. It must be understood that each of these short lines operates on sections which were going to be abandoned. If the government interferes with the development of such short lines, more lines in Quebec and in Canada will be abandoned.

I am also concerned about the survival of existing CN subsidiaries whose activities are not related to railway transport. The minister said that those CN subsidiaries which are not directly related to rail transport will be sold separately. These subsidiaries include some Quebec companies which are currently experiencing financial difficulties. We will have to ensure that these companies can survive without CN, and that their current level of employment is maintained.

In conclusion, we will have to review major elements of this bill, so that a badly planned privatization does not result in a waste of all the money the taxpaters of Quebec and Canada invested in CN.

[English]

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is about time a Liberal government realized the private sector can operate and manage a commercial enterprise far better than government can. I have been waiting a long time to hear that.

We on this side of the House support ending government involvment in the financial sinkhole of political policy that operated CN Rail. We do, however, have some concerns about the manner in which this government is turning the former government operated financial sinkhole into a commercial operation.

As members know, when government sold off the money losing Air Canada to private interests government also wrote off Air Canada debt, which caused other Canadian airlines grievous harm. The question to be asked is whether this government will have the political courage to rid taxpayers of the money losing CN without causing unjustified harm to Canadian Pacific. Will this Liberal government act fairly, or will it continue government intervention into private industry? I fear that on both counts the answer if no.

This Liberal government has already written into this legislation interventions that will severely harm CP Rail and place manacles on the new owners, if any, of CN. This government, in its usual haste to appear to do something, has allowed the taxpayers to once again bail out previous government errors.

Instead of ending government involvement in CN, this Liberal government divorced one sector of CN holdings from the other. Instead of having taxpayers bail out debt, why is this government not selling off CN real estate assets and using that money to pay down the debt? Why is government holding on to the assets instead of sparing taxpayers further pain?

This Liberal government is asking taxpayers to forgive debt that is rightly payable by CN. They ask taxpayers to once again pay for governemnt mismanagement. This governent is also asking anyone who purchases CN to be bound by rules and regulations that will hamstring its future owners.

Why is this Liberal government making as a condition of sale that the head office for future CN owners must remain in Montreal? If this condition does not or will not make good business sense, must the future owners be shackled with another political decision? If CN is to be privatized, let the new owners be free to decide what is best for the railway and its customers.

Why does the Liberal government always preach freedom of enterprise and freedom for private business to operate in the marketplace yet always place restrictions upon private enterprise? That is anything but free. This governemnt states that private industry can operate better than governemnt in the marketplace, but then this government places cost consuming measures, such as maintaining an official languages policy, on prospective purchasers. Again, we have this government stating one goal while doing everything in its power to prevent accomplishment of that goal.

Why can this government never get it right? Why can this government not understand that intervention in the freedom of the marketplace or in constituents' lives will not encourage growth and prosperity? We on this side of the House understand fully that private initiative is the best means to economic growth and wealth and that private initiative reacting to a free marketplace will create opportunity for Canadians. Unfortunately, this government cannot or will not believe that independent Canadians know what is best for a continuation of prosperity.

The members opposite continue to believe that private property owned by free citizens must have government interference to be viable. With that in mind, why is this Liberal government restricting ownership by any one sector to 15 per cent of outstanding shares? What if western grain producers and operators can afford to and wish to purchase as much of CN as they can to maintain a say in what prices will be charged to move their grain to market? What if western interests want to make certain CN will charge the price that is necessary to move the grain and make a profit but prevent outside interests from arbitrarily setting extremely high rates to ship their grain? What if these Canadian interests wish to purchase more than 15 per cent? Why can they not?

Why does this Liberal government continue to talk free enterprise but always intervene in the free market? Why does the government always put up barriers to the free movement of goods, services, and enterprise? Can it not understand that its outdated measures are holding back the future growth and the competitiveness that are required to make Canada an effective force in the world market?

Several ideas have been forthcoming that would allow hard–pressed taxpayers to recover some of their investment in CN. One idea is rationalizing the CN operation for public sale based solely on offering rolling stock, trucking, and real estate for public tender and having government retain ownership of the iron highway. Taxpayers have purchased the asphalt highways in this land. Why not allow taxpayers to keep the iron highways they have purchased?

Just as government levies a fee to use the open road, a realistic fee could be charged to all users of the iron highway. This measure will allow taxpayers to receive some return on the investment that opened this land from sea to sea. This measure has been tried and found to be viable in Great Britain. Granted, some may shout that government has no place in the iron highway, and some may point out that there are wrongs to this plan, but why does this government not allow discussion on this point? This government is quick to shout that it has consulted on many items in the agenda. Why is this government afraid to consult on this measure in the House?

Do not misunderstand my criticism, Mr. Speaker. I am a firm supporter of privatization, a firm believer that private industry can operate an enterprise far more effectively and efficiently than any government. I am a firm believer that private industry can create jobs and economic wealth far better than any government. However, there are several issues in this legislation that do not offer the best value for the dollar to Canada's hard pressed taxpayers. Make no mistake, it was tax dollars that created the CN this government now wants to pass to private ownership. I have no problem with that decision. I only have a problem with the manner in which this initiative takes place.

Taxpayers deserve maximum return for their investment. Taxpayers deserve liquidation of CN real estate assets to pay down the CN debt, which may make this sale unattractive to some purchasers. Taxpayers do not deserve to have their hard earned dollars used to rid this company of one cent of debt while any asset remains.

Taxpayers do not deserve to have a hidden agenda set by this Liberal government, such as head office location or official languages requirement, which other private enterprises can forgo, to hinder the sale to and the profitability of future owners.

I believe I have raised several issues that require answers. I believe I have pointed out to taxpayers why this government is not giving them the best value for their dollar. It is now up to the government to answer those concerns, and I challenge them to do so.

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to speak on second reading of Bill C–89, whose purpose is to privatize Canadian National, a decision that was announced in the last budget and is well on its way to being implemented.

However, before this bill does what it is supposed to do, which is to privatize CN, there are a few points I would like to raise for the benefit of the Minister of Transport and his colleagues, and I am referring to the importance of the railways for resource rich regions like the Abitibi in Quebec, the riding I represent in this House. My concern is that this bill should benefit, not penalize the railways.

The railway system was one of the keys to the economic development of the Abitibi and, as we all know, was also instrumental in the development of many other resource regions in Quebec and Canada. I often wonder, when I see these small rural municipalities along the railroad tracks, whether they grew up around the railway station or attracted CN to the area so they could expand.

We have to ask whether this government, like previous governments, will again be wide of the mark with its railway development policy and this new policy of privatization.

Could it be that once again, Quebec has been the first to realize the importance of having a modern railway adapted to the needs of today's economy?

We all know that the decline of our Canadian railways is not a measure of their usefulness, since during the recent debate on special legislation tabled by the Liberal government to put the railway companies and their employees back to work, much was made of the importance of the railways for the economy in general.

Oddly enough, the railways were called an essential national service. so that the government could force a settlement during this latest dispute, while in our region we had to fight to justify maintaining sections of the railway network in order to preserve our principal means of shipping our natural resources, our mining and forestry products.

Despite the importance of the railways, the reason for their decline is simple: no government has ever made a serious attempt to remedy the situation when there was still time, although it provided substantial grants for operating the railways.

We have been trying to placate unions for too long, instead of searching for efficient or cost–effective solutions for both the employer and the employee. What effort has this government or previous governments made to promote this means of transport over the past 20 years? Absolutely none. We can sum up the actions of the successive governments by the word "cuts" and the federal leitmotiv "we cannot afford it". Infusions of capital were certainly not the best solution, as we can see by the results today.

Over the past twenty years or more, the only notable things about the coast to coast rail system have been staff cuts, abandonment of lines and cuts to client services. Instead of investing in this great Canadian asset and creating jobs, the government is cutting.

On the other hand, the government found a way to meet the needs of western grain transporters, justifying itself by saying that we need international trade and that our wheat producers have to be competitive. Why did the government not place the same importance on the transport of wood and minerals from northern Quebec and northern Ontario?

Natural resources, and the jobs they create, are the foundation of our economy. The executives controlling rail transport in this country exhibited a flagrant lack of leadership skills. They failed to rationalize an essential service and to make it cost effective when they had the chance. They neglected their responsibilities by letting rolling stock age without replacing or improving it.

The longer they let it go, the higher the costs of getting the equipment back on track. They had gotten so behind in their upkeep and replacement of rolling stock that the situation came to a head at the beginning of the 1970s. The situation only worsened under VIA which, with the weather beaten material it inherited from CN, was never able to break even.

Furthermore, the leaders at the time denied the importance of also maintaining efficient, competitive and aggressive passenger service, deeming it less profitable than freight transportation and not essential because road transportation was available by car or bus. Through its policy, the government supported this situation rather than look for solutions that would put the industry back on a solid footing and would serve the real needs of the communities affected by the flood of lost jobs and services.

Is the government trying to isolate distant localities once and for all by taking away their trains, airports, TV stations and even the social programs the people have contributed to in large and ever growing measure? No study has compared the huge costs of highway maintenance with rail line maintenance in northern regions such as Abitibi, with its notorious climate. The potential end of rail transportation could mean increasingly poor roads. The people in my riding know about this problem. They are faced with increasing numbers of trucks on the road, since the railway was not competitive and lacked the services to compete with the trucking industry.

In my region, this type of transportation is causing a lot of problems, since the highways were not designed to take such heavy loads. It is always the same problem, unfortunately—a lack of consultation. Government makes decisions without consulting the regions and without taking their particular needs into account. Even today, privatizing CN as outlined in this bill does not guarantee that services will be maintained in outlying areas. In spite of this, the federal government gives itself the power to interfere in short–line railway operations through clause 16 of Bill C–89.

This is totally unacceptable, since short–line railways were created thanks to the initiative of rail staff and unions, who took the risks that our leaders had avoided taking in the past. These people feel that some sections abandoned by CN and the government can become profitable through sound management. To fulfil their potential, short–line railways also needed the operating flexibility that only provincial regulations could provide.

It would be dishonest for the government to discourage the creation of short–line railways, or to try to hamper the development or operations of those already in existence by interfering whenever it feels like it. The short–line railway in my riding of Abitibi is a very good example of a CN section. It meets with the Lac–Saint–Jean line. We managed to rescue it from abandonment with all the attendant advantages for our region in terms of jobs, economic benefits, development, transport, and so on.

I would also like to take this opportunity to address clause 8 of this bill. As it now stands, this clause is unacceptable. Let me explain. The government plans to sell most of CN, an institution over 100 years old, through the largest share issue in Canadian history, which would amount to some $2 billion.

Like my Bloc colleagues, I deplore the fact that this government did not include in the bill a clause explicitly prohibiting foreigners from holding a majority of shares. Today, I will try to explain to the Minister of Transport and all his colleagues how important it is to encourage local purchase by local investors if possible or any concrete gesture through short–line railways.

Railways have played an important part in the development of my region and many others, and they can still play this role if we make the effort of identifying the needs of people in the regions and helping them meet these needs. May I point out that we are not dependent on the U.S., and yet the danger is real. The presence of Goldman Sachs, an American firm, among the brokers appointed by the government confirms the government's need to issue shares outside the Canadian stock market.

We also know that American investors are used to assessing railway companies. There are at least a dozen on the stock exchange list in the U.S., while in Canada, there is only CP, hence the risk that less informed Canadian investors may not recognize a good deal when they see it. That is why I propose that clause 8(5) be deleted or at least amended to apply only to Canadians.

To conclude, if the railway system was the connecting link for all the regions of this country, and promoted its development, why is it that today, on the eve of the 21st century, we are not able to find innovative ways of making it profitable? The railway is an essential public utility, connecting people and businesses.

If a committee to save the railway system were set up, I am sure that we could come up with solutions, because I am still convinced that solutions do exist and that short–line railways are part of the solution. Personally, I think that privatizing CN is not a bad idea in itself since investors are needed to boost the rail industry if it is to become more performing and modern. And I think that regional business functions may offer solutions.

Privatizing must take place in the interests of all stakeholders: customers, employers and employees. In terms of profitability, CN is not doing as bad as in 1992, with estimated profits for 1994 between $240 million and $250 million.

Perhaps we have the time and resources to make the right choices. Let us take the time to weigh up the pros and cons of Bill C–89 to try to make up for the mass of not so great decisions made by rail officials and our governments over the past 20 years.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C–89, which seeks to privatize CN. First, it should be remembered that the Canadian National was always a symbol of unity, with its lines crossing the country from east to west and going deep into remote regions. However, that symbol is disintegrating, just like federalism, and no longer meets the aspirations and needs of Canadians.

I agree with the Minister of Transport when he says that, given its current structure, CN is not a profitable venture. And CN must remain competitive. Maintaining our national railway in the long term implies government ownership in the short term.

For reasons of profitability, and in an effort to find solutions to eliminate CN's growing deficit, the government must ensure the maintenance of an adequate service, particularly in remote areas which are not served by any other public means of transportation.

Let me give you some figures. My riding of Champlain is served by two CN–operated railroad lines, Montreal–Senneterre and Montreal–Jonquière. According to a 1992 Via Rail survey on the origin and destination of travellers, 56 per cent of passengers on the Montreal–Senneterre line were either going to or coming from a remote destination. Twenty two per cent of the respondents said that their point of departure or their destination was otherwise only accessible by bush roads. In the early nineties, Transport Canada found that 38,000 trips were made on that line, with over 60 per cent of them originating or ending in remote communities or places otherwise only accessible by bush roads.

The same survey showed that 26 per cent of all passengers on the Montreal–Jonquière line were going to or coming from a remote community. Seven per cent of respondents said that bush roads were the only alternative. In 1992, Transport Canada found that close to 20,000 trips were made on the Montreal–Jonquière line, with over 26 per cent of them originating or ending in remote communities or places otherwise only accessible by bush roads.

It should be noted that, after a decrease in the number of users in 1990, there has been a significant increase, in the last two years, in the number of travellers on these two lines, in spite of a lack of marketing and poorer services, a well–known fact. Just think of the environmental disaster resulting from the derailment in the Tawachiche ZEC, close to the municipality of Sainte–Thècle, in my riding of Champlain.

Of course, the railway service in the southern part of these two lines has to compete with other means of transportation. Given the length of the trip, the unaccommodating schedules, their infrequency and our individualized travelling habits, the train in its current incarnation is not competitive.

However, it does contribute to the autonomy of residents of remote areas, it is an efficient evacuation method in case of natural disaster and it could be at the heart of economic development or promote tourism, if it were more enthusiastically supported and its publicity campaigns better targeted.

After reading Bill C–89, one has to wonder how the privatization of Canadian National will affect the maintenance of infrastructures in remote areas and one has to ask oneself if the Minister of Transport can guarantee these people access to public transportation where roads are not adequate?

This question is even more pertinent, since clause 16 of the bill before us gives the federal government the right to meddle with the property of short line railways. It is particularly unacceptable and even economically inefficient and unjustifiable for the federal government to take over all or even some of these small operations.

One of the main reasons that these short line railways can make a profit operating short lines is that they are not heavily regulated by the federal government. These operations need the flexibility which they enjoy under the jurisdiction of the provinces. This federal initiative could discourage the creation of short line railways and limit their numbers. We must not forget that each of these operations saves a railway line from abandonment.

If the government impedes the development of these small operations, an increasing number of kilometres of track in Quebec and in Canada will be abandoned.

Another aspect of Bill C–89 which makes me fear for the future of remote areas is the lack of controls regarding foreign takeovers of CN holdings.

The aim of the Minister of Transport in presenting this bill is highly praiseworthy, but his prime obligation is to ensure that all Quebecers and Canadians, who paid the cost of building and operating the national railway, continue to have the service available to them. One way for this to happen would be to limit ownership of CN to Canadian interests.

Clause 8(5) is unacceptable in its present form, because it allows a foreign group of associated businesses to acquire a majority of CN shares. The only thing blocking an effective takeover in such a situation is the decision by CN directors that the companies in the owner consortium will stand by their statutory declaration to not act jointly. A company acts first and foremost in its own interest and in the interest of its shareholders. If the companies owning CN's shares have common shareholders, they would not need to act jointly in order to achieve the same end.

Therefore, clause 8(5) must be deleted in order to limit ownership of CN to Canadian groups.

In closing, I would remind the Minister of Transport that he is responsible for keeping control of Canadian National within Canada, because it was built with the tax money of Quebecers and Canadians. With billions of dollars of public money already poured into this rail system, it would be intolerable if it were now to be taken out of the hands of Quebecers and Canadians. Furthermore, if we are to keep CN rail traffic from heading south to the American rail systems, it is vital that CN remain under Canadian control.

In the past two quarters, CN has recorded profits of over $200 million. Now that it is beginning to make money, we sell it. CN must be well managed, serving the needs of its clientele and of the remote regions.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to speak to Bill C–89 which, as we know, will have the effect of privatizing Canadian National.

This bill will also determine the mechanism that will be used by the government to implement the process. As soon as the legislation is passed, CN will no longer be a crown corporation. It will become a business corporation.

When I began to examine this bill, I soon realized that some of its clauses were cause for concern.

• (1345)

Clause 6 of the bill allows the transfer of CN property to the government. Under this clause, the government will be able to take possession of CN affiliates and real estate not directly related to the railway sector.

We also know that the minister made it clear he wanted CN to keep only those assets directly related to rail transport. Assets related to other sectors will be privatized separately.

I would like to take as an example the intermodal station in the riding of Jonquière, next door to my own riding. If the station is closed, all freight will be transferred to Quebec's highway network, more specifically the highway through the Parc des Laurentides wildlife reserve.

We know the Minister of Transport has no long term policy for the road network, which means that the entire road network in Quebec will be penalized. Safety will be a casualty as well. People will have to cope with larger numbers of heavy trucks on our roads.

To me, this clause rang some alarm bells. We know that CN affiliates include businesses that are not in very good financial shape but still manage to do the job thanks to CN.

One wonders whether these businesses will be viable without CN and whether they will maintain the same employment levels. Will these levels be maintained? I think this is a very important question.

Eighteen months ago, throughout the election campaign, the Prime Minister's main platform was creating jobs for the people of this country. Eighteen months later, we see this promise was not kept. Even worse, in the last budget the Minister of Finance failed to include measures for direct job creation. I would even go so far as to say that the budget's impact will be the reverse of what was promised in the red book.

In my riding, things are very bad, with over 30 per cent of the population on unemployment insurance or welfare. Of this group, a number of people have decided to give up looking for jobs. They have stopped looking for jobs because there are none. We are gradually killing off an entire generation.

Jobs in CN affiliates must be guaranteed so that we do not get thousands more unemployed people looking for jobs. This is particularly crucial when we realize that this government is doing little or nothing to deal with this problem.

The Prime Minister seems to have forgotten the golden rule which says that when you are the boss, never take on a task your assistant will not be able to do. Let me explain. Clearly, neither the Minister of Labour nor the Minister of Finance are in a position to keep the government's promise that it would put people back to work and provide for economic recovery.

CN itself has concerns about this bill. I will take the specific example of AMF Technotransport Inc. of Montreal, which employs 1,300 people but, on its own, without the support of CN, it may get into financial difficulty, which will add to the unemployment statistics of the province.

Again, this bill does not contain any provision to protect jobs in subsidiaries. This could be very dangerous, leading to jobs cuts, layoffs and perhaps even businesses closing down. We cannot afford this kind of luxury.

Another clause that would require further consideration is clause 8. My colleagues mentioned it earlier, but I would like to address it anyway, particularly as regards paragraph 5, which, as it stands, authorizes a foreign group of corporations which are associates to acquire majority control of CN.

The only thing that stands in the way of an effective takeover in such circumstances under this clause is the judgment of the CN board of directors, which they have shown in negotiations, and collective bargaining in particular, with employees at every level. Collective agreements were signed that were considered generous at the time, but then the company only tried to take these hard won rights away from the workers later on. They tried to do so by seeking legislation like the bills that were brought before this House a few months ago. Knowing how much common sense the CN directors responsible for determining whether the corporations in the owners group are complying with their statutory declaration not to act in concert really have, I doubt this can be achieved.

Everybody knows that corporations are guided first and foremost by the interests of their shareholders, and that is absolutely normal. So, if the corporations that own CN all have the same shareholders, they do not need to act in concert to act along the same lines. It is therefore essential that clause 8 be amended.

Need I remind you that this railway system was built with money provided by the taxpayers of Canada and Quebec? It would be unacceptable for control over a railway in which billions of dollars of public money were invested to be lost to Canadians and that CN traffic be redirected toward U.S. rail systems.

Finally, at a time when the provinces are asking the federal government to give them more flexibility and to withdraw more and more from certain jurisdictions, clause 16 authorizes the federal government to interfere in a wide variety of provincial jurisdictions through short–line railways.

In closing I would like to add that these entities should be protected so that they can be sold to private sector enterprises, but enterprises truly owned by Canadians and Quebecers.

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–89 is a very important bill to the railway industry and for the future of transportation in the country. I appreciate the number of members who have spoken and the vast number of questions which will be answered in due course in the committee hearings to commence tomorrow.

I want to extend appreciation to the opposition parties, the official opposition, the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party, for their support in principle of the bill. I understand it is conditional support at this point in time and that we will endeavour to answer their questions at committee. I should point out that the NDP continues to be in a time warp. It believes the government must own and operate everything to ensure that it is run efficiently. Most members have indicated that we have a tremendous opportunity to create a new CN with greater efficiencies.

I highlight two questions that have been posed to the government. The first concerns no restrictions to foreign investment. The Canadian taxpayer has helped to build Canadian National and the Canadian taxpayer deserves to get the maximum benefit for that investment. Therefore the experts have indicated to us that to ensure the maximum benefit, one cannot impose certain restrictions on the share offering to try to get the best possible value for Canadian National.

Second, we have put a restriction on individual shareholdings to a maximum of 15 per cent. A number of opposition members have indicated that certain unaffiliated or unrelated companies could band together to essentially take over Canadian National. I want to say with regard to that concern that the experts have told us it is impossible. The reason we have drafted the bill with such detail is to ensure that unrelated companies and individuals could not band together to essentially have control of Canadian National.

I want to make two other points. The Minister of Transport indicated this morning that regulatory reform would be coming up soon. It is as important as CN's privatization to ensure that we have an efficient railway transportation system.

We all agree that transportation is key to our competitiveness, to creating jobs and to exporting. That is why we want to create a national, affordable integrated railway system in the country that will allow us to be able to move goods and people as efficiently and as effectively as we possibly can, and to ensure that those jobs remain in the country and that we continue to export.

Bill C–89 is going to committee and when it comes back I am sure we can look forward to the support of all members of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 73, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith the question on the motion now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 6.30 p.m. today, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

The Speaker: It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5) the House will now proceed to statements by members.

HEARING AWARENESS MONTH

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, you might agree that in your chair you are more often a listener than you are a speaker, but not all Canadians share the luxury of hearing as you do.

May is Hearing Awareness Month and as such is an occasion to promote greater public understanding of Canadians who are deaf or hard of hearing. It is also a time to help those with related communication disorders and to emphasize the importance of protecting our hearing.

More than one million Canadians have a hearing loss. For these people communication is not a simple task. It means using teletypewriters, close captioning for television, listening devices, sign language and oral interpreters.

This year the hearing awareness campaign will focus on access and communication. Hearing organizations will be working together to promote programs and services that improve the lives of the hearing impaired in Canada.

Please join me in saluting the Canadian Hearing Society and the Canadian Association of Speech Language Pathologists and Audiologists for their devotion to improving the lives of Canadians with hearing difficulties. Thank you all for listening.

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on April 25, I attended the official opening of the largest copper mine in operation in Quebec, the Louvicourt mine, near Val–d'Or.

This mine, which will employ over 350 people for more than 10 years, is the result of a roughly $300 million investment by partners Aur, Teck and Novicourt. This impressive achievement shows how important government assistance, in the form of flow–through shares, is to mining.

We deplore the fact that the government has rejected the Standing Committee on Natural Resources' recommendation to enhance the federal contribution to the flow–through share system. The Minister of Natural Resources should be reminded that the government's involvement in mining is not an expenditure but a profitable investment that would benefit a number of mining regions in Canada and Quebec as well as thousands of workers.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals in this House are very proud of their connection with the Ontario Liberals. They believe Lyn McLeod is going to be the next premier of Ontario.

The federal Liberals support the Ontario Liberals' red book policy. The Canadian finance minister has gone so far as to interfere in the provincial election by ridiculing Ontario Tory policies. However, speaking of ridicule, I wonder just how proud Lyn McLeod is of the federal Liberals. Why does she not ridicule federal Liberal policy that will see the continuation of the MPs' very own porky pension plan?

Ontario Liberals understand the revulsion that Canadians feel toward their MPP pension plan and say in their Ontario red book they are going to scrap the porky plan.

Meanwhile, federal Liberals are poised to vote for their pension plan. They want to hide it from Canadian taxpayers in committee, which makes me wonder if federal Liberals are proud of Lyn McLeod. Is she ashamed of them?

CN RAIL

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal red book highlighted the importance of Canada's infrastructure to our economy. Yet the Liberal government has done another about face by selling off CN Rail which takes away a vital link in our transportation infrastructure.

The Canadian people will no longer be participants in our rail economy, the transportation link that built Canada.

In preparation for the sell–off, CN laid off 11,000 Canadians. As a former trainman for CN Rail, I saw firsthand the good work done in bringing grain and other Canadian products to market. I am one of thousands of Canadians who are deeply concerned about even further job loss caused by putting CN Rail on the auction block.

With no rules on foreign ownership, CN is destined, with the Liberal government's blessing, to be purchased by individuals and corporations with no interest in Canada's future. The Liberal government is exchanging an east–west transportation system for a north–south system that will see even more foreign control of the Canadian economy.

Bill C–89 brings to an end Canadians' ownership and control of their own railway and only leaves further job loss and more debt for Canada.

PORT PERRY CADET CORPS

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are being visited today by the Port Perry Cadet Corps. This corps of young men, who attend both elementary and secondary school, has a long history of achievements.

Having been formed in 1898, they are now fast approaching their 100th anniversary. The purpose is not to train soldiers but to train young men for the responsibilities of citizenship.

Being a part of the Department of National Defence, they have expressed to me their concerns about possible reduced funding, especially since they are often dependent on the local forces base, many of which are now closing. They also expressed to me the need to get funding down to the level of local decision makers. Highly centralized authority often makes inappropriate decisions with respect to local needs.

I would like to thank Major Doodley and the 40 young men of the Port Perry Cadet Corps who have made such a major contribution to our community.

INTERNATIONAL DAY OF FAMILIES

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to recognize the United Nation's International Day of Families which is being celebrated today.

The United Nations calls the family the most crucial link between generations, the purveyor of human culture, the primary source for love, sustenance and shelter. I too call the family the most important grouping of people in our society. On this day to honour families I want to take a moment to honour my own.

The family unit is fundamental to our society. Through our families we strive to make the world a better place. Through our families we hope to achieve harmony in the world by promoting healthy values and instilling tolerance, understanding and compassion in our children.

Families struggle to maintain cohesiveness in these stressful times of social and economic change. Households are changing but the family unit remains intact and strong as each member supports the others.

The family is our strongest bond. I invite my colleagues to join with me today in honouring our families.

NATIONAL MINING WEEK

Mr. Elijah Harper (Churchill, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second week of May is National Mining Week, when we focus attention on the contribution this industry makes to Canada.

I would like to focus on mining in my constituency. This industry is the main employer in many of our communities. The mining industry makes a significant contribution to the northern Manitoba economy through salaries and royalties.

I would especially like to pay tribute to the men and women of northern Manitoba who work hard in our mines and smelters. They are an important part of our northern community and they deserve our appreciation.

POWER CORPORATION

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at the Power Corporation stockholders' meeting, chairman of the board and CEO Paul Desmarais, who is also the father–in–law of the Prime Minister's daughter, said that, in the current circumstances, it was not in his corporation's best interest to invest in Quebec.

We learned at the same time that Power Corporation had increased its stake in Southam, which is about to build a $55 million printing plant for the Gazette. Bloc members deplore this blackmail campaign aimed at Quebecers on the eve of the referendum campaign.

Everyone knows that, because of its influence, its family ties, and the professional past of its senior executives, Power Corporation has benefited from orders–in–council regarding satellite broadcasting that were custom–made for one of its subsidiaries, Power DirecTv.

Are we to understand from Mr. Desmarais's declarations that he is now returning the Liberal government's favour?

NATIONAL POLICE WEEK

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this week being National Police Week, I acknowledge the RCMP detachment in Burnaby, British Columbia, Canada's second largest municipal contract detachment, with approximately 240 officers. In every aspect, this detachment exemplifies what is meant by serving the community.

On January 15 the local RCMP began a community policing pilot project, forging a new relationship with citizens. By dividing the city into four districts, the force will eliminate a central command, making officers more accessible to citizens, essentially assigning each officer to his or her own turf. By providing a greater presence in the local neighbourhoods, through full service community stations, storefront contact offices and a restructuring of the organization, this five–year strategic plan is sure to make a difference.

There is much concern for safety on our streets and in our homes. I congratulate the Burnaby force for its innovation and diligence, and making my part of British Columbia a safer place to live.

NATIONAL POLICE WEEK

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the week of May 14 to May 20 marks the 25th anniversary of National Police Week in Canada, an event aimed at strengthening co–operation between the police and the public.

As you know, the Liberal government cares about the safety of Canadians. We must ensure that this co–operation between all members of the community remains strong, to ensure that Canadian law enforcement services continue to be efficient.

The police play a vital role in public safety and security and this year's police week theme "Partnerships with the Community" underscores this special relationship.

INTERNATIONAL DAY OF FAMILIES

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today, May 15, is recognized by the United Nations as International Day of Families.

This day provides us with an opportunity to reflect on the new realities facing the modern family. Social, technological and economic changes have significantly changed the make–up of the so–called traditional family unit.

This day must be an occasion to reflect on the evolution of the major role played by the family, which is the cornerstone of our society.

In spite of above–mentioned changes, one thing remains certain: generations follow one another, but the family will always play a fundamental role by providing our children with an essential and special environment to foster their development.

On this International Day of Families, I wish everyone the very best.

CULTURAL COMMUNITIES

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, five members of the Bloc Quebecois' commission of cultural communities resigned to denounce the fact that they were being manipulated by Bloc officials.

With their resignation, the cultural communities representatives wanted to show that they would not have a real role to play in an independent Quebec.

The few reactions from Bloc spokespersons following these resignations clearly show the deep malaise which exists between the Bloc and the cultural communities.

[English]

This is one more example of the failure of the Bloc as well as the PQ to sell their separatist option to Quebec's cultural communities. These Quebecers have seen through the PQ's fearmongering and desperate tactics.

Quebec's cultural communities deserve respect; they do not want to be ignored. Quebec's future will not be decided without their input, in spite of what the Bloc and the PQ may think.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, on the International Day of Families, the Bloc Quebecois wishes to emphasize the importance of this primary social unit for each and every one of us.

Many believe that the family is the place where the individual is formed, for better or for worse. That is why it is so important to aim for more equality in our society, and I mean not only equal opportunities but also some basic equality in living conditions.

In 1993, more than one million families in Canada were living below the poverty line. For us as elected representatives, this should be a day to reflect on what we hope to achieve in this House and how we can improve the lives of families in Quebec and Canada.

ONTARIO ELECTION

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has gone on the hustings for Lyn McLeod and the son of red book. In a speech to the Liberal faithful, the minister heaped praise on the Ontario Liberals for setting a four–year target for the elimination of the deficit, calling their so–called strategic spending cuts laudable and their tax cuts sensible. This is very ironic. In a classic case of Liberal doublespeak, it is another example of do as I say not as I do. It is just like their MP pension plan reform.

Despite constant Reform pressure, the minister has repeatedly refused to set a date to eliminate the deficit and has actually increased taxes by over $1.5 billion. Liberals love taxes so it is not surprising that they would tax logic along with everything else.

Not to worry. The son of red book will end up with the garbage with its federal parent. Ontario voters will have the sense to realize that it is only by the application of the sound Reform principles of deficit elimination, debt reduction and the resultant tax reductions which will ultimately work to—

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, within the last number of days I was troubled by some incidents in connection with a francophone woman by the name of Johanne Harvey living in my riding of Bruce—Grey, in the city of Owen Sound of which I was the mayor.

I want to assure the House that the city of Owen Sound and the Government of Canada are strongly committed to supporting linguistic minorities across the country and promoting language duality as an essential element of Canadian unity and identity.

We will continue to speak out on behalf of tolerance and ensure that there are harmonious relations between linguistic communities in Canada.

Our actions over the past year as a government are clear. We have reaffirmed the vision of Canada in both our language and in our community. We want to make sure all Canadians feel at home right across this great country.

On another note, I have been in contact with the mayor of the city of Owen Sound and he takes the matter extremely seriously and will look into it personally.

ONTARIO ELECTION

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with only 24 days to the Ontario election, Bob Rae is getting desperate.

Last Friday in Thunder Bay the premier and his nearly defunct party reached a new low in campaign dirty tricks. In the middle of an announcement by Liberal leader Lyn McLeod, a member of the NDP's own provincial council, Alex Ng, rushed the podium, screaming in protest.

Later Mr. Ng admitted to the media he was ordered to disrupt the event by the NDP's central campaign, which had paid his flight to Thunder Bay.

The premier apologized for the incident and announced that Mr. Ng was withdrawing from the campaign. Mr. Ng's career as a paid protester may well be over but at least he had a good start on Bob Rae, who will start looking for a new job on June 9.

CHECHNYA

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, although the Prime Minister says he is concerned about human rights issues, on his recent trip to Russia to attend ceremonies celebrating the 50th anniversary of V–E Day, it was clear once again that the Canadian government's only priority is trade.

In fact, at the very moment when the Russian army continued its attacks in Chechnya, the Prime Minister was discussing a Team Canada trade mission with his Russian counterpart.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Considering the foregoing, would the Prime Minister agree that his attitude and that of his government, which subordinates human rights to strictly commercial interests, does not give the Russian authorities any incentive to show more respect for the rights of the Chechen who are now being attacked by the Russian army?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that I raised the issue of the people of Chechnya with President Yeltsin, and I told him personally that his government's attitude did nothing to further Russia's interests in the world.

We were there to celebrate the 50th anniversary of V–E Day. The Russians made an exceptional contribution since 27 million Russians died during the war. We accepted the invitation as a matter of course.

My colleagues in the Western world and myself refused to attend the military parade, but we agreed to attend a parade of veterans who fought during the last war. To show our disapproval of what is now happening in one part of Russia, we boycotted their biggest parade.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to accept the Prime Minister's reply, but if he really wanted the Russian authorities to take seriously his concerns about human rights violations in Chechnya, why did the Prime Minister not tell them in advance that he would refuse to attend the military parade, as a form of protest, like other heads of state who were not afraid to speak out?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I made it quite clear, although I may not have had a chance to announce my intentions publicly, but in communications with other heads of state, we agreed we would boycott this big military parade, and we did. The Russian government was well aware that Canada would not attend this parade.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said President Yeltsin gave him assurances that the Russian army had already been replaced by a normal police force in Chechnya. However, immediately after his departure from Russia, the Russian army was again bombing Chechen civilians.

Considering the false assurances the Prime Minister received from the Russian head of state, how does his government intend to put pressure on the Russian authorities to stop human rights violations in Chechnya?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have protested on several occasions. My colleague, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, brought this matter up several times with his Russian counterpart. We are putting as much pressure as possible on the government. And if the problem persists, I will have another opportunity to launch a protest when I meet Mr. Yeltsin in Halifax next month.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

Another item to add to the Power DirecTv file is the submission this company made to the government dictating the steps to be taken to reverse the CRTC's decision allowing Expressvu to begin broadcasting as early as next September but not Power DirecTv.

Will the Minister of Industry admit that he received Power DirecTv's submission and that he dutifully followed all of the instructions contained in the document, which demanded that the order be tabled in the House before April 24 to prevent Power DirecTv from being put at a disadvantage?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, although this information is a little dated, I am pleased to answer the hon. member's question. If he had read the document, he would have noticed that we did not follow Power DirecTv's recommendations. In fact, we received many other recommendations in that period. We did not accept all of the suggestions of Power DirecTv, but we did accept all of those made by the Consumers' Association of Canada. The recommendations we accepted were the ones made by that association.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting explanation, but let us look at the facts. And, given the appearances, the minister should find this case indecent.

Does he not find it indecent that Power DirecTV, a company owned by the Prime Minister's son–in–law, not only tried to instruct the government on how to settle an issue to its satisfaction, but that worse yet, the government, we have every indication to believe, scrupulously followed its orders and issued a decision tailored to the requests of the company?

Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat for the hon. member. He seems to have failed to read a document which I think has been in the public domain.

Certainly others have quoted from this submission received by the government from Power Direct, one of many received after the expert panel's report was tabled. In the case of this one, which asked that we make changes to the direction and table it on April 24, he will know we did not make changes to the direction and we did not table it until April 26.

On many important elements we did not take its recommendations. What we acted on were the very general and very supportive recommendations of the Consumers Association of Canada, Friends of Canadian Broadcasting, ACTRA, et cetera. We took our recommendations from people who are concerned about competition in this field in Canada.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has assured us Bill C–68 is constitutional. He has assured us that Canada's aboriginal groups have been made part of this consultation process.

Last Friday Mr. Mosley, the assistant deputy minister, stated consultation with the James Bay Cree took place when the government provided the country with its white paper on firearms control and through the issuance of Bill C–68. He denied that constitutional rights of aboriginal people had been violated.

Is the justice minister's definition of a consultation the mere provision of what he intends to do with firearms legislation? Does this explain why he has stated repeatedly he has consulted with various groups and individuals including the James Bay Cree, the attorneys general of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba and the ministers of justice from Yukon and the Northwest Territories, who have all stated they were not consulted by the justice minister?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I engaged in consultation for many months before tabling last November 30 the government's proposals, before tabling Bill C–68 on February 14 of this year.

• (1425)

This consultation was not done through officials. It was not done through publishing an options document. It was done personally by my visiting all 10 provinces and both territories to meet with national, regional and local firearms groups as well as representatives of aboriginal communities.

The views we heard during that consultation process were carefully and fully reflected in the legislation we put before Parliament.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a letter signed by Ovide Mercredi to the minister. He says: "For God's sake, respect our rights".

Bill C–68 has some draconian search and seizure provisions. The police are given enormous powers and discretion to inspect for firearms and search and seize without warrant. At one time Canada had writs of assistance which were in effect permanent, blanket search warrants. They were withdrawn and these kinds of searches are no longer allowed.

Is the minister intending to bring back something even more reprehensible than writs of assistance through his so–called inspection provisions?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the hon. member's recent enthusiasm for aboriginal rights as well as his recent discovery of the importance of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

He is a very hard working member of the very parliamentary committee now hearing witnesses and examining clause by clause the provisions of the bill. If he has a constructive suggestion with respect to the implementation of this act in a fashion sensitive to aboriginal traditions and customs, I hope he will make it in committee and we will listen.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the worst thing we can do as a government is create laws and agreements with the native people and then violate those very agreements.

There is growing concern from groups about many aspects of the bill. The Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Civil Liberties Associations are both concerned about Bill C–68. The Canadian Bar Association will publicly elaborate its concerns regarding the constitutionality of the so–called inspection, search and seizure powers.

Is the justice minister still confident his bill is constitutional in every respect?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): I am, Mr. Speaker, but the very purpose of having hearings before a committee is to enable groups such as those referred to by the hon. member to come forward and express their views.

I have had no doubt from the beginning the bill can be improved by that process. I listened with interest to the views expressed to date and I will listen with interest to the views to be expressed by the Canadian Bar Association.

Let me make clear if there are ways the bill can be improved with respect to the inspection procedures or others we are very happy to have those proposals. We will take the proposals from the bar association and others and give them serious consideration.

AGUSTA

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works categorically refused last week to break off negotiations between the federal government and the firm Agusta regarding potential compensation for the Liberal government's cancellation of the contract for the EH–101 helicopters. The Prime Minister stated a few days after his election that the contract would be cancelled and no compensation would be paid to anyone.

How does the Minister of Public Works justify his current negotiations with Agusta, when the Prime Minister stated a few days after his election, and I quote: "The program is cancelled and there is no compensation for anybody"?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that under the terms of the contract there are various provisions whereby the Government of Canada must provide some funding to the contractor.

The Prime Minister's statements were made with that in mind. We are proceeding with our negotiations as we would proceed under any other normal circumstances upon the termination of any contract with the Government of Canada.

• (1430)

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Agusta has just hired the former director of communications of the Liberal Party of Canada, Daniel Despins, and the former special adviser to Pierre Elliott Trudeau, James Peacey, as lobbyists in order to sell helicopters to the Government of Canada, would the minister of public works assure us that he is not negotiating a new contract on the quiet with Agusta, in exchange for compensation for the cancellation of the last contract?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made reference to two individuals, neither of whom I have seen, heard, or communicated with since I have become a minister of the crown.

I want to assure the hon. member that whatever a particular company does or who it hires is certainly its prerogative. There have been no representations made to me as a minister of the crown regarding that particular incident.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the weekend edition of The Globe and Mail ran a feature story on illegal gun sales in Canada. In that article, Detective Geoffrey Francis, who headed a gun running task force in the Toronto area, stated: "We already have good, strong laws in Canada for controlling firearms. We have to start enforcing them".

For 18 months the minister has done nothing to enforce the laws we have. Why is the minister not enforcing the existing laws instead of creating new laws that will do absolutely no good?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that article effectively pointed out the importance of taking action with respect to the smuggling of firearms. However, the fact that this problem exists does not mean that other things are not also needed. We have to address all these concerns.

The minister of revenue and the people working in his department, the solicitor general and members of the RCMP are all working closely with other police forces. Indeed, when I met with the attorney general of the United States here in Ottawa in March, the first item on the agenda was the need for our governments to work together more effectively to deal with the smuggling of firearms.

I fully agree with the hon. member, it is an important issue. It needs more attention, and it will get it.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if he agrees with me, he should have agreed with me 18 months ago and got off his backside and done something about it.

I will ask the justice minister one simple question. Since he is fully aware and has been made aware by a number of people that registration will do nothing to curb crime, why does he not scrap that whole idea and save the taxpayers a lot of dollars?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if I were to do such a thing I would disappoint the strongest supporters of registration, the chiefs of police of the country, the frontline police officers, the Canadian Police Association, the mayors of cities, the professional health care workers, people who know of the close, the practical, and the demonstrable connection between registration of firearms and achieving greater public safety.

SOMATOTROPIN

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

We learned in La Presse on the weekend that somatotropin has been entering Canada freely as customs officers are unauthorized to stop it. All the while, the Minister of Health is imagining that this hormone, which may pose a health hazard, is not being used because of a moratorium on it.

Would the minister tell us whether Health Canada is taking particular action against those who are importing somatotropin, because the use of it is banned?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has information she could share with us on the sale of this product, which is not legal in Canada, we would appreciate it if she would tell us.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would invite the minister to read this weekend's La Presse.

• (1435)

How can the Minister of Health think that the Minister of Agriculture's moratorium has any effect at all, when appreciable quantities of this hormone are entering Canada, and does she intend punishing those using this hormone despite the ban?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, of course, because it is not approved for sale in Canada. As regards the moratorium, the hon. member should perhaps talk to the Minister of Agriculture.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Transport suggested he might cancel the problematic air traffic control computerization contract with Hughes Aircraft. Now he has apparently offered the company more than a hundred million taxpayer dollars to supply a system inferior to that in the original contract.

How does the minister justify his about face, which will actually reward a company for not living up to its government contract?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the difficulties with Hughes on that contract are well known. As the hon. member has raised in the House and as I have agreed, we have to find a way out of that. It is a very difficult and complex question.

It is a very odd situation to have the hon. member now suggest that we should cancel the contract when has been such a stout defender of the Pearson contract.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not hesitate to cancel the Pearson airport contract without producing a single item of evidence of wrongdoing.

Hughes is a year and a half behind schedule. It has stated that it cannot provide what it contracted to provide the government with and it wants even more money for what it does supply.

If Hughes insists on more money for an inferior system, why does the minister not either approach an alternate bidder or simply retender the air traffic control contract altogether?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there have been millions of dollars spent already on this contract. I agree with the hon. member that the contract is not being delivered on schedule and that it is over budget.

We are negotiating with Hughes to try to find a solution to the problem. The hon. member would know that the contract was entered into a number of years ago. It came to my attention that there were problems with it and I immediately informed the auditor general of my concerns. I have discussed the matter with my deputy minister. We are going to try to find a solution to it.

The problem we face with Hughes I think the hon. member would recognize as a good reason why we should proceed rapidly with the commercialization of the air navigation system to ensure that those who deliver the service, the people who use the service, and especially those who pay for it have a direct say in how these services are built and maintained.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

After testifying before the commission on Quebec's future, Pierre Laberge, a retired member of the RCMP and CSIS, has now been barred from their Montreal headquarters, where the association of former RCMP and CSIS members holds its meetings. This ban was imposed by, among others, Normand Chamberland, the current director of CSIS for the Quebec region.

How can the Solicitor General justify such retaliatory measures against a retired employee simply because he took part in the proceedings of the commission on Quebec's future?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the association of former RCMP members is a private organization that does not report to the government. It makes its own decisions regarding access to its meetings.

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the RCMP building comes under the government's responsibility.

Can the Solicitor General tell us if the RCMP's intolerance toward Mr. Laberge reflects the policy that the federal government intends to apply to all federal employees who side with Quebec in the upcoming referendum campaign?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, access to the RCMP's premises in Montreal is an internal management matter that concerns the RCMP. It is a prerogative of the commanding officer, Deputy Commissioner Thivierge, and not a matter for which the Solicitor General is directly responsible. As I just said, it is an internal management matter concerning the RCMP.

GREECE

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Thessaloniki is Greece's second city, capital of Macedonia and the contemporary gateway to the Balkans. It is designated the European heritage city for 1997.

Considering the size of our Greek–Canadian community and the increasing trade links between Greece and Canada, will the minister consider appointing an honorary consul in Thessaloniki with responsibility for representing Canadian interests in northern Greece and the southeast Balkans?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, indeed I would confirm to the hon. member that this suggestion is very worthy and we will study it very quickly.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Kootenay West—Revelstoke has drawn attention to the government's questionable decision to proceed with the Hughes Canadian automatic air traffic system. Yet we are informed that the defence department, 16 months after federal auditors warned that the civilian system was two years behind schedule and massively over the agreed contract price, signed a $70 million deal for a military version of the same system.

What prompted the Minister of National Defence to invest in a system that does not meet the original specifications? Why did he proceed with this project?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe I addressed this question on Friday.

The air traffic control system is primarily being developed under the auspices of the Department of Transport, and it appeared only logical for the former government to have the defence air traffic control systems at Canadian military bases developed in co–operation with that being developed by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is also reported that if the military system is installed the department estimates its internal costs alone will add $106 million to the $70 million Hughes contract. Why would the minister authorize such an expenditure on a system with so many questions about its capabilities?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think we have to emphasize that this contract was initiated by the former government. My colleague, the Minister of Transport, has done the government and the Canadian taxpayers a real service in conducting an internal audit on this project. It is an audit with which we at national defence are co–operating.

COLLECTION OF CHILD SUPPORT

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

After Quebec's National Assembly unanimously passed a bill providing for the automatic collection of child support, the minister said on April 25 that, in the coming weeks, he would propose measures to enforce child support orders.

Does the minister promise that the process he will put in place to ensure payment of child support will not overlap with those already in effect in several provinces including Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the reference the hon. member has made could perhaps be to a response I gave in the House some days ago concerning the government's intention to announce shortly its proposals with respect to child support in general, including efforts to put in place an effective national strategy for enforcement of orders requiring the payment of child support.

I can give the hon. member my assurance that we share the objectives of the Government of Quebec and other provincial governments that have put in place methods to increase the level of compliance with such orders. We will not be working at cross purposes; rather, our intention will be to collaborate to ensure that our efforts work together to achieve what we both have in mind: the payment of the orders when they are made and proper levels of support for children.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister undertake to endorse the federal–provincial child support committee's recommendation that provincial regulations prevail in the provinces that have such regulations?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): First, in relation to the determination of the amounts of child support, we have signalled to the provinces a preparedness to see separate provincial formulae if there is a good need to have different amounts, so long as they are the same in purpose and principle. Second, as I mentioned, we are happy to work and I believe we are already working closely with provincial officials in developing enforcement methods that are complementary.

Putting the matter shortly, we do not in any way wish to get in the way of any provincial effort in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada because we are all after the same thing.

I assure the hon. member of a willingness on our part to work co–operatively with provincial officials from coast to coast to see to it that people do not defeat court orders by moving, that information is shared to permit enforcement, and that the level of payment of the orders goes up across the country.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this morning at 10.50 a Canadian forces liaison officer with the Somalia commission attempted to contact Major Barry Armstrong at his home.

What was the problem? As everyone in the House knows, today is the first day of a six–month tour in the former Yugoslavia war zone for Barry Armstrong.

It seems that the Somalia commission was just as surprised as members of the House that the doctor whose testimony first sparked the inquiry has been removed from the picture.

My question is for the Minister of National Defence. Is it not as obvious to the minister as it is to the Somalia commission and to members of the House that Major Armstrong being posted to this war zone compromises the investigation into the events in Somalia?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely not.

The fact is that Major Armstrong along with other Canadian forces personnel are required as part of their duties to be deployed from time to time outside the country.

If the commission wishes to have Major Armstrong or anyone else testify before the inquiry, it has to ask the person to come. The forces will certainly make him available, no matter where the person is residing.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, maybe the minister should be reminded that the former Yugoslavia is considered a war zone. News reports indicate that the situation is escalating. At this very moment the Sarajevo airport is not even open.

How can the Minister of National Defence guarantee the safe and timely return of Major Armstrong for his testimony to be heard before the commission?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if any members of the forces are required to testify they will be there.

FISHERIES

Mr. Ron Fewchuk (Selkirk—Red River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The report on Fraser River sockeye salmon stated that the sales agreement under the aboriginal fisheries strategy last year contributed to the mismanagement of the Fraser runs.

In response to the report the minister promised that all pilot sales agreements would be signed by May 15. Could the minister please update the House?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not have an announcement but I will do my best.

The Fraser panel report indicated that the late negotiations of sales agreements last year, negotiations that went into July, contributed to poor management performance with respect to the management of the sales agreements. The member for Delta has said that once or twice in the House.

Having listened to both members, the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands and the member for Delta, as well as members on this side of the House, I am pleased to announce that effective today all sales agreements will be signed two months earlier than was the case last year.

GAS PUMPS

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. We learned this morning that 13 per cent of gas pumps across Canada do not give accurate readings, which translates into unjustified additional costs to customers.

Does the Minister of Industry confirm this information and what does he intend to do to remedy this situation, which is prejudicial to consumers?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I too read a remark to that effect in the weekend papers. The hon. member may be interested to know that a maximum margin of error of 0.5 per cent has been set for gas pumps. There are federal employees assigned to inspect the pumps and we hope to have a report explaining these discrepancies in the near future.

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Industry not agree that, by having gas pumps inspected only once every six years, he is failing in his duty to protect consumers, who can then fall victim to any malfunction of these pumps?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I fully agree that it is very important for inspectors to be vigilant, so that they can detect the kind of problems raised by the hon. member.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians were shocked to learn last Friday that when it comes to Canadian foreign policy the government believes trade should take precedence regardless of a country's poor record on human rights.

Will the Minister of Foreign Affairs explain the shift in policy, given the fact that it breaks yet another promise set out in the infamous red book wherein it reads: "We will continue to support democracy and respect for human rights worldwide?"

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can confirm for the hon. member that we will continue to act very vigorously to support respect for human rights and democracy throughout the world.

There has been no change of policy. In response to the very thorough review of the parliamentary committee we have expressed in our presentations the various goals we want to pursue in foreign policy.

One goal is trade. Another goal is to promote our values, what we believe in. Certainly we believe in respect for human beings and respect for democracy. This is one of many features of our foreign policy.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that was not what was said last week. It sounds like we will see no evil, speak no evil and hear no evil when it comes to our foreign policy on human rights.

The attitude of the government shows the callous disregard for the gross human rights abuses that are taking place all over the world. I am sure the government's insensitive approach to human rights will be little comfort to the valiant souls subjected to torture and incarceration without trial while fighting for human rights and democracy throughout the world.

Why has the government flip–flopped yet again on its foreign policy commitments? Why has it broken another of its red book promises?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I absolutely refute the allegations of the hon. member. We have not changed our foreign policy. We have not flip–flopped on the red book. It is quite the contrary. We are delivering on our promises.

One of the main promises we made to Canadians—and the Prime Minister has said it all along—is to create jobs and sustain the Canadian economy. We are doing it. Despite the view of the hon. member we will work vigorously to promote employment and growth in Canada and create jobs. That is one aspect of our foreign policy.

By doing that it does not mean we are abdicating other objectives we have, particularly to promote and sustain those who are fighting for democracy and human rights in the world. They are not contradictory. Quite the contrary, the two objectives could go hand in hand and be promoted worldwide.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the answers given by the Minister of Foreign Affairs to the questions just asked.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs did not say that as far as the government is concerned there is a link between trade and human rights and that they are prepared to use trade in certain circumstances to make sure human rights are upheld around the world through our trade policy.

Will the minister say that there will continue to be a link between human rights and trade policy? If he will not that is a flip–flop.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that whenever we have trade relations in countries where we have established good rapport and created a climate of confidence, we will certainly use the good rapport to promote human rights and influence governments to change their policies and to accept our values and our own objectives.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Foreign Affairs saying he rejects that possibility with respect to any country guilty of severe human rights violations, whether it be Burma in the present or South Africa in the past? The government from now on will rely on good rapport that is supposed to be established between countries as a result of trade? Or, is he still open to the possibility of using trade sanctions as a way of upholding human rights around the world?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that in some cases, through the United Nations, when all countries accept the imposition of trade sanctions as happened in South Africa, Canada has certainly joined others and supported the measures.

To try to be a boy scout on our own, to impose our own rules on others when nobody else is following, is absolutely counterproductive and does not lead to any successful future. Therefore it is quite clear that our approach, the multiplicity of objectives we are pursuing, is certainly much more conducive to obtaining the end result.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The government has conducted extensive public consultations on the reform of Canada's social programs. During that process one of the important issues raised had to do with unemployment insurance benefits for seasonal workers.

As the minister is expected to announce reforms to the unemployment insurance system later this year, could the minister assure the House that he will continue to give full credit to seasonal workers in recognition of their valuable contribution to the Canadian economy?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in addition to general public consultations we have commissioned some special initiatives. A seasonal workers task force tabled its report about a month ago. We have had a special working relationship with the construction trades. I have met with representatives of the building trades and construction unions last week in Toronto.

In all cases they made very significant contributions. Therefore we will be responding to many of the representations, including one which I think is important, that is that we would seek an alternative to the two tier system originally presented in the green book. We think there are better ways of doing things.

COMPCORP

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in order to protect the insurance policy holders from events arising out of corporate failure, the private sector created Compcorp, a well run and efficient regulatory body. Even the Secretary of State for Financial Institutions has applauded Compcorp's record in dealing with the failures of two federally regulated life and health insurance companies. Yet the government is pushing to eliminate Compcorp in favour of a federally operated policy protection board.

Why is the minister pushing to set up a public regulatory body when one that fills the needs of the private sector already exists? Is it not just another case of government overkill?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and for his interest in financial institutions legislation.

Perhaps the hon. member is aware that I made remarks in Toronto recently on the question of Compcorp. I recognize it has been effective. If they will make some adequate changes to Compcorp we will certainly consider not proceeding with our policy protection board.

The four conditions I set out at the time are: revised corporate governance for Compcorp; greater access to privately financed resources; the capability of levying higher assessments if necessary; and, finally, to ensure the ability to arrange going concern solutions. These are the minimum changes that we would require from Compcorp and we would hope the private sector would answer those concerns.

COPYRIGHT

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Canadian Heritage indicated that he had provided the Minister of Justice with instructions for the drafting of a copyright bill. However, the federal government still has no copyright protection policy.

Since the heritage minister is now waiting for his colleague from justice, could the Minister of Justice tell us if he plans to introduce this bill for consideration by this House before the summer recess?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say. I am not sure that I know the timing of the proposals. I do know that officials in my department have been communicating with Heritage Canada and are at work in preparing proposals to improve the copyright law. As to timing, I am not able to answer the hon. member. Perhaps I will inquire of my colleague and let her know in the next day or two.

HIGHWAYS

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues for the usual reception.

On Saturday I met with a group of truckers in Nova Scotia concerning Highway 104. They were protesting the diversion of $26 million in funds from the federal–provincial agreement to upgrade the highway for safety reasons among others and to encourage interprovincial trade.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Given the fact that this diversion has been denounced by the auditor general of Nova Scotia as not conforming to the agreement signed between both governments, will the Prime Minister rein in his minister of public works so that he stops sending money to his own riding at the detriment of the safety of the highways in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to welcome the leader of the fifth party back for his monthly appearance.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I am sure the hon. minister is going to get to his answer.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I can only say that had the member been tuned in, he would have known that the question has been raised in the House on a number of occasions by members of the Reform Party. As I indicated to them and as I want to advise my hon. colleague now, the decision to build highways in Nova Scotia is a decision of the Government of Nova Scotia. The report to which my hon. colleague refers is a report by the auditor general of Nova Scotia.

It is not unheard of and certainly no precedent for this government to be able to reallocate funds and to be flexible enough to recognize realities, whether that occurs in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick or in Nova Scotia. Under these agreements funds have been reallocated.

Any beef the hon. member has would be with the few colleagues he still has in Nova Scotia in the opposition there.

The Speaker: This brings to a close the question period. I do have a point of privilege from the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the member for North Island—Powell River made the following statement about me:

> Mr. Speaker, the member for Prince Albert was adopted by binding aboriginal ceremony into the Bird family of the Montreal Lake Bank in a powwow about two years ago. Roy Bird, the chief of the band, is an important player in this family. The member for Prince Albert has been co–opted by the minister and is defending these negotiations with his adopted family.
> Will the minister not agree that he has placed this member, knowingly or unknowingly, in a conflict of interest situation?

I have been accused by the hon. member from the Reform Party of being in a conflict of interest situation. I feel that these accusations have very serious moral and legal implications impacting and affecting my ability to adequately function as a member of Parliament.

I would like to make very clear that even if this suggestion made by the hon. member were true, this is nothing more than an honour bestowed by a community upon an individual.

So that the Reform Party can understand what this type of ceremony would be about, it would be like receiving a citizen of the year award from the chamber of commerce. It would be like getting an Order of Canada from the Government of Canada.

I would suggest this would simply be an honour bestowed by a community upon an individual and is not grounds for any conflict. Even more important, this honour was never bestowed upon me in the first place. I wish to say I do not know where the hon. member would get such a statement.

Mr. Speaker, whether or not you view that my privileges have been violated, I would like the hon. member for North Island—Powell River to publicly withdraw the comments and apologize to the people of Canada for making statements that in some parts of the country damage positive race relations. This is the new politics promised by the Reform Party.

The Speaker: Colleagues, this point of privilege rises out of one that was raised on Friday. At that time the hon. member was not here to defend himself and that is why I waited until today to hear what the hon. member had to say.

It would seem to me at first blush that this is not a point of privilege; it is surely a point of debate and clarification. Many times when these statements are made, they are made in good faith, and I have to believe that they are because hon. members are just that, hon. members.

I do not think the hon. member for North Island—Powell River is here today. If we could let this sit until tomorrow, I want to take a look at everything that was said. I want also to review the video. If it is necessary, I will come back to the House but at this point it would seem to me this is not a question of privilege.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to a number of petitions.

BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK OF CANADA ACT

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–91, an act to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name Business Development Bank of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wish to inform the House that it is my intention to propose that this bill be referred to committee before second reading, pursuant to Standing Order 73(1).

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–325, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to introduce to the House today my private member's bill entitled an act to amend the Food and Drug Act, re lactose warning labels.

This bill amends the Food and Drugs Act by ensuring that any packaged food or drug that contains lactose and is intended to be sold and used by the public is packaged in containers labelled with a warning that it contains lactose and may be harmful to persons with lactose intolerance.

Lactose intolerance is a condition that affects one out of five Canadians, which is about six million of the population. I hope all members will take the time to carefully review this bill and come to the realization that the proper labelling of food containing lactose would certainly assist at least six million Canadians.

PETITIONS

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I wish to present a petition that has been circulated across Canada. This particular petition has been signed by a number of petitioners from the Oakville, Ontario area.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to rise in the House to present a petition duly certified by the clerk of Petitions on behalf of 98 constituents of Saanich—Gulf Islands and surrounding area.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

RICHARD CARROLL

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise in this House to present a petition with 263 signatures.

The petition is from residents of Cumberland—Colchester wishing this government not to force the departure of Mr. Richard Carroll of Stewiacke, Nova Scotia from this country unfairly into the United States.

GRANDPARENTS RIGHTS

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition with another 125 names to add to petitions already presented to this House regarding grandparents rights and the rights of grandchildren. It is the wish of these petitioners that we address their problem and vote in nature with it.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present to this House a petition signed by 44 constituents from the town of Smooth Rock Falls who oppose the inclusion of sexual orientation in the Canadian Human Rights Act. They say that this inclusion will infringe upon the historic rights of Canadians such as the freedoms of religion, conscience, expression and association.

TAXATION

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition today from 385 British Columbian constituents many of whom are from my riding of New Westminster—Burnaby.

The petitioners make it known in their petition that they are overburdened with taxation due to high government spending. Therefore they pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

By presenting this petition, these petitioners have displayed their responsibility to help Canada get out of this fiscal crisis. I wish to concur with this petition.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition today signed and started by a constituent of mine, Shelly Siwack of New Westminster.

Fifty–seven petitioners signed the petition in order to voice their opposition to Bill C–41 and urge members of the House of Commons to not give passage to the bill.

The petitioners pray that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or homosexuality, including amending the human rights act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination, the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present another petition in the course of action undertaken on behalf of constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson.

• (1515)

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making our streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray our streets will be made safer for law–abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murderers.

Mrs. Bakopanos: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I missed the time for presenting reports from committees. May I present the report now?

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration in relation to order in council appointments.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY DEBATE

ATLANTIC FISHERY

The Speaker: I am in receipt of a motion under Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, I am requesting that you grant leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a matter requiring urgent consideration, the damaging and misleading statements made by the leader of the third party in New Brunswick on Thursday, which I became aware of late Friday—

The Speaker: I received notice from the hon. member, as procedure requires. I believe the hon. member stated he wanted to have an emergency debate on the fisheries and not on the statements made about the fisheries.

I wonder if the hon. member would limit himself to debate or at least to putting forth his points on debate on the fisheries if that is what he wants to do.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, my next sentence was that the fishery in Atlantic Canada is a $1.6 billion export industry; $1.6 billion is a far cry from suggestions that the fishery is over.

Given the morale situation in Atlantic Canada right now and given the importance of the fishery and the confidence issue that is important to the fishery at this very difficult time, I feel it is timely to have a full fledged debate on the issue to set the record straight, to ensure false and misleading information is not undermining the confidence of a very vibrant industry employing tens of thousands of people in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Speaker, that is my application. I hope you will give it your consideration.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: To the hon. member with all respect, the fisheries question in Canada on both coasts is one of great importance to all of us in the House and to all Canadians.

However, I suggest the hon. member might have avenues to pursue that other than an emergency debate. It seems to me at this time at least an emergency debate on that topic would not be in order.

I thank him for his intervention on behalf of his constituents and for the work he is doing in that regard.

VETERANS REVIEW AND APPEAL BOARD ACT

The House resumed from May 12 consideration of the motion that Bill C–67, an act to establish the Veterans Review and Appeal Board, to amend the Pension Act, to make consequential amendments to other acts and to repeal the Veterans Appeal Board Act, be read the third time and passed.

The Deputy Speaker: When we last debated this matter the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan had the floor. He has 15 minutes remaining in his intervention.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, because there has been a lapse of several days I remind all that Bill C–67 is the Veterans Appeal and Review Board Act and that the purpose of Bill C–67 is to reduce the existing backlog of appeal pension cases and to shorten decision time on first application.

If it succeeds it will merge two existing bodies, the Canadian Pension Commission and the Veterans Appeal Board, and first decisions on veterans cases will be made by the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the bureau of pension advocates will become part of the department and will work only on preparation of appeals.

My unease with Bill C–67 stems from two sources. The first is the change of position of the bureau of pension advocates. This has long been an extremely important first level of contact for veterans who have a case to make. To move it to the second level is totally unacceptable. The second unease I have concerns what I shall call the leadership factor in the Departments of National Defence and Veterans Affairs.

Reaction to need within those departments has historically been very slow. I do contend that at the sharp end of the Department of National Defence, when we are talking about our troops, it is very good. Its reaction time is good and it is flexible. The farther we move in the chain of things behind the front line, the more the bureaucracy is involved and the slower the reaction. The bill's purpose is admirable but if the effect of the bill will be to increase the size of the bureaucracy then I cannot believe it will achieve its aim.

When I spoke to the bill very briefly last week I pointed out delays of 40 and 50 years in recognizing our veterans' accomplishments. The merchant navy waited for 50 years for recognition. The veterans of Dieppe have waited for over 50 years and are finally receiving a simple clasp for a medal. The veterans of the Korean operation have waited for well over 40 years to achieve something. Other veterans of peacekeeping operations are still waiting. There was a proposal from this side of the House, supported by some members opposite, that there be a Canadian volunteer service medal produced for peacekeepers. However, I am sorry to say that was rejected by the House. There is certainly a slowness in recognition.

The other side of this impasse in national defence I started to illustrate the other day when I spoke about problems with hearing loss of members of the Canadian forces. Way back when, and we are talking a long time ago, when I was on the rifle ranges we wore no ear protectors. It took literally years for the Department of National Defence to come up with protection for the troops on the ranges firing weapons. It took even longer for any recognition of the fault of the Department of National Defence to be echoed by the Department of Veterans Affairs when veterans applied for hearing aids. The departments dragged their feet. That is a syndrome visible within national defence and veterans affairs.

Another example is the atomic energy corporation of Chalk River. There were spills of radioactive materials. There was a spill of the main reactor in Chalk River in the 1950s. People like Jimmy Carter, not then the president of the United States but a midshipman at Annapolis, came up to help clean up that spill. I was there. I had some illness presumably attributable to exposure to radiation. I tried to declare this on my release from the forces but it was not even accepted by national defence and veterans affairs.

There is the gulf war syndrome. Our troops were in the Persian gulf several years ago and some of them have complained of a variety of symptoms. The same thing has happened in the United States. The American veterans administration has acknowledged and labelled the problem as the gulf war syndrome. It has set up a registry at veterans affairs across the United States where all gulf war veterans complaining of health problems can get a complete physical examination. There has been acknowledgement of it in the United States. Here there has been nothing yet. We are still looking at the problem.

I am not in a position to say there is such a thing as an illness contracted whether it is from the oilfields, nerve gas or from anything there. What I am saying is national defence and veterans affairs invariably drag their feet in recognizing there are problems.

There are sufficient symptoms displayed by veterans that it should not be a problem. The symptoms include loss of memory, aches in the joints, night sweats, severe headaches, loss of hair, confusion, reproductive problems, stress within family, attention disorder, fatigue, abnormal rashes, bleeding gums, irritability, breathing problems and so on. They are surely sufficient for our people to say get it out in the open and tackle this thing and either put it to rest and say there is no such thing as gulf war syndrome or there is and these are the attributes we recognize.

I have a letter from the vice–president of the Canadian Peacekeeping Veterans Association. He is reporting on the gulf war syndrome problem: "This report would be more extensive had I received all of the information I am waiting for. Please advise me if you would like me to keep you informed of any new developments. Our methods of gaining information are very tedious, as we are a non–profit organization that must rely on the mail system, etc. We do not have the funds to travel to interview the individuals in question. We also have full time employment and must conduct this type of research after hours. Don't get me wrong, we do this research because we believe in what we do. We must help our fellow veterans. We would like eventually to conduct an interview or have a questionnaire completed by our gulf war veterans and their spouses. This would certainly enlighten us as to the situation with regard to that".

My point is veterans affairs and national defence should take more initiative, should exercise leadership and show our serving soldiers and veterans that they are interested and lay some of these problems to rest.

We have other examples of the same thing. Somalia and the use of mefloquine is another such example. Mefloquine is a drug used as a malaria inhibitor. Years ago, I will not say how many, when I was in Korea we used paludrine which had certain side effects but nothing to the extent that apparently mefloquine does. My colleague from Delta brought this up in the last six months. He has asked for an investigation into the effects mefloquine may have had on Canadian troops serving in Somalia. He cited specifically Trooper Kyle Brown who, as we all know, has been put into prison, and Master Corporal Clayton Matchee and the men of the Canadian Airborne Regiment.

I understand this drug is still in use to this day in Somalia in spite of questions about its appropriateness. Apparently Canadian troops in Somalia were given heavy doses weekly of mefloquine which, as I say, is used as protection against malaria. However, the drug is well known to have neurological side effects. The manufacturer's literature states that reactions are rare but include convulsions, psychosis, nightmares, dizziness, headaches, confusion, anxiety and depression.

The Canadian medical personnel in Somalia reported that Canadian troops experienced these side effects. In fact, the day the drug was administered in Somalia was known as psycho Tuesday.

In view of reports like this, I would expect that the Department of National Defence—and I lump veterans affairs in with it for this purpose—would show more leadership by taking the initiative to say: "Let us put a stop to nonsense like this. Let us put a stop to the stories. We will determine accurately whether mefloquine can continue to be administered, what its side effects are, when it can and cannot be used, what its effects are with liquor and so on". We need to put these things to rest.

In conclusion, I find that leadership in national defence, lumped in with veterans affairs, is lacking today. We have been looking at a great many problems over the last year: Somalia, the disbandment of the airborne regiment and the videos pertaining to that, the reduction in the size of the forces, equipment problems, morale problems brought out in the Oehring report, having to do more with less in the way of equipment and troops as brought out by Brigadier–General Jeffries' report from Petawawa, the Fowler–Doyle–Létourneau incident, the Somalia inquiry and the staffing of the inquiry itself, the Bosnia–Croatia decisions, suicides in the forces and, more recently, the block of access to information problems. All of these things tell me that there are leadership problems in national defence.

When I look at those problems and the foot dragging that goes on, I say that Bill C–67 should be really looked at very carefully. It should not be proceeded with in its present form. I am absolutely against the relegation of the bureau of pension advocates to a review position. This is not going to help the veterans. The burgeoning bureaucracy that will be created by the combining of two levels is going to be bad news once again for the veterans and their administration.

Therefore, I speak negatively on this bill. The purpose of Bill C–67 is laudable but its implementation, I am sorry to say, may not do what we want for the veterans who are having problems.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise and speak in the debate today on Bill C–67.

For the benefit of those viewing this at home, Bill C–67 has to do with the review procedure for pensions of people who represented and fought for our country in the last world war. It is apropos that we should be speaking about this having just gone through the victory in Europe celebrations and remembrances last week.

As we discuss the bill concerning pension reform we should keep in mind that the average age of those involved is 74 years. That means that the motivation for the government to proceed with this bill now is to try to speed up the process.

When we want to find out how things affect veterans in our country it makes sense to go to the Royal Canadian Legion. As everyone knows, the Royal Canadian Legion by and large speaks for veterans. To some degree it is supportive of the bill. Its concern has to do with four basic facts. It wants to see that these four basic principles in the adjudication of pension disputes are met.

First, it wants to preserve the benefits and services provided to veterans. That goes without saying. It does not want to see this reduced in any way.

Second, there is a need to protect the benefit of the doubt provision. If the bureau of pensions is to err on one side or the other then it would err for the benefit of the applicant.

The third principle is to ensure an independence of advocacy and adjudication. Members should keep that in mind.

The fourth principle is to achieve the necessary speed and generosity to ensure that pensions and other benefits are received by the veterans when they are entitled to them.

The Royal Canadian Legion believes these four basic principles should be upheld by the bureau of pensions. Further it has two basic problems with the bill. They are the levels of expertise to be afforded the applicant at the first application level under the new system and the need to maintain continuity of process between the first application and any subsequent review or appeal.

Members may know, but many people watching may not be aware, that when a veteran appeals for a pension it is a two–step process. If the pension is applied for and granted, that is the end of it. However only 30 per cent of veterans who apply receive a pension after the first round. Therefore, most of them go to appeal.

When veterans are talking about the continuity of process, they are saying it makes sense for their advocates at the first level to also be their advocates at the second level at appeal.

It is interesting that of the 70 per cent who are rejected at first application and go on to appeal, fully 80 per cent of applications appealed are granted. That would be the benefit of the doubt. Therefore, the vast majority who apply for a veterans pension get it. Keep in mind that they are 74 years of age.

If we follow the logic of the whole process as I have described it, a veteran, whose average age is 74, requests a pension. Thirty per cent receive it and 70 per cent do not. Of those who do not receive it and appeal, 80 per cent end up winning their appeal. A lot of those would be based on the benefit of the doubt provision which is one of the four principles the Royal Canadian Legion particularly would like to have.

Another principle the Royal Canadian Legion has identified is the importance of an independent adjudicator. That is the Achilles' heel of the legislation.

The government has stated a number of times that the goal of the legislation is to speed up the time it takes a veteran to get a disability pension without the veteran losing any of the rights the veteran currently possesses. That is a very laudable objective. However, we have identified a serious deficiency in the bill.

The disagreement centres on whether the bureau of pension advocates should remain an independent body at the disposal of veterans at the first level or whether it should be made part of the department reserved for appeal level only. If 30 per cent of the applicants get their pension and on appeal 80 per cent win, why are we not making the gates a little wider at the beginning?

A number of arguments were made in the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs and in the House in this regard and they have been reviewed extensively. After consideration I have concluded that the bureau of pension advocates should remain an independent body at the exclusive disposal of the veterans. Why? I fail to see how removing the bureau from the first level will save any time in the current system. The only way to speed up the system is to ensure that more applications are accepted at the first level.

If 80 per cent of the appeals are granted, why not grant more of them at the first level? These applications must be well prepared in the future because the department currently rejects 70 per cent but goes on to accept 80 per cent on appeal. The typical time it takes for a lawyer to prepare an application is two to three months, a modest period of time to prepare a case when the veteran is forced to battle the department to receive a disability pension. The remaining delays at the first level, which can take up to a year and a half, are the responsibility of the department.

The problem is not with the veteran or with the lawyer who prepares the application, the problem is with the department. Much of that was identified earlier by my colleague who went through a step by step process of showing how the application goes from Ottawa, gets copied and then ends up in Prince Edward Island because the former government decided to put the bureau in Prince Edward Island.

Ironically, the government feels that removing the bureau from the first level will speed up the system because it will focus on appeals only. Under the legislation the government intends to have departmental clerks assist the veteran in filling out the first level application. That is a potential problem which the Royal Canadian Legion identified because it is the skill and the proficiency with which the first application is completed that will determine its acceptance.

The first level decision would then be adjudicated within the department. It could be true that the first level decision would be faster, but would the acceptance rate be higher than the existing norm of 30 per cent? Given the department's past record of rejecting 70 per cent of first level applications, I doubt it. If the veteran then has to appeal the case he has to go to a bureau lawyer who would work directly for the department.

The current system is that an outside, independent lawyer who is acting on behalf of the veteran, makes the application and then follows through with the appeal. Under the new system a departmental clerk will complete the application and only if the application is refused would the lawyer go to work to prepare an appeal for the applicant, which would take a further two to three months. The veterans say that streamlining of the whole process is in large measure due to how well the first application is put together.

If the government intends to focus all of the bureau's resources at the appeal level, then it is obvious that the first level acceptance rate will not increase. The majority of veterans will still have to wait years to get their disability pensions, and we must remember that their average age is 74 years.

If the process is to be speeded up the first level acceptance rate must be increased so that there will be fewer appeals. The way to accomplish this is twofold. First, have the first level application expertly completed by a bureau lawyer so that the veteran's case is solid. Second, the department should consider the success rate for past appeals, which is 80 per cent, and use the benefit of the doubt provision more liberally to increase first level acceptance. This two–track approach would substantially speed up the system and serve best the interests of the veterans. I know that it is serving the interests of the veterans that all members of this House and indeed all Canadians are firmly committed to achieving.

While the intent in this bill is certainly a step in the right direction, as with much legislation that comes before this House there are certain aspects of it that could be substantially improved. I draw again on the suggestions made by the Royal Canadian Legion that the four paramount underpinnings of the foundation of the veterans' appeal must be to preserve and protect the benefits and services provided to the veterans of Canada; to protect the benefit of the doubt provision; to ensure an independent advocate; and to achieve the necessary speed and generosity to ensure that our veterans, whose average age is 74 years, are honestly and fairly dealt with.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to address the House with regard to Bill C–67 on third reading of the Veterans Appeal and Review Board Act.

In the last few days our attention has been focused on the men and women who served our country so valiantly 50 years ago, men and women who left family and friends to fight for freedom, democracy, and peace. As I and thousands and perhaps millions of other Canadians witnessed the V–E Day celebrations here in Ottawa and on television from Europe last week, it evoked emotions of pride for this country and respect for all those who served here and abroad. While we have honoured these veterans through pomp and ceremony, we have failed in many cases to provide them with the compensation that is due them.

I want to briefly refer to a couple of incidents that happened in my riding. First, there was a huge air show in the city of Lloydminster last week where we were able to show off both military and domestic planes in a huge air show. It was a success. The Snowbirds were involved. Of course they are based at the Moose Jaw airbase. They were very well received.

A couple of days later there was another event in my riding. It too occurred in the city of Lloydminster. It was sponsored by the Kinsmen and the Kinnettes. It was a raising of the flag ceremony. It was truly an honour for myself as well the mayor of Lloydminster and one of the MLAs from the area to be involved in the ceremony where annually they raise the flag and we reflect on our country and the democracy we enjoy and remember those who paid a heavy price for the democracy that we enjoy. There was a colour guard there and cadets present, as well as the Kinsmen and the Kinnettes and dignitaries.

Following the raising of the Canadian flag and following the ceremonies I had an opportunity to meet with a couple of veterans. They were two brothers from the area who had just returned from the Netherlands and the celebrations over there. We were able to talk with them about their own experiences, first of all on the advancement into Europe when the liberation took place and then the recent trip over there. They expressed real emotion about the warm greetings and the warm reception they received from the people of Holland for the efforts they had been involved in 50 years before.

As I spoke to one of these veterans, one of these brothers, he said he had not been able to stay the full time. He had not been involved in the entire liberation, he said, because he got hit a few times. He pointed to his left hip and said "I got hit here first and then a little while later I got hit in this hip, and then finally they got me a little higher up, in the arm and the chest. After that they decided they had better send me home."

When we think of the commitment to democracy and we think of the commitment to Canada and what we stand for that was displayed by these veterans 50 years ago, it really humbles us who have not experienced the sacrifice and hardship that they did. It elevates in our minds the value of our veterans for their dedication and for their service to our country, and not only our country but democracy around the world.

Just a few minutes ago we also listened to the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan as he also described some of the horrors of war both past and fairly recently, including the gulf war and the gulf war syndrome.

We realize that war is a terrible thing and that people are involved in it not because they enjoy it but because they feel a sense of duty and want to be involved for the pursuit of peace and democracy.

We realize once again that we do owe them more than just a thank you for a job well done. We need to come through with more than just kind words and phrases, but with actions and deeds as well. That is why it is a privilege for me to speak to Bill C–67, the bill that deals with the Veterans Review and Appeal Board Act.

The government has stated in this House a number of times that the goal of this legislation is to speed up the time it takes veterans to get their disability pensions without the veterans losing any of the rights they currently possess. This too is the aim of the Reform Party. Yet we disagree with the means to this end.

One of the main points of disagreement centres on whether the Bureau of Pension Advocates should remain an independent body at the disposal of veterans at the first level or whether it should be made part of the department reserved for the appeal level only. A number of arguments have been made in the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs and in this House as well in this regard. They have been reviewed extensively by my colleagues in the Reform Party, my fellow MPs who sit in this part of the House. After careful consideration we have concluded that the Bureau of Pension Advocates should remain an independent body at the disposal of all veterans.

Let me explain. I fail to see how removing the bureau from the first level will save any time in the current system. The only way to speed up the system is to ensure that more applications are accepted at the first level. These applications must be well prepared, because the department currently rejects 70 per cent of first applications but then goes on to accept 80 per cent of appeals at the second or third levels.

The typical time it takes for a bureau lawyer to prepare an application is two to three months, a modest period of time to prepare a case when the veteran is forced to do battle with the department to receive a disability pension. The remaining delays at the first level, which can take up to a year and a half, are the responsibility of the department. Ironically, the government feels that removing the bureau from the first level will speed up the system because they will now focus on appeals only.

Under this legislation, the government intends to have a department clerk assist the veterans in filling out their first level application. The first level decision will then be adjudicated within the department. It could be true the first level decision will be faster, but will the acceptance rate be greater than the current 30 per cent? Given the department's past record of rejecting 70 per cent of first level applications, I doubt if this will change. We have no reason to believe that Bill C–67 will improve this situation.

If the veteran then has to appeal his case, he will have to go to a bureau lawyer who works for the department directly. This lawyer, who answers to the minister, must start to prepare the appellant's case from scratch, which will take months or years, because there is nothing in this bill that will speed up the appeal process, which currently takes up to three and a half years.

One gentleman who had served in the armed forces for a number of years waited approximately five years to receive a disability pension for military related injuries. This was after he had made several long trips for medical examinations for the appeal process and after he had written a number of letters to the department.

Veterans are becoming increasingly frustrated, frustrated to the point that many are unwilling to go through the lengthy appeal process. How many bureaucratic hoops must these veterans jump through to receive what they are legally entitled to?

If the government intends to focus all the bureau resources on the appeal level, it is obvious the first level acceptance rate will not increase. The majority of veterans will still have to wait years to get their disability pension. With an average age of veterans approaching 74, this is too little and too late.

I firmly believe that if the process is to be speeded up, the first level acceptance rate must be increased so there are few appeals. The way to accomplish this is twofold: first, have the first level application expertly filled out by a bureau lawyer so the veteran's case is solid; second, the department should consider the success rate for past appeals, which is 80 per cent, and use the benefit of the doubt clause more liberally to increase the first level acceptance rate. This two–track approach would substantially speed up the system and serve the best interests of all veterans.

The government in this piece of legislation has also proposed the merging of the Canadian Pension Commission and the Veterans Appeal Board. It has been implied that this amalgamation will streamline delivery and hence cut turnaround time for pensions in half and eliminate the backlog in two years. This is to be done without affecting veterans' benefits or appeal rights.

As this House knows, the Reform Party is in favour of streamlining government and eliminating bureaucratic entanglements. However, there must be some guarantee that the veterans will receive what they are entitled to in the shortest period of time. As I have already noted, only 30 per cent of veterans' claims are accepted by the Canada Pension Commission, whereas 80 per cent of the appeals heard by the Veterans Appeal Board are accepted. Why is there such a discrepancy in the rulings of the two commissions?

Currently the Canada Pension Commission has an independent policy from that of the Veterans Appeal Board to determine what constitutes a disability. With 70 per cent rejection of veterans' claims by the Canada Pension Commission, it is evidence that they have taken a more restrictive view of the assessment of disabilities than the Veterans Appeal Board.

What position will the new amalgamated board take? Will it take a more restrictive position, as that of the Canadian Pension Commission, or will it take a more liberal position, as that of the Veterans Appeal Board? A more restrictive position taken by the board will undoubtedly increase the number of second appeals and lengthen the average turnaround time. Therefore it is essential that if the two boards amalgamate they adopt the more liberal policy of the Veterans Appeal Board. Any other position would adversely affect veterans' rights and benefits.

In addition, there is some concern from veterans whether or not the proposed Veterans Review and Appeal Board will provide for a new and independent look at each of the levels or simply be a review and appeal process. Under the new board, commissioners may hear both reviews and appeals but not of the same case. The whole review and appeal process would lose its independent look. As a result, any appeal would essentially follow the department's stated policy and procedure. The checks and balances the two independent boards have provided would be lost. Further, there would be no reason for a veteran to appeal any decision made at the first level.

We have given our veterans medals. We have honoured them in ceremonies, and rightly so. We have given our veterans parades. However, we have failed to provide our veterans with adequate financial compensation for their faithful and loyal service to this country when it was due.

We in this House have a moral obligation to provide support to veterans in a reliable and timely manner. How else can we say thank you to those individuals who laid down their lives for us?

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

The House resumed from May 8, consideration of Bill C–54, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act, the Canada pension plan, the Children's Special Allowances Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act, as reported (with amendments) from the committee; and of Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7.

The Deputy Speaker: Because of circumstances, the hon. member for Calgary North has the floor.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on group No. 4, amendments to clause 23 of Bill C–54.

For Canadians watching the debate, I will repeat that the bill is an attempt to make the administration of some of the government social services programs more streamlined, a little more user friendly, so to speak. We think that is a good idea but there is real concern expressed in this group of motions about the accountability in the administration of these acts.

The Bloc has put forward two amendments to clause 23 and Reform has put forward one amendment to clause 23. In fact, that is the only amendment we have put forward on the entire bill.

The purpose of our amendment is to ensure accountability of the administration of these new rules and procedures. We think it is right and proper that our citizens have access to these programs in a way that is not unduly bureaucratic and which removes as much red tape as possible. We are also very concerned that it also removes the accountability of the department and the administrators of the program from the people because it removes needed accountability to Parliament.

We believe the amendment we are suggesting to the bill and to clause 23 specifically would make the system more accountable. We think they are very modest and sensible proposals. We have not put forward a number of amendments but we think the issue of accountability is so key and so necessary that we felt the amendment we put forward ought to be seriously considered and passed by the House.

The amendment we have put forward is set out in today's Order Paper on page 17 under Motion No. 7.

Essentially the motion calls for the minister to be required to make a report to the House every year within 30 days of the beginning of the fiscal year. The report would tally the overpayments under these programs, particularly CPP and OAS and the amount of the overpayments. At the very least, the minister and his department should be accountable to the House and therefore, to the Canadian people we represent.

The House should know exactly how much the overpayment is because it really identifies administrative error, waste and inefficiency. If overpayments are being made, clearly the department is not doing its job very well. Overpayments, of course, very properly suggest these are payments over and above what should be made.

It is necessary because the dollars available to assist people in need under programs are becoming more scarce, with the possibility of CPP going broke in the next few years. It is very important that the dollars available actually reach the people who are entitled to them. If dollars are going to people who are not entitled to them, then clearly some of the difficulties these programs are in will hit hardest the people who do need those moneys.

Therefore, we think right after the beginning of the fiscal year, the minister should give a report to Parliament through the operating committee, of the administrative error that has taken place in the last fiscal year.

It is all very well for the minister to report the overpayment and the errors that have been made by his department, but then what happens? The report will then be considered by the appropriate committee and the committee will then decide to what level the minister may have leeway to overpay for the next year.

For example, if the department has made overpayments under these programs of, say, $3 million the year before, the parliamentary committee may say to the department: "This is simply unacceptable. We will make you accountable by putting a cap of only $1 million on the errors and overpayments you can make next year. We think that is plenty of room for error and we want you to operate in that range". The committee then will decide how much margin for error that particular department can operate under.

This is sensible and sound management of very scarce and needed dollars. It would give the minister a target and goal and some parameters within which to operate. This limit would be considered by a proper authority, which is Parliament itself.

Someone running a business, a board of directors of a company, a school board, a union and even a household have to have some kind of budgetary parameters within which to operate. If there is an unlimited ability to overspend and to make errors in spending, two things happen. One is that the operation pretty soon does not operate on a sound fiscal basis and does not live within its means. The other is that money which is needed in other areas is simply not available because it has been wasted or not properly allocated in the area being considered.

I think that this is nothing but a very sensible, sound and modest way of ensuring that there is some accountability in the spending of the department under this bill. Under these new proposals we can effectively judge how well and how sensibly the program is being run.

Without this kind of accountability we lose a couple of things that are very important to sound management. One is the paper trail. There has to be some record kept of spending, where it has gone and why there has been overspending so that there can be a good assessment of how soundly things are being run. We also lose track of where the money is going. We do not want to do that. That is important not just because of some accounting fetish, but because money goes to people and the people who are entitled to the money need it and are entitled to know that is being well managed and put forward sensibly.

I urge the House to adopt this motion put forward by the Reform Party. It enhances the bill. It enhances the service to people and enhances our need to be accountable to the Canadian public.

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it fascinating to be discussing Motion No. 7 because of what the Reform Party is advocating. It is advocating that the minister's discretion with respect to forgiving overpayments should be wiped away and this special kind of power given to the highest ranking officer.

• (1610)

Mrs. Ablonczy: No, that is not true. It should not be wiped away. It should be accountable.

Mr. Dromisky: —to forgiving.

Let me begin my discussion of this amendment by outlining briefly what it contains.

The Reform Party proposes that the minister should report to the House how much overpayment benefit money is forgiven each year. That is a simple request. The minister should make recommendations regarding how much he should be permitted to forgive in the upcoming year. The Reform Party believes that the minister has a crystal ball and knows exactly how many cases are going to appear before him and his ministry. Therefore, he should be able to make such a judgment for the future 12 months.

Reform proposes that a parliamentary committee should set limits on how much may be forgiven in a year. Again we have to use the crystal ball. The proposal also suggests that no amount may be forgiven until the committee sets the yearly total and no amount may be forgiven once that total has been reached.

When I first heard the motion, I could hardly believe my ears. The Reform Party is supposed to be the party which believes that less government is better government. Yet that very same party introduced the motion which would add extra processes, extra time, extra layers of bureaucracy and extra costs to the administration of the old age security program. It really is amazing.

Motion No. 7 betrays the Reform Party's fixation on the minute details of the OAS program. Members opposite seek to micromanage the program and the minister at great cost and for no benefit whatsoever. It would like to have complete control over every minute detail, every tiny aspect of the entire program.

As usual, it is instructive to look at the facts surrounding the motion. It is also worth while to note that these facts are at the disposal of the Reform Party, as they are at the disposal of all members of the House.

The Minister of Human Resources Development currently forgives something less than $1 million in old age security overpayments each year. As we have noted in debating other motions, the minister is responsible for that amount but does not have carte blanche to forgive overpayments. Certain conditions must exist before the overpayment can be forgiven.

As the old age security program pays benefits in the order of $18.5 billion each year, the rate at which overpayments are forgiven is something in the order of five one–thousandths of one per cent of the benefits paid. In addition, the amounts are already reported to Parliament in the context of the annual main estimates and public accounts. I will repeat that for the benefit of Reform members. These amounts are already reported to Parliament in the context of the annual main estimates and public accounts. Hon. members already have the opportunity to examine all of the figures in depth.

The motion by the Reform Party would create a duplication of these processes, and to what gain? So that Reform members can micromanage the minister's use of his discretion to forgive overpayments which amount to something in the order of five one–thousandths of one per cent of the program's expenditures.

If the motion were adopted, it could lead to disaster. Imagine a committee setting a small limit on the amount which could be forgiven. If that amount of money were used up in eight months time, let us say, what would happen to the cases which occurred in the final four months of the year? The government would have to tell those individuals that they must repay their debts even though their circumstances were similar or worse than someone who was overpaid a few months earlier. I do not consider this a fair practice and no one else in the House does.

With regard to the motions to amend Bill C–54 moved by the Bloc and the Reform Party, the government finds itself right in the middle. In one of the motions the Bloc Quebecois demands the minister be required to forgive overpayments without regard to the ability of the client to repay the amount. In Motion No. 7 the Reform Party seeks to prevent the minister from using his authority to forgive benefit overpayments compassionately by placing limits which would have to be respected no matter what the ability of the pensioner to repay the overpaid amount.

On one hand we have a party that says never collect any overpayment and on the other hand we have a party that says never forgive any overpayment. The government recognizes the need to recover moneys where warranted and to forgive repayment where appropriate. I also believe ministers must retain responsibility for the administration of their programs and that this responsibility should not be removed, as would be in the case of either Motion No. 6 or Motion No. 7 if adopted.

I firmly oppose Motion No. 7. I urge all hon. members in the House to do likewise and to move to the speedy passage of this legislation.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, members of the official opposition are used to seeing their amendments or their comments misunderstood or not understood at all. This is once again the case. It must be understood that we are significantly amending an act, and that seniors or people who are eligible either for the Canada Pension Plan or for family allowances may discover, at some point, that they received more money than they were entitled to.

The current act, which we are in the process of amending, includes a provision which is fair in that it provides the following, and I quote: "Where a person has received or obtained a benefit payment to which the person is not entitled, or a benefit payment in excess of the amount of the benefit payment to which the person is entitled, the amount of that benefit payment or the excess amount, as the case may be, constitutes a debt due to Her Majesty and may be recovered in proceedings commenced (a) at any time, where that person made a wilful misrepresentation or committed fraud for the purpose of receiving or obtaining that amount or excess amount". In other words, if someone cheats, the government can, at any time, recover the money.

However, there is also a (b) in the existing section, and we hope that the government will listen and keep that provision. Part (b) provides this: "in any case where paragraph (a) does not apply, at any time before the end of the fiscal year immediately following the fiscal year in which that amount or excess amount was received or obtained". We will see what these other cases are.

We feel that the (b) part should be kept. But what is the government doing? It is eliminating that provision. The government says that any such payment constitutes a debt to Her Majesty, as though the recipients were cheaters. I agree that the government is significantly amending the legislation to make things easier for the public. For example, I can think of the income supplement for needy elderly people. As you know, these people currently have to sign a form every year. The bill before us provides that they will no longer have to sign that form. However, it could be that, without any ill intent on the part of the elderly, their situation may change, because they inherited some money or for whatever reason, so that they are no longer eligible for a supplement, but will not know that and may continue to receive such supplement for years, until someone finds out.

Without being in any way guilty or even responsible, they would find themselves in the situation of having to pay back a large sum, even though responsibility for the overpayment might rest entirely with the system. I asked the committee to ensure that people knew what they were entitled to annually. I was told that that would be done through the regulations. I have no guarantee. I was shown nothing.

It seems to me that we cannot, on the one hand, increase the opportunities for administrative errors and, on the other, remove this limit, which forces the government to recognize that people are not required to pay for the errors it makes, because in fact, in this bill, the government is doing two things. It is taking away the five–year period within which a person could make a claim for benefits to which he was entitled. There was agreement with that, but at the same time, the government is giving itself unlimited powers to go after these amounts, which again may not have been fraudulently obtained, but might simply be the result of an administrative error. It is giving itself the power to subject members of the public to serious hardship, even in the case of an administrative error. We know that the people in question are generally seniors or families on income support.

Therefore, it seems to me that this is a measure worthy of the government's attention. We are concerned about the likelihood of administrative errors, and we will be supporting the Reform Party's amendment, and adding an amendment to the amendment deleting subsections 7 and 8.

The Reform Party wants members to be told exactly how the legislation has been administered so that they are aware of the large number of errors that have been made. We are in agreement with that, but do not agree that the government should not correct the errors, and we can be sure that the government will wish to correct them only in those cases where there has been prejudice done. We do not agree that errors should be allowed to stand until the House moves in this regard, particularly as any motion it brings forward can only be a recommendation.

Here is the amendment. I move, seconded by the member for Argenteuil—Papineau:

That Motion No. 7 be amended by deleting the new subsections (7) and (8).

But, it boils down to the same thing. Yes, we should improve the administration of the law but, in doing so, we should be very careful not to increase administrative errors and inconvenience people who are most in need and who are often unable to defend themselves. Individuals should not have to pay.

The current two subsections of the act stipulate that the government can recover its due at any time, regardless of the time which has passed since payment, if fraud is involved. If administrative or other errors were in play—mostly administrative errors—the stipulated time period is one year, and I stress this point all the more because this provision is contained in legislation, which increases the likelihood of administrative errors. I would like to take this opportunity to point out that we know, from what has gone on in our ridings, that when the new computer program was introduced, there were many administrative errors.

These administrative errors hit citizens hard, citizens who did not receive any pension cheques at all. Those are obvious errors. When people stop receiving pension cheques, often, they call their MP, and I am glad that that is what happens. But, other administrative errors occurred, causing people to receive supplements to which they were not entitled.

I do not know whether you have ever helped people of a certain age who do not quite know how to go about it or what their entitlements are to fill in those forms. They can easily, with the best intentions, end up receiving benefits to which they are not entitled and have no idea what to do to fix the situation. In those circumstances, the same errors which deprived people of their entitlements could have the effect of giving people benefits to which they were not entitled, which they did not seek to obtain and which they could be obliged to pay back at one point. In my opinion, that is very unjust.

The government should take this matter seriously. Is that not the rule of thumb to ensure that administrative errors do not occur? Nothing is easier when cutting the payroll than letting administrative errors go by.

I am not saying that this is the government's aim but that there is nothing meaner and more stupid than wholesale jobs cuts which end up negatively affecting seniors in particular.

I hope that they will listen to our message, which is not an extremist message, contrary to what my honourable colleague said, but one of reason and compassion for people. Far from being extreme, our position consists of maintaining in part the current legislation. It appears to me that it is more my honourable colleagues opposite who are breaking with the Liberal tradition, which used to take into consideration the rights of people and was compassionate with them, a tradition which is broken with here. I invite them to correct this serious error in approach.

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment by the hon. member for Mercier in order. We shall therefore continue debate on the same group, including the amendment moved by the member for Mercier.

[English]

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the days have long since past when individual Canadians had to rely only on themselves, their families and their community for support during times of either unemployment or old age. Instead, the federal government has created the complicated system of tax funded programs of support, often called our social safety net. Like any other net it is full of holes, some of which are intentional but some of which merely represent aspects of serving the public which were not anticipated when the original legislation was drawn.

Bill C–54 represents the most recent efforts of the Government of Canada to mend some of those unintentional holes in our national safety net. It pertains to several major pieces of legislation, including the Old Age Security Act, the Canadian pension plan, the Children's Special Allowances Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The fact that it covers such a large amount of earlier legislation makes one suspect Bill C–54 will be complicated. In that regard the suspicion is correct. Several members of Parliament have spent many hours studying and digesting what the government has proposed here.

According to the legislative summary provided by the economics division of the Library of Parliament research, the government intended Bill C–54 to achieve the following goals: to improve service to clients of these major income support measures; to better co–ordinate programs, administration and the actual delivery of service; to eliminate some inconsistencies between old age security and the Canada pension plan programs; to reduce administrative costs, and to save some trees and some time by reducing duplication and paper burden, both for the departments and their clients; and finally, to help members of Parliament to better serve our constituents.

These changes will have wide ranging impact since they are expected to benefit some 1.4 million seniors and save the taxpayer about $10 million annually. Of course, nearly all Canadians, including those in the Reform Party of Canada, would approve of these goals. We all want more efficient government, fewer program duplications and reduced federal expenses. As one might expect, however, it is how the government proposes to undertake these much desired improvements that has led some of us to propose amendments to Bill C–54.

The first section of Bill C–54 deals in clauses 1 through 24 with the Old Age Security Act. I must report to this House that my constituency office frequently receives complaints from seniors who are caught up in the red tape of the Old Age Security Act sections.

People receiving the spouses allowance, SPA, and the guaranteed income supplement, GIS, are required to reapply every single year preventing any payments from being made when the new fiscal year begins each April 1 until those applications have been received and approved. Single handedly that requirement imposes real hardship on the very Canadians this legislation was aimed at helping, namely low income seniors whose cheques are often delayed, for example if some bureaucrat decides that information on the application must be verified.

The simple fact is that the income of these least well off seniors does not change much from year to year. Therefore it seems to me to make far more sense to require only that seniors must report changes to their yearly income. No report received means there is no change.

On behalf of those seniors I personally congratulate the government for eliminating the very irritating and generally unnecessary piece of red tape. However, the question is not that simple.

A House committee has been at work on Bill C–54. The result of the committee's work is a series of proposed amendments which this place has been treating in groups for the purpose of organizing the debate.

Clause 23 of that first section of Bill C–54 is the subject of amendments, or Motions Nos. 5 and 6 proposed by the Bloc Quebecois as well as Motion No. 7 put forward by the Reform Party of Canada.

Clause 23 deals with overpayments that people may have received. Our position regarding Motion No. 5 is that when Canadians receive payment to which they are not entitled, they should pay the amount back except in those circumstances such as hardship or death, which already appear on page 10 of the bill.

Regarding Bloc Motion No. 6, we oppose it because we believe that department officials should stand behind their advice and be accountable regarding our tax dollars. This unaccountability by the bureaucrats and in some regards the politicians has gone on far too long.

Regarding Motion No. 7, the Reform Party's concern primarily relates to keeping the minister accountable to Parliament. This has been overlooked for years. It is time that the minister started to accept some of that accountability.

Motion No. 7 asks the minister to report annually to this House regarding overpayments in either Canada pension plan or old age security, providing details of their cost to taxpayers. A parliamentary committee would then study this report and make its recommendations regarding what the minister could or could not remit the following year.

Motion No. 7 has the great advantage of keeping the department and its minister accountable to the Canadian people through members of Parliament who are the people's elected representatives. What I am saying here is opposite to that which the member on the other side said a few minutes ago. We in the Reform Party say maybe it is time that MPs started to buckle down and do some work on their own to help the minister out and not just to pass it off.

Very often even in my own riding of Okanagan—Shuswap I hear complaints from voters that civil servants and bureaucrats can do whatever they want with no accountability to the people who pay their salaries. It is an ongoing complaint and not only in my constituency. I am sure hon. members on the other side have had the same thing happen. They must hear it at the parties they go to or from the friends they associate with. It is an ongoing concern in Canada that has to be addressed.

We must take every responsible opportunity to correct this situation, where both bureaucrats and the courts run this country instead of having a government of the people, by the people, for the people. Too often we have government of the Ottawa mandarins for their own purpose, or governments of the lawyers and the judges, all too often to protect the rights of the criminals rather than to defend the interests of the vast majority of law–abiding citizens.

Until we can bring accountability back into this House we will always have this complaint from our constituents. It is unnecessary. It is something we must address and I believe Motion No. 7 is the first step in a long process.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to address this particular matter today. When I came here in the fall of 1993 one of the biggest promises I made to the constituents of Elk Island who elected me was to exert pressure on the government to be accountable for the way the taxpayers' hard earned dollars were being spent.

I remember very distinctly one of the things which shocked me when I arrived here. There was an orientation for new members. The individual making the presentation told us what our office budgets were and explained the formula. Then he said that it did not matter, that we could spend more, that we could spend any amount we wanted to. I was getting upset and as a brand new member I did not know what to do. Should I get up and say that is wrong and we should not do that? I was getting quite angry about this carte blanche that an MP had to spend any amount he wanted.

Then the presenter said that to remember, any amount we overextended or overspent on our budget or any category in it would simply be deducted from our salary. I immediately relaxed and was happy. He was obviously building it up. He said that as a member of Parliament I had a personal responsibility to be within my budget. If I am not trustworthy or not on the bit in terms of managing my budget, then it would come out of my own pocket.

When I left that meeting I remembered how my emotions went up with anger and down with great delight that there was one level of accountability. I then asked some of my colleagues if it would not be wonderful if we could require that same level of accountability from all members of the government, all of the bureaucrats. A deputy minister would be required to give up a portion of his salary for overspending the budget.

I have been watching the budget and we have been working in committee on the estimates for the year and I am appalled. Over and over we hear about cuts, cuts, cuts. Yet in every set of estimates I have looked at so far the spending is up. The people of Canada need to know that total government spending under this new, much touted cutting budget is actually $2 billion more than last year. The people of Canada and members of this House ought to know that we are spending more and more.

When the hon. member from the governing Liberal Party was speaking earlier, he made some comments about the Reformers. He said that here is this group of Reformers who want accountability and all they are doing is proposing something that will cost more money. The member then said that the amount of overspending is not really that much. Why, it is only five one–thousandths of one per cent.

Five one thousandths of one per cent is certainly not excessive if it is put that way. But if we look at the tens of millions of dollars which are overspent because of administrative errors, because of lack of accountability and lack of resolve, I think that maybe 100 taxpayers would be required to pay their total tax bills just to pay for the overpayment. If we got those 100 taxpayers, or 1,000 taxpayers or however many are needed to come up with the tax dollars to fund this administrative error, I think we would have howls of protest. Perhaps then we would have a greater cry for accountability.

The member said that it is an administrative hassle. It will cost money to ask the minister to be accountable for the overpayments. Yes, indeed, accounting for money is a cost item. As any person who has ever been in business will tell us, the money which is spent on reliable accountants and on acceptable accounting procedures is usually money well spent. Money which is spent in providing accountability usually provides a saving of an amount much greater than the amount which is required to deliver on that accountability.

I would speak against the Bloc amendment to the Reform motion. What we are doing is we are promoting accountability.

The cry from the other side was that these people do not care, that we want to cut people off. Another statement was that we want to prevent the minister from being able to do his job. Wrong on both counts.

We in the Reform Party believe it is time we managed our fiscal affairs in such a way that we do not go down the tubes, so that we do maintain the ability to help people who are truly in need. As long as we keep on wasting money because we are too lazy to account for it, we are diving headlong into a disaster. That will prevent us from doing anything for anyone because we will have either runaway inflation or increased taxes and probably both in order to try to bail us out of a fiscal problem which was generated by governments over the past 30 years. There is probably nothing more urgent than bringing accountability to the whole process.

There is a recommendation in our motion that the minister must include his recommendations in his report. In other words, we are not saying that the minister cannot do his job; we are telling the minister to do his job and to do it well. Where it can be improved, he should bring his recommendations to the House. We will then provide assistance, via the House or a committee, so that we can be more efficient and better stewards of the money which Canadian taxpayers entrust to us.

We are saying to the minister that if he is overspending because of administrative errors, if he is giving money to people to whom it is not due, that money should be recoverable. If there are mitigating circumstances which would recommend that on compassionate grounds or for whatever reason it will not be paid back, we want to know why that is so. We want to know what the minister is going to do about it. Many years a go a very wise teacher of mine said: "If you set no goals, you will be sure to reach them. If you aim for nothing, you will be sure to hit it".

We are asking the minister to account for administrative errors in his department that cost the taxpayers money. We are asking the minister to come up with a plan that will save the taxpayers money. I do not think anyone would argue that when there is increasing competition for increasingly rare dollars from government, the money should go to people to whom it is intended. If someone receives money, whether it is OAS or CPP or UIC, to which they are not entitled it is actually a violation of the rights of the people who need it and it should be paid back unless there are very severe mitigating circumstances.

We want the minister to aim ever higher. We want the minister to say: "Last year this amount of unauthorized payments were made and we could not collect it back". We want the minister to stand in the House or table a report that will say what the amount was. He must be up front with the taxpayers who are footing the bill. Then he must also show his plan for reducing those costs. He must show what he is prepared to do in order to make the administration more efficient to reduce the number of people receiving payments to which they are not entitled. If the minister aims at nothing or says if we will have a certain amount of overpayment, so be it, we cannot improve, that is exactly what will happen. There will be no improvement.

However, as our amendment suggests, if the minister is required to give a report, stage his plans for doing better then we hopefully will find there will be improvement and fewer people will receive money to which they are not entitled. There will hopefully be fewer people required to pay back money they should not have received because the administrative procedures will be so honed to a fine art that people who are not entitled to receive money will not receive it. That is the ultimate goal for which we should strive and the goal which we should keep in mind and work toward until it is actually met.

We recognize it is not possible for a minister to micromanage his department. We say without equivocation that if the committees are to have any function in the House, as we were told by the so–called Liberal red book, we were to have more meaningful activities for MPs, let them work in the committees and deal with these recommendations.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable amount of trepidation and at the same time a certain sense of responsibility that I rise in the debate on the bill.

What is operating here is a plea for accountability, compassion and responsibility, efficiency and businesslike operation of the affairs of the House.

In particular I draw the attention of the House to Motion No. 7, the Reform Party motion calling for the minister to make a report to the House on where overpayments of CPP and OAS were made and at what cost to the Canadian taxpayer.

I am sure members of the House recognize only too well the largest group of people in Canada that deserves compassion today are the taxpayers. All taxpayers are burdened, be they young or old. They are paying taxes to a point at which they believe it has become excessive. They find themselves unable to do many of the things they want to do. They want to get into some of the larger purchases. They want to buy houses, cars, appliances and they find their discretionary income is getting lower and lower even though their gross salary is increasing.

We need to exercise some compassion. One of the greatest examples of compassion the House could demonstrate is that the money given to us by taxpayers be treated as money given to us in trust, money not to be spent willy–nilly at whatever whim or fancy might strike us at a particular time.

What is being called upon here is for the minister to say to all of his servants, the servants to the House and to the people of Canada: "Do your administration honestly, do it fairly and do it consistent with the legislation".

To the credit of most of our civil servants I must admit to the House that my association with our civil servants has been exemplary. They have done what they could and they do make mistakes, just as all of us make mistakes from time to time. When they make a mistake who is responsible? If the servant to the minister makes a mistake that servant is responsible to the minister but it is the minister who is responsible for the action of the people he has employed who report to him. The minister is responsible to the House for the actions taken by him and under his direction the staff he has appointed.

Therefore we ask that if there is an overpayment a committee do study these issues and they be reported to the House so that the responsibility can come back to the House. This is the Parliament of Canada. Here the legislation is enacted; here the responsibility ought to be demonstrated to all of the people of Canada.

It is with pride that we sit here. It is with the responsibility of knowing we are managing the people's money that we should approach the various aspects of the administration. It is with this intent that I come before the House to say the time has come to be accountable, to be responsible and to recognize it is not just the response we make to a stimulus but that we exercise the ability and the skill we have developed in the background we have so the right decision is made to emphasize that it helps the people who need the help the most.

Another group of people needs compassion. Those are the people who need to be helped by our social safety nets. There are many of them. There are those in our society, sad to say, who abuse the system, who use fraudulent means to apply for these benefits, who are dishonest in the information they include. They are responsible for the actions they have taken and they should be called to account. That is why this recommendation in this particular bill, to amend the bill, so that those overpayments do indeed become a debt to the crown. These are necessary and they ought to be enforced.

Then there is that other group that may well have received through administrative error or something else additional funds. Those people may through no fault of their own have spent more money than they probably should have are now unable to repay even though they may have received the amounts in error. Then a judgment call needs to be made. At that point the minister should exercise his responsibility. If he can defend that decision in the House, I am sure there are enough compassionate people in the House who would say there are those who ought to be forgiven.

We as a nation and as individuals would be the most despairing people and the most despicable people if we could not learn to forgive. Where there are honest mistakes made we ought to forgive; where people demand compassion, we must be able to give them that forgiveness. It can be done; it should be done.

Let us be accountable. Let us be compassionate to our taxpayers so we do not spend more money than we have to and recognize they are already overburdened in the taxes they are paying. Then let us call those to account who are responsible for the administration. They report to the House, they report to one another and they do these things honestly, credibly and efficiently. Let us all forgive where that needs to be done, where there are good reasons to forgive.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to Motion No. 7, the amendment put forward by the Reform Party.

Why is commons sense usually the first victim when we give consideration to change? I have stood in the House on more occasions than I wish to count and have seen that basic common sense becomes a trade–off between positive ideas for change and partisan politics.

Canada has reached a crossroads. Our fiscal situation has prompted a country wide debate on the state of our social security programs. Our safety net is financially unsustainable and many of the programs reflect waste and disturbing inefficiencies which will ultimately hurt the very people these programs were meant to help.

Motion No. 7 is one we believe can make the system more accountable. Accountability is one of the basic planks on which I was elected. I made a promise to constituents that all of my analysis, all of the efforts and work undertaken on their behalf would reflect that commitment to accountability.

There are many occasions in the House when all of us receive letters from constituents who write to us from their heart about expenditures and the danger to the basic structure of our social programs. When I get these letters I know why I am here challenging the government, demanding accountability on behalf of the Canadians we represent and using common sense in the deliberations we debate.

I received a letter from a lady named Irene in February of this year. Irene wants some answers to some very basic questions. She writes from her heart. She asks about accountability: "Dear member of Parliament, I am a senior citizen who is proud to call myself Canadian. However, I have become more and more concerned with the handling of our budget by our government. I have decided to participate in the process by writing this open letter to all members of Parliament regardless of party affiliation to communicate my concern over what I and many of my friends and family see as utter waste regarding unrealistic expectations and greed and total absence of conscience for the spending of public money".

She is doing what I would call her political work, participating in the process. She goes on to say: "I have been elected spokesperson by my group of friends, hence the lengthy list of suggested budgetary cuts. By cutting the following expenses we can perhaps cut less from programs that we have supported with our many years of hard work and money. Although these are but basic and straightforward budget cuts, surely the more unpalatable cuts will be seen less as another blow to the ordinary Canadian if it is perceived that all expenses are open to scrutiny".

What she is asking for is accountability. She goes on to list two pages full of cuts she believes would be appropriate and useful for government to take under consideration. Something in her last point I found quite interesting: "Why not increase the resources of the auditor general to find waste and duplication which they manage to find every year?" I thought that was appropriate to bring into the debate today since we are looking at our estimates: "However, rather than just report it, why not increase the personnel so that follow–up action may be taken? Every year we hear about all the waste and duplication in different government departments. However, once the report is made public, is that all there is? Is there any follow–up and/or guidance for the guilty parties?"

Irene once again is simply seeking accountability.

In Motion No. 7, which is basic common sense, we are trying to bring accountability to that system so that we can say to Irene: "Yes indeed, there is follow up to government waste. There is follow up to issues and problems as they arise within the bureaucracy".

Having said that, I want to go through the point that Motion No. 7 refers to because it is important to have for the record a very common sense motion that reflects the values of the Reform Party.

The motion calls for the minister to make a report to the House on where overpayments in CPP and OAS were made and at what cost to the Canadian taxpayer. That comment is very much reflected in Irene's letter to me. It is basic information about the government's bottom line. The report will then be studied by a parliamentary committee made up of representatives of the people who have entrusted us to make decisions based on the Canadian taxpayers' best interests with compassion and to do that with transparency.

The committee and not the bureaucrats will decide what the minister can or cannot remit next year. It will make recommendations on where and how to reduce the cost to the Canadian people in overpayment. That is just and fair.

If this motion is adopted, it will return accountability to where it belongs, in Parliament and not in the hands of the minister or senior bureaucrats of the department where everything is done behind closed doors. Let not the momentum of mediocrity continue to plague the actions of the House as we move toward change and become openly and completely accountable to the Canadian people.

The Deputy Speaker: My colleagues, it is my duty to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for Mackenzie—Canadian National.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have been quite surprised by the Bloc amendment to the motion that we proposed.

The Deputy Speaker: I believe the hon. member has already spoken to this motion, has she not?

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, no, I spoke to the motion but not to the Bloc's amendment.

The Deputy Speaker: Since it is the same vote, the member is precluded from speaking twice to the matter.

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am a little puzzled. My motion has been amended and yet I have no way of expressing in debate my response to that.

The Deputy Speaker: My understanding is that the matters were all grouped for debate. The member is correct that she did not have knowledge of the amendment before she spoke earlier today. Accordingly, unless anyone else wishes to intervene on the matter, I can see no reason why she cannot speak.

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, I find the amendment proposed by the Bloc to be extremely inconsistent with the stand that its members are taking on the bill.

Bloc members are erasing the accountability of the minister. They are saying that the minister should have discretion whether he exceeds any limits on overpayment. Yet in a number of their amendments, they say that the minister's discretion should be erased. Here they want to give the minister discretion by amending my amendment but in any other case, they do not want the minister to have discretion. I would ask the Bloc to consider the consistency of this amendment.

If they do not like the minister having absolute discretion in clause 38, why are they saying he should have absolute discretion in clause 23? I do not understand it at all.

Erasing subclauses (7) and (8) of our motion will make the committee's recommendation totally toothless. The Bloc members are the ones who are always hollering and screaming about the need for more fiscal accountability in the way government spends money and to quit adding to the debt.

We have tried to bring forward a very simple motion that would put some limits and some parameters around what a department can spend. The Bloc members do not want that. They want this department to have absolutely unlimited discretion to overspend, to make payments that are not legitimate, necessary or warranted, but there is nothing that Parliament can do to stop this. They do not want Parliament to be able to stop this but they are always complaining that departments are overspending.

I am really sorry but I fail to see the reasoning. The Bloc has not even put anyone up to explain why it is doing this. I see absolutely no reason why the Bloc is doing this. It seems entirely capricious and illogical.

I would ask my colleagues in the Bloc to reconsider the position they have taken which is not consistent, not logical, seems to serve no good purpose and flies in the face of the concerns they have expressed about this bill in their own motions.

It is all very well to say the committee would look at the overspending, but if Parliament has absolutely no ability to place limits on ministerial and departmental discretion what is the good of Parliament? Why are we sitting here? Is not the whole purpose of us being here to manage the affairs of the country in a realistic way?

If this amendment passes we are saying that if departments overpay, make all the mistakes they want, waste all the money they want, send the money here, there and everywhere, wherever they want, we cannot do anything about it nor do we want to do anything about it. God forbid that we should say: "This far and no more can your inefficiencies go".

I appeal to the members of the House to reconsider their position on this. If the minister wants to overspend and feels there are good reasons to do this and has a logical explanation, then he will have to convince a committee of the House, parliamentarians, people who were elected to manage our affairs and our money, that he has a good reason for needing to do this. Is that not the whole purpose of us being here or am I missing something?

I ask my friends in the Bloc for an explanation of why they proposed this amendment. Failing that, I can only urge on the House that it is totally frivolous. It is illogical. It is unnecessary. It flies in the face of what we are here for. I urge that it be voted down and the motion as proposed be accepted.

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ)

That Bill C–54 be amended by deleting Clause 38.

He said: Mr. Speaker, finally, the last amendment to Bill C–54. In Motion No. 12 I move the following amendment:

[English]

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As I understand it, the House voted on whether to accept the amendment to Motion No. 7 but not whether to accept Motion No. 7. We need to do that.

The Deputy Speaker: That will be done at the time of the deferred division.

[Translation]

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Speaker, in Motion No. 12 I move the following amendment: That Bill C–54 be amended by deleting clause 38, which reads as follows: "Where a decision is made by a Review Tribunal or the Pension Appeals Board in respect of a benefit, the Minister may stay—that is what it says—payment of the benefit until the latest of—there are three choices—(a) the expiration of the period allowed for making an application for leave to appeal to the Pension Appeals Board, (b) the expiration of the period allowed for making an application under the Federal Court Act for judicial review of the decision, and (c) where Her Majesty has made an application under the Federal Court Act for judicial review of the decision, the month in which all proceedings in relation to the judicial review have been completed".

Why delete clause 38? Because the purpose of this amendment moved by the Bloc Quebecois, the official opposition, is to prevent the government from suspending payment of benefits during appeals, since these appeals arise from the government's failure to manage these programs satisfactorily. Senior citizens should not have to pay for the government's incompetence.

Clearly, the government wants to discourage senior citizens from filing appeals, since some people do not have the resources to tide them over this waiting period. Clause 38 of Bill C–54 provides no guarantees for adequate financial security for seniors.

In the report by the National Advisory Council on Aging, as I said before, the disposable incomes of seniors were as follows: the income of families where the head of the household is a senior is 60 to 80 per cent of the income of other Canadian families, depending on the standard used and the region.

In 1989, the average income of families where the head of the household was a senior was only $37,462 or 72 per cent of the income of families where the head of the household was under 65. In 1989, the average income of single persons aged 65 or over was $16,316, while the average income of single persons under 65 was $23,080. A single person, for the purposes of this clause, is a person who lives alone or in a household where he or she is not related to the other members of the household.

Single persons, whatever their age, tend to have relatively low incomes. Consequently, the gap between seniors and the rest of the population is not quite as wide for those who live alone as it is for families, but it is still significant.

By allowing himself to stay payment of the benefits during a review or an appeal, the minister is depriving recipients of money they need to live on, as it is often their only source of income.

Seventy–two per cent of retired women and 50 per cent of retired men receive old age security and guaranteed income supplement benefits. Only 5 per cent of seniors make more than $50,000. The life expectancy of seniors has increased. We must ensure that their extra years of life are satisfactory.

By tightening the conditions under which seniors can appeal what they consider an unfair decision, the government is trying to discourage them by reducing their income. Yet, the government itself admits that old age benefits are the only source of income for a considerable proportion of recipients.

Let us keep in mind that the federal government has already decided to reduce the deficit on the backs of the most vulnerable by lowering the age credit. As a result, all taxpayers aged 65 and over can apply for a tax credit equal to 17 per cent of $3,482 at the federal level and 20 per cent of $2,200 in Quebec. This credit is non–refundable, that is to say, it applies to the tax payable, and the excess portion cannot be refunded. The unused portion of the credit can, however, be transferred to the spouse.

On May 31, 1994, I rose in this House to oppose reducing the age credit. I reiterated that the feeble efforts to reduce spending were being made on the backs of the most vulnerable. During that speech, I also asked the minister responsible for seniors a question about the plan to install voice mail to answer inquiries from seniors.

The minister simply told us about the speed of the proposed service. I explained that many seniors are reluctant to use such a service and that they express this opinion on a regular basis. If you ask seniors how clause 38 will affect their decision about whether or not to appeal a decision, the answer is clear: seniors will not appeal because, for most of them, old age benefits are the only source of income.

In conclusion, the Bloc Quebecois, the official opposition, cannot remain silent and let the government reduce the deficit on the backs of seniors. Clause 38 of Bill C–54 must be deleted so that the government will not be able to stay payment of benefits during the appeal process.

[English]

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, again I rise on this question to try to persuade the government to make the right decision. Since the calls are made by the Liberals, with their majority whatever they decide will be, so I am going to try hard to persuade them in the correct way.

There has been considerable inconsistency from Bloc members, in the sense that with this amendment they are asking that we take away from the minister the discretion not to pay.

• (1720)

In other words, if the minister decides that somebody should not be entitled to some of these programs that are being dealt with in Bill C–54 and some administrative bureaucrat in the system decides a person should not be receiving a benefit because the rules say he should no longer be receiving it, according to this amendment the minister would no longer have the right to stop the payments.

To me, this is ludicrous. On the one hand they move a subamendment to our motion, which would have the effect of not giving the minister the right to make payments when they are required, and here they are saying they do not want to have the minister have the right to not make payments when they are not required. That does not make sense to me.

As members opposite are thinking about this amendment, and I presume they will be opposed to it, I want to strongly urge them to be opposed to it. If the payments are not justifiable they are in breach of the rules, and the minister should be able to stop those payments.

Let us look at the scenario this sets up. A person receives money and the department says no more money. Then the person who is receiving appeals. During that appeal process, in which the wheels of government can take quite some time, these payments must be kept coming. If the person receiving them really wants to take the system for a ride, they will make sure that all of that money they receive is totally spent, so that if the appeal goes against them they will be able to say they cannot pay it back because they have no money. Then, on a compassionate ground or whatever, according to the previous rules that money would not be repayable.

It really means that the taxpayers are being totally dumped on in terms of accountability if this amendment is accepted. As I said, I urge the members opposite to pass the information on to their leadership so that the leadership gives the direction to them so they know how to vote and they will vote correctly in opposing this amendment.

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is easy to see from the large number of amendments prepared on the subject that the opposition is not in favour of making changes to the current appeal process.

I cannot speak for the opposition, but the Liberal Party of Canada believes that our seniors deserve the best. With the proposed changes to the appeal system we would be giving them the opportunity to have their decisions reviewed as quickly and fairly as possible under the best system we can offer.

Motion No. 12 is intriguing. By the debate that is taking place, we see it is also very frustrating and confusing for the members of the official opposition versus members of the third party opposite. The battle that is going on between the two clearly reveals to me and to other members of the House of Commons that there is no simple answer to the very complex operations of any great government such as we have in Canada. Simple solutions just do not exist.

However, both parties have for some time, close to 18 months, been advocating simple solutions to extremely complex problems. I am just wondering after this lengthy period of time whether or not that is a deliberate attempt, or perhaps it is simply a matter of fact, that both parties lack the ability to comprehend the complexity and profound depth of these government operations. Perhaps they are deliberately trying to confuse Canadians with these simplistic solutions and are therefore misguiding the voting population.

We should begin by noting that the Canada pension plan review tribunals hear thousands of cases every year, thousands. These cases often are very complex. The legislation is also complex. They are sometimes very difficult to adjudicate.

With human beings involved, mistakes are sometimes made by these tribunals. When this occurs the minister must with great reluctance appeal the decision to the pension appeal board. This is only done where there are the clearest indications that a mistake has been made. Nonetheless, the department records indicate that 45 review tribunal decisions that were appealed by the minister to the pension appeal board were in fact overturned by that body. That 45 represents 80 per cent of the decisions that were made and rendered in 1994. Had the minister followed what appears to be the preference of the opposition and paid benefits before he was absolutely certain they should be paid, these 45 people would have been in the unfortunate position of having to repay money to the government. Imagine the shock these 45 people would have received if they had opened their mail and discovered they had to pay back thousands of dollars immediately. Naturally, they would be in the position where they would have no assets, no funds, simply because they live from cheque to cheque.

Therefore, closer examination of this motion, which the opposition claims will give better service to clients, will in fact reveal that many of those clients are put in a position where they have large overpayments that must be repaid, because the government is paying benefits before it is certain about entitlement. We must not allow that to happen.

For all these reasons, I oppose Motion No. 12 and urge all hon. members to do the same.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if someone is inconsistent in this House, it is certainly not anyone on this side. I do not see where the consistency is in saying—especially with respect to the Canada Pension Plan which, we will recall, provides benefits to people with disabilities of all kinds—that individuals who are denied benefits will have to appeal. It is stated in the bill that the minister may stay payment of any benefit until the later of the following dates.

How can those people who are often disadvantaged because they have problems getting around and defending their case, because they have to hire someone to help them—people who will now be expected to appeal if they are convinced they qualify, knowing that, if they are wrong, the law requires that they repay—how can they, on top of everything, be deprived of benefits while they have to defend themselves? It makes no sense.

This is beyond me. If there is someone who does not understand, it is not one of us. Examine actual cases and then try and look us straight in the face and tell us that benefits should be stayed, even though the legislation clearly provides for benefits to be repaid. The pensioners who will appeal are those who are sure they have a good case. But if they do not receive benefits during that time, chances are that people will not appeal because they are unable to do so. It does not make any sense to me. It makes no sense and this so–called Liberal government should examine this point closely before adopting this clause.

The clause reads as follows: "Where a decision is made by a Review Tribunal in respect to a benefit"—so there was a benefit to start with—"the Minister may stay payment of the benefit until the later of—"

This means that those to whom benefits are denied or cut will probably have to go on welfare and rely on the welfare plan in their province. In some places, single individuals get something like $250. When a handicapped person who has to pay a helper loses his or her benefits and is told to wait until the very end, at which time he or she will get benefits, this is absolutely inconsistent and illogical; it makes no sense but, more importantly, it shows a total lack of compassion.

I urge Liberal members to look at this legislation closely and not from a partisan point of view. We, on this side, certainly did not debate the issue on a partisan basis. We work for those who are the least able to take care of themselves. This is how we have to consider this issue. We took a close look at the amendment proposed by the Reform Party and we agree with part of it. However, we do not agree with the part which provides that the minister must wait, even if he is convinced that an amount should be remitted because an administrative error was made. We feel that those who suffer the prejudice should not have to wait.

In any case, the amendment proposed by the Reform Party did not remove the minister's discretionary power, since the motion only refers to a recommendation. That could only adversely affect the people concerned, since the minister still had discretionary power. I am answering the hon. member, because we always enjoy debating the substance of these issues, but that proposal does not make sense. The fact is that, if we look at all these provisions and amendments, which are supposed to be technical, we realize that this bill will significantly change the relationship between the elderly, the handicapped and families, on the one hand, and the state, on the other hand. This is what this legislation is about.

It seems to me that we are all trying to protect the interests of our fellow citizens. At the same time, we realize that the system must include some protection. However, that protection must not be provided at the expense of the public. We must not set the whole system against the public. To deprive people of the means to defend themselves when they risk losing their meagre benefits, is certainly not consistent with social fairness, accountability or good government. No. The government is trying to save money on the backs of Canadians, by not explicitly providing them with the right to appeal, a right which is theirs.

One must have worked with people who had to fight the system, whether as regards occupational safety and health issues, or eligibility to disability benefits, to measure the enormous challenge which these people face, given how hard it is for them to provide the required evidence. Consequently, there is no reason to come up with such a provision, in addition to all the other changes proposed in this bill to favour the system, at the expense of the public. To be sure, this is not a legislation which the Liberals can be proud of.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we are having a good debate today on some administrative changes to Bill C–54. I certainly agree with my hon. friend from the Bloc that we are trying to serve the citizens of the country as well, as effectively, as compassionately and as truly as we can.

• (1735)

Our country deserves the best we can give it. I remind my hon. friend that if we are to run things effectively it should not be done on the backs of citizens. Savings should not be looked on as being something we do on the backs of people. Spending is really what we put on the backs of people. Spending is a burden which we extract from the hard work of our citizens and often place on our future citizens as well. We have to look at all of the administrative measures and all of the spending proposals in a way which is fair to the people who need the money, fair to the people who have to earn the money and fair to the people who will inherit the debt we are building in order to spend some of the money.

We cannot look at this issue as if only desperately poor and needy people are being hurt. Those are the people we want to help. If we are to continue to help them then we must be responsible, effective and efficient in the way we administer every government department.

I was saddened to hear the Liberal member deriding the Reform amendment to this very complex bill. He suggested it was put forward to hurt seniors. It does no credit to debate in the House when attempts to constructively improve proposals of government are simply dismissed as meaning to hurting people.

It is beneath members of the House to suggest that any member would be motivated by such repugnant motives.

The Liberal member also suggested the amendments were simplistic. Is any attempt to improve government legislation to be dismissed as being simplistic? I say to the people of Canada that to look at complex bills, to study them, to assess the impact and the effectiveness of them takes a great deal of time and effort. It is done in an attempt to give the best to our country, to ensure everything we do has the highest standards of accountability in delivering the services which Canadians need in a way we can afford and which we can count on over the long term.

I appeal to members to respect and to objectively and seriously judge the things put forward in the House, not to deride, misrepresent and distort them in a partisan way. The country will not benefit from that kind of approach. I am saddened by that kind of approach and I appeal to members not to take it.

Over 80 per cent of Canadians say they want our social programs reformed. They know the programs are often abused. They often give money to people who do not need it. There are many examples of programs sending money to millionaires. Any small attempts we make to these complex bills to make the departments and bureaucrats accountable are somehow dismissed.

Do we really want to say as parliamentarians to a minister or to a department: "Go out and overspend. Go out and make allocations of money not warranted, to which people are not entitled, in any amount you want. We do not care. We do not want to know about it. We will not stop you. We do not want limits on that"?

Surely we owe the people of Canada better responsibility, accountability and management than that. I ask the House to vote down measures which remove accountability and support measures which add accountability.

Our ministers and our departments are not looking for ways to defraud the Canadian people of money to which they are rightfully entitled under these programs—far from it. There are tens of millions of dollars going to people who do not need it, who do not deserve it, who are not entitled to it, people receiving money from programs not meant for that.

Surely we have an obligation and a responsibility in the House to put a stop to that and to make sure the people who do need the money are getting it and the people who do not need the money and who are not entitled to it are not getting dollars that should be going to the neediest people in our society.

I speak against Motion No. 12. It removes accountability in an important way. I certainly urge the House to add more accountability to the way these programs are administered rather than detract from it.

AGREEMENT ON INTERNAL TRADE IMPLEMENTATION ACT

Hon. Raymond Chan (for Minister of Industry, Lib.) moved that Bill C–88, an act to implement the agreement on internal trade, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Industry, I thank you for this opportunity to speak on the occasion of second reading of Bill C–88, an act to implement the agreement on internal trade.

The bill is another step in the process to create a new internal trade regime that has been under way in Canada for some time. Our objective is to reduce barriers to interprovincial trade and to remove restrictions on the movement of people and capital within the domestic marketplace.

Passage of Bill C–88 will be a necessary step for Parliament to take in order to implement the agreement on internal trade signed last year by all the provinces and territories along with the federal government.

At the invitation of the Prime Minister, first ministers met in Ottawa last July to formally accept and sign the agreement the committee of ministers of internal trade had finalized at the end of June. With this accord, we were committed to a target of July 1, 1995 to have the appropriate legislative and regulatory changes in place so the agreement could be legally implemented.

In this sense, in putting this legislation before the House we are meeting an obligation to provincial and territorial governments we incurred when we signed the agreement in June 1994. The agreement on internal trade was an important step in the quest to create an integrated domestic market in Canada.

In the 127 years or so since Confederation, we have seen a hodge–podge of protectionist measures and trade conventions develop, which have inhibited interprovincial trade and restricted the flow of goods and capital between provinces in Canada. These measures range from outright restrictions to bidding on government contracts to a patchwork of regulations and incompatible standards.

The government has felt strong and repeated pressure from the private sector to deal with the problems associated with internal barriers to trade and conflicting regulations on cross–border flows of people and capital. We have received representations from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Business Council on National Issues, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Bankers Association, the Canadian Construction Association, and so on. The list is long and the problems are deeply felt and broadly experienced.

Such barriers put Canadian businesses at a comparative disadvantage by restricting the size of the available marketplace and by making the markets open to Canadian businesses even smaller than they would be on an open national basis. In a time of increasing global competition and more open markets in other parts of the world, this can have the negative result of putting Canadian businesses at a disadvantage to international competitors, even in our own markets. In addition, there is an economic cost related to marketplace inefficiency. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has estimated that barriers to trade cost Canadians about $7 billion annually in direct job and income loss.

In years past, when external trade barriers protected economies like ours from international competition the economic costs of internal trade barriers were tolerated. When Canadian industry was sheltered from international competition by tariff barriers of 10 per cent or even 20 per cent, the economic costs were not so obvious. But a marketplace sheltered from international competition is no longer the reality. International barriers and tariffs are down. The market is global and the competition is fierce.

We will not and cannot be successful in an open global market if we operate in a closed market here at home. So we need to adapt to the international reality in trade. Bill C–88 and the agreement it implements is an important aspect of this process and is part of the more open fundamental process of economic renewal that the government is following towards its strategic objectives for economic growth and job creation.

Last fall the Minister of Industry introduced in the House our government's plan to build a more innovative economy. We outlined our intentions for improving the economic climate of Canada in four ways: to build a positive entrepreneurial climate and to help small business grow; to expand markets for jobs and growth through trade; to create an efficient and modern infrastructure; and also to make technology work for Canada. These are the areas where the government can have the greatest impact on job creation.

While Bill C–88 will support all of these objectives, it has special relevance for the objective to expand markets. To grow and prosper, business needs an efficient and open marketplace, an environment that encourages innovation and expansion, free of unnecessary barriers.

With the agreement on internal trade and now with this bill we have the elements to establish a new internal trade regime in Canada, one that will allow us to make the most of our interprovincial domestic market by encouraging innovation and expansion and by removing unnecessary barriers to trade.

The Canadian economy is in a period of transition. There are fundamental changes taking place because of the globalization of trade and the rapid pace of technological change. Competitive advantage in today's world depends less on location and natural resources and more on innovation and ability to respond to changing market conditions and to achieve economies of scale.

As we continue the transition from a resource based economy to one where innovation, knowledge, and flexibility are the underpinnings of competitive advantage, we need to ensure that the domestic trading environment will accommodate and expedite the necessary changes.

Bill C–88 will provide a supportive environment for the economic transition process we are now experiencing. The legislation that is before the House now is the result of a long process of negotiations and consultation, which has involved many Canadians with many different perspectives, ministers of the federal government, ministers of all the provincial and territorial governments, officials of all these governments and representatives of the private sector. Also, it is interesting to note that political parties of all stripes have co–operated in negotiations leading to the agreement. There were different perspectives, but a shared belief that a more open trading environment will be good for Canada.

In fact a striking feature of the process has been the high degree of co–operation and goodwill that has been demonstrated on all sides. Those Canadians who have been involved in the process understand the compelling need to open our internal markets and ensure that the Canadian marketplace works to the advantage of all Canadians.

Over the last two years the negotiations and background work were under the guiding hand of Mr. Arthur Mauro, a well known Canadian businessman. Mr. Mauro acted as chairman of the committee of chief negotiators and worked tirelessly to keep the process moving toward its objectives and produced the agreement that the ministers signed last year.

The work leading up to this bill has been exhaustive. It has been thorough and it will be ongoing. It is our duty to keep the process moving. The process began in June 1988, when federal and provincial agriculture ministers compiled a list of barriers to internal trade in agricultural food products. A federal–provincial committee of ministers of internal trade with a commitment to open market access within Canada was formed. The focus of this group was comparatively narrow. Topics of discussion included government procurement, wine, spirits, and beer, transportation, professional mobility, and standards.

The process had begun. Governments were now dealing with the problems of internal trade barriers in an organized way. Federal–provincial discussions continued and the focus widened. Ministers also began to consider the need for a dispute resolution mechanism as part of more comprehensive trading agreements between provinces and territories.

In December 1989 a memorandum of understanding on internal trade in agricultural products was signed by seven of the provinces. The process was beginning to move. Federal–provincial negotiators continued to meet. Agreement was reached and memoranda of understanding were signed on a number of individual issues, such as transportation and government procurement.

By December 1992 the committee of ministers of internal trade recommended that the process be accelerated and that all parties commit to the goal of reaching a broad and comprehensive internal trade agreement by June 30, 1994.

By March 1993 the negotiators agreed to three specific principles as basic to an agreement. They were that governments treat people, goods, services, and capital equally, irrespective of where they originate in Canada; that government reconcile standards and regulations to provide for the free movement of people, goods, services, and capital within Canada; and that governments ensure that their administrative policies operate to provide for the free movement of people, goods, services, and capital within Canada.

In August 1993 Mr. Mauro took charge of the negotiations. In December 1993 our government reaffirmed its commitment to the process, and in January 1994 chief negotiators were given specific instructions to prepare a draft agreement for the consideration of the committee of ministers of internal trade. Ministers were looking for an agreement that would improve three main elements: trade rules to apply to specific sectors or issue areas; an elaboration on how the rules would apply in these specific areas; and also a dispute resolution mechanism that would encourage parties to negotiate settlements but not to involve the courts.

Now the process was in high gear. An intensive series of meetings was held during the period from January to June last year. These meetings culminated in ministers agreeing to the text of an internal trade agreement at the end of June. Following that, the Prime Minister and all other first ministers signified their acceptance of the agreement with a formal signing on July 18. The final legal text was put in place and accepted by all parties by last October.

All governments agreed to make necessary legislative and regulatory changes to bring the agreement into effect by July 1, 1995. Bill C–88 fulfils the commitment of the federal government in this regard. Last year's agreement on internal trade was a major step in a long process. It has demonstrated that all governments can work together to achieve a common objective that will benefit all Canadians.

What are we putting in place? The agreement on internal trade gives a set of general rules that prohibits any new barriers to trade and eliminates old ones in ten specific sectors or areas and establishes a formal mechanism for the resolution of disputes that may arise.

The agreement provides for the following objectives. It will open the $50 billion annual government purchasing market to competitive bidding throughout Canada. It will reduce restriction on investment, including a code of conduct to forbid incentives that lure firms to relocate from one province to another. It will improve the ability of Canadians to work anywhere they wish. It commits government to work on harmonization of environmental protection, transportation standards, and consumer protection. It will set up an impartial publicly accessible process for resolving trade disputes between governments and between individuals and governments.

The dispute settlement mechanism is based on the principle that it is preferable to solve problems informally and at an early stage. It reflects the desire of governments to cooperate rather than to confront or to litigate.

Therefore, it sets out a methodical, step by step process of information exchange followed by consultations. Questions not settled in that way may be brought to an impartial panel that would make recommendations for solving the issue. Only as a last resort, when a party has failed to change a measure found to have violated the agreement, might retaliation be acceptable. Even then, action would be limited both in effect and scope to areas especially covered by the agreement.

Also important is the fact that the agreement has the potential to grow and evolve. It deals directly with a large number of current issues and it provides the framework for negotiations to continue on others. Also, the agreement and this bill are parts of a broad set of activities now under way to create a more open trading environment throughout Canada.

The provinces and territories have obligations to implement the terms of the agreement by July 1, 1995. Work is under way on many fronts to make necessary legislative and regulatory changes at the provincial and territorial levels. At the federal level we have both an obligation to make the necessary changes, as Bill C–88 does, as well as a duty to show leadership in order to advance the process. It is fair to say this bill does not solve all the interprovincial trade problems that have built up over the last 127 years. However, it has moved us a considerable way along the track.

We see the process as one of forward movement. Some issues are dealt with. Systems and procedures are in place for dealing with others and new ones may yet come forward for our attention. For example, in the energy sector a separate set of negotiations is under way toward a similar deadline of July 1.

A process is in place to deal with the outstanding issues in the agricultural sector. Issues related to interprovincial trade in alcoholic beverages are not resolved either, but a consultative mechanism is set up and deadlines for resolutions are in place.

In summary, for the first time in our history, we will have a rules based system, a mechanism for settling disputes and a work plan for the future. In the future other issues may come up, for example, interprovincial regulations relating to financial services or standards for environmental protection. There is the further possibility of using the framework to consider streamlining and harmonizing "non–standards" regulations.

Whatever new issues come forward, we will want to deal with them in the same spirit of co–operation, shared objectives and mutual interests that has now been established within the agreement on internal free trade that this bill will implement. With this legislation we are ensuring the framework is in place and we are confirming our belief that the fundamental principles of free trade will work.

When first ministers signed the agreement last summer they committed to having the necessary legislative and regulatory changes in place by July 1, 1995. Passage of this bill by the House will ensure we meet our obligations to our provincial and territorial colleagues as discussed at the recent meeting of federal, provincial and territorial ministers in Calgary. It will also demonstrate our continued leadership in the move toward a more open domestic trading environment and it will reinforce our other activities to create a more innovative economy.

I want to emphasize that passing this bill is not the end of the process. It is part of a continuing one. This legislation builds the foundation and establishes the framework within which we will continue to build an effective domestic trading environment over time. Look at how the GATT and the European Union have evolved over time. The important thing is to establish the base and create the mechanism to allow for flexibility to meet changing economic conditions as they occur.

Trade agreements deepen and broaden with use and experience and this one will too. Bill C–88 will provide the foundation for moving toward a domestic trading environment that will allow for the free flow of goods, services, people and capital within Canada. The Prime Minister and other ministers, including first ministers, have been actively involved in broadening the marketplace for Canadian goods and services in export markets. The Team Canada approach has been highly successful in doing that.

Now we must bring the same spirit to improving the domestic market for our businesses and our workers. Bill C–88 is an important step in that direction and that is why we support it.

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this bill is aimed at implementing the provisions of the Agreement on Internal Trade signed with the provinces last summer. To this end, the federal government must pass legislation to comply with the agreement before its coming into force, on July 1, 1995, as the minister said. Briefly put, this is the purpose of Bill C–88.

First, I would like to show that Bill C–88 assumes powers which were never mentioned during the negotiations with the provinces or when the agreement was signed. This indicates a strong desire on the part of the federal government to centralize.

In the second part of my speech, I would like to highlight some of the aspects of international trade which favour the political autonomy of the regions and the creation of economic unions rather than the establishment of great federations with a rigid and centralizing constitution such as the Canadian federation.

Last summer's agreement deals with 11 specific areas, namely government contracts, investments, labour mobility, consumer protection standards and initiatives, farm products and foodstuffs, alcoholic beverages, natural resources processing, communications and transportation, energy and the protection of the environment. However, the sections of the agreement Bill C–88 deals with are basically those regarding dispute resolution, as if all the federal government could do was put controls in place.

Articles 1601 to 1604 deal with the establishment of a committee on internal trade and its secretariat. The role of the committee will be to supervise the implementation of the agreement and to assist in the resolution of disputes. Article 1705 deals with the establishment of a panel at the request of the disputing parties. The panel is made up of five members who will have to decide on the validity of the dispute and on retaliatory action that the complaining party will eventually be authorized to take.

Articles 1710(4), (5) and (6) stipulate that, if the matter has not be resolved within one year of issuance of the panel report, the complaining party may request a meeting of the committee. The committee shall convene within 30 days to discuss with the complaining party the option of taking retaliatory action in respect of the party complained against. So, the complaining party may, until such time as a mutually satisfying resolution is achieved, impose to the party complained against retaliatory action of equivalent effect to the damage caused to the complaining party.

If I am reminding the House of these few rather technical aspects of the Agreement on Internal Trade, it is essentially in order to highlight the context within which the interprovincial agreement was reached. We must understand that the panel decisions are not binding, which implies that the committee governing the interprovincial trade agreement has no power.

If the party complained against does not comply with the panel recommendations, article 1710 applies. As we saw, article 1710 deals with retaliation action that the complaining party may take in respect of the party that did not comply with the agreement.

In fact, the main purpose of this bill is to implement the agreement on internal trade. The Bloc Quebecois has always been in favour of freer trade, which is the context in which states do business today. So, we support the principle of the agreement, but if the federal government is the aggrieved party under a trade agreement referred to in the agreement, it can impose retaliatory measures. However, that is not what is said in Bill C–88.

In fact, clause 9 goes well beyond the spirit of the agreement reached by the provinces last summer. This is why we are against the bill as it stands now. Clause 9 reads as follows:

> For the purpose of suspending benefits or imposing retaliatory measures of equivalent effect against a province pursuant to Article 1710 of the Agreement, the Governor in Council may, by order—

And then it goes on. It says that the Governor in Council may act, by order, which is the method usually used by an autocratic government. This bill clearly shows that the Liberal government wants to govern by order in council.

• (1810)

Are we again facing Liberal totalitarianism? In fact, clause 9 means that, if a party is at fault pursuant to article 1710 of the agreement, then the federal government, whether or not it is party to the dispute, assumes the right to impose retaliatory measures against all of the provinces without distinction.

Bill C–88 clearly indicates that the federal government intends to interfere in interprovincial trade and be both judge and judged, to provide through this agreement the power to act by order in council, a power it alone can exercise, and to extend the application of any federal law to the provinces, as mentioned in clause 9(c).

Governing by order in council, setting oneself up as the arbiter of interprovincial trade, are measures that go way beyond the spirit of the agreement signed with the provinces last summer. Nowhere in the 13 paragraphs of article 1710 of the agreement is there mentioned any right of the federal government to intervene in a trade dispute when it is not itself one of the parties to the dispute, contrary to the retaliatory measures described in clause 9 of Bill C–88, as formulated and tabled before us today.

The range of retaliatory measures the federal government has given itself in this clause is too broad. Its power of retaliation can affect the entire population of a province and is excessive. The problem stems, of course, from the fact that Ottawa has legislative power over all Canadians and can impose legislation on all the provinces.

Bill C–88 is another example. In our opinion, the retaliatory measures contained in clause 9 must be toned down considerably and the focus limited strictly to matters of trade. The federal government would thus not be able to retaliate in the social sphere, by attacking the Canada Social Transfer, for example.

I would have one last word concerning the intentions of the Liberal government reflected in this bill. Clause 14 of the bill provides, in the best Liberal tradition, that appointments to fill any position that may be necessary or advisable for carrying out the purposes of the Agreement be by order in council. To prevent any form of patronage on the part of the Prime Minister, the Bloc Quebecois requests that appointments be systematically approved by the House of Commons, as they should be in a democratic system.

There is no doubt in our mind that this bill is highly centralist. It is a sign of a retrograde vision of trade relations between the various regions of the same continent. We are living in an era of trade globalization, of the dissolving of tariff and non tariff barriers, of open markets and not of the heavy, unilateral regulation by order in council of a continental market by a single state like Canada.

More and more, a new competitiveness can be found at the local, regional and provincial levels, which goes against the federal centralizing model. The new regional international model of economic development is an example of the globalization of economies, in which regional economic trade areas are swallowed by the global market.

Fernand Martin, from the department of economic sciences of the Université de Montréal, is unequivocal regarding this regional international reality. He says that local businesses are realizing that they are competing not only with domestic businesses but with all other businesses, and that they no longer benefit from the buffer of national borders.

This new reality on the world market underlies a second economic phenomenon: the role of local economies in the competitiveness of businesses. Regional space takes on a strategic importance. In this context, the intervention of a national state structure is no longer needed. By wanting to give unprecedented powers to the regions, the Government of Quebec fully grasped the new parameters of international trade, something that the government in Ottawa failed to do. NAFTA will decrease the federal government's power to intervene in economic matters even more.

Even now in the area of international trade, agreements such as the GATT prevent Canada to a large extent from imposing tariffs and subsidizing exporters. These international agreements promote globalization of the economy and thus reduce, along with regional economic development, the federal government's control over the national and interprovincial economy.

Globalization of trade was first and foremost the product of the emergence of the multinationals. They initially turned the states toward new economic spaces, such as NAFTA. Today their ability to restructure an economic space is well established. Accordingly, they confer international stature on the cities and regions they locate in. These cities and regions in turn form networks giving rise to decisions and economic policy previously the domain of central states.

The federal government's regulatory authority, in these circumstances, becomes less and less important, and it is clear that clause 9 of Bill C–88 runs contrary to the current course of international trade. This point is all the more relevant, and, once again I quote Fernand Martin: "—since economic development is based on competitive development, which counts on the quality of labour and on the infrastructures and economics of large population centres and urbanization. These levers come under provincial jurisdiction, because health, education and land use planning do".

Thus, in terms of economic development and international competitiveness, membership in a centralized economic union is today, at the dawn of the 21st century, of little importance. However, the same cannot be said when it comes to belonging to a region. Since Trudeau, the traditional federalist vision of the federal Liberals has never gone beyond the level of a strictly nationalist analysis. Like those from the Trudeau school of thought, this liberal government is obsessed by the fact that it is powerless to stop the national economy from being regionalized under the influence of multinationals and the newly created continental trade areas.

It should not be forgotten that as interprovincial trade is increasingly following a north–south axis, Bill C–88, and more specifically clause 9, are nothing more than the reaction of this government without an economic agenda to this phenomenon and, by and large, to the present changes.

[English]

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise in the House today and speak to second reading of Bill C–88, an act to implement the agreement on internal trade.

However, Bill C–88 is like Bill C–85 on pension reform, it has more fluff than substance. Unfortunately it is another failure to deal with a serious problem. It appears to be another broken promise made in the famous red ink book. The Reform Party will be opposing the bill as it is currently written because it would implement an agreement that from a federalist perspective may be a step backward in our already deplorable situation.

I would like to point out for the benefit of all members the problems this bill brings, some historical perspective and as always, the Reform alternative, what I believe can be an inexpensive, agreeable and efficient solution to our current problems.

We are all aware that Canada has a massive problem with the free flow of goods, services and capital within our borders. We are all aware of the hundreds of barriers that exist to trade between the provinces, the billions of dollars this costs the economy annually, the thousands of jobs that are lost to Canadians and the larger than necessary government deficits that continue to grow.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce estimates that interprovincial trade barriers cost every Canadian family at least $1,000 a year. Others have estimated that the cost per family may be as high as $3,500 per year.

The chamber continues on to say: "These estimates do not capture the costs associated with new activity that is deterred as a result of the existence of barriers. For example, existence of internal barriers and the knowledge that new ones can be introduced at any time can deter Canadian businesses and entrepreneurs from undertaking new initiatives based on the expectation of access to the whole Canadian market. Similarly, the existence of internal barriers may discourage international investors who seek to locate their plants in fully integrated markets from bringing their productive investments to Canada".

There is no partisan issue in these considerations. We have all agreed, as did all the premiers last year, that these barriers to growth, productivity and employment must be reduced and eliminated. Even the current premier of Quebec has indicated his willingness to find agreement in these matters. Free trade within our borders is something every member of the House can agree to, except perhaps the NDP.

Where some of us differ is on the issue of the best mechanism to get there. The agreement signed last year between the provinces and Ottawa is a faulty mechanism that may do more damage than the good it intends.

A Globe and Mail editorial stated: "To say that the signing of the agreement on interprovincial trade barriers was a triumph of federalism would be an overstatement. To say that it will create a free market would be an illusion. To say that it will bring stability and unity would be optimism". The editorial continues to talk about the status quo of barriers which will remain in place saying: "These are the wages of parochialism and the country continues to pay them".

What became perfectly clear at the outcome of the meeting was not that the agreement to trade freely had been brokered but rather that an excellent photo opportunity had been set up for one candidate in the Quebec provincial election. All news commentators made that point. All of them remarked on the shallowness of the deal and in the final analysis they were right. The deal was shallow and the photo opportunity was a bust. The Quebec candidate went on to lose the election.

Unfortunately Canadians have to suffer with the results. There is still no improvement in trade between the provinces. The unity question continues to burn. We believe that in the solution to our domestic trade problem we will also find the solution to our national unity problem. The trade ties that could be binding us together as Canadians are the trade walls which are currently keeping us apart. Reformers and the BQ agree on this point. The Liberals say they agree but their words have rung hollow so far.

A Liberal Party pollster summed it up well when he said: "The people on the street know this is no victory for federalism. They know the deal is full of loopholes. They know that Canada has successfully negotiated a sweeping free trade deal with the United States but is unable to do so within its own borders".

It is important to reflect on the statements that have come from the government recently with respect to free trade. For example, the finance minister estimated that the economy would grow by 0.4 per cent as a result of the implementation of the GATT agreement due to freer trade with other countries. On the other hand, estimates by the Fraser Institute on the effect of removing interprovincial trade barriers ranged from 2 per cent up to a possible 6 per cent growth in GDP.

In other words, with the Uruguay round of the GATT we spent seven years and millions of tax dollars to negotiate with 120 foreign countries to open up trade and yet we have an opportunity to realize five to fifteen times the economic benefit by legislating, negotiating and arbitrating among only ten provinces. Unfortunately, the government has given only a half–hearted effort so far.

The Minister for International Trade in speaking to the GATT implementation bill stated: "The agreement includes an enormous package of national commitments to lower tariffs and non–tariff barriers to merchandise trade". It sounds wonderful but where are the complementary commitments we need to increase interprovincial trade?

The Prime Minister stated during the first ministers' conference that thousands of new jobs would be created and it would benefit all Canadians regardless of region. Unfortunately the talk we have heard bears little resemblance to the inaction we have seen in the flawed agreement. Let me explain where some of the flaws are.

The agreement sets out to eliminate specific barriers but may in fact create new ones and higher hurdles for business to cross. An example is the provision contained in article 709 which states that a province may adopt or maintain a measure that is inconsistent with the articles on labour mobility if the purpose of that measure is to achieve a legitimate objective.

The list of legitimate objectives is extensive. Any province wishing to maintain or erect a barrier need look no further than this list to find a suitable excuse. Included are: public security, safety and order; protection of human, animal or plant life and health; protection of the environment; consumer protection; affirmative action and so on.

In other words, labour mobility is restricted by the self–serving interests of any province through the articles contained in this agreement. Many would recognize this as the current status quo, but early on I said this may even be a step backwards. Such a provision could be used by any self–interested group in any province to erect new barriers to trade.

The dispute resolution mechanism included in this agreement may deal with these issues but it is not clear that the agreement will bind a province that wishes to go its own way.

Another major impediment to change is article 1507, part III, which states that nothing in this agreement shall be construed to effect the existing rights and obligations of the provinces under other environmental agreements, including conservation agreements. It does not take very much effort to realize that if one province wanted to keep in place an existing trade barrier, all it would have to do would be to claim an environmental exemption. Even worse, it is obvious that new trade barriers could be erected under this article. Again the agreement appears to be a step backwards.

One fact that cannot escape scrutiny is that many new regulations, panels and other administrative functions have been introduced in this bill both at the provincial and the federal level. It is plain that a whole new bureaucracy will spring up: new jobs for bureaucrats, new expense for the taxpayers but not necessarily any benefits to consumers.

However, one provision stands out as an improvement over the past practice and that is the proposed reduction in restrictions on interprovincial trucking. The consensus in this important area should not be dismissed lightly. Barriers to trucking have raised transportation costs, resulted in inefficiencies and lost productivity, and ultimately cost consumers millions. I hope we can capitalize on the consensus reached on this aspect of the agreement.

Some commentators have made the observation that the agreement is only the first step in a process which will see more agreements signed and barriers reduced. While this may be true, Reformers believe that this first step agreement is not necessarily a step forward. If we are going to improve the situation, it is vital that all steps must move us forward and reduce barriers, not leaving the possibility that new barriers can be erected in their place. We have lived with the status quo for too long already and Canadians deserve better.

It is important to look at the historical record and see where we have been as a nation in dealing with this issue. When Canada was created out of four British colonies in 1867 the founding fathers of Confederation had one purpose in mind. They believed that if they united, they could resist being pulled into the American sphere of influence and retain their distinct cultural heritage.

They saw two strategies as essential to resisting American pressures. The first was a unified military which could better defend the borders of Canada. Thankfully we have not had to face a major threat on our own soil since that time. But our armed forces have served with distinction in most major conflicts and all peacekeeping missions since that time.

The second strategy to maintain a distinct identity was to implement free trade between the provinces. It was believed that the free flow of goods and services would strengthen economic, political and cultural ties east to west instead of north to south.

It is quite obvious in which strategy we failed to accomplish our objectives. The fact is that trade between Canada and the U.S. today in many goods is freer and easier than the trade between the provinces.

Where we do fall down on this issue, history has shown it came because of ineffectual leadership in this area at the federal level.

I see my time is running out. I have quite a bit more. Will I be allowed to finish my presentation later?

The Speaker: You will at a later time, not today.

The Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Accordingly the bill stands referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–67, an act to establish the Veterans Review and Appeal Board, to amend the Pension Act, to make consequential amendments to other acts and to repeal the Veterans Appeal Board Act, be read the third time and passed.

The Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at third reading stage of Bill C–67.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if you were to seek it, I think you would find unanimous consent to apply to the vote now before the House the vote taken on the main motion concerning Bill C–85.

Since the usual discussions did not take place, if the whip for the New Democratic Party wishes to say otherwise, I am sure he will do so in a moment.

The Speaker: Does the hon. whip for the Bloc Quebecois agree?

Mr. Duceppe: Agreed.

Mr. Silye: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Solomon: The Democrats in the House vote no on this issue.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 215]

The Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

(Bill read the third time and passed.)

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–54, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Children's Special Allowances Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

The Speaker: The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on Bill C–54.

The first question is on Motion No. 1. A vote on Motion No. 1 will also apply to Motions Nos. 3, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 16 and 17.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote in the following way: that the vote on second reading of Bill C–89 be applied in reverse to the motion now before the House.

• (1910)

If you were to seek it you might find similar consent to apply this vote to report stage Motions Nos. 4, 5 and 6, as well as to the amendment to Motion No. 7.

Mr. Speaker, I think you would also find consent that it be applied to report stage Motion No. 12.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Silye: Agreed.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, members of the New Democratic Party will vote no on all of those motions except report stage Motion No. 12 on which we vote yes.

The Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

• (1920)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on May 8 I rose in the House and asked the Minister of Transport to explain why the government appeared to have changed its policy outlined in the red book of resisting U.S. influence in the economy and in our nation by leaving the share offering that he was proposing in his commercialization bill for CNR open to foreign purchasers.

In the minister's response he said: "I have not seen any major changes in the way Canadian Pacific Railway operates and handles its shipments, as opposed to CNR". With that, he apparently was attempting to justify the fact that on a one time only offering of shares for ownership and control of CNR it would somehow come out with a similar kind of shareholding as Canadian Pacific.

I think the minister failed to recognize that Canadian Pacific began under the guidance of the government of the day and that there was an initial policy of Canadian ownership and control, even though some of the capital came from Great Britain and the United States. That tradition of existing shareholders, ownership, and control continues. It is not very likely that the balance of control over CPR would change overnight, as is possible with the CNR commercialization offering, because the shares will be offered all at once. If there are no Canadian bidders or purchasers it could conceivably all fall into the hands of foreigners, with the only control being that no one purchaser could hold more than 15 per cent.

I noticed that when the group that investigated commercialization for the government looked at it, they were attempting to answer the question of how competition could be encouraged to ensure that pricing and outcomes are not affected by the duopoly nature of railways in Canada. They were also asked to describe how the rationalization and abandonment process could be improved to ensure that efficiency and equity are addressed.

It seems to me that the proposal I put forward of putting the first share offering directly into the hands of farmers, because the amount of money is roughly the same as what is going to be netted from CNR after the brokerage fees are taken off and because the government had already decided to allocate $1.6 billion toward that end—that a different use of those funds would in fact allow for true competition because the users would then be the owners of the railway and it would be in their own interests to keep the prices for the service of the railway as low as possible. This would in fact force a new, never before seen kind of competition onto the rail sector in this country.

I cite as an example the kind of competition that resulted on the prairies in the elevator system in the teens and twenties, when farmers began taking over the ownership of government owned elevators at that time and the elevator system became truly competitive. For the first time in 20 years of buying grain, a truly honest, fair weight and fair pay were given.

This is the kind of thing we could expect if the government would accept the proposition that there are other ways of commercializing CN that would put full control directly in the hands of the users not just of owners.

I stress to the government that the question of control is even more important than who owns CN, the people who decide who will be the board of directors. Those directors would be making the decisions to operate the company afterward. If those directors had to respond and be responsible to the users, the resource industry which in this case would be the farmers, it would be a big step toward true global competitiveness.

The minister has said that he does not think farmers want to own CNR. He said outside the Chamber that he has some doubts they would be able to operate the CNR. I point out that they have a lot of experience outside of farm operations which has proven to be very beneficial to them, their communities and the economy. These have become very much commercial operations. This has held the farming and rural community in good stead.

For those farmers who do not wish to continue to hold shares in CNR, it would be very simple for them to sell the shares. I am sure that other resource users such as mines, timber businesses and sulphur shippers would be interested in buying shares, as would the initial farmer shareholders. As well, some port cities would be interested in owning shares that might become available from the farmers who wish to retire and dispose of their CN assets. There would be quite a diversified ownership of the company.

Most important, because those shares would come on the market slowly and not in 100 per cent blocks as is the proposition the government is putting forward, it would be highly unlikely that foreigners would quickly get to own and control the CNR.

It is especially important that when the east west policy is fully abandoned by the government, the natural flow will be north and south. The proposition of U.S. railroads and shippers ending up controlling the second railway in this country is not a prospect I who represent shippers in western Canada look forward to.

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this government's objectives are to put CN on a viable footing so that it maintains competitiveness with other carriers and to maximize the value of the sale of CN's shares to Canadian taxpayers.

To achieve maximum value the broadest possible distribution of shares is necessary. The initial public offering of CN will be the largest such issue in Canadian history. The Canadian equity market may not be large enough on its own to absorb such an issue of this size.

To ensure the divestiture of all the government's equity in CN at maximum value, markets outside of Canada will need to be assessed. The United States in particular will be an important market. Its numerous investors are familiar with the rail renewal and revitalization which Canadian railways and CN in particular are undertaking. Foreign ownership restrictions could jeopardize the participation of these investors.

Canadian rail policy does not restrict or prohibit foreign ownership. More than 30 per cent of CP's limited shares are owned abroad. By not limiting foreign ownership for CN it ensures a level playing field between both CN and CP in their ability to raise equity capital in global financial markets.

The government's financial advisers agree that a foreign ownership limit could reduce the potential size of the issue and would reduce the price. Limits could also prevent the government from selling the majority stake. Given the size of the share offering, a successful issue would be endangered if the potential shareholder base was limited to Canada.

While shareholder investment thresholds under the Competition Act and Investment Canada Act could conceivably have provided sufficient safeguards against an unwanted foreign takeover, the proposed 15 per cent limit on individual share ownership also acts as an effective constraint on foreign control. Past experience with Canadian initial public offerings indicates that foreign sales are unlikely to approach, let alone exceed, 50 per cent.

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-326, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act (membership of board of management).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is simply to ensure that, in the future, Canada Post Corporation will consider regional development in fulfilling its mandate. We realized that this corporation was very focused on production and did not necessarily take into account the development of each part of the country.

Changing the membership of the board of management would ensure representation from every province and territory in Canada. This would also prevent the concentration that may occur when the people sitting on Canada Post's board of management look after their own interests instead of those of people from the various provinces. That is the purpose of this bill.

INDUSTRY

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I move that the second report of the Standing Committee on Industry presented to the House on Tuesday, October 18, 1994 be concurred in.

It is with considerable pleasure that I rise to debate this motion. The committee had a very successful time in debating various parts of the access to capital for small business. Many of the things we talked about had to do with the lending institutions, in particular the chartered banks, trust companies, credit unions and groups of that sort.

The committee came up with 22 distinct recommendations. This is what we are talking about. The recommendations that the committee came forth with are the ones that ought to be concurred in. It is a pleasure for me to say that the banks have already moved in some of those directions.

Take for example recommendation No. 3. The committee recommends that the joint Industry Canada committee in consultation with the Canadian Bankers Association draft a code of conduct. It would explain to customers in plain language the information a loan applicant must disclose. There would be a clear explanation of reasons for refusing a loan, a commitment to guide customers to alternative sources of financing, and a commitment to provide an internal complaints handling mechanism.

The Canadian Bankers Association met with the committee in the earlier part of this year. It indicated clearly to us that it had established that kind of code of conduct. At first the association said it would be very difficult if not impossible to bring about some kind of standard of behaviour as far as treating the customers and the banks were concerned.

A lot of information is available now. It has been exchanged among the various branches of the banks. In addition to that, what is called an ADR which is a dispute resolution mechanism has been brought into being. It is an alternate dispute resolution mechanism that has been brought into being.

The committee also suggested that perhaps this was not good enough. It thought that probably there ought to be an independent ombudsman established. Recommendation No. 5 reads as follows:

> The committee recommends that the government establish an independent office of the bank ombudsman to investigate complaints of breach of duty or maladministration by the banks. As in the United Kingdom, the ombudsman should have the power to require banks to pay compensation to complainants for financial loss, inconvenience and stress.

The experience of the banks in Britain where this independent ombudsman has been operating for a number of years has been very salutary. It has helped small business people. It has helped various other people in the business world to deal with their banks more successfully. It has also made the banks a little more humane in the way they deal with their customers.

When we brought this to the attention of the Canadian Bankers Association, it thought that perhaps there should not be an independent ombudsman who is outside the banking community but rather it should appoint its own ombudsman.

The Toronto–Dominion Bank has one of those people who was the leader in the Canadian chartered banking industry to do just that. It is apparently working very well.

It is interesting to note that the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce now has this kind of person on a full salary at the senior vice–president level. This person deals with complaints that various business people have with regard to their loans or other operations with regard to the bank.

There are other recommendations from the committee as well. We need to recognize that the committee proposes to continue monitoring small business access to capital by calling one or more banks as witnesses every quarter to review their performance in lending to small businesses. That process has begun.

The banks have indicated that indeed their performance with regard to lending money to small businesses has improved. At least they are prepared to tell the committee what exactly their operation is with regard to these activities.

We go beyond that. We have asked the superintendent of financial institutions together with Statistics Canada and the Bank of Canada to develop a new format for the collection, compilation and publication of statistics on bank lending to small business. These statistics should be based not only on the size and type of loan but also on the nature of the borrower, including gender, employment, sales, major sector of operations and municipality. These statistics should be reported quarterly.

It was very interesting to watch the reaction of the banks to this recommendation. They first said: "That is impossible. We cannot give you those kinds of numbers. We do not have those kinds of numbers. It would be a horrendous expenditure in order to give you these kinds of numbers. It cannot be done".

It is a great pleasure for me to report that in the quarterly review at the end of April the banks not only said they have the information, they are prepared to give it to the office of the superintendent of financial institutions and to the committee. That is a great move forward. It shows the kind of concurrence that we see in the industry which the committee had in mind in the first place.

It is not so much what the government does, it is what industry does which makes business run better. In the final analysis business makes this country run. Government provides the opportunity, the environment and the parameters within which business can operate more easily, more fluidly, more efficiently, more effectively and more successfully.

We need to recognize it is not government that creates employment, it is not government that makes the economy grow, it is business that makes the economy grow. In particular, it is small business that makes the economy grow. In the last five years 85 per cent of new jobs created in Canada were created by small business. Let us recognize the significance that small business has in the Canadian economy.

The committee goes on to suggest leasing should be encouraged. It urges the government to ensure that tax measures and other programs do not discriminate against this method of financing. There are situations in which the government through its income tax policy has discouraged this form of financing small business.

Often small businesses do not have the capital resources to expend huge amounts of money for the financing of capital expenditures. Very often, if they can lease the equipment, it is far more salutary and allows them to get on with their business. The money would be available for the operation, rather than having it tied up in capital expenditures or equity.

The committee goes on to recommend that the federal government establish a limited working capital guarantee for small and medium sized business exporters. Such a program should be self–financing and priced in a manner that is commensurate with the risk. Too often it seems to have been the philosophy or the modus operandi of governments that in order to help business they should give them something.

The committee does not agree that is what should happen. The government should create the environment which we talked about a moment ago and allow them to finance their businesses. If businesses need seed capital, that should be returned at a rate of interest which is commensurate with the risk involved in that particular situation.

We also need to recognize that the reference is to exporters, particularly small business exporters. Today most exports are by a very small number of businesses. I believe that approximately 100 businesses control 85 per cent of the export market. In other words, small business has not had as large a portion of the export market as it should have. If it did it would help the Canadian economy to grow. It would increase the global participation and competition of Canadian business in the world marketplace.

The report goes on to suggest that the government review the Small Businesses Loans Act. To the credit of the government, that is exactly what it has done. It ought to be commended for that. It has begun to concur with the recommendations of the report. If I remember correctly, the Small Businesses Loans Act ceiling was moved from $3 billion to $12 billion. The only difficulty is that in the past the government has had to write off about $100 million in bad loans. Does that mean that with a ceiling of $12 billion the bad loans will increase to four times that amount?

There have been, from the small business associations and also from the bankers, some concern that some of the provisions of the new small loans act amendments create an additional charge which may discourage some of the small businesses from taking advantage of the provisions of the small loans act as it has been amended.

Therefore we need to be very careful that when one moves to concur in these kinds of recommendations that one not move in such a way that the operation of implementing that recommendation mitigates against the purpose, intent and spirit of that recommendation.

The committee recommends further that the mandate of the Federal Business Development Bank be confirmed and refocused as a complementary lender to small and medium sized businesses and that it be authorized to use new financial instruments to fulfil its mandate.

I am sure members of the House noticed that yesterday the Minister of Industry introduced Bill C–91. The effect of that bill is to do precisely what this recommendation suggests be done. That makes a committee feel its work is very significant and has not been ignored. The government has recognized the hard work of the committee.

We need to recognize in detail exactly how the business development bank, under the new name of the business development bank of Canada, will operate. Will the operations of that bank become an extension of the Canadian federal treasury or, as the minister implied yesterday, will the capital used for loans come from private sources of one kind or another.

The new sources of capital that the Business Development Bank of Canada needs to look at is that money that exists in the private sector today and money that can be patient, particularly for new, innovative ventures. It should also include the high tech areas where the science and technology involved in those businesses is very far reaching, very expensive and does not create an immediate return. It requires a lot of seed capital for the intellectual background, the experimentation, the building of prototypes and things of that sort before it actually goes into active and profitable production.

The Federal Business Development Bank, or under the new name of the business development bank of Canada, could form and fill a particular niche in our economy.

The difficulty we need to guard against is it not becoming another crown corporation that is a drain on the taxpayer. It should be a self–sufficient, self–financing organization. To date, the operation of the Federal Business Development Bank has been a profitable venture and that needs to be continued in the future. I hope that the kinds of things that Bill C–91 envisages will indeed take place in that regard.

However, we are not done yet. This committee did a lot of very hard work. It dealt not only with the chartered banks which it said are doing a reasonably good job. It could do a lot better in some places but is that not true of all of us? We can all improve. We would like to get the banks to take their responsibilities and carry out their mandates a little bit better.

I now want to move outside the banks and into the trust and loan companies. The committee recommends that the trust and loan companies act be amended to remove the arbitrary capital requirements for the establishment of a trust company and the acquisition of full commercial lending powers. The superintendent of financial institutions should instead establish guidelines setting out conditions for the establishment of new federally chartered trust companies and for the acquisition of full commercial lending powers. Institutions meeting these guidelines would be able to operate in Canada and make commercial loans using the prudent portfolio approach.

It is precisely on the last phrase "using the prudent portfolio approach" that I wish to spend a few moments. In the last number of years we have seen the collapse of some very major financial institutions, one of which was Confederation Life, that probably everyone in the House remembers only too well.

I remember the appearance before the committee of the superintendent of financial institutions and the questions the committee members asked this individual. How was it possible that a major financial institution like this could collapse in Canada? It is very serious when such an institution collapses.

The superintendent of financial institutions has come under the scrutiny of the auditor general. On Friday of this week he was reported as saying in the Financial Post: "The auditor general and Ottawa's financial institutions watchdog are at odds". We have the auditor general on the one hand and the superintendent of financial institutions on the other at odds over when federal regulators should intervene to deal with troubled Canadian trust and insurance companies.

The superintendent of financial institutions has been given the responsibility by Parliament on behalf of the people of Canada to assure the financial soundness of banking institutions, insurance companies, credit unions and various other financial institutions.

The auditor general has been given the responsibility to investigate how successfully the office of the superintendent is doing its job. The superintendent specifically says: "I and the auditor general do not agree what my job is". Who is going to do the job, the auditor general or the superintendent of financial institutions?

The article goes on to explain what some of the issues might be. For example, the auditor general portrayed OSFI as sometimes being too slow to intervene with financial companies in trouble. The superintendent of financial institutions, John Palmer, who assumed the post last September, disputed the regulatory approach and said: "Your officials appear to favour a more mechanical system in which specific regulatory intervention would be required when specific numerical thresholds are violated. In our view it is essential to preserve the role of judgment in determining how and when to intervene".

If the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is to exercise judgment without looking at the numbers, there is no question that can put us into a lot of potential difficulty. This is a good example of where an individual needs a very hard head to understand the numbers and to make sure that the balance statements, the equity position and the financial situation of financial institutions are sound.

However, he needs to show a compassion that recognizes when situations have developed, when conditions have changed. He needs to be somewhat kind and give them some time to balance the sheet again if there is an indication a change can take place and the institution can become financially solvent if he had a little patience. It should never be done without a very hard headed look at the dollars and cents and to make sure the institution is sound and that management is capable of turning the institution around.

In the last little while we have seen financial institutions which were on the brink of bankruptcy long before anything was done to call them to account.

It is to the credit of some of the other people who are coming back now and saying that the confederation life policy holders are to get back 70 cents on the dollar and that perhaps in some cases they will get back substantially more. It is absolutely tremendous that this can happen in Canada. The critical situation is that this should never have been be allowed to happen in the first place. That is why we need to concur in the recommendations this committee has brought forward.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague for a point of clarification regarding his reference to FBDB.

Many times in the House we hear discussions with regard to regional development grants from the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, FORD–Quebec, and western economic diversification. What is his feeling about the role of these regional economic development agencies and that of FBDB? Could they be rolled into one or is there a role for each in this country?

Mr. Schmidt: The whole concept behind regional development has evolved to some degree. We need to recognize that the implementation of the regional economic development agencies has subsidized businesses that could not make it on their own. It has created artificial competition between businesses that were in existence and new ones created across the street so that neither of them could succeed profitably. It has given industries an artificial cushion, because it has not required that the money that was given to them be paid back.

If we are to have regional development it should be done in a fair and open marketplace with competition. It ought to be done in manner such that all businesses know what is going on and they are all on a level playing field and competing fairly with one another and whatever money is given ought to be paid back with a reasonable rate of return.

These are precisely the kinds of things the Federal Business Development Bank was supposed to be doing in the past when it was the lender of last resort. If that kind of thing continues, if regional development agencies develop a flat playing field, create competition, and require the money to be paid back, then there is no reason they could not be rolled into one. The bankers' criteria of lending money could be applied and the whole business would run a lot better than it does at the present time. I suppose the end result of that statement is they could be rolled into one, but under certain conditions.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Okanagan Centre for his concern about small business and for bringing this to the attention of the House, despite the fact that we thought the government would be bringing forward debate on Bill C–88, a bill that would deal with internal trade barriers and hopefully remove some of those.

I wonder if the member would expound on whether the report deals with the harm caused to small business because of the trade barriers we have in Canada between provinces. It has been determined that these trade barriers cost our country $6 billion to $8 billion every year, and I suspect the brunt of that cost is borne by small business.

I would like the hon. member to relate to the House what the harm of these trade barriers is to small business and whether the report does make any recommendations, and also whether Bill C–88 does go far enough in bringing an end to these trade barriers, which are so harmful to Canadians.

• (1035)

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member certainly knows how to ask complicated questions, but they are very significant questions.

The important thing is that one of the greatest hindrances to small businesses developing is the existence of trade barriers across Canada. They are a multitude in number. I believe at the last count there were somewhere between 500 and 750 of these trade barriers.

Estimates vary as to how much they actually cost. In some cases people argue that it is about $5 billion a year to the Canadian economy, in other cases they will say that it is $7 billion, depending on which set of figures is used. That means the average family in Canada spends $1,000 or $3,500 per year more than it would pay for the same goods and services if the trade barriers did not exist.

One of the embarrassing things for us as Canadians and parliamentarians is that it is often easier to trade with other countries, in particular our neighbour to the south, than it is to trade across Canada. How do we bring these kinds of things together? It seems so stupid to tell someone it is easier to trade, for example, between Vancouver and Spokane. It is wide open. There is an organization called Cascadia, which promotes this kind of economic development. It is so easy to do, because the trade barriers between Canada and the United States have virtually been eliminated. And now with NAFTA that goes all over the place.

There was a principle announced in the red book that states that Canada should be unified. By not dealing with the internal trade barriers we are in fact disunifying Canada and creating a situation where trade is now north and south but not east and west.

That is one of the great barriers for small business. We would like to be strong at home first before we go abroad, but that is not an opportunity today. We have to become strong internationally and then we can perhaps afford to go over these trade barriers within Canada. It is a reverse, backwards kind of thing. It hurts our feelings of patriotism. It frustrates our feelings of economic unity as well as political unity. It is those kinds of things that we have to tear down so that we can help each other and feel important as Canadians—as important in Nova Scotia as we are in British Columbia, as we are in Ontario, as we are in Quebec, as we are in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and so on across Canada.

The hon. member asked a very good question with regard to those things. Does the federal trade agreement that is now before the House and is supposed to be implemented through Bill C–88 do that? It does not.

We will hear from various members on this side of the House who will say clearly where this trade agreement falls short. It does not deal with the very basic issues.

The idea is a very good one. Let us recognize this right off the top. Recognizing that internal trade barriers in Canada are a significant problem is very important. All our premiers have now recognized that is a problem. The issue, however, is that although they have recognized there is a problem they have not solved the problem. When we get to the dispute resolution mechanism, what do we get? We get the opportunity that if they cannot resolve the conflict then they can retaliate. That is exactly where we are today. What have we achieved?

The agreement has to have some teeth in it. I submit that it does not have those teeth.

In answer to my hon. colleague's question of whether the trade agreement does those things, it moves in the right direction but it does not go anywhere near far enough. Does it help build the unity of Canada? No, it does not. Does it hurt small business? Yes, it does. It is an embarrassment to many of us because we can trade more easily north and south than we can east and west.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that the Reform Party has decided to waste the time of this House with a debate on a motion for concurrence in a committee report.

It is a real waste of time, since a bill to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name of Business Development Bank of Canada is already listed in the Order Paper. We may pass this bill this afternoon without wasting the time of the House, as was the case this morning.

• (1040)

I am sorry the Reform Party feels it has to take up time debating a report that was tabled in this House last October when there are bills waiting to be passed that could deal with the issue.

To avoid any further waste of the House's time and cost to the Canadian taxpayers, I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

CHEMICAL WEAPONS CONVENTION IMPLEMENTATION ACT

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (for Minister of Foreign Affairs), Lib.) moved that Bill C–87, an act to implement the convention on the prohibition of the development, production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons and on their destruction, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Foreign Affairs I am pleased to initiate the debate on Bill C–87, an act to implement the convention on the prohibition of the development, production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons and on their destruction.

This draft legislation represents the achievement of what has been for successive Canadian governments one of our most important priorities in the arms control and disarmament field, a multilateral agreement on a global and comprehensive ban on chemical weapons.

Such an agreement is of special importance for Canadians. It was almost 80 years ago that Canadian soldiers were among the victims of the first gas attack in Ypres Salient in April 1915. There are still alive today Canadians who remember with horror the effect of such weapons on their friends and comrades, their husbands, brothers and fathers.

Having let this horrendous genie out of the bottle, the international community has ever since sought ways to control and suppress it. The Geneva protocol of 1925 was the first such attempt but its scope was effectively limited to a ban on the first use of chemical weapons and many states, Canada included, felt obliged to develop and stockpile such weapons against the possibility that they might be necessary to retaliate against future attacks with chemical weapons.

The hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth, who will be speaking after me, has done a lot of research in that area. Hon. members may wish to consult with him for more information.

While our troops in subsequent wars were spared the horrors of further chemical attacks, neither the Geneva protocol nor mounting international condemnation of these weapons prevented other states from using them in other wars, most recently in the Iran–Iraq war. Even more monstrous, some have gone so far as to use chemical weapons against defenceless civilians. Who can ever forget the shocking pictures of the Iranian and Kurdish victims of Iraqi chemical weapons or the terror inflicted on Israeli citizens by Saddam Hussein's threats during the gulf war to rain chemical weapons down on Israel.

Spurred on by such barbarities, negotiators at the conference on disarmament in Geneva redoubled their efforts to conclude a multilateral agreement on chemical weapons which would forever remove this scourge. Canada is proud to have made a major contribution to these efforts, from the days in 1983 when a Canadian, Ambassador Donald McPhail, chaired the committee that developed the first outline of such a treaty to the successful conclusion of negotiations in 1992 when Canada was in the first rank of those pressing most strongly for a truly effective ban.

The chemical weapons convention resulting from these negotiations which opened for signature in January 1993 represents a major multilateral success. For the first time a whole category of what are known as weapons of mass destruction is to be eliminated. All stock piles of chemical weapons are to be destroyed under international supervision, along with the facilities which produced them. A verification regime which is global, comprehensive and effective is to be set up to ensure such weapons will never be developed again.

The convention is unique in a number of respects. Not only does it oblige states parties to destroy all existing stocks of chemical weapons and the facilities which produced them within a set time frame and under close international supervision, it also establishes a system of verification and inspection which is by far the most rigorous ever developed in a multilateral agreement.

Moreover, it does not just ban any future development of chemical weapons but seeks to safeguard against clandestine chemical weapon production through international monitoring and inspection of all facilities which might be used for such activity. Again uniquely, it extends this regime into the global civilian chemical industry. The basis of this verification regime of civilian industry is set out in three schedules or lists of toxic chemicals which either have been used as chemical weapons or are chemical weapon precursors.

Facilities working with such chemicals will annually report on their activities to their governments and through them to the international monitoring and inspection organization being set up in The Hague, the organization for the prohibition of chemical weapons, or OPCW. If their activities exceed certain thresholds they will be liable to inspection by international inspectors.

The convention's overview of industry extends even further because certain facilities which produce what are called unscheduled discrete organic chemicals, particularly those which contain phosphorus, sulphur or fluorine, can be adapted to produce chemical weapons.

The convention also requires these facilities to report on their production activities and provides for the future development of a system of random inspections of such facilities. Thus the scope of the convention extends beyond chemical and pharmaceutical industries and covers facilities producing pesticides, fertilizers, paints and coatings, textiles and lubricants.

Given the confidential nature of some of the information being reported by industry, the convention has its own provisions for protecting such information and requires states parties to abide by those provisions. The convention also requires states parties to institute restrictions on the export and import of schedule chemicals with states not party to the convention.

Perhaps the most novel element of the convention is the provision allowing for states parties to have the right to demand short notice or no right of refusal inspections called challenge inspections of any place, whether government or civilian, where they believe activities are being carried out incompatible with the obligations and goals of the convention.

In another departure from general practice the convention obligates states parties to pass penal legislation that not only encompasses activities on their own territory but also prohibits their citizens from undertaking forbidden activities outside their territory.

The convention has its own sanctions regime, although it also recognizes the pre–eminent authority of the United Nations security council regarding mandatory sanctions in the case of serious violations of the convention.

In view of the breadth and complexity of the convention, the Canadian government, like many other signatories, has given very close consideration to how its obligations shall be implemented in Canada.

Fortunately whereas the convention is 160–odd pages long, the draft legislation resulting from that consideration now before us is barely more than one–tenth that length and yet encompasses all the obligations that arise out of the convention relevant for Canada.

As Canada does not possess chemical weapons or chemical weapon production facilities, the related provisions of the convention do not pertain to Canada. Instead, the main impact on Canada arises from those provisions concerned with industry activities. The act's central provision is to ban completely anyone's activity relating to anything with chemical weapons in exactly the same terms as are used in the convention.

Also, as provided in the convention, these provisions ban the use of riot control agents as a method of warfare. Operationally speaking, as required by the convention, the draft legislation authorizes the Minister of Foreign Affairs to designate officials to act as Canada's national authority which will serve as the national focal point for liaison with the organization for the prohibition of chemical weapons, OPCW, and other states parties, collect the required information for the affected industries and transmit it to the OPCW and facilitate international inspections of Canadian facilities.

The draft legislation then spells out clearly the conditions under which the required information will be obtained; the right of the international inspection teams to conduct inspections in Canada in accordance with the provisions of the convention, and the roles and responsibilities of the national authority in facilitating such inspections. Because of the need to protect confidential information, it contains appropriate provisions to do so. It extends existing controls on chemicals by specifying all the chemicals on the convention's three schedules will be subject to the authority of the Export and Import Permits Act.

It institutes penal provisions and applies those to both activities on Canadian territory and activities by Canadian citizens outside of Canada. It further makes clear the enforcement of the proposed act will be conducted under the Criminal Code.

It provides for appropriate regulations to be prepared concerning inter alia the collection of the required data and the procedures under which the national authority will carry out its assigned responsibilities.

In considering this draft legislation, the government's first concern has been to ensure all of its obligations under the convention have been fully met. At the same time, however, the government has also paid very close attention to the convention's impact on the affected Canadian industries and has sought to achieve maximum effectiveness with the minimum amount of interference in the legitimate activities of those industries.

• (1135)

Fortunately in this regard the government has benefited from several years of close consultations with the most affected industries both during the course of the negotiation of the convention and in the preparations for the convention's implementation in Canada.

Throughout, the response from industry has always been positive and constructive. It was the Canadian Chemical Producers' Association which produced one of the first papers submitted to the conference on disarmament concerning the issue of confidentiality.

In 1990, thanks to the co–operation of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association and Merck Frosst, government officials were able to conduct a trial inspection of the Merck Frosst facility near Montreal to test the verification provisions of the convention. Both associations provided representatives to participate in annual industry consultations with negotiators in Geneva.

In our preparations to implement the convention in Canada, we have continued to consult closely with industry on the impact of the convention by distributing information brochures, briefing industry associations and contributing articles for industry publications, conveying information seminars and sending questionnaires and information material to some 2,100 companies across Canada to help determine which companies will be affected by the convention.

Almost without exception the response from industry has continued to be very constructive and encouraging. We confidently expect that as we proceed with this draft legislation and its associated regulations, this high level of co–operation with industry will continue.

The government believes the draft legislation before us is not only appropriate and necessary but represents the most balanced and cost effective means of implementing the convention obligations in Canada.

We all recoiled with horror some two months ago when in an unprecedented act of senseless barbarity, madmen unleashed chemical weapons on unsuspecting Tokyo commuters one early spring morning. We may not be able to prevent individuals from committing such unspeakable acts, but with the successful passage of the proposed legislation we can at least hope to control and deny them access to the materials for such weapons. This morning I was very pleased to read in the news that the police in Japan arrested those responsible for the nerve gas attack on Tokyo's subway.

With all party co–operation, which we will be getting in consulting with the official opposition and the third party, all three parties would like to get this legislation through as quickly as possible. When we do, hopefully the convention and the legislation will prevent the production, stockpiling and use of the kind of substance used on the Tokyo subways.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in this House today on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois to speak on Bill C–87, an act to implement the convention on the prohibition of the development, production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons and on their destruction.

We appreciate that the convention is the result of a long and complex negotiation process that took nearly 20 years.

For more than 100 years, the international community has been seeking to outlaw these weapons, or at least their use, because they are inhumane and of rather limited military value.

We should also rejoice over the fact that the convention is the first multilateral disarmament agreement prohibiting an entire class of mass destruction weapons. Under this convention, it is illegal not only to produce, but also to acquire, stockpile, transfer, use or engage in military preparations to use chemical weapons or assist anyone in any activity prohibited under the convention.

• (1140)

The prohibition applies not only to chemical agents but also to their vectors and any equipment intended for use in relation to chemical weapons.

We are pretty happy with the wording of the convention, which strikes a balance in a mix of areas, such as the protection of sensitive activities and ready access for inspection teams.

The convention provides for a challenge inspection mechanism while at the same time protecting sensitive and legitimate activities by putting time limits on the inspections, and by providing for restricted access and measures to deter abuse.

A balance was also struck between the need to maintain control over exports to suspect states and the will to liberalize the chemical products trade. Members of the Australian group, which includes Canada, and which monitors the proliferation of chemical weapons and defines the guidelines for controlling exports to countries deemed to have chemical weapons, pledged to review their policy and eliminate controls in the case of those states which fully comply with the convention.

Another balance was struck between the requirement to destroy chemical weapons within prescribed time frames and the need to take economic implications into account. All those states which own chemical weapons will have ten years to destroy both the weapons and the production facilities. However, the convention allows for an extension of up to ten years, under more stringent controls which are tantamount to turning over the weapons and facilities to the international community.

The destruction of a chemical weapons production facility costs ten times more than its construction. Consequently, we are concerned about the financial implications, for some states, of this requirement. The problem is very real, even though the convention provides for the temporary conversion of some production facilities into destruction facilities, where this is feasible and cost effective, thus making it possible to declare such production facilities as having been converted.

Indeed, one of the problems related to the implementation of the convention will be the destruction of arsenals, which is a complex and extremely costly operation. The cost of destroying the American arsenal of these weapons is estimated at $8 billion. Russia, which does not have the funds, has 40,000 to 60,000 tonnes of substances to destroy, which is quite the task and will undoubtedly take over 10 years and then again, only if western countries lend a hand.

By the way, we are not entirely satisfied with the verification system. However, we realize that they are the fruit of several years of negotiation and that they strike a balance between the need to have an efficient means of checking whether countries are respecting the convention and the legitimate need to maintain secrecy in defence and industrial matters which are not related to the prohibited chemical weapons.

We would have nevertheless preferred much stricter controls. The current convention is perhaps the best agreement possible under the circumstances. Regardless, we must admit that the Convention does contain the most rigorous controls ever included in a multilateral agreement. They permit the organization to confirm that substances and chemical weapons factories have actually been destroyed, to monitor very closely all operations authorized to produce certain toxic chemical products, to keep a database on the world chemical industry and, at the request of the signing states, to make inspections.

In addition, the on–site challenge inspection will in fact permit any signing state to request a universal inspection of a suspicious operation in another country by the secretariat of the organization and a multilateral inspection team.

We have concluded that the text of the convention is to be criticized for lacking coherence and logic in certain areas. In some cases, for example facilities used to stockpile or to manufacture chemical weapons, it goes into the greatest descriptive detail, and in others, for example the clauses prohibiting the development of chemical weapons, it fails to go into enough detail.

Furthermore, the verification system for declared facilities seems unnecessarily cumbersome and costly, while the so–called challenge inspection system has far less clout.

A major drawback is that paradoxically, enforcement mechanisms will not be in place when the convention comes into force. The director general will still have to be appointed, inspectors confirmed and the list of inspection equipment approved. In other words, each state party to the convention will have the right to request and obtain a challenge inspection, but there will be no one to carry it out. This is only one of the problems the preliminary commission will have to consider very carefully.

Surely it would have been more reasonable to wait until the organization is in a position to fully exercise its mandate before the main obligations set forth in the convention come into force?

It is also unfortunate that the sanctions provided under the convention are not more specific. Article XII authorizes the organization to ask a state party to the convention that does not fully comply with it to take corrective action. If the incriminated country refuses, the organization can then apply a certain number of sanctions and recommend to states parties a number of corrective measures in accordance with international law.

However, the convention remains silent on the kind of sanctions that can be applied. Furthermore, in recognition of the ultimate responsibility of the UN Security Council for international peace and security, very serious cases may be referred to this body for possible further action, in accordance with the UN Charter.

I would like to take a few moments to consider the consequences for the chemical industry in Quebec and Canada. The convention would not appear to have a major impact. Since the second world war, Canada has not produced chemical weapons and has even destroyed its stockpiles. Under the convention, the chemical industry in Quebec and Canada will, however, be subject to regular monitoring. The national authority, an agency to be designated in each state party to the convention, will provide the link with the organization.

The signatory states are required to submit statements to the organization concerning specifically the possession of chemical weapons or the manufacture or export of designated chemicals. These statements will subsequently be used in on–site inspections.

As Canada has neither chemical weapons nor facilities for their manufacture, it would appear that the effect of the convention will be limited in its case to trade.

We believe that Canada should assume some leadership with respect to this convention. There is good reason to ask, in fact, what role Canada intends to play in encouraging its partners to ratify the convention as quickly as possible. Canada should assume some leadership in this regard.

Until now, nothing has indicated this to be the government's intention. If it intends to be consistent, it should announce a series of initiatives in this regard in the coming weeks. After all, only 28 countries have ratified the convention up to now, and there should be 65. Need I mention that neither the United States nor Russia has signed yet? Furthermore, other important states that have yet to sign include Iraq, Libya and North Korea.

In the case of Russia, we realize that the costs of complying with this convention will be significant. However, without Russia and the United States, the convention will not entirely fulfill its role, since Russia and the United States have the biggest stockpiles of chemical weapons. Whatever the case, we believe that, if we support this bill, Canada will soon carve out a prime niche for itself within the various institutions of this new international organization.

In our opinion, the convention on chemical weapons constitutes a fine opportunity to eliminate the threat of chemical weapons. The other option would be to continue to take measures in isolation, an approach that would have neither the generality nor the global legitimacy of the convention. The convention gives traditional arms control a universal scope, with the added possibility of responding vigorously to non–compliance. It also calls for widespread support to determine who complies and who does not as well as what political action is appropriate.

We are therefore happy to support this bill, making Canada one of the first to sign the convention. In our view, this is far from an ideal document. The Bloc Quebecois appreciates however that it is the result of complex and comprehensive negotiations, during which several countries had to make concessions on issues they considered extremely important because they could not get the support of other countries.

Canada is probably one of the countries which had to make the most concessions in order to come up with this document, because it was strongly in favour of an efficient, comprehensive and global inspection scheme that would help build confidence. The Bloc Quebecois fully agrees with the position taken by Canada in the past. In fact, we still consider being able to request an inspection anywhere, anytime, and seeing this inspection carried out immediately without restrictions being imposed on inspectors as the best way of ensuring safety.

While, at present, few countries recognize possessing chemical weapons, notably the United States, Russia and Iraq, we know that many more have the means to use such weapons. We were all distressed by the pictures of Iranians and Kurds killed by Iraqi chemical weapons in the Gulf War. We also feared that chemical weapons could be used against not only troops, but civilian populations. We hope that the implementation of the convention will speed up the peace process.

[English]

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and an honour to speak today on Bill C–87.

It is a very poignant moment to do so, given the fact that a little more than a week ago we celebrated the 50th anniversary of Victory in Europe Day all across the world.

• (1155)

Today we are moving toward enacting a bill to implement the convention on the prohibition of the development, production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons. The saying goes that all is fair in love and war, but there are conventions which dictate to us as human beings a minimum level of behaviour even in the horrors of war.

This basic level of human behaviour is an obligation of those who engage in war. The use of chemical weapons contravenes that in a most heinous fashion. Terrible acts have been committed on fellow human beings. Chemical weapons are one example of what has happened.

Chemical weapons are weapons of mass destruction. The chemical weapons convention was signed by over 130 countries in January 1993. It is the first multilateral agreement that abhors an entire class of weapons of mass destruction. The act enables an organization to look at chemical weapons production facilities to ensure that they will be destroyed and that the chemical weapons stockpiled by countries will also be destroyed.

All government and industrial facilities will be monitored and the act will be implemented by the countries. It is a powerful act but it is necessary. It is important to realize that it does not impinge on industries to engage in legitimate industrial production of chemicals. It comes down on industries and countries manufacturing chemical weapons for aggressive and warlike purposes.

I reassure industry in Canada that the purpose of the act is not to come down on it but to form a broad framework to be applied not only in this country but in other countries for the collective security of all. I also reassure the industry that its stocks will not be destroyed in any way, shape or form.

There are three categories of schedules in the act. Schedule 1 includes such chemicals we are aware of such as sarin, tabun, soman, and the mustards that were used with widespread and tragic effectiveness in World War I. There are some legitimate uses for these chemicals in pharmaceuticals and in cancer research. Some of the precursors are used. Therefore one would have to obtain permission or a licence in order to use them, and that applies to all 130 signatories.

Schedule 2 includes such chemicals as amiton, which are key precursors for schedule 1 chemical weapons. The individuals and companies that make them will be subjected to scrutiny if they make over a certain amount.

Schedule 3 is the least powerful, the least destructive of all, as they are often used in industry but can in large enough quantities be used as chemical weapons. We have such chemical weapons as hydrogen cyanide and phosgene that have been used before. Companies that manufacture these chemicals will be eligible for occasional checks and balances as time goes on.

In the act is the establishment of national authorities responsible for collecting information that they will give to an organization that has been set up called the Organization for the Prohibition of Conventional Weapons or the OPCW.

All signatories are essentially responsible for checking within their countries all the industries that will be manufacturing any of the chemicals in the three schedules I mentioned.

The information will then be given to the OPCW which will then decide if it is necessary to take further action. The national authorities in conjunction with the OPCW will facilitate the inspection. They will also control the export and import of chemicals where necessary. The country of origin is responsible for enacting Criminal Code legislation that will provide penalties, fines and imprisonment if individuals or companies are engaging in the production of chemicals for aggressive warlike use in the future. Again, we must make the distinction that the convention is not to be used against companies engaging in the production of chemicals for medicinal or industrial purposes.

I caution the government that the cost should not be excessive. We must do this within our fiscal constraints. We want to ensure that the agency that will be set up will not be onerous or develop a morass of bureaucracy in the future. We do not have the money to do that, as we all know.

Some may argue why this convention is necessary; did chemical weapons not go out with the first world war? The reality is unfortunately they did not. We have seen more recently in Japan the release of chemical weapons that had tragic effects. Sarin was released on a civilian population, killing hundreds of individuals. Stockpiles have been found in Japan. More recently the Iraqis have used chemical weapons for aggressive purposes to commit genocide within their own country against Kurdish individuals. That is a hot spot which will affect us in the future.

The convention was designed to keep good countries in check and to come down hard on those countries that would seek to use these weapons from Hades in a fashion that is aggressive and would cause destabilizing effects.

The UN will be the ultimate body that will receive information from the OPCW. That brings a larger question, which we ought to examine, which is the ability of the United Nations to act quickly and effectively in the face of threats to regional and international security. We have seen Rwanda, Burundi, the former Yugoslavia, Angola, Sierra Leone, and the list goes on. In fact there were over 40 major conflicts in the world last year. That number is not decreasing; rather, it is increasing. In the future we will see countries such as Nigeria, the Sudan, possibly Kenya, Kashmir, and a host of other countries blowing up—not to belittle those already on the front pages of newspapers, showing on a daily basis the tragedies civilians are enduring in places like Bosnia, Croatia, Burundi, Rwanda, East Timor. The list goes on and on. We have learned nothing in over 50 years. We ought to remember that.

The OPCW is an example of what is considered to be conflict prevention. Even though this is a small but very important act, there are many lessons that can be learned as conflicts loom ahead. In fact there are many things we can do to prevent future conflicts. The United Nations must set in place a list of transgressions that are completely unacceptable to the international community. It must set a list of transgressions down that are threats to regional and international security, behaviours that are considered to be patently unacceptable such as genocide and gross human rights abuses.

I also mention countries engaging in self–destructive behaviours. I bring to the attention of the House the expenditures occurring in military hardware. Many people believe that in the post–cold war era we live in a safer place. We are far from it. The world as we know it now is a much more dangerous place.

While there was a decrease in global arms spending from 1987 to 1990 of some $240 billion, military spending in many parts of the world has actually increased. It is interesting to note which countries are increasing their expenditures. Curiously enough, it is particularly in the poorest areas of the world. Sub–Saharan Africa and east Asia did not have a decline in their military expenditures; rather, they were increased.

In general when we see violent conflicts occurring the military expenditures are increasing also, which means that they are taking away from the expenditures necessary in providing basic human needs.

According to the UNDP, in 1990–91 all developing countries spent the equivalent of 60 per cent of their combined expenditures for education and health on military expenditure, compared with 33 per cent in industrialized countries.

Let us take a look at who spends the most on military hardware. It is very telling. In 1990–91: Somalia, 200 per cent military spending compared with health and education spending; Ethiopia, 190 per cent; Angola, 208 per cent; Yemen, 197 per cent; Pakistan, 125 per cent; India, 138 per cent; Myanmar, 222 per cent; Iraq, 271 per cent; Sri Lanka, 107 per cent; Syria, 373 per cent of its spending for education and health was spent on military expenditures. Clearly these countries are not among the richest of the world; rather, they are among the poorest.

Along with this list of transgressions we also need to draw up a list of responses from the international community. For example, early diplomatic initiatives can be employed, along with positive propaganda. The former Yugoslavia and Rwanda are interesting examples. When the conflicts were first beginning, the people who started to stir up and fan the flames of ethnic discontent were in part using negative, hateful propaganda. The people who were on the ground, NGOs and representatives from other countries, saw this and were helpless to do anything about it.

A lot could be done if a system were set in place by the United Nations to immediately put positive propaganda into the theatre when negative and hateful propaganda is being spewed forth by individuals who are trying to fuel the flames of ethnic discontent and trying to stimulate conflict. I think it would do a lot to dampen down the hatred and ethnic conflict as it starts. It is an interesting area for us to try to convince the United Nations to engage in.

Another aspect, which is particularly appropriate given the fact that the G–7 summit is occurring in Halifax in June, is the use of the international financial institutions as non–military and inexpensive levers on countries that are engaging in these transgressions I mentioned before. It has not really been looked at very carefully.

We were in Washington not too long ago and I spoke to Mr. Fauver, Mr. Clinton's sherpa for the G–7 summit. I asked him if we could use the international financial institutions to exert pressure on countries or groups who were trying to stimulate a conflict by trying to pit one person against the other. He said it could be done but that it was difficult. I think this might be an inexpensive but effective and eloquent way of trying to defuse conflicts before they occur.

Something that could be done is not renegotiating the loans of countries. They need money to fight a war; if they do not have the money then they cannot fight a war. We can decrease non–humanitarian aid to countries that are engaging in this behaviour. The removal of preferential trade status is another example of what can be done. These countries should be penalized and brought to task. The international community should let these countries or groups know that their behaviour is completely unacceptable for this to occur.

We can then go ahead and do the traditional form of diplomatic initiatives. Something the government has put forth, which I think is a very good move, is the construction of a rapid deployment force. We are not talking about a standing army but rather a force that would be comprised of individual countries that would contribute arms, equipment, or people to go in on short notice to areas of conflict in order to dampen down a conflict or prevent a conflict from happening. This might be another issue that could be brought up at the G–7 summit in Halifax. We are not talking about an army that would stay at one place at one time; they would stay in their countries of origin.

Another useful aspect is that these groups could come together on a periodic basis and train. One of the problems the United Nations has always found is that when they get soldiers and put them into a conflict the left hand does not know what the right hand is doing. They do not know the equipment, they do not know the commanders, and they do now know how things work. This would obviate that, by bringing them together every year or so to go through manoeuvres and the motions so that they will understand how to engage in a conflict such as this.

We also have to combine the increased monitoring capability of the United Nations. In the UN there exists a crisis monitoring group, but to date it has been very ineffective in actually informing the United Nations in a timely fashion about conflicts that are occurring. Much can be done in this area also. We need to incorporate NGOs and groups on the ground to form a network of military intelligence that could feed information in an expeditious fashion to the UN crisis group, who could then process it and give it to the United Nations.

What is the rationale for all of this? People will ask why we are getting involved in the affairs of other countries. The rationale is very clear. Contrary to what has happened in the past when armies were killing each other, most casualties that occur in conflicts these days are not army personnel but are innocent civilians. We saw this in Bosnia and in Rwanda time and time again.

In 1993 there were over 40 million displaced people in the world. The United Nations high commission for refugees recognized this as a great tragedy. Where do these refugees go? They move within their own countries but they also emigrate to other parts of the world. No border is completely intact; borders are in fact porous. What happens half a world away will come back to affect us. The United Nations also estimates that while there are presently 40 million refugees, the number is likely to increase to over 100 million by the year 2000.

When conflicts do occur, we see the massive and widespread destruction of a country. All the aid, development, and hard work of decades are washed away in the course of a month or two of conflict. It will take decades to rebuild that. Furthermore, the seeds of hatred are planted, not only in the people subjected to the war but also in the unborn children, because they will be subjected to the same hatred and prejudices their families were subjected to. This is a cancer that starts very early and grows. It takes generations to go away, if at all.

Also, within our own country when conflicts erupt we are forced to engage in peacekeeping, peacemaking, defence initiatives, aid and development at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars a year. Is it not better to put in a few dollars now and save hundreds of millions in the future, rather than wait until everything blows up?

There is no need to discuss the humanitarian aspects of those who are involved in the conflicts because they are evident. For those of you who have seen war situations, as I have, it is not a pretty sight. These individuals want nothing more than to live in peace and harmony but are forced to engage in activities or have heinous crimes meted out to them, which they are powerless to deal with.

One mistake made in foreign policy is in the global community we do not have the backbone to deal with individuals who for their own self–interests are stimulating ethnic hatred. When we negotiate with these people it is important to realize they are not necessarily speaking for their entire populace. They may be only be speaking for a very small number of people. Their motivations should be questioned at every turn.

Few countries in the world have the international recognition and capability to form a system to address the pressures and conflict we will have in the coming new world order. Fortunately, Canada is one of the few that can do this. We must persuade our colleagues in the international community to set up a framework and a system of responses from the international community and identify early on the precursors to conflict. In short, we must do what we can, where we can, and when we can, given the fiscal constraints that are put upon us.

The action we have taken with the conventional weapons ban is truly admirable and is a shining example of what Canada can do. People may not understand that Canada is one of the leaders in putting forth this ban. It is something we as a country ought to be very proud of.

While we have managed to put forth a convention on the ban of mines, I suggest Canada take a leadership role in putting forth a convention on banning the production, stockpiling and sale of land mines and anti–personnel devices because their primary target again is civilian.

Once a conflict is over these land mines and anti–personnel devices stay for decades and I will give some examples. It is also important to realize that these weapons are not meant to kill; many of them are meant purely to maim and they maim children.

Many of the anti–personnel devices are showered from helicopters or planes. They are made of plastic and look like little toys. Children pick them up and get their arms or their legs blown off. I have seen this in Mozambique. Teenagers found these things and had body parts blown off. Believe me, it is not fun to spend four hours in a hospital operating room debriding somebody's leg after taking off the other leg.

Worldwide there are over 100 million land mines that have been set. It not only affects what we know about Cambodia but in Afghanistan 400,000 people have been wounded. The UN is now engaging in activities to remove land mines. About 85 hectares a year are done. It will take 4,300 years to clear Afghanistan of mines.

In Croatia over 330,000 hectares are completely uninhabitable and totally useless for industry. It costs Croatia over $230 million a year purely because the area is seeded with land mines.

Chechnya is another example where hundreds of thousands of land mines were sown in a very short period of time. Many areas of Chechnya will not be able to become economically self–sufficient for a long time because of that. When the civilian population tries to plant their fields or go to work, they will continue to be subjected to periodic incidents of having their limbs blown off or of being maimed.

Many of the land mines are plastic, some are metal and many are invisible. They cost between $3 and $30 to manufacture and up to $1000 to get rid of. Every year there are two million land mines seeded and about 85,000 being removed.

There is a land mine called the black widow or the PMW, a 10 centimetre plastic mine with 240 grams of TNT that can rip off a leg at the hip. There are about 20 million of these land mines deployed all over the world. China and the former Soviet Union make them.

There is the Valmara 69, also known as the bouncing betty. This one leaps up one metre and explodes, showering metal fragments for 20 metres. It is made in Italy. It is shocking to see the countries that actually make these, from the United States to many countries in Europe to China and the former Soviet Union.

This is something we need to address and Canada can take a leadership role in this. There is no military use whatsoever for this weapon which again is primarily used to maim civilians. Usually those who are maimed the most are the children and the men and women who work in the fields. We must take a leadership role on this as we have done on chemical weapons.

While we have had the convention on chemical weapons, we also need to consider the aspect of conventional non–nuclear weapons. The proliferation of non–nuclear conventional weapons, particularly small arms, is something that is having a huge destabilizing effect on the world stage.

When I worked on the Mozambique border there were hundreds of thousands of AK–47 assault rifles pouring into South Africa from Mozambique. An AK–47 can be bought for $5 to $20. When you have an AK–47, you have a lot of power. These people are desperately poor. They have no food and are starving and all they can do is sell these weapons. These weapons are ubiquitous in the developing world and there is a huge destabilizing force in that. It also enables people to engage in violent criminal acts which also impedes a country's ability to get on its feet economically.

Whether we are looking at west Africa, southern Africa or east Asia, crime is one of the largest problems confronting the developing world. It is something we need to address.

The G–7 summit is coming up. Over 90 per cent of conventional weapons are made by G–7 nations. It is hypocritical for us to say we are helping countries on the one hand with our aid and development, but on the other hand we are selling them the arms either through private dealers or by government to government sale. We are cutting off our nose to spite our face because in the long run conflicts brew. These are not things to be taken in isolation. They are to be taken collectively in the name of collective security.

Bill C–87 shows that Canada can, as it has in the past, show leadership in foreign policy. One person not so long ago in the celebrations of V–E Day said a poignant and kind thing about the people of this country: "If the Canadian people could look at Canadians the way the people in Holland look at Canadians, then indeed they would learn a lot and indeed they would be proud".

I ask the government to remember that. I ask the Canadian people to remember that in the hope that we can use that esteem and respect we have on the international stage to become more aggressive in addressing these threats to international security, not only for the people who are involved, but also for the people in this country.

Although we may be far away from areas of conflict and think we are immune to it, we are not. People will leave areas of conflict, the have not areas to areas that have. Canada is a have country. It will put stresses on this country that we are not prepared to deal with. It will cost us money that we do not have. Above all else, we should do it for humanitarian reasons. Although we may be different peoples, we are in fact one people on one earth.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to Bill C–87, an act to implement the chemical weapons convention. It is appropriate at this time to remind the House and all Canadians that Canada has much at stake in this piece of legislation. It touches the very heart of our military history.

I remind the House that on August 15, 1915 Canadian soldiers were the first soldiers to be subjected to a systematic gas attack. Inexperienced Canadian troops occupied the trenches at Ypres in Belgium. At that point in the war there had been a stalemate on the western front. It was very difficult for either side to move forward using conventional weapons.

On that day the Germans released chlorine gas from their trenches. The Canadians held the line immediately in front and on their right were French colonial troops. What the Canadians saw first on that early morning was a white cloud advancing slowly toward them. They were filled with curiosity, wondering what it was. It was like a low lying mist. As it approached and reached their trenches they were suddenly seized at the throat. When they breathed they breathed fire and they fell gasping to the ground and into the trenches, writhing and suffering.

The Canadian troops very quickly realized it was poison gas. The French colonial troops on their right broke and ran in a panic, but the Canadian troops, those who survived, climbed out of the trenches and lay on the parapets while the gas passed. Actually, it is a great moment in the annals of Canadian military history. Even though many of those young Canadian troops died, they held the line and resisted the gas attack.

After that first attack, gas became very popular on the western front. The French discovered it was chlorine and responded with their own gas. Then there was an arms race of various types of noxious substances. They went to phosgene gas, hydrogen cyanide and other variations.

One of the most effective gases that was discovered during the first world war came to be known as mustard gas. This gas has been used in very recent times such as on the Kurds in the Iran–Iraq war. When the vapour touches the skin it immediately causes huge blisters. It also causes blindness. When it is breathed in, it blisters the lung and causes death.

As the war progressed it became very common to hear the sound of artillery firing gas shells. Instead of the explosion afterward, there was a popping and hissing noise. Along the western front because both the German troops and our allies were using gas, troops on all sides had rattles. When they heard the gas attack, they spun the rattles.

I would like to read a few lines from a famous poem by British poet Wilfred Owen called "Dulce et Decorum Est". He captures what it was like during these gas attacks in the first world war. He begins:

> Gas! Gas! Quick, boys! An ecstasy of fumbling,
> Fitting the clumsy helmets just in time;
> But someone still was yelling out and stumbling
> And flound'ring like a man in fire or lime—.
> Dim, through the misty panes and thick green light,
> As under a green sea, I saw him drowning.
> In all my dreams, before my helpless sight,
> He plunges at me, guttering, choking, drowning.

It was that kind of horrific experience which captured the imaginations of all nations during the war and after its conclusion.

One of the results was the 1925 Geneva protocol which outlawed the use of gas. It was a recognition by states worldwide that the use of this weapon actually took the very minimum essence of humanity out of warfare. It reduced warfare to a matter of exterminating the enemy like vermin. This was felt to be, and we still feel it today, unacceptable behaviour on the part of people who would be regarded as human beings.

Therefore the Geneva protocol in 1925 was passed. Like the current chemical warfares convention, it was not ratified by all nations. In fact the United States did not ratify it until 1970. It had an impact. That impact was to give all nations of the world the sense that chemical weapons were an illegal weapon, a weapon that was wrong to use.

Nevertheless by the time we got into the late 1930s, it became very clear that chemical weapons were going to be used again. When the Italians occupied Abyssinia, the former Ethiopia, they attempted to colonize it by conquest. They used poison gas on the helpless civilians as a way of experimenting with chemical weapons in the event of another world war. That had an immediate impact in Canada.

It was at about that time a former chief of staff, General Andrew McNaughton, became the head of the National Research Council, that lovely stone building at 100 Sussex Drive. He felt that as a result of what the Italians were doing there was a good chance that gas would be used again in any outbreak of hostilities.

He initiated research in Canada on protection against the use of gas. We started with the development of gas masks and charcoal containers. That work went forward at the National Research Council.

Then when the war broke out in 1939 we stepped up our activities and research on poison gas, particularly defensive research which is a very Canadian thing to do.

In 1940 with the fall of France, Britain was suddenly desperate. When France collapsed Canadian troops were the only troops who still had their equipment. The British immediately mobilized all their available gas weapons with the expectation of soaking the Germans with gas should they invade. The weapon the British had at the time was principally mustard gas contained in collapsible drums. It was very primitive. They expected to fly over the beaches if the Germans invaded and dump this out of the aircraft and hope it would injure enough troops to deter the attack. The attack did not come, however.

The initiative to develop gas weapons went forward very rapidly. The British were very concerned the Germans were developing the weapons and felt they should as well. Britain is a small country and so the United Kingdom turned to Canada for assistance in the development of poison gas weapons. This led to the opening of the proving grounds at Suffield, very large proving grounds near Medicine Hat, where Canada undertook experiments with various types of poison gas. Canada expanded from mustard gas into research developing out toxins such as ricin. During World War II thousands and thousands of animals were killed at Suffield during tests on various types of poison gas.

One direction of the research was to find a poison gas that was heavy. During the second world war many of the poison gasses were too light and consequently would rise and dissipate. The direction of the research was to find a gas that was very heavy and would flow along the ground and flow into the trenches and would be very deadly.

The United States also accelerated its production of poison gas. Even before the war with Japan, before the end of World War II, the Americans were conscious that gas could be a factor. In typical American style they concentrated on mass production. By about 1942 the Americans had tens of thousands of tonnes of liquid mustard gas and other types of gas and had developed bomb casings to deliver these.

The Canadians tended to specialize in actual research. We did experiments on humans. It was felt that one had to be sure the gas was effective. Many Canadian soldiers volunteered to be subjects for tests of poison gas. Sometimes these tests were very elaborate and I am sorry to say there were injuries to Canadian troops from the poison gas tests at Suffield.

At McGill University Canadians made the biggest breakthrough among the allies in developing poison gas. A team at McGill discovered a nerve gas. It had been doing research on pesticides and made a connection with between pesticides which had caused accidental deaths and developed a nerve gas.

The scientists in Britain and the United States rejected the Canadian development and it never proceeded to production. It is ironic because the Germans were developing gas weapons of their own. They had made a major breakthrough by developing several types of nerve gas, sarin and tabun, which were many times more toxic than the traditional gasses used in the first world war, the mustard gasses. Hitler had an enormous stockpile of these weapons.

Hitler was influenced by the 1925 Geneva protocol. Although he was essentially a mad man in charge of a country who led to hundreds of millions of injuries and deaths across the continent, for some reason he was affected by the 1925 Geneva protocol and did not order the use of gas. Research in German archives discloses that Hitler was very much opposed to the use of gas. That probably has racial overtones. He probably thought it was improper to use it on the British and that kind of thing. We cannot get into Hitler's mind but the Geneva protocol did prevent this dictator from resorting to this ghastly weapon.

The irony is that on the Allied side there was a desire to use the weapons; Winston Churchill wanted to use poison gas on the Germans. Even as we approached Normandy Churchill was very conscious of the fact there would be casualties and he pressed his chiefs of staff to do a study to determine whether it would be effective to use poison gas during the invasion of Normandy.

I will quote from a document of the time. It was written by Churchill to his chiefs of staff on July 6, 1944:

> I want you to think very seriously over this question of using poison gas. I would not use it unless it be shown that (a) it was life or death for us, or (b) that it would shorten the war by a year. It is absurd to consider morality on this topic when everybody used it in the last war without a word of complaint from the moralists or the church. On the other hand, the bombing of open cities was regarded as forbidden. Now everyone does that as a matter of course. This is simply a question of fashion, changing as she does between long and short skirts for women. I want a cold blooded calculation made as to how it would pay us to use poison gas, by which I mean principally mustard.

The chiefs of staff circumvented Churchill and made sure no order was ever put forward. Churchill's desire was never implemented. They deliberately out foxed the old fox himself. At that time the Germans had enormous stockpiles of nerve gas and if the British had used mustard gas there would have been an incredible retaliation on London and the British would have lost more civilians than the Germans.

Again we return to the 1925 Geneva protocol by which the British chiefs of staff recognized how inappropriate, how wrong and how against civilization it would have been to use poison gas even when the head of state was pressing for its use.

The Americans had an enormous stockpile of mustard gas. They had tens of thousands of tonnes of mustard gas. In 1943 when they attacked the Island of Tarawa in the Pacific, the Japanese resisted so fiercely the Americans marines lost 3,000 and 1,000 were wounded, as against about 4,000 Japanese killed. The lesson the Americans took from that was it was to be very costly to fight the Japanese in an island hopping war.

Therefore the American chemical warfare service proposed to secretly use poison gas to suppress the islands in Japan. However, the Americans felt they needed the concurrence of their allies. They approached Canada, which by that time was in a state of co–operation with the Americans in the development of these terrible weapons. They approached Canadian scientists at the National Research Council and in the military and asked them to do a report confirming that poison gas would be an effective way to suppress the Japanese islands.

What happened is very interesting. There was no doubt mustard gas, at no cost in American casualties, would have suppressed the garrisons on any island in the Pacific. Mustard gas is more effective in the tropics than in temperate climates.

The Canadian scientists, when they were asked for this report, fudged the figures. They put out a false report which actually claimed chemical weapons used in the Pacific theatre would not be any more effective than high explosive weapons. A chemical warfare service was knocked back a step in that it was trying to get the approval of the chiefs of staff and President Roosevelt to use gas. It lost the argument when the Canadians refused to get onside. That is another reason Canadians have a special place in the debate about chemical weapons. During the second world war we very positively prevented the use of those weapons by the Americans.

What is driving this sense of morality is the 1925 Geneva protocol. This brings me to the current chemical weapons convention. This convention is an enormous improvement over the 1925 protocol. It contains various sanctions and rules. No law passed by the United Nations can actually prevent the use of this terrible technology.

The chemical weapons convention is symbolic. It tells countries that if they use these weapons they are renegades and no longer part of civilized humanity. It causes nations to pause when they might be contemplating this action. It gives moral limitations to how nations will react to one another.

This type of moral sanction is vital in this age, when we move into the next century and when we do have wars in which terrible phrases like ethnic cleansing are used. The chemical warfare convention will not prevent terrorists like those in Japan from mixing their own chemical weapons and using them, but it will forever outlaw that type of behaviour and make sure at the very least the use of chemical weapons is not something resorted to by civilized states.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth for his contribution. I know he gave up part of his life to do in depth research into this whole field.

How did he obtain such detailed information from the U.S., Great Britain and Canada? Is that information wide open now or is some of this information still under wraps? Do we need to do further research?

I am very concerned about the stockpiles of mustard gas in 1943 which the hon. member mentioned. What happened to those stockpiles? How did countries get rid of these stockpiles?

There may be a lot of work to be done yet but at least this bill will go a long way in preventing horror stories in the future.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question.

Most of the documentation I used for my studies on the subject came from the archives here in Canada but only by chance. The majority of the original documents had been deliberately destroyed around 1970 or thereabouts by persons unknown. I was fortunate, however, to find microfilm taken of these documents and hidden away in a dusty corner of the archives by a civil servant we will never know. That led me to do the study.

Unfortunately even the documents I had were incomplete and consequently I could not determine for sure whether in the post–war period Canada did dispose of its considerable stockpiles of chemical weapons. We had a mustard gas plant at Cornwall, Ontario, which at the end of the war had 2,800 tonnes of mustard gas. Most of it was dumped at sea, which raises some very serious environmental questions.

A few years ago the Department of National Defence made a concerted effort to get rid of any stockpiles we had. I am confident we no longer have them in Canada.

One of the problems is verifying what countries have in terms of their compliance with legislation. With a chemical warfare convention such as this one we rely very heavily on the sincerity and the good motivation of countries. There are ways of hiding these things. That was why I was saying in my remarks that the symbolic part of the chemical warfare convention is just as important as its actual practical measures.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am eager to participate in today's debate on Bill C–87, an act to implement the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction.

Today, when they look at the world around them, people in Quebec and Canada are concerned. We are concerned because we do not know what awaits us in the future. We are worried about the nuclear weapons that are still around, about the biological and chemical weapons scattered throughout the world.

By passing this bill, the Canadian government will be among the first 65 countries to ratify the convention on chemical weapons out of the roughly 135—there are perhaps 132 at this time—nations that have signed it. The convention will take effect 180 days after the 65th state to ratify this agreement tables it. Along with my party, the Bloc Quebecois, I wholeheartedly support this convention on chemical weapons, which follows the debate on arms control and disarmament.

The convention on chemical weapons is the result of more than 20 years of negotiations at the conference on disarmament and the forums that preceded it.

For the first time, we have an instrument that really resulted from an actual multilateral negotiation process. The signing parties undertake to refrain from various activities in relation to chemical weapons, to co–operate in a number of ways so as to facilitate the implementation of the convention and to ensure that persons also refrain from those activities and provide the necessary co–operation.

Since the Second World War, the issue of the arms race has come up every time the prospects for enduring peace or the possibility of war is discussed. Most observers felt that the arms race was intrinsically dangerous and ultimately destabilizing. Western countries thus found themselves facing a paradox: on the one hand, they believed that force deters aggression; on the other hand, they were convinced that the arms race alone could provoke a global war.

The latter shook up our certainty that deterrence is the best form of insurance against potential aggression. We could not avoid the disturbing realization that the very measures taken to ensure our security could bring about our downfall and lead to a global conflict.

The debate on arms control is largely based on the preconceived notion that any arms race is, by definition, a chain reaction which tends to trigger an escalation of the conflict. The responses of warring states to the stockpiling of conventional, nuclear, chemical and bacteriological weapons, as well as the attempts made by each side to gain the upper hand lead to destabilization and greater international tension.

It is claimed that, if there is another world war, it will be by accident, in the sense that it will result from a climate of suspicion and crucial errors of judgment made regarding a regional conflict. This is why it is essential, for international stability, to control the arms race.

However, military experts contend that arms control merely regulates the arms race, instead of limiting it. Many issues remain very timely, even though the cold war is over and these issues are no longer related to an east versus west situation. There is a new phenomenon on the international scene: regional armed conflicts resulting from the emergence of new nations and the fact that others are trying to increase their influence.

Since most of the objectives of the superpowers' traditional arms control program have now been reached, the international community is turning its attention to measures designed to prevent a wider proliferation of nuclear, bacteriological and chemical weapons. That goal is now part of an effort to face today's geopolitical realities. Indeed, the time has come to carefully reassess existing monitoring mechanisms.

Following a resolution passed by the UN general assembly in December 1993, it was announced, in March of this year, that the delegates at the conference on disarmament had reached a consensus on a proposal to set up a special committee to negotiate a reduction of fissionable material production for nuclear arms. Conference delegates also discussed, among numerous other issues, chemical weapons, in the hope of developing a convention on such weapons.

That was not an easy task, since the participants did not agree on the monitoring procedures. The 1990 U.S.–Soviet bilateral agreements on the sharing of information and the destruction of weapon stockpiles helped further multilateral talks on this issue. In June 1992, the conference on disarmament submitted a draft treaty to prohibit the development, production and stockpiling of chemical weapons. Monitoring activities were delegated to an international organization responsible for the prohibition of chemical weapons, based in the Netherlands.

The long–awaited treaty on chemical weapons was finally signed in Paris, on January 13, 1993. The signature and the coming into effect of that agreement is undoubtedly an historical event. As I see it, this instrument is important for three major reasons. First of all, it represents a real step forward for international security. Second, it is truly universal in scope, since it reflects a number of fundamental balances. Finally, we should also consider what the situation would be like if it did not exist. The convention is the first multinational disarmament agreement that prohibits an entire class of weapons of mass destruction.

It prohibits producing and also acquiring, stockpiling, transferring, using or engaging in military preparations to use a chemical weapon or assisting anyone to engage in any activities prohibited by the convention. The prohibition on chemicals covers chemical products as such, their vectors and any equipment designed for the use of chemical weapons.

Furthermore, any state party to this convention would be obliged to destroy all chemical weapons within its territory, those it abandoned outside that territory and facilities for the production of chemical weapons. This is very important. It means this is a truly comprehensive prohibition that affects all chemical weapons in the world.

The convention constitutes an effective deterrent to developing clandestine chemical weapons production systems because of its unique inspection system. By setting a common standard and giving the international community the means to enforce its application, the convention provides the impetus for joint action to eradicate weapons of massive destruction.

Furthermore, all countries that have chemical weapons will have to destroy these, with their facilities for the production of chemical weapons, within ten years. Consideration was also given to the technical and financial problems that may arise when a country must destroy its arsenal of chemical weapons.

The convention provides for certain adjustments, including an extension of the ten–year deadline, which would, however, involve stricter monitoring procedures, tantamount to being under the supervision of the international community. The same applies to exceptional cases where facilities for the manufacture of chemical weapons are converted to civilian use.

In the case of chemical weapons abandoned by one state within the territory of another state, the convention obliges each state to destroy the chemical weapons within its territory while at the same time assigning responsibility for destruction to the state that abandoned weapons within the territory of another state.

State parties to this agreement are responsible for meeting their commitments at the national level, but how they meet those commitments is monitored by the international organization. This applies to the destruction of weapons and the facilities to manufacture them.

If the convention had not been adopted, this would have been a signal to those responsible for the proliferation of these weapons to continue the production. The security of all countries would have been at risk, especially countries in the southern hemisphere. The result would have been to reinforce unilateral non–proliferation policies which would have increased barriers to trade and technology transfers while in addition penalizing developing countries that respect their commitments.

The chemical weapons convention serves the interests of all signatory countries and all countries that will sign in the future. Contrary to what was said in some quarters, it is not designed to serve the sole interests of industrialized countries. On the contrary, it is developing countries that will benefit from the convention. Indeed, in the past few years, unfortunately, it has been the developing countries which have used chemical weapons in their conflicts, while industrialized countries have found them of no interest strategically or as a deterrent.

And understandably, come whatever may, industrialized countries will always be better equipped to detect and to protect against chemical weapons than most developing countries, which do not have ready access to such equipment. We have only to think of what went on in Japan.

• (1300)

Japan is, nonetheless, better equipped to deal with such situations while the same would be more difficult for third world countries, where there would probably be more deaths. In fact, it is the industrialized countries which will take on the better part of the task of industry monitoring by virtue of the fact that their chemical industries are more highly developed.

However because of the extension of the definition of industries considered capable of producing chemical weapons, all countries will be affected by monitoring in one way or another.

Likewise, it is only natural that countries which are willing to be monitored and which respect the commitments made under the convention will feel that the current restrictions imposed under the current non–proliferation agreements are eased up.

It is worth noting that the cost of destroying a chemical weapons factory is ten times that of building it.

Having said this, you will understand our concern with the financial burden that the obligation to destroy chemical weapons will place on certain states lacking the necessary financial means to do so.

The convention's provision that some factories may be temporarily converted into disposal facilities when this is possible and cost–effective, so that they can be considered converted, will not relieve such countries of this problem.

I would like to add in closing that the convention is an historical first, which the conference on disarmament can add to its list of accomplishments.

This convention proves that, when the conditions are favourable, the conference does have the required competence and skill to draft agreements which are as politically sensitive as they are technically complex, and which contribute to the well–being of our respective populations.

The question arises as to the role the Government of Canada intends to play in encouraging its partners to ratify the chemical weapons convention as quickly as possible.

To my mind, Canada must play a strong leadership role in this regard. To date, we have seen no hint of such an intention. If the government wants to act consistently, it should announce a series of initiatives in this regard in the coming weeks. After all, only 28 countries have ratified the convention up to now.

I should perhaps point out that neither the United States nor Russia has signed yet. We realize that it will cost Russia significantly to comply with the convention.

What will the federal government do to help Russia get rid of its chemical weapons stockpiles? In my opinion, Canada should take a creative approach. For example, should the federal government not consider providing technical assistance to Russia, as it has in the past? It could, for example, set up a task force of technical experts.

We know very well that there are competent people in Quebec and in the rest of Canada to do this type of work, whose main thrust would be the evaluation of how Russia, for example, could destroy its manufacturing facilities and its chemical weapons at minimal cost.

Clearly, signatures and ratification mean little. Accordingly, in addition to de facto intentions, the federal government must ensure the organization has the intention and the resources to make the monitoring system a reality.

As you know, both Russia and the United States must participate in this convention, if it is to fulfil its role, since they have the biggest stockpiles of chemical weapons. As I said earlier, neither has yet signed.

We in the Bloc Quebecois believe that our support for this bill will mean that Quebec and Canada will be able to quickly carve a choice niche within the various institutions of this new international organization.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to be able to speak today to Bill C–87, an act to implement the convention on the prohibition of the development, production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons and on their destruction.

Questions on chemical and biological weapons were first placed on the United Nations agenda in 1969. On September 3, 1992 the conference on disarmament reached a significant milestone in its negotiations with the completion of the draft text of the convention on the prohibition of the development, production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons for presentation to the United Nations.

After more than 20 years of long, often difficult discussions on negotiations at the conference on disarmament and its predecessors in Geneva, the triumph was an agreement finally arrived at as a result of genuine, multilateral negotiations.

Approval by the United Nations general assembly paved the way to the signing ceremony in Paris in January 1993. Canada, a strong advocate of multilateral efforts, can take pride in being one of the 160 signatories of the chemical weapons convention. The convention completely outlaws an entire category of existing weapons of mass and indiscriminate effect and provides for a system of multilateral verification, thus setting a new precedent at the global level.

As one of the 65 nations that has promised to ratify the treaty and bring it into force, Bill C–87 is our commitment to implement this convention. Impetus causing responsible nations to move toward this agreement was provided by the gulf war which provided a heightened awareness of the dangers of proliferation.

The international community learned important lessons in the disarmament of Iraq involving the destruction, removal or rendering harmless of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons. This poignant lesson played an important part in convincing the international community that it was imperative for nations to put aside differences and to work together to outlaw these terrible weapons of human destruction.

When I was a military officer in Germany, I was required for several days every month to live and operate in a chemical suit with a gas mask close by hand. This was a very traumatic and very deeply held experience because while we, the military people on the base, had our chemical suits and our gas masks, we were fully aware that our dependants did not. Should there be an attack, and we were aware that the former Soviet Union regularly used this type of weapon in their exercises, our dependants would be very vulnerable.

There was an evacuation plan but this was a tremendous undertaking and would take a tremendous amount of time. Thus, we were very much aware of the risk that they were under. As a result, I feel as strongly as anyone can feel that we must do our utmost to rid the world of chemical weapons.

Since they have the greatest number of chemical industries, the willingness of the United States and Germany to co–operate was vital. Germany ratified the agreement in August last year. The United States, with the second largest chemical stockpile in the world, is expected to ratify the treaty this year. This will hopefully send out a hurry up message to other countries that have pledged their support.

We too must move without delay to implement Bill C–87, thus signifying our commitment to ratify the treaty. In this spirit, I support this legislation.

During the January 1994 joint summit meeting in Moscow, Presidents Yeltsin and Clinton declared their intention to promote ratification of the treaty as rapidly as possible, thus enabling the convention's entry into force this year.

However, the real work lies ahead. Costs of implementation will be high. As a rule of thumb, it costs 10 times as much to destroy chemical weapon production facilities as it does to build them in the first place. With each country bearing individual responsibility for the destruction of their chemical weapons, undoubtedly there will be financial problems for some members, particularly emerging countries and Russia. Both financial and technical assistance to those countries seeking to destroy their chemical weapons must be provided by member states and this will include Canada.

A universal system of verification to monitor and ensure the destruction of stockpiles will be carried out by the Organization for the prohibition of chemical weapons, OPCW. The scope of its activities is complex and its mandate is to verify: first, the destruction of chemical weapons; second, the destruction of chemical weapons production facilities; third, to verify non–compliance, ensuring that activities prohibited under the convention are detected and traced; fourth, to verify permitted production in the chemical industry, to ensure that only activities not prohibited under the convention are carried out; and fifth, to perform investigations concerning non–compliance, that is, challenge inspections, to ensure that the cost of cheating will outweigh its benefits.

Estimates indicate that the organization for the prohibition of chemical weapons will have up to 1,000 staff and will operate with an annual budget of $150 million to $180 million. Who will pay for this? International inspection expenses will be met by Canada and other members, according to a United Nations scale of assessment, in addition to the cost of eliminating our own chemical weapons and facilities.

For emerging member countries, the price of compliance will have to be added to the chemicals they export. That will make them less competitive.

There are other problems, as noted in the book An End to Chemical and Biological Weapons? by Richard Latter. It states:

> It is unclear whether major countries, for example the United States and Russia, will be prepared to fund the CWC sufficiently, given their other commitments—The U.S., which calculates that incinerating its 30,000 ton stockpile would cost $6 to 7 billion, have also agreed to foot part of the bill for destroying the 40,000 tons of Russian weapons stock. Even so, the problems of getting a destruction program under way means Russia will almost certainly have to invoke treaty provisions allowing an extra five years to complete the task.

No doubt Canada will be asked to shoulder some of this burden but the overall costs are still largely unclear.

In Canada, information from a 1988 survey indicates our chemical industry does not use prohibited chemicals listed in schedule 1, which includes the toxins sarin and soman, used in the war between Iran and Iraq, and the various mustard gases used during the first and second world wars. Some of the chemicals on the list are used by a few research organizations.

Once Bill C–87 becomes law, such users will be required to obtain a licence and be subject to two inspections per year to ensure they are following the rules.

Chemicals listed in schedule 2A and 2B may not be used to any great extent in Canada, but this has yet to be determined. Schedule 2 chemicals are used for commercial purposes and if production exceeds the listed thresholds, two yearly inspections will be required.

All substances noted on these lists will be banned for export to countries that do not participate in the chemical weapons convention.

The more commonly used industrial chemicals noted in schedule 3 can be produced without inspection under the 30 ton threshold. However, amounts exceeding 230 tons will be subject to random inspections.

Without complete data, the number of companies affected and the precise cost for implementation of the new law remains unknown. Unquestionably the disposal of chemical weapons, facilities and international verification costs to be paid by individual member countries will be expensive.

In this time of financial constraints the government must avoid creating a cumbersome bureaucracy and rather should establish a slim, trim and effective agency to inspect and monitor the chemical industry. Assumptions are that five full time staff will be required for Canada's national authority, plus one staff within the foreign affairs department.

Using Australia as an example, the bureau of statistics gathered data on chemical production relevant to the chemical weapons convention which assisted in the determination of resources required for its national authority.

The Australian chemical weapons convention office, the chemical weapons control organization, as it is called, will be closely associated with its safeguards office, also responsible for the nuclear non–proliferation treaty. The director of the Australian safeguards office, who is directly responsible to the foreign minister, will also be the director of the new chemical weapons convention office. This allows for effective use of available senior executive and administrative support resources. There will be a director, two full time staff with part time support drawn as required from experts in other areas of government or at times from the private sector. Hopefully our government will examine the Australian model for its efficiency and application in Canada.

Although there is no binding legislation giving government authority to demand information, the Department of Foreign Affairs has attempted to collect data by initiating a survey of 2,100 Canadian businesses. About 500 companies have responded to the voluntary questionnaire. There is still no clear indication as to how many companies will be affected by the legislation. Until government has these data it will be difficult to establish projected costs for our clean–up, verification and inspection.

Bill C–87 closely adheres to the requirements of the chemical weapons convention and has the support of the Canadian Chemical Producers Association as well as the Canadian Pharmaceuticals Manufacturers Association. Officials of the Department of Foreign Affairs deserve credit for taking industry concerns into consideration during consultations over the past eight years.

Without Canada's participation in the treaty and industry support we would have difficulty competing in the international marketplace. Canadian industry imports chemicals for the production of many commercial applications and under the convention chemicals identified for control will be banned or restricted for non–participating countries. Care must be taken to ensure regulatory costs do not become so prohibitive that they force smaller industries out of business.

Additionally we should not impede industry by increasing red tape and creating a complex decision making hierarchy. Undoubtedly industry will be required to make detailed declarations of production and be subject to stringent inspections within Canada. These extra costs will have to be borne by industry as well as the Canadian taxpayer.

The international secretariat based in The Hague will police international compliance. This area was the most controversial in achieving a consensus. The general guidelines state the inspection teams are to be granted unimpeded access rights. They will verify destruction programs, inspect all military facilities and civilian plants producing chemicals which could be used for armaments in addition to carrying out routine monitoring and random checks on other civilian chemical installations.

Bill C–87, section 13(1)(c) dealing with international inspection states: "Where appropriate, install, use and maintain in respect of any place monitoring instruments, systems and seals in a manner consistent with the provisions of the convention and any facility agreement applicable to the place".

It would seem appropriate or necessary to institute some protection to ensure this authority for international inspections is not abused.

Section 14(1)(b) states: "Permit the international inspector to examine anything in the place being inspected". Section 14(1)(c) states: "Permit the international inspector to make copies of any information contained in the records, files, papers or electronic information systems kept or used in relation to the place being inspected and to remove copies from the place".

Further clarification and expansion would seem to be in order. Commercial espionage is a recognized reality and industry understandably fears the disclosure of valuable commercial information to competitors. Every effort must be made to ensure our national security is not put at risk. Some form of checks and balances should be put in place as under the current legislation it appears Canada would not have the right to restrict inspection teams. Reasonable management procedures should be identified and implemented so that national security is not jeopardized.

Effective implementation of the treaty's provisions will pay off in long term world security dividends. It is important these national protection issues be addressed now.

We stand at a pivotal juncture on the world stage. We can succeed or we can fail in this effort to lower the risk of inadvertent or impulsive use of chemical weapons.

• (1320)

Our success in this instance will reap great benefits and assist by setting the example in the larger task of implementing co–operative approaches to problems in other areas, regionally or globally.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to speak at second reading on Bill C–87 concerning the prohibition of chemical weapons.

The Reform Party supports the chemical weapons convention which Canada signed in 1993. We will also support this legislation allowing us to be among the first groups of countries to implement the convention's terms of agreement.

As all members of the House are well aware, Canada has been a world leader when it comes to the promotion of peace. We have given steadfast support to the UN, provided peacekeepers in times of need and promoted international agreements and regimes to limit the dangers of war.

In the case of the chemical weapons convention we are dealing with a particularly important issue. Not only is the use of chemical weapons highly illegitimate against combatants who at least have some protection against them, but the threat of their use against civilian populations is an intolerable breach of civilized conduct by any nation.

Most of us will remember with horror the terrible scenes of the Kurdish villages gassed by the Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein in the late 1980s. This is the kind of tragedy that must be avoided at all costs in the future. By ratifying Bill C–87 Canada will be doing its part toward this end.

In the news today we see the arrest of the person in Japan allegedly responsible for the gas attack in the subway station in Japan. I hope Bill C–87 would go a long way to ensure that type of terrorist activity is never allowed on any part of the planet.

Bill C–87 prohibits the production or use of chemical weapons and provides for the regulation of certain chemicals that can readily be turned into chemical weapons. As we speak, similar pieces of legislation are being prepared throughout the world. Hopefully by this fall the convention will come into force. As things now stand, a large majority of countries have signed on, which is quite promising. The fewer countries outside of this convention, the more pressure there will be to adhere strictly to its goals and provisions.

Unfortunately several middle eastern countries are refusing to join the convention. They argue that because Israel is not willing to join the nuclear non–proliferation treaty, they cannot sign on. While I hope they will reconsider, I also hope the Government of Israel will bring its nuclear program out of the closet and join the nuclear non–proliferation treaty. The chemical weapons convention and the NNPT are agreements in the best interest of the people and governments of the world. Therefore they should not be used for tactical advantage by any government.

Moving on to the substance of the bill, while the Reform Party supports the bill, we are looking at it closely to see if there are constructive amendments that should be made to it during debate and in committee. High on the list for Reform are the costs to the taxpayer and to Canadian industry. While we acknowledge the bill has some legitimate costs, according to our preliminary investigation the government does not yet know the price tag on Bill C–87.

As Bill C–87 works its way through the legislative process, we should try to determine how best to improve it so implementation will be as cost effective as possible. For example, we must avoid the creation of a huge new bureaucracy to monitor and regulate the Canadian chemical industry.

Officials at foreign affairs have advised us that a full time staff of five as a national authority plus one additional staffer at foreign affairs might be needed. We should make sure it does not go beyond this. At any rate, during committee the question should be carefully addressed.

• (1325)

Another key question for the committee will be the inspection powers used to monitor the industry. As we have seen in another government bill, Bill C–68 on gun control, the government can be very heavy handed and intrusive if it is left to its own devices. Reform wants to make sure this case is not repeated on Bill C–87.

More important, Reform has some serious concerns about the privacy of businesses which will fall under the auspices of Bill

C–87. Industries subject to inspection must fully comply with inspectors or be subject to summary conviction or conviction on indictment. Under the more serious category persons will be subject up to five years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

Considering these serious penalties, business people will be forced to comply even if they feel their legitimate rights to privacy are being violated. Under sections 14(1)(b) and (c) the inspectors can examine anything in the place being inspected and make copies of any information contained in the records, files, papers or electronic information systems kept or used in relation to the place being inspected and to remove the copies from that place.

Although I know the intent of the legislation aims to fulfil the obligations of the convention, I am slightly worried these investigations could be used as a fishing expedition by the government to sift companies through a fine tooth comb.

Parliament should be sure such inspections are required to directly investigate whether companies are breaching the chemical weapons convention. Fishing expeditions should be specifically prohibited.

Under section 15(3) the bill says search warrants would not be required even if an inspector were refused entry to a premises if there are exigent circumstances. Although the justice department likes the wording and argues it is necessary so inspectors can have a freer hand, I am not convinced. As we all know, there are no industries in Canada that currently make chemical weapons or use them. What circumstances would be so pressing that a warrant could not be obtained? If this provision is only to be used in extreme emergencies where inspectors must take immediate action it should state so explicitly. If on the other hand it is intended to be used for the convenience of inspectors it should be removed from the bill.

Section 20 reminds me of the government's gun control bill. It states every person who contravenes any provisions of this act is guilty of an offence and is liable to either an indictable or summary conviction. Once again I realize the government is casting a wide net in order to avoid loopholes. However, this means to me that a business which incorrectly reports its activities or fills out a form incorrectly would be guilty of an offence under the Criminal Code of Canada. If a clerk makes the mistake would that employee be convicted? Would the owner? What about the board of directors? Would it be the clerk's supervisor? Surely this must be cleared up.

While I do not have anything against seriously punishing a company secretly making or selling chemical weapons, I think the bill may be going too far. Just like Bill C–68, we have to target the criminals and those who are willfully breaking the chemical weapons convention, not ordinary Canadians or business people who get caught up in the government's web.

Another section which caught my attention is 23(1), which talks about how the government can at the discretion of the minister in charge dispose of items seized under this act.

As I looked through the act, however, I did not see exactly where the government was given authority to seize property or what the limits were on that seizure. I would certainly want this point clarified in debate and during committee.

As I read through the details of the bill, I eventually came to the three schedules of chemicals that are being regulated. All prohibited chemical weapons are listed in schedule 1. According to my understanding, these chemicals are not used by any industry in Canada. However, there are a few research organizations that do require them. If Bill C–87 passes, these researchers will be required to obtain a licence from the government to continue with their activities. They will also be subject to two inspections per year to ensure that they are following the rules. A fee will be charged for this licence.

I do not have a problem with any of this, subject to the following two conditions. First, my concerns about privacy and the targeting of this legislation should be addressed to ensure that we are not whittling away at legitimate freedoms and liberties of Canadians. Second, the fee charged for this licence should be reasonable. Perhaps a maximum fee could be decided on during the committee stage or it should be made explicit that the fees would be on a cost recovery basis only.

Moving on to the chemicals in schedule 2, these are known as precursors and are one step removed from being chemical weapons. They are used for some commercial processes but not too extensively.

Companies producing or using schedule 2 chemicals in amounts beyond a certain threshold will be required to report this to the government. Beyond a second threshold, those companies will also be subject to an inspection of up to two per year maximum. While there is no licensing for schedule 2 chemicals, certain new chemicals will be added to the Export Permits Act.

In addition, three years after Bill C–87 passes, the export of schedule 2 chemicals will be banned to countries that are not signatories to the convention. Until then, importers in non–signatory countries will be required to produce end use certificates for schedule 2 chemicals.

As for the schedule 3 chemicals, these are more commonly used industrial chemicals. Companies producing schedule 3 chemicals in amounts beyond a certain threshold will be required to report this to the government. Beyond a second threshold those producers may be subject to infrequent random inspections to ensure compliance with the convention. In addition, facilities that work with discrete organic chemicals must report this to the government.

Export of schedule 3 chemicals to non–signatory countries will require end use certificates, and after five years further measures may be imposed.

Looking at Bill C–87 as a whole, I believe Canadians will support this bill strongly. Canadians have always been strong supporters of multilateral efforts to promote peace and restrict arms proliferation. This is especially true with respect to the prohibition of the use of chemical weapons. By asserting leadership in this area, Canada is standing up for the extension of a rules based multilateral system to defend our interests and promote common norms and values with like minded countries.

In conclusion, Reform will support this bill, and throughout the legislative process we will seek to improve it. These improvements will make its implementation as pain free as possible for industry while still upholding Canada's commitments under the chemical weapons convention.

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION ACT

Hon. Raymond Chan (for Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.) moved that Bill C–86, an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act, be read the second time and referred to committee.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak today in support of Bill C–86, an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act, and to urge speedy passage of this important bill and the amendments it brings forward to this act.

This government is strongly committed to building our vision of a growing, competitive, market oriented agriculture and agri–food sector. Canada's dairy industry is a key component of that sector. Trade and market development, both here at home and abroad, are crucial to achieving the sustainable growth necessary to allow this vision to materialize for dairy producers, processors, and further processors in the industry.

In recent years value added exports have grown steadily in importance for the dairy sector. I would like to add as well at this time that I commend those in the dairy industry for the approach and the actions they are taking in meeting the challenges that are coming forward, the competition that is there, and the way in which they are able to meet that competition and competitiveness in the export markets with the use of these amendments.

Market realities call for changes in the way dairy stakeholders do their business. It is essential to facilitate industry driven marketing approaches in the new GATT environment. With the passage of the amendments before us in this bill, we will enable the Canadian dairy sector to meet some of these new challenges. These amendments will allow for the maintenance of a successful, effective, and equitable framework for the orderly marketing of milk and other dairy products in Canada and beyond our borders, a framework developed and supported by the industry. I repeat that it has been developed and supported by the industry itself.

Bill C–86, along with this amendment, to the Canadian Dairy Commission Act was given first reading here in this place on April 28. It will provide the necessary federal legislative authority to permit the Canadian Dairy Commission, in close co–operation with the provinces, to implement a national milk pricing system with the pooling of market returns from different classes of milk and use. No cost to government is involved in these amendments.

This new strategy conforms with Canada's trade commitments under NAFTA and the WTO agreements. It will provide a mechanism for the Canadian dairy industry to continue to supply important export and domestic markets for dairy products and products containing dairy ingredients, while at the same time maintaining the equity that is inherent in the current supply management regime.

Under the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement, which has been incorporated into the North American free trade agreement, or NAFTA, as we know it, export subsidies are not permitted on bilateral trade in agricultural products. Also, under the World Trade Organization agreement, which was implemented on January 1, 1995, the definition of export subsidies includes producer–financed export assistance. Therefore, as of August 1, 1995, the current system of using producer levies to finance dairy product exports to the United States will be prohibited. The ability to use levies to finance dairy product exports to other destinations is also gradually being reduced in volume and dollar terms under the WTO agreement.

Currently, through levies, milk producers across Canada share the costs associated with the export of dairy products not required for domestic consumption.

These levies also currently provide the funds that are needed to facilitate the payment of rebates to further processors of products containing dairy ingredients. Such rebates have been necessary to assist further processors using dairy ingredients to successfully compete in domestic and export markets and to assist exporters of primary dairy products to be competitive on the export market.

The Canadian Dairy Commission administers these export and rebate initiatives on behalf of the dairy industry. These costs have always been considered to be a necessary part of managing the milk marketing system in Canada as a whole. The issue of equity between producers is central to the current milk marketing system in Canada and is preserved in the new pricing and pooling approach that will be enabled by this bill.

Equity is currently maintained through the payment of levies on every hectolitre of milk produced in Canada. Each province's current levy obligation is calculated by the commission on the basis of total fluid and industrial milk production. Levies are collected by provincial marketing boards and agencies through the deductions from producer milk payments and are remitted to the commission.

If Bill C–86 is not implemented by August 1, important dairy exports to the United States using producer financed levies will be in jeopardy. Furthermore, while export subsidies by levies to other destinations could continue for now, these subsidized shipments will also have to be reduced over time.

Canadian further processors, such as Hershey Limited in the nearby city of Smith Falls, De Tomasso Limited in Montreal, or McCains in New Brunswick, which use dairy inputs and products such as condensed milk, butter, and mozzarella in their chocolate and pizza products, for example, rely on U.S. exports to maintain the competitiveness of their Canadian production facilities. These companies, which employ thousands of Canadians, must continue to be able to obtain dairy ingredients at world price levels if they are to continue to successfully compete on the export market and to be competitive with the imports on the domestic market.

Pricing these dairy inputs at the producer level at U.S. competitive prices would eliminate the need for charging levies to producers and paying rebates to processors and would thus be a GATT–WTO acceptable method of maintaining this U.S. export activity. However, without the approach of pooling producer returns, which is enabled by this bill, Bill C–86, there would be no way of maintaining the producer equity that is achieved through the current levy system.

Without being able to pool returns on a national basis, milk producers in provinces where more Canadian processing and further processing activity takes place would be particularly impacted by the reduced market returns involved.

Under the amendments proposed in this bill, the levy system as it applies to milk marketed in interprovincial and export trade would be replicated through the creation of special milk classes where prices would be set at competitive market of destination levels and through pooling of the returns from those markets.

To maintain equity among producers across the country, milk revenues will be pooled and redistributed to producers through the Canadian Dairy Commission and provincial authorities according to terms agreed upon by the industry and the provincial authorities and set out in federal–provincial agreements.

In order to enable the Canadian Dairy Commission to administer such a pooling system for producers, certain federal and provincial administrative powers must be dovetailed legislatively. Most provinces currently have legislation authorizing pricing and pooling of returns on milk sold within their boundaries. The Canadian Dairy Commission requires similar pricing and pooling powers for milk sold across provincial boundaries and for exports. The commission must also be provided with the authority to both delegate and receive these new pricing and pooling powers from the provincial authorities. Such dovetailing of federal and provincial authorities does not involve any encroachment on current provincial powers.

The principal amendments to the Canadian Dairy Commission Act contained in this bill provide the commission with the legal administrative authority to calculate the average national price level for the milk classes whose returns will be pooled. Also it allows them to obtain the returns from sales to processors through the provinces and redistribute the returns to producers through provincial authorities on an equitable basis as per the terms of the formal federal–provincial agreements.

As I indicated earlier, the same effect is now being achieved through the producer levy system which finances such initiatives as the Canadian Dairy Commission's dairy product export assistance program; the rebate program for further processors and the butterfat utilization program.

Other amendments contained in Bill C–86 enable the dairy commission to recover pooling administration costs from funds generated by the pool itself; to establish a special bank account to deal solely with the producer moneys entering and leaving the pool; allow the commission to return any excess fees or levy funds to producers; permit the commission to establish a line of credit to ensure continuity of producer payments and strengthen the enforcement provisions of the act.

The price discrimination and pooling system approach that it will enable by Bill C–86 was developed through extensive dairy stakeholder consultation and negotiations and is supported by provincial agriculture and agri–food ministers.

I have a number of letters of support from provincial governments, milk producers, organizations and provincial boards from across the country, from Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, B.C., the Dairy Farmers of Canada, the UPA and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. They all support this bill and ask us to move it through this place and the other place as quickly as possible.

For the past two years stakeholders have dedicated extensive time and effort to develop a means of keeping in step with and responding successfully to all of the changes taking place in the domestic and international marketplace. Several working groups and committees, including the diary industry strategic planning committee, the negotiating subcommittee and the policy and all milk pooling committees, have all been established under the auspices of the Canadian milk supply management committee.

The committee oversees the application of a national milk marketing plan, the federal–provincial agreement which governs milk supply management in Canada. Chaired by the Canadian Dairy Commission, the Canadian milk supply management committee has representation from producers and governments from all provinces except Newfoundland, which is not a signatory to the national plan because it does not produce significant amounts of milk used in the industrial product sector. National processor and consumer groups also participate in the nationwide forum.

The federal–provincial task force on orderly marketing also reviewed the progress made by the dairy sector in defining a new framework for sustainable, orderly marketing. Last December ministers of agriculture and agri–food were advised of the industry's recommendation that national price discrimination be endorsed as the only viable option to continue current programs designed to export to the United States and maintain domestic markets facing import competition, and that the preferable method of sharing returns from price discrimination at the national level. The method that is equitable and GATT acceptable is the pooling of returns from all milk classes.

Ministers subsequently supported this approach and directed that amendments to the Canadian Dairy Commission Act be developed to provide for a national pooling of milk returns to delegated administrative functions.

The bill before us today is the culmination of this comprehensive, consultative process. Through the system enabled under Bill C–86, the dairy sector is adapting to a changing business environment. I congratulate it for doing that.

Dairy stakeholders have developed a flexible and more market oriented approach that will set the industry on a viable course for the long term. The approach will also encourage greater co–operation among provincial milk marketing boards, agencies and processors in developing new markets for Canadian dairy ingredients and products.

I urge all members and all parties in the House to give these amendments speedy consideration and passage so that we can continue to have a growing and strong dairy industry in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before giving the floor to our colleague from Frontenac, I wish to advise him that the Chair will have to interrupt him to allow oral question period to proceed but that he will get to complete his speech afterwards.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the clarification. I will of course comply.

I would like mention right away that five of my colleagues will join me in debate on Bill C–86, a bill of major importance for Quebecers in our view. I will be supported by the hon. members for Champlain, Lotbinière, Québec–Est, Matapédia—Matane and Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead throughout the day and tomorrow, if need be, as I put across our views on Bill C–86, which, I must tell you right away, we will be supporting. We do not have any amendment to put forth at this time. I can therefore assure the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings of our full support.

The GATT negotiations in Geneva led dairy producers a merry dance. Negotiations concerning article XI in particular, as well as discussions about maintaining a supply management system did not give much comfort to dairy producers.

I remember attending, in December 1993, a few weeks after this government took office, a large meeting with some dairy producers from my riding. The meeting was held in Saint–Georges–de–Beauce, in the riding of the independent member for Beauce. There were between 500 and 600 farm producers in attendance, and they sounded quite worried. This meeting was chaired by the chief economist of the UPA in Quebec, Yvon Proulx, assisted by two other persons.

I must say that three questions were asked over and over by our dairy producers. The first question of particular interest to them was this: Will supply management with respect to milk be maintained?

I clearly remember the answer chief economist Proulx gave them at the time, as it left me wondering. He said something like this: "My friends, if you want supply management, you can have it. If you exercise self–discipline, we can have a well–disciplined dairy policy in Quebec and Canada".

He managed to give some reassurances to the producers, who feared among other things that producers could decide overnight to increase their dairy herd, or that those running a cow–calf operation could suddenly decide to start dairy production to supplement their income.

Another matter of concern to producers was quota value. I remember one producer saying: "I could have sold my farm for $1.5 million last fall. Will I be able to sell it for the same price with these declining quota values?" Of course, the question remains unanswered. It was not answered in October 1993. Just this week, I read in La terre de chez nous an article by none other than the president of the union representing agricultural producers in the Châteauguay valley, Peter Bienz, who figured out that his dairy quota was worth hundreds of thousands of dollars and who is most interested in what will happen to the value of his quota.

A milk quota is only a work permit, a piece of paper, a certificate which says, for example, that so–and–so has the right to produce 12,000 kilos of milk fat per year. Our agricultural producers are extremely concerned about the monetary value of this piece of paper, which is now so valuable in Quebec, because many of them see it as their pension fund. They are not like MPs who, after sitting in the House of Commons for six years and reaching the age of 55, as provided in the new bill under consideration, can receive a pension for life, which, all in all, is quite reasonable after spending six years in this House. Unfortunately for them, farmers do not enjoy the same perks. They equate their pension fund with the value of their quotas, so I hope that this value will not be slashed.

Finally, another question of concern to farm producers was the following: Will the proposed import tariffs ranging from 181 to 350 per cent remain the same?

Mr. Speaker, I see that the time is passing very quickly and, with your permission, I would like to stop now and resume my speech after Question Period.

The Speaker: Yes, my dear colleague, you may resume your speech after Question Period. You will be first.

It being 2 o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to statements by members.

STREET KIDS INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I met recently with four high school students from my riding representing Street Kids International, an organization which raises awareness about human rights abuses perpetrated against the most defenceless segment of society, our children.

During our meeting, these young students pointed out Guatemala's, Brazil's and Colombia's flagrant violations of the Convention on the Rights of the Child. For a government to order that homeless children be killed because they are seen as harmful to society is totally unacceptable to Canadians.

As a signatory to the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Canadian government must make every effort to ensure respect for the rights of children whatever their nationality and wherever they live. It is a matter of justice and human dignity.

MINISTER OF LABOUR

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, now we know what cynicism really is. After relentlessly condemning the federal government's interference in the health sector, and after strongly criticizing the national standards imposed by that same government, the Minister of Labour is now making an about face and claiming that Quebecers want national standards.

She says that the government must make sure that everyone can benefit from the social programs which give Canada its distinct character.

What irony. After defending the idea of Quebec as a distinct society, which implied the rejection of Canada–wide standards, the minister now claims to want to protect Canada's distinct society with these same standards.

This is mind boggling.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the more Ontarians learn about the Liberal gun control bill the more they oppose it. They oppose the bill because gun registration has never proven to decrease crime. It failed in New Zealand and Australia. They oppose the bill because it contains draconian search and seizure measures like those of a totalitarian state. They oppose the bill because the consultation process was non–existent at worst and haphazard at best. They oppose the bill because it will cost between $100 million and $500 million of scarce taxpayers' money. They oppose the bill because they want real reduction in crime and not a made in Ottawa solution that will not work.

If Ontario MPs fail to represent their constituents and oppose Bill C–68, the old saying about safety in numbers will fail to apply to Ontario's voice in Ottawa.

TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to pay tribute to the business and professional organizations of my riding that assembled recently in an attempt to explore opportunities to enhance democracy through the use of new technologies.

I have made a personal commitment to consultation in my riding and this initiative is another step in refining the process. The brainstorming session that took place covered all areas of technology with representatives from cable, computer, software, hardware, communications and telecommunications industries.

I anticipate great things as a result of the gathering with more access available to the public policy development process and a real economic development benefit to the high tech centre of Atlantic Canada, Fredericton, New Brunswick.

I thank everyone who came out and look forward to future developments as we continue to explore technological opportunities to our mutual advantage.

RECOMBINANT BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to understand why rBST is needed in Canada, a country that produces dairy products of the highest international quality.

The National Dairy Council of Canada is strongly opposed to rBST. It refers to it as being an unneeded and unwanted intrusion into its business that offers no benefits whatsoever to consumers and processors.

Dairy cows injected with rBST are at greater risk of developing mastitis, a condition requiring the use of antibiotics. This will increase the dumping and waste of milk and potentially can lead to increased levels of antibiotic residues in milk for antibiotics that escape current detection methods.

Some researchers are concerned with the possible link between rBST and human health risks. I urge Health Canada to extend the moratorium on rBST. By waiting until conclusive independent studies have been completed Health Canada will have protected the health of Canadians.

RESEARCH IN MOTION

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the House of the Canadian Advanced Technology Association 1995 Award of Distinction being awarded to Research in Motion of Waterloo.

The CATA award for outstanding product achievement was presented to RIM in recognition of its exceptional contribution to the growth and competitiveness of Canada's advanced technology industry. The award was presented to RIM at the Global Connections Conference on May 3 to May 5, 1995 in Calgary.

Research in Motion represents the best that Canada has to offer in the new economy. RIM is a 100 per cent Canadian owned, export oriented, high technology company operating in the wireless data communications sector.

RIM's CATA award is the second award given to a Waterloo company in as many years. Mortice Kerns Systems won the 1994 award for its Internet anywhere software which eases access to the Internet.

The federal riding of Waterloo is in the heart of Canada's technology triangle and is a critical mass for technological innovation. Research in Motion is to be congratulated for its achievements as a leading edge Canadian company competing in a global stadium and bringing home the gold.

PROGRAM FOR OLDER WORKER ADJUSTMENT

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, while Ottawa keeps procrastinating regarding the Program for Older Worker Adjustment, the Quebec government is taking concrete action. Yesterday, Quebec labour minister, Louise Harel, announced that her department would help older workers who are victims of mass layoffs but are not eligible to POWA.

For five years now, the Quebec government has been asking that the program be amended, since many older workers are not eligible because of criteria which are too restrictive. When they were in opposition, the federal Liberals strongly supported Quebec's claims. However, now that they are in office, they are not following up on their stance.

Once again, to ensure fair treatment to all Quebecers, the provincial government is forced to go ahead without federal financial support, in spite of the fact that Quebecers pay close to $30 billion in taxes every year.

TRANS–CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the prairie provinces 113 kilometres of Trans–Canada Highway from Gull Lake, Saskatchewan, to the Alberta border is still two lanes. In the last 15 years that stretch of winding hilly goat paths has claimed 23 lives and 320 people have been injured.

Twinning would cost $35 million. Last fall Saskatchewan had its money on the table but Transport Canada would not pony up its share.

• (1405)

Each year the federal government collects $5 billion in road fuel taxes and puts only 10 per cent of it back into the national highway system. There seems to be no limit to funds for hockey rinks, swimming pools and silly bureaucratic projects like universal firearms registration but nothing for this long overdue investment in essential infrastructure, an investment that would save lives.

Priorities, boys and girls, priorities.

BILL C–72

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again Henri Daviault, the man charged with sexual assault of an elderly disabled woman, was acquitted by using drunkenness as a defence.

After consuming an enormous amount of alcohol this man dragged the victim out of her wheelchair and sexually assaulted her. Despite the fact that the crime was committed, the courts determined that Mr. Daviault was too drunk to know what he was doing.

His acquittal has rightfully angered many Canadians. I have received a petition of several hundred names from the Sexual assault crisis centre of Chatham–Kent. Every signature demonstrates the frustration with the justice system and proves that Bill C–72 is needed and applauded by many.

Each time Mr. Daviault was acquitted of this hideous crime the dissenting judges commented that Parliament was free to deal with the matter of intoxication and criminal fault. That is exactly what the government is doing.

I rise in support of the bill and hope its passage will help in strengthening our justice system.

PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S NETWORK

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in Etobicoke—Lakeshore many women from diverse business backgrounds have come together to establish a network to help women in business.

The Professional Women's Network will provide a much needed forum for local business development and for the needs of professional and business women. These women representing a broad representation of professions will meet regularly to exchange ideas, share information, and work together to create opportunities for each other and for our community.

The growing prominence of women in professions and other sectors has proven to be a major factor in Canada's future growth, and the Professional Women's Network in Etobicoke—Lakeshore is testament to that fact.

The Liberal government recognizes the women of Canada have the imagination and determination to participate fully in the growing world economy. I support, commend and encourage the ingenuity of these and all women across Canada.

ONTARIO ELECTION

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we all know, Ontario voters will soon elect a new provincial government. By most accounts it will be a Lyn McLeod led Liberal government. I say it is about time.

Soon after the campaign started the Lyn McLeod Liberals released their plan to get Ontario back on track. York University economist Fred Lazar said:

> I have had a chance to review the assumptions and the numbers in the Liberal balanced budget plan. This plan to balance Ontario's budget in four years while providing stable multi–year funding to the transfer partners in health, education and the municipalities is a realistic doable approach to re–establishing fiscal responsibility in Ontario. A balanced budget is key to creating a healthy economic climate that will in turn stimulate investment and bring jobs to Ontario.
> Only a plan that aims to balance a budget within the term of a government can be considered to be a balanced budget plan.

Ontario needs a new provincial government; it needs a Liberal government led by Lyn McLeod.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Foreign Affairs has announced that Canada is preparing to start trading with certain countries regardless of their human rights violations. According to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the liberalization of trade is the best means of promoting the respect of human rights.

These words will be of no comfort to those on death row in Indonesia, China, Saudi Arabia, Burma and Iraq. The most ironic thing about the whole situation is that the Liberal government, with the Prime Minister showing the way, is so happy with this development that it is actually bragging about it. Money has no smell. As for the Liberal government, it has no scruples. It has traded them in for several million greenbacks.

HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development cannot even get a piece of legislation past his own cabinet colleagues.

• (1410)

Every day another article appears stating that the grand schemes proposed by the minister last year have been scrapped. His own discussion papers on unemployment insurance state that 26 per cent of UI claimants have filed four or more claims in the last five years. First he says this is a serious problem that needs to be addressed, and now he is saying it is not a problem and does not need to be addressed. The minister just cannot seem to make up his mind.

Today the minister is reported to have said that the social reform proposals have had to take a backseat to cutting the federal deficit. Reducing the number of repeat users of unemployment insurance would help cut the federal deficit, and still he will not implement the needed reforms.

If the minister cannot make the tough decisions, he should turn the administration of UI over to the workers and the employers who pay the premiums. The minister flails and fails again.

WORLD KITE FESTIVAL

Mr. Raymond Lavigne (Verdun—Saint–Paul, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when I think of kites, I think of the sheets of newspaper which children used to glue to slats of wood and then try to send up into the sky. Recently, my eyes, and those of hundreds of thousands of other people, were opened.

In 1993, the municipality of Verdun inaugurated the world kite festival. Since then, some 20 countries have begun coming to the event in Verdun to compete and to show off their talent. Each year during the festival, the sky is filled with kites of all colours and of all imaginable forms. Last year, the festival won Quebec's award for tourism—the Meritas prize.

I invite all of you, and your families, to come to the world kite festival which will be held in my beautiful riding of Verdun—Saint–Paul from June 1 to June 4. We promise you a good time and a show that you will not easily forget.

QUEBEC FINANCE MINISTER'S BUDGET

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with or without sovereignty, taxes will go up next year, said Jean Campeau, according to today's headline in La Presse.

Quebecers do not want taxes to go up, no matter who collects them. They want a responsible finance minister, someone who, like his federal counterpart and those in several provinces across Canada, works hard to reduce spending and the deficit without raising taxes.

The Canadian government has reviewed all government programs and proposed measures to reduce spending and the deficit. Its approach was logical, involving a great deal of consultation and skill and none of this rushing around to close down hospitals, for instance.

Quebec's budget is important to all Quebecers. The Government of Quebec should be less independent and listen to Quebecers.

NIAGARA DISTRICT AIRPORT

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago the member of Parliament for Niagara Falls and I attended a ceremony initiating the transfer of the Niagara District Airport from the federal government to local authorities.

Local authorities in St. Catharines, Thorold, Niagara Falls and Niagara–on–the–Lake have been working together toward the transfer for quite some time. The national airports policy announced by the transport minister last summer provided a perfect opportunity to make the transfer a reality.

Local control of the airport will provide a more hands on approach where local stakeholders can be directly involved in airport responsibilities. The transfer will enable the airport to run in a cost effective and competitive manner and be better equipped to respond quickly to local commercial opportunities.

We thank the Minister of Transport and his officials for a smooth transition.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister of Indian affairs will soon table a policy on inherent right to self–government. This is a significant departure from past government policies.

Despite red book promises to consult with aboriginal peoples on the inherent rights policy, we now see Indian and Metis leaders demanding that the minister go public with his document. I agree. All Canadians have a right to know what the minister is contemplating. This will affect future political relations between aboriginal and non–aboriginal Canadians forever.

The Minister of Justice has shown he does not understand what consultation means with his gun bill. Now we hear that the minister of Indian affairs is imitating his colleague and has a secret draft policy that may also have considerable constitutional ramifications. Native leaders do not think they have been adequately consulted, let alone the rest of the Canadian people.

While meeting the needs of aboriginal communities I believe any inherent rights policy must respect the principle of equality for all Canadians.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at a meeting with his Quebec counterpart who came to Ottawa with three bills for a total amount of $333 million, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs once again refused to meet his financial commitments. The minister even told Quebec, in no uncertain terms, to take the matter to court.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Are we to understand from the arrogant reply of his intergovernmental affairs minister that this is the new flexible federalism: asking Quebec to sue for payment of accounts in arrears?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the reply the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs gave yesterday was quite satisfactory. One aspect of the problem is being checked by the auditor general. Another aspect is being checked again. If there were any mistakes, we can correct them, but for the time being, we have no information to that effect.

As for the third matter, when determining payments to the provinces, the Minister of Finance does this according to formulas that are in the legislation. There is no flexibility, and if someone thinks the law was not interpreted as it should be, then that person should, and there are precedents for this, ask the courts to intervene.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is the same kind of answer we got for months to requests for reimbursement of referendum costs.

Mr. Loubier: Exactly the same.

Mr. Bouchard: Ottawa has been particularly stubborn in the case of the cost of educating young aboriginal people, which amounted to $119 million, payment of which has been outstanding for eight years. As you know, this amount is payable under the James Bay Agreement signed by Ottawa in 1968.

I want to ask the Prime Minister to explain why, considering these delays and dilatory measures, the only offer he will let his minister make to his Quebec counterpart is to appoint a new committee of officials that will conduct more meetings.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the James Bay Agreement contains a section indicating the province and the federal government must agree on budgets and their content.

In this case, the Province of Quebec refused to fulfil its part of the agreement. It did not give the federal government a chance to check assets and the number of non–natives among the student population. Consequently, we had no way of knowing what the federal government's share actually was.

During that time we paid $464 million for aboriginal education. During that time, and in fact quite recently, we offered to review the matter with the Quebec government in an attempt to clear up this problem, and the ball is now in the court of the Parti Quebecois.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the minister wanted to know more about the case, he could talk to his colleague, the Minister of Labour, who used to be the Minister of Education responsible for this matter in Quebec City and as such filed claims that have gone unpaid for years.

Mr. Loubier: Times have changed. She sold out.

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, it is not true that the Government of Quebec refused to provide the information. The fact is, more young aboriginal people are getting an education as a result of social measures introduced by the Quebec government, and the federal government, which finds this surprising, refuses to acknowledge this development.

Mr. Loubier: Yes, tell it like it is.

Mr. Bouchard: My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Since the Quebec minister suggested to her federal counterpart that they leave their officials at home and sit down like two reasonable people and deal with the issue face to face, could the Prime Minister instruct his minister to sit down and negotiate and settle this immediately?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that both the Province of Quebec and the federal government will have to review the case and again establish what the facts are. It is clear the Province of Quebec must co–operate and give us the information.

In this particular case, the federal government made it clear that it was ready to negotiate, but the Quebec government has yet to provide the necessary information.

HUMAN RESOURCES INVESTMENT FUND

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Bill C–76, which implements provisions of the budget, contains no provision on the human resources investment fund announced in the budget. The latest ministerial overview, an official document of the Department of Human Resources Development, indicates this fund will have a budget of more than $4 billion, at least $2 billion of which come from the unemployment insurance fund.

Would the Prime Minister confirm that the human resources investment fund will have a budget of $4 billion, financed in large part by the unemployment insurance fund, to enable it to interfere further with new manpower training, income supplement and day care service initiatives?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is becoming more and more frequent for the hon. member to confuse numbers. I would not suggest she is doing it deliberately.

The hon. member knows quite well it has been explained that the human resource investment fund has a way of consolidating a number of existing expenditures so we can begin to provide a much more effective delivery in a decentralized community way. It gives our employment centres much more discretion, much more accountability to make decisions at the local level, working in partnership with their counterparts at the provincial, municipal and community levels.

To again try to elevate it into another wild attack about interventionism misses the whole point. It is really designed to give a lot more control in the local and regional community to make decisions about how to get back to work.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the central government does not have jurisdiction in these areas.

Are we to understand that, with this human resources investment fund, the minister is attempting to carry out the reform of social programs he has been unable to finalize up to now because of nationwide condemnation, and that, far from responding to the demands of Quebec, he intends to intervene further, thus adding to existing waste and muddle in the area of manpower training?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, almost a year ago I made a specific set of offers to all the provinces to share a number of our manpower programs. We would turn over institutional training and invite the provinces to join with us in the planning of programs we have in common and that we would transfer existing programs.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on April 24, the director general of public affairs for national defence, Ruth Cardinal, addressed a meeting of the Media Club of Canada. She emphasized that she would tell them what is really happening in the military.

Ms. Cardinal went on to imply that the suicide rate in the armed forces was acceptable because we get our recruits from the most susceptible portion of the population and that the airborne videos came from ex–soldiers who needed cash because they had blown their pay cheques on Camaros. These are remarkable statements to be made by the defence department's senior mouthpiece.

Does the Minister of National Defence agree that these comments are completely inappropriate, and does he still have full confidence in his director general of public affairs?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, certainly the comments that have been publicized on television and have come to my attention are disturbing. It is a matter that the deputy minister of national defence is looking into at the moment.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Ms. Cardinal was hired for her present position by Bob Fowler, the former deputy minister of defence, who has been under investigation by the Somalia inquiry.

In her speech to the Media Club she went out of her way to discredit one of the principal critics of what went on in Somalia, Dr. Barry Armstrong, saying that his story did not have credence and that he had been proven wrong by an independent group of investigators. The validity of Dr. Armstrong's testimony is to be independently judged by the Somalia inquiry, not prejudged by a DND spin doctor hired by Bob Fowler.

Why does the Minister of National Defence allow his director general of public affairs to make any public statements on the Somalia inquiry when she has a potential conflict of interest with respect to the issues and the individuals to be judged by that inquiry?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I agreed with that very point when it was raised last Friday. Any employee of the Department of National Defence should be very cautious in what he or she says, publicly or privately, with respect to matters which are now before the commission. We do not want anything to be said by anyone in a position of authority to give the impression that there would be some kind of prejudicing of the inquiry.

I also note that the individual in question, the director general of public affairs, won a public service competition for the post.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, what is really at issue is the minister's ability or inability to manage his department. The minister was the last to know about the airborne videos. He was the last to know about the high suicide rate at Valcartier. Now we have the department's senior mouthpiece attempting to bias media coverage of the Somalia inquiry in direct disregard of the minister's gag order concerning that inquiry.

When will the Minister of National Defence start to exercise the leadership of his department which Canadians deserve and expect?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if there was ever a rhetorical question that was it. Considering the amount of controversy we have had in the last year and a half, I feel quite comfortable in the leadership I have given to the department.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Collenette: However, I will let other Canadians be the judge of that.

I would like to repeat that the comments which have been brought to my attention are disturbing. They are being looked at by the deputy minister. As to any action that may be taken, I will have to inform the House at a later date.

AGUSTA

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The government is preparing to compensate the firm Agusta. After cancelling the contract to purchase nearly $6 billion worth of EH–101 helicopters, the Prime Minister stated, a few days after his election, and I quote:

[English]

"The program is cancelled and there isn't any compensation for anybody".

His Minister of Public Works reaffirmed yesterday the government's intention to conclude an agreement with Agusta.

How can the Prime Minister allow his government to pay compensation to Agusta from public funds, without any investigation into this $6 billion contract to purchase EH–101 helicopters, when Agusta is currently facing charges of corruption and influence peddling in Italy and Belgium?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is the third or fourth time that members of the opposition have raised this issue. Unfortunately I am going to have to give the same answer to the hon. member.

The hon. member is making reference to "no compensation for anybody", a phrase which was used by the Prime Minister. However the Prime Minister went on to promise that his ministers involved in those talks would ensure that we "pay not a cent more than we are absolutely required to pay".

What we are doing under the contract which we signed with that company is paying termination costs, which every government must pay. That is not pay for future work, that is payment for work which has been completed or which was being completed upon termination.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the government is clearly going to compensate Agusta. Therefore, if he will not refuse to compensate Agusta without an investigation first, will the Prime Minister at least guarantee, unlike his Minister of Public Works yesterday, that no new contracts for the purchase of helicopters are awarded to Agusta as a form of compensation for the cancellation of the first contract?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what the minister has just said is correct. I have said it and I repeat it: the government has a contractual obligation for expenses incurred up to that point, which we must fulfil. There will, however, be no compensation for loss of profit or for future work.

If we eventually have to buy new helicopters, no preference will be given to anybody. We will follow the usual procedures in order to obtain the best product at the best price.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

The director general of public affairs, Ms. Cardinal, has left the perception that her comments to the Media Club represent the views of the Department of National Defence senior management team. The problem is greater than one person's irresponsible comments and points to the leadership culture at the Department of National Defence which shows ignorance of Canada's frontline soldiers. There is no respect for the minister's authority at the senior management level at DND.

What does the minister intend to do to gain control over his department?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the specific allegation the hon. member raised, I answered that question Friday. I answered it yesterday and I answered it again today.

Some disturbing comments have come to light as a result of a speech given by the director general of public affairs. The deputy minister is looking into it. If I have any further announcement on any action that may be taken, it will be made to the House in due course.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, surely the minister must understand it is all well and good that the deputy minister is looking into it but the Minister of National Defence is responsible for this.

The problem is deeper than Ms. Cardinal's speech. These are the views of senior management at DND. The director general of public affairs does not speak off the record. She is responsible for disseminating national defence positions and policies.

What action will the minister take with respect to his supervision with his entire senior management team at DND?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fact that the deputy minister will be looking into this shows that there will be some action taken.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

All federal public servants have had their wages frozen for several years. In his latest report, the auditor general reveals that, since 1993, diplomats have been allowed to cash in their plane tickets to and from Ottawa to pay for vacations anywhere in the world, without even having to submit vouchers.

How does the President of the Treasury Board justify this 1993 directive, which nets Canadian diplomats posted overseas $8.4 million a year, or about $5,000 tax free per person?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should understand that the auditor general's criticisms had to do with a former procedure that has since been completely corrected.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, despite the reduction in the number of diplomats posted overseas, the total cost of their vacations, paid for by taxpayers, continues to increase at the rate of 9 per cent a year.

Can the President of the Treasury Board tell us why public officials posted overseas can enjoy all–expenses–paid vacations in an era of budget cuts?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would have appreciated it if the hon. member had at least listened to the answer I gave him. He refers to a situation that no longer exists. I cannot understand why he continues to claim that we give preferential treatment to some public officials when this practice has stopped.

ETHICS COUNSELLOR

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The auditor general's report reveals that an astonishing 58 per cent of public servants are unaware of the federal government's conflict of interest policy. The auditor general also noted that the best conflict of interest guidelines are useless without leadership from the top, the cabinet.

When will the Prime Minister take the initiative to lead by example and prove that he has nothing to hide by appointing an independent ethics counsellor?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are some very strict guidelines for conflict of interest for everyone in the ministry and in the public service. The senior people in the departments are responsible for those guidelines. There is an ethics counsellor who is consulted on any problem and he reports to me. I am responsible to Parliament for any and all mistakes made and I have never run away from my responsibilities.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the ethics counsellor has given an investigation on very, very few matters of substantive importance.

The Liberal red ink book promises an independent ethics counsellor. The Reform Party has repeatedly called for an independent ethics counsellor. Seven of ten provinces have independent persons in this role. Now Gregory Evans, the independent conflict of interest commissioner in Ontario, is calling on the federal government to appoint an independent ethics counsellor.

What is the government hiding? Why does the Prime Minister insist on keeping the ethics counsellor totally accountable to him?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the ethics counsellor will be invited to meet with a committee of this House if required. However, in his daily operations he has to be responsible to somebody so he is responsible to us. One of the reasons we have acted this way is because we did not want to have a multiplication of jobs. He has other responsibilities and we gave him this new responsibility. He is doing a good job.

In the end, no Prime Minister can get up in the House and say he is not responsible and that somebody else is. In this parliamentary system the government is responsible and the head of the government is responsible for the actions of all the government in front of this House, nobody else.

TAINTED BLOOD

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The Minister of Health has refused to take a clear and definite stand on the need to press criminal charges, once the Krever inquiry is over, against those individuals whose carelessness caused the death of hundreds of men, women and children.

Since the Minister of Health failed to take a stand on this issue, does the Minister of Justice undertake to see that justice is served and that, once the Krever inquiry is over, charges are laid against those whose behaviour caused the death of hundreds of haemophiliacs?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is really an insulting question, considering how much the government is spending to get to the bottom of this, by holding a judicial inquiry. Before we can take position on the inquiry, we have to wait for its findings.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Justice.

Will the minister admit that the information disclosed to the Krever commission so far is sufficiently incriminating to justify pressing criminal charges against those individuals whose irresponsible behaviour led to the tainted blood tragedy?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, however one might characterize the evidence before the Krever inquiry with respect to alleged wrongdoing, in the final analysis the decision whether to proceed with criminal prosecution is up to the provincial authorities. In the circumstances, since it is not a matter for the federal government to initiate, it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the strength of any such suggested charges.

FISHERIES

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Mr. Abbott: Another surprise.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Culbert: Mr. Speaker, the alligators are restless this afternoon.

The minister's department has proposed the professionalization of the fishing industry and an increase in licensing fees. My Bay of Fundy fishers depend on a multi–licence fishery to sustain their economy. They are concerned with these proposals.

Will the minister confirm in the House today that his department will seek advice and guidance from the fishing community and industry organizations before proceeding with these initiatives?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for his question. Of course, with 31 of the 32 members from Atlantic Canada on this side of the House aware that the fishery is not finished, proper consultation is the order of the day in terms of dealing with the fishermen of Atlantic Canada.

I want to assure the member and all members from Atlantic Canada, including the one on that side of the House, that when it comes to any new fee structure, cost recovery structure or professionalization structure within the fishery in Atlantic Canada, consultations will begin in the region with the fishermen themselves. The process will be driven from the ground up, not from the top down. The process will start at the end of this month.

HIGHWAYS

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure Atlantic Canada can afford 31 members on that side of the House.

For instance, the ethical high ground is nowhere to be found on the death valley highway of Wentworth Bypass in Nova Scotia. The mayor of Amherst says if this case was not found to be legally wrong, "I would certainly consider it morally wrong". This boondoggle will cost some companies upward of $400,000 annually, just so the minister of public works can buy some boats in his riding.

Since the questions of morality, fairness and ethics are being raised not only by the Reform Party but indeed by the people who live and some people who have died on this treacherous stretch of the highway, even some guy from the fifth party—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Colleagues, I would encourage all of us to not personalize our remarks. I would ask the hon. member to please come to his question.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): My question is for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister admit now that the only way to clear this up is to assign the ethics counsellor to investigate this issue and report back to this House?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is always edifying to all members of the House to have the hon. member report on the voices he has been listening to.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Young: The question raised by the hon. member has been raised on a number of occasions. I want to repeat that the decisions with respect to highway construction in the provinces are the responsibility of the provinces.

The minister of transportation for the province of Nova Scotia approached us. He asked us if we were prepared to review the arrangements with the province of Nova Scotia with respect to allocations of federal funds for highway construction. We did that.

We have done the same thing with others. As a matter of fact, this week I met with the minister of transportation for Newfoundland to do exactly the same thing. We have done the same thing in Prince Edward Island. We have done the same thing in New Brunswick. We will do the same thing in any province in the country because we want to be flexible. We want to try to accommodate provinces that have the responsibility for deciding where highways are constructed within their jurisdiction.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is strange that the Liberals stand up and justify it when the auditor general of Nova Scotia is critcizing them for it.

The Prime Minister just said he never runs away from his responsibilities. I would like to ask him this question. I would like to know why he steadfastly refuses to let his ethics lapdog look into anything that may be potentially—

• (1445)

The Speaker: I am sure we sometimes get carried away in our questions. I wonder if the hon. member would consider withdrawing the word "lapdog" at this juncture. I find it a little offensive.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I will withdraw that. I would still like the answer to my question.

The Speaker: I put it to the hon. member: Would he please simply withdraw the word "lapdog", yes or no?

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised at what they used to call the new way of doing politics.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I have to tell members that the answer given by the Minister of Transport was very clear. We do indeed respect the provincial jurisdictions.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. On May 13, the daily La Presse reported that several dairy producers were illegally using the growth hormone somatotropin, which they import from the U.S. Most of the stakeholders, including the Quebec federation of dairy producers, recognize that this is common practice.

Can the Minister of Agriculture tell us which concrete measure he took to ensure that dairy producers comply with the moratorium in effect?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad for the last part of the hon. member's question, which would tend to indicate that the manufacturers of the product who have agreed to the moratorium are complying with the moratorium.

The questions that have been raised in the press appear to relate not to the companies but to the potentially unauthorized use of this product by certain individuals. Since those news stories have arisen in the last several days, I have asked my officials to investigate those allegations to determine whether or not any rules, regulations, or laws of the Government of Canada are being violated in any way. When I have their report on their investigation, I will be happy to share that with the hon. gentleman.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Agriculture recognize that his moratorium is totally useless, since there is no control over the destination and use of somatotropin once it has gone through Customs at the border, thus creating a situation which could bring a very promising Canadian industry into disrepute?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): As the hon. gentleman knows, under the existing law of Canada, unless and until the Department of Health has issued a notice of compliance—which has not occurred to date, because the Department of Health is still examining the issue and has not come to a decision—and comes to a decision that is favourable and notice of compliance is issued in due course, then the sale of rBST in Canada is illegal. We have undertaken to investigate allegations of its use presently unauthorized in Canada. We will report the findings of the investigation when they are available.

• (1450)

I want to assure the hon. gentlemen that I and many members on the government side share his concern about the health and strength of the Canadian dairy industry. We are anxious to do everything we can.

CHILD–PROOF LIGHTERS

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

The 75–day allotted period for public comment on the draft regulations requiring cigarette lighters to be equipped with child–resistant safety locks has been complied with following publication in part I of the Canada Gazette. Canadians applaud this government initiative.

When will the new regulations come into force? And can the minister assure Canadians that retailers will have to remove from their shelves at that time, not one day later, all remaining cigarette lighters that are a danger to children?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the regulations banning non–child–proof disposable lighters will come into effect in the middle of June. Yes, not one day's grace will be given to any retailer in terms of the disposal of these unsafe lighters.

It is a pity that the regulatory process has taken so much time to come forward and bring in the regulations. In the time it has taken, already more children have lost their lives. I would ask the retailers, as much as possible, to get rid of those particular lighters today, because as of the middle of June they will be illegal.

CONTRACTING GUIDELINES

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Parkins communication recently won a media monitoring contract worth $15,000 a month from Canada Communications Group. Yet the company failed to meet the mandatory requirements for the contract, including demonstrated experience, quality control, or an office in the capital region. They did not even have a listed telephone number.

The contract was issued mainly because Parkins agreed to hire contract workers from CCG, the very firm that awarded the contract. That is an obvious conflict of interest.

Why has the government chosen to ignore its own contracting guidelines in awarding this contract?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yes, the hon. member is quite correct. A contract was awarded on January 24, 1995. The hon. member forgot to tell the House that six proposals were received and this one was selected.

We did have a file review by an internal audit group. The review indicated there were no irregularities in the contracting process. I would suggest that if the hon. member has evidence to the contrary he should share the evidence with members of the House so we could have a thorough investigation.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I did list a few of the problems with the contract. The contractor was not qualified. He did not meet the mandatory requirements. He should not even have been considered for the contract.

He had an audit done, of course within his own department. An independent audit, which is like an independent ethics counsellor, something the government has trouble with, should be considered when there is this type of contract, an obvious conflict of interest.

Will the government at least release the inside audit so we can all have a look at it and perhaps reopen the bidding process?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the House should be aware that the hon. member is basing these allegations on a very reputable source he has been able to come up with in the last number of weeks. That source, of course, is Frank magazine.

I want to suggest to the hon. member that my department does in excess of 350,000 contracts a year, and at any given time there will be a number of individuals who are not very pleased with the fact that they have not won a contract. Six proposals were submitted and this one was selected based upon the best value for the taxpayer's dollar.

I think the particular awarding of the contract has been done appropriately, and the investigations I have been able to come up with confirm that. However, if the hon. member does have something substantive, other than references to Frank magazine, I suggest he put up, or he knows what he should do—shut up.

SEGA COMPANY OF JAPAN

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on January 13, the CRTC issued a new exemption order concerning the Japanese company SEGA, which is about to offer its video game service on cable television. Yet, the CRTC admitted that this was a broadcast service.

Given the consequences of the exemption order granted to the Japanese company SEGA, can the Minister of Industry tell us if his government intends to set up a working group to review that decision, as was done in the case of Power DirecTv?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take note the question. I will provide an answer to the hon. member as soon as I get it.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the minister's answer, I would like to know if, in the event that a working group is set up to review the exemption, the minister will pledge that the committee will hold public hearings, so that all those who want to express their views on this issue will be able to do so?

The Speaker: I am sorry, but since this is a hypothetical question, it cannot be allowed.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have been told that the Minister of Justice did not consult adequately with the governments of the three prairie provinces or the two territories regarding Bill C–68 and that he did not adequately consult with the James Bay Cree, the Council for Yukon Indians, or the Métis. Last night we were told by Chief Mercredi that the minister absolutely did not consult with the Assembly of First Nations.

I ask the Minister of Justice, did he or did he not consult with the Assembly of First Nations on Bill C–68?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, for the last 12 months the Department of Justice and in fact this minister personally have done little else except consult with respect to firearms legislation.

The fact is that there are some, perhaps including the hon. member, who define consultation as doing exactly what they think we ought to do.

The legislation we have put before the House reflects the broad and careful consultation with the wide variety of interests on this topic. The work of the committee, which is now under way and to which the member contributes as an active and hard–working member, is completing that process of listening carefully to the views of Canadians on these important matters.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many times we have to ask the justice minister for a straightforward answer to a straightforward question.

On November 30, 1994, the Minister of Justice, while tabling the proposals to Bill C–68, said "Let me make it very clear, the process of consultation leading to legislation is now over". That was back in November.

I ask the Minister of Justice one more time: Inasmuch as he has failed to adequately consult the Yukon Indians, the James Bay Cree, or the First Nations in the prescribed manner, how can he say he has not violated the constitutional rights of these people?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the very fact that those groups are now before the committee expressing their views with respect to the proposed legislation is proof positive that their perspective is being taken into account.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member in opposing this legislation is merely illustrating the inconsistencies in their position. This is the party of law and order that will not do as the police chiefs and the police associations want. This is the party that wants to reflect the views of the people and will not pay attention to polls in their own province showing widespread support for this legislation.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister concerning the disgusting and irresponsible diversion of public funds by the minister of public works for a highway called "death valley" where more than 40 people have died over the last nine years so that he could pave a tourist trail in his own riding.

The Minister of Transport twice said this was a decision made by the provincial government. I have in my hand the agreement signed by both governments which says clearly both governments must approve any such project or deal. Why is the Minister of Transport misrepresenting the facts?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I will permit the Minister of Transport to answer the question but I remind hon. members we are skirting awfully close to unparliamentary language in this question period.

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I welcome all the members of the fifth party to the House of Commons.

To make sure the hon. member understands this, the death highway he refers to was there during the nine years in which he was a member of government travelling to Nova Scotia. It has not changed in a year from the condition it was in eight years ago, seven years ago, six years ago, five years ago and so on.

The one thing we want to make sure of, which the hon. member should realize, is that it is quite true that by consensus funds are reallocated for highway construction. The difference is when the Government of Nova Scotia requested it we did consent, we did not hold it up the way he and his colleagues used to do when they were in government.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during question period in response to a question I asked of the minister of public works, he suggested I should find it in my heart to shut up. I do not know what the minister expects me to do. I have to ask questions of the government. I do not think it is very parliamentary to ask another member to shut up.

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not unparliamentary and if the hon. member finds the tone somewhat offensive I would gladly apologise to the hon. member. Perhaps the next time he might want to select a different source.

The Speaker: I suggest, with all respect to all hon. members, you give the Chair enough latitude to decide that which is parliamentary or unparliamentary.

I hope we would think very seriously about the words we are using because some of them are inflammatory. Today I found we were coming pretty close to the line of unparliamentary language. I appeal to you to please be very judicious in your choice of words.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, you called into question today my use of the word lapdog. I have found we have used this descriptive word in the House 32 times already in this Parliament. It is not on the list of unparliamentary language.

The Speaker: Earlier in the session the hon. member for Winnipeg South raised a point of order about the use of a word in Parliament. At that time I explained to the hon. member and to the House that there is no word which in and of itself is unparliamentary. We cannot use the word "liar" in describing each other but if we are using it in a sentence sometimes the word can be used.

The chair is always left with the decision as to what is parliamentary and what is unparliamentary many times from the tone of the word, many times in the context in which it was used.

Again I appeal to all members, as I did in past days, that the decisions I make are hopefully for the proper functioning of the House. Today I asked the hon. member to withdraw a word he used. He was very gracious in doing so and I thank him for it. I would like to let that point sit. I found it offensive today and I have made the ruling.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, at the GATT negotiations in Geneva, dairy producers were taken on a roller coaster ride, especially in relation to the talks on article XI, and the talks on whether the supply management system should be preserved were far from reassuring.

The new accord to be implemented following the conclusion of this round of GATT negotiations will force the farming sector to rapidly adapt to a new economic environment.

Dairy producers in particular are facing an enormous challenge. By virtue of the GATT's definition of an export subsidy, NAFTA will force dairy producers to do away with their system of export levies by August 1, 1995, that is, in two and a half months.

• (1510)

Bill C–86 amends the Canadian Dairy Commission Act in order to resolve the problem of export subsidies. I would like to mention that the commission's chairman is Mr. Prégent. In particular, this bill would implement a national pooling system of market returns which would be used to promote the export of dairy products.

Currently, producers pay a levy of some $3 per hectolitre of industrial milk, which is used mostly to make butter and powdered skim milk for export. This levy which was labelled under the GATT and NAFTA as an export subsidy, even though it is paid by the producers and not by the government, is justified because the levy is paid at source, like the Rand formula for unionized workers, as I was explaining to my colleague from Lévis earlier. Union dues are deducted from wages. In this case, the Quebec federation of dairy producers takes $3 for each hectolitre from the farmer's pay. Because it is a deduction at source, NAFTA and the GATT consider it a direct export subsidy, and, as of next August 1, it will no longer be permitted.

Therefore, the pooling allowed under Bill C–86 will be consistent with the international agreements and will permit dairy producers to keep the advantages of the existing system. In 14 and a half months, there will be a single milk pool for all of Canada. In other words, on August 1, 1996 all that will matter is that it is milk, not that it is unprocessed or industrial milk.

The hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi will find that it will not matter whether the cows were Holsteins, Ayershires or Jerseys. The issue is milk, and milk alone. And to top it all off, there will be a single price. No longer will there be two prices, one for fluid milk and one for industrial milk.

We should, however, be aware that if the United States, which is only too ready to challenge, of late, decides to challenge this two price policy for milk, one for the domestic market and one for the international market, the dairy industry could be accused of dumping.

However, the United States, or whatever country feels it has been adversely affected, would have to prove that Canadian exports were prejudicial to its market. Since we do not export a lot, and since our exports are increasingly value added processed products, this proof could be very elusive.

Bill C–86 is the response of producers to the impact of new international rules on the dairy industry. Dairy producers have rolled up their sleeves and found ingenious solutions to their predicament. We in the Bloc Quebecois support Bill C–86 because it allows producers to adapt to the requirements of international trade agreements signed by Canada.

The main purpose of the bill is to replace export levies going into an export subsidization fund with the pooling of returns from the marketing of dairy products.

Since some provinces—such as Quebec—export more dairy products than others, the commission will ensure that each province's contribution to the export fund matches its percentage of quotas. That is fair. If Quebec produces 47.5 per cent of industrial milk, it will pay 47.5 per cent of the export fund. If Prince Edward Island produces 6 per cent, it will pay 6 per cent.

For once in this country, we will have ensured a process that is fair. It will be different from the research and development funding system, in which Quebec receives barely 17 or 18 per cent of the funds allocated to R and D every year. In this case, each province will pay according to its percentage of dairy production.

The pooling of revenues from the marketing of dairy products from every province will allow domestic producers to continue to share market risks equitably and to balance the costs of the system, as the levy system often did. For example, if Quebec produces 48 per cent, it will pay 48 per cent; if Prince Edward Island produces 12 per cent, it will pay 12 per cent, and so on.

As you can imagine, I am pleased to point out that this bill will also allow the commission to delegate its powers to provincial marketing boards and to receive in return any similar powers granted to provincial boards, since fluid milk presently comes under the provinces while the Canadian Dairy Commission's authority is restricted to industrial milk.

The bill provides for a delegation of powers between the commission and the provinces for the purpose of managing the pooled fund. In the absence of a signed agreement, the commission would administer the pool only for industrial milk.

I look at the Liberal members opposite and I think that they, as well as the Minister of Agriculture, who is here this afternoon, will understand. How can this be in a federal system variously described as renewed federalism, courtroom federalism or flexible federalism? Those who talk about courtroom federalism probably worked for the Barreau du Québec or some such organization and see in this an opportunity to line their pockets. As the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs told us again this afternoon: "If you are not happy, all you have to do is sue".

In a normal country, do we go to court every day, one part of the country suing the rest? That is this government's vision of Canada.

Fluid milk, the type we drink every day, comes under provincial jurisdiction, while industrial milk comes under federal jurisdiction, that is to say our jurisdiction, here, in Ottawa.

• (1520)

That is federalism for you: the same cow has to have two sets of udders, with the federal government drawing from the left side and the provincial government from the right. This agreement will help a little bit in correcting this distortion. I can see Liberal members laughing. They are laughing because they did not even know that industrial milk fell within their jurisdiction. One of them just woke up, poor him. He finally realized that reality in the legal world is quite different from the reality of agriculture.

These are the technical changes introduced by Bill C–86 regarding the Canadian Dairy Commission. It is interesting to note that the bill is put forward in a context where six provinces, namely Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, have signed an agreement in principle to pool their whole milk supply system.

I must say that, among the ten provinces, there is one exception and that is Newfoundland, because it has only fifty of so dairy producers, producing mainly fluid milk, which comes under provincial jurisdiction. So, Newfoundland is not a member of this consortium, leaving nine potential members.

The three Western provinces—Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia—have not joined the other six yet. Should they be called sovereignist provinces? Or secessionist, indépendantiste or even, as the Prime Minister says, separatist? I do not think so. These are elected people who want to properly manage government affairs, adequately represent their constituents, and also check with them to see if this is a good solution. I must say that, regardless of what happens, the six other provinces account for over 82 per cent of Canada's milk production.

Even if all the provinces keep their current quotas, there will only be one milk. There will no longer be any distinction made between industrial milk and fluid milk. Consequently, only one price will apply to milk across the country. The provinces will split the increases in quotas among themselves, and producers will be able to buy quotas from other provinces, which is a nice change.

A Quebec producer will be able to buy a quota in Ontario or in New Brunswick, and vice versa. Of course, there could be an increase in consumption if we help each other, if this government stops reducing subsidies to industrial milk producers, as it just did. The hon. member said that the Minister of Finance was not increasing taxes. What a naive statement on his part, given that the federal tax on gas has gone up half a cent per litre. And the member claims this is not a tax. Oh no, this is not a tax.

The government reduced its industrial milk subsidies by 30 per cent. This is not a tax. However, the cost of milk will increase and the government reduces its subsidies. But this is not a tax. Oh no. It is not a tax. Go and ask producers. Go to Lafaille's for example. I did go last Monday to the Lafaille and Sons' auction, in the riding of my friend, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, and I talked with some of my fellow farmers. Let me tell you that the minister should stay away, because if he went there—but he would not dare do that, of course—he would find out what farmers think of his budget.

Admittedly, it took some doing to conclude this agreement. It is the result of lengthy negotiations in which Quebec demonstrated commendable leadership. When the topic of grain and cereals comes up in the House, the West takes the lead role. But in this case, where for once a bill affects Quebec, I am sure you will not mind if I take a minute this afternoon to congratulate some of our own experts on their tireless efforts. I am thinking of the Quebec federation of dairy producers, its president, Claude Rivard, and its vice president, Jean Grégoire, as well as economist Guylaine Gosselin, the UPA milk expert.

I would also like to pay tribute to officials of the Quebec federation of dairy producers for their unremitting efforts throughout these negotiations. There is no doubt that our milk producers in Quebec are very well represented by their elected officials and by their union, the UPA.

I invite my Liberal colleagues to occasionally take a look at La terre de chez nous. They would find this weekly newspaper very instructive regarding the views of Quebec farmers and other questions. Speaking of the West, La Terre de chez nous carried an article this week about the Canadian milk pool, which threw out an invitation to Western indépendantistes, the three provinces that have not yet signed up: British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Despite their hesitation, the repercussions of this historic agreement may well be greater than first thought.

From a practical point of view, we need only mention that in 1996, Quebec dairy producers should see their income rise by 60 to 70 cents per hectolitre. Of course, 60 or 70 cents is not a fortune. It is an increase of a little over half a cent a litre, which has nothing to do with the increase they should have received, given the rise in the cost of living and the cut of the 30 per cent subsidy that the federal government is getting ready to implement on July 1. This increase of 60 to 70 cents per hectolitre results from the realignment of prices for industrial milk and unprocessed milk in Quebec and the prices of milk in the other provinces, since by 1996, there will be one national price for milk in Canada.

Because of the GATT, Canada will have to allow butter to be imported this year, which will probably affect quotas. But, with the pooling of all returns, the six provinces will share the impact of market fluctuations on all milk prices and no one province will be hit harder than any other.

What must be stressed is that this kind of agreement is based on the economy. It is the kind of agreement which maximizes the strong points of each and every member, who are all working together. Even with a referendum around the corner, producers from various provinces did not hesitate to collaborate with Quebec because it was in their best interests to do so. When we get down to reality, not hypothetical disaster scenarios, we see that the voice of reason prevails over political considerations.

In a document written by The Council for Canadian Unity, largely funded by the taxes paid by all Canadians, and in particular by Quebecers who are forced to pay for this kick in the behind, the council strongly suggests that the word "separation" be used, although the explanation it gives of the term in the glossary simply refers the reader to the definition of sovereignty.

And a few weeks ago, I saw that, regarding the separation of Quebec, the Prime Minister once again uttered the sentence that he just loves to repeat: "Does Quebec want to separate or not?" He knows very well that his only way of convincing people is by fearmongering.

Last week, when I was doing the rounds in my riding, I made a point of visiting—and I hope you did too, Madam Speaker, because I know you have a very special relationship with seniors and as you know, last week was national seniors homes' week—so I made a point of visiting the homes in my riding, and to my surprise, I found that more and more seniors support sovereignty for Quebec.

When I read in La Presse that the Premier of Quebec went to the Lower St. Lawrence, in the riding of the Quebec minister of agriculture, where at a home for seniors, he renewed the membership card of the oldest member of the Parti Quebecois on that member's one hundred and first birthday, I thought that was splendid.

This always reminds me of my elderly mother—unfortunately she passed away three years ago—who said she was going to vote for sovereignty because all her children were in favour of sovereignty. But she always added that this was the only weapon we have against their scare tactics. In fact, in a document the Council for Canadian Unity recommends using the term "separation", but they have a nerve, it is not even in the dictionary. According to them, with sovereignty Quebec would immediately lose—and this is just to scare our farmers—all its market quotas in Canada. According to them, it is unlikely that farmers in other provinces would agree to maintain those quotas. When I say them, I am referring to the Council for Canadian Unity, led by a bunch of dyed in the wool federalists who are biased and misrepresent the facts.

Does this mean that after making substantial changes in their operating procedures during this referendum year, producers outside Quebec would be so inconsistent as to drop the whole thing this fall? Madam Speaker, let us be reasonable. In business matters, farmers know which side their bread is buttered.

An hon. member: As they say: "Money talks".

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Indeed. This single milk pool which, as I said earlier, represents 82 per cent of milk production, was created not for the sake of any one group but because it makes sense, and the six provinces that are part of this agreement are in it because it works for them. And who knows, maybe this agreement will be the first of many to be negotiated between Canada and Quebec, after a positive response by Quebecers to the referendum this fall.

At a time when we must adjust to the new environment created by the GATT agreements, we should welcome this agreement wholeheartedly.

• (1535)

As the president of the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec, Laurent Pellerin, pointed out: "The day after the GATT agreements, the government reiterated its support for supply management on the condition that producers, and dairy producers in particular, collectively adapt their marketing tools". The ball is now in the federal government's court. Let us see whether it keeps its word on this.

Let us now take a closer look at Bill C–86, which was made necessary. As usual, the present federal government waits until the last minute before acting. This bill must pass all stages, receive Senate approval and be in force by August 1, 1995. If we do not count May, only June and July remain. Therefore we have to get on with it.

The aim of this bill is to adjust the famous $3 currently deducted on every hectolitre of industrial milk produced by dairy producers. This $3 levy, known as the export costs in the industry, will be illegal under international agreements as of August 1. This levy is vital, however, because, without this assistance to industrial milk processors, our exports would no longer be competitive, and we would not be able to compete with products from outside the country, which could flood the markets in Canada and Quebec, because our prices would be too high.

I have 40 minutes, Madam Speaker. Yes. I wonder if time does not go by faster on your watch than on mine.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): You had 30 minutes left when you started.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Madam Speaker, if I have only a minute left, I would like to remind you that, here in Ottawa, on May 2, 3 and 4 the representatives of nine provinces discussed matters in detail. Six of them subsequently made a three–point proposal to Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. If you permit me, I will read it to you.

The proposal to British Columbia was to pool industrial milk revenues on August 1, 1996. Fluid milk revenues would be added the following year, on August 1, 1997. The province would keep much of the future increases in fluid milk, because the population in British Columbia is the fastest growing in Canada.

Madam Speaker, I thank you very much for your attention. As I indicated to the Speaker before you, five of my colleagues will help me with Bill C–86. They are the hon. members for Champlain, Lotbinière—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would remind the hon. member that I have the list of his colleagues who will take part in the debate.

Debate continues with the hon. member for Vegreville.

[English]

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is with enthusiasm and some trepidation that I lead the debate for the Reform Party on the future of supply management and the dairy industry in Canada.

• (1540)

The enthusiasm comes from my belief that there could be and should be a bright future for supply management and particularly the dairy industry in Canada.

The trepidation I feel is for two reasons. First, if the changes in the dairy industry are handled poorly or badly everyone involved in the industry will suffer. Second, I have less of an understanding of the dairy industry than I do of many other areas of agriculture. I have been working hard with the help of dairy farmers and groups that deal with dairy farmers to improve my understanding and I will certainly continue to work on this.

Today we are debating Bill C–86, an act to amend the dairy commission act, but our debate must go beyond the bill to a discussion on the very future of supply management and the dairy industry.

I will debate the bill by summarizing it and how it will affect the dairy industry and discussing the future of the dairy business in Canada as I see it with input from farmers and groups I have talked to. I will do this by discussing Liberal policy on supply management from the red book and later added to the red book in an appendix. I will discuss it by talking about the Liberal position as presented from two other sources. I will refer to these sources later.

Bill C–86 is an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act. It was given first reading on April 28, 1995. The purpose of the bill is to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act to provide for a replacement of the existing system of levies with a system of pooling market returns from different classes of milk.

The government claims the switch to a pooling system will maintain equity among producers and is consistent with Canada's international trade agreement.

I have some background information. As part of Canada's system of supply management, the Canadian milk supply management committee, chaired by the Canadian Dairy Commission, oversees the application of the national milk marketing plan.

The CMSMC sets national production targets, establishes each province's share of the national quota and exports any surplus milk through planned marketing programs. The orderly export of surplus production is an essential element for ensuring the integrity of the supply managed system. Without it the system would falter.

Currently producers assume the cost of exporting dairy products not consumed in Canada through a system of levies collected by provincial marketing boards and agencies as deductions from payments to milk producers. Once remitted to the commission these levies are used to finance special programs intended to increase the domestic use of dairy products and to cover the commission's administrative costs.

During the 1993–94 year a total of $141.5 million was collected from the industrial and fluid milk sectors. Such levies, however, are now considered to be a form of export subsidy under the new GATT deal and must be reduced or modified.

Through the bill Canada's dairy industry would abandon this established system of producer levies on industrial milk. The levies will be replaced with a system of national pooling which allows all stakeholders, including farmers, processors and the commission, to equitably share the costs and benefits of pooling revenues and the effects of fluctuations in market size for both fluid and industrial milk.

Through a system of pooling the producers who export milk into the U.S. would receive smaller returns for their milk but the burden would still be shared by all dairy farmers. Basically instead of a levy taken off farmers' cheques to subsidize exports, the national pool would achieve the same ends since the net return to farmers would be in theory identical.

For its part the processing industry would still pay lower prices for its industrial milk. These amendments to the Canadian Dairy Commission Act add a certain amount of new pricing and funding distribution authority to the Canadian Dairy Commission. The new pricing and pooling approach for milk has received agreement from all provinces in principle. However, negotiations are ongoing as to whether there will be one national pool, which at the moment appears very unlikely, or two separate pools. There would possibly be one for B.C., Alberta and Saskatchewan, and we do not know about Newfoundland, and another for the other six provinces.

Ontario dairy farmers supply most of the industrial milk to further processors and Quebec dairy farmers are the biggest exporters. They would receive less than other dairy farmers unless there is some form of national pooling. On the other hand, under a national pooling system producers in the other non–exporting provinces subsidize those who are exporting. It really amounts to a form of equalization payment from one sector of the industry to another or from one province to another. This is perhaps the biggest obstacle to achieving agreement on establishing one national pooling regime for all classes of milk.

I would like to talk about the Reform Party's policy and position relating to Bill C–86. Reform policy in this area has four main points.

First, all processors will be able to structure and manage their organizations in any manner they believe will best serve their interests. The matter of regulating production and setting prices for products under the organization's jurisdiction is a producer issue and should be dealt with by producers.

Second, Reformers acknowledge that the agriculture industry, including supply managed sectors, is moving toward a more competitive market driven system.

Third, we have proposed tough positive measures to ensure fair competition. These are measures such as a tougher anti–combines legislation. That would lead to lower input prices and fair trade policies which would help protect against dumping from other countries particularly from the United States. It would help to protect Canada from the effects of high subsidization in other countries in particular the United States.

Fourth, Reformers propose general changes which will reduce government overspending in a general way but through that will reduce input costs to farmers and indeed to other business people.

We presented these measures before the election campaign, during the election campaign and most recently in the taxpayers budget which would lead to a balanced budget over a three year period if implemented. It would be good for all businesses, including the dairy industry.

In February I visited with farmers in the Niagara peninsula. They spoke of three options. These three options have been presented many times since from a variety of groups. For example, a group of dairy farmers and veterinarians who were in Ottawa a couple of weeks ago wanted to discuss the issue of the BST, but also other dairy issues. These options were presented from dairy farmers in my constituency and across the country both in person and by letter.

The three options concern the future of supply management in the dairy industry. The first option is to end supply management now. I do not believe that this is a widely accepted option within the dairy industry. The second option is to start preparing. Recognize the reality and start a transition process which will allow a healthy dairy industry to continue down the road. The third option is to keep supply management as it is.

The third option clearly is not a reality. Unfortunately it is the position this government presents at least in public. It chooses to go down the avenue of least resistance. It would be appropriate now to look at what happened to grain farmers in western Canada because past governments have chosen to go down the road of least resistance.

I am talking about the elimination overnight of the Western Grain Transportation Act subsidy, the old Crow benefit. Due to the lack of openness, honesty and action on the part of previous Conservative and Liberal governments, no phase–out period was provided. There is no clear direction on how farmers will deal with the loss of the freight subsidy. There are no changes in place or proposed by government which would allow efficiencies to be put in place within the grain handling and grain movement system. There are no changes which would allow lower input costs in other areas. Many grain farmers in western Canada will go out of business over the next few years because of the loss of this subsidy, particularly the loss without a transition period for crops which are now being seeded in western Canada.

Governments have talked a lot over the past several years about stabilizing the agriculture industry, but their moves have led to chaos, not stability.

Of these three options, the second option is the option which the Reform Party supports and believes is most realistic. Use what time there is left before we move to open competition in the dairy industry to help prepare for the changes which will come in a supply managed industry. Let us not take the bury your head in the sand approach which has been taken by the government.

Let us look at the reality of the situation in supply management. First, let us look at the GATT and what it does to supply management in the future. After the year 2000 new negotiations will begin regarding supply management through the GATT. In the new negotiations there will be a rapid reduction in tariffs. Those tariffs are presently high and protect the supply managed industry quite well. There will be more access to imported dairy products in this country.

The changes to the GATT starting a short five years from now will have a huge impact on dairy farmers. That leaves precious little time for farmers to prepare for these changes.

I believe that the real open borders, particularly between the United States and Canada in supply managed products and in dairy products, will come through new NAFTA negotiations. A lawyer for the Dairy Farmers of Canada, which of course is arguing that the GATT supersedes NAFTA in guiding supply managed industries in the Canada–U.S. trade agreement, said in a Western Producer article: "The Americans have a strong case in arguing that NAFTA supersedes and that dairy farmers should be preparing for this possibility".

Further, a very significant event happened when our Prime Minister and U.S. President Bill Clinton announced a few months ago that Chile would be a part of the NAFTA deal within four years. Why is that significant? It is significant because the Americans, who are looking for and pushing Canada in every way they can for more access to our supply managed markets will not sign a new NAFTA deal until they have much more access to the Canadian market in milk and dairy products. That will mean that in less than four years the supply managed industry in Canada will have to move to a much more competitive environment.

The government can pretend that it will protect supply management through this process but it cannot. I will demonstrate this with quotes from three sources, from the red book first. I will quote all of the agriculture policy in the red book; it will not take very long. This is how important agriculture is and was to the Liberals when they drafted the red book. This is their complete agriculture policy:

> The Canadian agri–food sector has a unique opportunity for growth. An overall policy for the agri–food sector must build upon three component strategies: developing new domestic and international markets for Canadian food products; reducing input costs to make farming more viable; and introducing a new "whole farm" income stabilization program. Liberals believe that farm families need long term programs to assist them in securing their future, so that they can continue to provide Canadians with the best quality food in the world.

The red book goes on for one more whole paragraph to conclude the Liberals' agriculture policy:

> Canada's agri–food industry needs policies and programs such as supply management, the Canadian Wheat Board, and stabilization programs to minimize the impact of market price fluctuations; government support in developing new commercial markets for commodities in which the agri–food industry has a competitive advantage; sustainable agriculture practices to maintain and improve the quality of our land and water; and mission oriented research to increase productivity and create quality products to meet market demand.

That is the entire agriculture policy that was included in the Liberal red book.

There was a very secret appendix that was even more difficult to get than the red book itself during the campaign and since. It was quite difficult to get. The appendix goes on for three more paragraphs regarding supply management. Three whole paragraphs. That is the extent of the Liberal policy on agriculture and on supply management.

I will go next to some quotes from the parliamentary secretary to the agriculture minister. I will read from a publication put out by the Independent Dairymen's Association Committee of British Columbia which is made up of the Mainland Dairymen's Association and the Southern Interior Dairymen's Association:

> Following are some public quotes from Lyle Vanclief, parliamentary secretary to the federal minister of agriculture, member of Parliament for Prince Edward—Hastings, and owner of a cash crop and market garden farm in Ontario:
> "It is more than definite that the future of supply management in Canada will be 'uncertain after the year 2001'. The United States insists that the earlier signed NAFTA supersedes GATT rules. The Americans expect tariff levels to be reduced at a quicker NAFTA rate and be completely gone to zero by 1998".

There are three or four more paragraphs but for the sake of brevity I will end the quote from the parliamentary secretary with that.

It is interesting to note the difference between what the Liberals said in the red book and what the parliamentary secretary to the agriculture minister is now finally starting to say in public. Until now this Liberal government has pretended it can protect supply management. It seems to have refused to acknowledge that NAFTA and the GATT and changes that will come to both agreements will bring about quick change to the supply managed industry, including the dairy industry.

It is encouraging that the parliamentary secretary is finally starting to talk publicly about some of the changes that will come about. This will give the industry some time, a bit of a transition period, to get from where it is to a competitive system which will be in place some time over the next few years.

The third source is an article from the May 4 Western Producer. The headline is: "Grits didn't support supply management". The lengthy quote is from Michelle Comeau, former assistant deputy minister for agriculture: "Supply management has proven useful in stabilizing farm income but has generated costs to consumers and to the economy in general".

• (1600)

Barry Wilson leads in by saying: "The Liberals wanted the end of supply management long before GATT, say internal documents". This is totally different from what the Liberals have been saying publicly.

Part of this article states:

> Long before the December 1993 world trade deal "forced" Canada to abandon the legal basis for supply management, the government had decided the system had to go, according to an Agriculture Canada planning document.
> Memos issued in 1993, obtained from government files under access to information legislation, show a government publicly proclaiming support for supply management, while privately drawing up plans to manage its weakening.
> According to a memo written in late 1993 by then assistant deputy agriculture minister Michelle Comeau to then deputy minister Rob Wright, the system was too rigid and too farmer–dominated.
> In any reform, the power of the provinces would have to be reduced and the "excessive producer control over decision making" would have to be counter–balanced by a greater role for processors, retailers and consumers who want lower prices.
> "Supply management has proven useful in stabilizing farm income but has generated costs to consumers and to the economy in general", she wrote. "Reform is required."

Point out how different this is from what the Liberals were acknowledging at the time. If the Liberals did not agree with what the bureaucrats were saying, they should have said so then. They chose not to. It is clear from this article the Liberals are saying one thing in public and another thing privately.

I continue with this article:

> Comeau's memo was part of a plan devised by the bureaucracy to handle fall–out from the decision to sign a new world trade deal, even though it excluded the rule which had allowed Canada to control imports of dairy, poultry and egg products governed by supply–managed rules.
> For years, the government had been criticizing the rigidity of the decision–making process while praising supply management as a way to help farmers make their living from the market.
> Privately, the bureaucrats were agreeing with consumer and processing lobbyists that supply management was bad for the country and the economy.
> The planning documents laid out a strategy for dismantling the traditional rules of supply management—controlling the communications, stressing that the system could survive under new rules, injecting more voices into the decision–making, stressing that trade deals and competition made change inevitable and making sure the provinces accepted some of the responsibility for deciding to tear the old system down.

This, released through access to information, is much different from what the Liberals have been saying publicly.

Reform has chosen the more direct and honest approach, even if it means taking some heat in the short term. Which is kinder and gentler, as the Liberals like to always say, to pretend that major changes are not coming and ending up with the pain and hardships that grain farmers in western Canada will feel over the next years as they deal with subsidies that were removed overnight, or being open and honest and allowing dairymen and others involved in the industry to make the transitions that are necessary?

It would be kinder and gentler to lay the cards on the table and allow farmers and processors the time they need to make the transition from this protected industry to a more competitive industry.

The change is coming. Reformers have chosen to be up front and honest in dealing with changes to supply management. I encourage dairy farmers across Canada to choose the approach they prefer and to choose the people they prefer to help them with the transition they must make over the next few years.

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Vaudreuil.

I am pleased to contribute to the debate on Bill C–86, an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act. It offers a new, more competitive marketing approach for the Canadian dairy industry, which is required to allow Canada to honour its international trade commitment while preserving the fairness and equity for Canadian milk producers of the present system.

While market opportunities will flow from both the North American free trade agreement and the World Trade Organization agreement, certain changes to our domestic structure must be made. Effective August 1, 1995, under NAFTA Canada will not be permitted to export dairy products to the United States where the price of the product has been supported by a producer funded levy. This relatively immediate export restraint will be accompanied by a more gradually implemented WTO restriction on our ability to use levies to finance dairy product exports to other market destinations.

The importance of maintaining current export and domestic markets for dairy products and for products containing dairy ingredients in a manner that still allows all dairy producers to share the cost of supplying milk to these markets cannot be overstated.

Over 300 dairy plants in Canada employ almost 25,000 Canadians to process milk used as table cream and milk or in products such as milk, cheese, yogurt, and ice cream. Thousands of other jobs are provided in the further processing sector for items containing dairy ingredients such as cookies, pizza, and chocolate, as well as in areas of dairy product transportation, packaging, storage, and marketing.

Under the rebate program for further processors in dairy product export assistance programs, initiatives currently funded by the producer levies and administered by the Canadian Dairy Commission, export assistance was provided to facilitate the export of over 10 million kilograms of cheese in 1993–94 and to support processor purchases of dairy ingredients used in the production of over 2,000 finished food products.

In 1993–94 dairy exports to the United States involved about 0.7 million hectolitres of milk, about 1.7 per cent of the entire Canadian milk quota set for that period.

Canada's dairy processing industry is largely centred in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The 1992 census data indicated that 105 plants processing fluid and or industrial milk were located in Ontario, while the 83 plants situated in Quebec had the highest value of shipments, at $3 billion. Alberta follows with 31 processing establishments. B.C. has 25, Manitoba 18, Nova Scotia 14, Saskatchewan 12, P.E.I. 9, New Brunswick 6, and Newfoundland has 5 such processing facilities.

Without price discrimination and pooling of returns, dairy and further processors would not be able to access milk at price levels that would enable them to compete on the U.S. market and be competitive against imports on the domestic market. Furthermore, the current level playing field provided to producers by the current levy system would be eliminated.

The largest volumes of the lower priced milk needed by processors and further processors for certain export and domestic products are produced in the more industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Some smaller provinces are also greatly affected in terms of the proportion of their total milk marketing that is sold at reduced prices.

Without a workable alternative to the current levy system such as that offered by price discrimination, the loss of the U.S. market for Canadian dairy products and products containing dairy ingredients would lead to reduced competitiveness and would place in jeopardy the domestic further processing sector for such products.

Without pooling of the market returns, there would be an inequitable sharing among producers of the cost of maintaining exports to the United States and for domestic competitive markets. This could lead to their abandonment. Should these markets not be maintained, the domestic further processing industry would be less viable due to the diminished economies of scale. Pressure on further processors to relocate their operations to the United States would result. The job loss ramifications of such relocations would be significant.

There is a potential additional reduction in the industry side of almost two per cent resulting from the growing restrictions agreed to under the WTO agreement of the allowable quantity of subsidized exports and the export subsidy paid annually for each product class up to the year 2000–2001. A price discrimination system with pooling of market returns as facilitated by Bill C–86 would address this issue.

Everyone in the Canadian dairy sector is becoming clearly aware of the need to adapt to the new North American and global trade conditions in competition. To illustrate Canadian dairy producers' awareness of this need to adapt, I quote from a May 4 letter written to the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food and copied to me by my constituent, Mr. John Core, chairman of the Ontario milk marketing board.

Mr. Core writes:

> It is extremely important that Bill C–86 be passed by the House. We have negotiated long and hard to arrive at a system to replace levies effective August 1. The changes to the CDC Act are critical to special class pricing and the required pooling that follows from that new pricing method. Your directive to not use levies for exports to the U.S. cannot be adhered to without the necessary amendments.
> We met the challenge given to us by the federal and provincial agricultural ministers to find the solution. We require the legislative changes now to implement the necessary changes.

Mr. Core, I am proud to say, is one of my constituents.

The dairy industry leaders who have developed and negotiated the approach facilitated by these amendments fully understand that while tariff protection is in place between now and the year 2001, the only way to reduce uncertainty and concern about what happens after this period is to meet the new trade challenges head on. Bill C–86 will allow the industry to do so.

I urge my fellow members to support these amendments.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest the hon. member's speech on Bill C–86. There was a point I found particularly interesting, and I would like the hon. member to clarify, because I know very well that the farmers' problem is not producing milk but producing just enough to fill their quota.

If farmers were told to raise their quota by 5 per cent this year, they would be very happy. The problem is that they have to produce, say, 10 000 hectolitres of milk, but if they produce more than that they are fined, and if they produce less their quota will be reduced in the following years because—bad boys, bad girls—they cannot fulfil their commitments. So much so that people often joke and compare cows, as the hon. member for Lotbinière did yesterday, to gas pumps that have not been fixed. With gasoline, once the exact number of hectolitres has been pumped into the tank, the pump is turned off, and the customer waits until tomorrow or the next year. But one can hardly do that with cows.

Therefore our problem is not to produce more, because milk production could easily be increased by 5 per cent a year. What I want to ask about is the 1.7 per cent of our milk production which was exported to the United States last year or in 1993–94. I would like the hon. member to tell the House what province this 1.7 per cent came from and in what form it was exported.

• (1615)

Mrs. Ur: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

In his statement he said that the dairy farmers do not wish to produce more milk. Bill C–86 is not about producing more milk. It is about providing a proper environment for the new export rules that will be implemented in August of this year. Bill C–86 will open those avenues to the dairy farmers so they can adjust.

Dairy farmers are well aware of the adjustments they have had to make since the Uruguay round of discussions. It is not something that was thrust on them at the last minute.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Frontenac that Canadian dairy farmers could increase production very rapidly. If Quebec were to become independent and leave Canada I believe that the rest of the country could take up the production that Canada would lose very quickly. Alberta and western Canada would love to be able to improve dairy production.

They do not want Quebec to leave so that will happen. They have other plans for allowing for the increase in dairy production.

There is an understanding that the present system of levies is not GATT friendly. I ask the hon. member if she is completely confident that this bill cannot be challenged successfully by the World Trade Organization?

Mrs. Ur: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

We certainly have top priority with our dairy people. I feel the government has moved in a fashion that will protect the whole dairy industry.

I realize that six provinces have signed on and other provinces agree with portions of Bill C–86. The bill is in the best interest of Canada and its export markets and pertains to the reduction and changeovers that will be happening in August of this year.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member for Frontenac has 30 seconds left.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Do we not have ten minutes for questions and comments?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): No. It is five minutes because there was an agreement to share time.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac): Then 30 seconds will not be enough.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today to speak in favour of Bill C–86, an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act. The proposed amendments will permit the strengthening of the partnership between the commission, provincial milk marketing authorities and the dairy industry, through the joint administration of the new pricing system and the pooling of market returns.

This approach will allow Canada to comply with the new trade conditions under the North American Free Trade Agreement and the World Trade Organization agreement. Milk used for exported products or for products on domestic competitive markets will continue to be made available to processors at competitive prices. At the same time, we will maintain the producer equity that is so essential to the current milk marketing system.

Even though Bill C–86 gives new powers to the Canadian Dairy Commission, it has no effect on provincial jurisdiction. An interface between current provincial and federal powers on pricing is necessary so that all milk marketing can be regulated, whether the milk is sold beyond provincial borders or on export markets.

The pricing and pooling approach, authorized by the amendments in Bill C–86, was proposed by the dairy industry itself and represents only administrative changes to the mandate already given to the Canadian Dairy Commission and the provincial milk marketing authorities.

Since its creation as a Crown corporation in 1966, the commission has assumed a key role in the development and implementation of the federal dairy policy. It is working in close collaboration with important national organizations such as the Dairy Farmers of Canada, the National Dairy Council of Canada and others working under them.

The Canadian Dairy Commission is also facilitating the essential work of the Canadian Milk Supply Management Committee through the chairman of this committee responsible for controlling the implementation of the national milk marketing plan, the federal–provincial agreement governing the management of milk supplies in Canada.

After detailed consultation with the industry, the commission sets the target price of industrial milk—the milk used in dairy products such as cheese and yogurt—and the support price of butter and skim milk powder.

The Canadian Dairy Commission is also authorized to collect levies from producers remitted by the provincial milk marketing authorities. This is to cover exportation costs and finance special programs aimed at increasing domestic consumption of dairy products.

Provincial milk marketing authorities are authorized to set the prices and pool market returns within their respective borders. The new legal provisions contained in Bill C–86 will place the commission on equal footing with provincial authorities as far as price setting is concerned and authorize it to operate the pooling system agreed on by the provinces for milk earmarked for interprovincial or international trade.

In order for the Canadian Dairy Commission to be able to manage this new price setting and pooling approach in the interest of producers, legislation must give certain powers to provincial dairy authorities and, as required, provide that they give up certain responsibilities. In the new system, provincial authorities will grade milk for export or sale on competitive domestic markets and set prices depending on end use.

Under the terms of the amendments before us, the Canadian Dairy Commission would be able to delegate to provincial authorities its present responsibility with respect to the pricing of milk traded interprovincially while being granted the power to pool revenues from the sale of milk sold interprovincially by provincial authorities.

On a regular basis, boards and milk marketing boards would report to the commission the sales volumes and going prices for each grade of milk sold during a given month. The Canadian Dairy Commission would then be asked by provincial authorities to average nationally the price for each component included in the pool. Sufficient amounts would be included from each province to ensure fair distribution of the proceeds from the sale of milk for the lowest priced classes.

We must bear in mind that not all provinces contribute to the same degree to processing activities. The quantity of milk for special classes of products, that is to say, dairy products for export such as cheese, or further processed products such as chocolate and pizza, varies widely across the country.

Most of the inexpensive milk in these classes will be sold to processors in the most industrialized provinces, namely Ontario and Quebec. Some smaller provinces, however, are greatly affected as to their proportion of the total volume of milk sold at reduced prices.

To ensure that the cost of maintaining these industries and the essential export markets is shared equitably among producers, each province will be required to inject a minimum percentage of its total monthly sales of milk into the pooled fund.

This is how national average prices for the different classes of milk products would be calculated. This percentage is being negotiated by provincial authorities.

Returns from the agreed upon percentage of milk sales would then be pooled and redistributed to producers through provincial authorities on an equitable basis negotiated by the industry and provincial authorities and set out in official federal–provincial agreements.

The industry has concluded that creating special classes of milk sold at competitive prices on the destination market would be a good way of maintaining our share of the dairy export market without resorting to production levies.

The importance of finding an equitable way of maintaining our share of the export market in dairy products and products with dairy ingredients was the main force behind the intense negotiations and hard work undertaken by the provinces through the various committees and working groups in the past year.

Just before Christmas, the hon. Ralph Goodale and his provincial and territorial counterparts responsible for agriculture and agri–food confirmed their support of the industry's consensus that some pooling of market returns from dairy products was urgently needed so that the industry could meet Canada's international obligations and maintain an orderly marketing system.

By passing Bill C–86, the House can finally take an active part in the development of this essential sector of the Canadian economy, which successfully faces the modern challenges of the emerging global market.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Vaudreuil talked about the target price for industrial milk, which is essential to producers of powdered milk, for example, or frozen pizzas with cheese; this class of milk is sold at a lower price. He talked about the targeted price for that milk. I would like him to elaborate on that.

Secondly he spoke about NAFTA and GATT. I often ask Liberal Party members as well as Reformers which of the two agreements should take precedence. Would the hon. member for Vaudreuil not agree that his government should seek to determine which should take precedence?

For example, the three dollar levy per hectolitre of milk was partly consistent with GATT. It could have been reduced each year by 15 per cent, while, according to NAFTA, it will have to be totally eliminated by August 1, 1995. Which one is right? Is it GATT or NAFTA? If the hon. member for Vaudreuil does not know, would he not be tempted to suggest to his minister of agriculture that he seek a determination of whether GATT or NAFTA takes precedence?

Mr. Discepola: Madam Speaker, first, the hon. member for Frontenac will surely agree that the bill was drafted in consultation with Quebec's dairy industry, which is very supportive of this legislation.

I do not want to get into a debate as to which agreement takes precedence over the other. Rather, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Frontenac, who is the opposition's critic on agriculture, for his very positive comments, in this House, on April 4, 1995, regarding the development of the memorandum of understanding which integrates the marketing of industrial milk. Indeed, the hon. member was very pleased with this change.

Consequently, I wonder what the opposition is now up to. The fact is that, if the amendments to the act do not come into effect by August 1, 1995, there is a risk that producers' contributions could no longer be used to finance exports to the U.S.

Considering that Quebec accounts for over 47 per cent of the industrial milk production, and that most of this production is exported to the U.S., it only makes sense to pass this bill as quickly as possible, so that producers in Quebec and in the rest of Canada can benefit from it.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Davenport, World Bank and International Monetary Fund; the hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe, internal trade; the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, gasoline prices.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to rise and speak today to further the interests of farmers in Quebec and Canada, and more particularly in my riding of Champlain.

It is all the more pleasant to do so since Bill C–86, an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission, shows that, for once, the government has understood how important it is for our agricultural producers to adjust to the new international trade rules.

We all know that agriculture is an industry that cannot be compared with any other, especially in Quebec. For example, virtually all farm production in Quebec comes from family farms. Agricultural performance depends on the weather and, for most products, marketing is done jointly by producers. Those few points illustrate the distinctive features of this local industry that has to compete on world markets.

With GATT and NAFTA, farmers are thrown onto a free market and have no other choice but to succeed. To do so, they must prepare, and we must set up systems that are allowed under those agreements and provide independent producers with a framework that is both flexible and competitive.

Bill C–86 is a step in the right direction, but the government should keep in mind that producers must constantly adjust and keep their production costs as low as possible, to be able to meet the challenge of world competition. Farmers have realized as much in the last few years, and they do whatever is needed to succeed. In Quebec, let us just mention the establishment, in 1992, of the Quebec dairy industry recovery fund, which has, as one of its prime missions, the funding of research projects on dairy products or of marketing projects aimed to increase sales.

This recovery fund is partially financed through a levy on each hectolitre of milk produced and on processed products. The fund was set up by the Quebec milk producers federation, Agropur and its subsidiaries, the Lactel Group and a number of associated co–operatives, as well as a company belonging to private manufacturers members of the Dairy Council.

This example shows the innovative spirit of producers and others involved in the Quebec agri–food system and, in addition, it reflects their capacity and willingness to work together to face common challenges. It is no longer possible to ask producers alone to constantly reduce their production costs without asking the other people involved in the agri–food system to do the same.

This reality is the basis of our collective approach and competitiveness on the world markets. Emphasis is now put on total quality and the implementation of research results not only throughout the Quebec and Canadian agri–food systems, but also by all the stakeholders involved, including the federal government.

As for the government, it must make the legislative framework more flexible and maintain the assistance measures allowed under the international trade agreements, as requested by the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture during the last general assembly of his organization. The government and the Minister of Agriculture must constantly ensure that their action does not harm the agricultural industry.

The budget recently tabled by the Minister of Finance took away some of the basic resources our farmers need and undermined the growth of our agricultural industry. Under the February budget, Agriculture Canada stands to lose 2,000 jobs, including 900 in the research sector, one of the most important sectors in agriculture, and the farm support programs will be reduced by 30 per cent. More specifically, milk producers will sustain over a two–year period a 30 per cent cut in the subsidies for industrial milk. These producers live for the most part in eastern Canada, which includes Quebec, and the government has made no provision to compensate these producers, although it plans to compensate western farmers for the elimination of the Crow benefit. The producers will have no other choice but to pass part of the bill on to consumers. And producers will again be accused of having increased the price of dairy products.

As the president of a farmers association, Laurent Pellerin, said in an article which appeared in the weekly La terre de chez nous: "The Martin budget singles out rural regions".

The government cannot, on the one hand, change the rules applying to the dairy industry and, on the other, gradually withdraw its support. I would hope that both measures are carried out with the same outlook on our agricultural future and that the Minister of Finance has consulted the Minister of Agriculture before proceeding with these cuts. I would also hope that they have assessed the impact because it would be a shame for the farmers to see the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture wiped out by his colleague, the Minister of Finance, year after year, budget after budget.

Bill C–86 is a very praiseworthy initiative of the Minister of Agriculture, who wishes to establish a national pooling system of market returns which will help sustain dairy product exports. This new system is consistent with international trade agreements and gives producers the same advantages as a deduction system. However, I hope that the minister has thought of a reply for the American government, which has the habit of challenging Canadian agricultural policy and could be tempted to accuse Canada of dumping, since this system favours a lower price for milk used in export products.

We must not forget that the bill before us has been introduced right after six provinces, including Quebec, signed an agreement in principle on the pooling of their milk supply systems. That means that, in these six provinces, producers will get the same price for their milk and that the provinces will administer a common quota. Put together, these six provinces account for 85 per cent of all the industrial milk produced in Canada. That consolidation will allow them to implement a single milk marketing system under which interprovincial barriers to milk supply will be phased out in the medium term.

Moreover, the consolidation of the milk supply system will help these provinces make the adjustment to competition from further–processed foreign dairy products. The agreement is the culmination of lengthy negotiations in which Quebec played a leadership role.

Quebec is the main stakeholder in the dairy products supply management system. Without Quebec, the Canadian dairy policy collapses. The Canadian dairy producers understood that. This agreement proves indeed that, even in the middle of a referendum campaign, dairy producers from the other provinces have recognized the importance of economically integrating their industry with that of Quebec in order to protect their interests.

By their actions, dairy producers have shown that economic reality prevails over emotional debates. This is proof once again that all the dire scenarios that federalists spread about will simply not materialize once Quebec becomes sovereign.

Quebec will not lose its present share of quotas. On the contrary, like the other provinces, it will maintain the supply management system in the interest of all dairy producers in Quebec and in Canada. Quebec's success in dairy production is an economic reality hard won by producers, not a gift from Canadian federalism.

I wanted to mention these facts because they are important in order to explain the role of each player, to understand fully the economic dynamics of the dairy industry and to clarify the role of the government, which must follow suit and work with producers toward a shared vision of tomorrow's agriculture and the actions needed to get there.

The government's contribution to the development of our agricultural economy is mainly through the creation of a favourable environment. It must act as a guide and help all those who want to consolidate their markets or to develop new ones.

Let us hope that Bill C–86 is only the beginning and, as the member of this House for the riding of Champlain, where agriculture is very important to our economy, I must support such initiatives.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened attentively to the hon. member's representations, and, I must say, it sounded to me like a rerun of all of the debates which have taken place in this past year, or even in the past 30 years. They always come back to how our federalist system has mistreated Quebec.

But, recently, the debate shifted to how Quebec can retain the benefits of a federalist system even after declaring its independence. For almost a year now, they have been discussing how Quebec could keep the same currency as Canada, the same passport and citizenship, and how it could remain a member of all of the trade agreements.

I will ask my question now because I would like to give them ample time to answer. How can they dare say to Quebecers today, in this House, that if Quebec were to separate, they would guarantee them—? Under the federal system, dairy producers get 47 per cent of overall production. We heard the Reform member say—

• (1645)

How happy the rest of Canada would be, if Quebec ever decided to separate, to take up the slack in milk production in the rest of Canada. They would be happy. He stated that they did not want the separation of Quebec.

Therefore, I am going to ask my hon. colleague how he can dare, first, to tell Quebecers today that they will be a signing party not only with the rest of Canada, but that they will also remain part of NAFTA, GATT and other trade agreements? But, more importantly, how does he intend to guarantee that the production quotas of dairy producers will remain at their current levels?

Mr. Lefebvre: Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to my colleague opposite, the member for Vaudreuil. We can see how consistent the Liberals are in their approach. They continuously resort to the same scare tactics against Quebecers. What I want to say to the member for Veaudreuil is that we, on this side, have guts, we have courage, we are willing and able to trade with any country, and we want to maintain provincial agreements. I believe it will be in the best interests of everybody in Ontario and in the western provinces.

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Madam Speaker, my party's position on Bill C–86 is very clear. We support this bill, which enables milk producers to meet the requirements contained in the international trade agreements signed by Canada. This bill provides for the creation of a national pooling system of market returns which will help support the export of milk products.

Among the interesting proposals, we notice that, from now on, the Canadian Dairy Commission will manage a common fund made up of returns from the sale of dairy products. Previously, the commission deducted levies from producers' pay cheques. With this bill, the commission will ensure that the provinces fund exports proportionally to their milk quotas. For instance, Quebec which exports more dairy products than the other provinces, will be assured that producers will share equally in the risks and in the costs of the system, as was the case under the old levy system.

On April 4, I mentioned in this House that six provinces had signed a memorandum of agreement aimed at merging their milk supply systems. This bill is being tabled while Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have signed a memorandum of agreement providing for the common marketing of industrial milk and fluid milk in these six provinces. Even if the provinces keep their present quotas, there will be only one class of milk and one price and no more distinction between industrial and fluid milk.

Quebec has played a major role in the signing of this agreement, I want to make that clear. I want to mention it because, even with the upcoming referendum on Quebec's future, the other provinces recognize the importance of an economic union with Quebec. Federalists say that, if Quebec separates, it will lose its present part of the quotas. I say this is false.

Come on. Quebec will keep the supply management process, mainly because it is in the interests of milk producers in other provinces. If the federalist threat were true, Quebec products would create a very harsh competition for dairy farmers from the rest of Canada and there could even be a shortage of these products on the Canadian market.

The fearmongering campaign of the federalists caught on rapidly in Quebec. One of their key arguments is the threat that a sovereign Quebec will lose half of its industrial milk quotas and that thousands of dairy farms will be out of business in Quebec. Roger B. Buckland, a vice–principal at McGill University, suggested in the Opinion rurale column of the March 2nd issue of the magazine La Terre de chez–nous that the United States would drive many dairy farms to the brink of bankruptcy.

According to him, the United States would refuse to maintain the tariffs agreed to under GATT in an agreement which would make an independent Quebec part of NAFTA. He argues that sovereignty would have a negative impact on Quebec dairy farmers since, within Confederation, they supply 48 per cent of the industrial milk sold on the Canadian market when Quebec has only 25 per cent of the population.

Fortunately, the same publication also ran a reply from a sociologist, Stéphane Paré, in its issue of March 30 to April 5. Here are some excerpts from this reply:

"Will Americans swallow us? Will they take advantage of the situation to make NAFTA prevail over GATT? Will Canadians produce more milk and will Quebecers have to reduce their production? Quebec, even if it separates, will remain a signatory to GATT, at least that is the way we interpret international law. It is called "state succession", and it means that the successor state abides by the laws and obligations of the country it was part of previously.

Mr. Buckland, I can just see you rushing in to argue that the rule of successor states does not necessarily apply. You are right. In fact, this is one of the reasons why I believe that Canada would be interested in siding with us against Uncle Sam. Canadians know very well that, without Quebec, they would be an easy prey for the Americans. Therefore, they would see the advantages of sitting down with Quebec to negotiate. If there is a possibility that Chile could join NAFTA, I fail to see why the signatories would be harder on Quebec. We must keep in mind that, for the U.S., Quebec is a more important economic partner than France is, for example. As for the fate of dairy producers in Quebec, you should know that they do not need Quebec's independence to disappear. All they have to do is to let Mr. Martin do his thing".

Rational arguments always prevail over fear, and Quebecers will not be fooled on the day of the referendum. Why claim that a sovereign Quebec would not be allowed to trade with the rest of Canada, when we know that Canada's dairy production is an economic reality? Trade between Quebec and Canada exceeds $80 billion.

Do you think that it would be in Canada's interest to cut all ties to an independent Quebec? If Quebec loses, how can Canada expect to gain? The need to maintain a Quebec–Canada economic zone is obvious.

The agreement in principle reached between the six provinces that we referred to earlier is an increasingly relevant case in point. Dairy producers in the other provinces know that Canada will maintain economic ties with a sovereign Quebec. Economic reality will prevail over feelings of emotion and vengeance. Furthermore, the Quebec government is committed to maintaining a quota system, which it sees as essential to both producers and processors.

We know that scrapping this system would not be in the best interest of any dairy industry in Quebec and Canada. As the Bloc Quebecois demonstrated during the official opposition day on agriculture, excluding Quebec from the quota system would expose dairy producers in the other provinces to the fierce competition of their Quebec counterparts, in addition to creating a shortage of dairy products in those provinces.

GATT rules virtually preclude the imposition, by Canada, of restrictive measures to prevent Quebec dairy products from getting in. These rules seem to be open to a legal challenge. So, we will leave it to the lawyers.

Maintaining a common economic zone within the dairy industry will make it possible to resist pressure from the United States. Quebec and Canada will have to join forces if they want to counter constant American opposition to custom tariffs on our dairy products. The bill before the House, Bill C–86, will probably be challenged by the Americans.

It should not come as a surprise to us to hear that the U.S. are accusing Canada of dumping by reason of the fact that Canada intends to promote low prices for milk in dairy products for the export market. However, it will be up to our neighbours to the South to prove that Canadian exports have an injurious effect on their market. This will not be an easy task, for our products are exported in small amounts and generally processed.

At any rate, we know that all European GATT members subsidize their dairy exports. Canada is not there yet. Therefore, there is no reason to worry too much. However, if Canada were to act on the federalists' threat to break off any ties with an independent Quebec, the American ogre would be sitting pretty. The federalists also threatened Quebec dairy producers with the loss of tariffs negotiated with the U.S. under NAFTA if and when Quebec became sovereign. Come on.

The U.S. appetite for international trade is well known and I am convinced that they will not change their ways with a sovereign Quebec. Naturally, they will try to get more than they already have and to renegotiate the agreement with an independent Quebec. But the fact of the matter is that this is already going on now with Canada. Like Canada, Quebec will reply that customs tariffs are protected by GATT.

The Americans are putting the pressure on and will continue to do so, whether Quebec becomes sovereign or not. However, they do understand that money talks. With exports of $14 billion and imports of $27 billion to and from Quebec, it is not the economic considerations involving Quebec's dairy industry that would keep Americans from signing a new free trade agreement with us.

There is currently very limited trade between Quebec and the U.S. involving the dairy industry, because of high tariffs. It is easy to see that we would have a new free trade agreement without having to make concessions on agricultural tariffs. So, where is the catastrophe for the Quebec dairy industry in a sovereign Quebec?

Where is the catastrophe, if it is wrong to claim that a sovereign Quebec would lose half of its industrial milk quota, which would result, if we are to believe the fearmongers, in the closure of thousands of dairy farms in the province? Where is the catastrophe, if it is wrong to claim that sovereignty would adversely affect Quebec producers, because they provide 48 per cent of Canada's industrial milk production, while accounting for only 25 per cent of the country's population? Where is the catastrope, if it is wrong to claim that Quebec dairy producers will lose the benefit of the existing tariffs with the U.S., under NAFTA. Where then is the real threat?

The real threat was tabled by this government not long ago. The real threat for Quebec's dairy industry is the last federal budget, as I said a few moments ago, when I quoted a Quebec sociologist. Because of that budget, the federal subsidy for industrial milk is reduced by 30 per cent over a two year period.

We mentioned earlier that Quebec accounts for 48 per cent of Canada's industrial milk production. So, who do you think will bear the brunt of these cuts? It is pretty easy to figure out. These cuts amount to a loss of income of $3,775 for an average size dairy farm producing about 2,500 hectolitres of milk. This means a 15 per cent loss of income for a producer with a net income of $25,000. And this is not taking into account the increased feed costs, following the elimination of transport subsidies for grain and feed. Quebec farmers have been left high and dry. The finance minister's budget does not provide any compensation for them, even though they are the most affected by it.

This bill will allow producers to adjust to the requirements of international trade agreements signed by Canada. As we said, this is why the official opposition supports Bill C–86. However, the problem confronting our daiary producers is certainly not solved, given the obstacles set in their way by the finance minister's budget.

What gives me hope however is the agreement in principle signed by Quebec, Ontario and the four other provinces to pool their milk supply system. This shows that a sovereign Quebec would not be isolated for mere emotional reasons, when it is economic considerations that really count.

[English]

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened to the remarks of my colleague with great interest.

I come from a rural Ontario riding that has an excellent dairy industry. Speaking on behalf of the farmers, the dairy producers in the immediate area where I live, I am perplexed by the remarks that separation would not hurt Quebec producers.

The dairy farmers in my area feel very strongly that Quebec dairy farmers are enjoying a singular advantage right now and would look forward to an opportunity to compete face to face with Quebec as would be the case in the event of separation. There are farmers in my riding who are very expert in the dairy industry.

Does my colleague feel in the event of Quebec's separation that Ontario dairy producers would lose or gain? Would they produce more milk and get more money?

Mr. Landry: Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to answer this question because, in reality, our colleagues from Ontario, our neighbour, have nothing to worry about. They know very well that they have a good thing going with Quebec, and Quebec knows it too.

I do not believe that the day after Quebec's separation, should that day come, Ontario would say: "From this day on, we are going to ignore you, ignore your businesses, your dairy businesses, your imports and exports". I do not believe it because my colleague opposite knows very well that two provinces, two good provinces, Quebec and Ontario, which have always had good trade relations, are not going to erect walls at their borders, even when it comes to agriculture, I might add.

My colleague also knows very well that, as things stand now, such a move would cause Ontario to lose thousands of jobs and millions and millions in revenue. Therefore, I think that a married couple can always make some kind of alliance and come to some kind of agreement. I would like to add that we are all sensible people, whether we are from Quebec or from another place in Canada. We are all very reasonable and very talented. Should Quebec separate from the rest of Canada, I would be worried in the least. We will continue to have very good trade relations. I assure you. I thank my colleague for raising this excellent question.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Madam Speaker, marriage is not on the agenda in the current political situation in Quebec. Divorce is. And I never knew people to be better off after a divorce than they were before. Never. They keep talking about threats and scare tactics when we disagree with them. The real scare tactics started when the budget was brought down in Quebec. Although six or as many as eight provinces brought down a balanced budget, the Quebec minister of finance opted for genuine scaremongering. Vote no or vote yes, depending on the question, otherwise we raise taxes.

The hon. member also said everything would be just fine after separation.

[English]

They are dreaming in Technicolor. They stand in the House day after day and state everything will be rosy after separation. I challenge them.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Question. Question.

Mr. Discepola: The hon. member for Frontenac might as well know this is a time for more than questions, this is a time for questions and comments. He never had the intestinal fortitude to tell the House how Quebec and its farmers would be better off in an independent Quebec.

• (1705)

The hon. member also said that, in an independent Quebec, Quebecers would have the assurance that their new country would be a party to all trade agreements.

[English]

He says again that it is in the interest of Ontario and all other provinces to continue a lateral trade relationship with Quebec.

We are talking about a divorce; we are talking about the destruction of a country. They cannot stand in the House day after day and pretend that in a separate Quebec people would be able to keep the monetary policy, the Canadian dollar, and to have dual citizenship. Imagine people in Quebec being able to vote in the rest of Canada because they have dual citizenship and people from the rest of Canada not being able to vote in Quebec.

There is never a campaign of fear mongering in this party. We will reach a decision diplomatically and democratically. I would like them once and for all to stand and say there may be a risk but they do not. They continually tell Quebecers that it will be business as usual.

How can they guarantee that? They have said they want to take the good things Canada has to offer. They want the same dollar, the same passport, the same everything. Pretty soon they will be telling us: "We will keep Canada; find your own Quebec".

Mr. Landry: Madam Speaker, it will be a pleasure to respond to the hon. member for Vaudreuil. I wish the hon. member would remember what I said. When I referred to marriage, I meant an economic marriage, and I would like to point out that today, as many as 60 per cent of businesses in Quebec and Ontario are involved in joint ventures, and that Ontario has a $3.8 billion trade surplus with Quebec.

Just a minute, Madam Speaker, just a minute, please. Will Ontario ignore us overnight? Will Ontario and the other provinces in Canada turn down economic ties overnight? Hardly likely. Globalization is the order of the day. But let us continue.

Just because we are talking about agriculture, we do not need more fences. There will be no fences tomorrow. These are the figures I wanted to mention in the House when I spoke earlier, and I repeat, this is an economic marriage regardless of the outcome for Quebec. With respect to agriculture, which was supposed to be my topic today, there are no borders, no fences. And I may add that yes, this will be a good economic marriage.

[English]

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, as someone from British Columbia I am sick and tired of talk about some kind of economic merger.

A lot of dairy products come from Quebec into British Columbia. Why does the member think British Columbia would accept product from a country that just separated from Canada? What motivation is there for people from British Columbia to take the product when we can produce it ourselves?

[Translation]

Mr. Landry: Madam Speaker, I think our western colleague overlooked the fact that Quebec buys $800 million worth of beef.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Annually.

Mr. Landry: Annually. Eight hundred million dollars worth.

Does the West—

An hon. member: And Western wheat.

Mr. Landry: We could say plenty about Western wheat, Madam Speaker.

I will say this, if the Reform Party does not want an economic marriage, it can refrain, but as a politician, I say that we are going to have a real marriage, a marriage that is economically and politically sound.

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am happy to join my colleagues in the debate on Bill C–86, an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act and to add my support to this important initiative.

Dairy farmers of Canada as well as producers in my home province of Prince Edward Island are very anxious to see the bill passed prior to the end of June so that the legislative requirements laid out in the act are in place prior to August 1.

The P.E.I. milk marketing board held a number of public meetings on the proposals outlined in the act and had strong producer support. However I underline the important point that producers in my province do not want to see this as the first step in moving toward a national quota exchange. It is important to have the quota distributed throughout the country and not drawn basically into Quebec and Ontario through quota pricing practices. I underline that as a concern.

The bill provides Canada's dairy sector with the ways and means to successfully face demanding new market realities. As well the amendments are very much in line with the government's fiscal goal of getting the deficit under control.

The new milk pricing and pooling system will not require any additional resources from government reserves. It will not entail any contingent liability on the part of the federal government or involve any reallocations from within the Canadian Dairy Commission's current operating funds.

As my colleagues before me have noted, the principal amendments to the act provide the commission with the legal administrative authority to work co–operatively with provincial milk marketing authorities to calculate the average national price level for the milk classes whose returns will be pooled, to obtain the returns from sale to processors through the provinces and then to redistribute the returns to producers through provincial authorities on an equitable basis under the terms of a formal federal–provincial agreement.

The other amendments contained in Bill C–86 are even less complicated. They are necessary to add clarity to the act to ensure compatibility and consistency with provincial authorities and legislation, to enable proper and efficient banking procedures and administration of producer money, and to strengthen the enforcement provisions of the act.

Through Bill C–86 a provincial milk marketing board is specifically defined to add clarity to the act and to ensure consistency with similar provisions contained in the dairy products marketing regulations. The new industry pooling system for milk marketing returns will be carried out through arrangements agreed upon by the Canadian dairy commission and the provincial milk marketing authorities.

An amendment has also been included for clarity to ensure that there is no misinterpretation of the fact that the regulations made under the CDC act do not take precedence in terms of the authorities provided to the commission under the act.

The provisions contained in any legislated act always take precedence over any regulations made pursuant to the act. That is an important point. Other amendments provided by Bill C–86 enable the commission to recover pool administration costs from the pool, to establish a special bank account to deal solely with the producer moneys entering and leaving the pool through the provincial authorities, and to permit the CDC to establish a line of credit to ensure continuity of producer payments. These are important principles to ensure that we meet our GATT obligations and that we are not using government moneys to fulfil these procedures.

Under pooling arrangements the Canadian dairy commission will simply be administering a pool of producer moneys on behalf of producers. If necessary, any borrowing costs would be undertaken on a short term basis only to ensure timeliness of payments as moneys enter and leave the pool. Any such borrowings would be subject to prior approval by the Minister of Finance and be totally funded by producers.

Bill C–86 also enables the CDC to continue its long standing practice of returning any excess fees or levy funds rightfully owed back to producers. The amount of in quota production per producer can only be estimated at the beginning of each dairy year. The amount of actual production is not known until the end of the year.

While no penalties are charged for under producing milk, under the supply management system over quota production is exported and levies are charged on these amounts to cover export costs and other related CDC program costs. The same type of situation may well occur under the pooling system as average national prices will be calculated at the beginning of a certain period and may differ when the marketing costs are finally determined. Again, no additional government funds are involved.

The last amendment contained in Bill C–86 strengthens the enforcement provisions of the CDC act. Given the attorney general conducts all litigation for the commission and has the power to seek injunctive relief in its own name the new provision will ensure the same relief is available if litigation is commenced by or against the commission in the name of the CDC.

Again I urge my fellow members to fully support Bill C–86. Such approval will demonstrate clear recognition of the importance of Canada's dairy sector and the continuation of the supply management system and its benefits to not only producers but to all Canadians. This is a model we should be encouraging other countries to adopt and these amendment will go a long way in terms of making it compatible with GATT agreements.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, my distinguished colleague and member for Malpèque is an expert in dairy production, and I have considerable respect for him.

The Federation of Dairy Producers of Canada decided to comply with the provisions of NAFTA—and NAFTA is the reason we are here debating Bill C–86 this afternoon—because the $3 levy per hectolitre of milk could have been reduced by 15 per cent a year. However, GATT determined that, as of August 1, 1995, this $3 deduction from the income of industrial milk producers would be illegal under the NAFTA agreement, because it would be considered a direct export subsidy.

This is debatable, but since it seems we do not want to overly upset the Americans, we bowed to their demands. We still do not know which takes precedence—GATT or NAFTA—so we comply with the requirements of NAFTA.

Under this agreement, we obtained an extension in order to become legal. As the member for Malpèque pointed out, the quota may be negotiated between provinces. The hon. member for Malpèque could buy part of Quebec's quota to expand his farm. Better yet, if he wants to swell his coffers, he could sell his quota to Quebecers, who could take his quota from Prince Edward Island and bring it to Quebec.

I think this is a very good point in Bill C–86, given that, in the agreement signed by the farm producers of the six provinces, if, for example, Prince Edward Island sees its milk quota vanish like snow in springtime after the 1 per cent sale, it can temporarily withdraw from the agreement it signed with the other five provinces.

What I want to find out from my colleague for Malpeque, who is very familiar with agriculture across Canada, is: what is going to happen to the three recalcitrant provinces? I will not go so far as calling them separatist, but I would like to know what we can give these three western provinces to get them to sign the agreement with the six other provinces, since they produce barely 18 per cent of Canada's milk.

[English]

Mr. Easter: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

I want to make it very clear that Bill C–86 is only talking about the legislative authority to implement a national pooling system of market returns from the different classes of milk. It will not establish a national quota exchange. To be very clear, it will set up a national pooling system of market returns and would give that authority within the context of federal–provincial agreements on pooling mainly through delegated functions. I raised quota exchange because it is a concern of producers in Prince Edward Island that this legislation not been seen as the first step toward moving in that direction.

This requirement is really as a result of the GATT. In terms of the point he raised with respect to GATT and NAFTA, we in Canada know which tariff reduction regime has priority. We know it is the GATT negotiation and not NAFTA. The Americans may differ in their opinion but certainly we are firmly behind the stand that the GATT tariff reduction rules apply.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the debate to this point has been quite insightful. It tells us a bit about Canada and some of the problems we face. It is interesting that the debate is over something as simple as milking cows. The previous Liberal speaker has been actively involved in the dairy industry. I cannot say the same although I have milked cows.

It is very interesting to see a debate in the House, an argument, a scrap might be the correct word, between the Liberals and the Bloc over milking cows. It was at the point at which they were talking about marriages and divorces over milking cows. We have to wonder, in the marriage or the divorce who is the cow and who is the bull. Maybe we have two bulls, in which case where is the milk?

If we have this kind of debate over milking cows, can we imagine a fight over the future of Canada as to whether we remain a united country? We can imagine how the scrap will intensify. We will not be talking about milking cows, we will be talking about the St. Lawrence seaway, the division of assets, federal buildings across the river in Hull, federal buildings in Montreal and all across Quebec, apportioning the federal debt. We can only imagine the difficulty.

The problem is we have two parties in the House talking about marriage and divorce. It is time to change the parameters of the debate and start talking about life and death. With the parties involved in the debate all I see is the potential of death. They will scrap until someone is killed.

We may be talking about some new life in this issue. When I think about new life I think about Reform because Reform talks about a constructive new way of looking at things. Perhaps both parties need to lay aside their instruments of war and listen to Reformers who talk about a new Canada, the birth of new ideas, a new Confederation with 10 equal provinces working together because they have responsibilities appropriated to each level of government in a manner that will allow us to work co–operatively and lay aside some of these foolish and silly debates like the debate over how we milk our cows.

I farm and I have milked cows, mostly as a young lad. I do not claim to be an expert but I recognize the importance of the industry. Therefore it is a privilege for me to speak this afternoon on Bill C–86 which provides for the replacement of levies with a pooling system of market returns from different classes of milk use, which system maintains producer equity and is consistent with Canada's international trade agreement.

I rise in the House today to talk about an issue that should have been addressed many months ago. While I congratulate the government for finally addressing the issue of supply management, I have many doubts whether the government has the resolve to develop a policy that addresses farmers' concerns for the long term.

Canada's supply management system has provided stability to the dairy industry. In the system farmers are given a reliable means of marketing their product with a consistent price. Consumers are guaranteed in receiving a product of high quality. However, this has come with a hefty price tag for consumers with goods in some cases double what the same product would cost in the United States.

As long as our dollar is relatively low, below 80 cents U.S., it does not create too much of a problem. However, when we see our dollar increase above the 80 cent mark certainly we have cross–border shopping. Any Canadian who goes across the border to shop in the United States will put in their hamper large quantities of dairy products such as cheese, milk and the like. That indicates perhaps there are some fundamental problems and pitfalls ahead with regard to not only the dairy industry but all supply managed areas we need to openly discuss in the House and in the industry.

Recent developments in world trade have signalled the inevitable end of Canada's supply managed systems as we know them. The status quo will go, just as it will go with regard to the squabble between separatists and federalists. The status quo in the supply managed system will have to pass away as well.

As of August 1, 1995 under the Uruguay round of GATT all import quotas must be converted to tariffs. While tariffs may protect supply managed commodities in the short term, it is doubtful they will be a fixture in the long term. Canada will try to maintain the 85 per cent tariff level until the year 2001 but it is likely the United States will challenge it. Even the parliamentary secretary to the federal minister of agriculture has said publicly this is inevitable.

I quote the MP for Prince Edward—Hastings:

> What will likely happen is that the Americans will ask for a NAFTA panel in the very near future. The panel of industry experts is made up of two Americans and a fifth person who is chosen by 'a flip of a coin'. The system is somewhat biased, depending on which country 'wins the toss of the coin'. That's the way the system works.

The government is confident it can win an American challenge against tariff levels. However, what plan of action has the government developed if the Americans win the challenge? It reminds me that the Liberals said they were sure Canada would win the debate over article XI in the GATT negotiations.

Everyone knows the Liberals were wrong. We have found out the Liberals are wrong a lot of time. We are concerned that they do not always accurately communicate the conditions not only of the dairy industry, but those that many sectors of our economy may face in the future. The Liberals are not being straightforward with the results of the ongoing deficit and increasing debt.

It is about time we started to deal realistically with the issues before us and address in a very direct form the concerns of the dairy industry. For instance, a ruling in favour of the Americans would put the current system in jeopardy. We are reminded that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. The Reform Party supports the tariff levels which were agreed to under GATT.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.) moved that Bill C–319, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (reimbursement of election expenses) be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is a very straightforward bill. It intends to put one more very small hurdle in the path of registered political parties before they are eligible for reimbursement from the public purse. It would be a hurdle similar to the one that is in the path of individual candidates. When individual candidates run in a particular riding, the candidate is required to have 15 per cent of the total votes cast in that constituency before the candidate is eligible for reimbursement from the public purse.

Reams and volumes of books have been published over the years on election financing in Canada. The stack is quite high. It all has to do with financing elections in Canada and ensuring that financing is straightforward and transparent. It ensures that candidates who are able to run in elections come forward to represent their constituencies without having to be independently well off.

The election financing rules are intended to ensure that candidates are not bought by individuals. That is why there are limits on campaign expenditures. That is why there is full disclosure on funding of individual and national campaigns.

The bill speaks only to the national campaigns. It was motivated during the last election when I found myself, as everyone in the House did, in the situation where there was a cacophony of candidates representing quite a wide variety of platforms.

Perhaps the most outrageous was the platform of the yogic flyers. While the debates were going on I wondered what yogic flying had to do with running our country and what yogic flying could do to get our country out of debt and make our country work better. At first I am sure many people thought it was a joke. We certainly do not want to dissuade anyone from running and getting involved in politics. And perhaps yogic flyers do have the answer to Canada's problems.

I wish to inform the Chair that it is my intention to share my time with my colleague from Okanagan Centre.

• (1735)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. McClelland: Madam Speaker, here we were in the middle of the election campaign surrounded by yogic flyers.

That would have been great, except that when the election was over I checked into it. They received a grand total of 84,000 votes in the last election, .6 per cent of the total votes cast. They also received $717,000 from the taxpayers of Canada in reimbursement for their national campaign expenditures. It worked out that the taxpayers of Canada reimbursed them $8.41 for every vote cast. They spent $37.38 for every vote they received, which is their business. It did not make sense to me that the taxpayers of Canada should be subsidizing what really is not a political party.

The intention of having the national campaign party reimbursement was to ensure that national or regional political parties had some income between elections. It was intended to keep them going. National or regional political parties are necessary for the lifeblood of the country.

In looking at the campaign expenditures, we thought about how we would make sure the hurdle was low enough, so small that parties could get started yet high enough to be real. We came up with the figure of 2 per cent. Federal parties would have to have spent 10 per cent of their total allowable limit and also have garnered 2 per cent of the total votes cast. In the last election that would be something like 270,000 votes across the country.

Some with whom I have discussed this bill have suggested it might be appropriate to have a lower threshold. If that is the case, I would be quite happy to consider amending this bill to have a lower threshold, perhaps 1 per cent.

Mr. Milliken: Why not higher?

Mr. McClelland: That would still be 130,000 votes across the country. As an hon. member opposite mentioned, why not higher? If it is the will of this House either in committee or in debate that it should be higher, that could be considered. In my view, 2 per cent was high enough that it was a hurdle but low enough that it was possible to achieve.

I wish to reiterate the intent is not to prevent new parties from getting going. The intent is in keeping with the spirit of the Electoral Reform Commission to ensure hurdles are in place to protect the public purse, to ensure that genuine political parties are able to benefit from the very wise intentions of those that preceded us in this House.

I ask hon. members opposite to give this bill their consideration and support. It may save us somewhere in the region of $1 million, which for most Canadians is quite a lot of money. For the federal budget, it is not that large an amount. However, it is not just the amount, but the principle we are talking about.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased and happy today to be able to support my colleague from Edmonton Southwest and his bill to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Canadians are a people with a profound respect for democracy. Look around at the make–up of the House. We know by the change that took place from the last election to this one how democracy is respected in our country.

We understand representation very well. We respect it even when we do not necessarily agree with everything our representatives say. One of the things that brings this home most clearly is the structure of our electoral system.

We conduct open, free and fair elections in Canada. We give political parties tools to raise funds and to run candidates. We place limits and restrictions on their activities during and between writs to ensure fairness, even in dealing with each other and with the public. We have disclosure rules to make the system transparent. But our system also has some flaws. The bill put forward by my hon. colleague is all about addressing one of those flaws.

Bill C–319 seeks to limit the reimbursement of election expenses to those parties that have spent more than 10 per cent of their allotted expense amount as described in section 46 of the Canada Elections Act if and only if they receive more than 2 per cent of the vote nationally. What this would do is limit expense reimbursement to only those parties that have received a significant number of votes in the election, those parties that have a reasonable level of public support among Canadian voters.

In the most recent election, Elections Canada reports that there were 19,906,796 registered voters. This means that with this bill a party would have to have received 398,136 votes nationally to be eligible for reimbursement of election expenses. I do not think it is unreasonable for Canadians to expect a party to give a reasonable showing in an election before hard earned tax dollars are handed over to help it pay its bills.

What this bill seeks to prevent is the situation that arose in the last election. During that election certain parties were either well financed or had policies that were way out of touch with reality but were still well financed. These parties managed to field a large number of candidates and spent considerable sums on their campaigns. The taxpayer reimbursed them for a sizeable chunk of those expenses, even though they received only a very tiny portion of the overall national vote.

It does not sit well with me nor with many other Canadians that we are reimbursing expenses to parties that do not get more than a handful of the overall votes. I am not advocating the restriction of the electoral system here, far from it. I am only suggesting that it is about time we started to apply some fiscal restraint to our electoral system just as we are to the rest of the functions of government.

Parties should in no way be limited from forming or running as many candidates as they can muster. Parties should be allowed to spend as they see fit within the current rules set out by Elections Canada. Parties that do not command a significant share of the vote should not expect the Canadian taxpayer to cough up money to pay their bills.

I need to correct myself. We want 2 per cent of the total votes cast which in the last election would have worked out to 270,000 votes or thereabouts. The earlier figure I used was a theoretical number based on the actual number of people who could have cast a ballot.

The reimbursement of election expenses should be a privilege enjoyed by those parties that have demonstrated they have the support of a significant proportion of Canadians. It is that simple.

What Bill C–319 seeks to introduce is fairness and fiscal restraint in the electoral system. We all know that fiscal restraint is absolutely essential in Canada today. We want political parties to demonstrate that they are deserving of any benefits they might derive from the taxpayer. We want them to show that they have support at the ballot box before they get the support from tax dollars. It is really all about fairness.

If a party deserves to be reimbursed because it has support among the people, it will be. If, however, a party is using the electoral system in this country as a soapbox for personal or questionable exposure and the people ignore it, then it should pay its own bills.

Again, I am not suggesting that we limit participation in any way. It is just that parties that do not command a certain level of support from the voters should not expect those same voters to bail them out with tax dollars. It is about being fair, responsible and accountable to the taxpayer for the dollar spent.

I am pleased to offer my support to my colleague from Edmonton—Southwest in this Bill C–319.

• (1745)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am highly interested in the bill introduced today by the member for Edmonton Southwest. I congratulate him on the fact that his bill was chosen. I hope that today, or at a later date, the House will adopt the bill at second reading so that it can be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs which will study it, and maybe recommend a few amendments before sending it back to the House for concurrence.

[English]

The bill purports to put a minimum in place for contributions from the federal treasury for parties participating in elections. The hon. member has proposed a political party must receive at least 2 per cent of the votes cast in order to be eligible for the 22.5 per cent reimbursement allowed under section 322 of the Canada Elections Act.

The hon. member will be aware there is a fairly significant history in relation to this issue which might be of interest to him and other hon. members wishing to participate in the debate today. The Lortie commission, the report of the royal commission on electoral reform and party financing, recommended registered parties that receive at least 1 per cent of all the ballots cast be reimbursed at a rate of 60 cents for each vote received provided that no party would be reimbursed at an amount greater than 50 per cent of its electoral expenses.

This increase proposed by the Lortie commission rewarded parties that received a large number of votes in proportion to the number of votes they received and also increased the rate for the major parties so they would get more money because there was a recognition that at the national level Canada's national parties are generally short of cash, particularly those not forming the government.

There was a recognition by the royal commission that the governing party had an easier time raising funds than parties in opposition to the government. In part to offset that the commission recommended this rather generous reimbursement procedure but based on votes so that only a party that was fairly successful in the polls would receive a substantial chunk of money.

The hon. member will know there were extensive discussions between the parties about the Lortie recommendations. In the last Parliament I had the honour to be a member of the special committee on electoral reform which dealt with the Lortie proposals in some detail and came up with a series of reports tabled in the House. One of the reports resulted in the adoption of Bill C–114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, in the last Parliament. The other major report from the committee was never acted on by the government prior to the dissolution of Parliament and accordingly this issue, as were some others, was left untouched.

The committee, composed with representatives of the three recognized parties then in the House, the NDP, the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal Party—the Progressive Conservatives of course had a majority on the committee—was unable to agree on the Lortie commission proposal.

While it was something that would have been palatable with our party, the New Democratic Party in particular found it offensive because it would have received far less money than under the current legal arrangements. The Progressive Conservative Party, looking at the polls, was very nervous it might also be disastrous for it and so it was not very keen on it.

I say with some pride the Liberal Party has always done well in the polls, whether in opposition or in government. Hon. members opposite laugh but it has been a fact for really all of this century that we would have come out reasonably well on any scenario with this arrangement. Other parties were more apprehensive and based on the election results in 1993, I can understand their apprehension. We all know the New Democratic Party took a terrible whipping, although well deserved, and the Progressive Conservative Party similarly was thrashed, and very properly so.

They would have felt this rule in a very harsh way had they adopted it before the election, which this party would not and had not in any election. With all the elections it has lost in this century it still would have done all right under a rule of this kind.

I now want to turn to what the committee did. The committee came up with another way of enriching the parties a little, and that was to increase the reimbursement from 22.5 per cent to 25 per cent and simply leave the rules as they were. That was the only deal we could make which every party agreed on and it was part of a package which included other changes to the financing of political parties. Of course none of it was enacted.

I do not mind telling hon. members opposite one of the points the government was very anxious to include in the bill was a restriction on the minimum number of votes one had to receive in order to qualify. The government was very anxious to put in place a figure which I think was around 5 per cent. That would have put at risk various other parties that were more regionally based. When I say that I look at the two parties in opposition because both of those parties come from a fairly regional base. I think the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest would concede the Reform Party is not strong in Quebec or in Atlantic Canada.

We resisted that at the time because we felt if we were to have a regional basis to the parties it was unfair to stack the deck against the establishment of new parties and we were naturally somewhat concerned about that. Therefore we resisted and I think I can safely say from the point of view of hon. members opposite it is probably just as well we did.

However, that is history and certainly from a theoretical point of view there was no objection on our part to putting some minimum number of votes obtained in place. Therefore, to have this bill before us today and allow the committee to study it is very important. I support the hon. member in that objective.

However, I cannot let the opportunity pass without commenting on the 2 per cent figure. It strikes me as being rather low. In South Africa and in Germany where there is a system of proportional representation, in order to qualify to get any seats in the legislature they have to have at least 5 per cent of the votes. That is my recollection. That is to get seats, let alone reimbursement.

In our country we can win seats in Parliament in one or two places, as we had with the Reform Party which had one member in the last Parliament, the hon. member for Beaver River, who was here throughout that Parliament. With a modest number of votes in a general election a party can still have seats in the House. We have two areas in which there is reimbursement, at the national party level and at the constituency level. If one is successful at the constituency level, money is paid to the successful candidates and to the other candidates who run well.

In looking at the 2 per cent figure I cannot help but look at the results of the 34th general election, the 1988 election. Eight parties ran in that election which would not have qualified using the rule of the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest. They all had less than 1 per cent of the vote. However, the one party over 2 per cent was the Reform Party. That party received 2.09 per cent of the vote in 1988. It is an extraordinary coincidence that 2 per cent is the figure which the hon. member chose because of course it saved the Reform Party based on the 1988 results. I am sure he did not look at the results to come up with the figure, but perhaps a researcher did.

While it has initial appeal, I think a little higher figure might not be inappropriate. I would have hated to see the Reform Party cut out of the financial jackpot if we had put it too high in the last election. I cannot remember if that party broke 5 per cent. I would want to look at a higher figure in committee. I served notice to that effect and I certainly look forward to hearing the witnesses the committee is able to call on this bill, should the House in its wisdom decide to give the bill approval in principle at second reading.

There are lots of ways to skin a cat, as they say, and I think there are many ways we could seek to improve Canada's electoral law with respect to the reimbursement of political parties. I am glad to see the Reform Party by this bill is adopting the principle that the state does have an important role to play with respect to the reimbursement of political parties because that is certainly something we have regarded as fundamental for some time and on which occasionally I have heard statements. I cannot say I have read the little blue book, but I have heard statements that make me wonder if the Reform Party really is committed to this principle.

I assume this bill put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest has some approval from the powers that be in his party, including the member for Calgary Southwest who I gather has some say in these matters, that this is okay and this principle therefore is satisfactory.

I am glad to support the principle. I hope we can work out a series of rules that will be fair not just to the parties currently in the House but to other parties formed in Canada and also to the Canadian taxpayer.

The problem with the current system is it encourages parties that are registered and fielding the requisite number of candidates to spend as much money as they can. As long as they spend 10 per cent of their limit, I believe, they become entitled to a reimbursement of 22.5 per cent of their expenses no matter how many votes they get. I agree that is wrong. There should not be an incentive to spend.

In my view, the money paid should be based on some other principle, whether it is on the number of votes received or on a minimal number of votes one must get in order to qualify for the expense. Something needs to go into the law.

I quite agree with the hon. member in bringing this forward. I would be glad to support the bill at second reading in order that the standing committee may do a detailed study on the proposal.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure today to represent the official opposition in this debate on Bill C–319. Before I start, I would like to salute and thank the members who are constantly striving, through their work and reflection, to improve the elections act and the way our tax money is managed, with a view to reaching a very significant goal, namely the representation of the people.

On behalf of the official opposition, I would like to give a point of view based solely on democratic principles in action. The purpose of this bill is to allow only those registered parties that have received 2 per cent of the total number of votes cast in a national election to receive a 22.5 per cent reimbursement of their election expenses.

We believe that this new provision of the Canada Elections Act will result in making it more difficult—and I especially stress more difficult—the emergence and survival of a variety of political formations which often reflect political diversity and a rich and vibrant democratic life.

I do understand the underlying principle of the bill, which is to avoid reimbursing part of the election expenses of groups or factions formed to campaign in favour of a political idea shared by a tiny minority. I believe that this bill is aimed at the Natural Law Party, for example. We have no intention of launching into an endless debate, even if I am opposed to the principle of the bill. Again, I understand the bill's objectives. It could, however, set a dangerous trend for democracy in Quebec and Canada.

Since a political party is already required to nominate at least 50 candidates to be registered, which I feel is enough to confirm how serious a political formation is, why should it also be required to receive at least 2 per cent of the total number of votes cast in an election to be eligible for a 22.5 per cent reimbursement of its expenses? Preventing the wasteful use of public funds to promote silly ideas during an election campaign is one reason, but it is not enough to convince me that this bill is justified.

In my opinion, this bill is strangely reminiscent of Bill C–229 tabled by the Reform Party, which would require a political party to nominate candidates in at least seven provinces in order to be registered. I think that both these bills are similar to the extent that they both seek to limit the expression of democracy in Canada.

Make no mistake. This is a discussion about principles, a discussion that could lead us in this House to debate the relevance of the multiparty system at the so–called "national" level.

Bill C–229, which required a political party to nominate candidates in at least seven provinces that have, in the aggregate, at least 50 per cent of the population of all the provinces, was nothing short of undemocratic. We regarded it as an insult to democracy, because it denied Quebec's right, as a distinct society, to have its own representatives in the federal legislature.

In Canada, the multiparty system is also a matter of regional representation, and that is what the bill denied. In the past, several political parties have been active on the Canadian scene while based only in one province. As early as 1920, members from other parties started to be elected to the House of Commons in relatively large numbers and with enough support and credibility to influence the democratic system. In the 1930s, the Social Credit and the Commonwealth Cooperative Federation, for example, represented very special interests, and their demands and aspirations were in no way national in nature; these were movements created by Western farmers to protest the excessive taxation powers of a highly centralizing federal government.

So, why limit access for the political representation of minority views and amend the Canada Elections Act if not to prevent Quebec in particular from voicing its rejection of the old national parties, the people commonly referred to as the Grits and the Tories?

Let us be clear. The introduction of such restrictions on the exercise of a democratic right in the Canada Elections Act would mean the end of the multiparty concept in the Canadian electoral system. We feel that the provision requiring that a party gets 2 per cent of the votes to have part of its expenses repaid is a restrictive measure.

Such bills promote the emergence of a one–way political life, of a biparty system essentially dominated by two parties taking turns to defend the same interests and the same vision of a very centralized Canada.

The biparty system does not reflect the geographical reality of Canada. Our country is part of a continent. Each region of that continent is a country in itself, with its language, its character and its cultures. In that context, we feel that the Canadian culture is a myth.

The two party system can no longer reflect reality across the continent; the rout of the Conservative Party of Canada in the last general election is proof of that, even though the hon. member for Sherbrooke is trying like the very devil to resurrect his party.

Mr. Ostrogorsky, one of the fathers of modern political analysis, condemned—and this democratic approach is important—what he called the "perverse effects of a mechanical democracy". He was referring to the two party or one party political regimes under which the democratic life looks somewhat mechanical and loses all its meaning. "The ongoing nature of parties is the basis for the development of the machine and disturbs the workings of democracy", he wrote. Therefore, the appropriate solution to the problem of parties appears obvious. He felt that we have to get rid of the use of rigid and permanent parties, whose only goal is to gain central power. Where I come from, we say that it does not make the slightest difference whether the Tories or the Grits are in power.

We should go back to the true nature of political parties, that of groups of citizens formed to promote certain policies. The author describes political parties as forums where all those who are trying to solve a given problem or reach a given goal have a role to play and an opinion to voice on each and every issue. They are a kind of comprehensive and regional association.

He writes: "In countries with a bipartisan system like the United States, Great Britain—and Canada, I should add—political debate all but disappears. When the discussion revolves around the vision of the Tories or the Grits, we end up nowhere. Real debates on social issues take place outside the political parties".

So, he makes the basic and implicit assumption that there is no universality in the differences of opinion within our society and that our conflicts and differences cannot be resolved by a single entity.

The last general election proved that the two major parties, the Conservative and the Liberal parties, the Tories and the Grits, are no longer alone in the Canadian political arena, which is being redesigned according to regional considerations that have nothing to do with the concept of a Canadian nation. To us, any measure aimed at limiting the expression of political differences at the continental level is inconceivable.

This is why the Bloc Quebecois, the official opposition, is against this bill and wants to point out during this debate that we are now faced with a new democratic approach which recognizes the fact that, since the last election, there is no longer a truly national party in Canada. We have well–represented regions, which clearly indicates the goals we have to reach.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am glad to be here today to debate this private member's bill.

Private Members' Business gets far too short a shrift in this Parliament as it did in other Parliaments. It is a time for private members who do not get to set the legislative agenda of the government, both on the government side and indeed in the opposition, to come forward with pieces of legislation that they believe will fix things that are wrong.

Some of Private Members' Business is inherently partisan, which is fine; that is the nature of the beast in this place. Some seeks to try to get some consensus and camaraderie around the Chamber with respect to principles, goals and ideas.

I do not support the bill in its entirety but I do understand the direction the hon. member is trying to set. Having run in two elections and having run election campaigns in a number of elections prior to that, I know it is extremely difficult as a candidate or as a campaign manager when one gets individuals or indeed parties that form for a very frivolous reason the intention to go out and paint everybody else who has a legitimate political belief as somehow ripping off the system.

We have seen that all the time. The Rhinoceros Party and some other regional parties form for the sole intention of trying to make some fun out of the very serious business of politics. It is difficult as a candidate when that happens. However, one has to be extremely careful when one starts introducing pieces of legislation whose impact may be to limit entry of legitimate political thought in our system. It begs the question of what is legitimate political thought. That is really in the ear or eye of the beholder.

One of the major problems I have with the bill and one of the reasons I could not support it in its current form, although I would support it's going to committee so that we can at least have some non–partisan debate not structured by our parties with respect to this issue, deals with the percentages. The reason I had difficulty with the percentages, and the hon. member will be interested in hearing this, is not so much that I am opposed to setting a benchmark below which a party is not deemed to be worthy of support by the taxpayers of Canada. I am worried for two reasons. One is that I firmly believe we have to do everything humanly possible to ensure genuine political debate is fostered, that it does not become the purview of the rich and the famous and those who can bankroll on their own.

The second thing we have to be very careful of is the minimums when one starts establishing in law certain parameters within which political debate and thought must be conducted. Otherwise one will not be able to get the type of funding necessary, which in turn will thwart the fostering of new political thought, new political ideologies.

I did some quick math. In Atlantic Canada we have 32 constituencies. One thing that strikes an individual after getting elected, be they from Alberta, Nova Scotia, northern Ontario or Quebec, is the vastness of this nation. This is a wonderful piece of God's earth. Although from time to time we just deal with our troubles, it really behoves us to think about the enormity of the resource we have.

It is a regional country, like it or not. I am a regionalist. I believe the country is made up of a number of regions. We may have provincial boundaries that fit inside those regions, but most of all it is a country of regions.

In Atlantic Canada many times we have voted differently than the rest of the country has. I remember back in 1984 when the Conservative Party first came into power there was a sweep across the country. The sweep was not nearly as complete in Atlantic Canada. In 1988, while the Tories enjoyed a second electoral victory, in Atlantic Canada the tides turned. Atlantic Canadians moved away from that governing party in a larger percentage than any other region of the country.

An hon. member: We are awfully smart.

Mr. MacDonald: We are awfully smart and perhaps that is it.

Different regions may find different political ideologies appealing for whatever reason. In Atlantic Canada we have 32 seats. We are a vital part of the nation. We have the great province of Newfoundland. We have Prince Edward Island, the birthplace of Confederation. We have the bluenosers from Nova Scotia and the herring chokers from New Brunswick. We have 32 wonderful constituencies and four tremendous provinces as part of this great country.

The Tories did not do terribly well in the last election, as we know, right across the country. In Atlantic Canada they did not do terribly well either. The message of the Reform Party was so objectionable to the people in Atlantic Canada that people who could not see their way to vote for the Liberal Party stayed with the Tory Party, knowing their vote would be lost, that the Tories would not get another term in office. They could not go with the third option, the Reform Party. They will never go with the Reform Party. That will never be an option down there.

The Tories did exceedingly well with respect to how they did in other parts of the country. They got wiped out as well there, with the exception of the member for Saint John, the former mayor, who perhaps most days wishes she had not been so lucky to win that night.

In Atlantic Canada the rough math tells me that the Tories in 32 seats polled about 290,000 votes. That is pretty close to the two per cent limit set out in the bill. I do not have them all marked, but I will run through the percentages of votes cast that Tories received in all of the ridings in Nova Scotia: 20 per cent, 8, 22, 11, 32, 36, 23, 20, 23, and 32.

I do not throw those numbers out to say the Tories are a viable alternative now or in the future. I throw them out to show they did still garner a significant vote because the Reform Party's message was not saleable in Atlantic Canada in the last election. It probably never will be.

Mr. Epp: You wait, you'll see.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member for Delta knows of which I speak.

There are 32 ridings in Atlantic Canada. The Tories scored fairly well, better than they should have and better than they did on the national average. Yet if that were a regional party in Atlantic Canada it would have garnered only about two per cent of the vote nationally. I have a problem with the percentage. Two per cent is probably too high, and perhaps the percentage should be lowered to about one per cent.

Another concern is with respect to the establishment of minimums. When we establish minimums, many times they become maximums. Perhaps down the road, if this bill is fortunate enough to gain the consent of the House, people might say there is a precedent that there have to be certain criteria before you are deemed to be a legitimate political party in Canada. It may also be that at some point you must win seats in more than one province or more than one region before you get a political rebate.

I know that is not covered in the member's bill. I worry that at some point, unless a bill like this is crystal clear and the the debate is crystal clear leading up to the adoption of such a bill, somebody would try to use it as a precedent to do those certain things.

• (1815)

I do not support our colleagues in the House who represent the Bloc Quebecois. I believe that deep down they are good individuals but they are terribly misguided with respect to their desire to take the great province of Quebec, la belle province, out of the great Canadian Confederation.

However, they have a legitimate right as a political party to voice their concerns, to go out and seek support in a general election through the democratic process. I would not want to see at some future point even separatists in the province of Quebec somehow trying to use a restrictive bill like this which seeks to put parameters on legitimate political parties for the purposes of rebate to stifle political thought they found to be objectionable.

I commend the hon. member for putting thought into this bill and I hope it does go to committee so it can get some fuller debate at committee.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I congratulate the member for Edmonton Southwest on Bill C–319. It is very obvious the debate has started members thinking about a very important issue.

I will approach it in a slightly different way. One of the issues it raises which is so important in our electoral process is appearances. I remember my own election campaign, which was a first experience for me since I had never run for election before, going to all candidates meetings in which there were the five major parties represented as well as another four candidates from very minor parties.

I do not reject the right of groups to try to run as national parties; I think it is fine. However, we have to draw the line somewhere. At these candidates meetings I found myself with the candidates from the other major parties speaking on issues, then having to waste my turn while these very minor parties spoke. In the case of the Natural Law Party—its members will forgive me for saying this—their platform which had to do with levitation did not really seem to fit seriously into the issues of the day.

While I agree they had the right to speak and the right to run as parties in the election, they did dilute the debate when we had our candidates meetings. They also diluted the debates when they appeared in the media. It has a responsibility to provide equal space to all candidates in an election. Perhaps the debate was not as good or as serious as it could have been. I agree we can do nothing about that.

On the other hand, I find myself supporting the member's bill on this point. If the public were to perceive, as it does, that anyone is eligible for compensation in running for election regardless of any limit in the number of votes they garner, it trivializes for them the exercise of candidacy, the exercise of running in a national election.

If the Natural Law Party wants to run for election, that is fine. If it wants to field candidates, that is fine. If it wants to use an election as a platform for promoting its particular agenda of metaphysicalism or whatever it is, that is fine too. It becomes a problem when the public perceives it is funding that type of group. This is the difficulty.

It is the same with all the other parties as well. If the public perceives a group is out promoting itself in a national election and does not have much support or has trivial support, and the government funds its election expenses because it can afford to put the money out there, then we erode our political system and the faith people have in the process.

I do support the principle of Bill C–319. We have to draw the line somewhere. Whether it should be 1 per cent, 2 per cent or 5 per cent, I cannot say. I actually rather like 2 per cent. Nine of the 14 parties that ran in the last election had less than 2 per cent of the vote.

It is interesting to run down the percentages of those nine. Beginning with the Abolitionist Party of Canada at 0.1 per cent, the next was 0.2 per cent, 0.1 per cent, 0.1 per cent, 0.2 per cent, 0.1 per cent, .01 per cent for the Marxist–Leninist Party of Canada. It is not doing well. Then we go on to 0.6 per cent and 1.4 per cent, which was the National Party of Canada which I happen to agree had a message.

I agree with the intention of Bill C–319. The line has to be drawn somewhere. I do not know if this bill is the answer. As the member for Dartmouth and others mentioned, we should bring this to committee for further debate. In the final analysis I do not think it will affect regional parties. We will still be able to go forward with certain amendments to the bill which will make the process more efficient.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, there have been conversations earlier this day among party whips. If you would seek it you would find unanimous consent that the vote be deferred until tomorrow at 5.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Shall I call it 6.30 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

WORLD BANK AND INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Madam Speaker, on May 8 I asked the hon. Minister of the Environment and Deputy Prime Minister whether the G–7 leaders at the June meeting in Halifax will discuss the important issue of making the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund environmentally sustainable institutions.

At present, the lending programs of international financial institutions, including the World Bank and the International Monetary fund, provide mostly developing countries with over $30 billion a year in the form of loans. Too often these loans fail to take into account environmental and social considerations as in the case of dam construction.

Closing the gap between the rich developed nations and poor developing countries must remain the principal goal of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. We all agree with that. However, these institutions and their initiatives in developing countries must aim at alleviating poverty while protecting the environment. That is where the point needs to be made.

In the case of the International Monetary Fund, we feel that instead of relying predominately on economic considerations, economic and environmental goals should be integrated.

As to the World Bank, while it has made some progress toward greater accountability, it still has a long way to go to fully incorporate sustainable development principles into the decision–making process. Furthermore, at every opportunity the World Bank should ensure that the principles of international environmental agreements such as the convention on climate change and the one on biodiversity, to mention two, are upheld and reinforced by its decisions.

It is my understanding that the Prime Minister intends to discuss the role of international financial institutions at the next meeting of the G–7 in June in Halifax. Therefore, in that context I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he can inform us whether the urgency of incorporating the principles of sustainable development into the activities of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund will be discussed there.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Madam Speaker, first let me say that the meeting hosted in Hamilton by the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment for the G–7 environment ministers reached substantive recommendations and conclusions.

With respect to the question of international institutions, the ministers looked at two different aspects. First, they discussed the roles and responsibilities of the primary international institutions that address the environment and sustainable development. The ministers agreed that the United Nations environment program should be reinforced in its efforts to be the global environmental voice, while the United Nations commission on sustainable development, created just over two years ago in the aftermath of Rio, should continue to evolve as a key political and policy forum to promote sustainable development principles and practices worldwide.

With respect to international financial institutions, the ministers agreed that the World Bank should place sustainable development at the top of its list of priorities and that it should operate on a much more open and transparent basis. Plans for projects funded by the World Bank should demonstrate how the principles of sustainable development will be promoted and how local participation will be a basic part of the process.

The ministers also called on the International Monetary Fund to take environmental considerations into account in its structural adjustment programs. They also called for continued work from the new global environmental facility, the GEF, on providing funding for global environment priorities and noted the important role that private capital flows will play into the future. They also indicated their intention to work with the new World Trade Organization to make sure the environment is a fundamental part of its work. In this regard, let me signal the initiatives recently taken by UNCTAD and UNEP in focusing on the environment and the economy.

The important outcomes of the Hamilton meeting of environment ministers are being provided to the preliminary process for the Halifax summit. I am certain that any consideration of financial institutions that might take place in the context of the Halifax summit will be well informed by the views of the Hamilton meeting, which will flow into the Halifax summit.

INTERNAL TRADE

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Madam Speaker, during a previous question period, when addressing comments regarding Bill C–88 to the Minister of Industry, I suggested that Bill C–88 contained provisions which go far beyond the agreement on interprovincial trade, which gives each party recourse to retaliatory measures.

Bill C–88 appropriates powers to the federal government which were never discussed during the negotiations leading up to the signing of the agreement on interprovincial trade last summer and is also indicative of, we feel strongly, the federal Liberal government's extremely strong will to centralize trade relations with its partners. The current trend in international trade is to give regions more political autonomy and to establish economic unions, not to create big federations with rigid centralizing constitutions, like the Canadian federation, which is given an inordinate amount of power to take retaliatory measures.

The primary goal of the bill is to implement the Agreement on Internal Trade, not to permit the federal government to implant itself as the supreme power on interprovincial trade. Do not forget that the Bloc Quebecois has always been in favour of liberalizing trade in this way, which, at any rate, is the framework within which all modern states must develop. Therefore, we do agree with the agreement in principle.

The way we understand the provisions of this agreement is that, if the federal government is the slighted party in a trade deal covered by the agreement, it has the means to take retaliatory measures. By the way, so can any other party to this agreement. However, that is not what is written in Bill C–88.

Why not? Because clause 9 of the bill goes over and above the intent of the agreement. This is quite straightforward. Clause 9 reads as follows: "For the purpose of suspending benefits or imposing retaliatory measures of equivalent effect against a province pursuant to Article 1710 of the Agreement, the Governor in Council may, by order—but the other parties may not—"

The bill refers to orders, which cannot be taken lightly. None of the other parties have this authority. Orders are used by totalitarian governments to subdue the other parties. It says in this bill that the Liberal government wants to govern by order under this agreement on interprovincial trade. Are we looking at a dictatorship? That is the question.

In this context, according to the wording of Clause 9, when one of the parties is found to be at fault pursuant to Article 1710 of the Agreement, the federal government—and it alone, among all the parties—whether or not it is a party to the dispute, assumes the right to impose retaliatory measures on all the provinces, without exception.

In this bill, the federal government demonstrates its determination to act as judge and jury in the area of interprovincial trade, to introduce its exclusive authority to act by order in council and to extend the application of any federal law to the provinces—

[English]

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the questions raised by some members on Bill C–88 last week stem from an inability or an unwillingness to understand the plain meaning of the text of the bill.

The Minister of Industry was quite clear in responding to questions in the House on May 5. Perhaps repetition at this time will help the hon. member.

Only in rare cases would the federal government be a complainant in the dispute under the agreement on internal trade. If a dispute were resolved in favour of the federal government and if the province involved refused to comply with the impartial panel findings, then the federal government could withdraw benefits of equivalent effect. Such retaliation would have to be in the same sector as the original violation or in another sector covered by the agreement. Retaliation could not involve transfer payments or social programs because those things are not covered by the agreement. Anyone who takes the time to read the head notes to section 9 of Bill C–88 and article 1710 of the agreement on internal trade can verify the accuracy of what I have just outlined.

• (1835)

Remarks by Quebec premier Parizeau and Quebec industry minister Paillé on May 9 and May 10 suggest they had not bothered to do so before speaking on the issue. The repeated expressions of concern in this question by BQ and PQ representatives suggest they are unable or unwilling to understand plain and clear language.

Bill C–88 deals only with what the federal government must do to live up to its obligations under the internal trade agreement and nothing else.

At the April 12 meeting of the committee of ministers on internal trade, the Minister of Industry advised his provincial colleagues of the steps the government intended to take and that legislation would shortly be brought before Parliament.

Premier Parizeau has unequivocally supported the agreement and stressed the importance of free trade within Canada. He reaffirmed on May 9:

[Translation]

"The change in government in Quebec City has changed nothing. We believe in free trade".

[English]

I am sure all Canadians look forward to seeing what those governments that claim to support internal free trade actually do in concrete terms.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Madam Speaker, in late April gas stations across Canada raised prices as much as 10 cents a litre. It was the sixth price increase of gas in 11 months.

These increases excluding tax increases represent a 20 per cent increase in the price of gas to consumers. What is even more startling is that oil companies have seen a 40 per cent increase in their revenues once taxes are factored out in the same period.

There has been no reasonable justification by the oil companies for these repeated increases. Each year since 1991 the average daily price of crude has declined. Crude prices today are virtually the same as they were a year ago with the 11 months in between seeing lower prices.

The profits of the major oil companies including Imperial Oil, Shell and Petro–Canada have increased each year over the past three years. In 1994 Imperial Oil profits went up 29 per cent; Shell went up 43 per cent and Petro–Canada went up 62 per cent.

When gas prices have risen they have risen uniformly from company to company in each region within hours of each other. Consumers are outraged and believe strongly that they are again the victims of price gouging at the pumps and price fixing by the oil companies.

This latest series of price increases is nothing more than a cash grab by the major oil companies that monopolize the industry.

In a recent court case in Ottawa a gasoline retailer, Mr. Gas, admitted communications between gasoline retailers are common in the industry when setting prices. What this means is if smaller chains set prices, certainly the majors do.

This latest increase in gas prices represents an extreme polarization of power and wealth into one sector, multinational oil companies. This increase is also extremely bad timing for farmers who are seeding their crops.

The increase is injuring Canada's economic recovery and must be addressed. Every two–cent increase costs Canadian $750 million a year. These recent increases of six cents will take over $2 billion out of the Canadian economy in one year.

The federal government must intervene in arbitrarily rolling back gas prices until a full energy price review can take place to ensure these increases are fair and justified.

In my question to the Minister of Industry on April 28 and on May 3, the minister commented: "When the prices are the same, it is consistent with both competition and price fixing. Therefore how do you know which it is?" I suggest that if one does not know the difference that in itself demonstrates the need to conduct an investigation.

The House of Commons is elected to ensure Canadians are not victims of the marketplace and to ensure the interests of Canada are protected. A gas price review would send a clear message to the oil companies and to Canadians that in a key economic sector such as energy fairness must prevail and significant price increases must be justified.

The setting of energy prices is no different than the regulation of communication services. When Rogers cable or Bell Canada want to increase prices, the CRTC reviews their request to ensure they are fair and justified. Having the oil industry justify its increases is no different. Gas prices are viewed by the public as being set unfairly and unjustifiably and must be reviewed and regulated.

The government has the power to question industry on its pricing practices and to create new laws that would demand gas price increases be made only after justification.

Why do the Liberals refuse to act in the best interest of Canadians? The federal Liberal Party receives substantial donations from the oil companies. Husky Oil donated $14,000; Amoco, $27,000; Imperial Oil, $47,000. Is this the reason the government will not conduct an investigation into gas pricing? Is the Liberal Party concerned it will offend its top party donors? He who pays the piper calls the tune. The government—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, the time has expired. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I take this opportunity to respond to the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden on his question concerning the uniformity of gasoline price increases across Canada.

As the matter involving an Ottawa gasoline retailer is presently before the court, it would not be appropriate to comment further on that case.

No federal government agency has the authority to regulate gasoline prices. It is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. In 1994 the Minister of Industry asked the director of investigation and research at the Bureau of Competition Policy to review the provisions of the Competition Act. His report stated the Competition Act is adequate to address concerns about anti–competitive behaviour and that amendments were not required at this time. The report is public and I encourage concerned members to read it.

At the suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre we are presently studying the implications of introducing whistle blower legislation to protect industry insiders who provide information about anti–competitive behaviour in the petroleum industry. The act empowers the director to investigate allegations that prices have been set as a result of anti–competitive behaviour. Where evidence exists of a criminal offence the case is referred to the attorney general for prosecution.

It is important to realize this is criminal law and offences must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. In the petroleum products sector uniform price increases may be the result of normal market forces; the visibility of posted prices and the homogeneity of gasoline tend to result in identical prices in a given market. It is very easy to immediately respond to a competitor's price movements up or down.

Gasoline prices should be set by competitive market disciplines. When there is evidence of anti–competitive behaviour the Competition Act authorities will take appropriate action. People with information about anti–competitive acts should bring the information to the attention of the director.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CLIMATE CHANGE

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today we have the very special honour of having the presence in Ottawa of Western Samoa's High Commissioner to Canada, the permanent representative of Western Samoa to the United Nations, His Excellency, the distinguished Neroni Slade.

His Excellency has just returned from Haines Junction where he addressed federal, provincial and territorial ministers of the environment on the real threat climate change poses to the very existence of Western Samoa and other small island states.

Later this afternoon he will also speak at a joint meeting of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources and the Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development about this critical issue.

Hence it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to welcome to Ottawa our distinguished guest on behalf of all members of this House.

PROFESSOR PIERRE DESLONGCHAMPS

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like today to honour chemistry professor Pierre Deslongchamps of the University of Sherbrooke and offer him our warmest congratulations on his appointment to the Académie des sciences in Paris.

Known for his work on organic synthesis and on the concept of stereoelectric effects, Mr. Deslongchamps has been a professor at the University of Sherbrooke since 1967. The Académie des sciences in Paris is one of the world's most prestigious societies in the world and brings together top researchers in the fields of mathematics, physics, chemistry, natural sciences, biology and medicine. Its members are the 20th century's greatest scientific minds.

A highly respected scientist, Mr. Deslongchamps has been a fellow of the John Simmon Guggenheim foundation in New York since 1979, a member of the Chemical Institute of Canada since 1980, a member of the Royal Society in London since 1983, and a member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science since 1988.

Professor Deslongchamps' international reputation brings honour to the University of Sherbrooke, the Eastern Townships and the Province of Quebec as a whole.

ROYAL ROADS MILITARY COLLEGE

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Royal Roads Military College located in my riding is closing this week and is being gutted.

In this House the Prime Minister assured me that Royal Roads would become an educational facility and would receive the same deal as Collège militaire royal in Quebec. The reality has been completely different.

CMR received $25 million over three years. Royal Roads received the same, but had $5 million promptly removed. Conditionality was linked to the deal on Royal Roads but not to CMR. Most appalling of all, ministers of this government are having secret negotiations with developers to sell up to 300 acres of pristine old growth of Royal Roads property for a condominium development.

The treatment of the staff at Royal Roads has been nothing short of reprehensible. Previous educational facilities purchased by the college, including the school's oceanographic teaching vessel, have been removed. No such parallel exists at CMR.

This government, in collusion with the province, is destroying this superb educational facility. Despite what the Prime Minister says, CMR in Quebec has been given preferential treatment and Royal Roads and the people of B.C. have been shafted.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again we are seeing the Canadian dollar fluctuating on any given week. Last week the dollar surged to a half year high of more than 74 cents U.S. This week the dollar has lingered near the mid–73 cent level.

The Bank of Canada's response is to once again jack up its rate for the first time in almost two months. High interest rates are having a devastating effect on our economy.

For more than a year and a half I have consistently been emphasizing that we must have lower interest rates. The interest rate must come down even if we are faced with a slight increase in inflation. The bogeyman of inflation did not succeed before; it killed the growth of our economy.

A country that is fully employed with some inflation would be better than what we have now. We have a 9.4 per cent unemployment rate that does not include 700,000 part time workers who cannot find full time jobs. We have a triumvirate of destruction of the economy in this country namely—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Ontario.

"THE MAGIC AND THE MYSTERY"

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the House the case of Ms. Susan Shewan. Ms. Shewan, who is a constituent of mine, is also a musician and songwriter of considerable talent.

Unfortunately she is involved in a protracted dispute with Canadian Airlines International and the Government of the Yukon Territory over the alleged unauthorized use of a future album cover drawing, lyrics and music related to Ms. Shewan's song "The Magic and the Mystery".

The drawing, lyrics and music from this song about the beauty of the Yukon are similar to items used in certain advertising and promotional material by both CAI and the Yukon government.

As a single parent with limited finances, Ms. Shewan does not have the resources to pursue a lengthy and protracted legal action to protect her copyrighted material.

I call upon the Yukon government and Canadian Airlines International to respect the intellectual property laws of Canada and Ms. Shewan's copyrights to her original works and resolve this outstanding matter forthwith.

MISSING CHILDREN

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, each May, Child Find Canada holds its Green Ribbon of Hope campaign. The aim is to increase public awareness about Missing Children's Day on May 25.

Community members are asked to show their support of the missing children's issue by prominently wearing a green ribbon. Proceeds generated by the green ribbon campaign will enable Child Find Canada to continue its mandate of assisting in the search process for Canada's thousands of missing children and the education of children and adults about abduction.

The concept of the green ribbon of hope was originated by the students of Holy Cross Secondary School in Ontario following the abduction and subsequent murder of one of its students, Kristen French. In memory of this tragedy, the students and faculty have generously directed that their idea for the green ribbon be used exclusively by Child Find Canada.

• (1405)

Child Find Canada receives no government funding, depending entirely on the corporate community and the Green Ribbon of Hope campaign. For the sake of our children, I ask all members to support this very worthwhile program.

B'NAI BRITH CANADA

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, B'nai Brith Canada is our country's senior Jewish advocacy organization with a 120–year history.

Through its lodges, regional offices, League for Human Rights and Institute for International Affairs, it has built a national and international reputation for service to the community, promoting human rights and fostering tolerance and respect among all Canadians. It has been a world leader in the fight against racism, anti–Semitism and discrimination.

A grassroots membership organization, it has served the Jewish community and Canada with distinction on issues such as immigration and refugee policy, law enforcement, international human rights, the treatment of Jewish communities overseas, intergroup relations in Canada, as well as a host of charitable activities and voluntary action.

On the occasion of its annual meeting in Ottawa this weekend, I urge all members of the House to join me in applauding the work of B'nai Brith and in wishing it future success.

INFORMATION HIGHWAY

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Prime Minister offered Canadians direct access to him through Internet.

Unfortunately, in order to reach him, Canadians must subscribe to and use the services of an American company, CompuService, located in Ohio.

Why did the Prime Minister not use a Canadian network, which, in the opinion of experts, does exist and is currently available at no charge?

How can we believe a government that tells us it gives priority to Canadian content on the information highway when information on members and the House of Commons is being broadcast on the Internet from Switzerland?

The Prime Minister's electronic photo op yesterday sent a disquieting message to Canadians: in order to talk with their Prime Minister, they have to pay user fees to the Americans.

MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the environment minister said: "It is the first question on the environment in a year and a half".

We are now seeing why this minister has been such a failure as Minister of the Environment. She simply does not recognize an environmental question when she hears it.

How quickly the minister chooses to forget my recent questions regarding the clean–up of Canada's worst environmental disaster, the Sydney tar ponds in Nova Scotia, or my colleagues' questions regarding MMT.

When is the Minister of the Environment going to take charge and quit whining that her failures are due to the opposition? When is the minister going to take charge of her own department and pass some meaningful environmental legislation?

It is little wonder that the Prime Minister will be shuffling this minister off into oblivion come this summer. She is simply ineffective.

HIGHWAYS

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, some controversy has arisen relative to the diversion of public funds originally slated for the development of Nova Scotia highway 104.

This funding has now been redirected to a tourist trail in the riding of the minister of public works. In lieu of the original federal–provincial funding agreement for the upgrading of route 104, a toll funded highway is now being envisaged.

This is unacceptable. There have been 40 tragic deaths since 1986 in death valley. People's lives are far more important than developing a tourist trail.

Yesterday in this House the Minister of Transport told us that his government had permitted this diversion of public funds at the request of the Government of Nova Scotia.

Given that the highway improvement program calls for a written agreement in these cases, I call on the Minister of Transport to table all correspondence and documents relative to this backroom deal.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the proposed public service cutbacks are causing quite the stir across the country, particularly in Newfoundland, where the jobless rate remains unacceptably high.

In my riding for example, there is concern about the restructuring and downsizing proposals for Canada employment centres, and about the workforce adjustment policy, job security, seniority rights and the desirability of making departure incentives available to all employees.

Although the government has taken a step forward with its job swap offer, there still is a great fear that the level and quality of badly needed services will suffer at the worst possible time. I share those concerns.

• (1410)

With any changes in the status quo, the government must do everything in its power to ensure that fairness and equity prevail.

CANADIAN TULIP FESTIVAL

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, from today until May 22, the national capital region will again host the Canadian Tulip Festival.

To mark the opening of the festival, Her Royal Highness Princess Margriet of the Netherlands took part in a midday ceremony at Major's Hill Park to launch the 1995 edition of the festival. The festival also coincides with the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the Netherlands by Canadian troops.

This is a good opportunity to remember the thousands of Canadians who fought on Dutch soil and all those who died in the liberation effort. Again this year, the Canadian Tulip Festival will probably stand out as one of the highlights of the national capital's tourist event calendar.

I wish the princess a most enjoyable stay in Canada, the organizers more clement weather than today, and a very good time to all those who will participate in the many activities scheduled.

I would also like to congratulate all the organizers and invite my colleagues to visit the festival in the coming days.

JESSE DAVIDSON

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this Saturday a young man from my riding of London West will begin a remarkable journey. On May 20 on the TransCanada Highway at the Ontario–Manitoba border Jesse and John Davidson will set out together for the Quebec border on a route covering over 2,000 miles. They intend to arrive in September.

Jesse cannot walk. He is afflicted with Duchenne muscular dystrophy, a genetic disorder, and is wheelchair bound. John Davidson has vowed to wheel his son across the entire province of Ontario.

This remarkable undertaking is sponsored by the Foundation for Gene and Cell Therapy. The journey will raise public awareness about DMD as well as money so desperately needed for medical research.

Young people with DMD seldom live to see their twenties. Jesse is 14.

I urge all members of the House, particularly Ontario members, and all Canadians to get involved. I am proud to acknowledge the efforts of individuals who take action to make a difference not only for themselves but for all of us. It is now time to show our support for them.

NATIONAL MARINE STRATEGY

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the anti–worker attitude of Liberal members is reflected in every page of the report on the national marine strategy tabled by the Standing Committee on Transport.

The report contains many negative comments on the supposedly excessive salaries and on job security. On the basis of two recent disputes, the committee recommends that a commission of inquiry be made responsible for reviewing all aspects of labour–management relations. The Liberals are set to call into question a smoothly operating negotiation system in order to resolve a problem that exists only at the Port of Vancouver.

May I remind you that, since 1975, only 27 working days have been lost as a result of strikes or lockouts at the Port of Montreal, out of a total of more than 7,000 working days.

The official opposition strongly urges the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport to reject this recommendation by the transport committee, which calls into question the basic rights of workers in Canada and Quebec.

TROUGH NIGHT IN CANADA

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Monday night Canadians saw a great game on TV. It was trough night in Canada. The game featured the Liberal pork patrons against the overburdened taxpayers. The Liberals were clutching and grabbing for their coveted MP pension trophy.

In the first period Liberals were given penalties for boarding, the gravy train that is. Another penalty was given for charging the taxpayer. The Liberal pork patrons went offside with Canadian voters. The overburdened taxpayer delayed the game and got five minutes for fighting and ten minutes for drawing blood. They will get the final score in the next election. When that comes the Liberal pork patrons will lose, the coach will be replaced and the team will be dismantled.

This game was brought to the people by greed incorporated, manufacturers of pork and patronage.

TAXATION

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Quebec minister responsible for restructuring released a new study, this time on taxation.

In his press release, the minister claims that merging the two tax systems would permit Quebec to, I quote: "—reap many benefits". The minister stressed that taxpayers would have only one tax return to fill out, that they would have fewer officials to deal with, and that taxation measures would be harmonized and streamlined.

• (1415)

What is surprising is that the authors of this study made the conscious decision not to mention that Quebecers could already be reaping all of these benefits if the Quebec government would only agree to the changes already proposed by our government.

All of these changes could be made very easily within the current federal system and at a much lower cost to Quebecers than those that would result from breaking away from Canada. But these are the kinds of things that separatists avoid mentioning.

ONTARIO ELECTION

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Premier Bob Rae said today that Ontario has 38 per cent of the population but is being hit with 54 per cent of federal government cuts. This is deliberately misleading.

When we subtract the equalization payments to the poorer provinces, which Mr. Rae has frequently said he supports, Ontario's share of federal budget cuts is 39 per cent for 38 per cent of the population.

Bob Rae should stop whining, take a few Rae days and get out of the way so Lyn McLeod and the Liberal Party can put Ontario's House in order.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, although somewhat late in the day, the Minister of Human Resources Development finally used some common sense and decided to give up his two–tier unemployment insurance system, with one tier for the seasonally unemployed, with reduced benefits, and the second tier for the rest, with more substantial benefits. However, there is still cause for concern, since the minister said he still wanted to make frequent claimants less dependent on unemployment insurance and planned to submit new proposals to cabinet very shortly.

Will the Prime Minister confirm that his government has definitely abandoned the minister's baby, and I am referring to the unemployment insurance reform proposal for a two–tier system, and is he prepared to make a commitment that the new proposals will not penalize frequent claimants, although the minister seems to be saying that he still has the same objective in mind?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question.

As the member knows, we had a wide variety of representations, studies and examinations. It was certainly recognized that the primary objective of UI reform must be to help people get back to work. We can use that system not simply to pay basic benefits but to also enable people to get the tools they need to restore themselves back in the labour market. That is still the primary function of our intention on unemployment insurance.

We saw with the various options we presented, one of which was the two tier proposal, that it would add complexity to the system and probably additional cost. I think we can find a much better alternative which will simplify the system and at the same time provide a much better set of work incentives for people to get back in the workforce.

We are still very much on target and on aim to enable Canadians to get away from unemployment and get into employment, the whole purpose of our reform.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what the minister said in his answer, and after trying very hard, I think I understood the minister was giving up his plan. I want to commend him for doing so, since a minister who admits his mistakes gains in stature. Would that others followed his example.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard: My question is directed to the Prime Minister, and I hope to get an answer from him. Since the government is about to review its unemployment insurance reform, will he promise to stop using the Unemployment Insurance Fund to finance new intrusions by the federal government in provincial jurisdictions, especially in manpower training?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development will table a bill this fall that covers all aspects of the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Human Resources Development claims he will stay the course, in other words, restrict access to unemployment insurance for frequent claimants, does this mean, and my question is directed to the Prime Minister, that the government's real objective is not to make the system more effective but to reduce costs by restricting access and reducing benefits, which means it will again be hitting hard at the unemployed?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the minister said a few minutes ago, the government's objective is to ensure that people can work. This government's objective is to create jobs, and the aim of reforms in unemployment insurance and other social programs is to make it possible for people to work with dignity instead of being completely dependent on unemployment insurance or welfare.

That is why the minister wants to reform the system, and we will have a chance to discuss this when the minister tables his reform proposals this fall. This reform is badly needed, because these programs were introduced 30 or 40 years ago, and the time has come to make some adjustments.

PEACEKEEPERS IN BOSNIA

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

As fighting intensified in Sarajevo, the Minister of Foreign Affairs indicated yesterday that he was unhappy with the current situation, stating that the peace plan was going nowhere. He also indicated that he would soon be consulting with the French and British authorities, hinting that a pullout from Bosnia could be closer than ever.

Does the Prime Minister confirm what his Minister of Foreign Affairs said yesterday about the possibility of Canada withdrawing its peacekeepers from Bosnia in a few weeks?

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada calls on both parties to withdraw their forces from the zones of separation.

Canada's position all along has been that the conflict can only be resolved at the diplomatic table, politically, not by military means. That is still Canada's position.

The minister made it very clear Canada will not withdraw its forces unilaterally. We are consulting with our partners, France, Great Britain, et cetera.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister or, again, the parliamentary secretary tell us whether Canada is prepared to consider UN Secretary–General Boutros Boutros–Ghali's suggestion that UN troops in Bosnia be reduced and regrouped?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the situation is obviously very complicated in that part of the world at this time. As the hon. parliamentary secretary said, Canada belongs to a group of countries ensuring a military presence in the area and we have agreed not to withdraw without first consulting with our partners. The French have indicated that they were contemplating pulling out, but if and when they do, it will not be unilaterally, since they have asked us not to withdraw our forces unilaterally.

As far as we are concerned, any suggestion from the UN secretary–general deserves to be considered because peacekeepers are under UN command.

So, consultations are under way with the secretary–general, and we will inform the House of any new development.

SOCIAL POLICY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, after months and months of floundering it is becoming abundantly clear the social policy reform Liberal style is all but dead.

The Minister of Human Resources Development has failed to reform anything. His plans for a two tiered unemployment system are now on the back burner, as are income contingent student loans and TAGS retraining. Canada pension reform did not even make it to the back burner. We fear the minister is going the way of the turbot, barely clinging to the front benches by his fingernails.

Why has the minister failed so completely to provide Canadians with a new vision and plan for social policy?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to reply to this question.

Reform of social programs is a very high priority for the government. At the moment the minister is engaged in consultations with the provinces. Members of Parliament have held consultations across the land over many months. We will put all the discussions together and take them to cabinet during the summer.

There will be real reform, not fake reform which the member is trying to promote with the name of his party. I hope the Reform Party will agree with the reforms.

• (1425)

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, reform may be a priority as the Prime Minister says, but the fact is Canada's social safety nets are in a terrible mess.

The federal government's influence over medicare is diminishing, CPP is headed toward bankruptcy, consultations with the provinces are going nowhere, UI is unreformed and Atlantic Canadian workers are quitting their jobs to get on TAGS.

A government that proclaims to be the architect and defender of social safety nets is now presiding over the demise of those safety nets through its inability to act.

Does the Prime Minister want to go down as the Prime Minister who presided over the demise of the social safety nets or does he have a fresh new approach to social policy to lay before the House?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since the road to Damascus I have never seen such a conversion. I am delighted the leader of the Reform Party now supports the safety net.

When we make it more effective in the fall I would be delighted to have his support. It is great that the Reform Party is now getting more and more Liberal.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the collapse of the government's social reform program hurts not only Canadians dependent on those programs but also taxpayers.

Every member of the House knows there is absolutely no way the federal budget will be balanced unless there is social program reform and reform of social spending. If the Minister of Human Resources Development cannot lead that overhaul, then someone else in the government must be assigned the job.

With the Prime Minister prepared to provide leadership on this subject, since his government's budget is undermined by the failure of this minister to overhaul social funding, is it the Department of Finance that will now be providing the leadership for social reform?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the kind of leadership I have shown in this area is when I named an extremely able minister to be in charge of this very important project.

The leader of the third party should relax because I am looking forward to the day he will get up and applaud the Minister of Human Resources Development.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Contrary to what the Minister of Foreign Affairs said yesterday, Foreign Service Directives Nos. 45 and 50 still allow diplomats to cash in their plane tickets to Ottawa, to pay for vacations anywhere in the world. The auditor general is critical of Treasury Board's decision to no longer ask for vouchers.

Given the condition of our public finances and the fact that the government is about to eliminate 45,000 jobs in the public service, how can the President of the Treasury Board still allow such a privilege for diplomats, which will cost over $8 million this year to Canadian taxpayers?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has long been a tradition that those in foreign posts, particularly those considered to be in hardship posts, would have the opportunity for themselves and their families to return home from time to time, once a year in fact.

Of late the policy has involved a reduction in the amount of money to 80 per cent of the full economy fare. That has been on a test basis. All of that is subject to review. Every three years a review is automatically required. It is part of the union agreements. Therefore we will do it with the bargaining agents and it will be done this fall.

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the President of the Treasury Board confirm that this privilege, introduced in 1993, was designed to allow diplomats posted overseas to avoid the salary freeze now affecting public servants?

• (1430)

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Not at all, Mr. Speaker, as has been pointed out.

A number of diplomats serve in hardship posts in spots in the world that nobody would envy. We want to give them and their families the opportunity to be able to come home from time to time. That was the purpose behind all of this.

Having said that, we have to make sure of the best value for the taxpayers' dollar. The program has to be operated in an efficient fashion. We are reviewing it in the normal three–year cycle and will be negotiating this matter with the bargaining agents this fall.

BOSNIA

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as we have already heard today, reports out of Bosnia indicate that the fighting has risen to the highest level in three years. The UN Secretary–General says the current peacekeeping mandate is totally inadequate. Reform has been warning that this would happen for months now, but the government did not listen.

My question is for the Minister of National Defence. For the safety of our peacekeepers, will the government pull our forces out now?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, though we are very concerned about the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the Prime Minister made the government's position quite clear last week.

There is good work still to be done by UNPROFOR. The Canadian government is still committed. We are consulting with our allies to see whether or not the mission should continue and if changes are required what could be implemented.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is no peace in sight in Bosnia. The UN is powerless facing the renewed fighting and no amount of tinkering with the UN mandate is going to change that.

Now is not the time for the Prime Minister to be timid, waiting for the governments of France and Britain to tell him what to do in Bosnia.

Will the Prime Minister stop wavering and initiate the process of withdrawal immediately?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the troops have done a great job.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): I do not think it would be responsible for us to start a process that could result in many lost lives. Canadian soldiers are considered to be the best. I was told so by the president of Bosnia. It was also mentioned when I met last week with the president of Croatia. They both praised the quality of our soldiers' work. Our soldiers are committed to be there and will not leave unilaterally.

When we tell our partners we will do something, Canadians keep their word.

FILM INDUSTRY

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

According to the director of Telefilm Canada, the Minister of Canadian Heritage plans to charge the major American film companies a tax of between 5 per cent and 10 per cent on their revenues for the distribution and showing of their films and videos in Canada. The director of Telefilm Canada has confirmed that the Minister of Canadian Heritage discussed this matter during his now famous trip to Los Angeles.

Would the minister confirm having discussed such a tax with the representatives of the major film companies during his short trip to Los Angeles?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that we have such a strong and imaginative individual, with an eye for change, at the helm of Telefilm Canada. My discussions with the major American companies, however, did not cover this particular point. They were much more general in nature.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as my supplementary, I would ask the minister what measures he is considering in order to force the major American film companies to reinvest in Canadian culture some of the billions of dollars they are making here, as is being done in France, for example?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that our colleague is interested in this matter. Now she understands why the Minister of Canadian Heritage wants a policy on the film industry supporting the interests of the industry in Canada.

There are a number of ways to go about it. This is in fact what I am looking at with representatives of the Canadian industry and with the American major film companies and independents.

FISHERIES

Mr. John Cummins (Delta, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

A key recommendation of the Fraser report was that the federal government not expand the native only commercial fishery. In his rush to conclude the AFS agreements by Monday, the minister expanded this native only commercial fishery to include early chinook salmon on the Fraser River.

Can the minister explain why he broke his commitment to follow John Fraser's recommendation not to expand the AFS commercial fishery?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Delta for his question. I know of his interest in the protection of the salmon resource.

However, the member will know that what the Fraser panel reflected on, both in the report and in the press conference which was held, was the need to ensure that early sales agreements were signed in order to ensure that proper management routines were put in place.

I would have thought that the member would have wanted to stand in his place, given his comments on this matter in the past, and reflect out loud on the fact that this year for the first time since sales have been implemented we have agreements in place fully two months earlier than was the case last year. All of these agreements were reached by the May 15 deadline put in place by the federal government. As a consequence of the early agreements, we will have the best managed, best conservation regime in place for salmon this year for the sales programs in British Columbia.

Mr. John Cummins (Delta, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister is quite correct. Mr. Fraser recommended the early signing of the native fishing agreements so that workable enforcement and management regimes would be established prior to the opening of the first fishery.

However, by allowing the native commercial fishery to start within days of signing the agreements the advantage of the early signing is lost.

Why are we proceeding at this time? Why is the minister giving up the advantage of the early signing? Why is he ignoring his commitment to implement Mr. Fraser's recommendation?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, no objective individual who believes that it is possible for aboriginal people to make and keep agreements in good faith, and who believes it is possible for the people who represent the First Nations and the Government of Canada to sit down and come to reasonable terms on a reasonable sales agreement, would come to the conclusion that having reached agreements two months early, having met the requirements of the Fraser panel report and having negotiated in good faith, is a matter to complain about. That is a matter to celebrate.

I say to the member, let us have some faith in the people who first settled this land, the First Nations people. Let us work with them in good faith and make this agreement work.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Last week, the auditor general reported that the Department of the Environment has not established a program for the disposal the federal government's PCBs, nor has it estimated the total cost of such an operation. The auditor general also confirmed that no funds have been earmarked to cover the cost.

Since the Minister of the Environment has committed herself to disposing of the federal government's PCBs before 1996, will she tell us what the total cost of this operation, which supposedly is already in progress, will be, and where the departments should cut in order to find the necessary funds to meet her objectives?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government decided to put an end to the never ending search for a site precisely because $20 million was spent on the fruitless search for a federal site between 1988 and 1994. I felt that this expenditure related to the green plan was no longer justifiable, and I asked Public Works Canada to resume sending these products to Swan Hills in Alberta from the month of March onwards.

Negotiations are ongoing and, as the former minister of the environment will explain to the hon. member, the cost of disposing of PCBs is not Environment Canada's responsibility. Each department that is responsible for PCBs must pay the cost involved in shipping them to Swan Hills. In addition, under the supervision of Public Works, we are already negotiating with the Department of National Defence, among others, to also ensure that we will not have to absorb the storage costs and to ensure that we will be able to dispose of all of the federal government's PCBs by the end of 1996, as was promised in the green plan.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the minister is looking for sites, we can show her the ones we found last week.

How does the minister expect us to believe her promises when her colleague from Public Works has said not only has no contract been negotiated with Bovar Inc, the company which will be disposing of the PCBs, but also that it is still much too early to forecast the related costs or the timing of the disposal of the federal government's PCBs?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely why I told the House last week that I took the decision at the end of March to stop spending federal money on the search for a site in addition to Swan Hills. I turned to negotiations instead. That is what I explained last week.

The Department of Public Works is in the process of negotiating with each department to find out the quantities of PCBs and where they will be shipped, and I am certain that negotiations have already begun in the Atlantic provinces. The hon. member for London issued a press release in March regarding PCBs and the disposal plan—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: Maybe you could not care less whether the PCBs will be disposed of. We will dispose of them. They are going to be shipped to Swan Hills, and the federal government will see to it.

[English]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Brunswick Mining and Smelting is actively considering moving its operations from Dalhousie, New Brunswick.

Can the minister tell the citizens of Dalhousie who will be responsible for the estimated $50 million bill for the environmental restoration of the site and surrounding waters? Can the minister guarantee that she will use all the resources of her department to ensure that the company will be held responsible for the complete restoration of this site?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to follow up on the points made by the auditor general last week on contaminated sites, it is the view of the government that when a company occupies a site and has a signed leasing arrangement with the Government of Canada, if ever it vacates the site it will leave the site in the condition in which it was found.

It is our belief that the restoration project could cost in the millions of dollars. We intend to ensure that if any decision is made about a change in location of this operation, all the costs of the rehabilitation of the site will be borne by the company that is responsible for making the mess, not the taxpayers of Canada.

FUR INDUSTRY

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, animal rights activists seem to be convincing our trading partners in Europe to ban furs imported from countries which use leg hold traps. In Canada such a ban apparently would affect about 100,000 jobs, including 80,000 trappers of whom about half are native people.

I would like to ask the Minister for International Trade whether it is true that our only strategy in the situation is to seek delays beyond the current proposed deadline of January 1, 1996.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, earlier indications from the European Union had been that the proposed regulation would be delayed beyond January 1, 1996.

Because of the more recent indications of the European Union's likelihood of moving on the issue, we are pursuing on an urgent basis with the European Union, with the United States and Russia, with other countries directly involved in the issue, to design and agree on what is called a more humane trap so that we can resolve the issue during the current calendar year.

However, I acknowledge to the member opposite that time is short. We shall need to consider as a fallback position, if the European Union does act, whether we would seek one of the various forms of trade remedies that are open to us.

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I am glad he realizes that time is of the essence.

As a former trapper I can verify that the Conibear trap which kills the animal instantly rather than inflicting the suffering of leg hold traps, has been available for many years.

I ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern development what his department is doing to encourage Canada's trappers to change over to non–leg hold traps as soon as possible, in order to avoid a major blow to the local economies which such a ban on Canadian furs would cause?

• (1445)

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as well as assisting the Minister of International Trade and the Minister of Foreign Affairs wherever we can in whatever format and whenever we can to get the matter settled because it affects industry, we have put significant amounts of money—I do not have the exact amount—into training and into the development of a more humane trap.

The problem is that we think no matter how humane the trap is there will still be European backlash against animal furs. We are doing our best to overcome it but it is a problem. To say it is not a problem would be misleading the hon. member.

PROGRAM FOR OLDER WORKER ADJUSTMENT

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Surprisingly enough, Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. On Monday, the Quebec employment minister announced the unilateral funding of Phase I of a labour adjustment measure in response to the mass layoffs in the clothing industry. The Quebec government would spend close to $7 million to provide assistance to these older workers, while the federal government will not contribute a penny.

How does the minister explain his stubborn refusal to modify the Program for Older Worker Adjustment or POWA, which is now putting Montreal at a disadvantage, by extending it to layoffs involving 20 workers or more instead of 100 as is now the case?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased the Government of Quebec is offering supplementary assistance to older laid off workers in the clothing industry, but it is not correct to say that the federal government is not involved.

Under PATA, as the member knows, we cost share at a level of 70 per cent a major program for older workers in the province of Quebec as we do in all provinces. The province of Quebec agrees to the criteria of that program.

In the last month or so we have provided assistance to seven or eight major factories that laid off older workers in the clothing industry. I would be glad to give the hon. member a full list of joint federal–provincial support for older workers in the Montreal area.

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, surely the minister must know that the federal government is not investing a penny in the program I am referring to.

I will ask my supplementary question slowly to make sure the minister understands. Now that the Quebec employment minister has announced her intention of initiating talks with Ottawa to convince the federal government to make a financial contribution to Phase II, should it be implemented, does the minister promise that he will acquiesce to his Quebec counterpart's request?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to make sure that each of us understands what is going on, I point out that under the present program for older workers Montreal has 4 per cent of the Canadian population and receives over 11 per cent of the full support for older workers right across Canada, which I think is a substantial contribution that we are making.

We have put forward as one major element in looking at social reform in the country how we could provide greater assistance to older workers. All we need now is the co–operation of the Quebec government to join us in that enterprise. Then we can jointly arrive at an effective answer.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday I asked the minister of Indian Affairs what he had done about serious allegations regarding the misuse of band assets, capital project funds and housing moneys on the Yellow Quill Reserve.

I am now in receipt of a letter from a band member who says that the Indian affairs department has finally admitted that the $2 million deficit was due to "incompetent bookkeeping".

The band may have a financial management plan in place, but band members want to know what the minister has done to determine where the missing millions went.

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe I responded to the question last week. I would be pleased to take the member's letter under consideration. Again I emphasize that there are 605 First Nations out there. Over 80 per cent run their affairs well, and I never hear the Reform saying that is good. Some 152 of the remaining 200 have remedial action plans in place and we are working with them.

• (1450)

We are working with the people to make sure they do the things the Reform allegedly wants. I quote the leader of the Reform Party when he said that his goal was to dismantle and decentralize my department's function, funding and responsibility and transfer them to local aboriginal agencies of government.

If the Reformers are complaining, that is good. That is democracy. At least they are showing an interest in what is happening.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear that the minister will take the letter under consideration, because it is addressed to him.

The minister of Indian affairs cannot continue to ignore band members requesting financial accountability of their chiefs and council. As the minister knows, this is not an isolated case despite what he claims.

To pay for the so–called incompetent bookkeeping band members must forgo much needed capital projects and social programs. They have called on the minister to uphold his fiduciary obligation to them.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. What steps will the minister take to hold chiefs and council financially accountable to all band members and guarantee that abuses like this will never happen again?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a letter is being drafted, in response to that letter, to the member. A full review is under way in this instance and I wanted to advise the member of it.

I repeat that members of the Reform Party never look at the good side of what is happening out there. They take isolated cases like they did on immigration and on anything else in the House that they oppose, such as the gun laws. I say they should go and talk with the people they represent. I can assure them that most people want to do the honourable and just thing for native people to get true self–government and to bring some dignity into the process rather than single out individuals in the House and come close to defaming them.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

In recent weeks we have read about the projected closures of all agricultural centres across our rural communities. These services provide a very vital service for agriculture in Essex and Kent counties as well as other rural areas.

What will the minister do to maintain agricultural employment services across Canada?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the hon. member and members of the House that as part of our reform program we are presently engaged in a major reinvention of the way the department provides delivery of services. It is our expectation that by this time next year we will have substantially expanded the level of service to rural areas by providing more delivery points at areas where they have major responsibilities.

In terms of the special activities under the agricultural employment service, we are prepared to sit down with the agricultural community, the Canadian Federation of Labour and the horticultural society to work out ways to have direct partnerships with the agricultural community in the rural areas and to both have a facility in which we share in the opportunities that the centres can offer for jobs and employment. That is part of the new partnerships we are trying to establish in reorganizing the department.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal.

In its budget, the federal government announced that the public service would be reduced by 45,000 positions over three years, including more than 12,000 in the Ottawa–Hull area. The Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal seems to be unable to give specifics about the extent of these cuts, stating that it should be a rather large number, but that he does not know the exact number because it varies from department to department and from day to day.

Are we to understand from what the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal said that the decision to eliminate 45,000 public service positions was an impromptu, last minute kind of decision?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member from the opposition knew anything about public administration, he would know that, when plans are made that affect departmental administration, it is clear that each department will come up with a different plan and that surplus notices will be sent out on the basis of evolving needs.

• (1455)

It is therefore impossible for any department to indicate today what it has done because, obviously, its plans are implemented on a day by day, week by week basis, and the answer that was provided is correct.

What is important to know is that we are going ahead with our plans to streamline the public service; we are in the process of implementing the measures announced in the budget with efficiency and competence.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if, as the minister claims, this was not an impromptu decision, does he undertake to release the department by department program evaluation report, which resulted in the decision to lay off 45,000 public servants, and to tell us how the work force adjustment program will be carried out?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the budget tabled before this House clearly spells out the government's fiscal plan and its impact on each department.

The government had the courage to make the decisions required. Unfortunately, this means that certain positions will have to be eliminated. We acted in a humane way, providing programs such as early retirement or buyout packages and, so far, the unions feel that the budget is being implemented appropriately and efficiently, in an effort to accommodate the public service.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, recently an American tourist was acquitted of assault for spanking his five–year old daughter. Every parent in Canada was on trial.

Last June the minister stated that the government was reviewing section 43 of the Criminal Code. This section permits parents and educators to physically discipline their children using reasonable force. The minister also stated: "I know of no plan at present to propose a change to this section".

My question is for the justice minister. Will the minister state today the outcome of the government's review of section 43, and regardless of that outcome will he reaffirm his support for section 43?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied the section in the Criminal Code complies with our obligations. I can tell the hon. member and the House that the government has no intention to introduce any change to section 43 of the Criminal Code.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. If the minister has no intention of changing section 43, why in the world is his government continuing to fund the Children's Bureau review of section 43?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I made clear in my response to the question when it was last put, because we are signatories to international conventions and treaties we are obligated like other civilized countries to do an audit of our laws to ensure they reflect the values and the principles to which we subscribe with other nations.

The work to which the hon. member has referred is simply part of that effort and it must be done.

FINANCE

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who will know from press reports today that his present seatmate has said: "Cash means clout. No cash, no clout". He went on to point out that the majority of members of the finance committee agree it is important for Ottawa to maintain the cash transfer to make sure the federal government maintains its influence, meaning the ability to enforce legislation like the Canada Health Act.

Will the Minister of Finance agree with his seatmate that the idea bears merit and that he will consider it in terms of changing the legislation presently before the House?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development –Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would like my colleague to answer the question and my colleague would like to answer it.

We are delighted as a result of the reform of House of Commons committee rules that we have a very active, dynamic and incisive finance committee of the House.

• (1500)

As to the particular comments of the chairman of the committee, as the hon. member for Kamloops knows, we will be sitting down with the provinces, and quite clearly we do not want to do anything premature in terms of those discussions with the provinces. It is very important for us to hear from the provincial finance ministers on this issue.

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning the justice committee heard moving testimony from Burlington resident Priscilla de Villiers on gun control. In no uncertain terms, Mrs. de Villiers stated: "Let me tell you about inconvenience. The death of your children at the hands of a man wielding a gun is an inconvenience."

I ask the Minister of Justice if he feels the proposed gun registry contained in Bill C–68 will inconvenience Canadian gun owners.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think it is telling that the question of the day did not come from the other side of the House, because the witnesses yesterday were victims of violence with firearms and they were not in a position that could be exploited by the Reform.

The very purpose of Bill C–68 is to address the kinds of tragedies the committee heard about yesterday. The point is perhaps best made by comparing on the one hand the inconvenience of filling out a form and mailing it in with $10 over the next five years and on the other hand losing a member of your family.

I am often asked for proof that registration of firearms will achieve something for Canada. For those who ask for proof, I suggest they speak to the parents, the mother who yesterday described the tragedy of losing a child, speak to the children whose mother is dead because she was shot in her home.

This government with this bill stands with the Victims of Violence for Change. This government stands with the police chiefs and the police across this country. We shall not fail them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: This concludes the question period.

I have a point of order from the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of the House that during this last question in question period, the question concerned specific matters that happened in committee. My understanding of the rules under the standing orders is that is not a proper question for question period. I would ask you to rule on this issue, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. member is correct in stating that we cannot ask questions in the House that directly relate to a committee. In my interpretation of the question, it would seem to me that at the time I heard it, it seemed to be general enough.

I will take the hon. member's request under advisement. I will review the blues, and if necessary I will come back to the House.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and International Trade relating to the reform of international financial institutions for the agenda of the G–7 summit in Halifax.

The report makes 20 recommendations aimed at strengthening Canada's position heading into the G–7 economic summit in Halifax in June. It is a unanimous report of the committee.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee is asking for the government's response to the report.

[English]

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been some quick consultation here. I believe there might be unanimous consent to allow my colleague from Wild Rose to introduce a private member's bill today without the usual 48 hours notice, since he is not available to be in the House on Thursday and Friday. I would ask the House to give him consent to introduce his bill today.

The Speaker: I am informed that we have to have the bill. Does the member have the bill with him? We have the bill. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–327, an act to amend the Criminal Code (bail in cases of assault with weapon or criminal harassment).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleagues for giving me the opportunity to present this private member's bill.

The bill is an act that would amend the Criminal Code regarding bail in the case of assault with a weapon or criminal harassment. There have been a number of cases throughout the nation where people have been released on bail who have committed some very serious violent crimes and have followed through on their threats after bail has been issued. This bill would be an attempt to assist the victims so they would not be vulnerable in the future.

This important report deals with the form of the Journals in respect to supply proceedings in the House and in the other place. I think there will be consent to adopt the motion without debate this afternoon.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

PETITIONS

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise to support a petition that has come from 1,038 members of my riding, which reads as follows.

We the undersigned residents of the province of British Columbia draw the attention of the House to the following: that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation is a real and hurtful form of discrimination in this country; that all forms of families in this country, those based on financial and emotional interdependence, are equally meaningful and important to the social well–being of Canada; and that both protection against discrimination and recognition of relationships based on financial and emotional interdependence are necessary to ensure the equal treatment of gays, lesbians, and bisexuals under the law.

Therefore, your petitioners request that the Parliament of Canada amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation as a basis for protection against discrimination and to include recognition of relationships based on financial and emotional interdependence.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I was asked by a group of people to table a petition on their behalf. I am pleased to do so. These people are from a number of Quebec municipalities, mainly Longueuil, but also Terrebonne, Sainte–Monique, Montreal and Laval.

They are asking Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act so as to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation.

[English]

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present.

The first is from petitioners in and around the cities of Edmonton and Calgary, Alberta, where the petitioners request that Parliament recognize and address the concerns of this petition regarding the Young Offenders Act and that action be taken immediately to bring about results that would improve the situation.

VICTIMS RIGHTS

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition contains 96 signatures, wherein the petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation that would re–evaluate and amend the Canadian justice system to provide protection to and give precedence to victims rights, which require stricter sentencing guidelines, stronger penalties for major crimes, deportation of convicted non–Canadians, and all juveniles charged with major crimes to be tried in adult court.

BILL C–41

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition contains 40 signatures from the Kingston, Ontario, area, wherein the petitioners pray and request that Parliament delete section 718(2) entirely from Bill C–41.

GLOBAL EDUCATION

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions from citizens and residents of Peterborough. All the petitions concern the cuts in global education and I will summarize each one.

In the first, the petitioners say: We are concerned that our children learn how to live as responsible global citizens. We know we consume too much of the world's resources and we want to learn how to change.

In the second one, the petitioners say: We believe in democracy and want to be actively involved in community discussions on Canadian foreign policy and global issues. We believe that global education is an investment to counter the social, economic, and environmental deficit facing the developing and developed world.

In the third petition, the petitioners say: We know non–governmental agencies are the best delivery system for global education and for overseas development assistance. We commend the work of the Kawartha World Issues Centre based in Peterborough and four surrounding counties as effectively linking global issues to local action for justice across many sectors of the community.

Therefore, in the three petitions, the petitioners request that Parliament reinstate public participation as a goal of Canadian foreign policy and request that Parliament reinstate global education through non–governmental organizations based in Canada.

• (1515)

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions.

The first petition deals with the Young Offenders Act. The petitioners, some 490 strong, from the metropolitan Toronto area ask Parliament to recognize that they wish stiffer penalties for young offenders convicted of violent crimes.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second set of petitions contains approximately 230 signatures, all from the Richmond, British Columbia area.

The petitioners pray that Parliament ensure the present provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third set of petitions contains approximately 220 signatures from the Trenton area, my riding of Scarborough West, Kanata, Carleton Place, Ontario and from Vernon, British Columbia.

The petitioners call on Parliament not to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table a petition signed by elderly people from several communities in my riding. These people feel powerless when they have to use voice mail technology. They want a more appropriate service, particularly as regards their income security claims.

They are asking that an appropriate service be provided and that the government give up its idea of using voice mail to answer queries.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure today to present a petition on behalf of citizens of Prince George—Peace River. Some 74 citizens have signed the petition.

The petitioners call on Parliament to oppose any amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

I find myself in complete concurrence with this and it is my pleasure to present it.

The Speaker: When we present petitions it is not necessary to be either for or against a petition. We have been doing that on all sides as of late. I ask you to simply present the petitions.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present. The first petition concerns the provisions of Bill C–68.

The petitioners wish to express their opposition to the universal registration of long guns, restrictions and controls on the purchase of ammunition and the undue use of regulation by order in council.

They therefore call on Parliament to refrain from passing Bill C–68 as it presently stands.

RAIL

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is very thick. It is from virtually every resident of the Arborfield, Zenon Park area and represents those who use the Arborfield subdivision of the Canadian National Railway which now serves an excellent grain producing district as well as a large alfalfa dehydrating plant employing some 40 people. Without the line the future of the plant and the village of Arborfield is in doubt.

They ask, therefore, that the Parliament of Canada support Canada's rural way of life by rejecting the policy proposals now before it which lift the prohibition orders on branch lines and instead develop agriculture and rural development policies for Canada in which rural citizens are considered to be necessary humans with spiritual, social and economic needs; not to treat them just as statistics.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Tony Valeri (Lincoln, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am presenting a petition signed by 250 constituents in my riding of Lincoln asking Parliament not to amend the Canadian human rights code to extend spousal benefits to same sex partners.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Ms. Susan Whelan (Essex—Windsor, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present petitions on two issues.

The first petition I received from my constituents of Essex—Windsor asks that Parliament ensure the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Ms. Susan Whelan (Essex—Windsor, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second set of petitions also requests that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child.

• (1520)

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table in the House a petition signed by 60 residents of Kapuskasing and area on the gun registration legislation.

The petitioners are asking Parliament to deal more with crime control than gun control. The system should also concentrate its efforts on the criminal element of society instead of further eroding the rights and freedoms of law–abiding citizens.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of tabling four petitions today, all duly approved by the clerk of petitions.

The first two deal with the moral issues of euthanasia and also include sexual orientation legislation.

JUSTICE

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the last petitions deal with the criminal justice system.

These were signed by over 6,000 citizens of my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap. These 6,000 Canadians are asking the government to reform the justice system to protect the innocent and deal more efficiently with criminals.

These requests are added to the request of many thousands of Canadians. It is time for the government to act.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting four petitions signed by over 200 constituents from various parts of my riding.

The petitioners are calling on Parliament not to amend the human rights act or charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would indicate societal approval of same sex relationships.

I am also presenting a fifth petition signed by some 50 individuals calling on the government to amend the human rights act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation.

Mr. Gary Pillitteri (Niagara Falls, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present the following petition dealing with sexual orientation.

The petitioners from my constituency believe the term sexual orientation in Bill C–41 is ambiguous and therefore would broaden implications indicating societal approval of same sex relationships.

They humbly request that section 718.2 of Bill C–41, the sentencing bill, be rescinded. This petition contains 113 signatures.

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions, the first containing 40 signatures.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code and the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition contains 167 signatures. The petitioners request that Parliament support laws that will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime, support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions which recognize and protect the right of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms, and support legislation that will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety or have proven not be cost effective or have proven to be overly complex so as to be ineffective and/or unenforceable.

JUSTICE

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition of many thousand names which would probably bring the total to in excess of 60,000.

The petitioners are calling on government to keep dangerous sex offenders and pedophiles locked up for life, to eliminate statutory release, to impose stiffer sentences for violent offenders, have violent criminals serve their full sentence and have time added for bad behaviour, and on and on.

Members get the idea of the petition, basically calling for changes to the Criminal Code to make Canada a safer place.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling the following petition which calls on Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

I also have a petition calling on Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation.

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition which has been circulating around Canada. It is signed by a number of residents from the Oakville, Ontario region.

• (1525)

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present two petitions from the province of British Columbia on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue.

The first petition signed by 42 individuals deals with the issue of sexual orientation.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker the second petition signed by 1,100 individuals concerns the Young Offenders Act.

The petitioners request that Parliament amend the act to automatically try a youth in adult court for any crimes of violence and to provide for public identification of a convicted, young dangerous offender.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise in the House today to present two petitions from the constituents of Hamilton—Wentworth riding calling on Parliament to oppose any amendments to the federal Criminal Code which would provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation. There are about 300 names on these two petitions.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY DEBATE

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today, pursuant to Standing Order 52, and move:

That this House do now adjourn for the purpose of an emergency debate on a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration.

Both the council for the James Bay Cree and the Yukon Indians have agreements with the federal government which are appendages to the Constitution of Canada. Both groups claim their constitutional rights demand consultation with the federal government prior to the enactment of federal law touching on hunting, trapping or food gathering.

The testimony of both groups before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs claims unequivocally that no consultation took place in the prescribed manner regarding Bill C–68 and therefore their constitutional rights have been violated by the federal government.

I believe the allegations of the violation of the constitutional rights of the aboriginal people are so pressing that the public interest will suffer if this issue is not given immediate attention. The foremost responsibility of members of Parliament is to uphold the Constitution of our country and that can only be done in the House.

The public interest and the interest of aboriginal people demand this matter be dealt with immediately.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: I listened with great attention to what the hon. member had to say. The matter raised is important to Canadians. However, in my view the hon. member would probably have other avenues to explore this topic, in committee and otherwise here.

At least at this time it would seem to me the hon. member's request does not meet the requirements for an emergency debate.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed from May 16 consideration of the motion that Bill C–86, an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when debate resumed I was the first speaker following a rather bad movie unfolding in the House called "milk wars" between the Liberals and the Bloc Quebecois over what would happen to the dairy industry should Quebec separate. It was rather amusing at times.

The Reform Party supports the tariff levels agreed to under GATT. However, we should become proactive in this area and address future concerns.

I am concerned about the health of the dairy industry down the road. The trend toward more open and competitive global markets is happening whether we like it or not. Failure to adapt will undoubtedly result in the destruction of an industry that has provided Canadians with a quality product for many years. Dairy farmers must move to a more efficient means of producing milk.

I would like to address a few aspects of Bill C–86. I have already mentioned that the Canadian government had no choice but to make alterations to the supply management commodities. As with many of these programs that were initially developed by the Liberals, they, the creators of the system, are reluctant to change them or drop them entirely. Sentimental feelings are driving the government's agenda.

All we have to do is look at the GATT negotiations and the Liberals' position, who at that time were not the government, with regard to the GATT negotiations and article XI. They said that article XI was non–negotiable. They told people in the dairy industry to support them and they would defend article XI and it would be in the new GATT agreement.

A few days after the Liberals took office, history shows us that in fact article XI had to be negotiated away. We had no support in the international community for article XI. Tariffication was put in place to replace that article.

I might add the Reform Party anticipated this event. We said in our election platform that we believe the structure of national supply management agencies need not change at all as long as these agencies continue to have the support of their producers. They should continue in any manner in which they feel best serves their interests. Tariffs will be reduced as other countries reduce their support. This will allow Canadian producers to remain competitive and will ensure that these sectors are able to adapt to the new market driven environment.

The point that we raised was that tariffs should initially be set at levels sufficiently high to protect the domestic market and industry. We said that supply managed producers should have access to our comprehensive income stabilization program. We went on to say that import control regulations as a defence against foreign dumping should be rationalized and strengthened.

We said that licensing and arbitration regulations as an improved safeguard against business which might engage in unfair practices should be strengthened. We also said that competition and anti–combines legislation intended to place limits on the power of buying groups should be strengthened and vigorously enforced. We concluded by saying that the impact to the sectors during the tariff reduction period should be carefully monitored.

The Reform Party believes that this approach will not only ensure the continued viability of supply managed sectors, but will build a bridge to a new era of opportunity and expansion.

Bill C–86 fails to address the problems it has set out to correct. While the intent of the bill is to help the Canadian dairy industry to comply with the GATT regulations, it is almost certain that industry will be open to other trade sanctions, especially from the United States.

The pooling market system which replaces the existing system of levies has long been a bone of contention with the United States. We have seen the response of the U.S. over the last five years to the effect of the Canadian Wheat Board. While the Canadian Wheat Board has been functioning in the manner it should and we have been winning the trade disputes, nevertheless the pooling is an irritant. If we are looking at pooling in the dairy industry we need to be very careful that we do not structure it in such a way as to become a trade irritant with the Americans, or at least not a trade irritant that we would lose a scrap over.

The Reform Party is concerned that this government has not been honest and open with those farmers that are within the supply managed areas. I believe this government has not reacted to the global trend toward a more open and a more competitive market. As we know, Canadian dairy farmers are capable of competing in these competitive markets.

More and more, Canadian farmers are going to have to compete in a global marketplace. As we see trading blocs forming, currently NAFTA is expanding with the inclusion of Mexico and negotiations with Chile and other Latin American countries, we realize that there will be more and more observation of our own trading practices here in Canada. We will have to be very careful as to how we design our marketing and our trade deals so that we do not jeopardize industries which at the current time are very sustainable and are functioning very well.

The Liberal messages to the industry have been misleading in the past and we are concerned that they may be misleading in the future. We will be scrutinizing the bill very carefully to ensure that we are not sending the wrong signals to the dairy industry with respect to what it can expect in the future from agreements such as the NAFTA and the GATT.

There have been some good questions brought forward in the House as to whether the NAFTA supersedes the GATT or the GATT supersedes the NAFTA. Those are important questions and we need more clarification from the government that in fact the legislation which it is proposing will not be challenged under the NAFTA and we will not lose the challenge.

The question I ask of the government is whether Canadian dairy farmers will be given the tools and the time to adapt to a new market driven economy. We need not look any further than the current fiasco with the WGTA and the Crow buyout. Imagine a government which would discontinue the Crow benefit and replace it with a one time payout and then talks about a transition period and a transition program which would take place one year following the conclusion of the Crow benefit. That is not very good planning in my mind and I am getting the same message and the same signal from my constituents and other Canadians who are affected by the elimination of the WGTA, the Crow buyout and this transition program.

It would seem to me that it would be much more logical to have a transition program spelled out before implementing legislation to end the Crow benefit and introduce a buyout to producers. We wonder about the logic of a government which would eliminate something and then a year later introduce an unspecified program to help the industry make the transition from transportation subsidies to an unsubsidized system.

We have the same concerns about the dairy industry. We are concerned that the government is not looking at the long term. It is not considering carefully the outcome of its policies with respect to the dairy industry. It is not looking at the need to access new markets. It is not thinking long term; it is continuing to look only at the short term situation.

Another important issue which needs to be addressed is whether supply managed industries should have access to income stabilization, in particular, a whole farm income stabilization plan. Many spokespersons in the dairy industry and other supply managed industries are suggesting they would not like to be a part of any income stabilization plan or a whole farm program.

I think part of the reason they are suggesting that is because the Liberals have made guarantees to them about the current supply managed system which perhaps are not supportable in logic. In fact, perhaps if the industry was given the true picture of what awaits it in the future it might be more interested in looking at belonging to some kind of income stabilization plan, something along the lines of NISA.

Again I would communicate to the House that the Reform Party envisioned the need for that to happen. We suggested that an income stabilization plan should be a shared federal–producer program having universal application, which means all sectors. It would include the supply managed sectors. This would be made available at the whole farm level. If a farm produced many commodities all those commodities would be recognized by the plan. Supply managed sectors would have access to the program upon the introduction of tariffication.

Of course, that was written before the tariffication was introduced. We were correct in anticipating that. I believe we were correct in anticipating that there will be a need for the supply managed industries to have access to a NISA type income stabilization program, given the market trends and the formation of a global economy in which eventually supply managed industries will have to participate and be in a competitive position.

I would like to conclude my speech by asking the government to be more honest and more open with the Canadian dairy farmers. The government promised that it would be very open and honest with the public. It is in its red book. We sense that those pages are being torn out of the red book and it concerns us very much. It should concern dairy producers across Canada as well.

Before the Liberals were elected it was very easy for them to say they would be open and honest, but they seem to be having some difficulty now fulfilling some of those red book promises. We are concerned that one of the casualties may be supply managed industries, in particular the dairy industry if the true situation of international negotiations and of course the jurisdiction of the NAFTA versus the GATT are not correctly and very clearly communicated to the industry. The Reform Party would like to see that honesty and openness with regard to this situation.

Hopefully, the House will get away from the milk wars I spoke about in my remarks yesterday. I think we should quit talking about marriage and divorce and start talking about birth and death. Let us let the old system die and let us see a new Canada formulated in which we all get along well and where we do not have milk wars and turf wars over just about every other issue in Canada. To be competitive in the global economy we certainly cannot be scrapping within the borders of this great country.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to provide a little background on the dairy industry in Canada. In the 1960s, there was no supply management in the dairy industry. Farmers were producing as much milk as they wanted.

In the summer, when they were out to pasture, dairy cows produced three or even four times as much milk. The milk was put into containers commonly called milk cans. To keep the milk fresh, these cans were placed in the spring or the river nearest to the barn. At 9, 9.30 or 10 a.m., depending on the transporter's route, the cans were picked up on tripods along the road.

The truth be known, freshness left something to be desired. Processing plants were drowning in milk in the summer, but come winter, farmers were having a more difficult time; in order to produce the milk, they had to buy meal, ingredients, inputs. It was not really worthwhile to produce milk in the winter. So they produced the maximum in the summer and stopped producing in the winter.

That is what was happening on our farms during the 1960s and early 1970s. In 1970, 1971 and 1972, milk producers got together with government officials and set up standards, agreements. They said that there is no use producing too much milk if we are not able to use it and if we cannot sell it outside the country.

They came up with supply management, that some people are decrying so strongly here in the House. Supply management requires a farmer to now produce 12 months a year, on a monthly basis. Our dairy farmer cannot keep the cream and give the whey to others. He has to produce milk in summer, fall, winter and spring. Therefore he must manage his herd in such a way that cows will calve all year long. He can non longer take advantage of geographical or climatic factors.

In that regard, I would ask my Reform colleague to explain the second point that his colleague and friend so brilliantly explained yesterday in this House. The agriculture critic and member for Vegreville outlined the four points his party's dairy policy. I would like to have the second point explained further this afternoon.

I quote: "Second, Reformers acknowledge that the agriculture industry, including supply managed sectors, is moving toward a more competitive market driven system". Where can there be any competition if a farmer is told that he has to produce 1,000 litres of milk for the local dairy, while one of his neighbours has to produce 1,100 litres, and the other has to produce 900?

• (1545)

Where can there be competition when, for milk of the same quality, one farmer is paid 47 cents a litre and another 46 cents, because he is a member of the Liberal Party, the Reform Party or the Bloc Quebecois? How can producers compete with one another under such circumstances, if they have to produce milk of the same quality? I would like my Reform colleague to explain his view on competition.

[English]

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Frontenac for his question.

He began by talking about what farming used to be like back in the 1960s. While I was not a grown man at that time, I remember what farming was like. I remember my parents shipping cream back in those days, not quite the way the hon. member described it, but it did bring back some memories hearing his comments.

As the hon. member for Frontenac is aware, agriculture has changed substantially in the last 35 years. The industry and the producers are always far ahead of government. It is not government regulation or legislation that causes progress in industry, including the agriculture industry.

Whether it be a supply managed industry, a free market industry or the growing of wheat under the Canadian Wheat Board, which is in neither of the aforementioned categories, we have seen dramatic changes in the industry over the last 35 years as world and domestic conditions have demanded better operating practices from farmers no matter what the commodity is that they produce.

The member talked about the need for a consistent supply of milk over a 12–month period by producers. I understand what he is saying. He seemed to be indicating that my colleague from Vegreville was suggesting something that would be in conflict with that requirement. I was not in the House to hear what my colleague said yesterday on this issue, but he related to me that he talked about a need for a more competitive environment.

The hon. member for Frontenac indicated that would pit producer against producer. Nothing could be farther from the truth. We are talking about the need to be competitive as a Canadian industry. We are looking at the industry versus the needs of the consumers and what consumers expect of the industry. We are also looking at what will be required both internationally and interprovincially with regard to the dairy industry.

For the most part international agreements have already been signed. We know that Bill C–88 will be before the House very soon. It deals with internal trade in Canada. There are some real problems with internal trade, particularly in the dairy industry. Some things have to be dealt with. Part of that was the cause of the bickering between the Bloc Quebecois and the Liberals yesterday.

I am sure what my colleague was suggesting and what I would reiterate is that the industry needs to be competitive. However it needs to be competitive as a whole industry, not producer against producer. In this way we can compete in the new climate under GATT and NAFTA and break down the barriers to internal trade within Canada so that our agriculture industries and other industries flourish under that scenario.

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to debate Bill C–86, an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act, especially as I was invited to do so by the member for Frontenac.

As the member of Parliament for Matapédia—Matane, a rural riding, I have several reasons to be greatly interested in everything that concerns farmers. My interest in agriculture is not motivated by political or partisan reasons.

My region owes its existence primarily to this industry. Nearly all the villages and towns in my riding were founded by settlers, who were farmers, of course.

I like to remind people that, at the turn of the century, over 80 per cent of inhabitants of Matapédia—Matane eked out a miserable existence in the country. They worked from dawn to dusk, but they were happy. I do not want to wax nostalgic, but I am one of those who do not deny their past, being very proud of their origins. Without agriculture, the riding of Matapédia—Matane would probably have never been developed. These farmers are responsible for building what we have here and the best of what we have.

The result of their efforts is that the Lower St. Lawrence now boasts over 400,000 hectares of farmland and 2,600 agricultural businesses with sales in the order of $190 million a year. As I was saying, my contribution to the debate on Bill C–86 is motivated by several reasons.

The first reason is probably that the farmers in my region, like those elsewhere in Quebec and Canada, have become real entrepreneurs and built real businesses over the years. They have built small, medium–sized and even large businesses, with all the risks involved. While subsistence farmers at the beginning of the century did not lead very risky lives, the same cannot be said of today's farmers who face fiercely competitive international markets. It is difficult to live beside a giant neighbour such as the United States of America with its formidable economic power and its climate, which is much more suitable than ours, especially in the Gaspé region. Last week, I went snowmobiling, because there are still two feet of snow in the sugar bush, so there were not many farmers out in the fields.

Some farmers now administer thousands of dollars, and many jobs depend on their economic health and the continued development of their businesses. Bill C–86 should secure the future of milk producers for a while. This means that many farmers in my riding will enjoy a better future and may even ensure their succession, something which is particularly difficult in my region.

Without the farmers, our small communities will not survive. They were built thanks to the solidarity and the strong will of ordinary people who, over the years, have become great men and women, the builders of our country. Bill C–86 is proof that Quebecers always show solidarity, including with their neighbours, when necessary and when they do not feel pressured by the big federal machine, which often blindly imposes its will.

If each region could plan its own development without having to meet countless standards, we would obviously have a more prosperous country which would surely work a lot better. If the federal government did not impose its standards and, instead, let the provinces decide freely and independently among themselves, the country that you call Canada would undoubtedly work a lot better.

In any case, when Quebec becomes sovereign, it will show solidarity with its neighbours. As I said earlier, virtually all the small villages in my region and my riding were built around agriculture, and they continue to depend on that industry for their livelihood. Should agriculture disappear, a very large number of them would be abandoned overnight. It would be unfortunate to see a country, which our ancestors worked so hard to build, slowly disintegrate because people, who have given so much, have had to leave their regions.

I am also pleased to discuss Bill C–86 because my region is one of Quebec's major dairy production centres. It took almost 50 years of efforts to get to the enviable position that we, Quebecers, now hold in that market. Moreover, we invested large sums of money over the years to diversify, to produce more finished goods, and to fight effectively against outside competition. We are used to defending ourselves, and Bill C–68 once again confirms our leadership, our vision and our courage.

Moreover, Bill C–86 contradicts the federalist big names who wrongly assert that the rest of Canada will reject any agreement with Quebec, if it were to become sovereign tomorrow. On the contrary, an economic union is crucial for both parties, and everybody knows it.

Bill C–86 embodies this principle. Six provinces have signed an agreement, and others will undoubtedly join in when they realize that it is in their own interest.

In my area, dairy production alone generates 75 per cent of farm income and the dairy sector accounts for over 50 per cent of the farm businesses. The other main sectors are cattle, sheep and pork. That tells us a lot about the importance of the dairy sector.

Looking at employment, that sector provides over 7,500 permanent jobs, and thousands more seasonal jobs. Forty–eight per cent of the workers are under 40, which is truly remarkable.

In spite of this, figures for the Matapedia Valley show a 22 per cent drop in farm acreage between 1981 and 1991. Over the same period, the number of farms fell from 420 to 285, a 32 per cent drop.

While many factors can explain these drops, the main one also applies to other sectors. Raw materials from the regions go to major cities for processing, and the finished goods are then sold back to regions. Bill C–86 sets up a national pooling system of market returns that will help the sale of milk products abroad. That goal is praiseworthy, because it will enable us to counter the constant threat of foreign competition.

GATT and NAFTA do not give us much choice. I think we should also consider the same approach in other areas, particularly research and development in agriculture, without any federal involvement. We could research and develop new farm products that could be processed in the regions. Specialized small regional businesses could revitalize rural areas.

I congratulate the proponents of the agreement that is incorporated in Bill C–86 and more particularly Claude Rivard, the president of the federation of dairy producers, and a resident of my region of Matapedia Valley. I urge them to go even further and consider the future of agriculture in regions, including mine, because strong regions make for a strong country and a strong Quebec. Our survival and prosperity depend on a strong and diversified agricultural industry at the regional level. Thanks to specialized producers evenly and fairly distributed throughout the country, we will be able to successfully compete on world markets.

There is no point trying to grow oranges in northern Quebec, but we sure can try to produce something else. There is no point trying to produce milk on a large scale on farms that are not suited to this type of production, but we sure can try our hand at something else. What I am trying to show through these examples is that the agreement underlying Bill C–86 is excellent, and that we should continue in this way. In Quebec, pooling of our resources is where our great strength lies.

If farming is doing so well in Quebec, it is because we gave ourselves the means to succeed. Our farmers are independent, but have set up huge co–ops, pools and marketing boards which serve them well. Canada should follow suit and have independent provinces which still feel solidarity with each other. Unfortunately, the dinosaurs of centralist federalism have no options to put forward.

We, in Quebec, will make the right choice, just like Quebec farmers have done recently. A sovereign Quebec will stand behind its Canadian neighbours. I want to tell you that, in my rural riding, the people are very proud of this agreement, and I am particularly proud that one of my constituents, a resident of Matapédia, is behind this initiative.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments. I will recognize a member of another party, the hon. member for Durham.

Mr. Plamondon: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am convinced that I was on my feet before the hon. member, and I thought that the custom here was to recognize the first member to rise.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is absolutely right, but as he may already know, it makes for a much more interesting debate if the Chair gives a member of another party the opportunity to ask questions or make comments.

So, I recognize the hon. member for Durham.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for Matapédia—Matane for his dissertation on this bill.

As I listened to the member's speech I was taken aback by how he used a federal agreement to argue the case of an independent Quebec. Actually, as I read this piece of legislation it occurred to me that this is one of the powerful things of a federal state like Canada, which can actually come to national agreements in the best interests of all the people of Canada, including the farmers of Quebec.

The signatories in this agreement are not other independent countries. They are not states of the United States. In fact they are people who have agreed to make this arrangement within a federal state. Indeed, if my memory serves me correctly the whole concept of pooling and marketing board systems was created by the federal government in the first place.

Most of the farmers in Canada recognize the importance of the federal government in the area of marketing and in establishing national marketing standards. My riding is also a very important area of milk production, contributing 2 per cent of the total milk production for the province of Ontario. I can tell the hon. member that if things were different, if things were as he would like them to be, the people in my riding would do the economic thing and start producing more milk to service our own domestic market, excluding the people of Quebec.

Forty per cent of the industrial milk quota has been allocated to the province of Quebec. I want to assure the member that the people in his riding are very much taking advantage of the federalist system. I would like to bring that to the member's attention.

Mr. Canuel: Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that we are interdependent and that Ontario has a production level of 40 per cent. It is a fact that one province can reach agreements with other provinces, but that does not necessarily mean that these agreements will be overseen by the federal government.

Many agreements have been reached with Ontario, on a department to department basis, and both provinces have benefited from then. There were also agreements with New Brunswick. That is how I see the situation. The day we are sovereign, we will be able to negotiate our agreements without having to ask for permission from the head office, the federal government.

We noted that six provinces came to an agreement, and we hope that the other provinces will understand, because it is in their interest to operate with the other provinces. Under such circumstances, they will be ready to move on their own initiative, at their own speed. That is how I see things. This is how the federation should have been operating for a long time, but this is not the way things turned out.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will start by congratulating my colleague for his remarks. I think it was very appropriate for him to talk about the contribution of the people who built his region, Quebec, and several other regions of Canada. The builders of both our nations, Quebec and Canada, are mostly farmers.

Agricultural development gave birth to small villages, some of which later became larger villages and then grew into towns, small and large. In this context, this historical review seemed important as part of my colleague's speech. He also used a rather harsh word to describe the federal government when he talked about the federal monster.

I want to ask him a question about that. What bothers farmers and the majority of people in both our nations, Quebec and Canada, the most is to see the federal government interfering in areas that are not under its jurisdiction. Whether in health, job training, environment or agriculture, the federal government has a tendency to become an administrative monster which sticks its nose everywhere and does nothing really to favour regional economic development.

Quebec would like to have a different kind of relationship with this federal monster. As my colleague mentioned, it would rather have direct agreements with the provinces. Quebec has a lot in common with Ontario. It may have less in common with the western provinces, but it does have strong ties with the United States. So this new kind of state that Quebec would like to become would allow it to negotiate directly with any province that would be willing to make a deal.

Milk is a good example of the economic life of various regions of the country. Of course, Quebec has a higher percentage of milk production quotas, with close to 50 per cent.

However, if we consider the Alberta beef production for example, we can see that Quebec buys nearly 75 per cent of the total production. In that sense, Quebec is a good friend of Alberta since it is a consumer of some of its products. The same thing happens when Quebec makes a financial contribution to the federal state and this federal state distributes the money. When the federal gives this money to western grain producers so that they can produce wheat and sell it on the international market, Quebec is giving back quite a lot to that region of Canada.

The Quebec population represents 23 to 24 per cent of the Canadian population. If we were to receive 23 to 24 per cent of the federal budget for agriculture, we would be getting $800 million more each year. So maybe our quotas are in fact more generous, but as far as financial fallouts are concerned, and I am talking here about direct annual statutory programs, we are losing $800 million a year. This figure does not even include special programs like those announced in the last budget, the $1.5 billion for western diversification for example. However, as announced, Quebec will also suffer cuts of 15 per cent this year and 15 per cent next year, but I heard nothing about a financial compensation for our region.

All the special subsidies awarded to western Canada over the last seven or eight years amount to more than six billion dollars. Quebec contributed one fourth of that sum through its taxes. We have thus been extremely generous towards Canadian products and it would be only fair that, when the time comes to share in another form of economic activity like milk production, we get a larger share. By the way, when the system for western wheat was put in place, sales to China or eastern countries were subsidized by the federal government. This type of production was a lot more profitable than milk production. Farmers in that part of the country were not interested in producing milk.

In other words, if you were a farmer, dairy farming was a job which paid less and was therefore less attractive. We agreed to do it, to develop our industry and improve its efficiency. Now that it is doing well, we are told: "Maybe you got too much". I was surprised by some of the chauvinistic interventions I heard in this debate, yesterday and again today, especially when my colleague from Frontenac was giving us market examples, examples of competition , and also examples from the Reform Party.

Speaking of the Reform Party, and I will conclude on that, I would ask my colleague whether he agrees with what I just said, since he talked about Mr. Claude Rivard, the president of the Fédération des producteurs de lait who said, and rightly so, quoting a respected American editorialist, that the system we presently have is quite exceptional and that the United States would do well to implement one like it instead of trying to destroy it.

I fail to understand the attitude of certain Reform members, when they say: "Abolish it, let free competition take care of it. Let us do it the American way". The most eminent analysts, however, would tell you that the result of the current American system is that they are investing 34 cents on the dollar instead of 49 cents as we do in product development in the dairy industry.

Therefore, that would be far from free competition, that would be abandoning Canada and Quebec to the American market. Regarding this, Mr. Rivard put it nicely when he quoted American economists and he is delighted with the agreement reached between six provinces a short while back at a meeting with 190 delegates. He is delighted that they voted unanimously in favour of the agreement. Bill C–86 is a step in the right direction as far as the Bloc Quebecois is concerned. It is also, I think, what Quebec and Canadian dairy producers have always wanted. They have a very fair system.

It is acceptable to producers, and very inexpensive for the federal government when compared with other interventionist systems, such as the Crow rate, subsidies for western farm production or the eastern fishery. Yes, it is relatively cheap compared to other economic policies.

So, when something is not broken, why fix it? Hence, I congratulate my hon. colleague on his representation and I would be interested in hearing his remarks regarding my comments which could only expound on his speech moments ago.

• (1615)

Mr. Canuel: Mr. Speaker, my colleague has described the situation very well. Over the last 50 years, all of Canada's agriculture ministers, or almost all, have managed to leave our farmers increasingly worse off. My colleague gave a brief description of the situation in Quebec's towns and villages in the 1960s. There were dairies everywhere. Each community processed its own milk, cream and butter. They were all self–sufficient, and there was some assistance from the federal government. Then, the government pulled out almost completely and left people to fend for themselves.

I am very pleased to see that the provinces today are trying to go back to the system of 20 or 30 years ago.

The Deputy Speaker: Before giving the floor to the member for Québec–Est, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is the following: the hon. member for Saint John—Infrastructure.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to speak to Bill C–86, at the invitation of my colleague from Frontenac, not only because he has asked me to take part in this debate, but also because agriculture is a topic dear to my heart, although in my riding of Québec–Est there are no farms as such, just a few retired farmers.

It is of interest to me because I recognize the great importance of agriculture to the economic health of a country, and in Quebec we must do everything we can to maintain and strengthen the agricultural economy, and especially the all–important dairy sector. And in addition, because Bill C–86 is a good bill.

Finally, the Liberal government has tabled a good bill, something we do not often see. It is worth mentioning because the very great majority of bills it has tabled to date have been, if not terrible, certainly mediocre and second rate. Take the budget, for instance, which was probably one of the worst proposals ever tabled in this House, a budget in which everything was done to protect the rich in this country and make the poor poorer. One more example of their lack of vision and understanding. Take the Lobbyists Registration Act, another rotten piece of legislation. In fact, there are several bills that have been really disappointing, at a time when the public expected so much of this government. They have been very disappointing indeed.

However, Bill C–86 before the House today is a good bill, I must admit. And maybe it is a good bill because, basically, it was not so much the government as the farmers themselves that initiated this legislation. They were the ones to start the ball rolling. The farmers convinced the government to table this bill. They did everything they could to ensure that this proposal to pool resources and dairy production became a reality. I may add that Quebec farmers and dairy producers were largely instrumental in getting these proposals off the ground. They were actively involved in these plans for pooling dairy production. This is important. We are aware of that.

As was mentioned by other members, there was a problem with dairy production in Canada. Formerly, $3 per hectolitre was collected to subsidize exports of dairy products, mainly butter and powdered milk, which represented about $160 million.

The money was used to support the sales and distribution of these dairy products. Because of the new GATT and NAFTA agreements, Canada can no longer collect this money, because according to GATT and NAFTA, for various reasons this is perceived as money used to support unfair competition.

Canada is eliminating this $3 levy per hectolitre, as a result milk prices will go down. Moreover, milk production in the six eastern provinces, except Newfoundland, namely New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario, and Manitoba, which account for roughly 80 to 85 per cent of milk production in Canada, will be pooled and placed under the authority of one commission, with one price and one milk.

In the past, there was a difference between fluid milk or drinking milk and milk used in processing to make dairy products such as cottage cheese, butter, and powdered milk. From now on, there will be only one class of milk, one system and one price. All the quotas will be pooled, which means that all the provinces which currently have quotas will be able to retain them. Quebec, which accounts for 48 per cent of the total milk production, will keep the same production quotas, and so will Ontario and the other provinces.

This new commission, which hopefully will be able to get along with the provinces and operate as efficiently as possible, will have increased powers enabling it to deal with the export of milk based products. It would also be responsible for pricing and selling quotas, for instance. Provinces will be allowed to trade quotas.

However, we must admit that the main advantage of this new formula is that dairy production risks will be spread among dairy producers in eastern Canada, and that it will allow them to share the costs of managing the system. No doubt this will reduce the administration costs of the system, and we hope it does.

I will make the point, and it is a point that must be made: dairy production is very important to Quebec. In fact, the entire agri–food system is very important. For example, in 1993, Quebec exported over $1.5 billion worth of natural foodstuffs and, in 1994, it increased these exports by almost 5 per cent over the same period in the preceding year.

In 1989, for example, dairy products in Quebec represented 35 per cent of the province's total agricultural revenues and 38 per cent of Canada's dairy revenues.

The dairy industry in Quebec is beyond a doubt one of the largest industries and therefore it must be preserved and protected at all cost.

• (1625)

Bill C–86 will result in the economic integration of this whole sector, with milk production being consolidated under a new Canadian Dairy Commission. This is one way of protecting the common interests of all the provinces. Dairy producers are united in protecting themselves and this vital industry.

It must be said that the supply management system, particularly in the dairy sector, came under a lot of criticism in the past. The members of the Reform Party said it would be better to eliminate the supply management system, because they prefer free competition.

My colleague for Richelieu pointed out that it was not a good idea to eliminate the supply management system. On the contrary, if we compare our system with the American one, we see that we are well off with our own. My colleague for Richelieu drew attention to an article by Claude Rivard, president of the Fédération des producteurs de lait, in which Mr. Rivard quotes two editorials in Hoard's Dairymen, which is apparently the Bible of American farmers.

The two editorials in this "Bible" noted that dairy producers had lost production value, in that an increasingly large part of the market had been taken over by wholesalers, food chains and supermarkets, to the detriment of farm producers. In other words, dairy producers in the United States have lost money. They have become poorer, they have suffered the highs and the lows of an insufficiently controlled market.

The editorial in Hoard's Dairymen recommended that the United States develop a system like Canada's, that is, a system in which supply can be adjusted to suit demand. It pointed out that the supply management system in Canada is highly efficient. We know it is.

We know that dairy production is volatile because production can be easily increased. Without a system to adjust production to supply, prices would vary significantly. Therefore the supply management system is a good one. It is better than the one in the United States and warrants keeping.

Bill C–86 does just that: it makes dairy producers feel safer, more secure about this system being maintained, now that they have pooled their resources. This strengthens this branch of the industry and gives some indication of what lies ahead for them. This bill clearly shows that, contrary to the fears raised by certain individuals about quotas going down in value, the supply management system disappearing or this entire sector declining in the coming years, the system will be maintained, and I might add, even after Quebec has become sovereign.

We must conclude from this bill that, even after Quebec has become sovereign, the supply management system will almost certainly be maintained. That is normal since, as we know, this bill was developed in response to international agreements such as NAFTA and GATT. It is an attempt to adjust to these agreements, which will be maintained after Quebec has become sovereign.

We know that Quebec as well as Canada will accept the requirements of both NAFTA and GATT, according to which there should be no unfair competition and no new tariff barriers or other barriers like those currently encountered.

Again, this is very reassuring to dairy producers since all dairy producers, from Nova Scotia to Manitoba, are now together in the same system. It will certainly be to their advantage to stick together, not only because this is an excellent system, a system that will maintain reasonable levels of production and income for them, but also because it keeps American producers at bay.

If this system were to disappear tomorrow or be rejected all of a sudden, then we would obviously have to compete with the Americans, and our dairy producers might have a hard time staying in business, in spite of the fact that they may offer higher quality products than the Americans.

This threat from the U.S. would be quite worrisome for producers, be they in Manitoba, Quebec or Nova Scotia, if they did not stick together, if they did not join in this pooling system. We can even predict that if Manitoba or Ontario decided to opt out of the pooling system after Quebec achieves sovereignty, this would create problems not only for that province and for Quebec but also for all the other provinces. The whole system could collapse, when it is beneficial to all dairy farmers in all six provinces.

It would therefore be illogical, even irrational, and certainly economically harmful to bring down the system being set up under Bill C–86. This system is beneficial to all dairy farmers and will be maintained after Quebec achieves sovereignty.

Quebec must achieve sovereignty, and it is in the farmers' interests to acknowledge that this will be good for the country as a whole because Quebec will want to repatriate the powers it needs in other sectors. However, dairy farmers in Quebec will be allowed to maintain this pooling system, which is beneficial to them and to their counterparts in other provinces. Upon achieving sovereignty, Quebec will be able to uphold the agreements in this sector and those that will be negotiated in other sectors.

In fact, some economists published a report yesterday that explained that because of GATT and NAFTA, similar economically sound administrative agreements in other sectors will be maintained and will continue to exist.

Once again, we have people saying that the end is near, that new borders will arise, that there will be customs check points between Quebec and Ontario. This is all purely hypothetical and just a lot of scaremongering. We know that even Europe has simple administrative systems that would work in Canada, between Quebec and Canada, and would not prevent free circulation of goods and services or alter generally beneficial agreements that exist now, like the pooling system to be implemented by Bill C–86.

All this will continue. There is no reason to believe it would not, and the same applies to other sectors. There is every indication that this is what will happen. In fact, farmers know that the federal system here in Ottawa constitutes the greatest single threat to the agricultural sector. We have said this so often it has become a—

An hon. member: A truism.

Mr. Marchand: —a truism that Quebec has been treated unfairly by the federal government. This has been going on for years. If Quebec really received its fair share, it would have had as much as $800 million annually. Quebec got a raw deal under the federal system. In fact, one of the threats to the dairy system, for instance, is BST.

BST is a major threat, and this is very disturbing. The fact that they want to introduce BST in Canada is very disturbing indeed. I think it is totally unacceptable, and all dairy producers should be up in arms, and consumers as well. Introducing BST in milk, in this pure product, is almost sacrilege.

This is all very disturbing. I think Quebec is well advised to get out of the federal system because the system is falling apart and heavily in debt. Canada has been warned twice during the past three years. The International Monetary Fund warned Canada it would have to turn its economy around because it was teetering on the brink. It seems our public finances are out of control. It is like a ship sinking in the middle of the ocean, and people who think the federal system is here to stay should remember the Titanic.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Québec–Est. He often performs eloquently on agricultural issues. However he speaks of a fairy world in which we can have our cake and eat it too.

The member talked about the fear of the American market system and protecting his own people, the farmers of Quebec, from the American marketing system. The uniqueness of that is that America is a nation state. We are not talking about Canada being a group of 10 nation states; we are talking about Canada being a federalist state. Perhaps the member has not studied economic history, but sovereign states basically take care of their own people first. The concept is the welfare of the people who live within that country.

The GATT negotiation is a way of playing baseball. We are to play a game and these are the rules. Each team is trying to win. Each team is trying to be effective. It is an illusion to have a pooling system, keep all the good things and have a sovereign state. To argue that we are going to keep the good and do away with the bad is not how it works in reality. It has not worked in any country. Sovereign nations will take care of their own people first.

Farmers in Quebec are the highest per capita income earners of all farmers in Canada. How could the member argue that they have been taken advantage of or that they are at a great disadvantage in the federal system when they are the best off economically of all farmers in the country?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that Quebec farmers are disadvantaged. It has been written all over federal budgets for years. We had proof of that again recently. We are reducing subsidies to milk producers in Quebec by 30 per cent. That affects Quebec. It certainly affects Ontario as well. However it is a known fact that Quebec has never got its share of federal dollars in terms of agriculture. It has received much less than its share. There is no doubt about it.

If agriculture in Quebec is strong and well developed it is because we have good farmers. It is not at all due to the federal government. We would have had a stronger agriculture sector if the federal government had acted fairly with Quebec farmers.

It is not a fairy world to speak about the GATT and free trade. It is obvious that the GATT and free trade with the United States have rules. They set ways that commercial interests can trade functions. We know as well that the understanding and trade relations which exist now, today, tomorrow and every day before Quebec sovereignty will continue afterward because that is one of the principles of the GATT. Economic relationships will not disappear overnight.

My hon. colleague is the one who is dreaming when he thinks that the GATT has no weight. It is quite the contrary. The negotiations have weight. The structure that will be put in place by Bill C–86 will be respected by all other trade bodies, whether it be the GATT or anything else.

I am not dreaming at all. We are not speaking of any kind of fairy world when we say the agreements that were taken or will be taken now will continue after Quebec sovereignty. It is entirely logical and entirely reasonable. Farmers today are undertaking the agreements in a very economic, reasonable and logical way. There is nothing emotional involved. It is in their best interest and it will be in their best interest after sovereignty.

The milk producers of Manitoba and the milk producers of Ontario are not interested in United States milk producers competing with Canada or Quebec. The same reasoning is applicable elsewhere, like in Quebec and in every other province. They are not interested in having U.S. competitors coming into Canada. Besides, free trade does not allow it at the moment. GATT does not allow it either. It will not allow it after sovereignty. These agreements go beyond Quebec sovereignty. These are international agreements.

The minute Quebec becomes sovereign, it will belong to GATT. There is no reason to even deny that Quebec will belong to GATT. We are living in a civilized world here. We are living in a civilized world where people respect each other and respect agreements that are signed in a reasonable way. Some people are less civilized than others, certainly. Some people also see problems where there are no. problems. They create fear but there are no foundations to those fears.

The Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. With apologies for not recognizing him earlier, the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, no apology is necessary. The mistake was at our end but nevertheless it is a pleasure to rise to address Bill C–86.

Talking specifically to the bill, this is an act to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act. The purpose of the bill is to amend the act to provide for the replacement of the existing system of levies with a system of pooling market returns from different classes of milk. The idea of this bill is to bring that levy system into alignment with Canada's international trade agreements.

I am the first one to admit that I do not know a tremendous amount about milk production. I am certainly a milk consumer. I go to the 7–Eleven and buy milk. I put it on my cereal and am happy to drink it, but I have only milked a cow once in my life. Apparently it is all in the wrists, but I had very little luck with that.

I will speak a little on the idea of trade. I will also talk a little from my perspective as somebody who comes from a rural constituency about the obvious need to be sensitive to the farm community and the agricultural community while at the same time recognizing the realities out there.

Certainly the reality today in this country and around the world is that we are moving more and more toward free trade. My hon. friend from Québec–Est has just spoken at length about how Quebec is a sovereign country, and if it should ever become a sovereign country, heaven forbid, how it would somehow turn the tide against free trade or be a hold out to free trade. It would protect itself from free trade as though free trade were like a cafeteria where you could pick and choose the agreements you wanted to make.

Of course, that is unrealistic. It took around 100 countries to get a GATT agreement. I remind my hon. friend from Québec–Est and my friends in the Bloc that coming up in the year 2000, which is not very far away now, we are going to see another round of negotiations where undoubtedly tariffs will continue to fall. More and more pressure will be put on Canada and countries like ours that have supply management systems. We are eventually going to have to open up.

I also point out to my hon. friend that under the NAFTA agreement and certainly under any new NAFTA agreements that would come as a result of allowing countries like Chile and other Latin American countries in, we are going to have to see things open up.

Although I am somewhat sympathetic and I have heard from my friends about how supply management has served Quebec well in the past, particularly individual farmers, I can completely understand how important agriculture is to a province and to a country. It does not only produce agricultural commodities but it also produces a lifestyle. It produces income and people with fine character. That is very important and I believe in that.

We are doing people a disservice if we are not straight with them, if we do not tell them what the reality is. The reality is free trade is coming our way and the best thing we can do now is to begin to make adjustments so that we can survive in that free trade environment.

• (1650)

Yesterday I watched on television as members of the Bloc and members of the government debated back and forth about whether or not Quebec was going to stay in Canada, what it would be like if it was outside of Canada and so on.

People must remember that there is a third option. We do not have to settle for status quo federalism, which not only the people in Quebec are upset about, but also the people in the west. The people in my constituency of Medicine Hat are very upset with it.

We do not have to settle for sovereignty. In fact, I understand my Bloc friends are moving away from sovereignty. Pretty soon, who knows, maybe they will be committed federalists the way they are moving around here.

An hon. member: They voted for the pension.

Mr. Solberg: They did vote for the MP pension. That is notable. They are quite happy to take those Canadian dollars when it comes to pension plans.

There is a third option. It is important for dairy farmers in Quebec and all over the country to note that. Because only when we consider the third option can we make the argument that Canadian dairy farmers can still have a viable industry down the road. They need not fear the American juggernaut because there are ways to make dairy farmers in Canada competitive so they can not only survive, but can thrive in the free market environment.

Let me talk for a moment about that third option. Canadians have been telling us that one of the biggest issues of concern to them is the debt and the deficit. The government has taken some baby steps to deal with that but those steps will not be adequate. The reason that should be a concern to dairy farmers and anybody who is in business is that with every day that goes by, we go another $90 million to $100 million in the hole. Eventually we have to pay interest on that. Of course taxes have to go up to keep paying the interest on the debt and deficit. Every second that goes by we go in the hole another $1,036. It is $90 million to $100 million a day. Now our total debt is $551 billion and climbing.

One thing that must happen in order to make dairy farmers around the country competitive is we have to balance the budget. We have asked the government over and over again to the point where some people have become weary of it, but it is an important issue. We have asked the government to tell us when it will balance the budget. It has refused to do that. By refusing to do that it sends a very negative message which also hurts dairy farmers and anybody who is in business. The government sends a message to the markets that it is not prepared to deal with the problem seriously. Thus we have high interest rates which again penalize particularly people in the agriculture industry.

Before Canadian agriculture can be competitive with farmers around the world, we have to get those interest rates down. Right now there is an approximate 3 per cent differential with the United States. That is a huge competitive advantage for the United States. We have to beat that down.

If we can get a hold on the deficit and the debt we will slay two dragons. We will slay the dragon of high interest rates and the dragon of high taxes, which make it very difficult to do business in the country and compete internationally.

That is the option Reform is offering. It is one that the federal government certainly has not talked about. Of course, our Bloc friends would just as soon be out of the country so they have not really offered any constructive ideas for dealing with the debt and the deficit.

While we are on the subject, Reform has also talked about the need to pass language and cultural issues down to the provinces. That would solve a lot of concerns people in Quebec have about confederation and federalism as it is today. We are sensitive to the fact they wish to preserve their language and culture. Reform agrees with that. We believe there can be a way of accommodating the desire of provinces to have control over language and culture in a large country such as Canada where there are many different interests.

There are many other things we could talk about and many other arguments we could make for our vision of federalism. I hope those two address specifically some of the concerns that Quebec dairy farmers would have about competing more in a free trade environment.

One thing that is going to be happening in the near future and which the government has talked about is the need to expand the NAFTA.

The talk is that Chile will become involved very quickly in NAFTA. When that happens there are many people who suspect that the Americans will argue for more of an opening up of some of the protection we now provide for supply management. If that happens, if government is committed to expanding the NAFTA agreement as it says it is, there must be some accommodation to some of our trading partners to open these things up. Frankly, I would be surprised if the government denied that it was going to have to open things up a little bit more.

Setting that aside for a moment, we have already talked a bit about the GATT agreement which will be renegotiated in a few years time and undoubtedly tariffs will be coming down more. Given that reality, I say to my Bloc friends across the way that they are doing the dairy farmers in their own province a great disservice by telling them, leading them on and making them think that there is some way we can preserve the status quo. Well there is no way.

The best example of that, which my friend from Kindersley—Lloydminster pointed to earlier on, is what happened when the government made changes to the WGTA. People out west are saying: "Yes, WGTA is coming to an end. We do not have a problem with that, but it would be nice if we could have had a little notice. It would have been nice if we could have made some of the changes that we needed to make to the transportation system so that we could compete in that free market environment".

On the one hand, we are moving away from the free market environment by dumping the WGTA, which is fine, but on the other hand, the transportation system is still not responsive to a free market environment. Unfortunately, in the next year or so at least and probably three years, farmers in the west are going to be caught in that situation. That is unfair and really reflects poor planning on behalf of the government. It hurts people. I believe many farmers in the west may have to go out of business because of that very poor planning on behalf of the government.

Let us not repeat that mistake now by permitting dairy farmers across the country to think that somehow we can hold on to the status quo. The fact is that free trade is coming.

As I mentioned at the beginning of my comments, I do not know a lot about the production of milk but I do know a little bit about the consumption of it. I want to address some of the comments the member for Québec–Est made with respect to how this benefits dairy farmers.

I remind my hon. friend that there has to be a balance here. Consumers need to be considered when we talk about these things. When my friend talks about how dairy farmers in the United States are suffering and this that and the other thing, he should know that consumers are benefiting by the fact that there is that competition. If anyone doubts that, they need only cross the border and look at the difference in the price of cheese, butter or milk compared to Canadian prices.

I do not think the difference in those prices has to be the difference in profit margin between Canada and the U.S. If we could get our act together by getting our own input costs down, I think our own dairy people can be extremely productive and profitable. However, the key is for us to deal with that debt and deficit.

When consumers have more money in their pockets by virtue of lower prices for things like milk, butter and cheese, they can also buy more of them. However, when they are very expensive because supply management builds in what I think we would regard as some inefficiencies, then people are a little bit more squeezed when it comes to buying groceries and they just cannot buy the same quantities they would be able to buy otherwise. That is something I would like my friend from Québec–Est to consider.

I talked a little bit about the debt and the deficit and the need to offer a third option. One of the things that came up yesterday in debate between the Liberals and the Bloc was the whole idea of the status quo federalism versus separation.

One of the things happening lately with the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois is they have been sending out signs that they are moving more toward the idea of sovereignty association and who knows what now. There has been a lot of talk about their having all kinds of internal problems and about some people being perhaps more committed to federalism than they would like us to believe.

We would like to offer a chance to our friends in the Bloc Quebecois to take the extra step, come a little closer and consider Reform's vision of a decentralized Canada in which provinces will have their rights respected under the Constitution, in which we absolutely and completely support their rights to make some of the decisions that affect their well–being but on the other hand still allow them to remain part of one country and have more control of some of the things important to them in terms of international trade by virtue of the fact that they are part of one big country. They are not tiny countries among 150 in the world. They are part of Canada. Canada carries tremendous weight by virtue of its reputation and its size in terms of its economy.

We encourage our friends to consider this when they are talking about international trade. Obviously when we have more trade in the world because of a larger economy we will be able to make better agreements. We encourage our friends in the Bloc to think about that as well.

Any time the government brings forward legislation which brings rules and regulations in line with international agreements it is a step in the right direction. There are still some provinces concerned about the bill. We respect that.

I encourage the government and members of the Bloc Quebecois to continue to move toward agreements that recognize the reality that we must have free trade. It is where everyone is heading.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member.

He talked about competition. He envied the American agricultural system and its milk producers. In Canada milk producers are better compensated than their American counterparts.

Even so, the top 10 per cent of dairy producers only receive about 5 per cent return on their invested capital. Clearly from a business operation Canadian farmers are far from being wealthy. The hon. member is speaking about emulating a system that will make Canadian farmers far poorer than that.

It is interesting that we have had both the Bloc and Reform members on their feet today speaking about the same system. They are talking about decentralizing, weakening the federal system.

The NAFTA and the GATT have already weakened the federal government's ability to exercise economic policy within our borders. By decentralizing even further and allocating more powers to the provinces there is a point at which there would be nothing left. That is what both of these parties basically want to do. I am very happy to belong to the governing party which understands the need for national standards and national policy.

We are debating a pooling agreement which draws to our attention the importance of a federal system with provinces and the federal government setting national standards, in this case for the pooling of milk.

• (1705)

It has the possibility of being downloaded to the provinces by certain authorities. At the same time it is establishing national standards. I believe some of my colleagues in the Reform Party would do the reverse. They would have each province make its own agricultural policy as it affected them.

I would like the hon. member to address whether they are in favour of a supply managed system Canada or an American free market system with lower incomes to farmers than in the Canadian system.

Mr. Solberg: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked the wrong question. He asked if we are in favour of supply management as if that is a long term option. The hon. member should be completely up front with his own constituents, the people of his province and the people of Quebec. He must know that although the government fought against NAFTA it has signed on to it. It said it did not really believe in the whole thing but it has signed on to it. He must know supply management as it exists today is not a long term option.

We are moving toward free trade so there is no point in pining in some sentimental way for the way things used to be 20 years ago. Tariffs are dropping every year. Ultimately we will see a situation, since the government signed the agreement, in which dairy producers will have to compete more on a premarket basis.

Let us not complain about the way things are and how they used to be. Instead, let us get ourselves ready. The best way to do that is to get rid of the taxes. The hon. member talked about the American system. The one thing I admire about the United States is it has been able to hold its taxes down which gives it a tremendous trade advantage.

We will be in the hole $32 billion this year. By the end of the government's term it will be over $100 billion. The Liberals are adding to it when they reap huge rewards through their MP pensions, but that is another debate.

The point is we have to get a handle on the debt and deficit so we can get the taxes down so dairy producers and all business people will be competitive. Let us not be sentimental about the past. The past is past. Let the dead bury the dead; let us get on with the future and start making the changes we have to make in order to be competitive.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I see that the Liberals are anxiously waiting for my comments. I hope I will not disappoint them.

I am very pleased to take part in this debate for two specific reasons. First, there is the importance of agriculture for the economy of my riding and my region of Estrie, the Eastern Townships. However, I also want to discuss certain arguments raised during this debate on Bill C–86, particularly this idea that, according to our federalist colleagues, once Quebec becomes sovereign, it would be impossible to preserve any form of agreement between Quebec and the rest of Canada.

First, I want to point out that the Eastern Toownships, where I come from, and particularly the riding of Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, which I represent here, produce 2.6 million hectolitres of milk every year. This translates into net annual revenues of over $130 million for producers.

Dairy producers in the riding of Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead alone provide 1.2 million hectolitres of milk per year, which amounts to more than $60 million in net revenues. Roughly 50 per cent of the milk produced in the Eastern Townships comes from the riding of Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. Although I did not make an in depth study of the location of producers in my riding, I would say that three quarters of the production comes from the Coaticook region, which is known, not only locally, but throughout Quebec and even Canada, as the top milk producing region.

Each year, the beautiful city of Coaticook holds its dairy festival. This event is an opportunity to fully recognize the importance of that industry in my region and in my riding. It is also an opportunity for our fellow citizens to celebrate, to meet, and basically to enjoy the fruits of their labour. This is one of the reasons why I really wanted to take part in this debate.

I said a moment ago that I wanted to focus more on the relations between states, or to put it another way, between economic partners in the Canadian economic union, rather than on the actual substance of Bill C–86. My colleague from Frontenac, the Bloc Quebecois agriculture critic, has brilliantly, as always, explained why the Bloc Quebecois supported this bill.

He is very familiar with the subject, with all aspects of the bill, and was able to substantiate his arguments, unlike the Liberal members opposite, of course, and our colleagues in the Reform Party, who would like to see a system of free enterprise, with no constraints whatsoever, a sort of no holds barred capitalism really, such as we had a number of years ago, and such as can still be found in some parts of the United States.

Often our Liberal and Reform colleagues, and the member for Kingston and the Islands is a good example, use the word "separation" when speaking about the sovereignty of Quebec.

Mr. Milliken: That is what it is.

Mr. Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): The Liberal party, the Liberal government, which is using our taxes to conduct all sorts of opinion polls, saw that using the word "separation" worked to their advantage, because it struck fear into the hearts of Quebecers, and could lead to a "no" in the referendum.

• (1715)

When people look more closely at what sovereignists are saying, when they take the time to really listen to what they have to say, they see right away that the sovereignist message is one of openness, of self–confidence.

To put it briefly, what sovereignists want is for us to be able to look after our own affairs in Quebec, to be able to make our own decisions about the kind of society we wish to build, the kind of society we wish to live in, and to be able to determine, on the basis of our needs, our interests and our values, what we want to share with our neighbours and with which of our neighbours we want to do business. That is what Quebec sovereignty would mean.

Let me give you a few examples. During Canada's 1988 election campaign on free trade, one of the strongest proponents of the free trade agreement with the U.S. was Bernard Landry, who is now Quebec's Deputy Premier.

I would say that he spoke up in just about every forum. He was then a staunch ally of the Conservative Party, arguing that it was necessary, not only preferable but essential, for the economy of Quebec and Canada as a whole to expand our markets and sell more products to the Americans, the U.S. being our closest neighbour.

This was acknowledged by then Prime Minister Mulroney, who, on several occasions, used the example given by Bernard Landry to say what a decisive role it played in that election campaign. Well, Mr. Landry is a convinced and convincing sovereignist, an active politician who, for more than 30 years—without adding years to his real age—, has been defending this theory with brilliance and eloquence.

A few days ago, at a fundraiser for the Parti Quebecois in Montreal, the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Parizeau, told business people, and I quote: "We may be a small country in terms of population, but we are successful, fulfilled and wealthier". Mr. Parizeau did not give any examples, but he could have mentioned Norway, Sweden, Finland and Switzerland, small countries whose populations are roughly the same as Quebec's. Mr. Parizeau went on to say, "We may have a small population and still be a prosperous, wealthy society, on one basic condition: that we have access to large markets without ever giving up our identity".

That is what was said by the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Parizeau, whom our Liberal friends call a separatist. In fact, Mr. Parizeau said this: "What I personally want for my people, my nation, is for us to decide to take our collective future into our own hands and decide what we want to share with others". Like all sovereignists, he acknowledged the need to have as open a market as possible.

In that sense, Quebec sets a fine example with this Bill C–86 before us, since it was based on the Quebec model that the agreement was entered into by all the provinces, and I repeat the provinces, because all the federal government has to do is pass legislation in the House of Commons recognizing this de facto situation. It is a good thing that the federal government is not involved; it would only make matters worse.

So, based on the Quebec model, it is possible to enter into agreements with our Canadian, American and international partners, as it is recognized that this kind of decision must arise from mutual interests and have something in it for everyone involved.

I want to stress that Bill C–86 is an excellent example. Six provinces have already approved the agreement, while three others still have reservations. We are letting them think it over. That is what co–operation is about. That is what I call openness. Why impose one's views on everyone else? Give people a chance to change their mind. We have to be open to the world. That is what Quebec sovereignty means.

In the minutes remaining, I would like to address government intervention and its negative impact on the economy in general, and the agricultural industry in particular, seeing that the debate is on agriculture.

I shall refer to an article published in La terre de chez nous, which, I should point out to our colleagues opposite, is not the Bloc's official newspaper. It really belongs to the agricultural community and provides farmers with information on what is happening in their region and elsewhere in the industry.

In the latest edition of La terre de chez nous, for the week of May 11 to 17, 1995, editor in chief Claude Lafleur quoted an example of inconsistent and harmful interference on the part of the federal government based on the implementation of the finance minister's budget that we have been debating in this House these the past few months. What example is that? I urge my Liberal colleagues to pay close attention to what Mr. Lafleur said, as it contradicts what their little red book says.

What did Mr. Lafleur say? The president of La terre de chez nous told the agricultural industry that it should expect the worst from the finance minister's budget, adding that it was a real Pandora's box, that new harmful effects were discovered every day, and that it would probably never end, unless, of course, Quebec decided to assume full authority.

Mr. Lafleur also had this to say: "Indeed, this is not the last of the bad news coming from the Martin budget. For example, the federal government just announced that it was withdrawing from the agricultural employment services program". That comment was made in reference to the red book. The Liberals were elected under false pretenses in 1993, when they campaigned with their red book and insisted on the importance of creating jobs.

But what are they doing now that they are in office? They axe agricultural employment services, a successful program which has been in place for over 20 years. During the last year, the minister—whom I once called the minister of human resources impoverishment, but whose title really is Minister of Human Resources Development—asked the UPA to reach an agreement with his department to ensure the maintenance of these agricultural employment services, which provide farmers with a qualified manpower when they need it.

Only a few months ago, the minister said: "We have an agreement with the UPA in Quebec to keep these services going". Then in the Martin budget, the government decides to axe this program. It will be cut by 20 per cent in 1995–96, 40 per cent in 1996–97 and dropped altogether in 1997–98. This example does not come from the Bloc Quebecois or the separatist Minister of Agriculture in Quebec but from the editor in chief of La Terre de chez nous, Claude Lafleur, whose integrity is well known and whose objective approach to the issues can certainly not be faulted by our Liberal friends.

That is a very real example of the Liberal government's negative impact on agriculture. I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, since you are signalling I have only two minutes left. I would like to ask for more time, but I know it is no use trying since I would not get unanimous consent. So I will simply ask them to come back next time, and maybe some day they will understand.

In concluding, I would like to comment on what was said by the hon. member for Medicine Hat who expressed so well and so consistently the Reform Party's position on trade between regions and between countries. Reform Party members want to see a return to a genuinely free market without government constraints. The hon. member for Medicine Hat said that, if we want a more open market, which is what sovereignists want as well, as I said earlier, we cannot have a supply management system.

I simply want to say the hon. member is mistaken. Supply management is a way to deal with domestic problems. Its role is not to regulate international trade or trade between regions. So we can have a supply management system, and still open our borders to international trade.

AIR-INDIA DISASTER

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston, Lib.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take immediate steps to initiate a royal commission of inquiry into the Air-India disaster of June 23, 1985 which claimed the lives of 329 people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, June 23, 1995 will be the 10th anniversary of what is and was the worst mass murder ever in Canadian history. Three hundred and twenty-nine people lost their lives on board Air-India flight 182 while over the coast of Ireland.

The flight originated in Vancouver. Of the deceased, 280 were Canadians, 80 of whom were children. In the 10 years since the tragedy, a royal commission of inquiry has not been held. There has been no parliamentary inquiry whatsoever into this terrorist act.

I remind hon. members there was an inquiry in Ireland. There was another inquiry in India. Notwithstanding that over 280 people on board were Canadians, the Mulroney administration refused to initiate a royal commission of inquiry.

It is essential an inquiry take place in order for the people of Canada, the people of the world, to understand exactly what transpired both before and after the tragedy on June 23, 1985.

There is evidence to suggest the Government of Canada in the months before June 1985 was warned there could be or would be a serious act of terrorism by Sikh extremists in Canada.

June 1985 marked the first anniversary of the storming of the Sikh holy temple at Amritsar. The Indian government stormed the most holy place in June of that year and a number of people were killed. As a result Sikh extremists worldwide were suspected of planning retaliatory measures to seek revenge.

The government of India, aware that the first anniversary was coming up, gave a specific warning to the Government of Canada and in particular to the foreign affairs department, at that time headed by Joe Clark, that there could be an act of terrorism.

Notwithstanding the advanced warnings, there was absolutely no enhanced security for this flight. The X–ray machinery that would examine the luggage boarded on to the ill–fated flight broke down and instead of the bells and whistles going off the luggage was simply loaded on to the plane and scanned with a hand scanner.

In view of the warnings given to the Government of Canada, the luggage should have been more thoroughly searched by hand or they should have waited until proper machinery was in place.

• (1805)

During the weeks preceding the disaster the Prime Minister of India was scheduled to visit the United States. The American authorities were able to uncover a plot to assassinate Rajiv Ghandi at the time. It was determined there was a link between those alleged to have conspired to assassinate the Indian Prime Minister and a Sikh extremist group in British Columbia.

The security intelligence service, our secret service, was monitoring the activity of Sikh extremists in Canada, particularly in British Columbia. Not only was it trailing a prime suspect in the Air–India and the Narita bombing acts of terrorism, it also tapped their telephone lines.

In the weeks preceding the Air–India disaster CSIS agents actually saw the two prime suspects detonate a bomb in the woods outside of Duncan, British Columbia. Notwithstanding this information and in spite of the fact that they were actually listening in on telephone conversations, they discontinued the surveillance on these two individuals. Why did they do that? They assumed these people were constructing bombs to be used in acts of terrorism outside of Canada. Why did they not take action on the wiretap evidence they had? The evidence obtained was in the Punjabi language. There was no Punjabi speaking CSIS agent to translate this information. The information received as a result of these interceptions could very well have led the police to foil this act of terrorism.

In my view the Government of Canada of the day was grossly negligent. Is it any wonder the government was subsequently party to a settlement with the families of the victims? It contributed an estimated $20 million to a compensation fund for the families of the murder victims, and that was also a big secret. If there was no negligence on the part of the Government of Canada, why did it contribute to the compensation fund?

There are many very disturbing unanswered questions in this tragedy. To put this tragic act of terrorism into perspective, this was and continues to be today the most hideous act of aviation terrorism ever. The Pan Am Lockerbie terrorist act took a significant number of lives but nowhere near the number in the Air–India disaster. It was the worst mass murder in Canadian history.

That is the backdrop and when we look at the involvement of the various government agencies we have to ask whether the response of the Government of Canada was adequate in the circumstances.

Following the act of terrorism in June 1985, the security intelligence service erased two–thirds of the tapes it had gathered in the months leading up to the tragedy and in the several years that followed. It says it was done inadvertently, that there were no regulations in place to maintain that evidence, that there was nothing on those tapes to assist in the criminal investigation. A transcript was never taken of those tapes.

If one is dealing with the worst mass murder in Canadian history, why would one not preserve every last piece of evidence the authorities were able to uncover or to gather in the investigation?

There is no doubt in my mind there was a cover-up. The Mulroney administration refused to initiate an inquiry because it was trying to cover up the actions of agencies of the Government of Canada for which it was responsible. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Transport and the solicitor general of the day were all ultimately responsible for the gross negligence on the part of individuals within that administration.

The erasing of the tapes is further evidence they were trying to destroy evidence that could prove the security intelligence service and the RCMP were grossly negligent. Not only did they erase tapes, but false affidavits were sworn. Members of CSIS broke the law by swearing false affidavits in order to convince a judge to issue warrants to wire tap the telephone conversations of numerous individuals subsequent to the disaster. The security intelligence service started to panic. The RCMP started to panic realizing what it had done or what it had failed to do. Then it deliberately misled the court into issuing warrants.

Those people have not been held accountable. There has never been an inquiry to look into the actions of the agencies of the Government of Canada.

Throughout the last 10 years the government and the previous administration have continually maintained criminal investigation is ongoing. That is the excuse the RCMP has put forward over the years. It is a lame excuse. According to press reports today the criminal investigation is virtually non–existent.

There are two people working part time on the worst mass murder in Canadian history. If the Royal Canadian Mounted Police does not have the evidence in order to secure a conviction after 10 years, surely at some point it has to say the investigation is concluded and it cannot move any further.

As I indicated, I believe there are reasons. The RCMP or certain individuals within the RCMP and the security intelligence service do not want a royal commission of inquiry.

There is also an international element to this tragedy, not only because it was an Air–India plane blown up, not only because of the involvement of Sikh extremists, but also because there is evidence suspects involved in the bombing of Air–India were trained in the United States in Alabama. The operator of the soldier of fortune training school in Alabama, Frank Camper, has indicated Sikh extremists were trained at his mercenary training school.

One would think that if the RCMP was doing its work it would personally interview Mr. Camper and others who might have evidence in the United States. The FBI refused to allow the RCMP to investigate or question Mr. Camper or others in the United States. Why would the Government of the United States and the FBI refuse to co–operate with Canadian authorities with respect to this matter?

• (1815)

The theory put forward, with evidence, by a number of people in Canada and abroad is that the American government, the Pakistani government and the Indian government knew that Sikh extremists were being trained; that the Pakistani government facilitates the training of Sikh extremists abroad; that the American government needed the co–operation of President Zia of the Pakistani government at the time to ensure that Pakistan could continue to be used as a conduit, as a route, for arms for the Afghan rebels fighting the Soviets in Afghanistan.

There is evidence to suggest that there was pressure by foreign governments, in particular the American government, the Indian government and the Pakistani government, on the Canadian government not to hold a royal commission of inquiry because of the international implications of what happened.

Notwithstanding the alleged involvement of other governments or the connection with other governments and other foreign nationals, this government has an obligation to the families of the victims to ensure that those responsible are brought to justice. If there is insufficient evidence to bring those people to justice then the answers to all the disturbing questions must be answered. The only way to do that is through a royal commission of inquiry.

I believe that the government has a strong suspicion and in fact knows who was responsible for the Air–India disaster that killed 329 people. It lacks the evidence to secure a conviction. There is not the will to initiate a royal commission of inquiry. The reason I say the government is aware of who is responsible is because there has been a conviction in the case of the Narita bombing.

If you recall, Mr. Speaker, 52 minutes before the Air–India flight was blown out of the skies over Ireland, a bomb went off at the Narita airport in Tokyo. The CP flight originated in Canada. It landed in Tokyo. The baggage handlers were removing the luggage from the CP flight to an Air–India flight that was about to leave for Bombay when a bomb exploded and two baggage handlers were killed.

As a result of the meticulous investigation on the part of Japanese authorities, an individual by the name of Inderjit Singh Reyat was convicted and is now incarcerated in Canada for that crime. Mr. Reyat and Talwinder Singh Parmar were arrested in the Air–India disaster but were released after a preliminary inquiry in British Columbia.

There was a connection. There is no doubt that those responsible for the Narita bombing were also responsible for the Air–India act of terrorism, the Air–India mass murder. Yet we are unable to secure a conviction.

I have asked previous solicitors general about this. The Government of Canada has never offered a reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the Air–India disaster. That act of terrorism was not the act of a single person. It was a conspiracy and several people were involved.

Why has the government refused over the years to offer a reward, whether it is $1 million or $2 million or $5 million? If the Government of Canada is able to pay the family of Clifford Olson $100,000 to locate the bodies of his victims, surely it can offer a substantial reward to close the final chapter on this ugly episode in Canadian history. However, for some reason a reward has not been offered.

In conclusion, there is no doubt in my mind that the Mulroney administration was party to a cover–up. As well, there is no doubt in my mind that the present administration will do the right thing and call a royal commission of inquiry before the 10th anniversary on June 23. The reason I say that is because the Prime Minister, two years ago, while leader of the opposition, wrote in a letter:

> We will continue to press the government to create a royal commission to look into the Air–India disaster.

I have every reason to believe that the Prime Minister will honour his word and a royal commission of inquiry will be appointed. However, I would still like to see the House take a stand on the issue.

The Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse, I would like to indicate that this is a very important issue to a number of members here tonight. I wonder whether members would agree to share their time.

Would that be agreeable?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague from Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, I listened to the hon. member for York South—Weston present his motion M–293 regarding the Air India tragedy of June 23, 1985, with great interest.

To demonstrate just how lightly the government of the time took this tragedy, in which 329 travellers, 280 of which were Canadians, most of them of Indian origin, I would mention that the Mulroney government's first gesture was to send its condolences to the Republic of India. That is indicative of how the case was handled. It also helps to understand how the Canadian Security Intelligence Service carried out its investigation or, more exactly, did not carry out the investigation.

It is clear, and the hon. member for York South—Weston mentioned this during his representation, that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service's approach to the investigation is questionable. The attitude of the RCMP, which apparently put a lid on its own investigation and only assigned staff to the effort part–time, is as questionable as that of CSIS.

Given the scope of this tragedy, 329 deaths as was mentioned earlier—the biggest mass slaughter in the air ever to have been executed at that time—it is obvious that we should go back and take a better look at this case.

Is the royal commission of inquiry requested by the hon. member for York South—Weston the ideal solution? Maybe not. Obviously, ten years after the fact, we will not be able to interview the victims of the tragedy. Obviously, parallel investigations were carried out by organizations in other countries. It may be wise to pool all of the knowledge collected. Nevertheless, the very serious allegations made about CSIS, while not meriting a royal commission of inquiry, certainly should be looked into by the sub–committee on national security.

It would appear that this sub–committee, which is comprised of parliamentarians and would cost taxpayers nothing, contrary to a royal commission of inquiry, is the appropriate body to study the way the Canadian Security Intelligence Service handled this and other cases, where its work has left to be desired. I think it is high time we cleaned up the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

• (1825)

That is why, given all of the investigations that have already been done, since it is highly improbable that the exact causes of the tragedy will ever be found and since almost all avenues of inquiry have already been exhausted, I am of the opinion that creating a royal commission of inquiry would be a waste of money. However, I am in favour of a parliamentary review of the way in which the Canadian Security Intelligence Service carried out its investigation into the matter.

[English]

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the member for York South—Weston for bringing this motion to the floor of the House.

The timing is most appropriate. In just over one month's time it will be the 10th anniversary of the bombing of Air–India flight 182. It is with full confidence that I use the word bombing and not accident or incident or any other marginal term. What happened to Air–India flight 182 was an act of terrorism, an act of cold blooded murder and an act of cowardice.

Unfortunately no one has been brought to trial in this case yet. If my hon. colleague is accurate and others are involved, it is only a matter of proof that they have not been brought to court, I would like to stress, yet.

The member for York South—Weston seems to be of the opinion that charges will never be laid in this case so let us move on to a royal commission. If this was the case, I would have no problem in providing my unconditional support to the call for a royal commission.

However, I believe that the member for York South—Weston may be a little premature in his assumption that charges will never be laid. On April 4, when Commissioner Murray of the RCMP appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, I asked him if he was opposed to a judicial inquiry into the Air–India bombing. His response was:

> We are not at all opposed to having a judicial inquiry. Our only concern was to undertake the judicial inquiry while the investigation was still active—The investigation is still active—I have made a commitment to the Solicitor General that when we reach a point where we feel that we are at an impasse, I will at that time come forward and indicate so. But we have not reached that point. The investigation is still optimistically being pursued.

I accept the word of the commissioner. I hope that this commissioner will make an intense effort in the near future to advance the investigation or to accept that the investigation is over and the time has come to move on. But until that time the question is, will a royal commission affect any subsequent criminal proceedings?

Again the member for York South—Weston is impeccable in his timing. Less than two weeks ago the Supreme Court of Canada handed down its decision on the holding of a public inquiry into the Westray coal mine disaster at the same time that criminal proceedings are under way.

The decision in that case was that the court should be most hesitant to interfere with interests of holding a public inquiry. However, the court limited its decision specifically to the Westray case and would not speculate on other cases.

For example, the supreme court pointed out that the Westray criminal case was being tried in front of a judge alone. As well, the court believed that the commissioner of any public inquiry would not compel the accused to testify at the inquiry until the criminal case was concluded. Thus some significant considerations have to be resolved before a royal commission into the Air–India bombing is conducted.

Do we want to sacrifice any subsequent criminal charges for the sake of holding a royal commission today? I think not. This is where a royal commission would create a great many problems.

In the Westray decision the supreme court recognized the protection of the charter to any potentially accused. They could be compelled to testify in front of the royal commission but their testimony could not be used at the trial. That is a given.

What would cause even greater problems in pursuing criminal charges against those responsible for bombing Air–India is the difficulty created by the derivative evidence.

• (1830)

This means that if any new information comes out at the royal commission, at a subsequent criminal proceeding the defence could claim that the crown was only able to proceed with charges with the evidence that was a result of compulsory incriminating testimony and therefore the evidence would not be admissible.

In addition, in the Westray case the court ruled that the testimony of the accused must not be published and the report of the inquiry must remain confidential to ensure that any accused received a fair opportunity at trial.

The whole point of a royal commission should be to bring the truth about Air-India to light, and this could not be done if the evidence could not be published. Our first priority must be to bring those responsible for the Air-India bombing to trial.

I know that my colleague for York South—Weston is concerned about the way both the RCMP and CSIS have handled the investigation of this terrorist act. And there should be a cause for concern. I have no doubt that when the evidence of how these two agencies handled their investigation comes to light, it will be apparent that mistakes were made.

Who will ultimately be held accountable for these mistakes? Most of the senior management who were in place at CSIS and the RCMP have retired. There is concern that the whole truth may never come out. But when it comes to choosing between pointing fingers at those responsible for some of the mistakes at CSIS and the RCMP or bringing the individuals who are responsible for the worst mass murder in Canadian history to justice, I am afraid there is no comparison. Bringing to trial those responsible for the bombing has to take priority.

To get back to the motion before us today, if there is any way a royal commission could be held without jeopardizing the crown's ability to bring those murderers to trial, I would fully support such a call. Let us put the speculation to rest and give everyone involved in the case the opportunity to give their testimony. I am sure that many investigators at both CSIS and the RCMP would love to have the opportunity to provide their versions of the event.

Let us give the families of the victims an opportunity to finally hear what happened to their loved ones. Let us give the Canadian public the truth about what happened with the bombing of Air India. We should be told what the Canadian government was doing in regard to this issue prior to the bombing. Could it have been prevented? We should be told about the subsequent investigation. Did a turf war between the RCMP and CSIS impede a proper investigation?

The member for York South—Weston is absolutely correct: all this information must be made public and a royal commission or a judicial inquiry should occur. The only question is the timing.

The first and foremost concern on this issue must be that those individuals involved in the cowardly bombing of Air–India must be brought to justice. If a royal commission will not interfere or jeopardize a criminal trial, then we should proceed immediately. However, if it is likely that this royal commission would provide these mass murderers with a technicality to escape conviction, I am afraid the commission should wait.

While it is important that we ensure that the bombing of Air–India flight 182 is never forgotten, we owe it to the victims and their families that those responsible are brought to justice.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Sarnia—Lambton is going to share his 10–minute slot with one of his colleagues.

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the agreement was that I would share remainder time.

I am pleased to rise today to discuss private member's Motion No. 293. Ten years after, we cannot adequately acknowledge the suffering of those left behind, but we can look to the changes in our air travel safety that have occurred as a result of this very tragic event.

Immediately following the disaster, the interdepartmental committee on security and intelligence was instructed to study and report on airport and airline security in Canada. The recommendations stemming from this report have been implemented, resulting in significant improvements to aviation security in Canada.

New air carrier and airport security regulations have been introduced, which establish high minimum standards. These regulations are under constant review and adjustment to respond to the changing situation.

Monitoring and inspection of airport and air carrier security measures have been greatly increased. Also, more stringent security controls on passengers, carry–on baggage, checked baggage, cargo and mail have been introduced on international flights. Air carriers are prohibited from carrying the baggage of persons not on board the aircraft.

• (1835)

The range of enforcement mechanisms has also been strengthened with the introduction in 1989 of the designated provisions regulations, which is an administrative monetary penalty scheme. These regulations were amended in 1993, increasing the number of punishable aviation security regulatory offences and the size of maximum penalties that can be levied.

Additional X–ray detection equipment and explosive vapour detectors have been put into service. A training program for security screening personnel and their trainers has been developed and implemented by Transport Canada. Courses are regularly scheduled. Internal security training programs for Transport Canada security inspectors and other aviation security specialists are also in place.

In addition, new measures have been implemented that require air carriers operating in Canada to carry out a program of initial and annual recurrent crew member aviation security training. All persons employed at major airports who have access to restricted areas must undergo a security assessment to ensure they do not pose a threat to the security of civil aviation.

In 1994 new security standards were legislated for airport restricted area pass systems, which improved the ability of the government and airport operators to ensure that people in restricted areas of Canada's airports have a need and a right to be there.

Transport Canada has been actively pursuing stronger security provisions and bilateral air transport agreements with other countries to ensure that implementation of Canada's high aviation security standards is a mandatory condition for foreign air carrier operations in our country.

I would like to point out that in addition to these enhancements Canada has in place a three–level alert and response system to ensure appropriate security measures are taken in response to specific threats. I understand this system was fully updated in 1992 and is under constant review and fine tuning to ensure it responds effectively to changing circumstances.

In conclusion, the Air–India disaster has been the subject of exhaustive examination by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the Security Intelligence Review Committee, Transport Canada, the Solicitor General of Canada, and the police investigation is ongoing.

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in support of the motion by the hon. member for York South—Weston.

The hon. member is correct: it is high time for a royal commission of inquiry into the Air–India disaster. For too long the Sikh community has lived under a great shadow of suspicion created by the media reports that someone from the Canadian Sikh community may have been responsible for the deaths of 329 people.

Responsibility for the crash has been attributed to a number of groups. Accusations have been made that U.S. intelligence agencies withheld vital information from RCMP investigators. There are real questions about how much the RCMP and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service knew.

The only clear fact is that on June 23, 1985, Air India flight 182 exploded over the Atlantic Ocean near Cork, Ireland. All 329 people aboard the plane lost their lives, including 280 Canadians. Most were of East Indian origin; some were Sikh families.

This was the worst mass murder in Canadian history. Yet 10 years later no one has been prosecuted in Canada for bombing the plane. Ten years later, the families are still waiting for answers. Ten years later, the Canadian Sikh community is still waiting to find out who was really responsible. We still have far too many questions and not enough answers.

Regardless of who placed the bomb, regardless of their motives, it is imperative they be brought to justice. I ask the Canadian government to initiate a royal commission of inquiry into the disaster as soon as possible.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for North Vancouver has very kindly offered to give up his normal rotation in the party line. Therefore the hon. member for Brampton has the floor.

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, for most Canadians Friday, June 23, 1995 will be a day like any other. Parents will get up, have breakfast with their children, take them off to school and go off to work just as they would any other day.

However, for the families and friends of those Canadians who lost their lives aboard Air–India flight 182 exactly 10 years ago to the day, June 23 will be a day filled with remembrance and sorrow. It will be a day to reflect on the memories of loved ones lost in the blink of an eye, of entire families and children who never had a chance to grow up, children who never had the chance to experience the many joys and expressions of life.

There is nothing we can do to bring them back, but we must honour their memory and we must do all we can to ease the suffering of their families and friends. That is why we must properly investigate this terrible tragedy. That is why it is imperative that we conduct a royal commission into the most horrific mass murder in this nation's history. This is a commitment members of the Liberal caucus made while in opposition, and it is a commitment we must honour now that we are in power.

While in opposition, members of the Liberal caucus watched in horror as the then Prime Minister of Canada, upon learning of the tragedy, contacted the Prime Minister of India to offer his condolences on the issue. In doing so, the Prime Minister sent the message that this terrible tragedy was being mourned primarily by the citizens of India. This was the wrong message to send. These were Canadians.

That inquiries have been undertaken by foreign governments on this matter in the absence of an inquiry by the Government of Canada is cause for embarrassment to all members of this House.

Previous governments repeatedly turned down requests for a royal commission on the grounds that the matter was still under investigation and that it might prejudice the ongoing RCMP investigation. I believe that this rationale can no longer be invoked in good conscience.

A story in this morning's Globe and Mail states that the 10–year old RCMP investigation is winding down and that only two or three officers are working on this case on a part time basis. The cost of this investigation to date is in the order of $20 million. Ten years and $20 million later, we have still not solved this horrible crime.

There is another reason that came to mind as I was listening to my hon. colleague speak. We have heard about extremists from different groups of people being blamed, suspicions passed on to these groups. I have heard from many sources that this group of people did it. When I hear today the Sikh population being mentioned, it brings a great deal of pain to me. This only increases the misunderstanding of a community. To cast aspersions upon this group of people is an absolute sin. We must have a royal commission to remove this scar that has formed on this nation's history by failing to respond to the cries for answers from the families and friends of those who perished aboard Air–India flight 182.

We can begin by voting in favour of this motion today. Given the importance of this issue for all Canadians, I move that this motion be declared votable.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that this matter be declared a votable one?

An hon. member: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: The nay having been given, the member still has the floor. She might wish to continue. If not, we will now go to the hon. member for North Vancouver and then we will close with the honourable parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will just take a few minutes as well.

In looking at this whole situation of the Air–India crash, I know that it has been dragging on now for 10 years, as other members have said. It is really getting to the point where we have to start asking questions about whether it has gone on long enough and how long do we allow the police investigation to keep going and winding down.

My colleague from Reform has pointed out some of the technical difficulties that are involved in starting a royal commission when there is still an RCMP investigation under way. That is an important consideration. However, we are 10 years downstream and many of the people who were involved in the RCMP are already retired. We have a situation where one of the major suspects is already dead, killed in a gun battle with Indian police in India.

• (1845)

According to a newspaper article in the Ottawa Citizen on April 14, 1994 another suspect, Mr. Manjit Singh, also known as Lal Singh, is in prison in India. We have two there. A third person who may have been a suspect was arrested the same day for the bombing which killed baggage handlers at Narita airport.

The evidence is fast disappearing. In the meantime we have spent about $20 million, yet we still have all the families of the victims who lost their loved ones in this crash wondering what really happened and whether there was a cover–up.

My colleague who proposed the motion asked what happened. Was there a cover–up? What is the truth behind the crash of the Air–India flight? On balance, weighing the questions, weighing the technicalities, weighing the length of time it has taken and weighing the amount of money spent so far, I would have to support the member in his motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take immediate steps to initiate a royal commission of inquiry into the Air–India disaster of June 23, 1985 which claimed the lives of 329 people.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first let me congratulate the hon. member for bringing forward this long delayed motion. June 23 will mark the 10th yearly observance of the largest mass murder in Canadian history and the most tragic incident in the history of aviation, the bombing of Air–India flight 182.

On June 23, 1985, without warning, 329 innocent passengers were blown out of the sky. They were all killed instantly. There were no survivors. On flight 182, 295 passengers were Canadian and 82 of the passengers were children.

For the past 10 years the victims' families have suffered tremendous grief and endured great pain in virtual silence. They have waited patiently for the killers of their loved ones to be brought to justice and they have looked for answers. To date they have had none.

Air–India's explosion was not an accident; it was a planned and deliberate cold blooded act of violence that took the lives of 329 innocent passengers. It was an act of terrorism.

One decade is an eternity. For the surviving family members the past 10 years have been filled with hollow birthdays, empty anniversaries and missed graduations.

As a compassionate and caring society, as a country that has been built on the tenets of justice, fairness and equality, and as a country that believes in the due process of law, we cannot continue to ask these families to wait any longer. As Canadian citizens they deserve justice. For the sake of the victims and their families justice must be served.

There are two tragedies for these families. First, there is the horrific loss of innocent life. In some cases whole families were lost. In some cases one family member remains while the rest of the family was on the plane. I remember watching a vivid scene where a father wept out loud when he had lost his wife and his two children. As someone who has three children, I can imagine the nightmare that he will have to go through for the rest of his life. We need to give that person and all the other people some answers. It was a horrific loss of life. Second, 10 years after the bombing and $20 million later the murderers are still at large.

While in opposition we called for a royal commission. We promised the families of Air–India victims that justice would be served. We committed ourselves to finding the perpetrators of this brutal crime.

Today, nearly 10 years since the bombing, no charges have been laid. During the first two years there were up to 75 officers on the investigation. Today only one officer is dedicated to investigating this savage crime on a part time basis.

I want to re–emphasize that we do not know. People have not been brought to justice. I know some members have said perhaps it was one group or person. In Canada we are innocent until proven guilty. We need to bring the guilty to justice because we do not know. There are books written on the subject because there are so many questions and people do not know. That is one of the reasons we need a royal commission.

After reading the Security Intelligence Review Committee's report I have many concerns about the existing investigation into the Air–India disaster. CSIS has admitted that prior to the bombing of Air–India it did not regard the threat of violence stemming from extremist groups to be very serious. Few resources were allotted to the investigation.

Translators were not found. There is lots of evidence that CSIS simply bungled up and we need to know why. We need to know what the reasons were. At the time of the bombing CSIS was in its infancy. Its role and areas of jurisdiction were still being defined.

While there was a healthy spirit of co–operation between the two investigating parties differences emerged between the RCMP and CSIS after the bombing of flight 182 in terms of their responsibilities, jurisdiction and methods of evidence collection and retention.

I quote from the SIRC report:

> One former senior officer told us that while the role was well understood by senior personnel, he was concerned that some CSIS investigators would conduct their inquiries as though they were criminal investigators and would compete with the RCMP to solve this case—

Once again I quote from the report:

> We saw no early instructions from CSIS headquarters that attempted to clarify the CSIS mandate vis–à–vis the RCMP criminal investigation or which set out CSIS policy regarding the sharing of information and intelligence with the RCMP. We consider this to be an unfortunate oversight on the part of senior management.

We need to know what took place between CSIS and the RCMP. We need to have better information, and the royal inquiry will give us that information. We need to know why 159 of the 210 audio tapes with recordings of wiretapped conversations were erased. Many of these tapes were never heard. Translations were delayed or were not completed and significant backlogs of unprocessed tapes were commonplace. These issues were raised by SIRC in its report.

In accordance with established policies CSIS had already erased three–quarters of the 200 or so audio tapes of the principal targets, conversations before the disaster, so these were not available to the RCMP for its requested examination.

Given the number of inaccuracies, errors and oversights, given the absence of clear direction and a clear delineation of roles and the chain of command, it is difficult to see how CSIS could have done justice to the investigation.

The government has stated that the results of the investigation into the bombing of flight 182 are inconclusive. If they are inconclusive we need to know why. This is a Canadian tragedy. I do not think in any other situation government would not react. Any other government would have reacted. We have seen that in other governments. Why have we not reacted? We need to respond and have a royal commission to look into the matter.

Given this conclusion I believe it is in the best interest of justice to launch a royal commission of inquiry. There is precedence for such an inquiry. I refer my colleagues to past catastrophes, namely the Ocean Ranger tragedy and the Hinton rail disaster.

The issue is justice, justice for the 329 innocent victims of this aviation disaster, justice that has not yet been served. On April 13, 1994 former RCMP Commissioner Norm Inkster stated to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs: "It was my hope that before I retired from the RCMP I could appear before this committee and say the Air–India case was solved. Tragically, this is not yet the case".

We cannot bring back the innocent Canadians who lost their lives. We cannot make their families whole again. We cannot bring back their smiles or laughter but we can bring those left behind some peace of mind. We can bring the criminals who have inflicted this ceaseless pain to justice.

I believe we are on the right track. It is clear from the level of active co–operation between the RCMP and CSIS that a real desire to solve this crime does exist. It is also evident from the continuing investigation that this tragedy has not been forgotten and that the Liberal government intends to keep its word. Our new solicitor general has stated the appointment of a royal commission is under active consideration.

In light of the SIRC report, the continued anguish of the victims' families and the ever growing price tag on this inconclusive investigation, I strongly recommend we launch a royal commission of inquiry.

Once again, given the importance of this issue for all Canadians, I move the motion be declared votable.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary would be aware that he needs unanimous consent to make the matter votable.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, it was the parliamentary secretary to the solicitor general who denied that the matter be allowed to proceed. I wish he would have the courage to stand up and defend his position.

Notwithstanding, I ask the Chair to seek unanimous consent that the subject matter of this motion be referred to a parliamentary committee. I ask the parliamentary secretary to consider that.

The Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the mover of the motion. Is there unanimous consent that the subject matter of the motion be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs?

An hon. member: No.

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion before the House presented by my hon. colleague. It is on behalf of the 329 people who were killed, on behalf of the 280 Canadians, and on behalf of their families tragically and instantaneously hit that I would like to see justice done.

We need a royal commission because if a train full of Canadians on Canadian territory were blown up we would find immediate justice. These Canadians cannot be brought back. We must find justice for them because they are silent.

The Liberal Party is known for being a compassionate party. Its members believe in justice and feel they have to ask for justice on behalf of the many communities of Canada, especially for the Sikh communities.

Vancouver East has a lot of immigrants; 45 per cent is made up of new immigrants. Some belong to the Sikh community. When I was elected I made a promise to fight on their behalf. Some of these communities do not have much of a voice and it is entirely up to us, to the government, to the members of the House to speak on their behalf. We were put here to do that.

In this tragic instance when no justice seems to have been served, when we value ourselves as those who speak about justice and human rights, we have to intercede on behalf of those who cannot speak.

• (1900)

I would like to see a royal commission struck to look into this accident. It took too long. We cannot let this go again. I would also like to move that this motion be votable.

The Deputy Speaker: Once again a motion has been made that the matter be a votable one. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Deputy Speaker: I will give the hon. member for York South—Weston one minute if he wants to close the debate.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, in the closing of the debate, I want to remind the House that several members have stood up, all of them Liberal members of Parliament, asking that this motion be votable.

I would like you, Mr. Speaker, to consider a point of privilege. This is private members' business. On several occasions there was one member, the parliamentary secretary to the solicitor general, who withheld his consent to having this matter voted upon. He has not spoken today and I do not know why he has not. Perhaps he does not have any worthwhile submissions to make today.

However, I would suggest that as the parliamentary secretary to the solicitor general, he does not have the right to interfere in private members' business. If his withholding of unanimous consent is as an individual member, then that is one thing, but if he is interfering on the part of the Government of Canada, I would submit that is improper. The Prime Minister and the government has committed itself to the integrity of the private members' business. If private members' business is in fact to remain private, allowing free votes on behalf of private members, then the parliamentary secretary to the solicitor general should keep his nose out of private members' business.

The Deputy Speaker: The time has expired. Is there unanimous consent to let the parliamentary secretary reply as a point of order?

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: It was a point of privilege.

The Deputy Speaker: It does not matter whether it is privilege or a point of order, the time has expired and there is not unanimous consent to go over the time. Therefore, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant Standing Order 96, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Adjournment Debate

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to pursue a question I asked the Minister of Transport in this House last week about the port of Belledune in New Brunswick.

I asked the minister to explain to this House how he justified giving a $5.8 million grant to the port of Belledune after saying that he was "not prepared to put a cent into Belledune as far as a grant or anything like that is concerned, any more than I would put into the port of Saint John or anywhere else".

The minister gave an answer but it was not to my question. I was pleased to hear him say that he would consider forgiving the loan to the port of Saint John, but not surprisingly he flip–flopped on that promise once the cameras were off.

It is not just troubling that the minister continually goes back on his word but that he gave the port of Belledune almost $6 million when we have yet to see a plan on how the port intends to pay back its $20 million loan it has received.

Furthermore, the minister has failed to explain why the government is spending over $25 million on new berthage and cargo sheds in a town bordering the minister's home riding when there is excess capacity at the port of Saint John and the port of Dalhousie which is only 32 kilometres away. As the minister has stated, once the port of Belledune and the expansion takes place, the port of Dalhousie is out of business.

The House will understand my questioning the minister's motivations for this grant to Belledune in light of some of the decisions made by this government.

Just recently there have been hearings on the privatization of the pilotage authority of our harbour pilots. I ask again, is this because the port of Belledune does not need the harbour pilots and the port of Saint John does?

For example, in February we learned of a decision by public works to borrow $12 million to build a new office complex in the riding of the Indian affairs minister, even though the office building vacancy rate is 18.2 per cent in Sault Ste. Marie and despite the fact that a less expensive option of buying and retrofitting existing office space could save $5 to $6.5 million for the taxpayers of Canada.

Now the minister of public works and the Nova Scotia transportation minister have inexplicably diverted $26 million of the federal strategic highway improvement program, known as SHIP, funds designated for Nova Scotia highway 104, death valley, toward the fleur–de–lis tourist trail in their ridings.

The SHIP agreement states that projects undertaken are to be part of the national highway system. The fleur–de–lis does not meet this criterion and everyone knows it. Death valley is an example, just as Belledune is an example, of blatant, unapologetic, pork barrelling with no thought to fiscal responsibility.

The Saint John Port Corporation told the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transport on March 16, 1995 that "there is an overcapacity in Canadian ports with too much underutilization of infrastructure and the federal government as the shareholder of the port is competing against itself".

Once again I ask the Minister of Transport to explain why he is pouring millions of dollars into expanding the port of Belledune when existing ports in New Brunswick are underutilized.

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate but as usual this member has it all wrong and misrepresents the facts.

The proposed marine terminal at Belledune represents an unprecedented partnership between federal, provincial and various municipal governments. All three levels of government working in concert will be putting funds into this project.

If the member were concerned about the future of marine transportation in Atlantic Canada, she would be supporting this unique collaboration. It is interesting to note the following comments from Paul Doiron, general manager of Logistec Stevedoring that operates the Rodney terminal. He said he did not expect that development of the terminal of Belledune on the north shore would offer threatening competition to Logistec.

He then said that Forterm operates the largest forest products terminal on the eastern seaboard and is in the top eight or nine forest products terminals in the world. That will not change. "We will be able to compete just as we have for over 16 years," he said.

It is sad to note that the member wants to deny the people in this region the right to seek a loan from the federal government when she had no trouble supporting a request that the federal government write off a loan for the port of Saint John.

I would be interested to discover whether the hon. member opposite during her reign as mayor ever gave the port of Saint John money toward its operations. Perhaps if she had, the port would not be in this fix today.

It seems that I have to remind the former mayor that members should be reminded that Belledune and Saint John are in the same province and that the entire province will benefit from the increased economic activity.

The mayors and people of the municipalities surrounding Belledune are putting their money up front to support their region and the entire marine industry. They should be applauded, not hindered, and this member should be supporting New Brunswick, not voting against it.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege today because I feel my privileges as a member of Parliament were severely breached during committee proceedings last night.

As the House knows, the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons was considering, clause by clause, Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity. During debate on clause by clause my first amendment was ruled inadmissible by the chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, on the grounds that it was only available in English.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the rules of Parliament state that a member may move an amendment in the language of his or her choice. This happens all the time. No notice is required and the onus is on the chairman and the clerk of the committee to provide the translation to members of the committee if needed.

The chairman's ruling was immediately challenged by members of my party but overruled by the rest of the committee. In supporting a ruling on a matter over which the committee had no authority in the first place, the committee breached my right as a member of Parliament to move amendments to a very significant piece of legislation.

I approached the chairman and the clerk to try to obtain an explanation of this obvious breach of my privilege. In a questionable justification of his ruling, the chairman explained his actions in an inconsistent manner, ruling my amendments out of order because I was "not a member in good standing of the committee", which the clerk immediately refuted. I was a member in good standing.

The chairman's subsequent behaviour was reprehensible. Legitimate motions were tabled and immediately ruled out of order. Debate was cut off. The questioning of witnesses was curbed. The list goes on and on. On more than one occasion we were put in a position to challenge the ruling of the chairman. I believe the record, upon review, will speak for itself.

As an example, the committee had agreed to adjourn at midnight. I brought to the attention of the chair that midnight had come and gone and he continued with the next motion. At the end of that motion, which was voted and carried by the government side, I again brought it up that it was past midnight, according to our previous agreement, and they passed a motion without a vote.

I recognize that committees are masters of their own destiny, but democracy must prevail. I will quote from Speaker Fraser in his ruling of 1987, which states:

> It is essential to our democratic system that controversial issues should be debated at reasonable length so that every reasonable opportunity shall be available to hear the arguments pro and con and that reasonable delaying tactics should be permissible to enable opponents of a measure to enlist public support for their point of view.

Despite this, the members of the committee then proceeded to move time allocation, restricting the debate to five minutes per clause, and this after two hours of committee proceedings. Five total minutes was given for all parties on this clause by clause.

This is totally unacceptable. There were clauses last night on which not only was I not allowed to move an amendment, I was not allowed to utter one word of debate. I cannot do my job as a member of Parliament if I am not allowed to move amendments and debate amendments. It is just absolutely unacceptable. I do not know what I can do. I am a bit beside myself.

In his conduct last night, the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, overstepped his authority.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that you rule on this very important matter and you suspend clause by clause consideration until such time as you do rule, because the committee sits as we speak. I am at your mercy. I know not what to do. I cannot speak and I cannot move amendments. I give up.

An hon. member: No, don't give up.

Mr. Strahl: No, I do not give up.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know at least one other member wants to address this representation, there is a point of privilege.

The first thing I want to submit to the House is that the committee has not yet reported. As per the conventions of this House, if a committee has not yet reported the House is in no position to rule as to whether or not there has been a prima facie case of privilege.

Notwithstanding that, even if the committee had reported to the House, the committee itself would be the master of its own business pursuant to the rules this House has established for the committee.

Mr. Strahl: Do you call that democracy?

Mr. Boudria: Standing Order 108 and other standing orders of this House are clear in that regard. Therefore, it is my submission that the chair should not be ruling on this at this time. However, in the unlikely event that the chair does decide to rule on this issue at this time, I want to make representation to the Speaker in regard to the substance of the alleged point of privilege.

First, there has been an allegation made today that there was some sort of an attempt to prevent the member from speaking on and studying this bill thoroughly. This bill has been the subject of study for five months. Yesterday alone, the committee sat for over six hours and adjourned at 12.05 this morning. This hardly sounds like an attempt by anyone to stifle debate.

The next thing that is important to add at this point is that yes, it is true that an hon. member of the committee did propose to limit the time of debate per motion. That was not a government attempt. It was a member of the opposition. Therefore an accusation that the government is trying to stifle the opposition would not be totally accurate. In fact, the motion in question, which duly carried, was proposed by an opposition member and carried by the committee as a whole.

On the issue of the motions, it should be noted that there were a number of amendments proposed yesterday. As a matter of fact, I am told that some 40 amendments had been proposed prior to the committee sitting yesterday. And yesterday amendments in a stack several times thicker than the original bill were proposed by one member.

At the first occasion on which the amendments were proposed, the member in question was not a duly signed member of the committee. Therefore all the amendments he proposed were out of order because the member had no standing before the committee. Later on the member was afforded an opportunity to become a duly signed member of the committee as per our rules. In other words, his whip signed him in. I understand at that point he was able to move the amendments.

If I can speak to the issue of the amendments and the language for a moment, it is true of course that the House and its committees have permitted and will permit an amendment to be produced in only one of the two official languages. We have done that before. But it is equally true that a substantial document of the House must be, not only because of the Standing Orders but because of elementary courtesy, produced in both official languages, because our rules make it such and simply because of the volume, in order to enable all members to participate.

May I suggest that when someone moves a stack of amendments several times thicker than the bill itself, that rule then must apply as well. In other words, several hundreds or dozens of amendments should be translated, again in order to accommodate all members of the House to participate. It is not a matter of one or two amendments where one member can listen to the interpretation system and hear the three or four words proposed to be amended. We are talking here of hundreds and perhaps thousands of words being amended in a particular bill. That courtesy was judged by the chair of the committee to be essential to the good functioning of the committee and ultimately of the House.

I am told the chair did rule as well that some, if not a large number, of the amendments were not substantive but were dilatory in nature and nothing else. I am told, as an example, that someone wanted to exempt people working in restaurants from being obliged to hire people of different ethnicities and so on. Mr. Speaker, you have already recognized that is not even in the area of federal jurisdiction. An amendment such as that and several others, according to the committee, had little or no purpose other than to stall the process of the committee after five months of deliberations and six hours of sitting in one day. The purpose was not at all to amend the bill.

Finally, the committee did adjourn nominally at five minutes past midnight. That was invoked as part of the alleged point of privilege. The House will know that adjourning five minutes later than the usual time when there is general agreement on the committee is not exactly something unprecedented in order to complete the business before the committee.

After three hours of debate on one clause of the bill the committee judged it was for the betterment of the committee that a time limit of five minutes per clause was appropriate. The committee decided that by virtually unanimous consent, with the exception of one or two members. The committee did make that decision with full democratic principles in mind, as it had the wisdom and the right to do.

The committee has not yet reported to this House. When it does report to the House, any member who was not a member of the committee—as is the case of the hon. member who proposed the amendments initially—is perfectly in order to produce amendments again at report stage, if the Speaker and his very able staff determine the amendments are in order.

Therefore, in my view there is no point of privilege. Even if the points raised by the hon. member were valid—and I submit they are not—this would not constitute a point of privilege now but only at a later date.

I believe hon. members worked very hard on that committee. I know the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve and several other members have worked very hard. They stayed up very late last night to continue the work after five months of deliberation.

Perhaps some people are not in agreement with the bill. That will not change by invoking points of privilege in this House, which are not really points of privilege at all, and even if they had been, they were not invoked at the appropriate time. I submit the chair of the committee ruled properly with the able advice of his clerk and staff, and did make the committee function to advance the legislation before the committee, as is the role of the chair. He did nothing different from the usual work of a committee chair. I am sure I speak on behalf of most members of this House when I say he is an outstanding committee chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, may I add two clarifications so that my colleague will not keep the chair in the dark about certain facts. In accordance with common practice, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East was allowed to introduce unilingual amendments during proceedings.

You should know that as soon as we started our proceedings, the committee clerk asked all participants several times to hand over their amendments, so that they could be translated and made available in both languages. What is at issue here is that, at the start of the proceedings, my colleague from Fraser Valley East was tempted to table some 30, if not more, amendments. Given this pile of amendments, we in the official opposition asked that they not be considered, since one basic element of the rules adopted by the Subcommittee on Agenda and Procedure is that all documents and amendments tabled during proceedings must be available in both languages.

I should point out to you that the Reform Party has representation on the Sub–committee on Agenda and Procedure. They supported these rules and I am concerned about the hon. member for Fraser Valley East's lack of courtesy and respect for francophones. I wish to draw your attention to the fact that I mentioned during proceedings that—again, in accordance with common practice—we agreed to let the hon. member for Fraser Valley East introduce handwritten unilingual amendments.

You should know that we have always tried to co–operate and that the hon. member is quite brazen, to say the least, in claiming that his remarks were cut off, as a look at the time allocated shows that the hon. member for Fraser Valley East took up between 80 and 90 per cent of the time available for debate. It is only after a two hour filibuster based not on content but on form that we felt the need for consent, as part of committee proceedings, to suggest to the chairman that we should be able to call for a vote after spending five minutes on each clause under consideration.

In a fit of generosity, the chairman proposed that 15 minutes be allocated, and you may be surprised to hear that my colleague from the Reform Party was opposed.

So I am counting on the Chair to hand down a ruling that will respect the rights of francophones in this country.

[English]

The Speaker: The hon. member for Fraser Valley East on the same point of privilege. I would ask the hon. member please to make his intervention at this point fairly brief.

Mr. Strahl: Mr. Speaker, it is important to clarify several facts, as the Speaker was not able to be at our committee last night.

One thing is that the member who made the intervention from the government side was not there either, but he may have been fed some wrong information.

Originally I sat at the committee table and proposed a motion about calling more witnesses. It had nothing to do with clause by clause. At that time it was pointed out to me that I had not submitted my form to the clerk about being a member of the committee. I immediately gave the sheet to the clerk of the committee and to the chair so that I could take part in the clause by clause voting.

After I had submitted my proper documentation to the clerk, and I am sure the Speaker will check with the clerk on this, then I moved my amendments. They were then ruled out of order and tossed away. I asked for them back and could not get them. I could not even get them. I had a stack of amendments. All of them were taken and they went into a black hole or wherever they go.

We were not restricted to five minutes per motion which would have been bad enough. It was five minutes per clause.

Even the government side had as many as three or four amendments per clause which were read out with an explanation and that was considered the total debate. It was not per motion, per amendment, or per subamendment. It was per clause. We passed entire sections, sometimes running an entire typewritten page in the bill, without a word of debate.

It cannot go on, Mr. Speaker. It is going on right now. Clauses are being passed without debate. You cannot allow that. I do not know what to do. I could go back there and stomp on the table, but they are just passing clause after clause without debate. It cannot continue.

My final point is it is interesting that the member mentioned that the committee did adjourn at 12.05 a.m. which is an admission that it did go past the hour of adjournment, not that it was not pointed out to the chairman. I brought attention to it in two different points of order that we had agreed to stop at midnight. The chair said we must continue with it. Another amendment was passed. I said that it was now really past midnight, it was five minutes after midnight. I said that I could not see that we could proceed. The chair hit the hammer and passed the amendment without even a vote. The amendment was passed without a vote.

How can you pass an amendment without a vote? You cannot do it. To say that this is somehow speeding up the procedure, I guess it is. Speeding up procedure does not involve trampling on the rights of members of Parliament who want to debate the clauses and have the right to bring amendments in both official languages. If members on the government side think they are appealing to some unknown masses out there by running roughshod over the rights of members of Parliament who have the privilege of bringing forward concerns from their constituents, it is hypocrisy, it is dictatorship, it is despotism and it is out of order.

The Speaker: Order. Colleagues, I have listened to this question of privilege. I think I have enough information. I am starting to get the complete drift of what went on.

Hon. members from time to time become frustrated in their work because things are not going one way or another. That is understandable. That is about par for being here in this place. Things do not always go the way we want them to go. I want to point out some of the similarities that hon. members have brought to the attention of the Chair.

• (1035)

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East said in his opening statements that indeed the committee is master of its own destiny. The reason for that is that with all of the standing committees that we have, if we had appeals from the committees to the House then the time of the House would be taken up with these appeals.

Speaker Fraser in an earlier ruling has indeed said that there are exceptions to everything. From what I have heard here today, it would seem to me that the committee which is master of its own destiny by a democratic way of coming about it has decided to proceed in a particular way. If one, two or five members disagree, again the disagreement is noted.

When a member asks the Chair to make a ruling, as an overwhelming rule the Chair has always waited for a report to come from the committee to the House. In this report the grievance that was brought up, if the committee decides to report it, would be brought to the House.

Here, all of us together would have a chance to look at it and make a decision as the House because we, the House, are masters of our destiny. Speakers in the past most of the time have given great latitude to committees because of the far reaching importance of the work they are doing and have waited for them to come to the House.

It is my decision at this point that I do not have a report from the committee in front of me. Therefore, I do not want to make a ruling until the committee as a body brings this report up. It could be that the hon. member will have a question of privilege to bring up at a future time. I do not discount that but it would seem to me that at this time I would rule that there is no question of privilege.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege but in a different vein—

The Speaker: Order. I have ruled on the question of privilege. That question of privilege is now put to one side. If the hon. member has another question of privilege that he wants to bring up I will listen to it, but if it is on the same question of privilege I beg the House to accept the ruling of its Speaker.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I guess I need some clarification from you on one instance.

I want to bring forward another very important issue. First of all my understanding of the standing orders is that a question of privilege must be brought forward at the first opportunity. How can we justify saying we have to wait until a report is given before a member can put forth a question of privilege when he at the same time must put forth a question of privilege at the first opportunity?

My hon. colleague has brought forward what is a very legitimate question of privilege at his very first opportunity. I appeal to you on that basis.

The other thing I would like to bring to your attention is that there are changes in the standing orders. This is the first Parliament in which these changes have been implemented. It may mean that a new precedent is being established and it may be very important for you to play a role in establishing a proper precedent.

When bills are submitted to committee prior to second reading, this House forgoes second reading debate. The House is sacrificing an opportunity to debate in the House so that would happen in committee. There are 180 minutes permitted of debate on a motion to submit the bill to committee prior to second reading. There really is no second reading debate. The vote on second reading is held without debate.

Therefore, it is very important that a precedent be established to allow proper debate at second reading. The spirit of the agreement to change the standing orders was so that amendments could be brought forward at committee and that proper time could be taken to deal with the clause by clause study.

• (1040)

Mr. Speaker, on that basis I ask you to consider very carefully what precedent is being established here, whether or not the rights of members are protected under the standing orders as they now stand in light of this new procedure. I think it is very critical and may be repeated many times in the future in the House and in committee. I just want to make it very clear that we are concerned.

The Speaker: I would accept the intervention as a point of clarification.

Your Speaker is guided at all times by the rules decided upon by this House. If a member has a grievance, the member could appeal to the Speaker for clarification, if you will, but there are other avenues that a member can take for doing the same thing. Perhaps the member would want to bring it forth with the committee on rules and procedures.

However, for your Speaker today, in this particular instance that was brought forward, I have listened to all interventions and in my view there is not a question of privilege. A point of privilege might be brought forward in the committee itself. Who am I to tell members how they should go about their business?

As I am thinking here, I do not know that this was brought forth as a point of privilege in committee. I do not know that. All I know is what the members here have brought in front of me. On the basis of what members have said here today in this House, then I would rule that there is no point of privilege.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. When the Auditor General of Canada tabled his report in February 1994, the issue of pension overpayments, which reached between $120 million and $200 million, in the auditor general's estimation, was raised repeatedly.

For the committee, behind the figures lay a more important issue: the department's ability to efficiently manage pension programs. This prompted the committee to meet twice with senior officials of Human Resources Development Canada and the Office of the Auditor General of Canada.

In this report, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts makes a number of recommendations, which, for the most part, have an implementation deadline. The dissenting opinion of the hon. members of Chicoutimi and Joliette is appended to the report.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests that the government table a comprehensive response to this report.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-328, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to transfer from the Department of National Revenue to the Department of Human Resources Development the responsibility for assessing job insurability under the Unemployment Insurance Program. There are several advantages to doing this. We believe that the larger number of points of service maintained by the Department of Human Resources Development could mean much shorter processing times.

Also, there will be a better understanding of the case at hand, since files will be processed locally by individuals who will then be in a better position to assess particular circumstances. I think this will help develop a fairer rule of construction. That is, at any rate, the spirit in which I table this bill.

PETITIONS

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of the city of Kamloops who point out the social programs of Canada form the very fabric of our country and define us as a civilized and compassionate nation.

The petitioners point out the struggle to build universal health care, old age security and other valued institutions is a proud part of our heritage. Consequently they are petitioning the federal government to maintain and enhance these social programs, the right and heritage of Canadians.

MINING

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a very extensive petition on another matter. The petitioners from Logan Lake, British Columbia, point out all the benefits mining provides to Canada, particularly in our trade balance. Therefore they call on Parliament to take action that will see employment in this sector increase, promote exploration and rebuild Canada's mineral reserves to sustain mining communities and keep mining in Canada.

JUSTICE

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Madam Speaker, I present a petition signed by a number of residents from throughout central British Columbia who point out that Canadians, particularly women and children, are becoming increasingly fearful of walking our streets in our neighbourhoods. They believe many violent offenders and sex offenders are being paroled prematurely or are being released without proper treatment or rehabilitation.

They point out a number of concerns and therefore call on the House of Commons and the Minister of Justice to take whatever steps deemed necessary to amend Canada's Criminal Code and parole system to ensure safety and peace in Canadian neighbourhoods.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I suggest that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—QUEBEC'S FINANCIAL DEMANDS

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ) moved:

That this House deplore the federal government's delay in responding to Quebec's demands with regard ato the education of young Aboriginals in the Quebec North amounting to $199 million, to the compensation of $135 million under the 1991–92 stabilization program and to the $79 million claim for expenses incurred during the events at Oka in the summer of 1990.

He said: Madam Speaker, I thank you for this opportunity to discuss the motion. Before getting into the thick of things, I also want to thank my leader, the Leader of the Opposition, for asking me to table this opposition day motion. It is a sign of trust to have been asked to be the first one to speak on this motion, which gives an eloquent example of the way the federal system works.

In the next 20 minutes or so, I want to explain why the official opposition tabled this motion today, and also what that motion means. Indeed, what are we talking about when we refer to the three issues mentioned in the motion, namely the claim for expenses incurred during the events at Oka, the refund of education costs for young aboriginals, particularly in the Cree territory located in Northern Quebec, as well as the payments under the stabilization program.

I will try to explain not only the costs related to these claims, which are estimated at over $330 million, but also the costs related to this whole operation. This is why I said at the outset that this motion—and this is why we are tabling it today—very clear shows the flaws of the Canadian federal system.

Sovereignists are often criticized on the grounds that they only rise in this House to claim more and more rights for Quebec. Indeed, we often hear the argument, from Liberal as well as Reform members, to the effect that Bloc members are always trying to get more for the Quebec government. The same comment is also made regarding the Parti Quebecois government by our federalist friends.

This motion shows to what extent—I am not sure if I should use the word "normal"—traditional federalism is flawed. I would even go so far as to say that, in this specific case, federalism works against Quebec's interests.

Mr. Milliken: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): If the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands gives me a moment, I will try to convince him, assuming this is possible, of the appropriateness of my comments.

In fact, the $330 million claim of the Quebec government was presented and renewed by Quebec's intergovernmental affairs minister, Louise Beaudoin, this week, here in Ottawa, when she met with her federal counterpart to claim something that, in one particular case, has been owing for more than ten years.

The motion refers to three issues. The first one is the expenses incurred during the events at Oka, in the summer of 1990. Everyone remembers what happened then, particularly these days, when there is a risk that these events could be repeated, because of some aboriginal people in Oka.

We all remember that, in 1990, the Quebec government was faced with enormous costs for public safety, or for law enforcement, as a result of the crisis in Oka and Kanesatake that I mentioned a moment ago. Of course, given that public safety was at stake, and that the crisis related to the native issue, which is under federal jurisdiction, it was totally appropriate for Quebec to ask the Canadian government to pay the additional amounts associated with the need to call in the Quebec provincial police.

A request for payment of $84 million was submitted. An amount of $5.3 million has already been reimbursed by the federal government, which leaves approximately $79 million still to be paid. The crisis goes back to 1990, but the bill remains unsettled. How did our politicians react to the request for payment, when a federalist government was in power in Quebec, during Mr. Bourrassa's, and then Mr. Johnson's Liberal governments? What was the federal politicians' answer to the Quebec government? In September 1993, the Minister of National Defence in the former government refused to reimburse the total amount requested, following the Oka crisis, because these events, he claimed, resulted from a situation related to public order, not public good.

Such a position is totally ridiculous, and I submit that the present government, through its critics, is still making that claim. This is utterly ridiculous. I ask the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Justice and the whole government to talk to the people of Kanesatake and Oka, to check if their well–being was not affected during those events. The government should be ashamed of using such a ridiculous argument, and realize that this issue must be settled right away.

A second issue deals with the education of young aboriginals in northern Quebec. This is a claim made under a federal–provincial agreement signed under the James Bay Agreement, which provided that the Quebec government and the federal government would pay the costs relating to the education of young natives, especially the young Crees of northern Quebec.

There is an outstanding account in the order of $119 million, the payment of which has been demanded for nearly 10 years now by successive Quebec governments and, I repeat, governments of federalist allegiance.

• (1100)

I do not think any member opposite can deny that the Bourassa government wanted to get an agreement with the federal government at any cost.

If the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs has any doubt about that, he should confer with his colleague from Outremont, who was a member of the Bourassa government and made the same demands when she was the Minister of Education.

I repeat that, under a federal–provincial agreement, both levels of government share the costs of education of young Crees. But the population has increased, more young Crees have registered for several courses or have decided to take more training, so that costs have been higher than forecasted. The federal government's position is that those claims are not justified, and that it has not been consulted. Therefore, it refuses to pay the claim for $119 million submitted by the Quebec government.

At a time when the federal government's intention to set national standards concerning shared costs program such as post–secondary education and health is being discussed in this House, we should take a hard look at these issues. When we realize that agreements signed by both levels of government are not being complied with in day to day operations, are we to understand that the federal government will set its so–called national standards each and every time the Quebec government asks the federal government to assume its financial responsibilities? Will Quebec get the same kind of response: that the federal government was not consulted on each and every one of those expenses, that all the invoices have not been provided, and that a thorough examination is in order before any amount is reimbursed to the Quebec government?

Let me remind the House that the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs' answer was that he will ask his officials to meet with those of the Quebec government in order to study the whole issue more thoroughly. The issue has been dragging on for ten years already. They are saying, in fact, that they will take the time they need, that they are in no hurry. As the minister said again this week: "I do not want to raise the hopes of Quebec politicians by implying that this issue can be easily settled". No, no and no, these things must take time. We have to ask our officials to meet, to discuss, to chat, in order to try to come to an understanding over an agreement signed—this bears repeating—more than 15 years ago.

The last demand involves compensation of $137 million demanded not only by Quebec's current government but also by its previous governments. I repeat, these are not new demands brought forward by the current government of Quebec, Mr. Parizeau's government. These demands were first made 10, 5 and 3 years ago by the previous federalist Liberal government.

Stabilization payments are made under a very complex program that I will not even try to explain to you because I cannot make head or tail of it myself, but the program is designed to restore some kind of fairness in terms of the expenses the provinces must incur to fulfil their own responsibilities. The federal government has committed itself to review each province's tax revenues and to compensate provinces whose tax revenues are lower than expected for various economic reasons or because of the economic situation. The government seeks to stabilize provincial revenues through this program, which it set up on its own initiative.

Twice, the Quebec government asked for compensation and twice its demands were turned down by the federal government. The last time that demand was made by the current Minister of Finance in Quebec, the federal Minister of Finance replied: "If you want to get compensation to the tune of $137 million under the stabilization program, your only option is to take us to court".

After hearing all about progressive federalism, or progressive status quo as our colleagues opposite like to call it, now we have courtroom federalism. In other words, when we want the federal government to respect programs it has introduced, we have to go to court to obtain justice. It is the new way of doing things of the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and the Minister of Finance, who say: "Let us go to court".

With all due respect, this reminds me of what a Quebec humorist, père Gédéon, not to mention any names, used to say: "We will go to court even if we lose, and we will go all the way to the Supreme Court". The Liberal government's attitude is somewhat similar. It admits that it owes money to the Quebec government, but to drag things out, to make sure the matter takes years to settle, it says to the Government of Quebec: "Go to court".

In conclusion, I mentioned at the beginning of my speech that this was a good example of the way federalism operates. I also said that I wished to underline the costs that this entails. We are speaking, of course, about a justified and recognized claim. The government's officials acknowledged that the amounts mentioned are correct.

Can anyone imagine the human and financial costs generated by all these discussions on these three simple claims?

Mr. Cauchon: It is fear mongering.

Mr. Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Do we know how many civil servants, and the member for Outremont could perhaps look into this, at the federal as well as the provincial level, met, talked on the phone, exchanged letters and piles of documents? All these costs for the taxpayer must be added to the claim of $333 million.

If we had this money, if Quebecers could realize the enormous costs of federalism, I am convinced that they would at once choose to become sovereign. They would do it because the day we are able to assume our own responsibilities, the day we are able to make our own decisions concerning our collective future, we will not have to listen to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs say to us: "Go to court; let us ask our civil servants to get together". We will be able to make our decisions, and this is what the motion tabled by the official opposition is all about.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the last speaker. Unfortunately, I did not sense in his speech the real human dimension of the problem faced by natives in Quebec and, let us be frank, in all areas of Canada.

The debate revolves around a ten–year old dispute between Quebec and the federal government. And I would point out that the federal government has already paid out a considerable amount of money.

However, I will leave it to my colleagues on this side to make speeches that will undoubtedly be brilliant and informative for the opposition.

• (1110)

What I find unfortunate in the statements of the opposition is the fact that they did not speak about the social, human and economic situation in which Quebec's natives live. I think that it would have been more humble, more humane for the opposition to focus more on the means of helping these people to improve their lot. This has been a point of contention for several years now.

I remember that in 1981, under the PQ government, 1,000 police officers invaded—that is the word, invaded—the Restigouche reserve. That was unfortunate and I think that that is when the relations between natives and Quebecers began to deteriorate. I believe that we do not do enough for natives. I think that we should encourage dialogue instead of resorting to fear mongering, threats and statements like: "If it had been up to Quebec, we would have solved the problem long ago".

I ask the official opposition to make a proper evaluation of the situation and not to confuse the issue with sovereignty and with the upcoming referendum debate. I think that the first step should be to consider the economic and social situation of Quebec's natives as well as their problems. I think that that should be the real subject of the debate. It is not a money issue, but a human issue that we should address in a co–operative fashion.

Mr. Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his remarks, but I feel compelled to remind him of certain facts. I do not want to give him a history lesson, but I think that there is no relationship whatsoever between the events in Restigouche and the matter we are discussing today. I am sure that, if my colleague takes the time to consult his history book, he will recognize that these two matters are not related.

However, I agree with him when he talks about the need to deal with the real problems facing native populations. I wish the member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine would convince his colleagues to adopt a similar position because, in recent years, it is exactly what every Quebec government, whether federalist or sovereignist, has done in relation to the James Bay agreement, especially in relation to the matter we are debating, that is the $119 million claim for the education of young natives in northern Quebec.

The government of Quebec has striven to offer quality services to native people and to meet their needs, which means that when there is an increase in the clientele, there must be an increase in spending on health care or education, as is the case here. That is what the government of Quebec has done over the past ten years, and it is the federal government which has been tight fisted with its money. If the government of Quebec had waited for the federal government to honour its commitments, natives in the north would never have had the level of services they are getting today, thanks to the Quebec government.

So the point raised by my colleague for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine is most interesting. I ask him to convince the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and the Minister of Finance to contact the Quebec Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs immediately to settle the issue. We agree on this. Quality services have been delivered and now the time has come to pay the bill. Unfortunately, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs will do the same thing he did in the case of the Charlottetown referendum in 1992: he will first lose face, then he will change his mind and agree that he must reimburse the government of Quebec.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Madam Speaker, if we are going to talk about amounts, it should not be forgotten that the federal government paid out close to $450 million for Northern Quebec natives.

However, I would have another question. The point has been raised of Quebec's historic dispute with the federal government over the last ten years. We were not in power during this period, but I know that a certain Leader of the Opposition, here today, was a member of that government.

Yesterday, in fact, we learned, because we asked the question, that he was never aware, at the time, of the claims that were made by the province of Quebec. It is regrettable that the least fortunate members of society are being used to generate propaganda, to engage in grandstanding, as well as to promote sovereignty and independence at whatever cost.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Opposition where he has been for the last ten years and why he did not, when he was a member of the government in power, do something about the Quebec government's claim?

Mr. Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Madam Speaker, I hope that we are not going to spend the entire day listening to this sort of nonsense. It just shows how few arguments the government can find to reject the legitimate demands of the government of Quebec. Responding with references to the former government, and specifically to the Leader of the Official Opposition, who was a member of that government over six years ago—having left it before the Oka crisis—shows, in my opinion, just how few arguments they can muster.

I hope that the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs will come up with something more serious. As someone familiar with the workings of federalism, surely he will be able to convince us, with copious arguments, that he is right, without spouting the sort of nonsense we have just heard.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I will vote against the motion presented by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, for a very simple reason.

The federal government is not late in making the payments referred to by the hon. member, and this includes Quebec's demands with regard to the education of young Aboriginals in the Quebec North, compensation under the 1991–92 Stabilization Program and the claim for expenses incurred during the events at Oka.

Perhaps the hon. member will withdraw his motion after hearing the government's point of view. In fact, if Quebec's demands were so legitimate, I think, with all due respect for the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, that his leader, the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean, would have presented the motion himself.

Monday I had a chance to discuss the matter with Mrs. Louise Beaudoin. It was a cordial meeting during which we reviewed the cases mentioned in the opposition motion and discussed the mechanisms available to us to deal with these matters.

[English]

Madam Speaker, Mrs. Beaudoin and I met earlier this week to discuss these matters. Our meeting was productive and focused on the substance of the issues and on finding ways to solve these issues in the best interest of Canadian taxpayers.

[Translation]

We both agreed to continue discussions on these matters through existing mechanisms. We both agreed to make every effort to find the right solutions without wasting any time.

• (1120)

In the process, I want to ensure that the outcome is fair to both parties, including Canadian taxpayers.

I will be brief, but I will take the time to explain the government's position on each of the demands mentioned in the motion. First, the claim for expenses incurred during the events at Oka. Quebec submitted a bill for $130 million under the disaster financial assistance agreements and estimated the federal government's contribution at $84 million.

The federal government found that only $5.3 million seemed to meet the criteria for this program. The rest of Quebec's claim was not, in our view, covered by the program. We were not convinced it was up to the federal government to pay the cost of overtime—this is an understatement—accommodation and transportation for officers of the Quebec Police Force, for which the Quebec government was claiming $58 million.

I may recall that at the time the federal government had, at the specific request of the Quebec government, provided the services of the Canadian Armed Forces. In fact, federal expenses incurred by the use of the Canadian Forces at Oka totalled $122 million.

Expenses covered under another program are not eligible, which explains why the Auditor General has been asked to take a very close look at Quebec's expenses. In other words, there are regulations that determine which expenses are eligible and which are not. In this case, considering additional claims made by the Province of Quebec which, we feel, are unjustified, we asked the Auditor General, a third party who enjoys credibility among all Canadians, including Quebecers, to check Quebec's additional claims.

We are hesitant to pay the bills submitted by the Government of Quebec, not out of meanness, but because our goal is to be rigorous and fair in administering the public purse. Mrs. Beaudoin mentioned that the funds claimed are for Quebecers; however, our responsibility is to manage funds for all of Canada's taxpayers, including Quebecers, and that entails ensuring that the bills submitted to us are justified.

That is why we called on the auditor general, from whom we hope to obtain an impartial opinion. He has indicated that the results of his audit will most likely not be available until June or July 1995. In the meanwhile, he asked the federal government and the Government of Quebec to send him a detailed breakdown of all of the costs incurred and the related receipts, normal requirements for any in–depth audit. For our part, we have provided all of the information he requested.

The federal government, therefore, is waiting to see the conclusions of his audit. That is what I said to my counterpart in Quebec, Mrs. Beaudoin, and this is clearly the fairest process to use, and we must let it run its course. All taxpayers expect their governments to rigorously manage public funds, and that is what we are doing.

Now, what about the $135 million claimed under the fiscal stabilization program? Once again, the federal government's position is very clear. We will apply the program rules to all claims, be they from Quebec or from any other province. Nothing more, nothing less.

Regarding the case at hand, the fiscal stabilization program was implemented to assist provinces whose revenues drop radically because of an economic downturn.

• (1125)

The claim of $135 million for 1991–92 is not valid in our opinion, because the Government of Quebec's loss of revenue that year was not related to the economic situation. The Minister of Finance has therefore determined that the stabilization program does not apply.

However, the federal government has already paid an instalment of $125 million, that is, more than half the amount Quebec has claimed for 1992–93, because, in this case, we felt the legislation criteria were met.

As I indicated to Mrs. Beaudoin last week, the legislation does not provide for arbitration. The only alternative for the Government of Quebec, if it does not share our viewpoint on the application of the legislation, is, clearly, to appeal our decision under the procedure provided in section 19 of the Federal Court Act to resolve disputes between governments. Differences in interpretation of legislation are matters to be decided by courts of law rather than by politicians. I have even said that, if necessary, our government would be prepared to help Quebec out in such an appeal by providing all the necessary information.

Before going on to the third claim, I would like to draw the attention of the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead to the fiscal stabilization program I have just been talking about.

I am a Liberal, and Liberal is spelled with a capital "L", which means I believe in the principle of solidarity and in sharing the wealth. I believe as well that government has a role to play in this. A program like the fiscal stabilization program enables us to express Canada's social solidarity in concrete terms.

The public understands that these programs have criteria, naturally, in order to prevent abuse and to ensure that public funds are managed wisely and in their interest. And the criterion of loss of revenue due to economic slowdown seems to me a very valid one.

Now we come to the last matter, the claim for the education of young aboriginals in northern Quebec. This week, I told the Quebec minister that the federal government, far from dragging things out, was anxious to see this issue quickly settled. I say it again today and I would like to explain why it took so long to deal with this issue.

Both governments have agreed, in the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement, to share the education costs of young Crees of the Cree School Board on a 75–25 basis, that is 75 per cent for Ottawa and 25 per cent for Quebec. One of the reasons for that is that the Cree School Board serves a student population which varies from year to year and which includes a number of non–aboriginal students whose education costs are met by the province of Quebec.

The agreement states that budgets must be approved by both parties since amounts to be compensated depend on the education budgets, including capital budgets, teacher salaries and the proportion of aboriginal students and non–aboriginal students in the student population.

The Quebec government has always been reluctant to let the federal government play a role in budget approval, despite our repeated demands. Even though it never approved those budgets, the federal government already paid $464 million to Quebec. Therefore, we cannot be accused of being deadbeats. All they can say is that, since Quebec did not provide us with the information necessary to determine which amounts should ultimately be paid, we are protecting Canadians interests by not giving it a blank check.

Since the federal government did not take part in the decisions regarding the education budget, it is important that we understand the basis on which those decisions have been made before we decide whether a supplementary payment is appropriate or not. We refuse to sign a blank check for amounts which may not be owed.

This being said, and I conclude on that, the federal government always assumed its responsibilities towards natives and fulfilled its obligations under the James Bay Agreement.

To conclude, the federal government is a reliable partner seeking co–operation, but managing carefully taxpayers' money. I am calling upon the sense of responsibility of the hon. member for Megantic—Compton—Stantstead and his colleagues from the official opposition, and ask them to understand that fact. I am convinced that it is what Canadians, including Quebecers, expect from us.

We will continue to deal with real problems, the problems for which we were elected by the people of Canada, the problems to which we were asked to find solutions. The Government of Canada, our government, is an honest, open and reliable government. A government which deals with provincial governments in an equitable manner and looks at issues in good faith.

We are always willing to work with provincial and territorial governments in the interests of Canadians. This is why I will vote against this motion and I urge fair–minded opposition members to do the same, in the interests of Quebecers.

This is what we are doing and this is what will be done in the future.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to get back to some of the points raised by the minister who, a few months ago, was a keen advocate and defender of flexible federalism. Could it be that he is abandoning his lofty notions of flexible federalism to champion the cause of courtroom federalism? This is the conclusion one is inclined to draw from his speech.

The minister says that it has not been proven, beyond any doubt, or close to that, that the sums being claimed were indeed spent on young aboriginals according to the James Bay Convention. And yet, his government did not show the same scruples last year when the press reported that every year native people in Canada receive $1.2 billion without a census to establish their exact number.

And yet his government—I understand, I lay no blame—paid the money anyway although it meant that later on, it might have to make up the shortfall or withhold certain sums; it still took action. In the present case, I believe the minister is dead set against Quebec. He will not budge, no matter how legitimate the claims Quebec has against the federal government.

I just came back from a committee meeting. We learned that in Canada there are 298 public sea ports, and the present federal government is unable to say whether they are indeed public or private. For years now, it has been guesstimating. Sometimes, it assumes they are public and sometimes not.

Does the member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine know that, in his riding, there is a port in Chandler which is still being funded even though it is not known whether it is private or public? Ottawa keeps on acting as if it were public and belonged to the federal government. Funnily enough, scruples only happen when Mrs. Beaudoin makes claims on behalf of Quebec. I find this intolerable on the part of a man who prides himself on being responsible.

The minister, if he was that honourable, could have agreed with Mrs. Beaudoin on a certain amount to pay. Even if we cannot come to terms on the final numbers, we know that not everything is free, including in James Bay. He could have acted in good faith and paid out an approximate amount, which he most likely owes, even though it would have meant he might have to make up the difference or withhold part of the money to be paid some time in the future under the same convention or program.

• (1135)

In conclusion, I am not surprised that the minister intends to vote against our proposal, but I will ask him to refrain from saying that he is doing it in all good faith.

Mr. Massé: Madam Speaker, I am happy to see that the main objective of the opposition member is for the federal government to manage taxpayers' money with justice and honesty. I agree with him entirely. That is why, in the case of the Oka claim, even though we had already paid $122 million to Quebec under the Disaster Financial Assistance Arrangements, when we decided that we did not have to pay anything else, instead of just saying: "No more, we owe you nothing more", we went to the extreme courtesy of naming a third party to audit the books once again in order to give the province of Quebec another chance.

It is also the reason why we asked the auditor general, who is certainly the most credible reference in the matter of fairness and good management of public funds, to go once again over all the invoices, to try to determine if we still owed something to Quebec. If the report says we still owe certain amounts to Quebec, if we owe money, we will pay up.

As far as fiscal stabilization is concerned, I mentioned earlier that we have reviewed all the payment criteria and have come to the conclusion that no amounts were owing. Quebec is not the only province in this case. The situation is the same for Saskatchewan. This province also presented claims which, in our judgment, were not in accordance with the established payment criteria, so the amounts requested were not paid to Saskatchewan either.

In the present case, the opposition will, once again, have to congratulate us because we chose not to pay amounts that were not owed. But, to be perfectly fair, we came to the conclusion that we had to allow Quebec, as well as all the other provinces, to appeal our decision and our interpretation of the criteria. Clearly, the provincial government should not appeal to us, since we concluded that there was no money owed as far as stabilization was concerned, but to a court of law since it is the interpretation of the law which is being challenged.

In the third case, our friend from the opposition suggests that we at least give an amount corresponding to expenditures as a whole and hammer out the adjustments later on. But what have we done so far? In fact, in all these years, we have given $464 million to the province of Quebec for the education of aboriginal people. However, as the province of Quebec did not fulfill its responsibilities according to the James Bay agreement, we were not able to verify if there were other amounts that could be owed. Once again, to be as fair as we could, we proposed that a group of civil servants study the amounts given, the school board budgets, their capital budgets, the make–up of the student population, to see if other amounts were owed.

I say again, if we come to the conclusion that we owe some money, we will pay up. I conclude by saying that not only did we pay our fair share, but also we went the extra mile to give the province of Quebec every recourse possible and to ensure its claims are reviewed.

In this case, if opposition members are fair–minded about this, if they try to see just how well the federal government has managed the taxpayers' money and to understand the fairness principles involved, I am pretty sure that they will vote against their own motion.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Madam Speaker, first of all, I want to tell the minister that I find his comments rather insulting, especially when he said that, in his view, I was not important enough to move such a motion in this House. The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs suggested that the Leader of the Official Opposition is the one who should have done so. I do not know if he thinks the same about members speaking for the Liberal government, because that would mean that only the Prime Minister has the right to speak in this House.

As regards the very substance of the motion, I would like to say to the minister, who prides himself on being a Liberal with a capital L, that although the stabilization program precisely aims at helping the neediest provinces, these last few years, a province such as Alberta received $174 million in 1982–83, and Ontario, a rich province, according to government spokesmen, received $227 million in 1990–91 and $284 million in 1991–92 while the Government of Quebec was denied the same conditions.

Mr. Massé: Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member of the opposition is confusing the equalization program with the stabilization program.

The object of equalization payments is to give the have–not provinces the possibility of providing public services of a quality similar to those offered elsewhere. That is why equalization payments are not made available to the wealthiest provinces, but only to those less well–off. That is not the object of stabilization payments.

The object of stabilization payments is to stabilize provincial revenues. If your revenues, according to the criteria, are lower than before, the federal government offers a compensation. If they are not lower or if they are but because of something that the provincial government itself has done, then there is no compensation. That is what happened.

[English]

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, Reform members will be splitting their time.

I appreciate the opportunity to participate in debate on the Bloc opposition motion before the House concerning additions to the long list of Quebec demands again laid before the House and ultimately the Canadian taxpayer. I have a hard time denouncing the federal government's tardiness in the face of these spurious and ongoing demands. It is heartening to see the government and particularly the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs exercising some prudence and caution in doling out resources the government does not have.

I suspect the Quebec intergovernmental affairs minister, flushed with success from her 1994 coup in Ottawa when she pried $37 million out of the federal coffers for the referendum on Charlottetown, felt this trek to the capital would immediately result in the payout of $333 million.

Today we have the Bloc shilling for Quebec's intergovernmental affairs minister and solely as usual for the province of Quebec by way of an opposition day motion. Unlike September 1994, this time others have a chance to participate in the Canada–Quebec sweepstakes.

The motion calls on the House to denounce the federal government for not paying an additional $119 million which Quebec claims is the unpaid federal share for educating Indian and Inuit children in northern Quebec over the past nine years. Federal officials contend that some $450 million has been paid in this spending envelope and that conditions set forth under the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement and northeastern Quebec agreement have been contravened as a consequence of overspending by the Quebec government.

Who is right? Has the Quebec government sought approval from the federal government to do so? Who knows? A Bloc motion and a trip by a provincial emissary are not good enough for me.

• (1145)

The 1995–96 estimates for Indian affairs indicate spending of over $825 million on all elementary, secondary and post–secondary education for natives. On the post–secondary side it indicates an increase of $34 million over 1994–95. In the 1992–93 fiscal year departmental spending in education was $711 million. This year's estimates indicate a $114 million increase over a three–year period, or roughly what the province of Quebec is asking for by way of its alleged shortfall.

No one is denying any person access to a complete education. In the instance of aboriginal education certain comprehensive funding agreements or alternative funding arrangements have to be met. Political posturing and using the current political sensitivities by way of an implied threat will not get my party to support another $119 million being anted up, no matter how charming the messenger.

Allow me to turn to the second demand of the motion as orchestrated by last week's trip by the provincial intergovernmental affairs minister. In this instance the House is being called upon to denounce the federal government for not reacting to Quebec's demand for the government to apply the federal fiscal stabilization program and help out Quebec during these difficult fiscal times to the tune of $135 million.

Quebec claims drastic drops in revenue and thus qualifies for support from the emergency program. The provincial minister and the Bloc have good memories, since the claim for the payment of $135 million goes back to 1991. What was the revenue shortfall in Quebec in 1991? What was the emergency situation? These seem like reasonable questions. Since the Bloc was not in power in 1991 it is nice to see the Bloc carrying the can in Ottawa for Robert Bourassa.

Under the fiscal stabilization program certain conditions must be met for eligibility to funding. In 1991–92 and during this recession five provinces were found wanting and received a total of $418 million. Quebec and Saskatchewan were found not to be eligible at that time. However, in 1992–93 Quebec received $125 million from the fund. If the Bloc feels so strongly about the case, why not follow the federal government's suggestion and go to court? Why would it ask Parliament to give carte blanche approval to meet this demand?

We understand that the legislation and regulations of the Fiscal Stabilization Program Act were met and no favourites were played. However, because Quebec was involved and was turned down this was somehow considered suspect immediately and that we should go to arbitration. No way.

The issue is simple. Everyone is aware that it is one of an overall separatist strategy to make taxes and tax sharing the real issues in the sovereignty referendum. The Quebec finance minister has already threatened Quebecers in his recent budget by claiming that a no vote would mean higher provincial sales taxes to offset federal cuts in transfer payments. The leader of the PQ claimed that the federal debt burden had been shifted solely on Quebec and that he could not talk seriously of a cost effective and flexible federal system.

The Bloc has joined the bandwagon and continued the blackmail by way of this motion. It is interesting that neither of these two leaders will discuss budget projections or provide information on what a yes vote would do. We all know it means even higher taxes for Quebecers. According to a recent Fraser Institute study they would be a whopping 25 per cent higher. Whom are the Bloc trying to kid? This is rank amateur blackmail.

• (1150)

The motion calls upon the House to denounce the federal government's tardiness in meeting the Quebec government's claim of $79 million for costs of using the Sûreté du Québec in the events at Oka in 1990. The issue requires some historical perspective so I will trace the debacle largely instigated by the Sûreté du Québec, the police force for which we are being asked to cough up another $79 million.

Some very strange decisions were made at Oka by the Quebec government. On July 11, 1990 Sûreté members stormed the Mohawk barricade a Kanesatake. In the ensuing gun battle a police officer was killed. As a result we had a standoff which lasted 78 days. Soon after the events of July 11, police began blocking food and medical supplies destined for Mohawk residents at Kanesatake.

Widespread criticism led to a lifting of the blockade on July 26. Talks began between the parties and on August 8 the Prime Minister appointed as mediator Chief Justice of the Quebec Superior Court Alan Gold. At the same time the Prime Minister said he would make the Canadian army available if Quebec needed it.

On August 12, Justice Gold announced some agreement and two days later it was announced that the Quebec government had requested the Canadian army. A force of 2,500 soldiers moved in. The next day it was announced that the army would replace the Sûreté at the barricades. This was completed on August 20. Talks were going nowhere, and on August 28 the army was asked by the premier to remove the barricades.

The motion is a one dimensional litany of Quebec complaints. The Bloc is not truly displaying its position as official opposition. It would be better served devoting more attention to national issues and less time on purely political posturing to serve one province.

I cannot support the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech of the hon. member and I am somewhat surprised by his paternalistic attitude regarding the claims that are being made.

The claims made by the Quebec government at this stage are about adjustment and correspondence to criteria and things of that nature. We are not here to question the way governments have acted. In that regard, I think that the hon. member's attitude was more or less appropriate when he asked if the gouvernment had acted in a relevant way and when he suggested it should act in such and such a way in another situation.

However, as regards fiscal stabilization, I believe this raises an important substantive issue. We are told that the Quebec government should go to the courts since it received an unqualified refusal from the finance minister. Should we not question the relevancy of a fiscal stabilization agreement in which the federal government is both judge and judged? Indeed, the government will give the money if the claim is considered justified, but the government is also, through the finance minister, the final authority allowing the disbursement.

Should such an agreement not be considered as a form of domineering federalism where the father decides what is good for his children? As if the provinces were the children of the federal government. Should we not ask ourselves something?

• (1155)

Should there not be, for this type of agreement, an independent body which could decide on the relevancy of claims in cases of disagreement between the federal and provincial governments? This way governments could be spared legal battles which entail useless expenses and necessarily lead to political claims, like the ones the Quebec government is making, when one of the parties involved refuses to agree to a claim considered to be justified by the Quebec government.

[English]

Mr. Duncan: Madam Speaker, in terms of the fiscal stabilization issue, I have a lot of problems with the issue in a broader sense. We have an equalization arrangement that was reaffirmed for five years last year in Parliament. It was based on government and on party discipline voting. The agreement is one whereby the fourth most prosperous province, the province of Quebec, is receiving something in the order of 40 per cent of equalization payments. That has created some major contention in other parts of the country.

In terms of the actual question of dealing with whether the judge and jury on arguments within that framework should be an independent body, I have some sympathy with the argument. Otherwise it is very prone to political manoeuvring whether it is from a provincial jurisdiction or the federal government.

That is the rationale for including the courts in the process but perhaps there is another way to do it other than through the courts.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is stimulating for me to rise today to address the Bloc motion which denounces the government for its tardiness in addressing Quebec's demands for outstanding payment in three critical areas.

What does the Government of Quebec want? If we examine the request we see that the Parti Quebecois or the Government of Quebec says that it is owed $79 million for costs incurred during the Oka crisis of 1990. This bill is mainly for overtime paid to the Quebec provincial police. Quebec claims that Indian affairs is a federal jurisdiction and the government has a crisis fund from which the money should be paid.

On the surface it seems like a reasonable request and is reasonably justified. If we were to get into the details we might find room for argument. After all we all know that if the provinces request through their attorneys general the aid of the civil power for their police it is a provincial obligation to pay.

In any event, Ottawa says that it has already paid $5.3 million. It has asked the federal auditor general to review the claims on both sides and propose a fair division of costs. This seems like a quite reasonable position which I submit should be given a chance to work.

The second claim on the part of the Parti Quebecois or the Government of Quebec is for $119 million for moneys spent on the education of young natives in the James Bay region of northern Quebec. The spending of $119 million for the education of natives was very laudable and worthwhile.

The PQ claims that the 1978 James Bay agreement contained provisions for Ottawa to pay a portion of the costs, but that since 1987 it has refused to pay its full share. The response from Ottawa is that it has already spent $450 million over the past several years and that additional costs were incurred by the province of Quebec without federal approval. According to reports, Ottawa is quite willing to discuss this matter in further detail but Quebec is unhappy with the pace of the negotiations to date, if not the negotiations themselves.

I submit that the negotiation process should be encouraged so that a fair and equitable agreement can be reached on this important matter. It seems that in this play between the government and the PQ and even the BQ, Reform has almost taken the position of honest broker.

The final claim of the PQ is for $135 million under the stabilization payment programs for 1991–92. The PQ says that richer provinces, including Ontario and my province of British Columbia, got money under the program which compensates provinces if they lose revenue because of an economic downturn.

Ottawa's reply in this case is that the finance department analysed Quebec's application on the same basis as other provinces that applied that year and the application was turned down, as was that of Saskatchewan. If that is the case, then Quebec has no claim.

Having looked at the demands and Ottawa's response to these demands, it is also very important for all of us to look at the motivation behind these claims. The Parti Quebecois is currently engaged in a campaign to separate Quebec from the rest of Canada. The PQ is calling it a sovereignty campaign but it is just that, a campaign to separate.

We read in the polls that the campaign shows the separatist side is losing. We must ask ourselves the question: Could it be that the PQ and their BQ allies are simply looking for an issue to help buoy the sagging separatist cause? If we examine the theory we see that such a tactic could bring positive gains to the yes side.

First, if Ottawa refuses to pay, the PQ and the BQ can tell Quebecers that Ottawa just does not care. That it is just another example of why Quebec must separate from Canada, because Ottawa cannot be trusted to live up to its commitments.

If Ottawa gives in and pays what the PQ says it is owed, then the separatist forces can trumpet: "This is a victory against domineering Ottawa". Either way, the PQ and BQ can score political points. This is what troubles me about the bills being presented by the PQ and the motion presented by the Bloc today. It appears to be motivated by crass politics and is not a genuine desire to enhance the lives of Quebecers.

At the same time I have to applaud members of the Bloc for their dogged determination to bring before the House issues that affect their constituents, the people of Quebec. They are very good at that. However, as I mentioned earlier, it is unfortunate that this determination is not based on anything more than achieving the Bloc's stated political goal of separation.

I must also admonish the Bloc for neglecting its role as the official opposition. If the Bloc wants to maintain the role of official opposition, it has to widen its focus and begin to address the many greater areas of common concern in Canada. It must not be allowed to simply use its position to further its own agenda.

Dedicating limited supply days to debating motions such as the one we have before us today means that the affairs of the nation as a whole are put on the back burner while we all address issues which affect just a limited portion of our society. That is the problem. To me it is an abuse of the parliamentary process and to a large degree an affront to the majority of Canadians, even to Canadians in Quebec who are tired of seeing themselves used as nothing more than pawns in the political games being played by the Bloc and its PQ allies in Quebec city.

• (1205)

If the PQ and the BQ want to separate, then let them hold their referendum without delay and let Parliament get on with the business of running Canada for all Canadians. It is time for parliamentarians to demand the Bloc either fulfil its role as the official opposition or step aside for a party that is willing to do the job. The Bloc must not be allowed to hold Parliament hostage any longer.

It is within the power of Parliament to remove the mantle of official opposition from the Bloc and bestow it on a true opposition party. This has not happened to date because the Prime Minister appears unwilling to do it.

Therefore I appeal to Canadians from coast to coast to coast to write the Prime Minister and ask him why he is an accomplice to these political games; ask the Prime Minister to allow the House to conduct a free vote on which party should be the official opposition.

It is time for us all to move forward in the interest of all Canadians. The Bloc is hindering this process with the type of motion that is in front of us today. Canadians say enough, and I say enough, and enough to the motion before the House as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Madam Speaker, I suppose my colleague for Nanaimo—Cowichan got carried away, to have made such comments. I usually have great respect for what he says in the House. The speech he delivered in the last ten minutes shows how our friends from the Reform Party are unable to give any serious consideration whatsoever to the legitimate demands of the government of Quebec.

I have two points to make. The member explained, during his ten minutes, that the tabling, by the Bloc Quebecois, of a motion asking the federal government to act properly and stand by agreements it made under the statutes governing our institutions, is nothing more than separatists bringing up a local problem for partisan purposes.

I am sure my colleague cannot, in all conscience, maintain such an absurdity. He knows perfectly well that what the opposition is asking this morning, what the present Quebec government is asking, is what the Quebec has been asking for ten years in one case, five years in another case and three years in the last case. These demands date from the days of the Bourassa government. As I mentioned in my speech, Mr. Bourassa cannot be accused of thinking separatist thoughts.

My second point is that I was surprised to hear such comments from a Reform member who is always asking the federal government to stop interfering, to let the provinces act in their own field. He is asking even more—he would like the powers of government to be decentralized. He would like us to have a smaller federal government.

When the Bloc Quebecois, the official opposition, rises in the House on a motion that basically has the same goal, my colleague is blinded by partisan considerations and he lowers the level of debate to a partisan debate. I think there is no room for such behaviour in this House. I hope my colleague will take advantage of the few minutes he has left to refocus his thoughts.

• (1210)

Mr. Ringma: Madam Speaker, I must say that I partly agree with the hon. member's words. He is certainly right when he says that the Reform Party is against big government, against too much government and against too much control by Ottawa over the provinces.

I agree that we would like to have decentralization as outlined. But at the same time, and I will repeat what I just said. I see in the Bloc's motion a totally political manoeuver to bring the separation issue into the debate today.

I can say that I heard the Bloc previously describe federalism as dominating. I also agree with that. But we have to change the government, we have to change the system first. We need decentralization, but we do not have it yet. We must work in order to achieve it.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Madam Speaker, I find it rather deplorable that some people will say almost anything to score political points in the House. I understand that the hon. member might be very interested in forming the official opposition, but an election will be held only after the Bloc Quebecois is gone.

I would like to say to the hon. member that it is in Quebec that the Oka crisis happened. It is Quebec that has problems with the federal government with respect to payments for aboriginal education. It is Quebec that has problems regarding stabilization. That is why we are here, to defend Quebec's interests.

[English]

Mr. Ringma: Madam Speaker, of course they have problems in Quebec. Of course they must stand up and defend them, but I will come back to what it is I am saying.

We want to be the official opposition and yes, we will wait for a byelection to have it happen properly. In the meantime, the Bloc is doing nothing more than being the advocate of everything in Quebec and is not acting as the official opposition for all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Madam Speaker, it is a great pleasure to rise at this stage in the debate, especially after a speech by the Reform Party on a very important motion tabled by the Bloc Quebecois.

I think that we should put the cards on the table and look at what is really happening. The motion is very clear. It is aimed at denouncing the federal government's delay in paying the money it owes Quebec. This government owes Quebec $79 million as a result of the Oka crisis, $135 million under the 1991–92 stabilization program, and $119 million for problems related to the education of young aboriginal people in northern Quebec. The Minister of Indian Affairs and the federal government know that these amounts are owed, but they are not doing anything about it.

It is normal for the Bloc Quebecois, for Quebec MPs elected by Quebecers to defend Quebec's interests in Ottawa, to table such a motion on an opposition day, because it is in the news. This week, a Quebec official met with her federal counterpart to claim the tidy sum of $333 million. You expect us to remain silent while this is going on? No way. We have been sent here with a clear mandate, which we intend to fulfil, and we will fight for this money because it is owed to Quebec. We will work to get it.

• (1215)

Again, this issue gives us the opportunity to show clearly that Quebecers made a very definite choice in the last federal election because, as you know, Madam Speaker, this issue has been dragging on for years. Let me take a minute to give you some background information. We did not make anything up. The Bloc Quebecois and the big bad separatists in Quebec had nothing to do with this. Once upon a time, there was a federalist government called the Bourassa government in Quebec; it was a Liberal government. In the last Liberal budget tabled in the Province of Quebec, the Bourassa government indicated that the federal government owed $300 million to Quebec.

Is this something that big bad separatists made up? No, Madam Speaker. If the allies of our friends opposite, those who will share their platform in the Quebec referendum scheduled for this year, if the Liberals mentioned this $300 million in their budget—and we know that they are pals with our friends opposite—it is because this amount is really owed. It remains to be paid.

I had a prepared speech but I think that I will set it aside and speak from the heart instead, because this is much too important an issue. I think you can push, but only so far. Our motion refers to three demands of the highest importance. Let us look at them one at a time.

First, there is the Oka crisis. What was this crisis? Well, Oka is in Quebec. Certain Indians claimed a strip of land in that area in the 1990s, and the Quebec provincial police, as well as the Canadian Armed Forces, had to be called in. The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs said so himself. He reported having spent $122 million on these measures. And we are supposed to believe that these were not emergency measures related to a disaster, that, to use his own words, public order and public good are slightly different?

If it were strictly a matter of public good, what was the army doing there? Why did the government spend $122 million? Can you tell me, Madam Speaker? Because there was an element of public order involved, which is directly covered by federal–provincial agreement in the definition of disaster. This may sound like a strange term, disaster, but that is what the agreement says, and letters were even exchanged by the two levels of government, in which the federal government recognized the events in Oka were a disaster under the terms of the agreement.

Correspondence exchanged between the provincial Liberal government and the federal Conservative government at the time provides that the Oka crisis is covered by that agreement. An amount of $139 million was spent on that in Quebec. How did the federal government pay its debt? It gave $5.3 million. Then, it said: "The federal government is acting in good faith. It would pay the total bill, but the issue relates to public good, not public order". Such an interpretation can only be made in bad faith. When $122 million was spent because of the existence of a threat to the public, either the federal government pays the full amount or, if it does not want to respect its own agreements or thinks that it will not be able to fulfil its commitment, it should not sign such agreements with the provinces. This is what is deplorable.

Governments, whether they are Conservative or Liberal, are all the same. In fact, whether we are talking about the Conservatives, the Liberals or the Reform Party, it is all the same when it comes to looking after Quebec's interests. They are all opposed to these interests. This is the case and we have a very good example of that here, where Reform, Liberal, and Conservative members are working hand in hand. They belong to different parties, but they all react in the same manner regarding this issue. They are all opposed to Quebec's interests.

They put Quebec in its place. That is what federalists want to do, put Quebec in its place, and that is what they have been doing for 30 years. And then, they wonder why there is a sovereignist movement in Quebec.

There is a very precise order to the events in the Oka crisis. All the ministers who dealt with that issue have that correspondence. They know that the $139.7 million Quebec spent on that issue was not money spent for a futile purpose; it was spent to maintain public order. There was a major crisis going on. Those events involved the death of one person, and there was the need to intervene. That is why that money was spent, through the Quebec provincial police force.

It must be remembered that there is a provincial police force in Quebec. The province provides its own police services. What would have happened, say, if such a crisis had taken place in Manitoba, a province without a provincial police force? The events would have been monitored by the RCMP. Who would have paid? The federal government. Would the federal government have passed the $139.7 million bill on to the province of Manitoba? I doubt it.

Let us look at what is going on now with federal–provincial agreements on law enforcement services between that province and the federal government. The federal government provides police officers, and pays them, but it cannot even pass on the bill to get full payment for the services it provides to that province. Some might think that the member for Berthier—Montcalm is putting forward figures without knowing what he is talking about, but those are not my figures. The Solicitor General of Canada is the one who pointed them out. The solicitor general has been saying year in and year out: "You cannot even recover all the costs of the RCMP services you are providing, and you should".

And then, we are told that in a case like the Oka crisis that could have happened anywhere in Canada, the whole bill should be passed on to the province. Madam Speaker, this could only happen here. It could only happen in Quebec. It is the only province that has to argue to have the federal government pay its bills. We should not forget the Charlottetown referendum. How many times did we have to raise the issue in this House in order to get the federal government to pay the $35 million it owed? Quebec paid twice for that referendum that was forced upon it. The federal government imposed that referendum, and we had to pay for it twice.

It is only when the government opposite examined the issue, set aside its political interests and partisan considerations that it handed a $35 million cheque to Quebec, because that claim was indeed justified.

The situation is exactly the same with the Oka crisis. Quebec is owed $79 million. Now, who is going to pay?

I would now like to say a few words about the second claim concerning the education of young aboriginals. I am particularly pleased to do so when the minister is here. He will certainly confirm what I have to say.

Is it not strange that, here again, we had agreements between both levels of government on the education of aboriginals? One point should be clear. Aboriginal affairs are a federal jurisdiction. When the federal government steps outside its jurisdiction, we take it to task. What we have here is exclusively under federal jurisdiction. Let the government abide by that nice Canadian constitution it so eagerly defends in the House. Let it honour its signature. Here again, we have a federal–provincial agreement under which the federal government is supposed to pay 75 per cent of costs and Quebec 25 per cent. The minister gave an excellent explanation earlier. A few young whites live on the reserve, and their education is a provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, Quebec should pay for their education.

• (1225)

The federal government should also pay for the natives living on that reserve and on all the reserves in northern Quebec. Following the James Bay agreement, both levels of government reached an excellent agreement under which the federal government and the province of Quebec split some of the costs.

Between 1978 and 1987, this approach worked very well. The federal always paid as soon as it received the bill sent by the Quebec government. In 1987, the federal government stopped paying. Why? Because it argued that the bill was too high and that the expenses had increased too much. Why had these expenses increased? Simply because the birth rate has increased on the reserve as well as the number of young natives, and more natives had gone back to school. The Quebec government was providing more education services and more classes to the natives. So, the federal government said: "Oh no, the expenses have gotten out of hand; we will no longer pay".

Today, the minister had the nerve to say: "Look, we are acting in good faith. We paid $450 million". Yes, but they stopped paying in 1987. Is that what he calls acting in good faith? Is that what flexible federalism is all about? Is this the kind of federalism in front of which we should grovel like the members opposite? Without Canadian federalism, there is no salvation? I do not think so.

In cases like this one, we will still be blamed for defending Quebec's interests, even if the federal government obviously owes us some money. And we are not talking about petty cash here, but rather $119 million. We should give up $119 million without saying anything. This is horrible. It is unacceptable.

What is even more unacceptable is for some members representing Quebec ridings to rise and to criticize us because we are defending Quebec's interests and asking for the money owed to us. We want what is ours. This money is owed to us.

These Quebec members will still rise to try to sweeten things up, to hide the truth and to tell us why they do not have to pay. However, all the documentation we have clearly shows that some agreements were reached and some promises were made by the various levels of government concerned.

This only goes to prove that the system in which we live is awful and cannot work. There are two nations in this country; there are two countries in this country. We are totally unalike. How do you think we can agree when they cannot even respect contracts which they signed? Moreover, they invite us to settle our disagreements in court. "We do not agree, so let us go to court".

We can do that with the United States. A great Canadian like the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs can say to his neighbours who do business with Canada: "Listen, if we cannot reach an agreement, you can always go to court; that is what courts are for". But, to my knowledge, as long as Quebec does not say yes to sovereignty, as long as Quebec is not a separate country, we are still part of the system.

This is what the so–called flexible federalism is. Is this what the blind advocate of flexible federalism is going to offer us? It is scandalous. I think there is no better way to describe it than to say it is scandalous.

The third claim, and not the least, is an amount of $135 million for the 1991–92 stabilization program. If my memory does not fail me, it was not the big bad separatists who were in power then, it was the Liberals.

Indeed, the Premier of Quebec was the ineffable Robert Bourassa, a federalist well known by our friends opposite, and this man claimed $135 million. That tells you something. If a man like Mr. Bourassa put down in his books that the federal government owed Quebec the sum of $135 million, you need not look any further, it is a minimum. No matter how you calculate it, he was so afraid of displeasing his great federal friends, he so often groveled before the federal government, that if he submitted a claim for $135 million, you can be sure the federal government owed this money to Quebec. There is no need to look any further. We can make all kinds of complicated computations, we can make a balance sheet say what we want, I think everybody here agrees with that.

The fact remains that, if federalists like Robert Bourassa and his cabinet, of which the present Minister of Labour was a member, claimed such an amount, then that was probably the amount due. I would like to hear from the Minister of Labour, who was elected to protect Quebec's interests, since she is very familiar with all the details of the claim. I would like to know what she says to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Does she say that that is the correct amount as she used to claim when she was a member of the Bourassa government? Does she say that Quebec's claims like the one for the Oka crisis, which she certainly knew all about as a member of the Bourassa cabinet, are well founded? Does she say to the intergovernmental affairs minister that the money owed for northern Quebec natives' education should be paid? She was once the Quebec Minister of Education. Does she say it should be paid? Will she rise in the House? I am anxious to see how she will vote tonight on the motion and to see if she defends Quebec's interests as we do because it was for that reason that we were elected. I am anxious to see her on her feet.

The federal government made written and oral commitments to Quebec. It is accountable to the people of Quebec. Moreover, it is the source of some of the problems we are faced with today. The federal government should pay right away what it owes Quebecers. Do the honourable thing and pay what you owe.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in such a delicate matter that concerns not only our native people but also Quebec's honour, we must not forget that, in 1990, the media in Europe, Asia and all over the world criticized us for the way this dispute with our native friends had been handled. It was not something that Quebec could be proud of.

When I hear opposition members say that we, government members, are not protecting Quebec's interests, I would like them to tell me why they have decided to change their position with regard to the referendum. Now they want to have an association with the Canadian government even though they claim that it does not honour its fiscal commitments. Everybody knows that it is not true.

I would be curious to know the opinion of small municipalities which have received funding for infrastructure projects thanks to their support, to the co–operation of the province and to the federal government's determination to put Canadians and Quebecers back to work.

The members opposite say that the Canadian government has not responded to the Quebec government's demands, but it is absolutely false. It is the government of Quebec which called on the Canadian Armed Forces, and it is the federal government which spent $122 million. We must not forget that. You know, Madam Speaker, this bill will not be paid by the government of Quebec. It is through federalism, as it now stands, that we can share our resources. That is what gives our country its strength. The province of Quebec has a lot to gain by being part of our great Canadian family.

• (1235)

Of course, the fact that the federal government has paid $450 million for the education of natives in northern Quebec has already been mentioned. I could talk some more about all the programs which have benefited Quebec, but it is absolutely wrong to say that the members opposite are speaking for Quebec. I am a Quebecer, a Gaspesian and proud of it, and if an opposition party which does not even represent the majority in Quebec in terms of the popular vote thinks it can tell me—

Some hon. members: Not true!

Mr. Gagnon: Madam Speaker, I would like to point out that they only captured 48 per cent of the popular vote, and that the Parti Quebecois only captured 44 per cent of the vote in the provincial election. If they had the honour, audacity and intellectual integrity to say to us tomorrow morning: "We are going to hold a referendum and the question will be: Do you want to separate from Canada, yes or no?", I assure you that they would be lucky if 30 to 35 per cent of Quebecers were to vote in favour.

Therefore, I ask the members of the opposition why they decided to go this route, if Canada really is the deadbeat they make it out to be. Why would they still want to remain associated with Canada if, according to them, the Canadian federation is not worth the trouble?

Mr. Bellehumeur: Madam Speaker, what a shame that the hon. member opposite cannot tell an apple from an orange. Understandably, both are fruit, but that is no reason to confuse the two. Although we are no longer on the subject of the motion, too much is at stake not to reply to the hon. member's question regarding why we have proposed an association with Canada.

For one, we are not proposing an economic association with the federal government; we are proposing an economic association with the other provinces, with Canadians. It would be an economic association between peoples, not between governments. The federal government is the deadbeat; not the Canadian people. The federal government has acted in bad faith; not the Canadian people. The federal government is into petty politics; not the Canadian people.

By asking this question, the hon. member has revealed just how clueless he is about the referendum debate in Quebec. I invite him to pay more attention to the debate on the referendum, which I can assure him will be held in 1995.

Mr. Gagnon: I certainly hope so.

Mr. Bellehumeur: And I hope with all my heart that the great defender of this great country, none other than the Prime Minister of Canada, will join hands with the Conservative member of this House, the leader of the Conservatives, and with the Reformers too, because they all came out of the same mold. They will all try to sell flexible federalism to Quebecers.

But we will also be on the scene to push our position. We will also point out that the federal government's first reaction is always to say no to Quebec. The hon. member made comments on my speech, that is his right. But I find it strange that he did not really talk about the important points I made in my speech. Was money spent during the Oka crisis, yes or no? Did the federal government consider it a catastrophe, yes or no? Did the federal government send the army because it considered the incident to be a catastrophe as defined under the accord, yes or no? Why did the federal government spend $122 million, like the hon. member said, if it had no business in Quebec, if the incident really was a purely provincial matter?

Because Quebec asked it to? Of course. But that answers the question of whether or not it was a catastrophe. How odd that the hon. member did not talk about that. And regarding the $450 million, yes the federal government did spend $450 million on education up to 1987. I would remind the hon. member, however, that Quebec paid its share, 25 per cent or around $115 million.

The sum we are demanding is for all of the years after 1987 in which the federal government did not want to pay, under the same accord, the accord under which the federal government had already paid in years past. We are asking for nothing more than our due. The same goes for the stabilization payments.

• (1240)

How strange that the hon. member did not go into detail, did not explain why we were not entitled to claim these sums. No, instead, he accused us of comparing apples with oranges regarding sovereignty and would have you believe that we have charted a new course. Had he only really listened to the Bloc Quebecois since its arrival in this House, he would have realized that we did not do an "about face"; we are just openly repeating things we have always been saying here. This is merely a synthesis of our thinking.

The hon. members opposite can jeer all they want and call it an about face. For us, it is the next logical step on Quebec's path to sovereignty.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Madam Speaker, as you know, it was very hard for Quebecers and for all Canadians to see this aggressive confrontation with the aboriginal First Nations, watched by millions of people throughout the world. I found it very troubling.

And I think that this opinion, these feelings, are shared by thousands, even millions of Quebecers. It was very uncomfortable to realize that we did not get along with the first settlers of this country.

That is now history. According to the opposition, it is time to pay the bills. According to the Disaster Financial Assistance Program, the DFAP, the government has paid nearly $210 million in assistance since 1970, so that the bill we were sent by Quebec would represent nearly 40 per cent of the program's budget for the past 25 years.

I agree the bill is pretty steep. It takes time, as the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs explained, but the federal government always pays its share. We are ready to negotiate. We are ready to review. However, I do not think the opposition should politicize the issue like this, because we are dealing with Canada's First Nations, who arrived in this country long before we did. And I think we owe them something. That is why I ask the opposition to accept that 40 per cent of the federal program will be paid to the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Bellehumeur: Madam Speaker, not 40 per cent but 75 per cent, according to the agreement. That is my first point.

I think the hon. member is confusing the issue. Just compare what is happening in Quebec with what happens in other Canadian provinces. Aboriginal people are treated better in Quebec. I think that as a member from Quebec he should at least admit, here in the House, that we treat aboriginal people very well. And I think they would agree.

Second, when I see a member rising in the House to say; "Yes, there is a disaster assistance program but we think the bill submitted by the Province of Quebec is too steep, because then we would have no money left for anything else"—now I ask you, can we legislate disasters? Can we predict that we will not have more than three? No compensation for number four?

I think it stands to reason that when the government sets up a program and provides assistance under that program, it should expect to foot the bill. Again, I urge the federal government to pay its debts, because this is money it owes to Quebec. Pay now and stop arguing.

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to address this motion today. Some very important issues have been raised.

The hon. Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs has clearly set out why the government will be voting against the motion. At the same time it is important to understand this issue within the broader context of what the government is doing on aboriginal issues both in Quebec and in Canada as a whole.

The government was elected on a mandate from the Canadian people to respond to issues of concern to aboriginal communities. In the 1993 election we addressed these issues head on in the famous red book. We stated quite clearly what a Liberal government would do and now we are fulfilling our commitments.

• (1245)

One of eight red book chapters is devoted exclusively to aboriginal issues, in addition to references to aboriginal policies in other chapters. Never before in Canadian electoral history had aboriginal issues received such a high profile. The opposition should bear in mind that on the strength of bringing these and other issues to public attention we received a strong mandate from the Canadian people.

In the red book we maintain that aboriginal people in Canada want two things: first, a new partnership with government based on trust, mutual respect and participation in decision making; second, a strengthening of their communities. In the red book we stated that our goal was a Canada where aboriginal people would enjoy a standard of living and quality of life and opportunity equal to those of other Canadians; a Canada where First Nations, Inuit and Métis people would live self–reliantly, secure in the knowledge of who they are as unique peoples; and, where all Canadians would be enriched by aboriginal cultures and would be committed to bringing their fair share of their potential to our nation.

Perhaps most importantly, the red book set out our goal for Canada where aboriginal children would grow up in secure families and healthy communities, with the opportunity to take their full place in Canada. This is our vision and I think it is everyone's vision in this House. We have been moving step by step to bring it alive. In the first year and a half of the government's mandate, we have already made considerable progress in Canada and in Quebec. I am not saying that this is the end–all or be–all, but we have made some progress which I think is significant, even though we have a long way to go.

In the first 18 months as minister I visited Indian and Inuit communities across Quebec and I met with most Quebec chiefs and several Inuit leaders. I have talked to Ghislain Picard of the Assembly of First Nations; I have talked to Chief Max Gro–Louis of the Huron; I have talked to Matthew Coon–Come of the Cree; Jean–Guy Whiteduck; Brenda Gideon Miller; Joe Norton, Dennis Ross, Jerry Peltier of the Mohawk; Marcel Boivin; Bernard Jérôme; Simeonie Nalukturuk of the Inuit; Zebedee Nungak of the Inuit; and Remy Kurtness. Perhaps people are saying I am talking too much. They all tell me what is being done, what needs to be done and how we can do better things together.

We forget. We deal with the aboriginal people almost from a point of ignorance. I was looking at the notes of Joseph–Elzéar Bernier, the Baffin Island explorer, when he first met the Inuit. This is from his own diary: "After firing 19 shots, I instructed an Eskimo to fire the 20th, telling him, you are now Canadian". That is how we started up there.

We forget that in Quebec there are 10 First Nations, over 40 communities and Inuit in the north. These communities are all over the place. They are a suburb of Montreal, they are extended along the St. Lawrence, they are in the interior and they are in the far north. We forget that when Cartier first landed he lost half of his people in the first winter. If it had not been for the Indians, who taught him to put bark and cedar needles and water together, they would have all died of scurvy. The Indians asked for nothing. They asked for nothing. And that is the start of their history.

We came here with a certain amount of avarice in our hearts, telling these people: "You've been holding this land for 5,000 years for us. It is really ours and we discovered it". We forget that they have a proud history. They had been here. They are nations, they were nations and they will be nations.

Some 20 years ago the province of Quebec and Canada solidified an important relationship with First Nations as the first comprehensive claims in Canada, the signing of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and the northeastern Quebec agreement, fostered a sense of pride throughout Quebec, and rightfully so. I must remind members of the Bloc that it was former Prime Minister Trudeau who was on our side when this agreement was signed, initiated, worked on. It was the present Prime Minister, who had my job, who brought this agreement to fruition. The heritage of the Cree and the heritage of the James Bay agreement is not only a proud heritage of our country, it is a very significant heritage in the Liberal Party.

• (1250)

These modern treaties mark a pivotal point in our relationship with aboriginal people, not only in Quebec but throughout Canada. Much has already been accomplished under these agreements, but given their extraordinary scope and complexity it is not surprising that much more needs to be done.

When I visited the Cree communities in December I continued discussions with Grand Chief Matthew Coon–Come and Cree chiefs regarding implementation of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement. As a result, work has been undertaken to continue our dialogue on several key areas of concern.

I am pleased to report that under the first self–government legislation in Canada, the Cree–Naskapi of Quebec Act of 1984, significant progress has been made in bilateral talks on agreement on funding a five–year operation and maintenance budget for the regional and local governments.

We also recently reached an agreement with Chief Billy Diamond of the Cree of Waskaganish for fresh water and sewage treatment. I am pleased to report that the construction of the community of Ouje–Bougougmou was written up in National Geographic and in articles throughout the world as the way to do things. I think every parliamentarian should go to Ouje–Bougougmou and see how it is done and when we work together how it can be done right.

Chief Abel Bosum has been with us from the beginning there. He has lived with it. It is amazing. They took people from eight or nine scattered communities who were living in shacks. They met in a little house on a hill. They would come over in the evening and meet with the architect with suggestions. They were not just looking at plans. It was a living thing. They named each street after their traplines. If we could duplicate that in the 605 First Nations across Canada, problems would be solved.

I want to tell the House what Billy Diamond had to do when the Grand Council of Crees was started in 1974. Billy Diamond gave his health and his family. This is what he said on June 28, 1971: "This is our land. No one has obtained surrender from us. We never lost it in war. We never lost it in battle. We never signed a treaty. No one has taken it. And we are not allowed by the Creator to let anyone take it from us". That is the way we started. They have only had three leaders: Billy Diamond, Ted Moses, Matthew Coon–Come.

With the Government of Quebec and the Government of Canada working together we can put things together, not divide things or separate things. We can come up with the Ouje–Bougoumous. That is what we have today. It is easy to divide. It is hard to keep people together.

In the area of policing, the department of the solicitor general signed a tripartite agreement on public security for all Cree communities. This illustrates a common goal for the Crees to govern themselves by assuming administration, management, and supervision of its own police force.

We are also encouraged to see considerable progress made on reaching an agreement to establish a Nunavik assembly of government. Although primarily a negotiation between Inuit and Quebec, Canada has been invited by both parties to have representation at these negotiations and we have provided the Nunavik constitutional committee with funding for these landmark negotiations.

Canada has other involvement with aboriginal groups in northern Quebec. We organized and participated with Makavik Corporation in the Inuit forum, a meeting held on a regular basis to examine progress and co–ordinate the application of the implementation of the JBNQA in terms of federal obligations. Canada signed the JBNQA implementation agreement with the Inuit in 1990, which provides for an amount of $22.1 million and various other commitments.

The Naskapis are also being innovative in developing partnerships. We recently signed a five–year agreement on housing and infrastructure and are discussing in concert with other federal departments an employment creation strategy.

Ninety per cent of the time I am in the field with the aboriginal people of Quebec they do not talk about self–government or about the referendum or about separation. They talk about education, infrastructure, water systems, housing, and their aspirations. This is what they talk about.

• (1255)

We talk about separation here. The intellectual dilettantes are always talking about separation. The native people are talking about things that are important to them and their kids: food on the table, jobs, security. These are the things we were elected for. We were elected on jobs, fiscal responsibility, getting on into the future and that is why we are staying on that agenda.

Following our 1990 implementation agreement with the Naskapi, I am pleased to hear Quebec is engaged in discussions and looks forward to resolving various issues related to the implementation of the northeastern Quebec implementation agreement.

Federal initiatives are not limited to northern Quebec. As I said earlier, the aboriginal people are throughout Quebec. For example, comprehensive land claims with the 12 Attikamek and Montagnais communities are of enormous importance to all of northeastern Quebec. I look forward to renewed and rejuvenated negotiations that will lead to a fair and equitable resolution of their outstanding and complex land claims.

It was odd, when I heard the Bloc speak today there was no mention of the fact that David Cliche, whom I like, although we disagree philosophically—he is a separatist and I am a federalist—went to the Attikamek and Montagnais and offered $400 million. That is not ancient history; that was a few months ago. Nothing was said about this, but he presupposed that $300 million of that was federal money. While Quebec was taking all the bows—I see the Bloc member smiling, but that is correct—and David Cliche was taking all the bows and Premier Parizeau was in the glow of this, $300 million of the $400 million was our money.

I remember one Bloc member standing up saying "I am here to defend the taxpayers of Canada", which is what they were elected for. They are not here to separate the country—they have said that themselves; they are here to do their jobs. I do not remember one Bloc member ever standing up and saying maybe we have too much money in there. I think this is the first time it has even been mentioned that $300 million of that $400 million came from the federal coffers. Luckily, in a way, the agreement was rejected.

There are also important developments involving the Huron–Wendat First Nation right next to Quebec City. This is interesting about the Huron. At one time the Huron were the largest of the six nations and a profound part of our history. Through disease, war and what we have done, they now have only one reserve, which is near Quebec City at Loretteville. It is very sad when this happens. We read so much about the Huron in the books. There are a few in the United States, but only one reserve in Canada.

I met with Chief Max Gros–Louis in November 1994. An understanding has been reached among the federal, provincial and Huron–Wendat negotiators to recommend the framework agreement for very important negotiations of the application of the Murray Treaty.

I have several pages on the Mohawk, who we hear about every day. I will skip over that, because my time is getting short. I will mention that it is working. The Mohawk round table is not the end–all, but it works. We are now talking to the Mohawk. Judge Réjean Paul is there and Michel Robert is there. It works. This government came in, and there are no more Okas. We talked and negotiated and dealt fairly with the Mohawks of Canada.

We are working with the Inuit, the Cree, the Naskapi, the Montagnais, the Algonquin, the Attikamek, the Huron, the Malecites, the Micmacs and the Mohawks in Quebec. I cannot remember a time ever in the history of the country when any government could say there was movement with all of these people. That is what is important, not the fact that the Bloc comes here today on behalf of the Government of Quebec and tells us there is money owing.

It is important for us to work together when it comes to aboriginal people. We can do a good job. As things are going now, this country is not going to separate so we had better start talking about the future. We had better not have such deep wounds that we cannot heal them. That could happen even here. We could create such deep wounds that we could never heal them. We have to decide what is important to us collectively.

The Bloc member for Saint–Jean is out there in the field. He is probably one of the more knowledgeable, maybe the most knowledgeable person in opposition on what is out there with the aboriginal people. He brings the concerns of food mail to this House. He brings the concerns of aboriginal people across this country. He made one mistake by going door to door in a Mohawk village and almost got kidnapped by the Mohawks because they did not understand he was a member of Parliament, but these things come and go.

We have to establish what is important to us and what our values are as people. If we do that, this country will survive and we will do a good job for the aboriginal people.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Madam Speaker, I took the liberty of jotting down a few points while the minister was speaking. I must say he has given us an extraordinary lesson on aboriginal culture, and so we have not really completely wasted our time, since, let there be no doubt, we have a lot to learn from this culture.

You see, our purpose today was not to talk about aboriginal culture, which has its merits, but to talk about the money the federal government owes the Government of Quebec. It is just money, nothing important. It is just money after all. It does create a few minor problems, however. It is easy enough to say: there was a crisis at Oka, which is in Quebec, so it is not a big deal; Quebec can pay the costs or take the matter to court. Whose responsibility was it to deal with the native people? The federal government's. Now if I have properly understood the minister, given that the native culture has so many fine qualities, if the native people got angry at some point, it was because the federal government had not done its job. If it did not do its job, it has to assume the consequences.

So you see the matter is a simple one. The minister says that federal money would be used to reimburse the Government of Quebec for what it paid out. Yes, but, there is a problem here. There is a fundamental error in logic. It is not federal money, it is taxpayers' money. While the Liberal government may have red on its banner, it is not wearing a Santa Claus suit. It does not print money. It gets its money out of the taxpayers' pockets. Try asking the Minister of Revenue to wait two or three or four years for his tax money, try saying to him: "We will go to court, and it will get settled that way". It could create a few problems for any taxpayer foolish enough to try.

No, it is not federal government money, it is taxpayers' money. The shoe starts to pinch when Quebec taxpayers have to pay twice—once when they pay their federal share and once when they pay the provincial government. Who is supposed to pay the costs the federal government is responsible for? Good heavens, the logic is simple. It is the logic of integrity. It is the logic of honesty. It is the logic of "I paid out money for you under an agreement, I sent you the bill for it, you agreed to pay it—well, pay it then". What was the answer to this? It was: "See you in court. We want all the details on these invoices". Well, good heavens—I certainly could not talk about good faith here.

I would be tempted to suggest to the Quebec Minister of Revenue that he set aside from the GST money he collects an amount equal to what the federal government is refusing to pay, in the form of a guarantee. Once the federal government pays its bill, the Minister of Revenue will release the money. If this is the sort of language we have to use, then this is the way we will have to put it: $300 million out of $400 million.

The minister says: "Mr. Cliche, in Quebec, has offered aboriginals $400 million". He forgot to say that $300 million came from the federal government, in fact not from the federal government but rather from the taxpayers. If the federal government is so broke that it has to squeeze tax dollars out of taxpayers and cannot afford to hand over that money to Quebec, then it should separate from Quebec. Quebec then would be able to pay $300 million out of those $400 million since it would save a tidy sum of $30 billion.

The minister was very nice in his speech, very kind. Unfortunately, he did not address the motion before the House. To conclude, I have this question for the minister. In his speech, the minister said right from the start that they were going to vote against the Bloc's motion. Could he tell us therefore what we are doing in this place all day long? Is it an exercise in futility? Those people say from the outset that they are not going to listen, that they are going to vote against the motion. Are we wasting our time? No, we are not wasting our time because those who are watching us on television will know the truth and have a very good reason to resolve the issue this fall by voting in favour of Quebec's sovereignty and making Quebec a winner.

[English]

Mr. Irwin: Madam Speaker, I want to remind the hon. member that we spend $351 million a year in the Quebec region for aboriginal people. We spent $980 million on the Crees, $552 million on the Inuit and $69 million on the Naskapi, for a total of $1.6 billion.

[Translation]

We already gave Quebec $450 million for education.

[English]

Maybe I should not bother to mention it but $450 million of our money went to Quebec on education.

The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs has expressed the problem we have. Quebec is saying that the Government of Canada owes 50 per cent but we have no say on the amount of money spent. We have no say vis–à–vis education with the province of Quebec. It will call the shots. That is not partnership. That is: "I am doing it. I will send you the bill and you pay it".

At the same time, I wrote to Madam Beaudoin in April saying that I would put my senior officials at the table to see if there is common ground. We will count the various moneys owing to see if we can find a just solution. The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs has done the same thing but he has gone further and has met with her. We are trying to do this in a practical manner.

I tend to agree with the Reform Party on one point. There are a lot of games being played here today. The issue is not what is owing to Quebec, the issue is separation. No matter which way we cut it, this is it.

The problem I am having is that the onus is not on this government to prove why separation is better. The Bloc is having a difficult time with it. It is having a difficult time explaining to Quebecers how they will be more sovereign if Quebec separates.

The reality is that with GATT, with NAFTA, with what we are doing with aboriginal people and within the cultural community, there is more sovereignty for Quebecers under federalism. There is more. They are starting to realize that. The Bloc is failing in its argument. It is up to its members to put their argument and convince Quebecers, not us.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Madam Speaker, the minister just said that they gave $450 million towards the education of native people in Quebec. They have already used this argument three or four times on the government side. But if the bill comes to $600 million, it must be paid in full.

When I bought a car, and was told by the salesman that it came to $30,000, I did not stop paying at $20,000, saying that it would have to suffice, that it was too much. I had to pay the whole amount, and live up to my commitment.

Earlier, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs talked about the principles of fairness and good management; he really laid it on thick. But last year, around the same time, when we asked for a royal commission on the Pearson deal, for the sake of good management and good administration of public funds, we were told that it was not possible because time was of the essence. The whole matter had to be settled quickly for the economy to keep going, and the country to function.

• (1310)

One year later, what is the situation, Madam Speaker? We are not too sure. Bill C–22 is in limbo, floating around somewhere. What was supposed to cost $25 million, according to the transport minister himself, has now sky–rocketed to $450 million. Why is it that today, when Quebec and Quebecers are asking for what they are owed, all of a sudden the government invokes these same principles it refused to apply to the Pearson deal, even though a Liberal inquiry recommended legal action?

I would like someone to explain this to me. How could the minister change that much within a year to the point of being unrecognizable?

[English]

Mr. Irwin: Madam Speaker, in the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement there are shared costs for instance for infrastructure, water, sewers and so on which we have paid. We are doing the accounts on that. It would be as inappropriate for us to send the bill to Quebec saying to pay it without question as I think it is inappropriate for Mrs. Beaudoin to say: "Here is the bill. Don't let a senior civil servant field it. The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and I will deal with it. We will just cut a political decision".

I do not think, when we are dealing with large sums of money, that we can do these things that way. There has to be proper accounting. Senior civil servants who have the expertise have to sit down and do the accounting. That is all this is, an accounting. We accept that. What we do not accept is the Bloc using it as a political ploy which it is. We accept it as accounting within our normal relationship with Quebec, or any province in Canada from B.C. to Newfoundland.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Madam Speaker, as critic for indian affairs, I will speak mostly about two of the claims that are before us today. I could have chosen to get directly to the point, but I thought it would be useful to look at what Quebecers could do with $300 million, since this is approximately the amount of the claim submitted to the federal government which is now being discussed in the House.

There are quite a number of things Quebecers could do with $300 million. The first one that comes to mind is probably, as Minister Paillé said, an investment fund with a greater accent on venture capital, that would give young entrepreneurs with creative ideas the opportunity to go into business. We could create 50,000 to 100,000 jobs with such a fund of $300 million.

There is chronic unemployment in Quebec. The unemployment rate has always been higher in Quebec than in the rest of Canada, because of decisions made here, in this House, where we often choose to establish heavy industries and other important job creating activities outside Quebec. We are stuck with an unemployment insurance fund and we are being told: "You are lucky because we give you more money than you give us. We return more money to you in unemployment insurance, social assistance, and education transfers". Listen, you do not build a society with unemployed persons and welfare recipients. These people are hard pressed right now, and we have to put them back to work.

I think it is appropriate that we should question the government today, that we should introduce a motion which says: "Listen, ladies and gentlemen, pay your bills. You owe us $300 million".

I will now move on to the Oka question. Originally, the bill was for $84 million, but the Liberal government finally paid $5.3 million in 1992. At that time, the government looked at our claim and said: "We are paying $5.3 million, but the remainder is not eligible". Why is it not eligible? There is practically no reason. I remind you that, at the time, the Quebec government was Liberal and federalist. The man in charge was our former Minister of Social Security, the ineffable Mr. Ryan, that everybody knows and who tangoed with the federal government.

• (1315)

He danced the tango in step. Mr. Ryan kept complaining, and the federal government kept sending him letters saying: "You are exaggerating, we will not pay that much, we will give you $5.3 million, but as for the rest, the $79 million, forget it."

Mr. Ryan kept dancing with the federal government, he kept exchanging letters with the federal government, and he kept wringing his hands in the federal government's headquarters here in Ottawa. He kept writing to ministers tearful speeches, saying you must resolve this for us.

However, we never saw him demanding publicly the federal government to pay the bill now, as the current Quebec government is now doing after so much pussyfooting. We know the federalist mind of Mr. Ryan, as I said, the ineffable Quebec's Minister of Public Security at the time, and we understand that he was content to dance the tango privately with the federal government and never dared to do it publicly. So, we are doing it today.

Why do the expenses not qualify? We do not know, except that, with the Parti Quebecois' arrival in power in 1994, as early as December 1994, the then minister of public security was asking his counterpart for the reimbursement. What happened then is exactly what the minister wants to take us into today. "We will do it with the auditors and the high officials. I suggest that we meet".

For five years, it has been only meetings. For five years, we have been told that officials would get together to try and resolve the issue, that the auditor general would also be asked what would qualify and what could be paid.

It was a disaster that happened in Quebec in 1990, a disaster that had an effect not only in Quebec and in Canada, but also internationally. Several courts, several international fora dealt with the Oka events. I think that Quebec qualified under agreements signed between the federal and provincial governments and providing for such a disaster.

Was it a disaster? I think that I could talk about it for hours, because I certainly experienced the events, I saw them, I saw the federal government's negligence in the Oka crisis. From our point of view there definitely was a major crisis in Oka affecting not only native people but Quebecers also.

It has become obvious that in the beautiful region of Oka located near the Deux–Montagnes lake, where I go on a regular basis, the tourist industry has been completely wiped out. That region has become a desert from a tourism point of view. No one goes to Oka any more. There are still events in Oka which prove the carelessness of this government which sits around idly and waits for things to take a turn for the worse. What is happening during that time? The economy of the area and surrounding areas is in bad shape, as a result.

Some officers of the Sureté du Québec had to spend weeks in Oka at that time, far from their families. Who is paying the bill? The government of Quebec is paying the bill, at present. As I said earlier, there are agreements where in case of a disaster there has to be some sort of sharing. In this case, Quebec is the only one to pay the bill, except a paltry $5.3 million.

This government is still showing carelessness today. Just a week ago a good friend of the Liberals, Michel Robert, was appointed to the Quebec Court of Appeal. This man is a close friend of the Liberals, the red lawyer par excellence, a man who was on all strategic committees of this House, including the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

That man played a key role in the Kanesatake negotiation. I talk about carelessness because I also know the native people's philosophy. According to their philosophy, you cannot suddenly say that you want to negotiate, to set a timeframe and solve everything in three days. This is not the way things work with them. You need time to gain their confidence. I must say however that Mr. Robert is a very good and very competent negotiator.

• (1320)

However, after only seven or eight months, as we were beginning to see the light at the end of the tunnel, this government appointed Mr. Robert to the Court of Appeal and there we are, back to square one. What I am saying now is that the federal government is controlling the pressure in Oka, as he did in 1990. It raises or lowers the pressure depending on the political context. Today, we are claiming $79 million, knowing that this government has not done anything since 1990 to settle the problem in Oka. In this context, I think the claim is legitimate. As I said, it is another example of the carelessness of this government.

What were we supposed to do in Oka? The major part of this claim relates certainly to the presence of police officers there. What evidence is needed to convince the government? Maybe a videotape would do? They are quite in fashion. As was shown recently, the government opposite only reacted when they saw videotapes.

I recall events in Oka when the Sûreté du Québec was systematically sandwiched between aboriginal people and their opponents. I saw police officers torn to pieces. I saw on video some of them, accompanied by friends, being carried out on stretchers, because they had tried to separate two camps which were trying to cut each other's throat, so to speak.

Now we are told: "You take care of that yourselves. Public security is Quebec's responsibility." We do not worry about the fact that we are the trustees of aboriginal people, that we pay them and that we give a certain amount to the Oka band council every year. We simply continue to pay. You, however, will continue to pay the bills when things go sour, and also when we decide that things are taking a turn for the worse.

I think that Quebec's $79 million claim for these expenses is quite legitimate. And I think that the Quebec government did the right thing during that crisis by putting the Quebec provincial police between the two factions that wanted to have a go at each other.

They always fall back on the argument that things will be monitored by the auditor general, that senior officials will sit down together and keep an eye on things. I think that the problem is on the federal side. We should appoint an auditor general who is above everyone and can check on the conduct of this department, which not only increases or eases the pressure as needed, but also perpetuates through dilatory tactics the financial confrontation between Quebec and Canada. That is the problem. The federal side does not want to settle the problem.

Whenever we present them with a bill, it is quite normal for them to tell us, "Let us sit down together and look at this with our officials". What Ms. Beaudoin wanted was a political settlement. She wanted to meet with the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and settle this bill once and for all. However, the minister's solution is, as always, to perpetuate the problem. He says that the matter will be considered, that his senior officials, his faithful servants, will meet with us, but he refuses to settle the problem. The federal government will not settle the problem. So we are always caught in an ongoing financial confrontation with the government, and this confrontation may go on if a motion like this one is not adopted. Today's motion has launched a broad debate in which we are trying to convince the people opposite that they must pay their bills and settle their accounts.

I now move on to James Bay. We know about their open mindedness. The minister gave us a very good presentation on what is happening in Quebec in terms of culture. I could give a presentation, but I would rather answer the questions of Quebecers waiting for $300 million from the federal government. I could talk about the Naskapi, the Cree, the Inuit for hours, but that is not the subject of today's debate.

Neither is the fact that we always have to wait for money—taxpayers' money, of course, as my colleague pointed out earlier—from the federal government. We cannot say that the federal government does not give any money. It must give some. Because they are the trustees of Canada's aboriginal people, they must provide these people with a minimum standard of living. I do not deny that the federal government has given money for that purpose. So has the Quebec government.

• (1325)

Let me quote statistics showing that, as far as education is concerned, the Quebec government did not rely on the federal government. Otherwise, I think the James Bay Cree would have been in a really bad position.

How does it work up there? There are three school boards; the Cree, the Inuit and the Naskapi each have their own. Costs sharing was on the basis of a gentleman's agreement.

Here is how costs were shared at the time. I have the table before me. I read that, for the Cree–Naskapi, the Quebec government was to pay 25 per cent of the costs involved, and the federal government, 75 per cent. For the Inuit, the percentages were reversed, with the Quebec government paying 75 per cent, and the federal government, 25 per cent. We, in Quebec, care about native education. I cannot give you the exact figures, only the conclusions drawn from these statistics.

In terms of language retention, the Cree, Inuit and Naskapi do better on average than natives in the rest of Canada. By language, I do not mean French or English, but their native tongue, which is Cree. Their language retention rate is clearly higher than in the rest of Canada and we have Quebec and the James Bay agreement to thank for that, for this agreement is a model in Canada and several aboriginal nations used it as a basis for negotiating with the federal government. I might add that the federal government often refers to this agreement because, as I said, it is a model.

Enrolment rates are also higher than for other native groups in Canada. As for health, because they are more educated—this is an important consideration—aboriginal people have an infant mortality rate lower than the Canadian average. The life expectancy in these three groups is higher than in the rest of the native community in Canada. We can say that as far as the Cree, the Inuit and the Naskapi are concerned, the Government of Quebec has taken its responsibilities.

The government never accepted to sign the agreement—it is a gentleman's agreement—and things went well until 1987. Starting in 1987, the basis of calculation changed drastically. Indexation was introduced, but without taking into account the birth rate, which, incidentally, is twice that found in the rest of Canada. Aboriginal peoples are currently a very strong drain on the budget. The problem is easy to understand. The aboriginal population is growing twice as fast as that of the rest of Canada.

With regard to adult education, it was found that a whole generation—and that is true everywhere in Canada—of aboriginal children were removed from their families and taken far away, in an attempt to make them forget their culture and their language. A whole generation, the one which preceded us, of aboriginals completely missed the boat in terms of their culture, their language, their recognition as a people and, of course, their education.

There is some catching up to do regarding adult education in Quebec's far north, and these people are working on that. There is also an increased demand for services such as daycare, etc. Aboriginal people in the far north have access to the latest technology and knowledge, which allows them to have very adequate education conditions, compared to the rest of Canada.

What is the federal government's reaction? It says that it will pay back, but based on an indexation criteria, instead of complying with the terms of the convention in effect at the time. This government does not intend to pay its share in the current year.

The finance minister's budget does not allocate any money to repay the federal government's share under the James Bay agreements. Earlier, the minister said that the government gave $450 million. I want to correct him. He made a small mistake. The amount is in fact $465 million. The government gave more than the minister said it did. The problem is that if the original agreements had been respected, the federal government would have had to pay $584 million. This shortfall of $119 million is what we are claiming today.

I would like to quote another minister of the Quebec Liberal government of the time, who is now the Minister of Labour in this government.

• (1330)

With three minutes left, I have just enough time to explain what the education minister of the Quebec Liberal government was doing back then. She too was waltzing with the federal government. She took over from Claude Ryan, her colleague responsible for public security, and sent her deputy ministers to Ottawa with this message: "Listen, this does not make any sense in the education sector. You have to pay us back". A number of meetings were held but, of course, the federal government did nothing.

My conclusion is what could Quebec do? What could the Quebec government do, given the federal government's negligence and inertia? Should we follow the example of the Blood Indians and the Blackfoot nation I visited in Central Canada and tell young aboriginals: "Sorry, we do not have the money this year, so you will not be sent to school". We did not do that. Even if the federal government is not paying its share, Quebecers have decided to support the rights of native peoples in Quebec, and young aboriginals are going to school.

Lack of funds will not prevent a single child in northern Quebec from going to school. The Quebec government has decided to take on this responsibility. What were we supposed to do in Oka? Withdraw all police forces and let people fight? We had a ethical vision of our responsibilities, and the Quebec provincial police assumed a commendable attitude throughout the crisis, trying to prevent such fighting. Having said that, I would ask the federal government to abide by this gentlemen's agreement. Up to now, this side of the House has behaved in a gentlemanly way. I hope members opposite with the same mindset will keep their promise and pay what they owe to Quebecers.

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me a few minutes to reply and maybe put a question to the member opposite. While listening not only to that member of the official opposition but to all the members of the official opposition today, I kept wondering if we were living in the same world. I must tell you that, sometimes, I think I am dreaming.

Today, these people are really speaking against Quebec's interests. They claim they want to protect the interests of the province of Quebec, but in fact they are trying to fool the people in Quebec, who are mature enough not to fall into the totally partisan trap the Bloc Quebecois has set.

The official opposition is asking the federal government to act irresponsibly, but this could have serious consequences at the political level. As the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs said clearly this morning in the House, he has to manage the public funds, a good part of which comes from Quebec taxpayers. As a Quebecer, I am entitled to expect governments to efficiently manage public funds and also to maximize their benefits and manage them in the best interests of the population.

This is exactly what the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs is doing. He oversees the sound and responsible management of the public funds in the best interests of the Canadian population and also, needless to say, in the best interests of the people of Quebec. The minister told us this morning that he did everything he could. He helped Quebec as much as he could by providing advance funds. Basically what I would like to ask the member of the official opposition is this: From what I understand in the motion before the House, would he rather see the federal government act irresponsibly and foolishly and waste the taxpayers' money? I do not think that would be in the best interests of the province of Quebec.

When we look a little more closely at this motion tabled by the Bloc Quebecois, we find once again, and it could not be any clearer, that the members of this party are not defending the interests of the people of Quebec in general, but that they are—and I will have the opportunity to come back to this later today—putting forward their own agenda, which is the separation of Quebec.

I believe that the situation or the problem is clear: we have a responsible government versus people whose aim is complete negligence. When we look at the situation, and I am a Quebecer, the answer is clear. It is obvious that I support the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs whose aim is, first and foremost, sound management of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Bachand: Madam Speaker, my colleague for Outremont is probably dreaming. He said so himself. I think it is just wishful thinking. As for us, we are having a nightmare listening to such remarks from a member who comes from Quebec. I would ask him to go back to his riding and ask his constituents, who also pay taxes to the federal government, if they agree that these services should be paid for by the Quebec government alone.

Can his constituents and mine say that they will give Ottawa $300 million less to pay this bill? The present system does not allow it. Therefore, it is Quebec which must pay and which comes up short. I find it sad that a member from Quebec would make such remarks.

The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs is really acting in the public interest. I think he is acting in Ottawa's interest and that, as a member from Quebec, he is forgetting that, when the people of a province pay taxes to the federal government, they are entitled to certain services in return. That is what today's debate is all about.

We claim, with good reason, that Quebec was willing to honour this gentlemen's agreement but that the federal government has not honoured it. It owes Quebec $300 million and it must pay its bills. That is what it must do in the public interest. It has been five years in one instance and eight years in the other that all audits have been completed. Now the time has come to pay, and we are asking the federal government to do so.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Madam Speaker, today's debate covers a broad range of federal government activities, and this interjection shows how desperately the Bloc Quebecois is trying to bolster support for the scenario rejected by a majority of the citizens of Quebec.

The Bloc is obviously hoping to discredit the federal government, but to no avail, for we are seeing a boomerang effect here again today. In fact, this debate provides an opportunity to appreciate the extent of the federal government's prerogatives and responsibilities.

One of these responsibilities is addressed through the fiscal stabilization program created under the federal–provincial fiscal arrangements and Federal Post–secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. The purpose of the stabilization program is to provide protection to provinces in the event of extreme downturns in economic activity.

More specifically, provinces faced with a year–over–year decline in revenues due to a downturn in the economy, such as the last recession, have access to financial assistance, subject to specific rules set out in the act.

[English]

The compensation authorized by the stabilization legislation is based on the province's year over year absolute decline in a province's eligible revenues subject to three constraints. First, changes made by the province in the rate or in the structure of its provincial taxes must be factored out when measuring revenue declines. The program compensates for revenue declines due to business cycles and not for declines due to provincial decisions to reduce taxes arbitrarily.

• (1340)

Second, declines in resource revenues are subject to stabilization only if and to the extent that the annual decline exceeds 50 per cent. Third, since 1987–1988 the maximum grant payable to a province is limited to $60 per provincial resident. Assistance above that limit is at the discretion of the Minister of Finance and would take the form of an interest free loan. The litmus test in assessing eligibility to the stabilization program is whether there is or was a drop in revenues due to general economic conditions.

The stabilization legislation and regulations provide very detailed rules about how to measure provincial revenues and how to adjust for changes in taxation. It is these very same rules that were applied consistently in dealing with all provincial applications as the act requires us so to do.

Stabilization is a program for exceptionally hard times, which explains why only three provinces have received federal stabilization payments up to 1990. British Columbia received $174 million for the fiscal year 1982–83; Alberta, $419 million for fiscal year 1986–87; and Ontario received $227 million for 1990–91.

In order to be considered for stabilization payments, a province must make a claim to the federal Minister of Finance not later than 18 months after the end of the year to which the claim should be applied.

[Translation]

Last December 7, the Minister of Finance, Paul Martin, announced payments totalling $782.4 million in response to applications from the provinces under the stabilization program, including $418 million for fiscal year 1991–92.

These were final payments for 1991–92 in the case of seven applications, and interim payments for 1992–93 in the case of five applications.

Despite all the insidious and unfounded insinuations of the Bloc Quebecois, these applications were processed according to the letter and the intent of the fiscal stabilization program legislation. All provinces were put on the same footing.

The Bloc Quebecois has implied that the federal government used delaying tactics in settling Quebec's claims.

I urge the hon. member who moved the motion before the House today to ask his own leader about the meaning of the term "delaying", since he is an expert on the subject.

[English]

With regard to the 1991–92 fiscal year, the Minister of Finance made final payments to five provinces: Newfoundland, $3.1 million; Nova Scotia, $55 million; Prince Edward Island, $5 million; Ontario, $284.4 million; and Manitoba, $42.9 million.

The claims made by two additional provinces, Saskatchewan and Quebec, were found not valid under this rule set out in the act.

[Translation]

Quebec's application for 1991–92 was not approved because there had been no decline in revenue due to the business cycle, which meant that according to the regulations, there could be no compensation. That is all.

There was no question of unfair treatment, political intrigue or partisanship.

The Minister of Finance also has the authority under the legislation to make interim payments to a province where applications are supported by currently available data.

For instance, on December 7, 1994, the finance minister announced that interim payments be made to five provinces based on fiscal year 1992–93, which included $125 million for Quebec. In this case Quebec's application was valid, and the federal government paid.

• (1345)

I dare the Bloc Quebecois to make the same fuss about the payment made to the Government of Quebec for 1992–93 that it made to discredit the federal government concerning payments for the fiscal year 1991–92.

In concluding, decisions by the Minister of Finance on all provincial applications for stabilization are made in accordance with the legislation and regulations. Furthermore, they treat all provinces in a manner that is consistent and fair. These decisions are final.

The stabilization legislation does not provide for arbitration mechanisms. If Quebec wants to challenge the legality of the federal decision, it has one recourse: to appeal before the courts.

Those who call this courtroom federalism do not know what they are talking about. This year, the Government of Canada will pay about $11.7 billion in federal transfer payments to the Province of Quebec. That is what I call constructive and positive federalism.

I will vote against the motion of the Bloc Quebecois because it denies the facts and adds absolutely nothing constructive to this debate.

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Madam Speaker, we are speaking today on the opposition motion of the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead regarding Quebec's financial demands. This should not be the greatest surprise we in the House have ever had when speaking to a Bloc supply motion on Quebec's financial demands, especially for those of us who come from Alberta, British Columbia or Ontario who have been well versed in Quebec's financial demands for quite some time.

The motion we are debating is at the core of discussions concerning why the Bloc is in Parliament in the first place. It is a sad situation. The vast majority of Canadians look to Canada as a home and a federation of 10 provinces because we are Canadians. We do not boil the reasons for being Canadian down to the bottom line on a balance sheet asking what is in it for us.

Many times when members of Parliament are debating in committee the Bloc Quebecois—in fairness it is doing exactly what it said it would do—is thinking solely about any policy or law as it directly relates to Quebec. The question for them is always how to protect what we have already while at the same time perhaps getting a little more, wanting complete independence but ensuring we get all the support we have had in the past and what we may want in the future.

• (1350)

To be spending a day of debate in the House on this motion is not a major surprise. The Reform Party came to Parliament with basically one overriding priority, to put the financial affairs of the nation right. The overriding priority of many people who supported the Reform Party and I am sure the government and the Bloc as well was to get our financial affairs in order.

That should still be the number one priority of Parliament. It must be the number one overriding priority of our colleagues from the Bloc.

When I say financial affairs I mean everyone in Canada including in Quebec. Unless we get our financial affairs in order what will we be left with? What is the point of having an independent bankrupt Quebec? There is absolutely no point in it. The whole notion of splitting the country and expecting the haves to have the same critical mass and to be as successful as we are as a combined unit is crazy.

There are areas which would benefit right off the bat, for instance those parts which have through equalization payments been pouring billions of dollars eastward, much of which found a home in Quebec for many years. We are not talking about sovereignty association, we are not talking about splitting up the marriage but retaining bedroom privileges. We are talking about a new house, a new street, the whole shebang. Would the people of Quebec think for one minute that equalization payments or transfer payments from the rest of the country would continue to flow into Quebec? Of course not.

Conversely, all the benefits Quebec brings to the country would also be denied the rest of the country. That is how we would be hurt dramatically by this notion of our colleagues and friends from the Bloc who would want to take Quebec out of Canada.

I have been talking about the financial implications because it is the gist of the Bloc's motion, the financial implications of Quebec in Canada. The bias of the motion, the bias of the Bloc is it wants to make darn sure it will get more out of it and not lose anything even if it splits.

If we go beyond the bottom line on the balance sheet and talk about what will happen to the country if Quebec takes a hike, the costs will be far more than financial. It will cost us a tonne in terms of our own sense of self–worth. It will cost us dramatically in terms of what it means and what it is to be a Canadian, the culture we share together. That we have been able to nurture in an island the French fact in North America in a sea of almost 300 million people, that we have a vibrant, strong, successful, exciting Quebec and French culture here in our midst would be lost.

A separate Quebec would find itself very quickly becoming far more worldly in its outlook and far more accommodating to speak the language of whomever would come in to spend money.

• (1355)

Since I have been living part time in Ottawa I have, as often as possible, taken the occasion to vacation and spend weekends in Quebec, particularly in Montreal. I have come to cherish the time I spend there. A couple of weekends ago one of my sons visited from Vancouver. I am trying to persuade him to go to university in Montreal. I want him to have a sense of what our country is all about. Quebec and the French fact and the Quebecois are so vitally a part of our collectivity as a nation I feel if he did not partake in that he would be losing something in his life.

He lives in Vancouver. We went to Montreal and he had some trepidation because although he has taken French in school for about nine years he cannot speak a word of French. If we do not use it we cannot learn it. He wondered how he would be received as an English speaking Canadian. He is 17 and he was a little nervous about it. Every experience he has had and I have had has been one of complete comfort. People bend over backwards to be accommodating, kind and generous.

That weekend in Quebec turned his mind around. I wonder how many unilingual French speaking people in Quebec who have travelled to other parts of Canada have been treated with the same compassion, understanding, care and politeness. I wonder if we could get more people to look beyond the balance sheet of what it is to be a Canadian and to look at the value of what English Canada and Quebec bring to this united body.

I ask Bloc members to consider what I have said as this great debate unfolds.

GM RETIREES

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to welcome to Ottawa several GM retirees and their spouses. They have come from Niagara to visit the House of Commons and the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull and to enjoy the hospitality of our nation's capital.

My former colleagues and friends, some of whom are veterans, have come to join in the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the end of the second world war and to enjoy the magnificent tulip festival.

Today I pay tribute to the GM retirees and their spouses and wish them all the best during their visit here in Ottawa.

QUEBEC WOMEN'S MARCH

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on May 26, women of Quebec will go on a long march, which will end up in Quebec City. Hundreds of women from every community and every region of Quebec will gather to repeat the action taken by American women factory workers at the turn of the century.

Their slogan was: Bread and roses. The women of Quebec will use the same slogan this year. The bread represents the need to work and the roses, quality of life. The women will remind the people of Quebec of these two essentials.

To help them achieve financial equity, women are demanding a social infrastructure program, jobs, social housing and real access to programs providing general training and job training.

The Bloc Quebecois congratulates the women of Quebec on their initiative and wishes them a successful march.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the justice minister has been stonewalling Patrick Kelly's application to review his case for a year and a half.

Kelly, a former RCMP officer, is in jail for allegedly killing his wife but now the key witness admits that she lied on the stand. The review of Kelly's case has dragged on and now the justice minister wants Kelly's lawyer, Clayton Ruby, to sign a gag order before documents key to Kelly's case will be released.

The justice minister said:

> We will disclose all of those records that are relevant to the issues raised in the application and that will be done.

Now the minister is placing roadblocks in front of Kelly's lawyer.

Why the secrecy? The information being withheld from Mr. Kelly was collected at public expense by a public agency for use in a public prosecution. What are the Liberals trying to hide and what is in the documents that the Liberals are afraid of?

Why is there no justice in Mr. Kelly's case?

CHINESE CANADIAN ASSOCIATION OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to welcome to Ottawa the hon. Darlene Marzari, B.C. TERRORISM

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, within every cloud there is a silver lining.

Over the past few weeks we have all been exposed to the realities of terrorism. The Oklahoma City tragedy has forced us to realize that terrorism can happen even in North America.

I am happy to say that two women in my riding did not just sit back in the wake of the bombing. Janice Koekebakker and Linda Mathews, nurses in Woodstock, Ontario, spent a week in Oklahoma City providing first aid treatment and consoling rescue workers. The city of Woodstock and the Woodstock Rotary Club should also be commended for helping to offset the expenses of these fine nurses.

The London Free Press wrote in its recent editorial honouring these two nurses: "There are things all of us can do if we just decide to do them". These women realized that there was something they could do and they were able to provide an important service in a difficult time.

I thank these women on behalf of all of us.

THE LATE HECTOR TOE BLAKE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I pay tribute to Hector Toe Blake who died yesterday in Montreal. Toe was the greatest and most successful hockey coach in the history of the National Hockey League. He was also a great leftwinger.

As a coach he won eight Stanley Cups in 13 seasons. As a player he played for 15 seasons with the Montreal Maroons and with the Canadiens. He was on three Stanley Cup teams, one with the Maroons and two with the Canadiens.

He won the scoring championship and Hart Trophy in 1938–39 and the Lady Byng Trophy in 1945–46. He was a leftwinger on the punch line with Rocket Richard and Elmer Lach, one of the most colourful and prolific scoring combinations in hockey history.

He was named to the Hall of Fame in 1966, was on the first All Star team as a player three times, on the second All Star team as a player twice, and as coach of the All Star team nine times.

Toe Blake will be missed and long remembered in Montreal. I think all Canadians will pay him tribute on this sad day.

CHECHNYA

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister's discussions with President Yeltsin, the Russian army has been relentlessly bombarding Chechen positions and is continuing to bomb civilian populations.

In an effort to have done with the Chechens once and for all, the Russian army is preparing to launch its elite corps in a final assault against Chechnya. We have a hard time understanding how the Prime Minister could say he was confident that the army had already been replaced by the regular Chechen police force, as President Yeltsin had assured him.

The Prime Minister claims he put pressure on his Russian counterpart, but he also said that his first priority was trade. Today we are seeing the results. In addition to undermining Canada's credibility, the government's double talk leads nowhere.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the situation in the former Yugoslavia has deteriorated to the point where it is surely time for Canada to take action which reflects the reality there.

The Prime Minister says that Canadians do not cut and run when the going gets tough. Reform supports that stance. We know that Canadian troops have proven this many times over the years in support of worthwhile causes.

Is it not time to consider the worthiness of the cause in Bosnia and Croatia? What we have there are three antagonists who show no interest whatsoever in achieving a peaceful resolution of their differences. Rather than having a positive influence, the UN has proven to be either a toothless tiger or perhaps has even become part of the problem.

Others may have larger forces there but Canada's contribution has been substantial, competent and reliable. Rather than sheep following the French and British ram, is it not time for Canada to lead by stating that unless there is immediate, unequivocal and verifiable movement toward peace the Canadian forces will commence preparations to withdraw from the region?

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and its Quebec counterpart issued a study concluding that Quebec benefits greatly from interprovincial trade. It shows that in Quebec, 470,000 jobs depend directly on interprovincial trade. Given these findings, it is disconcerting to see that the Bloc Quebecois and the PQ are still adamantly pursuing Quebec's separation, regardless of the huge economic impact such a course of action might have.

Canada is financially advantageous not only for Quebec, but also for all the other provinces. The recent signing of an interprovincial trade agreement by the ten premiers opens new opportunities for this important sector of Quebec economy. The Canadian economic union already exists and it has proven to be extremely advantageous for Quebec. There is no need to jeopardize everything for the sake of satisfying the sovereignist aspirations of the Bloc and the PQ.

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois has finally yielded to pressures from the powerful gun lobby. Yesterday the Bloc critic on justice issues, the member of Parliament for Saint–Hubert, stated:

"Unfortunately, as soon as the topic of firearms comes up, males get excited and agitated—And since women are not the majority in the Bloc, male members put a lot of pressure on the caucus".

And yet, it should be pointed out that the Bloc Quebecois was committed to supporting the bill, as mentioned by the Bloc member for Saint–Hubert, on May 6, and I quote: "It is a good bill which provides for the registration and control of firearms". Women in Quebec will be very disappointed to learn that the Bloc does not take into account their views which are overwhelmingly in favour of Bill C–68.

WINNIPEG JETS

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is doing an about–face in the issue of the building of a new sport arena in Winnipeg. Two weeks ago, Ottawa did not have any money to help the Jets. Suddenly, the Minister of Human Resources Development seems to have discovered plenty of it in several federal programs.

There is no doubt that the pretext of the infrastructure program is simply a smoke–screen for an inescapable reality: Ottawa is about to give several millions of dollars of taxpayers' money to the Winnipeg Jets, and never thought about lifting one finger to help the Quebec Nordiques. There has never been such double standard before. It is obvious that the only thing flexible about Canadian federalism is fairness.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, imagine a place in which democratically elected members of a legislature are not allowed to propose changes to a law. Imagine then that they are not allowed to speak to the proposals of others and if they protest they are summarily cut off by the majority. Imagine a legislative body taking decisions without votes or ignoring long established rules of procedure in order to deny minority groups the right to be heard. Imagine a member of this minority group daring to challenge and oppose such autocratic rulings only to have the majority further restrict his rights by denying him the opportunity to even ask questions.

These types of governments exist around the world. We know that oppressive governments sometimes use the tools of democracy to choke off reasoned debate even while spouting false words about democracy and goodwill.

This kind of situation would be condemned by all members. I only wish we were describing a third world country, but I am talking about the standing committee on human rights and what it did last night.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE ASSOCIATION

Mr. Ivan Grose (Oshawa, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that everyone from Oshawa is in the nation's capital. It makes me wonder who is minding the store.

I am proud to acknowledge the presence in the nation's capital today of members of 420 Wing, the Royal Canadian Air Force Association from Oshawa, an organization of which I am a proud member.

Some of the members here today have just returned from V–E Day ceremonies in Europe. Incidentally they tell me that our Prime Minister was the hit of the show in Holland and literally moved everyone to tears. These are the men and women of Canada whose sense of duty, dedication and love of their country made that long ago victory possible.

We in the House would do well to exhibit the same patriotism and loyalty to this country that my friends and comrades showed in their youth and in truth to this day.

I will close with an admonition to all of us that was given to the airman son by his anxious mother: "My son, fly low and slow".

TULIP FESTIVAL

Mr. Charles Hubbard (Miramichi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this week in Ottawa we celebrate the Canadian Tulip Festival. It commemorates our friendship with the Netherlands and the important role that Canadians played during the dark years of World War II.

This month thousands of Canadians travelled to Holland. They participated in celebrations commemorating the liberation of Holland in 1945. They were welcomed into the homes, villages and cities by appreciative Dutch families.

Liberty and freedom are taken for granted in Canada. In Holland it is sincerely appreciated. The veterans who returned were received as liberators who restored freedom for those who had lived five long years under Nazi rule.

Canadian veterans, along with the Secretary of State for Veterans, visited Canadian war cemeteries and paid their respects to the many young Canadians who lost their lives in the struggle. Only those who were in Holland for the ceremonies could truly appreciate the tremendous respect, gratitude and emotion the Dutch people have for their Canadian liberators.

ONTARIO ELECTION

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people of Ontario have suffered throughout the nineties. They bore the full brunt of the recession and their troubles were compounded by an inexperienced, inept, high spending provincial government.

Do members know that the NDP government in Ontario continued to try to spend its way out of the recession two years longer than any other government? It doubled the provincial debt so that Ontarians now pay 20 cents of every tax dollar for interest. Now the NDP is trying to blame the federal government for its problems. We maintained the level of provincial transfers for our first two years in office. We have given all provincial governments ample notice about changes we intend to make.

Ontario needs a new government, a government which is caring and competent. Ontario cannot afford to try another inexperienced party. We cannot afford to stay with the NDP. We must have a Liberal government in Ontario after the upcoming election.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the multinational Dow Corning filed for bankruptcy protection, effectively cutting off another avenue for Canadian women seeking compensation for faulty silicone gel breast implants.

Despite the injury caused to Canadian women and the cost to taxpayers, the federal government has never filed suit against the manufacturers of these devices and continues to allow the use of saline breast implants; another disaster waiting to happen.

The federal government must act now and respond to breast implant support groups who have urged the minister to provide core funding to help them organize, to disseminate information, to make sure that physicians are required to inform women about the risk of implants, and to develop a national protocol for the removal of faulty implants.

• (1415)

Canadian women want action and deserve action. The government must respond now. It must no longer accept this serious health risk to women.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, many times the justice minister has claimed support from frontline police officers for his firearm control bill.

I would like to draw to the justice minister's attention that times have changed. The minister must be caught in a time warp. Not only have Canadians failed to support his firearm control measures but the very frontline police officers he often mentions are strongly opposed to his bill.

The frontline officers of Saskatchewan are against the bill, as are those of Manitoba and Alberta. We all know the Yukon and Northwest Territories authorities are against the bill. The police association stated it had many concerns with the bill. The Canadian Bar Association and aboriginals state the bill is unconstitutional. And today New Brunswick jumped on the bandwagon.

We have been told many times that many in his party are against his bill. They did not bother to come around to vote last time. Now the truth has been spoken I trust we will no longer hear that the minister has full support for his Bill C–68.

NATIONAL INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is about to invest $20 million in public funds to give Winnipeg a new arena, just to keep the Jets in Winnipeg. Unfortunately, Ottawa has never shown the slightest interest in getting involved to keep the Nordiques in Quebec City. Once again, the double standard rears its ugly head.

How can the Prime Minister use the Infrastructure Program to justify paying $20 million to the Winnipeg Jets, when according to our information, more than 90 per cent of that money has already been spent or committed, leaving only $6 million in the bank?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have an infrastructure program, and any decisions made under this program are made jointly by the municipalities involved and by the provincial government.

When we introduced the first Infrastructure Program, the Quebec government and Quebec City decided to build a convention centre in Quebec City, and the federal government invested $26 million. At the time, people said they might need an arena. The mayor of Quebec City, as reported in the media this morning, said no, Quebec City's priority was a convention centre.

In the case of Winnipeg and the Government of Manitoba, $15 million had not been allocated, and they asked us to allocate them for the building an infrastructure in Winnipeg, an arena.

There are several precedents in this respect. In Alberta, the government decided to invest $5 million in the arena in Edmonton and $4 million in the arena in Calgary, all federal money.

We respect provincial jurisdictions. We make the money available to the various governments. A total of $15 million comes from the Infrastructure Program. As we all know, the Pan–American Games will be held in Winnipeg two years from now, and they need certain facilities, so they want to combine the facilities for the Pan–American Games with the possibility to build an arena. So if the city and the province want a new infrastructure, they can take the money that is there. There is no new money for this program. This is money allocated to Manitoba which had not yet been distributed.

• (1420)

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister confirm that the $20 million Ottawa will give in direct assistance to the Winnipeg Jets is well in excess of what is available under the Infrastructure Program and will impinge, as he himself said, on the budget set aside for the Pan–American Games, although none of the disciplines at these games will require a coliseum or an arena of the kind that is going to be built, and that the money will also come from the Western Economic Diversification Office headed by his minister, the member from Winnipeg?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just made it very clear that the $15 million comes out of the money allocated to the Province of Manitoba. The province decides, as was the case in Quebec and Ontario. Ontario built a brand new convention centre; it also built a new cultural centre in Mississauga; Vancouver used all the allocated money for a new water treatment system. All these decisions were made by the provincial governments.

In the case of Manitoba, the province decided to use the money available to build a new infrastructure, a new arena, just like Edmonton and Calgary decided to invest substantial amounts in improving the arenas in Edmonton and Calgary.

There is no double standard here. There is only one standard; this money comes out of the budget. We respect the preferences of the provincial governments. In the case of Quebec City, Mayor L'Allier made it clear that he was not interested in an arena. He wanted a convention centre, and they will get their convention centre.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, people remember how the Minister of Industry insisted on a business plan when the time came to invest money in MIL Davie in Quebec City. And how he insisted!

Before the government—which is broke, in any case—invests more than $20 million in public funds in the Winnipeg Jets, could the Prime Minister tell us whether his government insisted that the Winnipeg Jets submit a business plan, to ensure this money is not wasted, and that the Jets provide guarantees that they will not leave within the next three years?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with the provincial government and the municipal government, we are investing in an infrastructure which is an arena. We are not investing any money in the hockey team, certainly not.

The private sector in Winnipeg has decided to raise funds to buy the hockey team. We do not know whether they succeeded. In any case, the Premier of Manitoba and the mayor of Winnipeg decided that the money allocated for Winnipeg and for the Province of Manitoba would be used to build a new infrastructure, an arena.

In Quebec City, they opted for a convention centre. In Vancouver, they decided to invest in a water treatment plant. We respect the priorities of the provincial governments, but we know that, if construction is going on, people are working, and that is money well spent. That is why we introduced this infrastructure program, which, by the way, has been a huge success in Canada.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if this money is not for the Winnipeg Jets but only for an arena, the Prime Minister will surely not tell us that it is for the free skating sessions on Saturday nights.

The federal government has decided to provide a direct $20 million subsidy for building this arena, for the sole purpose of allowing the city to keep the Jets franchise. This announcement came right after the Quebec Nordiques turned down the Quebec government's proposal.

How does the minister explain the federal government's sudden eagerness to help the Winnipeg Jets, even taking money from outside the infrastructure budget, the day after the Nordiques' owners rejected the Quebec government's proposal, when Ottawa never expressed its intention to assist the Nordiques?

• (1425)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think that, with respect to the Quebec government's proposal to the Nordiques, no one asked us to invest in an arena as we are doing in Winnipeg. Even back in January, the first project we approved was a convention centre for Quebec City, in which we invested $26 million and which led to accusations by the Reform Party that we acted too quickly for the benefit of Quebec City.

Mayor L'Allier is reported in today's press as saying that Quebec City's priority is not an arena but a convention centre. And we respected the wish of Quebec City's separatist mayor. I wonder why the members of the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois are against our respecting the wish of Quebec City's separatist mayor.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, $5 million was taken from the Pan-American Games budget, even though Winnipeg maintained that it had all the facilities needed for these games. The situation seems to have changed overnight. The Prime Minister has just given us the reason: separatists. This always gets a rise out of the Prime Minister.

I would like the Prime Minister to admit frankly that the $20 million aid package to the Jets had been planned for a while and that his government waited for the Nordiques' owners to reject the Quebec government's proposal to make a public announcement so that it would not have to provide the same kind of assistance to the Nordiques.

[English]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have not received one letter or one phone call from anybody from Quebec in the case of the Nordiques. Never. There was no timing arranged for that.

The people of Winnipeg and the business people of Winnipeg might or might not buy the hockey team. The city of Winnipeg and the premier of Manitoba have decided to take the money allocated for infrastructure for Manitoba and put it into an arena, exactly like the city of Edmonton, exactly like the city of Calgary. The city of Vancouver decided to invest its money in a sewage treatment plant. The city of Toronto is investing in a conference centre. The city of Mississauga is investing in an arts centre.

We respect the will of the citizens of Canada. What is wrong with that? We are flexible enough to listen to all the premiers of Canada.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal red book promised that the government would move full steam ahead on aboriginal self–government and on resolving outstanding land claims. As predicted, this has led to unrealistic expectations on the part of Indian bands, particularly in British Columbia.

Currently a huge percentage of B.C.'s land mass is claimed by natives but the provincial government says it is only willing to negotiate on 5 per cent and that self–government will not extend beyond the powers enjoyed by municipalities.

Will the minister of Indian affairs now admit that his failure to set realistic parameters for land claim negotiations and self–government is feeding these unrealistically high expectations and it is high time for him to correct these failures?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister treats this frivolously but he is headed for a disaster in aboriginal relations in the province of British Columbia.

Even his officials recognize that the federal government has raised band expectations to unmanageable levels while keeping the rest of the B.C. community in the dark. Despite memos from the deputy minister and appeals from the Assembly of First Nations, he stubbornly refuses to provide aboriginal groups and Canadians with any limits on the federal position on land claims or self–government.

I ask the minister again. Will he provide realistic guidelines for land claim negotiations and aboriginal self–government at least for the province of British Columbia?

• (1430)

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premise of the question. The issue of how much land, which is what we are talking about, will be provided to the First Nations is primarily a provincial responsibility since most of the available land is in the name of the provinces.

The offer, or the leaked offer because I have not seen it, by the province of B.C. is a question of a quantum of land. When the aboriginal people of B.C. get the offer they will respond to it and we will respond to it. But right now we provide money, the provinces provide land and that is their provincial responsibility.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in its land claim negotiation paper the British Columbia government goes beyond land. It says that privately owned land will not be on the table. It says that aboriginal self–government will be restricted to municipal–like powers. It says that status Indians should lose provincial and federal tax exemptions once their land claims are settled.

Does the minister agree with the positions being taken by the Government of British Columbia on these issues and if not, what is the federal position?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the issue of privately owned land, we have been consistent across this country to protect privately owned land and we try to compensate in those cases.

On the issue of taxes I find it passing strange that a province would make an offer on what is clearly our jurisdiction. I have made it clear to the province that the matter of taxation has to be solved with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue and Parliament at a national level.

As far as the question of status is concerned, this is something we are always negotiating. The leader of the Reform Party must realize that status is very important to aboriginal people for very legitimate reasons.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

In an effort to reduce the debt of Canadian National, thus making it easier to privatize, the government is apparently about to buy this company's real estate assets, including the famous

CN Tower in Toronto. These would be purchased at a price higher than their true market value, to help CN bring its debt down from $2.5 billion to $1.5 billion.

How can the Minister of Transport justify his government's decision to invest considerable public funds in buying real estate assets already paid for by Canadian taxpayers?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's premise is completely wrong. It is not the government's intention to pay anything for the real estate assets of CN that will not be transferred at the time of the issue. We have said that with the Department of Finance we will negotiate an arrangement to give CN a credit for the market value of any residual real estate assets.

The hon. member will know that the objective of the government is to try to put Canadian National railways out into the private sector in a condition that will allow it to operate in the same environment as Canadian Pacific. There will have to be some work done to reduce the $2.5 billion debt. I want to reassure my hon. friend that whatever the government does with respect to the sale of CN will be done in the very best interests of the Canadian taxpayers, both now and in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Transport confirm his government's intention not only to use public funds to buy assets already paid for by taxpayers, but also to buy these assets for more than their current market value?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member, but I understand he had his supplementary written down before he listened to the answer, there is no intention on the part of the government of giving any credit to CN that is in addition to any prior market value that would be identified.

The sale of CN is a major undertaking. We understand the opposition has agreed to it in principle. We hope we can demonstrate that on a business basis this will be done in the best interests of the Canadian taxpayer. Any evaluation of assets, real estate or otherwise, will be done on the very best basis of business and ordinary commercial practice.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, like many other Canadians, I am a fan of our national sport, hockey, but I am not a fan of taxpayer subsidies for professional sports.

The problems in Winnipeg and Quebec could be and should be solved by the NHL, not the Canadian taxpayers. Private luxury boxes and million dollar hockey players should not be subsidized by overtaxed Canadians.

How can the Prime Minister justify reallocating infrastructure dollars when hospitals are closing and Canadians are risking their lives on unsafe roads?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the infrastructure program, as I think the Prime Minister has pointed out, is based on local needs and local priorities to create jobs, strengthen the infrastructure of our communities so that we can attract additional investment dollars and provide more jobs.

The hon. member has an arena in his own constituency which also provides facilities for hockey players. He has supported infrastructure projects in his province.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the arena in Barrie was never supported by this member of Parliament at any time. The minister knows that. Arenas in Barrie, Edmonton or Winnipeg never were infrastructure, in any way.

The Minister of Industry has stated in this House that this level of government will no longer continue to subsidize business. Yet his western counterpart, the Minister of Human Resources Development, is attempting to bail out another local industry, the Winnipeg Jets.

Will the Prime Minister indicate what the policy of this government is? Is it the status quo pork barrelling of the western minister, or is it the let business thrive on its own policy of the industry minister? They cannot have it both ways. Which way is it?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, talking about having it both ways, who said: "I am writing to further offer my strong support for the project because of significant job creation?"

The project in Winnipeg will create thousands of jobs for the people of that city. It will create a great amount of economic activity. It is a priority of the city, a priority of the provincial government. Those are the rules under which we have been operating the infrastructure program.

CN RAIL

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, looking at the Liberals across the floor, one would think we were at the Winnipeg arena.

My question is for the Minister of Transport. The minister is about to privatize one of the most important federal crown corporations, without restricting foreign ownership. CN, which was established at a cost of billions of dollars in public moneys, is an invaluable asset for Canada and Quebec. Should it come under foreign control, it might not fully serve the interests of Canadians.

Will the minister admit that, by overrating CN's assets, so as to increase the market value of the corporation, he is in fact using Canadian taxpayers' money to give foreign buyers an indirect subsidy?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am truly moved by the hon. member, who is concerned about CN's future as a Canada–wide venture, from Halifax to Vancouver. At one point, I thought the member felt our government had decided not to restrict foreign investments, precisely to allow people like him, who want to achieve independence, to have an interest in that company.

• (1440)

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Minister of Transport that Quebecers contributed 25 per cent of CN's assets. The minister is not giving us anything.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: That is true. Put that in your pipe and smoke it.

Mr. Guimond: On another topic, and I hope to get an intelligent answer, will the minister agree that it is possible for a group of foreign businesses controlled by the same shareholder to buy a majority of CN's shares, thus making it impossible for the minister to ensure that CN remains under Canadian control?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the experience of Canadian Pacific which has been operating as a private shareholder driven company since the last century is such that there is no indication of any interest to the extent that we should be concerned about foreign ownership.

What I am far more worried about and what the government is concerned about is in order to have a successful issue of this size, we are of a mind and of the advice we have received both domestically and internationally that the issue is just too big for Canadian investors to take up. We feel that protection for the future of CN is really far more important in the context of our restriction on 15 per cent ownership for any individual or corporation.

The important thing here that everyone should keep in mind is this is going to be the single largest transaction of its kind in Canadian history. We are trading on a global basis. This railroad has to be competitive in the global economy. We think that restricting foreign ownership would not give the kind of signal that we believe is important, that is, that Canadians want to do business with everybody around the world. We are confident that as is the case with CP, CN will be retained in a majority way in Canadian hands.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, CBC and Cadillac Fairview have broken a deal over their lease arrangements, perhaps costing the CBC and the Canadian taxpayer up to $250 million. The actual cost remains unknown because both the CBC and the minister's office refuse to make public any of the deals of the arrangement.

My question for the Minister of Canadian Heritage is: If there is nothing to hide, will he commit to making public all of the details of this secretive deal?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there was of course an intervention by the courts. I will have to look carefully at what was decided. Eventually the transaction will have to be confirmed by an order of the governor in council. When we come to that point, I shall be pleased to answer the question.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let me continue. The CBC broadcast centre came in $138 million over budget. It was supposed to get revenues from Bramalea and Cadillac Fairview but now both companies are bankrupt. The total lease cost for the building amounts to over $1.7 billion. Now the government is poised to bail out of this $250 million fiasco.

The broadcast centre has been a financial disaster from the get go. Will the minister direct the auditor general to investigate the financing of this broadcast centre boondoggle and table the report in this Parliament?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take note of the allegations of our colleague and will give her the same answer I gave earlier. I will look into it and answer her questions.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has just told us that $15 million of the $20 million promised for the Winnipeg Jets will come from the infrastructure program in Manitoba. Information in official Treasury Board documents, however, reveals something quite different.

How can the Prime Minister say, on January 24, that in book 3 of the Treasury Board Estimates, only $6 million remained for the infrastructure program in Manitoba and talk today about $15 million? Where did the extra $9 million come from?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as regards the allocations for Manitoba, certain projects were left undeveloped, and $12 million is available at the moment.

Mr. Gauthier: So now it is $12 million. The figure is changing.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Twelve million dollars is currently available, according to the President of Treasury Board. The Government of Manitoba decided to reallocate certain approved projects, cancel them and replace them to create an additional $3 million, bringing the total to $15 million.

• (1445)

As I said earlier, the remaining $5 million will come from the money allocated for the preparation of the infrastructures needed for the Pan American Games. This adds up to the $20 million approved by the government. It has nothing to do with the hockey team. It is a matter of giving the City of Winnipeg and the Government of Manitoba their choice of priorities.

It is as if Calgary, Edmonton or the hon. member's city chose to have arenas. This was the choice of the City of Winnipeg. The mayor of Quebec City decided clearly, with the first project approved, to put all the money available to Quebec City and the region around it into a convention centre, which was already well under way. This was the local officials' priority, and we accepted it with pleasure.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the light of these latest rapid changes, how can the Prime Minister agree to reallocating $5 million earmarked for the Pan American Games to finance the Winnipeg Jets?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, clearly when you are holding the Pan American Games, you have to have the necessary equipment. The City of Winnipeg and the government of the province decided to use this opportunity to build themselves a facility to meet both requirements. This will be a good thing if it means saving some money.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

It will be remembered that, when the Saint–Jean military college was closed, certain people claimed that the closure would decrease the representation of francophones in the Canadian Forces. We all know about the budget and the white paper on national defence.

I would ask the Minister of National Defence to report to the House on the situation of francophones in the Canadian armed forces, and on their recruitment in particular.

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. member for his question. Contrary to certain allegations that the closure of the Saint–Jean military college would negatively affect the recruitment of francophones in the armed forces, I am pleased to announce that we met our recruitment objective this year for francophone officer cadets, which was 30 per cent.

This clearly shows that francophones still and will always consider a career in the Canadian forces to be worthwhile.

CULTURAL POLICY

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the American government is developing a hit list of Canadian communication and entertainment companies in retaliation for Canada's policy of cultural isolationism, a policy that has already denied Canadian country music artists a worldwide audience via country music television. Now Much Music and Teleglobe are among companies who may be sacrificed with this isolationist policy.

My question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. Can the minister deny that this government's anti–competitive cultural policies will cost Canadians jobs and Canadian country music artists worldwide exposure?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm for the hon. member that I did indeed receive a letter from the United States trade representative that indicates the intention to embark on a section 301 action against Canada if in the time immediately ahead it is not possible for us to reach agreement on the issues the hon. member has raised.

• (1450)

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we will try again with perhaps the heritage minister or the Minister of Industry.

Canadians have made it very clear: we support choice and competition. These should be the guiding principles of a cultural policy. Instead, it would appear that the Liberals favour competition when it benefits the Liberal family compact.

Why is the minister sacrificing Canadian artists, Canadian jobs, and consumer choice at the altar of Canadian cultural isolationism?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the decision to delist CMT was made by the CRTC pursuant to a long–standing CRTC policy. When CMT entered the Canadian market it was aware of the CRTC policy that it could be de–listed if a competitive Canadian service so requested. That is the rule of the game.

The follow up is naturally in the hands of the American authorities concerned. They have threatened retaliation. The minister of commerce and foreign trade has indicated that the letter from the secretary of state's Mr. Kantor received by him will be replied to in due course. However, the policy is clear.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. The official opposition checked the information network Internet and found that at least 10 federal government institutions provide information exclusively in English. Among the guilty you will find the Department of National Defence, the Royal Military College of Kingston, the Department of Industry and the Department of Natural Resources.

Does the President of the Treasury Board, who is responsible for applying the Official Languages Act, intend to take immediate action to ensure that these federal institutions and organizations start offering information in both official languages on Internet on the double?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated before in the House, we certainly intend to have the Official Languages Act and its regulations upheld. Canadians should be able to get service in the official language of their choice.

I understand the Internet primarily deals in the English language. What we need to do, in terms of ensuring that our government services are provided in both official languages, is take the necessary action to help ensure that happens.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, federal documents should be released to the public in both official languages simultaneously, not just in English and later in French whenever they have the time. We must all be treated equally. All that they have done is put a French title page in front of an English document. That is what I call a one way highway.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): In these hours following the release of the CRTC's recommendations regarding Canadian content on the information highway, is the President of the Treasury Board not ashamed to face francophones, knowing that some of the information the federal government puts on Internet is only available in English?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, there is changing technology. The government certainly is committed to moving as quickly as it can to ensure that people can have the services of this government in the official language of their choice. A great deal of progress has been made by this government to do exactly that.

I have indicated before in the House the new publications that have been brought out to assist our departments in making sure that happens, providing information to the public on where they can get service in the official language of their choice and publishing it in minority language newspapers. I can go on and on.

• (1455)

The government intends to ensure that the Official Languages Act and its regulations are followed so that Canadians can have service in the official language of their choice.

ELECTION ADVERTISING

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, you will know that the government has been appealing the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench ruling that the gag law against third party election advertising and free speech is unconstitutional.

According to recent press reports, the government's appeal in Alberta is all but being laughed out of court. Will the solicitor general save the taxpayers further expense and withdraw his appeal of the undemocratic gag law?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have found from my long experience arguing in courtrooms that it is very difficult to predict from newspaper reports what the result of a case will be.

I would caution the hon. member to be patient. We have made our submissions, and out of respect for the court I think we will await the judgment before making further comment.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this has already been defeated twice in the courts in the past.

Will the minister admit that the real reason for trying to preserve this gag law in court is the same reason as that of the previous government—that it is worried about organizations and citizens who are going to make their obscene pension plans an issue in the next federal election?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the position we advanced as counsel for the federal government was argued in the courtroom, where it should be argued. That judgment is now in reserve and I do not propose to comment on it until the court has had an opportunity to express its opinion.

However, I can tell the hon. member that the next time this government goes to the electorate it will do so very proud of the fact that it fulfilled its red book commitments with respect to pensions and every other matter.

TOURISM

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue.

Tourism is a substantial industry, worth billions of dollars to the Canadian economy. On Sunday the minister announced the opening of a new facility at the Vancouver international airport to assist foreign travellers. Would the minister tell the House how the new facility will help the economy and the thousands of cruise ship passengers travelling through Vancouver?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I certainly can.

We have approximately 700,000 cruise ship visitors coming through Vancouver. These people put millions upon millions of dollars into the economy of Vancouver. Yet I found to my surprise when I became minister that they were waiting for up to three hours at the Vancouver airport before moving down to the ship terminals.

We have a new facility in place. It is temporary until the new building is put in next year. Instead of wasting their time at the airport, the cruise ship passengers will now have the opportunity to spend their time in downtown Vancouver and spend their dollars along with it.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Indian affairs minister.

In a controversial move, Mohawks in Kanesatake are getting ready to bury two of their members in the pine grove, in Oka, on land belonging to the municipality of Oka. Meanwhile, negotiations have been suspended because their friend, Michel Robert, has been appointed to the bench.

Can the minister confirm that, for the past several years, the municipality of Oka has been offering land to the federal government—which it has not agreed to buy yet—in an effort to put an end to the tensions between itself and the Mohawk community in Kanesatake?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is potentially a very volatile situation, and with my knowledge of the hon. member I am sure he would not want to exploit it.

The situation is that two individuals, two Mohawks, drowned. The Mohawks say that there is not enough property in which to bury them and they have cleared a small plot of ground, which I think is 20 feet by 20 feet. The mayor of Oka says that it is his property. Judge Réjean Paul has been there. I think the minister of security for Quebec has looked at it. We are trying to keep a lid on it, and I think it would be highly inappropriate in the circumstances for me to comment on it. It is better done quietly and privately under the aegis of Judge Réjean Paul.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Immigration Association released a new poll that confirms that even after having broken every promise it made to Canadians on immigration, this government is still woefully out of touch.

• (1500)

Seventy–six per cent thought bogus refugees should be turned around at the border with no appeal, and the majority agreed with the Reform Party that civil servants and not politically appointed friends of the minister should determine refugee status.

Will the minister finally listen to Canadians, put their interests first and scrap the Immigration and Refugee Board?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, is it a surprise after his trip to Washington where he and his party allowed Newt Gingrich, Pat Buchanan and that great visionary Sonny Bono to dictate immigration policy? Those three want to bring the United States back to the dark ages and this member wants to hook Canadians' wagon to that. We say no thank you.

WINNIPEG JETS

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, who has been doing a lot of skating around the Winnipeg Jets issue.

Call it what you might, $20 million is being generated to rescue the Winnipeg Jets. If the government is to proceed with the rescue package would it at least consider taking an equity position in the hockey club so it will be an investment as opposed to simply turning its money over to the development of an arena which is really a black hole?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are not in the business of investing in hockey teams. We are in the business of investing in facilities. Because the city of Winnipeg wants to proceed with this project, it is quite eligible under the infrastructure works program.

The infrastructure works program has created to this point some 100,000 jobs, which is what this is about, creating jobs in our communities, strenghthening the infrastructure. That is where we have made our investment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for Parliamentary Affairs if he could tell us what the order of business will be in the House next week.

[English]

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will commence second reading of Bill C–82 regarding the mint, followed by Bill C–91 concerning the business development bank, Bill C–88 with respect to internal trade, Bill C–92 regarding the Canadian Wheat Board, Bill C–54 concerning pension administration, Bill C–75 respecting farm loans, Bill C–70 amending the Income Tax Act and Bill C–65 concerning the reorganization of certain agencies.

This will be followed by the resumption of debate on the motion to establish a special joint committee on a parliamentary code of conduct.

On Monday, May 29 if we have not completed this list we will resume at the point we left off on Friday.

Tuesday, May 30 and Thursday, June 1 shall be allotted days.

Mrs. Wayne: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, pursuant to the Thursday statement, I would like to ask the government House leader if the government intends to bring back Bill S–7, a private member's bill dealing with operating government vehicles with alternative fuels. Will he be bringing the bill back to the House for third reading to determine passage before the summer recess on June 23?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, Bill S–7 is before committee. When the committee finishes its work and reports back to the House we will be glad to look at it.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—QUEBEC'S FINANCIAL DEMANDS

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, before question period I was speaking generally about Quebec's financial demands not being a new topic for the House. In the year and half I have been here Quebec's financial demands have been front and centre every day.

It seems odd the Bloc would raise this as an opposition motion in the knowledge that Quebec has done very well by being a member of our great country over many years. It seems passing strange that it would want to leave.

It is also a tragedy that most members of the Bloc seem to think the relationship between Quebec and the rest of the country is primarily financial. To the vast majority of Canadians the relationship between Quebec and the rest of the country is far more than a financial arrangement; it is spiritual, a relationship among friends, brothers, relatives and family.

I recently introduced my son to Quebec and invited the people of Quebec and in particular members of the Bloc to venture west and east to see for themselves that Canadians are welcome in all parts of the country. Quebecers are welcome in the rest of Canada and the rest of Canada in Quebec.

Whether members of the House liked former President Reagan or not, they will appreciate that President Reagan was widely renowned for his masterful use of the media and his ability to express thoughts and put complicated thoughts into every day simple language. He was a master manipulator of the media. People have to admit that.

It was passing strange that he had a portrait of Calvin Coolidge in the cabinet room. Calvin Coolidge was regarded as the president who had perhaps a most acerbic wit. He would never say in three words what could be said in one word and was generally regarded as a man of very few words.

President Reagan had a portrait of Calvin Coolidge in the cabinet room because of Coolidge's ability to put very pithy comments in very few words. I will deal specifically with what Calvin Coolidge had to say about people, about responsibilities and how we relate together as a society and what the role of government is.

Calvin Coolidge said: "The people cannot look to legislation generally for success; industry, thrift, character are not conferred by act or resolve. Government cannot relieve from toil. It can provide no substitute for the rewards of service. It can, of course, care for those who need care and recognize distinguished merit. The normal must care for themselves. Self–government means self–support".

If we were to extend that the country would benefit greatly if we would start to think in terms of self–reliance and self–support. All provinces, all regions, rather than looking to the federal government and asking what is in it for them should be asking what they can give to the common good of the country after they have looked after their own responsibilities.

Unless we are first able to look after ourselves how can we presume to look after our neighbours? If we cannot first look after our own province how can we presume to look after other provinces? We need to be self–sufficient as individuals, we need to be self–sufficient as communities, we need to be self–sufficient as provinces. This will inevitably lead to self–sufficiency as a nation and to the further strengthening of the nation into the future; in my fondest dreams, desires and wishes, a nation united, with Quebec very much a part of the greater Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this morning, I listened to the beginning of the debate which opened with the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead who, as usual, made a very good and very interesting speech. But it had nothing to do with the motion before the House, it was a speech on separatism.

For his part, as always, the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest made a very interesting and good speech. For the Reform Party, it was an excellent speech. He said he had a problem with the motion presented this morning by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, which reads as follows: That this House deplore the federal government's delay in responding to Quebec's demands, with regard to certain matters.

Does the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest agree with me that the only reason for the motion is not to complain about the delay, but to promote separatism and create misunderstanding between Quebec voters and voters in the rest of Canada? This is what is intended by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead and his Bloc colleagues.

[English]

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member opposite for the question. I agree the underlying thought behind the motion is an opportunity to advance the cause of separatism in the House.

It must be extremely frustrating for members of the Bloc to have come to the House resolved to work faithfully to taking themselves out of the House. The more time they spend here, the more at home and comfortable they feel. The more time the Bloc spends here, the more time the members representing the people of Canada in Quebec spend here, the more it is indicative the country is very welcoming to everyone.

I have a great deal of empathy toward the members of the Bloc. Members of the Reform Party came here under much the same cloud as members of the Bloc. We were expected by members of the central Canadian media, by the people of central Canada, to be some sort of monolithic neolists with our knuckles dragging on the ground.

• (1515)

Members of the Bloc and members of the Reform Party were supposed to be fighting in the lobby. Much to everybody's surprise they found out that we probably have far more that unites us than separates us. The members of the Bloc came here and got involved in what they did out of frustration with the way the country is run. They felt left out of the affairs of the nation and the fact that nothing ever changed.

That is precisely the reason I am here today as well. As we have been here for the last year and a half we have come to know more about each other. We are going to be able to ask the big question that is going to come, that is going to be asked in Quebec.

It is my wish, desire, hope and feeling that no matter how the question is posed in Quebec, its people will decide to remain with Canada. Those of us in the House will put it behind us. That is my desire, my wish and everything I do will be to that end.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am always surprised to hear the Reform Party or the Liberal Party treat us as if we were beggars, as if we are asking for some kind of charity.

We are not begging for anything, far from it. We are only asking the federal government for what is rightfully ours, our part of the pie, the part that we sent to Ottawa. Through our taxes, we send enormous amounts of money to Ottawa. All we want is our due. Furthermore, we want the federal government to meet its commitments.

The federal government does not keep its promises. A good example of that is the health care system. When we introduced the health care system in Quebec, the federal government wanted to meddle in, so they said: "We want to impose our standards". In order for Quebec to accept that, they added: "We will pay 50 per cent of all the health care costs in Quebec".

Now the federal government pays only 30 per cent of the costs and we have to pay the remaining 70 per cent. It must be made clear that all the standards and structures were implemented on the grounds that the federal government would pay 50 per cent of the costs, not 30 per cent as it does now. Can you imagine what kind of management nightmare this creates for Quebec?

All we ask is that the federal government accept its own responsibilities. We are not begging, we are not asking for gifts, far from it. We are just saying to the federal level: "At least give us back the money we send to you". We are only asking for justice. All we ask is that the federal government carries out its promises.

This is why we have been saying for many years now: "Since you will not fulfil your commitments, we will levy all our own taxes and we will send you whatever we see fit". That is their attitude towards us, and that is why we want sovereignty. We do not want to be beggars, we want the federal government to keep its promises and it does not.

That is what I wanted to convey to the Reform Party member. He seems to know little about history. He is trying to convince the Canadians that Quebecers are beggars. We are not beggars. We only want what is rightfully ours, and we want respect.

[English]

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, if I left the impression with the hon. member that I thought the people of Quebec and the Bloc were here as beggars that certainly was not my intention. I do not think that is the case at all.

Bloc members are hard bargainers. The people of Quebec have been very skilful in using their balance of power and their electoral might for many years in extracting far more than their just rewards from their association with Canada.

The people of Quebec have done very handsomely by their association with Canada. The member speaks of the 50:50 cost sharing in health care. Let us talk about Canada assistance. The province of Quebec gets 70 cents of every dollar spent on welfare. Ontario gets 50 cents and Alberta and B.C. get 50 cents.

How is it that the province of Quebec is considered a have not province when it does not factor in its great and magnificent resource of hydroelectric power? The petrochemical resources of Alberta are factored in. Last year the province of Quebec received $3.5 billion in equalization payments. Alberta has contributed in the last 40 years something in the area of $100 billion toward equalization payments. Quebec has benefited by about that amount.

Therefore, for any member of the Bloc or any other member from Quebec or anywhere else to stand and say that Quebec has done poorly by its association with the rest of Canada is just denying reality.

If Quebec were to decide, in its wisdom, to leave the federation, it would be hurt dramatically because every nickel that has been going to Quebec to subsidize and protect Quebec industry or in direct cash transfers would come to a crashing halt. The people of Quebec have to understand that. They have to be looked square in the eye and told that if they decide to leave this country we are going to leave our cheque book right here at home locked safely in the drawer.

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today refers to three issues between the government of Canada and the government of Quebec. Indeed, the Quebec minister responsible for Canadian intergovernmental affairs raised them earlier this week with my hon. colleague, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs in Ottawa.

This motion suggests that the government of Canada is using delaying tactics in its relationship with the Quebec government. That is not the case. In fact, what is going on here is totally appropriate. It is a normal and constructive process of relationship between two levels of government. And the Quebec case is no different from any other.

Since he became Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs 18 months ago, my colleague has met with his provincial counterparts more than 20 times. Eighteen months in government, more than 20 meetings. He met with his counterparts in Western Canada, in the territories, in the Atlantic area, in Ontario and in Quebec.

At these meetings, it is perfectly normal for provincial ministers to raise issues with the government of Canada that need to be solved. As usual, the government of Canada examines them and, with the co–operation of the province concerned, takes steps to find solutions agreeable to both parties.

Also, the government of Canada sometimes identifies issues that it considers important. It then consults with the provincial governments and, together, they agree on measures, once again to reach fair and equitable agreements.

This process is not peculiar to the Department of Intergovernmental Affairs. In the Canadian federation, this approach is successful because all first ministers, ministers and officials work closely together to achieve concrete and practical results.

Our pragmatic federalism is based on a series of mechanisms and intergovernmental meetings that allow our governments to consult regularly and to solve their problems. These mechanisms come under various forms: we have first ministers' conferences, ministers' conferences, interprovincial meetings as well as a lot of meetings at the level of the deputy ministers. That is what makes our federation flexible.

• (1525)

These various mechanisms and our flexible federation, as well as the co–operation we were able to get from the provinces and the territories, led to the following achievements. We were able to sign agreements with all the provinces under the infrastructure program; to reach an agreement to reduce interprovincial barriers to trade and free movement of individuals so as to reinforce our economic union; to sign action plans with eight provinces and two territories to reduce duplication and overlap; and to create Team Canada, led by the Prime Minister of Canada, to strengthen our position on promising new markets.

The object of the national infrastructure program was to promote economic recovery by creating short term and long term jobs through local investments, while meeting the obvious need to renew and improve local infrastructures throughout Canada.

Under this flexible program, municipalities, provinces and territories can take into account their own priorities. The completed projects for the most part have met the priorities set by the local authorities, in accordance with the national and provincial objectives and criteria and pursuant to the federal–provincial agreements underlying the program.

The Agreement on Internal Trade provides for concrete changes, implementation schedules and a complete process that will help Canada become a real economic union characterized by freer movement of people, capital, goods and services.

With the agreement on the reduction of duplication and overlap, we are seeking to rationalize operations in areas ranging from environment to small business support to tax collection. The final result will be a streamlined government, less regulation and bureaucracy and more efficient services delivered directly and at a lower cost.

As for Team Canada's mission, it is an excellent example of what modern federalism can accomplish. It showed us that we can co–operate very effectively as a country to create jobs here and open up new horizons for all Canadians. Team Canada had quite an impact in the countries that we visited.

Everybody was impressed by the co–operation between the private and public sectors and by the way the various levels of government work together in the national interest.

These results are proof of our commitment to create jobs and to stimulate economic growth in our country, to build together a federation capable of facing international competition. That is what a good government is all about.

But such results are possible only if governments negotiate openly and in good faith. However, that does not mean that federalism excludes any dispute. We know that.

In Canada, we must continually find a balance between regional, provincial, cultural and language interests on one hand and national interests on the other hand in what we can call a state of constructive tension. I say it is constructive because it forces the parties to try and meet local needs while taking national priorities into account.

The government of Canada does not favour any region or any sector of our society to the detriment of another. If a region is hard hit by desertification, by a crisis in the fishing industry, by difficult economic conditions or whatever, the federation can come to the rescue thanks to our collective resources.

The name of the game is interdependence, and federalism makes the necessary compromises between the various groups and regions.

• (1530)

As Alain Gagnon, a political science expert at McGill University, noted, federalism is considered to be the expression of democratic practices favourable to innovative policies and political choices at the territorial level. As Canada faces the future, it enjoys the clear advantage of being a federation.

We know that both Quebecers and other Canadians fervently hope that their governments will work to resolve the pressing problems facing us. The time has come to turn the page and set aside our political differences so that we can invest all our energy in a common cause: to build a strong and united country for the present and future generations.

It is in this spirit that the Canadian government is negotiating with the Government of Quebec. We would like our opposition colleagues to understand that the Canadian government cares about Quebecers' interests as much as the Quebec government does. With regard to the three items included in the motion tabled by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, the Canadian government has acted in good faith. In every case, the process used was proper and consistent with normal intergovernmental relations within a federation such as ours.

I will certainly vote against the motion being debated today, because it goes against the principles underlying good federal–provincial relations in Canada. I know that every day since the 1993 election, every time they ask a question during Question Period, every time they make a speech in the House or ask a question during debate, my colleagues always come back to the issue of separation.

Yet, after listening to Bloc members for 18 months, Quebecers have not changed their minds. Quite the contrary. If we do an analysis over a given period, we see that Quebecers have realized that they are better off staying in the Canadian federation. Earlier, the hon. member for Longueuil asked his Reform colleague a question about health care. He spoke about the various original commitments and what we are now paying.

I am sure that the hon. member did not do it on purpose, but he failed to mention that how much the federal government invested in previous agreements, which were always negotiated with and agreed to by the various provincial governments, is not the only reference point. The federal government transferred to the provinces, in exchange for that money, a portion of the tax points it used to collect. Thus our responsibility has not changed.

He is forgetting that, when this federation was born in 1867, the federal authority was responsible for 60 per cent of taxes. Yet today, it is the opposite. This federal system is constantly changing to fit the circumstances. Indeed, every country of the world recognizes that the federal system is one of the most flexible government systems ever to be devised and experimented. In fact, Europe has been trying to imitate it since 1950 but is still far from having achieved anything like what we have. Of course there is room for improvement, but this is no reason to want to destroy the system and throw it away.

I think that the past can vouch for it: thing always improve and will continue to improve. I am convinced that, try as they may, day after day, every chance they get in this House to convince the people of Quebec that Canada does not work, my hon. colleagues from the official opposition will fail and the people of Quebec will remain in Canada because this country belongs to them and that is a fact. That is one thing that my hon. colleague and I agree on. Canada belongs to the people of Quebec, the same way that Quebec belongs to Canada. We built this country together. It should not be destroyed and we will do our best to prevent its destruction.

We hear people say that things are bad, that the federal government is not paying its bills and is acting in bad faith. We are talking about matters between two governments. Even in the private sector, there are explanations to be given, questions to be answered, before payment is made, and that is normal.

In fact, as my colleague, the minister of Intergovernmental Affairs mentioned this morning, in one case, we made partial payment and then said: "Look, there is a problem here. We will refer the matter to the auditor general. He will check into it and report to us. We will do as he recommends". We are still waiting. We hope to receive his report in the near future and we will abide by his decision.

We have already paid $450 million for education in northern Quebec. We have nothing more to pay, but because the Quebec government wants more, we would like to know why it cost so much. No answer.

This kind of interaction is normal. Instead of making an effort to discuss and find a way of creating jobs together, we gather here for an opposition day. And the opposition comes and tells us how we can go on wrangling and tearing one another apart to show Quebecers and drive in their heads that this system just is not working, that we do not pay our bills and so on. As the hon. member for Longueuil said: "The only option we have left is to separate". Not so, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that, with 128 years of experience, this system is a model for the whole world.

There are thousands and thousands of people in the world who would give anything to become Canadian citizens, to come and live in this country, in spite of this so–called hardship our colleagues opposite are taking about. This is a valid experience. Our country is regarded as a model around the world and will remain a model because the people of Quebec and Canada have faith in this system that we built together and will maintain.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I just heard a carefully prepared speech, and indeed a very eloquent speech, from the hon. member, who said that Canada is the envy of the whole world.

This sort of talk is starting to get on my nerves. Canada's debt is close to $600 billion, our situation is like that of some 60 developing countries, and we are on the edge of the abyss, but we keep saying: Yes, it is a great country. Rather, it was a great country, but this is no longer the case, it is on the point of collapse. Why? Because the federal government insists on directing everything from the top, on centralizing all responsibilities in Ottawa.

We are well aware that duplications cost between $2 billion to $3 billion. And that is not all, however. Just take, for example, our government's fascination with spending. It spent so much money, from the 1970s until 1989, that inflation was the result. The rate of inflation was jumping by 10 or 12 per cent per year. I recall that vividly.

What actions did the government take, even if it was responsible for that inflation? In the 1980s, it had to raise interest rates up to 21 per cent, which killed the economy and created a terrible recession. A great number of small and medium–sized firms in Quebec went bankrupt. That is very sad.

Some lost their jobs and experienced a lot of problems. I know many business people who worked very hard and who still went bankrupt in 1981–82. Why? Because the federal government itself generated that inflation. It increased interest rates to such a level that they killed the economy.

The federal government was the cause of that inflation and it was also responsible for the recession. All that happened because of its spending power. The federal government generated the inflationary spiral because it was intent on showing that it was indispensable, that it was giving money in every sector, including economic development and tourism.

The same thing happened between 1984 and 1990. Again, the government was responsible for the inflation. It also brought on the recession in 1990. From 1990 to 1994, it increased interest rates and triggered a recession. Once again, a lot of Quebec entrepreneurs and small businesses suffered. Some of them work 15 hours a day to build their businesses. So, the federal government is the cause of the recession and all these problems.

This is why we want some stability. Stability does not mean that the federal government must control everything and spend the way it does to prove it is indispensable.

The problem with our current debt of 500 to 600 billion dollars is that people are no longer interested in investing in our country. They no longer want to invest because interest rates fluctuate by 10 per cent every decade, while the value of the dollar can be anywhere from 70 to 90 cents. How can an investor who wants to export in the U.S. be interested in settling here, when interest rates vary by 10 per cent over a five or six year period, and when the unemployment rate fluctuates between 10 and 20 per cent?

There are pulp and paper companies which do well and then, all of a sudden, they go belly up. Why? Because the value of our dollar fluctuates. And why does it fluctuate? Because the federal government does not know how to manage. Because it spends too much in the hope of proving, to Quebecers in particular, that it is indispensable.

These are the reasons why we have decided to take control of our destiny. We do not want to fall in the same deep hole as this federation, which does not understand the need to decentralize, so as to improve our efficiency and ensure our success. Indeed, we want to become sovereign because we do not want to fall in the same deep hole of federation.

The hon. member for Saint–Léonard made very interesting comments. He had a nice speech prepared in advance by his friends. In fact, the Prime Minister himself probably told him what to say. I am convinced that the hon. member does not believe what he said, because he is an accountant. He understands my point very well, and I am convinced that he agrees with what I said.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Longueuil. His remarks bear out what I was saying. He said that the federal government is to blame for everything.

Is it the federal government's fault if Canada, in the 1980s, in spite of all its problems—like high inflation and interest rates—became a member of the G–7, a member of the seven most developed countries? Is it the federal government's fault if, for two consecutive years, the Organization of American States has said that Canada is the best country in the world to live in? Is it the federal government's fault if people do not want to invest money? Does the fault for Canada's political instability lie only with the federal government? We have been hearing about separation for 30 years. Is the federal government to blame for that?

Last year, we had the highest economic growth among developed countries. Is that a sign of bankruptcy? Is the member completely cut off from the global environment and completely oblivious to what is happening in other countries? Does he ever make comparisons? Statistics and international reports the world over clearly indicate that we are a very good country. But we do have a political instability problem, precisely because of their ideas.

• (1545)

As soon as they muster enough courage, instead of making policy shifts often enough to make heads spin, they should put the question clearly and squarely as to whether Quebecers feel like separating. Then, we could truly get rid of the millstone we have round our neck because of the separatists and, of course, still improve our situation.

When the hon. member says that Canada is bankrupt, he is not aware of all the prestigious positions we hold in the international community at all levels.

I would ask my hon. colleague to take that into consideration. I know he came here at the same time as I did, almost 11 years ago. Since he has had the chance to travel to most corners of the world, if he tried to remember the countries he visited and what he heard in his parliamentary travels, he would surely agree with me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There is barely two minutes left for questions and comments.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the last few comments of the hon. member, I cannot resist asking a question.

When we travel abroad, we are frequently asked why Quebecers, with all their potential, have not yet decided to withdraw from the Canadian federation to be more independent like they are in Denmark, Norway, or Sweden. People in those countries control their own development, they know they pay taxes to only one government, and they can easily understand the reasons why they elect representatives.

Let me conclude by saying that, just like members opposite, we have been elected by Quebecers. When we are told that we have not accomplished anything, I have to remind the hon. members that, in a period of two years, the Bloc was elected, which was an obvious sign that something is wrong with the Canadian federation, and a sovereignist government was elected in Quebec. If the federal Parliament cannot grasp that message sent by Quebecers, it must be because it is beyond reform.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member just said, I am proud to be a Quebecer, because Quebec is a modern society with a wealth of resources, and a society that is well recognized throughout the world.

Since Quebec has been able to develop and come of age inside the Canadian federation, why should it sever its links with Canada? If it remains a part of Canada, as I am sure it will, Quebec will be able to go on with its development and have all its many talents recognized. If everything is so fine, why bring to a halt such a valuable experience, which is the envy of the world and which everybody would like to share in?

Mr. Speaker, even the hon. members opposite give good reasons why Quebec should remain a part of Canada. If the hon. member could ask the question, I am sure the answer would be that Quebec will indeed remain part of Canada.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what my hon. colleague for Saint-Léonard, in eastern Montreal, had to say and I am always flabbergasted to hear him speak as if he built this country and almost as if he were the father of our vast and beautiful country.

Earlier, we realized that it is almost pointless for us to make the demands mentioned in the motion before the House. The partisan determination shown by our colleagues opposite indicated early on that our efforts would be useless, that their minds were made up and that, even if we argued all night, it would not do us any good.

Since I have nothing better to do then, I will try to disprove the nonsense uttered by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard. I want to give him a brief lesson in history. It would not hurt the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest to listen, since his knowledge of the history of Canada also seems kind of lacking.

Towards the end of the last century, while 2 million Quebecers, about to starve to death, were forced to leave their country to go to work in the New England cotton mills, the Canadian government sent for Eastern Europeans to settle in western Canada. It gave them land, work animals, horses, chickens, the right to cut timber to build their houses and a lot of other things, and 50 per cent of these expenses were paid for by the people of Canada, half of which then was paid by Quebec. That is what they called profitable federalism. It remained a profitable enterprise for a long time, but it had been even more profitable in 1840, when the Union Act was signed. At that time, Quebec formed the majority within that famous union.

Our ancestors, not very well educated individuals who had been pretty badly treated less than 100 years before by the invaders who had come to strip them of everything they had, used the old sock. They stashed away their savings, they did not get into debt. The villages were not in debt. Quebec was not in debt at the time. But Ontario, which was a hive of activity, had to borrow large amounts of money in order to build infrastructures for its towns. All the lines were blurred. The two debts were not kept separate, with the result that the people of Quebec had to pay over half the debt of Ontario, to the exclusive benefit of the latter. This is yet another example the so-called profitable federalism, as the Liberals see it.

I would say to the member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine that the Gaspé Peninsula, where I was born, lost most of its inhabitants at that time. The member must have, like me, one or perhaps many ancestors who were forced to leave for the United States because they could not make a living in this so-called great country. So I find it hard to listen to people who have been here for something like 20 years say that they helped build this country. I am willing, of course, to acknowledge their qualities, their contributions, but many of them profited a lot more from Canada than our ancestors did 250 and 300 years ago.

And it boils down to the fact that we have rights in this country and that we want them to be respected, that is all.

A lot has gone on here. A member of the Reform Party just told me that, after 18 months, he has discovered that we are alike. Frankly, I find that almost insulting. I resent it. Reform members are in favour of the death penalty, "Hang them quick and do not waste too much rope, and then next, please". That is the philosophy of the Reform Party. Fill up our prisons with whoever had the nerve to insult someone else. That is the right–wing policy of the Reform Party.

I even heard a Reform member say in this House: "My children are not educated, I forbid them to get an education. It is my belief and I adhere to it". But if Canada needs an ambassador, that member is frustrated that the government will not give the job to his son whom he refused to send to school. That is the Reform philosophy. It seems to be quite popular in that region because there are quite a few of them in this House. It is something that I heard here.

Anyway, Quebec is asking the federal government today for a certain sum of money for the natives in the James Bay area. It is time for the federal government to show off, as it has always done. When it came to paying $279 million to give a school board to a particular ethnic group in western Canada in order to show the greatness of Canada and of multiculturalism, it did not cut corners. It came up with the money. And when members of the same ethnic group in Toronto asked the government to give them the same thing it had given their friends in Vancouver, it obliged. It did not matter if the cost was $250 or $300 million, the government found the money. Quebecers did not complain in those days. On the contrary, 74 out of this gang of 75 chose to vote for those expenditures, in order to buy peace I guess.

One thing leading to another, we ended up with a $550 billion debt. I wonder if Canada will not follow in the footsteps of Dow Corning, the breast implant manufacturer, and file under our Bankruptcy Act pretty soon. We are asking to be paid for the services we have delivered to native people for which the federal government is legally responsible. We gave them the same education we gave young Quebecers who lived in the area. I suppose it was a good education.

Now the time has come to pay the bill but the federal government is shirking its responsibilities. It is a bit like the guy who goes to eat in a restaurant, pretends he is going to the washroom after he finishes his meal, exits through the back door and avoids the bill. That is what the government is doing right now, or it looks like it.

Why not face up to a situation that exists and that deserves to be dealt with, not because it concerns Quebec but because it is a matter of justice. There was an agreement. The Minister of Interdepartmental Affairs wants to refer this issue to committees and to government officials, all that for a total claim of $333 million. Yet, it took the government only 20 minutes to free up $20 million for the Winnipeg arena. Things did not drag on in this case.

An hon. member: Not for the Jets. For the arena.

Mr. Lebel: For the Winnipeg Power Jets.

An hon. member: The jet set.

Mr. Lebel: Yes. The Power jet set. In this case, they found $20 million just like that. So, it is not so difficult to find $20 million. But when ask for five, six, even seven years to resolve the problem in Quebec, to settle Quebec's legitimate claims, they politely refer us to their civil servants. Even a Jesuit—and God knows that Jesuits are supposed to know everything—would lose his way in this complex maze of negotiations.

I listened to the member for Saint–Léonard who praised this great country where civic rights and freedoms are recognized and respected. I will merely remind him of the 1970 War Measures Act, the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, the spying on political parties which was thought to have ceased in 1970, although it was recently discovered that members of the Reform Party are still being spied on, and the same probably goes for us as well.

These are the freedoms referred to by the member for Saint–Léonard. Some also spoke of transparency. I nearly choked. Transparency! As if the Pearson deal was transparent. A man named Nixon—we were not the ones who chose him—studied the famous Pearson deal. His conclusions were that there was something fishy. He recommended to the Prime Minister that an inquiry be conducted in this matter.

I remember the Minister of Transport answering my questions in this Chamber, saying: "Come on! Let us move forward. We do know that some individuals tried to take advantage of it". He could not deny it, the Nixon report said so, but he was saying: "Let us move forward, and quickly. Let us settle this whole matter. It will cost a maximum of $25 million".

We can see how high the stack of bills is now. It is estimated that claims of all kinds for breach of contract will total $450 million, and there are more to come. And yet, we demanded, we asked for a royal commission to get to the bottom of this. But no, it was urgent to proceed quickly and settle the whole thing, regardless of the cost. What openness! Examples of this kind of openness are legion. The heritage minister was not being very open while lunching in a room next to the one where the fate of the Canadian film industry was probably being decided.

Once again, he lacked openness. This is another example of openness. For the first time, a CRTC decision is being reviewed, at the request of the cabinet; by a strange coincidence, which, I know, has a hand in a lot of things, it involves close relatives of the Prime Minister, who stand to gain a lot. This is happening in this great country which is so dear to the member for Saint–Léonard as are the underlying principles of federalism he described.

• (1600)

I could perhaps talk about the underlying principles of federalism. They are nothing to write home about. Such noble principles.

I remember reading, not too long ago, that when we joined this country in 1867, about 50 per cent of the population was French speaking in all four provinces and 50 per cent, English speaking. At the time, we paid 300,000 pounds sterling to buy the Northwest Territories, Rupert's Land, which today is Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta up to the Rockies. We bought that from the Hudson's Bay Company for 300,000 pounds sterling at the time. Do not ask me how much it would be today, probably as much as the national debt.

It remains that 50 per cent of the people who paid for that were Quebecers, and they gave it away, for nothing, to those who developed western Canada. Now they are telling us that we are crybabies, that we are constantly asking for things we have no right to. No matter what the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine might think, we paid for western Canada.

If he wants to make some gifts, he should pay for them with his own money, not with other people's money.

He said that people would give everything to live in this country of ours. Yet, after the Minister of Immigration announced he would be charging $900 to those who apply for immigrant status, there was an uproar. People do not want to pay even that much to come here. They think it is starting to be a bit pricey. When making speeches we sometimes say things which are far removed from reality. He almost said, at the end of his speech, that we were pretty lucky to be part of the G–7. For us, being part of the G–7 is as bad as being part of the Winnipeg Jets.

Ross Perot said, in the United States, that we were beggars on horse back, that we had no business being in the G–7, given our structure, our wealth, our economic activity; that the only reason we were there is because the Americans needed our vote to support them, to support their proposals. It is for that reason that they put pressure on to get us in the game. However, we are part of the G–7. When we compare ourselves to the other member countries, we always come out seventh. Ross Perot said that we are there because of their goodwill.

Some people lack the judgment to realize that it was, indeed, a matter of charity. They see that as an honour. He said, as if he were the one who created it, that Canada was beautiful. I like to think that Canada was created by the Creator, not by the Liberal Party of Canada.

I could say that Liberals made much more nasty things than good ones. They should not try to take credit for the great accomplishments of the Creator.

That being said, I think that Quebec's claims are justified, that Quebec must go ahead with them and that all of us, in this House, will always insit that what is Caesar's be rendered unto Caesar. The money coming from Canadian and Quebec taxpayers ends up in the federal treasury. Thirty seven cents out of every dollar go to service the debt.

An hon. member: For the interests.

Mr. Lebel: Only the interests on the debt. So, there is not much coming back under various forms. But that is not a problem. When there is not enough to pay back, the government borrows some. That still works. But the next year, there is more money going towards the payment of interests on the debt, for instance. And the government travels around the world, especially in the G–7 bus, and it says: It is going well in Canada, everything is fine.

• (1605)

If it is going so well, why not respect its people? The natives in the James Bay area have received an education that is neither better nor worse than the one little Quebecers received in the same area. The teachers gave the same to both groups, who were often learning together in the same classroom.

Why would the federal government say today that it is not sure that they were taught exactly what it wanted them to learn? Why would the federal government say that it did not make a decision on the quality of teaching, the condition of buildings and school transportation and that it should have looked at all that before paying?

Considering how fast the federal government moves, little natives would be past university age and would still not have started school. The government is capable of ordering endless studies, and the more they cost, the more it orders them. What would our debt be if the Quebec government had not decided to act and had not stopped waiting so long for the federal government?

There was also the aboriginal Oka crisis in 1990. At that time, nothing was too good. Quebec was sending its provincial police officers and they were working overtime, seven days a week. They had to put out the fires. It was becoming urgent, especially since the federal government was quite involved in the situation there, because it was its fault if the natives were rising up about a territorial issue.

For almost 130 years, it had done nothing to understand them and to meet their needs. Again, when the time has come to pay the bill, it said that we should have submitted the menu served to policemen when they worked overtime—that maybe it would have substituted an orange or a piece of carrot for the apple. The government is dodging and using delaying tactics, as the member for Saint–Léonard said, to flee through the back door.

In closing, I must say we have no lesson to learn from these people. They seem to have made it a point of honour not to respect their commitments. The few times they did were when their candidates were defeated and they promised them a safe riding the next time. These are about the only times when the Liberal Party really honoured its commitments.

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was really shocked to hear the hon. member for Chambly referring to this member for Saint–Léonard as someone who arrived in Canada some twenty years ago, as if I did not have the right to talk about or to defend Canadian values.

I know the hon. member and I am amazed that he not only said that but he even believed that. Though I was not born in Quebec, I nevertheless see myself as a real Quebecer and a real Canadian. I hope he will take time to think about what he said and that he will withdraw his words and change his thinking. I hope he just got carried away because what he just said is serious: it means there are two classes of citizens in Quebec, those who were born in Quebec and the others who were not.

If this is what the hon. member thinks, I hope he will have the courage to admit it. If that is not what he meant, he should clarify his thought and withdraw what he said. Such allegations are serious and it is not the first time it happens in that party. I hope, no, I am sure that Quebecers have always been generous people, they have always welcomed people from other countries and have treated them as their equals.

As I said earlier, I know the hon. member very well and I hope he just got carried away and that was not his real thinking.

• (1610)

Mr. Lebel: Mr. Speaker, I also know the hon. member for Saint–Léonard.

I remember that, not too long ago, during an opposition day like this one in this House, when we were talking about the proposed referendum in Quebec, the hon. member for Madawaska—Victoria told me: "So, as a francophone living outside Quebec, I do not have the right to participate in this debate". I told her that no, she did not, but that the hon. member for Saint–Léonard did, because he is a Quebecer.

If he is as honest as he claims, he will admit that I made that statement here in this House; you can even look it up in Hansard. No, that is not my intention. What I mean is that some members have the nerve to lecture us here today, telling us that they were the ones who built this country—at least that is how I understood it—because we Quebecers are just a bunch of "bums". That is what the hon. member from the Reform Party told us through his thinly veiled remarks. He suggested that we wanted money, that we wanted things, that we came here to get funds. That is what I meant. I meant that we francophones have been in Quebec for 450 years, that we also contributed to this country, that our contribution was at least as important as that of more recent immigrants to Canada. That is what I meant, as the hon. member for Saint–Léonard knows full well.

Indeed, there are none so deaf as those who will not hear. That is so true. Particularly in debates such as this one, it is common for some people to twist what others have said. I am saying that Quebecers who have been here in North America for more than 400 to 450 years on average also have the right to speak up, to decide whether or not they were wronged in the past and whether or not they paid more than their fair share, and to demand that it not happen again. That is what the hon. member for Saint–Léonard should have understood, and I know that, despite his Mediterranean accent, he understands very well the French spoken here. That is to his credit, and I commend him.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where to start following the remarks made by the hon. member opposite.

It is really a shame that, once again, qualifications are made as to who is a Canadian and who is not, who can live in Quebec and who cannot.

It takes some gall to say that we are concerned only with those who settled here some 350, 400 years ago. I find it despicable that the hon. member of the opposition could claim that newcomers to Canada, and Quebec in particular, did not do well or contribute to the economic development of my province.

We must recognize one thing, Mr. Speaker, and that is that ours is a country built on immigration. And the first to settle this land were, to use the terms of the opposition motion, the aboriginals. They are the real, original settlers. Next in line are the French Canadians, Canadians of French descent, the Bretons, the Scots, the Irish, the British and the Loyalists. Then people from other countries came to Canada and Quebec, and put their talents to good use in our country.

In fact, if the hon. member of the opposition cared to check in his own ranks, he would realize that there are members who are not old stock Quebecers in his own party. There are newcomers, new Quebecers, not only within the Bloc Quebecois but also within the Quebec government. Are they not real Quebecers? I would like him to tell me.

All we are asking the hon. member of the opposition to do is to apologize formally in this House and withdraw his remarks. I think that the honourable man he is will recognize that the hon. member for Saint–Leonard and other newcomers, so to speak, people who left their country of origin to settle in Canada, have made an outstanding contribution to this country.

• (1615)

I personally have a great deal of respect for every newcomer who was admitted to Canada, who has elected to make Canada his or her home, to contribute to its development. One even had the qualifications and the courage to go before his peers and get elected, becoming a full–fledged member of the House of Commons. This gentleman was even appointed to cabinet. That is why I am proud to be a Canadian: I can see that, among us, there are people from various ethnic backgrounds, who are the pride and glory of this country.

So, I ask that the hon. member of the opposition withdraw his remarks on newcomers to Canada, nothing less.

Mr. Lebel: Mr. Speaker, it looks as if the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine were dancing the cha–cha–cha in swinging doors. First, I never said that. I never allowed myself to decide who is a Canadian and who is not—and I never will. I will only say that I am not one.

I never said who was a Quebecer and who was not. René Lévesque—a man whom I really appreciated and who came from a Gaspe community close to that of the hon. member who just spoke—once said something with which I fully agree, namely that Quebecers were those who lived in Quebec, regardless of their origin. Quebecers are those who want to live in Quebec. As for myself, it was never my intention to insinuate, either directly or indirectly, anything to the contrary.

If the hon. member wants to do politics on that issue for 10 or 15 minutes, fine. I do not have to apologize to anyone because I did not insult anyone. However, I did want to point out to the hon. member for Saint–Léonard that he has my admiration and my respect. He knows that I was not referring to him and I think he understood it full well. Again, I want to convey to him my admiration, and that also goes for his family. That being said, I do not make apologies. The hon. member for Saint–Léonard has all my respect.

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, you will understand that, before coming to the heart of the matter, I would like to join the hon. member for Saint–Léonard and the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine in denouncing the remarks made by the member from the official opposition, as well as explaining my feeling of dismay—to put it mildly. These remarks are totally inconsistent with the values we have developed in this country, the values we share and the values we have in Quebec. The transcript will bear witness to this.

I must say that, in addition to his personal attack on my colleague, the opposition member took on aboriginal people as well, saying that they were studying only because education was free. There was something fundamentally contemptuous in these remarks. They reflect the official opposition's deeply held feelings of contempt, a state of mind disrespectful of people and even more of the values they share.

In that sense, you will understand that I join my two colleagues in asking, as a Quebecer, that the official opposition member withdraw his words that I find unfortunate, to say the least. That being said, I will now address the issue raised in the official opposition motion.

• (1620)

Anybody who cares to examine the wording of this motion, let alone its substance, will realize that, once again, the people opposite are basically trying to sell us a bill of goods. They are trying to pull the wool over Quebecers' eyes. That same attitude permeates all their policies. That can be said of the Bloc Quebecois, but also, and even more so, of its head office.

Speaking of not being able to rise above petty politics, we can find superb examples not across the way, but with the Quebec government itself, a government whose concern ought to be to look after the interests of the people. This is a serious matter. What is at stake is the interests of citizens who put their confidence in a government, thinking that it would try to build a better society.

Among the most telling examples of the partisan attitude they cannot shed, I should mention the finance minister's budget. It is a real gem. When you resort to such an important instrument, something so essential in any society, to engage in crass political propaganda, something is really wrong.

Speaking to reporters, Mr. Campeau casually dropped these remarks: "If you vote on the right side at the referendum, we may well live in an ideal world, and there will not be any tax increase. It will be some kind of Garden of Eden". Such statements are a serious matter, coming as they do from the Minister of Finance of Quebec. Instead of indulging in petty politics, talking about the referendum, and trying to take Quebec out of Canada, he should be working hand in hand with the federal Minister of Finance in a responsible way to build a better society, a society our children will be proud of, if only we can tackle the real problems we were elected to settle.

Let us take the issues mentioned in this motion. They are serious issues. When I say that these issues are serious ones, I hear members of the official opposition commenting, a big smile on their face, because they do not really care about these fundamental and contentious issues. When we talk about the demands made by a province, it is important. It is also important for us, the federal government, to seriously consider the demands, to treat them fairly and, as the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs said, to act responsibly.

I must say that I have a lot of trouble understanding all the animosity and fury with which the official opposition is tackling these serious issues, because on this side of the House, as the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs pointed out earlier, we are doing everything we can to ensure that the decisions are made as soon as possible and in all fairness to Quebec and all of Canada.

Since I do not seem to understand, would the official opposition tell me if they would like us to pay without looking at the bills, without checking if it is our duty as federal government to pay for these expenditures? I sincerely doubt, Mr. Speaker, that that is what the people in all the provinces expect from the federal government. What we expect is a federal government which does not waste the taxpayers' money and has a good hold on the purse strings, and that is exactly what we are doing.

In fact, not very well hidden behind this motion is a pre–referendum political strategy. The official opposition wants to create a smoke screen. It wants the people in Quebec to rise to the bait. I think these members are basically scornful, and I am weighing my words.

The three serious issues mentioned in the motion are being used for partisan purposes, for referendum purposes. I must say that I do not agree with that and I do not understand anything any more. They are trying to lay down a smoke screen, but this is of course premature. It is premature because, as we all know, the government has not made a decision yet. On the contrary, it is putting in place a procedure by which it will judge each claim on its merits. Also, instead of waiting for the process to end, the Bloc is trying to turn these fundamental claims of the people of Quebec into a purely political question.

This proves that the Bloc does do not have the interests of Quebecers at heart, but that it is only interested in its own agenda, which is, at the risk of repeating myself, essentially the separation of Quebec.

I believe that Bloc members should sincerely listen to Quebecers. As I often say in this House, we were elected democratically. We were elected for the promises we made to Canadians. It goes without saying that the members across the way are not fulfilling their promises. The government of Quebec is not listening to the people. We were elected because we promised that we would rebuild people's trust in government, that we would have an honest government. We were elected because we said we would deliver, because we said we would tackle the real problems. They elected us because we promised them we would be a basically responsible government. We were elected because people trusted us not to throw their money out the window. And I must say that the people of Quebec want exactly the same thing.

I must also say that, by laying down a smoke screen, the Official Opposition will not succeed in making us react in an untimely or hasty way. On the contrary. In the best interests of the people, the best interests of Quebecers, we will follow a fair process to make sure that the hard earned money of the taxpayers of Quebec and Canada is well managed. We will certainly not fall into the trap set by the official opposition.

Speaking about good government and what the people expect from their provincial and federal governments, I would be remiss if I did not say a few words about intergovernmental co–operation. People elected us to solve the debt and deficit problem, create jobs, restore economic growth, help Canada carve out a place in the new global economy, and develop a labour force of which our country could be proud, which would attract new companies and make Canada competitive not just nationally but internationally as well. Co–operation is the key to all of this.

How can this co–operation exist when you have on the other side of the House and in Quebec—and it is unfortunate—a government which does not want the system to work? We do not have to go very far to find some rather striking illustrations.

Let us take, for example, the last visit of the minister from Quebec who came to Ottawa to meet with the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Quebecers have to wonder if the minister came to Ottawa to solve problems or to create problems.

When we see the attitude of the members opposite and the attitude of the Quebec government and the minister who just met with our friend, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, I think that the answer cannot be any clearer. But the answer is also unfortunate because the actions of the Quebec government are far from being constructive. It is obvious that these actions are very prejudicial not only to Quebec and Canada today, but also to the future generations.

I have visited Quebec extensively these past few months, I have talked to Quebecers and I can tell you that they are sick and tired of these endless debates. They are really sick and tired of seeing a government in Quebec that is taking steps but in the wrong direction. People want increased co–operation, they want a constructive partnership, they want fiscal consolidation. These are all reasons for us to all sit down together and try to solve these problems as soon as possible so we can start building our economy and create jobs.

When I talk about misleading the people of Quebec, let us think about what happened eight months ago, when Quebecers placed their trust in a provincial political party which, you will remember, spoke of the other way to govern. It reminds me of a federal political party that spoke of the real power. According to the people I met, when they chose the other way to govern, they wanted a responsible government, a government which creates jobs, a government which is interested in what they have to say.

Well, let us see what this other way to govern in Quebec turned out to be. It is simply a government that governs with its eyes closed and its ears plugged and with only one thing in mind: to achieve its own agenda. And everybody knows that the agenda is the separation of Quebec. It is just unbelievable. This reflects a lack of the most elementary respect for the public and is a denial of the mandate they received from the electorate.

They are trying to give the impression in Quebec that there is something terribly wrong with the present federal system and that some problems cannot be overcome within that system. Of course, if you listen to them, you cannot get anything done within the present system. I say that, if you are prepared to work within the system, in good faith, there is much that can be done.

If governments could get together for two seconds, there are some extraordinary things we could do in Canada today to help this country enter the new era of free trade and maintain its position internationally. There are some eloquent examples of this. When we talk about the real problems, those people on the other side of the House start shouting because they do not want to hear the truth. They do not want us to tell the people of Quebec that they are not acting in the interests of Quebecers.

That is why you hear them shout like that when we, Liberals from Quebec who were elected as well, take the floor. Of course they do not see us as Quebecers because we do not share their philosophy, but we were elected in Quebec, and I am a proud Quebecer, and I believe that if we do a good job we can build a better and in fact exceptional Quebec and Canada.

There are some outstanding examples like the immigration agreement, the agreement on interprovincial trade and the agreements concerning la Francophonie. Finally, there is a lot more we could do, but wasting our time on motions like the one before the House today is not going to help us work in the best interests of Quebecers and Canada.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first off, I would like to call the hon. member for Outremont to order, because he accused the hon. member for Chambly of saying something that he did not say. I would also like to call the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine to order for doing the same thing.

I think we have a good example of how members opposite play politics when they put words in the mouths of my Bloc Quebecois colleagues. I simply wanted to say this for the record. What they said about my colleague for Chambly is entirely untrue.

He also accused the Government of Quebec of shirking its responsibilities. I would call that sticking his nose into other people's business. We all know that the federal Liberal members from Quebec are not in the least bit, not even the tiniest bit, interested in the Government of Quebec. They are much more interested in making sure that Ottawa will control, manage and centralize everything. Because that is their outlook, they could care less about what is going on in Quebec right now. They have never had great faith in provincial governments, at any rate. For them, the only government, the only power in Canada, is the Canadian government.

Forcibly, they can only consider the provinces as managers of sorts. They confirmed this in the Charlottetown accord when they gave all of the power to Ottawa and the right to administer to the provinces. That is why this accord was flatly rejected. They claimed that they were decentralizing and giving the provinces the opportunity to manage or administer things. That is not what Quebec wants. Quebec wants powers, not just the opportunity to administer. And that is not just my message, not just the Bloc Quebecois' message, it is the message of the Commission on the Political and Constitutional Future of Quebec, the Bélanger–Campeau Commission.

• (1640)

The Bélanger–Campeau Commission sure was a big production, one of the biggest since Confederation. Altogether, they received 600 briefs, heard 205 witnesses while 55 experts were studying the issue. They concluded that for Quebec's well-being, it had to be given at least 20 real powers, for example, education, tourism, economic development.

And the federal government, with the support of the Liberals, hatched a proposal which purportedly met all of Quebec's aspirations. What hypocrisy!

Charlottetown gave Ottawa even more powers, and Quebec, even more administration. They treated Quebec as if it were a province like any other, with no particular status and nothing distinct about it at all. Now, they butt in and would have us believe that the Quebec Minister of Finance, Mr. Campeau, the eminent Quebecer who co-chaired the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, is botching his job. That complaint probably came from one disgruntled voter in Outremont.

And they are absolutely right when they say that we are playing politics when we say that Quebecers will pay more taxes if they do not vote for sovereignty. The federal Minister of Finance decided to wait before adding to the Quebec tax burden. He will hit Quebec next year only. Yes, we are in for it, and we will end up sending our tax money to Ottawa, and the federal government will skim a good billion from it before shipping it back to Quebec. And it is very clear that, once again, the Government of Quebec will be caught in the squeeze to some extent, because the federal government fails to live up to its responsibility to give us back the money we send to Ottawa through our taxes. It gives us back less than we gave. It promised to keep paying. It made such promises. However, it does not keep them.

So in all likelihood the Minister of Finance of Quebec will have to raise taxes, because the federal government does not assume its responsibilities, pure and simple.

There was talk of jobs earlier. When it comes to jobs, we know that the job problem in Quebec is the federal government's problem. As I mentioned earlier in my speech, the federal government talks of political uncertainty, but political uncertainty does not take away jobs, economic uncertainty does. Top American experts, economists, American business people say so: they could not care less about politics when they are looking to invest in Canada. They say: "The reason we do not invest in Canada is because of its economic instability". This economic instability is the federal government's doing, as everyone knows. The Bélanger–Campeau commission report said so, and it was approved.

So this fine speech by the member for Outremont seems completely out of date to me. He did not understand. He really has not grasped what is happening in Quebec. I do not know where he comes from, but he is not from the same place as the rest of us real Quebecers.

No, what I mean, really, is that the real Quebecers are those who understand Quebecers. That is what I wanted to say.

Mr. Cauchon: Mr. Speaker, we do not have to try too hard to rise above our colleagues today. I have just been told that I am not a real Quebecer. Come on. Let us have a little bit of respect for who we are, for the society we represent and the values we have in common.

They have just proved that I was right when I said that they do not consider me a true Quebecers because I do not think as they do. They just said it, it is as simple as that.

To get back to the member's comments, I will be kind and say that remarks verging on demagogy, such as what we just heard, do not deserve a response.

• (1645)

However, on the subject of commissions—the Bélanger–Campeau commission was mentioned—I will say that the PQ regional commissions throughout Quebec were a clear example of democracy being stifled. The commissions were created with the idea that they were to draw the conclusion the PQ wanted to see, namely that Quebec must separate, but in the end it realized that this was not what people talked about. People reminded the commissions that what they wanted the government to do was to rethink the role of government, deal with the economy and create jobs. But, despite this reality in Quebec and throughout Canada, the PQ regional commissions offered in their conclusion solutions and recommendations which have nothing to do with the testimony they heard.

When it comes to commissions, I believe that the PQ national commission is a telling example of a government which refuses to listen to the people, which wants to manage, to rule, and to govern with only one idea in mind. And we all know what that is.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to reply to my colleague, the member for Outremont. I know you will not allow me to say that 75 per cent of his comments were absolute lies, because I cannot say that, but I will say that 25 per cent of what he said is somehow related to truth and reality.

I would like to reply on one point in particular. He spent a good part of his presentation discrediting the Parti Quebecois government. He said that if all these issues before us, the issues mentioned in the motion, are not solved, it is because there is a separatist government in Quebec. The member for Outremont devoted a good portion of his speech to that point.

The Parti Quebecois government has been in place for six months. In Ottawa, the Liberal government has been in office for a year and a half now. Why did they not settle these issues when they were dealing with obedient federalists, ready to accept any kind of compromise to come to an agreement with the federal government? They had one full year to settle issues that have been dragging on for ten years. They did nothing. It is easy to see that the member for Outremont is taking us for a ride. Does he really think Quebecers are all that gullible? He is trying to delude us. He has lost all credibility in my view. He should have chosen to face reality, talk specifically to the motion and demand that his government find solutions to problems that have been dragging on for ten years, as I said before.

Mr. Cauchon: Mr. Speaker, earlier, during my short speech, I explained quite thoroughly how the federal government deals with the claims. The public understands very well that we are acting as a responsible government. So I am sure you see why I will not reply to comments that seem to come from someone who was not even here during my speech.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I always wondered what Pontius Pilate looked like in the praetorium. I think we saw that this afternoon. I will say no more.

We heard the hon. member making groundless accusations against us when he ought to have been defending Quebec. We are politicians in the House and our actions are political. We do not have to be ashamed of it, since we are paid for that. The hon. member boasts about the integrity of his government. It is not because one says that one is honest that one is, but because one acts honestly.

• (1650)

It is true that the population elected Liberals. Very often, it is because people did not have a real choice. When people had one, in Quebec, they elected the members of the Bloc Quebecois.

Mr. Gagnon: Not everywhere.

Mrs. Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): No, but they did have a choice. Sometimes, they had no choice, so they elected Liberals.

What is important is the fact that this government has done absolutely nothing since it took office. That is why it is so popular. When one does nothing, one is not open to criticism.

This government has simply introduced in the House the legislation the Conservative government left behind. Once the Liberals introduced these Conservative bills, they had nothing else to propose.

One thing should be important for them. They have a new member who comes from Quebec and, as my colleague for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead reminded us, the federalists had one full year to resolve the problem with the federalists in Quebec. Now, the population was misled by the hon. member for Outremont who barely mentioned what the whole issue was about. I would like to give the facts about the issue before us.

First, the motion. What does the motion tabled this morning by my colleague say? It says: "That this House deplore the federal government's delay in responding to Quebec's demands with regard to the education of young Aboriginals in Northern Quebec amounting to $199 million, to the compensation of $135 million under the 1991–92 stabilization program and to the $79 million claim for expenses incurred during the events at Oka in the summer of 1990".

That is to say the federal government owes Quebec $333 million.

An hon. member: That is not peanuts.

Mrs. Tremblay: That shows that this government which claims to be a good manager of public money is very bad at paying its bills. This government brags about reducing the deficit, but to do so, it shifts its problems to the provinces.

We had already noticed it in the last federal budget, when the federal government announced a cut in health and education transfer payments. Now the government has decided it will not pay the $333 million it owes Quebec. Yet, other provinces received a positive reply and even got back what was owed to them. Quebec has to wait once again, and the federal government even suggested that it should not expect much.

When Quebecers ask themselves who defends their interests in Ottawa, the answer is certainly not: the government of Jean Chrétien.

Since we cannot count on government members from Quebec to defend the interests of Quebecers, I will explain in simple words the grievances of Quebec regarding the payment of $333 million, which is owed to us, but which the federal government refuses to pay.

As the motion already mentions, there are three amounts of money at stake. I will explain the $79 million, incurred during the native crisis of the summer of 1990, which should have been paid back to Quebec under the financial support agreements in case of disaster.

• (1655)

Nobody can deny the fact that the summer of 1990 was a disaster in Quebec, in terms of what happened in Oka and, above all, of the federal government sending in the army to deal with a catastrophic situation. That is why these $79 million were spent by the Quebec Ministry of Public Security and by the Sûreté du Québec to maintain public order and protect the residents of the affected area.

The cause of the conflict was simply that a native group claimed to own the lands surrounding its territory. Natives are under federal jurisdiction. That is why the Canadian Army intervened in the Oka crisis.

Bill McKnight, then Minister of National Defence, told minister Claude Ryan, in a letter dated January 24, 1991, that is six months after the conflict ended: "The federal government has special responsibilities regarding the Indians". In that letter, he also made a firm commitment to the Quebec government: "In addition to the expenditures already approved, we will provide financial help to the province, in accordance with the guidelines on the implementation of disaster relief agreements".

This letter from the Minister of National Defence to the Quebec Minister of Public Security is as clear as it can be. The government admitted to having a disaster relief program and, therefore, it was obligated to reimburse Quebec's expenditures.

In 1992, the government wanted to show what a good player it was, so it admitted owing Quebec $84 million and that it would give $5 million to the province, an action by which we think the federal government indeed recognized its responsibility in this issue. It still owes us $79 million. Why did the federal government change its mind afterwards? Why is it now refusing to recognize its responsibilities?

The government used faulty reasoning to avoid paying. Let us look at three of its reasons. First, it claimed it was making a distinction between public order, that was supposedly in jeopardy, and public well–being, that was not. These are the sorts of nuances that the government is capable of invoking. Beyond the fact that this distinction does not appear anywhere in the disaster financial assistance arrangements, it is obvious that public well–being was threatened by this crisis that affected all Quebecers.

Second, there was political interference in this issue. Indeed, it seems that the decision not to reimburse the expenses incurred by the Sûreté du Québec was taken in 1992 by the Treasury Board of Canada, despite an opinion given by its own experts and the Office of the Auditor General, who had recognized that at least a part of these expenses qualified.

So, how can it be claimed, as the minister did the other day, that someone refused to open the books? If the Office of the Auditor General has already recognized that at least a part of these expenses ought to be reimbursed, someone must have looked at the books at some point.

Third, the federal government gave as its criterion for refusing the amounts of money involved. The hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine used this argument this morning. Yet, the objective of the program is to help provinces or territories to face a disaster the costs of which would be an excessive burden on them. To accept the federal government's claims is to not only go against the spirit of the financial assistance program, but also to create a dangerous precedent.

If we follow this reasoning, the federal government could decide to stop paying old age pensions or UI benefits to Quebecers, simply because it would cost too much this year. In return, people would not pay their federal income tax, because they would feel it is too high. One can see how such fallacious arguments could lead us to disaster.

Let us be reasonable for a moment. There are laws and regulations providing for the payment of certain sums to Quebec under specific terms and conditions. Quebec citizens pay taxes to Ottawa and they have the right to recover part of them. Whether or not the Liberal government likes the legitimate government of Quebec or the official opposition should not be a factor. Our $79 million claim is only a matter of equity and fairness.

I will now move on to the $119 million the federal government owes Quebec for the education of young aboriginal people. It owes us this money under the James Bay agreement. In this case, the federal government seems more open, as it does not deny having responsibilities in this area. However, it refuses to pay, because these amounts were spent without a prior agreement between the federal government and the province.

Of course, the federal government does not appear eager to come to an agreement. It would then have had to pay its share. In this whole matter, the Quebec government acted in a perfectly responsible fashion. It acted like a reasonable man, as the saying goes. Instead of abandoning the aboriginal people to their fate, with no resources, to suffer from this wrangling between two levels of government, instead of closing schools for one, two or three years while this government negotiates an agreement, the Government of Quebec took its responsibilities, kept the schools open and kept young aboriginals in school, fulfilling its part of the bargain as well as that of the federal government.

And it is still waiting. The Quebec government has been waiting since 1986 for the federal government to pay back what it owes the province for paying both the federal and provincial share of expenditures. Now, if Quebec had decided to close schools, the federal government would have dragged the Quebec government all the way up to the Supreme Court of Canada and the aboriginals would have gone to the United Nations to complain about it. We took our responsibilities, Now, there are bills to settle.

I am baffled though. We have had consecutive governments, under Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Johnson for instance, that were federalist. Yet, and that is what amazes me, you were unable to come to an agreement among federalists and, as a result, the sovereignists now have to get up in this House to protect Quebec's interests.

Finally, there is this huge amount, $135 million, owed to Quebec by the federal government under the 1991–92 fiscal stabilization program. Liberal federalists in Quebec had already put in a claim for this amount when they were in power. The Minister of Labour could certainly brief the Prime Minister and the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs on this issue.

As for the Minister of Finance, he flatly refuses to make any payment. Once again, the government is applying a double standard, since provinces much better off than Quebec—namely Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia—already received payments under the same program. In this case, as in the other two, the amounts to be paid should be based on objective criteria. Yet, the federal Minister of Finance refuses to go to arbitration and settle the issue without seeking to score political points. Instead, the minister suggested that the Quebec government take its case to the Federal Court, and eventually the Supreme Court. So much for the brilliant ideas of this government. The government owes us money, but tells us: Take the taxpayers' money. We will do the same. We will continue to pay lawyers and go to court, even though we are perfectly aware that, under the existing regulations and agreements, we owe you that money. Is this the finance minister's idea of flexible federalism and friendly administrative arrangements? We can only conclude that, with friends like him, Quebec does not need enemies.

• (1705)

I am beginning to understand what government and federalist members mean by "flexible federalism". The expression refers to a vision of Canada whereby Quebec must always yield to Ottawa and English Canada. Let me simply tell you that the Bloc will never ask Quebecers to yield. Quebecers are proud. They want to take control of their destiny, and they will soon set up their own country, in the upcoming referendum, with or without those $333 million.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata while she kept hacking at federalism and the Canadian government. I would like to hear her criticize in the same way the threats made by the government of Quebec and its Minister of Education, Mr. Garon, to the university located in Rimouski, in her own riding.

Some people dare to accuse the Liberal members and to accuse me, the member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, an elected representative from grassroots Quebec, of not standing up for Quebec and my own area, and I find that totally unacceptable.

In my riding and in the vast majority of rural ridings in Quebec, people are mostly concerned about the economy. They are concerned about jobs. We are thinking about our future, but we know very well that the federal government, the Canadian government, is a worthy partner for us. I think the federal government has shown in the last few weeks or the last few months, in fact in the 18 months since it has been in office, that we want to get Canadians and Quebecers back to work. We set up an infrastructure program. In fact, the current government of Quebec is glad to use it. It is glad to show that it can get some of the workers in smaller localities in grassroots Quebec back to work.

By the way, on the native issue, I have not heard the hon. member say a word about their living conditions in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada. They did not tell us about how dismayed the whole world was when these unfortunate events happened in Quebec and what it did to the reputation of Quebec and Canada. True, I was not in Canada at the time, I was in Japan and, for a while, in France. But, believe me, all my friends, my associates and my acquaintances kept telling me about this problem with natives in Canada. And it saddened me to know that the government could not find a peaceful solution to the problem. But the Quebec government did call on the federal government for help. The premier of Quebec has the right to call on the Canadian army in a very difficult situation.

That is what happened. It is Quebec that asked for the army's involvement, not the Canadian government. The federal government spent $133 million to send in the army and the RCMP.

• (1710)

The Canadian government spends millions of dollars every year to maintain the peace elsewhere in the world and to ensure that other countries will follow Canada's example. But I do not want to digress. About the natives, it is the federal government which takes on the responsibility of creating a healthy economy at the local level for these people. We build houses and even cabins for them. We do everything to help them.

All we are asking of the government of Quebec is that it stop playing politics to the detriment of the most disadvantaged people. Everybody here knows that natives are not the most spoiled people in our country. Nevertheless, we hear the opposition and even some government members say that natives are treated differently. The claim that they are better treated than most Canadians is false. Suicide, alcoholism and all the social ills imaginable are more prevalent in aboriginal communities.

I grew up one kilometre away from an Indian reserve. And believe me when I say that I saw with my very eyes how these poor people were treated. People were reluctant to give them jobs, to let them play on their hockey teams or to welcome them in our French Catholic schools. Unfortunately, I think we all should examine our consciences.

Today's debate was an example of negotiations to come between a sovereign Quebec and Canada. We got stuck on tiny details: who owed who $333 million, $79 million, $125 million and for what, and how Quebec has been taken for a ride for the past 125 years. How will we ever manage to negotiate? Now I ask the people watching us on television, do you think that we will ever be able to orchestrate a separation if, today, all they could do was condemn the federal government for wrong-doing? And they want to divvy up the debt, and share our currency and passport? They just want to coast on Canada's prestige.

The opposition should be told to go back to the drawing board. This new approach they are proposing to Quebecers is utterly unacceptable. They should just ask the question once and for all: "Do you want to stay in Canada, yes or no?"

Mrs. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, what is surprising about these Liberal members of Parliament opposite is that they try to distract people's attention and talk about any old thing. I spoke of three specific matters: the federal government's debt to Quebec of $333 million. We are not talking about peanuts, this is a lot of money for a people that needs every penny to grow and develop.

The Liberals call $333 million peanuts because they are used to wallowing in money with the Bronfmans and Power Corporation and because there are ministers in cabinet who are millionaires and who sail their boats under the Panamanian flag to avoid paying taxes in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says I described $333 million as peanuts, what about the $2.5 billion we send to Quebec every year?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. With all due respect to my colleagues on both sides of the House, this was not a point of order, it was a matter of debate.

Mrs. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, in 1985, the government of Mr. Lévesque was the first to sign an agreement with the native peoples. It was this government that went the farthest and that accorded the most to the native peoples in 1985.

In 1990, the October crisis unfortunately cast a shadow over relations between native peoples and the people of Quebec, perceptions changed.

• (1715)

This crisis arose, once again, because of the indecision of the government of the day, a Liberal and a federalist government, led once again by Mr. Bourassa. Both times the army moved into Quebec, Liberal federalists were in power.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.15 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 81 to interrupt proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the recorded division on the question now before the House stands deferred until Monday, May 29, at the usual time of adjournment, at which time the bells to call in the members will sound for not more than 15 minutes.

The chief government whip has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I would request unanimous consent to further defer division until 5.30 p.m. Tuesday, May 30.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): To be sure the House understands, the government whip has requested a further deferral of the vote to Tuesday, May 30 at 5.30 p.m. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you would find unanimous consent to commence private members' hour immediately, in other words consider it 5.30 p.m. and to do the same at the end of private members' hour, in other words finish 10 minutes ahead of time at the end.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent to proceed to private members' hour?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.20 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

UNDERGROUND ECONOMY

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the following initiatives for addressing the underground economy:

(a) an enhanced information campaign to educate the public and to encourage their participation in addressing the problem;

(b) a limited amnesty on interest and penalties otherwise payable when a taxpayer voluntarily declares income previously undeclared;

(c) a tax credit to taxpayers on home improvements and renovations to provide an inducement to create the essential paper trail and to serve as one of the primary vehicles for the information campaign.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the underground economy materially and adversely affects the lives of all Canadians and literally costs us billions of dollars of revenue each year as a result. That is why I submitted Motion No. 382 to the House for consideration.

While the existence of the underground economy in Canada is an undisputed fact, estimates as to its size vary widely depending on the methodology employed to measure it. Estimates range from 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent of GDP to over 20 per cent of GDP; in dollar figures $20 billion up to $140 billion.

Even at the lower end of the range the revenue potential I believe warrants further initiatives to realize the potential and to contribute to the restoration of Canada's financial health.

There are good reasons why we should act now. As the finance minister has said, everything is on the table. It is imperative that moving forcefully on the underground economy be part of the overall strategy to meet our financial targets. Now that the economy is growing we must encourage as many people as possible to integrate back into the legitimate economy of the country.

The government currently has better tools to address the problem of tax evasion, but tax evaders are also becoming more sophisticated. Given this reality, it would be prudent to take advantage of new provincial information sharing and other initiatives before this new advantage is neutralized.

There are some general assumptions about the underground economy I would like to note. There is the premise that once you are underground it is very difficult to come out even if you wanted to. That is primarily because people who are working underground generally have offered arrangements and deals to their customers and clients substantially below the otherwise market price. That means customers come to depend on them.

In addition, once a taxpayer has evaded taxes and not reported that income and paid those taxes, there is interest and possibly penalties which grow over time and may grow to an amount which would be prohibitive as far as the taxpayer's being able to settle it.

Most of the underground economic activity is very difficult to detect because there is no paper trail, no invoice which would verify such activity. That is one of the aspects I hope to address with Motion No. 382.

Some of the arguments for dealing with the underground economy include the statement that if every Canadian paid their fair share we would all pay less. We must all do our part and fulfil our responsibilities and become part of the solution.

Since the recession clearly added to the underground economy these new additions are the people we have to get back before their dependency becomes irrevocable. I believe focused efforts on certain segments will be most successful but a general initiative should still have positive results because the first wave of results will come from reminding Canadians of their legal and moral obligations.

While the size of the underground economy is elusive, Canadians consider it large enough to warrant attention. There are a number of reasons people choose to participate in the underground economy.

The first and most fundamental is basic greed, people taking care of themselves at the expense of others. The second is a belief in the myth that everyone is doing it and nobody is getting hurt, which clearly is not the case. Some feel it is easy to get away with because we have an honour system in our tax system of declaring income. There also is a perception that no major effort is being made to stop it. Some would suggest the income tax system is too complex and too cumbersome to operate within. We have matters such as the level of respect for government and politicians. It is a problem in today's society.

• (1725)

The objectives of the strategy to address the underground economy generally include to recover revenue legally owing to Canadians, to encourage voluntary compliance and to protect the interests of honest taxpayers.

To educate Canadians on the facts about the seriousness of the underground economy and how we can help is extremely important. We need to demonstrate to Canadians the government is appropriately discharging its responsibilities in enforcing the law through tough but fair actions. We want to eliminate illegal activity which harms the Canadian economy and thus all Canadians.

Tax evasion compromises the government's ability to provide essential social and economic programs. It leads to unfair competition to honest businesses and it places an unfair burden on honest taxpayers.

I refer to the 1994 report of the auditor general in relation to the income tax system: "The success of the tax system depends ultimately on the public's willingness to meet its tax responsibilities through voluntary compliance. This willingness is fostered by showing respect for the taxpayers and gaining their confidence through a proper balance between facilitation and enforcement". Today I am tabling this motion and its proposals to address in part both of these aspects.

In the tax act there are consequences for failing to declare income, to report a tax return. I will outline them very briefly. If a taxpayer fails to file a return he or she can be subject to a penalty of 5 per cent of the tax unpaid. In addition, there is an interest charge of 1 per cent a month to a maximum of 12 per cent. Failure to report income can get up to a 10 per cent penalty on the income if the person were shown not to have reported income in the previous three years. In all these cases interest is compounded daily.

With regard to wilful tax evasion, the penalty prescribed is up to 50 per cent of the tax owing. If the individual is charged there can be an additional penalty ranging anywhere from an additional 50 per cent up to 200 per cent of the tax plus imprisonment of up to five years. Needless to say these penalties are very extreme and reflect the seriousness of the problem of non–compliance with the Income Tax Act.

I do not suggest the government is not interested or not taking appropriate steps with the underground economy. Much to the contrary, I believe the motion compliments much of what the government is now doing.

As we all know, the government has entered into a number of provincial information sharing agreements to assist in detection, including joint audits, shared strategy and techniques and training. There have been increased investigations and audits, particularly in identified areas of high non–compliance. These include home renovations, construction, auto sales, restaurants and jewellery, as well as other service sectors.

The government has also embarked on a program of higher publicity of prosecutions. It also has found that as a result of this increased publicity the amount of voluntary disclosures has doubled. Each year Revenue Canada handles 15,000 leads or referrals as a result of its audit activity. It is working closely with the key stakeholders, with businesses, professionals and with the provinces to deal with tax evasion, the underground economy and smuggling.

To give an idea of the extent to which it has that co–operation, Revenue Canada has held consultations with more than 240 groups representing a wide range of industry sectors, including the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Canadian Homebuilders Association, the Direct Sellers Association, the Canadian Jewellery Association, the Canadian Restaurant and Food Association, tourist associations and chambers of commerce.

These initiatives have helped to refine our strategies, identify areas of non–compliance and explore initiatives for improving that compliance. I believe that Motion No. 382 complements these initiatives by placing a greater emphasis on the role of the Canadian public.

• (1730)

I would like to suggest some general approaches which we can consider in addressing the underground economy. Certainly the information sharing agreements with the provinces will lead to enhanced opportunities for the traditional audit. The public, through an educational and information campaign should be assured that the agents of law enforcement will get appropriate support as well as become more effective. In fact in 1994–95 Revenue Canada's enforcement activities and its underground initiatives are expected to add an additional $3.8 billion to its tax assessment. Other approaches must concentrate on labour intensive sectors and other high probability areas, some of which I have already mentioned.

In launching a general information campaign to address the myth that everyone is doing it, we are going to go a long way in breaking the back of the underground economy. Most Canadians will think twice if they know there is a serious and substantial risk of being caught and that the consequences which I previously outlined are very serious.

Tax evasion is a crime. It is not a victimless crime, as often is argued. All Canadians are its victims because tax evasion leads to among other things job losses and an increase in the deficit. Honest taxpayers are carrying more of the burden of taxation. Legitimate businesses are operating in an environment of unfair competition, often leading to their bankruptcy. We must stress the theme that people who evade taxes are in fact cheating honest taxpayers, including the poor, the needy and the disadvantaged.

We need to publicize the number of investigations, leads and referrals which are received by Revenue Canada each year from Canadians who know tax evaders and are very concerned about the prevalence of tax evasion within our society. Many more Canadians would contact Revenue Canada if they only knew that those calls would be followed up. We must encourage and promote voluntary compliance as well as enlist the support of all Canadians. We have to ask them to just say no to tax evaders.

The preferred approach to non–compliance is voluntary disclosure and voluntary compliance. That is why this motion emphasizes public education and incentives for compliance rather than some aggressive measures which others may propose. The taxpayer must ultimately be treated fairly and with respect.

The underground economy permeates Canadian society for the benefit of some but to the detriment of all. Canadians must realize that underground economic activity makes victims of us all. Honest businesses are faced with unfair competition. There are job losses because many of those businesses go bankrupt. Health, education and other essential economic and social services must be reduced because of the reduced revenue. Honest taxpayers must pay more to make up for those who do not pay.

Most Canadians have been faced with an offer to pay cash for a lower price. What we do not realize is that to accept a deal from a disreputable service provider is not only to condone the crime but also to promote tax evasion. When someone offers a lower price for cash but no invoice, not only do we lose the revenue but the consumer also gives up needed protection.

In my experience we do get what we pay for. When we go underground to provide services, or particularly when consumers accept underground services, they can expect lower quality work and lower quality materials because those businesses do not have to comply and will not comply with the industry regulations. As well and most important, consumers do not get the protection and the guarantee they would otherwise have if they had an authorized purchase order and/or an invoice. When the customer goes underground as well, he has no recourse and no protection.

This motion also asks the House to consider a couple of very specific initiatives.

• (1735)

Members should be aware that in the United States 25 states have at one point or another attempted to introduce or have introduced amnesties of sorts where tax evasion is a problem.

I am proposing a limited amnesty. It is not very specific in terms of its details, but is a limited amnesty of approximately a two or three month period on interest or penalties otherwise payable when a taxpayer voluntarily comes forward and discloses and reports income previously unreported. I would like to repeat that. The amnesty has to do with interest and penalties, not the taxes otherwise owing.

Phase two of the amnesty would implement an enhanced effort to crack down by engaging more investigators on a contract or commission basis possibly. This phase would continue as long as there is a favourable pay back.

With regard to ongoing efforts, we would report regularly to the public on the success of the program and consider an extension of the time frame as has been done with such things as gun amnesties. Our analysis of those who come forward will also provide information to the government which it can use to focus future efforts, thereby creating a ripple effect of the benefits.

This particular aspect of a limited amnesty is merely a suggestion which may or not have merit quite frankly. It is the kind of thing however I am hoping that the House will give due consideration to in committee.

The second specific new approach I proposed in this motion was an input tax credit. We must let the public know that when they patronize a supplier for the cash price without an invoice, they are actually condoning fraud. By refusing to do business with those who do not give invoices, they will become part of the solution.

After some work that I had done with the finance committee particularly with regard to the hearings on the GST, one of the facts that came out clearly throughout that process of public consultation was the extensive admission of underground activity in certain sectors. That was readily forthcoming, particularly because honest businesses represented by these associations and organizations were hurting. They were going bankrupt. We were losing jobs.

The construction industry particularly related to home renovations and improvements was found to have, based on the information from those associations, anywhere from 25 per cent to 40 per cent of its activity underground. That is over $1.5 billion to $2.4 billion. There is a substantial amount of tax revenue lost to the government because that business activity has not been reported by those businesses.

The proposal therefore states that as an inducement for the public to be part of the solution, we offer a tax credit possibly for the GST paid on home improvements or renovations. The taxpayer would be required to submit an original invoice or at least keep one available for a review should they be subject to audit and submit it as part of their tax return or by a separate filing.

The objective here is to create a real paper trail in an area of abuse with which most people are familiar. Their reward is a tax credit. Although that tax credit would reduce the revenues otherwise available to the government, it does mean that we generate reported income on which federal, provincial, corporate or business taxes are paid on which withholdings for payroll, health care and other source deductions that are matched by the government also would come into the system, thereby generating substantially more revenue.

This initiative would also I believe constitute an excellent vehicle through which to educate the public on the problem and to discourage generally under the table economic activity. Finally, this initiative is basically geared to help support honest businesses that are prepared to provide an invoice.

Consider someone who has been operating underground for sometime who approached a prospective customer. If that customer asked for an invoice, it is very likely that the business person would refuse to do the business simply because they would have to provide a piece of paper which would provide that essential audit trail and be a verification of the economic activity.

• (1740)

Initiatives like this may assist us in terms of dealing with the underground economy.

I have taken the opportunity to speak with members of all parties about the matter. I am finding across the House a very strong interest in this subject matter because of its importance to all Canadians.

I am not very concerned with regard to the specific initiatives. The ultimate objective is for the House to adopt this motion as a vehicle to bring the underground economy as an issue of importance to all Canadians to committee. Then together we can explore methods in which we can address one of Canada's most serious problems, the underground economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Motion No. 382 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South. When I read the motion and the accompanying material, I was pleasantly surprised by the hon. member's trenchant analysis in his short but very interesting paper. I must say he put his finger on a fundamental problem in Canada's tax system, and I am referring to the fact that a social contract between taxpayers, individuals and even businesses and various levels of government has been broken.

This situation is so serious and so widespread, so deeply anchored in our day to day lives that recently, when the premier of Quebec, Mr. Jacques Parizeau, was buying furniture for his residence, he was asked by the salesman: "What do we do about the tax?" When we get to the point where even the Premier is asked whether the tax should go on the bill, the problem is fundamental and requires our full and undivided attention if we are to find a way to deal with the underground economy and the problems it creates for the tax system in Canada, Quebec and all the other provinces.

There are some very interesting ideas in the hon. member's document, and although the official opposition is not usually fulsome in its praise for Liberal members, and you must be aware of that, Mr. Speaker, when valid points are made, when we are offered an intelligent analysis of a problem, we are open to discussion, we are prepared to explore the best ways to deal with a situation, especially one that concerns public finances.

Consider the three suggestions the hon. member for Mississauga South explored in his motion. One is to inform the public. Many taxpayers are not aware of the impact of certain decisions or do not realize the overall impact of the decisions they make every day as consumers. Here is an example. Before the dollar dropped to 73 cents, when it was still 81 cents or 84 cents, people would tell us, and this was quite common: "Last week I went to the United States. I went shopping in the United States, because it was cheaper". That was not necessarily the case, but that is what they said. And those same people were mad as hell about the lack of jobs in Quebec and Canada.

The connection between what they do as consumers and what happens to the economy and employment is not always clear in people's minds. A campaign to educate the public about the underground economy and the impact of acts of civil disobedience, which is what we should call this today, might improve the situation in the future and make taxpayers more conscious of their obligation to contribute to the public treasury through their taxes.

The second suggestion made by the hon. member for Mississauga South also deserves our support.

• (1745)

A limited amnesty for income tax returns of previous years, not future years, should not encourage more people to evade taxes. On the other hand, a limited amnesty for the payment of interest and penalties on unreported incomes subject to federal or provincial income tax could encourage some people, who must feel ill at ease from time to time even if this practice is almost institutionalized, to pay what they owe. People may feel ill at ease by not fulfilling their civic duty to pay their normal share of taxes.

The third option suggested is also very interesting. Every one knows and talks about the fact, even if there are no comprehensive statistics about it, that renovation and construction is an area where the underground economy is flourishing. This is why a tax credit for tax payers who do some renovation could be an interesting idea to explore.

In short, the three proposals and the clearness of the analysis are such that we, as the official opposition, will support the proposal of the hon. member for Mississauga South because it is an intelligent and articulated proposal which deserves to be examined in depth by the standing committee on finance. I invite my colleague, who will have my support as a member of the committee of finance, to present his analysis and to suggest various options to the committee, as he did when he tabled his motion.

I also congratulate him for the clear thinking he shows on page 1 of his document when he says: "In the event of—this refers to the present context—cuts in social programs and a harsh budget—probably the last budget, and even the first one, both were hard on taxpayers, especially the poorest ones—the government will be blamed for not taking action in certain areas".

I congratulate him for having the courage to recognize that the context is very difficult due to the budget measures taken by the finance minister who is slashing transfer payments to the provinces for social assistance, post–secondary education and health, and is also taking, as of this year, $2.5 billion out of the unemployment insurance fund.

My colleague for Mississauga South has the sense to recognize that the government could be blamed for not acting in the areas where it should. He thinks along the same lines as we do.

For the past 15 months, as you know, we have been blaming the government for not taking action in certain areas—we seem to be exceedingly repetitive, but we will keep at it as long as it is not done.

First, when Revenue Canada is not given the necessary resources to collect unpaid taxes, which, over the years, have grown to $6.6 billion, according to the auditor general, and 75 per cent could be collected, in his estimation, with the proper resources, I agree with my colleague for Mississauga South, the government could be blamed for not taking action and for not immediately giving Revenue Canada the necessary resources to collect the amounts owing, amounts which are not even in question. We are not talking about avoiding taxes and the underground economy, we are talking about taxes that have not been paid because Revenue Canada does not have the resources to collect them. The government is to be blamed for this.

My colleague from Mississauga South said, and rightly so, that we are watching the goings on in government and that this is eroding our trust. Every day, we make new discoveries—so does the auditor general each year—regarding more wastage and lavish spending. We also are discovering places where the federal government failed to close tax loopholes. On this point, I agree with my colleague, who had the courage to say that his own government failed to do what it should have done.

They have to practice what they preach. When we see that people in government are still spending extravagantly and wasting money, for example, the trip to the United States for members of the Canadian armed forces for a rocket launching competition, holidays for diplomats at the taxpayers' expense, and when we see that the government just brushes these questions off, I think we must all admit that the government is sitting idly by, when it should be in action.

Let us look at compliance with tax laws. This issue has been in the news for the past two weeks. Once again, contraband cigarette shops are opening up all over the place. It is obvious and the government is not allocating the resources necessary to ensure compliance with tax laws.

Here again I agree with my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South. The government could be accused of not acting where it should. All this must be straightened out, as far as the tax system is concerned.

I am not talking only about the federal government, but all governments. Restore confidence, make the public aware of the consequences of not contributing adequately to the tax base, and give a good example. I think these are the essential ingredients to restore the social contract and to improve public finances.

I once again congratulate my colleague from Mississauga South. The official opposition will support his motion.

[English]

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise tonight to address Motion No. 382, which calls on the government to adopt initiatives to bring people out of the underground economy and back into the legitimate economy of this country.

The member for Mississauga South seems convinced that an enhanced information system campaign, a limited amnesty, and a home improvement tax credit will do just that. Here we have yet another Ottawa Liberal politician pushing for reactive legislation to a problem, which does not address the fundamental question of why people go underground in the first place. It is for reasons like high taxes and confusing, complex, and convoluted tax systems, GST administration and accounting costs and the list goes on.

To set the tone of my speech I would like to read a quote that was made by Alex Doulis, a very successful third generation Canadian who like many has simply packed up and left this county. He states: "I left Canada in 1989 because I began to feel powerless. I could not influence the direction of my life, which was increasingly in the hands of the Government of Canada, and the government was deaf. The problem with Canada is it has responsible government. I was giving them immense amounts of money and they used it to perpetuate their power so they didn't have to listen to me. They were responsible for me, but they did not have to represent me".

The current income tax system in Canada is outdated, overly complex, and overburdens Canadian taxpayers. Many people have lost respect for this system because they cannot understand it. They do not perceive it as fair and as a result they are quietly resisting paying taxes by both legal and illegal means.

The underground economy is evaluated at between $10 billion and $100 billion. High taxes stifle economic growth in every sector of our society, decreasing private sector productivity, increasing unemployment, and above all tempting governments to keep spending at current unsustainable levels.

That is why so many Canadians are angry at politicians and what politics and government have come to represent. For me personally, rhetoric, regulation, waste, and arrogance are just a few words that come to my mind when I think about the Liberal government and the opportunity it has to effect change.

The reality outside this fish bowl is that some people grin and bear PSTs, GSTs, income taxes and sin taxes while others choose to go underground to increase their purchasing power. All these people have to do to justify breaking the law is pick up a daily newspaper and read one of the many stories of government waste on things like grants to study blueberry jam, parliamentary junkets, MP pensions for life, and the list goes on. It is this type of negative reinforcement that encourages many honest Canadians to pay cash for goods, negotiate deals or trade their services, anything to avoid paying excessive taxes to wasteful governments.

These are not simply my views, but those reflected in one of the first speeches made by our Minister of Finance in 1994. He stated: "The rise in the underground economy is what happens when the population of a country no longer believes it is heading in a direction where we all benefit. The underground economy is not all smugglers. It is hundreds of thousands of otherwise honest people who have withdrawn their consent to be governed, who have lost faith in government".

He is aware of that. What is he doing to change it? Nothing. They still spend $40 billion more than they bring in every year. Unfortunately, Motion 382 is an example that the Liberals have done nothing to restore a sense of faith, equality, and equity in our tax system.

Not only are these people avoiding Canadian taxes, many are moving their capital completely out of Canada to invest in foreign countries. According to the Bank of Nova Scotia, in 1993 unaccounted for capital that left Canada was estimated at $7 billion. The estimated figure for previous years was consistently around $700 million. It went from $700 million to $7 billion in just a few years. That is frightening.

The former attorney general of Bermuda puts this into perspective. I read this in a book by Diane Francis, Underground Nation, where the attorney general of Bermuda is quoted as saying: "People in huge numbers are hiding money offshore because they feel overburdened or feel so unfairly treated that they think there is no point in keeping their money captive at home. What is happening is that high tax rates in Canada and elsewhere are turning what used to be hard working honest businessmen into tax evaders. The feeling I get from Canadians and certain island institutions is that they are getting a lot of Canadian money invested outside of Canada which is not there legitimately".

Why will the government not wake up? The best way to solve the problem of the underground economy is by making cheating not worth while, similar to the smugglers' bill: take away the profit from the smugglers and get rid of that tax and smuggling will end. Lower taxes are the answer.

When people see governments like this one blow their hard earned tax money, increased enforcement from a government standpoint is an exercise in futility. Motion 382 calls for voluntary compliance measures to bring these people back into the mainstream economy. Voluntary compliance measures will have little effect on people who truly feel they have been wronged by the government. It is human nature.

Although I do not condone those who knowingly break the law, the reality is that if governments do not play by the rules, what incentives are there for their citizens to play by the rules? Why is there a double standard that when you are a politician you get a pension plan that is three or four times as good as that of the private sector? Do as we say and not as we do is fast becoming the new Liberal slogan, replacing jobs, jobs, jobs.

Although the Liberals campaigned on integrity and a new philosophy of governing, I along with many Canadians feel that we are watching the same play in the same theatre with different actors playing the same roles. The names have changed but it is the same old script.

For example, with Motion No. 382 a member of the government is calling for additional tax dollars to be spent on advertising to inform Canadians of the importance, the incentives, and the obligations to pay taxes. Where is the importance and the incentive and the obligation of the government to justify how it spends money and to eliminate the waste in government spending? Why is that not addressed in the motion?

If the government has to offer incentives to comply with its policies then there is something wrong with those policies. Like the Tories, however, the Liberals do not get it. Rank and file Canadians are protesting the tax system in Canada and their concerns are not registering with this administration. Surely the estimated size of the underground economy and nationwide tax protests should have sounded some alarm bells within the Liberal caucus. Apparently not. Motion No. 382, for example, has an amnesty clause to encourage people to come clean and pay taxes they have avoided without fear of punishment by the government. Where is the common sense logic in this suggestion? An amnesty will only get people to pay the taxes they refused to comply with in the first place. How is that an incentive?

It is time for the Liberals to stop these nickel and dime, band–aid solutions for problems with our tax system and begin the long overdue process of tax reform and tax relief. Attack the disease, not just the symptom. The Reform Party understands the difference between the two. That is why we have committed ourselves to spending reductions and tax reform, including the development of a simple, visible, flat system of taxation for Canada. The single most important aspect of this system is that it would be fair, removing the incentive for many to go underground in the first place.

It is interesting to note that Motion No. 382 is targeted at GST avoidance, which indicates that the Liberals have truly backtracked from the campaign promise to scrap the GST.

Our whole process of tax reform and relief would come under the umbrella of spending reduction and restraint. A Reform government would legislate balanced budgets. We would protect taxpayers dollars by reducing the size of the federal House,not increasing it to 301 as this administration plans to do.

• (1800)

We would pass more responsibility on to provincial governments as well as individual Canadians. The time has come to put money back into the hands of those closest to the problems facing Canadians and, most important, those who will spend it best.

In conclusion, a Reform government would mean effective government, a transparent government with full disclosure. We would introduce proactive legislation to clean up the fiscal mess in the country which many Canadians are doing their best to avoid.

The Liberals on the other hand will continue to propose band–aid solutions like Motion No. 382. I have a message for all angry Canadian taxpayers out there when they come to the end of their financial rope: "Tie a knot, hang on, a Reform government is just around the corner".

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is always so nice to follow the doom and gloom party.

It is a pleasure to speak today on Motion No. 382 introduced by the member for Mississauga South. Basically the motion calls on the government to consider establishing initiatives to address the massive underground economy that exists in Canada today.

The issue is of concern to me and should be of concern to all Canadians. I have even managed to address the matter while I was vice–chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. I had the opportunity to ask one witness, a deputy minister at Revenue Canada, about Canada's underground economy. He said that a lot of the situations which caused the underground economy were for elected representatives to discuss and address. This is what we are doing today. My colleague from Mississauga South has proposed ways to address the problem I spoke about before the committee.

The underground economy has a great deal of strength in Canada. The exact size of lost revenue is unknown, with estimates ranging from $20 billion to $140 billion a year. What is known is that each time someone participates in the underground economy money to help pay for our programs such as health care or education is lost and will most likely never be recovered.

It is safe to say that we are taking money from ourselves by being part of the underground economy. We must ask ourselves what is causing this type of economy, one the Minister of Finance does not want to see grow. It could be the threat of taxes. It could be the problems with the Department of National Revenue. It could be the perception that the system is bogged down in bureaucratic red tape. It could be a lot of things. Is it the hated GST? For whatever reason it is real. The underground economy is alive and well.

I hear stories in my riding of Victoria—Haliburton about welding shops which have gone out of business and now operate out of a truck and only collect cash. I hear of car body shops that only deal in cash, buy their materials in cash and pay their employees in cash. It has been said that there are restaurants which pay students cash and tell them not to report it. Some people have told me of contractors who continually give two quotes, a quote for cash and a quote for the legitimate way. Furthermore, some people have actually removed their business listings from the phone book so they can work in cash.

I know a lot of these people were never tax cheaters in their lives, but they may have been forced into operating this way or feel they have to operate this way because they have been doing it for so long and penalties would be too harsh if they come out and operate honestly.

One part of the motion is designed to address the situation precisely. The second part of the motion is designed to give some relief or limited forgiveness on interest and other penalties payable when a taxpayer voluntarily declares previously undeclared income.

Be honest and you won't be punished is the message in the motion. Another part of the motion suggests educating the public about the problem and encouraging its participation in solving the situation.

Our tax system is based on taxpayers voluntarily filing and paying their taxes. It is probably the least expensive way for the federal government to collect taxes owing. However there are some who do not pay which gives some businesses an unfair advantage. In the long run, if every Canadian paid their fair share, we would be further ahead. Most important, we would be paying in a far fairer way.

Nothing is more frustrating for small businesses such as contractors bidding for a job to lose the bid because the competition put in a low bid and an under the table bid.

• (1805)

Another part of the information campaign deals with ensuring people realize the federal government, in particular the Department of National Revenue, is addressing the problem of the underground economy. In the future more people will be exposed for contributing to the underground economy and once caught there are some serious consequences to consider. Furthermore the information campaign must stress that jobs are lost when the underground economy flourishes.

Canada must begin to realize that doing things above board is in the best interest of everyone involved. At the same time this part of the motion calls upon us as a government to help to create an atmosphere in which doing things above board is acceptable. There are other ways to encourage people to do things above board and the third part of the motion touches on them.

The third and last part of the motion deals with giving tax credits to people who are doing home improvements or renovations. The idea is to diminish the two–quote system which already exists. It also creates a paper trail that can serve as a primary vehicle for the information campaign I mentioned earlier.

We as a government must make sure that society is not punished for being honest. We must create an economy in which hard work and dedication are rewarded. We do not want to send out a message that it is all right to operate in the underground economy because everyone else is doing it.

One of our priorities when we were elected was to focus on jobs and growth. The motion helps to maintain that message and I urge all members to support the idea of the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to both sides of the motion presented by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

One positive side is that the member is looking for solutions to a problem. I endorse that. I encourage members to do that type of thing. The other positive side to the motion is that it reflects what many constituents are thinking. There are constituents who are saying that the present situation is unfair to legitimate business. There are other constituents who are saying that we can work our way out of it.

I refer to a letter from a constituent who came to see me in my constituency office in Nanaimo some weeks ago. His name is Gary Chandler. His thoughts were to give each taxpayer a new deduction on income tax which would represent 5 per cent to 10 per cent of taxable income for improvements to a principal residence. Canadians have more savings per capita than the people of most countries. The measure would free up enough of that money to reduce unemployment. It would also cut into the underground market as legitimate receipts would be required.

When I read the letter and talked with the gentleman I thought it was an attractive idea, that it was something positive to undercut the burgeoning underground economy. I am not an expert in this regard so I decided to find out what my colleagues in the Reform caucus thought. I passed it on to them and the caucus financial committee discussed it. They went at it in some detail. However they found that they could not support it for the following reasons.

First, they said the taxes that would be forgone by this type of exemption would make it quite costly. The next point they brought to my attention was that it would therefore be necessary to extend the same tax privilege to other areas such as car repair, small appliance repair and household appliance repair. All sorts of areas would stand in line and say: "Us too". Before we knew it we would have a whole series of exemptions that would affect the way we do business.

The third reason they gave was that it would move us, certainly as a party, away from our proposal for a flat tax system. A lot of Canadians are complaining about the tax system. We have to make it simpler and easier to understand. The forms have to be simpler and so on. This type of exemption would move us away from that area.

The final reason they could not support it was found when examining the reason for having the underground economy. This is the principal one. The reason we have an underground economy is the same reason my colleague pointed out a few minutes ago. The government's spending level is too high. Therefore the taxation level is too high. We keep pounding at that over and over again. We realize we have a $550 billion debt and it is growing. We have to do something about it.

The government is now taking some small steps toward reducing deficit spending. We do not feel it is enough, but it is the basic reason behind the fact that we have an underground economy. Unless we tackle that first we will not solve the bigger problems.

I compliment the member for Mississauga South for raising this initiative and for trying to solve the problems. While it is reflective of the thinking among constituents asking how to solve the problems, nevertheless overspending and the high taxation rate on the part of government must be overcome first.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I commend the member for Mississauga South for his interest in bringing this important subject to the House. There is absolutely no question our Minister of National Revenue and members on both sides of the House are very concerned about the direction of our underground economy. The issue has the focus of all Canadians and is very important to all Canadians across the country.

The greater the activity in the underground economy, the less revenue there is for governments. Underground economic activity creates unfair competition for honest businesses. Jobs are lost and honest taxpayers are forced to pay more of an unfair system in taxes when the underground economy flourishes.

For many individuals and businesses the underground economy has become a convenient way to avoid paying taxes, not to pay their fair share. When these people take their financial transactions underground they are failing to support Canada's social and economic programs. These people do not pay for the services they use. Instead other Canadians are forced to pay more. Other Canadians are forced to pay for those who participate in the underground economy.

I am very surprised the member for Calgary Centre suggested and almost condoned the underground economy and gave reasoning for it. It is serious to all Canadians that no one condone the practice. It is certainly not morally sound or fair to Canadians.

People who deal in the underground economy may feel their financial situation justifies the actions. It may be because they have not had a raise in several years. It may be because they feel the taxes are too difficult for them to comprehend. It may be just because of basic greed. They see it as cheating the tax department. It is not a simple matter of cheating a victimless tax department. It is cheating friends, the people who live next door and the people who do business in the community. It is cheating every Canadian, forcing them to pay more in an unfair system.

• (1815)

I ask members as well as all Canadians to consider the real cost of the underground activity. The cost is large. It shows up in reduced essential services, higher taxes than we would otherwise be paying, unfair competition and a reduced standard of living to the honest taxpayers.

How does the underground economy affect the legitimate businessman trying to be competitive? The Canadian Homebuilders Association is concerned. Home renovators who evade taxes have an unfair advantage over other home contractors. Right from the start, honest businesses are at a competitive disadvantage because they cannot offer the consumer the same deal offered by someone who will not collect the taxes. The end result is that legitimate businesses face unfair competition and jobs are lost.

We must not forget dishonest consumers. Dishonest consumers who take a lower price and pay cash are cheating the system. They are becoming party to the evasion of taxes. These same consumers benefit from a full range of government services but are not paying their fair share. All they have done is take part in the transaction which jeopardizes our health, education and other essential services. This is simply unfair and very short sighted.

The motion before us suggests the government educate the public and encourage its participation in addressing the problems. I agree Canadians need to know the facts about the seriousness of the underground economy and what it is doing to hurt Canadians. I also agree governments cannot solve the problem alone. We all must take part and fulfil our responsibilities.

The government has recognized solutions to this problem it is now facing are not in isolation by themselves. We must understand the problem and its consequences. It is for this reason that in November 1993 the Minister of National Revenue made education a fundamental element to address the underground economy.

During this past year, officials of Revenue Canada have actively been consulting with individuals and associations across the country. Revenue Canada is seeking support of groups and individuals throughout the country. With the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, for example, the department established a working committee to investigate the causes of the underground economy, to examine audit techniques and identify training that would assist in tracking down unreported or under reported income and identify the opportunities for reducing the cost of the administrative burden for compliance for businesses and individuals.

These groups are taking the message of the risks of dealing in the underground back to their memberships. Every citizen and every business has a role to play in eliminating the underground economy. Individuals can start by refusing to deal with businesses and trades people who ask for cash payments. Businesses can do their part by turning down demands to do work off the books by making sure that does not happen.

To ensure everyone is aware the government is serious about prosecuting those who deliberately defraud the system, the Minister of National Revenue is publicizing convictions for tax evasion. The increased publicity has had a deterrent effect. The number of voluntary disclosures received by the department in which people have come forward to correct their tax affairs has doubled in the past year. In addition, the number of referrals received from people each year providing the department with leads on potential tax fraud has risen to about 19,000.

I am confident we are making the right progress in dealing with the underground economy and I am hopeful all Canadians and all members of the House will applaud the efforts of the member for Mississauga South for stimulating this debate in the House.

I urge members of the House to carry the message back to their constituents. I urge the members of the House to actively seek solutions for the underground economy and create a better and fairer nation for every business.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT ACT

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (for the Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.) moved that Bill C–82, an act to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–82 is of wide ranging significance for Canadians. The piece of legislation will enable the government to modernize Canada's currency by introducing a new $2 coin.

The bill is part of a two–tier approach that will transform Canada's currency system and save Canadian taxpayers a half billion dollars over 20 years. The other element of the strategy is the decision to change the metal composition of the 1–cent, 5–cent, 10–cent, 25–cent and 50–cent circulation coins. Such a move has become necessary given the rising cost of producing the coins.

For example, it now costs approximately 1.4 cents to produce a 1–cent coin. In all, altering the metal content of the coins will result in annual savings of $12 million.

[Translation]

These new measures, an important stage in the history of our currency, are arousing a lot of interest throughout the country. For Canadians, their currency is more than a mere payment instrument. It is part of their heritage, a national symbol.

By deciding to replace the $2 bill with a coin and by changing the metal composition of the lower denomination coins, the government remains true to the principles it has always stood for.

Since our government took office, it has been faced with difficult choices. We have never shirked our responsibilities and we always tried to face the music in cooperation with all Canadians.

[English]

The savings to the people of Canada are considerable. I have already discussed the savings that will accrue to the people of Canada as a result of changing the metal composition of the lower denomination coins. It is estimated that moving to a $2 coin will by itself save taxpayers $254 million over the next 20 years. This is because coins last so much longer than notes.

At present the $2 bill costs 6 cents per unit to produce, but with all the wear and tear it takes a note only lasts one year. A $2 coin, on the other hand, will cost approximately 16 cents to produce but will last 20 years.

The new $2 coin brings another benefit to the government: within 18 months of issuing the coin the government will obtain $449 million in seigniorage. The difference between the unit cost to produce a coin and the face value of the coin is seigniorage. Within 18 months of issuing the $2 coin $449 million in seigniorage will accrue to the government, thus an additional $500 million for the government's consolidated revenue fund within 18 months. This is not bad by any stretch.

This move also reflects the government's sense of priorities. All Canadians understand that we have to get the government deficit under control, which demands spending cuts in every government department. As was stated in this year's budget, Canadians want the government to spend money and secure savings in ways that make sense and that reflect their values. To do so it is essential that our efforts be guided by clear principles.

[Translation]

The proposed changes to our currency are a good example of the savings that can be achieved with some determination and creativity.

Let me also tell the House that the government is looking for other ways to reduce spending in order to avoid tax increases. The introduction of the new $2 coin and the proposed changes to the other denomination coins will also meet our needs, since coins are still widely used in Canada.

In fact, despite the growing popularity of credit cards and debit cards, coins are still used in over 75 per cent of all financial transactions made in this country.

The third principle is frugality; each dollar matters. The initiatives put forward today are probably the best way to illustrate this principle. Some will argue that savings of $12 million a year, or half a billion dollars over 20 years, are not a big deal, but on this side of the House, we think that every little bit counts and as the old saying goes: "Little streams make big rivers". This government thinks that a dollar saved is a dollar in the pockets of the taxpayers.

[English]

By making these impressive savings in the production of our coins we are helping Canadians avoid painful budget cuts in other areas. Let me be perfectly clear. Our government is committed to eliminating the deficit, which will require more spending cuts in the years to come. Reducing the cost of our currency is a good example of spending cuts that are fair to all Canadians and relatively painless.

• (1010)

Some people have expressed concern about the changes to our national coinage, but the disadvantages which are mostly related to the bulk of coins are far outweighed by the advantages, especially the considerable savings.

I am convinced that if given the choice all Canadians would choose a few more coins in their pockets or purses over fewer dollars in their bank accounts as a result of tax increases. Canadians understand that a $2 coin will add a little weight to their pockets but will take a big load off the debt.

The government also understands the concerns of the vending industry and is committed to giving this and other important factors the time they need to adjust to the changes. The 8 to 12 months advance notice they have received should allow them to convert their equipment to handle the new coins. One reason we decided to introduce the new $2 coin at this time as we change the composition of other coins is to assist the vending industry.

By pursuing the two initiatives at the same time the industry will only face a one–time investment in recalibrating its machines.

[Translation]

Not only will the new $2 coin be better adapted to the needs of our trade and industry sector, it will also be more practical for users. As more and more goods and services such as coffee, snacks, laundromats, subway tickets and public parking require the use of coins, the need for printing low denomination bills is increasingly reduced.

By modernizing its currency in this fashion, Canada is joining the ranks of the many countries all over the world that already have higher denomination coins. The United Kingdom, France, Germany, Japan and Switzerland are only some of the countries which have recognized the practical value of coins as a method of payment. Many countries have coins that have a much greater nominal value than ours. For example, in the United Kingdom, the one pound coin has approximately the same value as our new $2 coin.

France is another country where low denomination bills have been withdrawn. In fact, their smallest bill, the twenty franc bill, is worth almost $5. Some European countries have coins that are worth as much as our $10 bill.

[English]

The proposed coin is composed of a nickel outer ring with a round aluminium bronze core. The use of bimetallic coins is another trend that is growing throughout the world. Such countries as France, Italy, Hong Kong, Singapore, Mexico and many others are already using such coins. The government's choice of a bimetallic $2 coin reflects another one of our principles, that of helping Canada break into new markets with new products. The capability of producing a bimetallic coin in Canada will position the mint and Canadian suppliers to compete internationally for the bimetallic coin business.

This is especially true given the Royal Canadian Mint's worldwide reputation for unsurpassed quality, its markets and its production expertise internationally. I am convinced that the capability of producing the bimetallic $2 coin will give the mint and potential Canadian suppliers another advantage in foreign markets.

I have outlined many of the tangible benefits that will flow from the changes. Canadians will benefit directly from the immediate cost savings as well as from the more cost effective method of producing coins. All this will result in a more efficient and effective coin system that can only help our economy.

The criteria for an effective coin system are that the system will first meet the needs of trade and commerce, will be cost effective, will have public acceptance and will meet public preference.

• (1015)

I have already addressed the first two points regarding the new coin. I would now like to address the issues of public acceptance and public preference. As was the case with the introduction of the ever popular loonie, I am confident that Canadians will also come to enjoy the convenience, the distinctive look, and the feel of the $2 coin.

The $1 coin may give us an idea of how popular its sibling could prove to be. Since its introduction, more than 685 million

$1 coins have been struck, which is more than double the number of $1 bills that were in circulation when they began to be withdrawn.

[Translation]

As a matter of fact, after seeing the success we have had with our loonie, the U.S. general accounting office is looking at reintroducing the $1 coin in the United States. That says a lot.

It is not necessary to wait and see if our $2 coin will be popular. According to the information we have now, more than 79 per cent of Canadians are in favour of the new $2 coin because of the savings it will bring.

Once they are informed of all the advantages associated with the new coin and of the modifications that will be made to the metal composition of other coins, I am convinced that Canadians will support this project wholeheartedly.

Canadians in all the provinces have shown their support for the new $2 coin by sending their ideas on the theme and the illustration of the coin. The Royal Canadian Mint has already received over 17,000 submissions from school children, artists, coin collectors and other Canadian men and women.

I encourage members of this House who have received suggestions from their constituents or who want to make their own suggestions to send them to us, but they have to do it as soon as possible because this cost–saving measure is progressing very quickly.

Our government is making these changes in the interest of all Canadians. The savings alone justify this decision but, more importantly, these changes reflect our determination to prepare for the future.

[English]

In making these changes we are also responding to the message we received from Canadians from coast to coast and we are putting into practice the message we sent out in the February budget. They want us to spend money and secure savings in ways that make sense and reflect Canadian values. We want to carry out their wishes in ways that cause the least pain possible.

It is only a small step in our larger march toward the future, but it is a symbol of our government's ongoing commitment to reducing the cost of government while providing service to Canadians.

Surely the people of Canada will benefit greatly from the introduction of the new $2 coin. That is why I strongly urge all members of the House to help us in passing Bill C–82.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House to speak to Bill C–82, an act to replace the $2 bill with a coin.

As the parliamentary secretary just explained, this change would save the government some $12 or 13 million yearly for the next 20 years. This measure will save us money. In fact, as he explained, the production cost of a bill, which has a circulation life of about 1 year, is 6 cents; the cost of minting a coin, which has a circulation life of 20 years, is 16 cents. Hence, the savings of $250 million over 20 years.

However, the parliamentary secretary neglected to mention the costs, amounting to approximately $30 million, which will be associated with the new coin. There certainly is the potential for savings; that is the main reason the government tabled this bill. When it comes to that pursuit, the Bloc Quebecois has always striven to propose to the government ways of saving money. This is always practical, especially for a government facing a deficit.

• (1020)

Some businesses, in particular bus companies, also support this initiative because they are having problems with their money boxes. All those $2 bills tend to get stuck in the money boxes on buses. That is indeed a great problem, and perhaps one of the arguments in favour of replacing the bill with a coin.

We can talk about savings for the government and for the government only. That is where the savings end. Substantial costs will be associated with making the transition to the use of the coin.

Mr. Laurin: Mr. Speaker, when a member has the floor, I think his colleagues should at least give him a chance to express his views and other people a chance to listen. The comments being made right and left make it impossible for us to listen undisturbed to what the speaker for our party has to say. I would appreciate, Mr. Speaker, if you would call my colleagues to order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I am sure that is what we want, regardless of the topic or the member who is speaking, and I hope hon. members will remember this, and that the debate will proceed in a way that is acceptable to all members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Joliette for coming to the rescue. I was so absorbed in my speech that I did not notice the other conversations that were going on, but now, as I look around me, I see people talking.

As I was saying, the purpose of Bill C–82 is to issue a coin that will replace the $2 bill, as a money saving measure that, I agree, will save approximately $240 million over 20 years. But that is where the saving stops. When we consider the transition period until this legislation can be implemented, we are talking about substantial expenditures, because it is clear that the private sector will again be stuck with spending several million dollars during the transition. As you know, when the government issues a new coin, in this case the $2 coin, it means all cash registers in every business in this country have to be changed.

At the present time, cash registers can accommodate coins in denominations of 1 cent, 5 cents, 10 cents, 25 cents and one dollar, and now all cash registers will have to be changed to accommodate the $2 coin. Who is going to pay? The merchants, of course. We will have to change all the vending machines across the country, at an estimated cost of more than $80 million. And yes, there is more. We will have to change parking meters in our municipalities to accommodate the $2 coin, and ticket counters and video games. And what about telephone booths? There are a lot of those in Canada. Apparently, the additional cost for the private sector in Canada will be $400 million during the first year, and that is a conservative estimate. That is the minimum cost to the private sector.

These are very substantial amounts.

• (1025)

It is nonsense to say, like the parliamentary secretary, that it is painless for the business community. There is nothing painless about obliging merchants to change their cash registers at a time when many are already suffering as a result of poor decision making by this government. Consider the GST and all the paperwork small businesses have to cope with, businesses that in some cases are on the verge of bankruptcy. Now they are being asked to change their cash registers. This is not necessarily good news for them.

We can hardly say this is painless and that the government is acting in the best interests of a private sector that will have to spend at least $400 million because a new coin is being issued.

I heard some comments from government members. Sure, this will get the economy going. This will make a real difference. Four hundred million dollars at least will be spent. That will make a difference. I think this reasoning shows a lack of imagination and I would even say a lack of intelligence on the part of the government, because we know perfectly well that if the government really wanted to boost the economy, it could do it in a positive way.

If the government really cared about promoting private enterprise and small business, it would make an effort to simplify the paperwork, the forms and all the taxes imposed on small business and forget about issuing a $2 coin.

Issuing a $2 coin is no help to small business or even businesses in general in Canada. It complicates their lives. It forces them to spend money for something they did not ask for. Who, in the end, is going to pay for it? Businesses will pass the cost on to the customer. It will have an inflationary effect, perhaps like the introduction of the GST and all the other government measures of the past. It will have an inflationary effect.

We all know that, with the introduction of the dollar coin a few years ago, a whole slew of things that sold for 80 cents, 85 cents or 90 cents suddenly started selling for a dollar. The same thing will happen again. Everything that now sells for $1.75 will now suddenly be selling for $2. It is not fair. This negative effect is not fair for consumers who will have to pay a little more for each purchase.

All the business people who will have to buy another cash register will pass the cost on in the goods and services they sell to their customers. Basically, the consumers will be the ones to pay. On the pretext of saving $250 million, the federal government is handing another bill to the consumers, who will have to pay two or three times more. This is unimaginative, would you not say, Mr. Speaker?

Besides, this is not a new approach. The federal government has often passed a debt on to the provinces or the municipalities in order to save money and reduce its deficit. In this case, it is passing the debt on to the consumer.

Furthermore, this measure not only does not help the economy, it may even have an inflationary effect on certain items. It may even be said to have a slowing down effect, dragging the economy down. Here again, this is not helping private enterprise, which is being stuck with a needless expenditure, one it never asked for. There is no money in this for private enterprise.

No business asked for this, except perhaps bus companies which could benefit from the elimination of the $2 bill. There would be no more $2 paper money. People would probably have to use one dollar coins. In other words, what I am trying to tell the parliamentary secretary is that there may be other ways to solve the problem caused by $2 bills in bus fare boxes.

To introduce a $2 coin at this time, given the present economic situation in Canada, with its crushing debt load and cuts to social programs and elsewhere, could possibly slow down the economy, because of the additional costs to the system. The government is considering expenses the private sector finds useless. It will cause consumers to spend more for the sake of saving a few million dollars.

Again, we, in the Bloc, believe Canada should save money, but not just any which way and at any cost. If, to try to save $250 million, you ask consumers to pay $400 million, what kind of saving is it? The parliamentary secretary mentioned the fact that the reaction from the public was very positive, that people were enthusiastic, and that the $1 coin had become the ever popular loonie. We were given the impression that the public agreed, and so did associations and merchants, but this is not the case at all.

The majority of merchant associations and consumer associations were not consulted. Only a few were consulted, and some said they felt the government was going too fast. Consumer and merchant associations remember the costly introduction of the $1 coin which was not readily accepted by the public and is not quite entirely accepted yet. Its impact was not very positive. It took some time to get used to it. Right from the start, the coin was found to be too heavy, too big, and unacceptable. This was a mistake.

The consumer and merchant associations I consulted told me that the government was going too fast. It might make another mistake and introduce a coin which might be heavier, bigger, and even less acceptable for the public, and which will be of no help to the private sector or retail business and will hurt them. It will cost shopkeepers at least $400 million more to adapt to this new coin and, in the end, consumers will have to foot the bill.

We have to ask ourselves whose interests the government is defending? Who exactly are we serving here? For whom do politicians work? To whom are we accountable? Is the government taking these measures just to solve some small problem of its own? By creating this $2 coin, we might be solving problems only for the Royal Canadian Mint, while ignoring those of the business people and the population.

The parliamentary secretary argued that the Royal Canadian Mint will have the opportunity to develop an industry and compete with other similar industries over the world, even sell $2 coins to the United States maybe. But can he explain why the Royal Canadian Mint is unable to compete on the international market right now? Why does it need a $2 coin? We already have the nickel, dime, quarter, half dollar, and dollar coin; we could mint 2, 5 and 10 dollar coins for other countries.

Is helping the Royal Canadian Mint compete internationally a good enough reason to introduce a two dollar coin in Canada, when in fact, the Royal Mint is quite capable of competing on the international market as things stand right now? Are we creating that coin just to please the Royal Canadian Mint? Should we not first try to find out if the public wants such a thing? Do shopkeepers and business people want that coin? That is the question.

Before we implement a change as important as this one, it seems to me we should get to the bottom of the issue and ask ourselves who we are supposed to serve. I happen to think we are here to serve the public. Therefore, before doing anything else, we should consult the public. We should find out if Canadians really agree with the introduction of a $2 coin.

The parliamentary secretary says that everybody agrees. Everyone wants coins, they love the loonie, the "ever popular loonie", as he said. Yet, when you look at the poll which was conducted, you wonder whether it was not also orchestrated to please the Royal Canadian Mint.

The were two polls, the one we are interested in was done this year or at least the results were released this year. In fact, this is the only poll done this year by Environics, although it was in two parts. It shows that, deep down, there is a strong reluctance in the public.

The company did one poll that showed that about 50 per cent of the people said no, absolutely not, no $2 coin. Another 50 per cent said maybe, they hesitated. And this was interpreted as a positive response, 50 per cent said yes.

The parliamentary secretary did not talk about the people who are against it. Environics redid the poll a second time and talked to the same 1,000 people—because they only talked to 1,000 people in Sherbrooke, Toronto and Calgary. They repolled the same 1,000 persons and they told them that the country would be saving $250 million. That second time, of course, the acceptance rate jumped to almost 80 per cent. Sure, everybody is in favour of motherhood and apple pie.

Everybody in Canada wants to save money. Nobody in Canada would refuse the government a chance to save. But did they take the time to explain to these people that it will also cost a lot of money to merchants and consumers? No, they did not take the time to explain that. They did not take the time to explain the other possibilities or to do a thorough polling to try to avoid the mistake made when the $1 coin was introduced. There was a big mistake made at the time. We know that.

When you look back at the history of our currency, you realize that there was a very strong opposition to the loonie. People were saying it was not real money, it was just a piece of metal of the wrong colour and it was far too big and too heavy.

• (1040)

But worst of all, the government did not take the time to inform the people. It did not launch, let us say, an advertising or information campaign to explain to citizens the need for this coin. It could have consulted people and put some effort into producing a coin that would perhaps be less bulky, lighter and more original, but it did not do so.

Once a coin is introduced, we are stuck with it for the rest of our lives. We cannot change it. The same thing can be said of the loonie. A mistake was made and this is not the ever popular loonie. Even in Kingston, as in cities everywhere, banks have 50 million loonies in their strongrooms, because this coin is not circulating. People did not accept it.

Here we are stuck with perhaps 50 million loonies which are not in circulation, quite a load. Obviously, in Kingston as elsewhere in the country, we will witness the same reluctance to use the $2 coin and it is already happening. I sense it myself but one has only to speak to people in the streets, on the buses and so on to see that people do not want a $2 coin. People did not accept the loonie, so why would there not be even greater reluctance to use a bigger and heavier coin?

Of course such reluctance is normal, because the idea is new. But if we decide to eliminate the $2 bill, for example, it will be a new experience too.

The government lacks imagination and vision. It does not take the time to really think things through. Even if, for some, the introduction of a $2 coin will not change the world, one has to take the time to do one's job. The Department of Public Works certainly did not do its job in this case; besides the minister did not even bother coming here to defend his bill this morning. Or rather, the hon. minister is here in spirit, smiling through his colleagues.

I note, however, certain factors that clearly indicate to me that the minister is not particularly interested in defending his bill as I would have liked him to.

Polls which unfortunately are made to serve the interests of the Royal Canadian Mint, but polls which are also incomplete, very incomplete, and which repeat the errors of the past, which do not consider two other alternatives that must be considered, that the government could consider, with the same regard for economy and with a greater respect for the general public.

If, for example, the government took a close look at the situation, maybe it would realize that this is not the right moment to introduce a $2 coin. Maybe this is not the time. Maybe we should maintain for some time the current system with the $2 paper bill. Maybe the timing is not right. Maybe the retailers do not want to be involved in another change, when they are already being buffeted by changes in taxation and forms coming from the government. Another government requirement, more useless spending by the government. Maybe this is not the right time. Maybe this is a lack of judgment on the government's part, bad timing, and if the government really, sincerely wanted to save money, it could do it elsewhere.

I could suggest many ways to save those $250 million. The Minister of Public Works could himself abolish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities agency, something that has been suggested to him many times, because we know that this agency spends its money very freely, making gifts to this one and that one. We read in the newspapers that the minister, who does not have the best reputation in the government when it comes to his handouts, could, by abolishing the agency which spends between $300 million and $500 million every year, have saved a much greater amount that the savings that we are supposedly making by issuing a two dollar coin.

There are all sorts of reasons and examples that we can give to encourage the government to save $250 million. Also, there is a second alternative. First, we can maintain the current situation and continue for a while, because the timing is bad for merchants and consumers. The other alternative that the government did not even consider and that I suggest simply because I too am interested in savings, is to abolish the two dollar denomination, whether paper or coin, as was done in the United States.

In the past—I have a $2 bill, I had a $2 bill in my hand—there was a $2 bill in the United States. I was in New York when they abolished it. There was no problem with that. There are no $2 bills any more in the United States. It is not the only country in the world that has abolished the two dollar bill. The parliamentary secretary mentioned that a two dollar bill had been introduced in Great Britain. But that is not true. In Britain, it was abolished, and several other countries simply abolished the two dollar denomination.

Some countries did convert it into a coin, but others did not. The parliamentary secretary seemed to want to mention only those who converted it into a coin. Many countries have abolished the two dollar denomination, and if they did, so can Canada. That could be very well received. It is not as if we wanted to abolish the 1 cent coin or another denomination essential to counting money. A $2 bill is not like a cent. To abolish the cent would have a devastating impact because we would be abolishing a unit essential to counting money. But the $2 bill is not essential, for that purpose. The proof of that, I repeat, is that other countries did it successfully.

That is what I am suggesting to the government. If we kept the present $2 bill for a while or if we simply removed it for some time, the government would save more money than by introducing a $2 coin.

This way, private business would not have to spend another $400 million to no real puprpose. Municipalities would not be forced to spend money replacing parking meters, vending machines, cash registers and all sorts of other business machines all across Canada. We would save a lot of money, and even the government would save.

If the government decided to eliminate the $2 bill, it would still be possible to reintroduce it later, if it was considered a mistake or if the public did not accept the change. By contrast, once the $2 coin is introduced, we will already have spent $400 million. The damage will already have been done. If it were abolished later on because the public did not accept it, the private sector would still have made unnecessary investments.

Some say that perhaps the timing is wrong, since the government is considering the introduction of a $5 coin. Some countries, Australia for instance, introduced a $5 coin. By the way, in Australia, the $2 and $5 coins have not been accepted yet.

• (1050)

At least the government understood that this is not the right time to issue a five dollar coin. They have understood that at least. They say: We may issue a five dollar coin in five or ten years from now. Why not wait and issue the two coins at the same time? Why now? What is the hurry? Why impose unnecessary expenses on the private sector? Why not wait for technological advances?

As we all know, we live in a rapidly changing society. I, for one, pay my newspaper with a credit card. I do not use spare change very often. People, at least in my town, use credit cards or debit cards issued by their caisses populaires to make purchases at their convenience store or supermarket. Plastic may be the way of the future.

New technologies could make currency obsolete a few years from now. Why should we have a bill which will force unnecessary expenses on merchants and tax consumers even more, when we know that in a few years from now technology will make coins obsolete? I believe this bill shows a lack of foresight, intelligence and vision.

This government is clumsy. Obviously they have not done their homework. Even their argument regarding fare boxes in buses is clumsy. They claim that there will be no more two dollar bills obstructing fare boxes and that using two one dollar coins instead will solve the problem.

Some say that, if we eliminate the $2 coin, we will end up with a lot of small change in our pockets, with many more $1 coins. We will keep them in our pockets instead of leaving them in the bank. Obviously, if a $2 coin is introduced, we will have more change in our pockets anyway. Having one $2 coin is no better for us than having two $1 coins. What I am saying is that four quarters are still equal to a dollar, but that in the end we are forcing shopkeepers to spend considerable amounts.

My government colleagues disagree, arguing that people in Canada are weak and vulnerable; that they do not know how to count; that they are used to the $2 bill; that if this bill is eliminated, they will have trouble counting to two. These arguments come from the Liberals.

I think that people are smart enough to figure out that one plus one is two. They do not necessarily need a $2 coin.

Another argument from the government—as the parliamentary secretary put forward a moment ago—is that this coin would be a symbol of our national heritage. Just imagine! Some Liberal members also told me that a Canadian $2 coin would enhance the Canadian identity and makes us different from the Americans, who do not have a $2 coin. What an argument.

The Canadian identity must be pretty fragile if we need a $2 bill to maintain it. That is a pretty weak argument.

The issue of future developments must also be considered. The parliamentary secretary talked about all the other countries in the world, listing a few—like England—that have introduced a $2 coin. He said that England had issued a $2 coin which, in fact, has been eliminated. He is showing bias in his remarks, stating that several countries have issued a $2 coin, although a number of them have eliminated it.

The way of the future is not so clear. Either we eliminate the two dollar denomination or we introduce a coin. Both examples can be found in this country. The other way is perhaps to act prudently and wait for technological developments to see if credit cards and plastic money could do the job instead.

Perhaps now is not the time to make such a change, requiring business and private enterprise to pay out up to $400 million for the sole purpose of alleviating a government concern. You know, many reasons militate against passing this bill, but the main reason that I would like to call to your attention is the fact that it was brought forward by the Minister of Public Works, who has quite a reputation.

The minister has already introduced legislation, namely Bill C–52, which had to be put off indefinitely because it was flawed. The minister was trying to introduce through this legislation a means of competing with private enterprise, in particular with the Canadian architectural and consulting engineering sector. There was a general outcry across the country and it was decided not to go any further with this bill. Bill C–52 was never seen again.

Perhaps the Minister of Public Works lacks good judgment in his bills. Here is another example: this ongoing competition with Canada Post, which competes unfairly with courier companies. Again, the minister seems to encourage unfair competition with private enterprise, which goes to show that this minister does not care very much about the business and industrial community. This is a minister who has, time and time again, squandered the taxpayers' money. And the list goes on. If I had more time, I could give you more examples of how this particular minister diverts funds, wastes money and does not do his job, because what we have here is a perfect example of a minister not doing his job.

We, Bloc members, care about savings and there are great savings to be made. Perhaps this is not the right time to be introducing Bill C–82, as it entails major transition costs. This measure will cost businesses and consumers a bundle, and introducing a $2 coin will not solve the problem with the $1 coin. We suggest that the government do its job, that is to say put out feelers to check whether or not the time is right to be introducing something like this or if other alternatives should be explored, like eliminating the two–dollar denomination altogether, which was not done. This should be done because we stand to save even more by eliminating the two–dollar denomination.

It would also add an element of flexibility, since a two–dollar coin could still be introduced in the future, if need be. At least, this would be a more prudent, economical move. All I have to say to the Minister of Public Works is: "Do your job, because you have not done it so far".

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, it being eleven o'clock, we will now proceed to statements by members, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5).

ANNAPOLIS VALLEY APPLE BLOSSOM FESTIVAL

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, from May 25 to May 28 I will join with constituents of Annapolis Valley—Hants in celebrating our annual Apple Blossom Festival.

This celebration signals the end of winter and offers the promise of a new growing season. Since the first festival in 1933 there have been many changes in apple production. However, one thing has not changed: the wonderful sight and breathtaking scent of apple trees in full bloom.

This festival draws people from near and far. It is an opportunity to showcase the beauty of Annapolis Valley and the warmth and generosity of the people who live throughout my riding.

I ask all members in the House to join me in congratulating all the people who volunteer their time to make this event so special. They should truly be proud of their efforts.

ACCESS TO QUEBEC MARKET

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I remind our colleagues from the maritimes and Ontario that, this year, trade between Quebec and the rest of Canada will amount to over $70 billion in goods and services. In Ontario, hundreds of thousands of jobs are tied to exports to Quebec. As for the maritimes, let us just say that access to the Quebec market accounts for a large part of their GDP.

Make no mistake about it: the Quebec market is the second export market for the rest of Canada. Ontario's three largest private employers, GM, Ford and Chrysler, would really suffer if they were to suddenly lose the Quebec market, which absorbs one quarter of their total production.

The federalists' bluff must be denounced. If Quebec becomes sovereign, no politician from Ontario or the maritimes in this House would be able to ignore these facts and what they mean for the economy of their respective ridings. Negotiating the maintenance of a common economic space will then be a question of common sense and economic interest for all partners.

I leave it to the members of this House to draw their own conclusion.

HYACK FESTIVAL

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, every May New Westminster, British Columbia holds its annual Hyack festival, a Chinook Indian word meaning "hurry up". The May day celebration dates back to 1870.

This year marks 125 years of these May day festivities. The celebration is an important part of Canada's heritage and continues to be the longest running celebration of its kind in the British Commonwealth. Children dancing with ribbons around the maypole, parades, music and fun fill the week.

Dignitaries from many countries including Queen Elizabeth II have joined the festival in past years which includes marching bands from across Canada and the United States, as well as traditional cannon shots in memory of Queen Victoria, done with two anvils and gun powder between.

The royal city is proud to present the Hyack festival, a symbol of west coast spirit within the Canadian family of communities.

UNDERGROUND ECONOMY

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recent estimates of the size of the underground economy range from $20 billion to $140 billion per year. Even at the low end of the range the loss of revenue to Canada is significant enough to warrant the urgent attention of all Canadians.

When a consumer is offered a lower price in return for a cash payment and no invoice not only are they condoning tax evasion, they are also hurting honest taxpayers. Under the table economic activity creates unfair competition to honest businesses, resulting in bankruptcies and loss of jobs. It means lost revenue necessary to sustain health, education and other essential economic and social programs, and it means honest taxpayers must bear the burden of those who do not pay their fair share.

The preferred approach to reducing the underground economy is voluntary compliance. Therefore I call on all Canadians to just say no to tax evaders. If everyone pays their fair share we will all pay less.

FRANCO–ONTARIAN GAMES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Franco–Ontarian Games take place from May 19 to 22, at the André Laurendeau high school, in Vanier, which is part of the Ottawa–Carleton regional municipality.

Five hundred athletes, artists and performers from 60 Ontario French speaking high schools, as well as 250 young volunteers and community leaders are taking part in these games.

For the second year in a row, these games provide young Franco–Ontarians with an opportunity to come together and participate in friendly competition. This gathering of young people reflects the vitality of the French language in Ontario, while also giving us hope regarding the future of the French fact.

I join the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier in congratulating the organizers of these games and in wishing luck to all participants.

LEARNING DISABILITIES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I stand in the House today in order to raise an extremely important but often ignored problem in Canada. Learning disabilities presently affect between 5 per cent and 10 per cent of the population, which translates into two or three children in every classroom. With the proper guidance these Canadians, with average to above average intelligence, are quite capable of functioning normally in mainstream society.

Such guidance is increasingly provided by such organizations as the Learning Disabilities Association of Canada. Since 1963 this non–profit volunteer organization has been committed to the advancement of people with learning disabilities. The association serves Canadians from coast to coast in more than 140 different communities.

• (1105)

It is my pleasure today to recognize the continuing commitment of this organization in helping citizens afflicted with this disability. With the aid of this association, Canadians with learning disabilities will continue to be a vibrant and productive part of our society well into the future.

NEW ARENA IN WINNIPEG

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the wonderful world of politics, it is not unusual to see signs of government posturing after it makes dubious decisions or budgetary choices that are in the very least debateable.

Yesterday, in a very clumsy attempt to deflect criticism, the Prime Minister's behaviour was a prime example of this when he tried to justify the federal grant for the construction of a new arena in Winnipeg under the pretext that it was needed for the 1999 Pan American Games.

I would like to mention a few facts which should debunk this myth. First, Winnipeg's designation as host of the games was not contingent on it building a new arena. Second, the list of competitive sports featured in 1999 will only be issued in September 1995, and hockey is never featured at summer games. Last, an arena with a capacity of 22,000 is not needed for volleyball competitions: a capacity of 17,000, such as in the current arena, suffices. So how can the government continue to maintain that this grant is not an attempt to save the Jets?

People are not stupid. Confronted with these irrefutable facts, the Prime Minister should have—

The Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I am now giving the floor to the hon. member for Calgary Northeast.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, to date 81 of 87 members of a Chinese investment delegation who came to Canada on visitors visas have disappeared and gone underground. It seems they were well aware of the government's let them all in immigration policy and the minister's generosity.

Now some of the delegates have turned up to make refugee claims. Now they are entitled to free health care, welfare and lawyers at taxpayers' expense.

This episode should serve as a warning. Next year the immigration minister in his infinite wisdom will be issuing visas and the health minister will be handing out $1 million to bring to Canada 500 AIDS sufferers from the third world to attend a conference in Vancouver.

Since AIDS sufferers have been granted refugee status already in Canada, the question is not if some of the 500 AIDS sufferers will jump ship and make a refugee claim, but how many.

I call on the government to use a little common sense. Enforce the law. Do not give visitors visas when Canadian safety is at stake.

MISSING CHILDREN

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Thursday, May 25, is missing children's day. Every year in Canada police receive thousands of reports of missing children. The overwhelming majority of these cases, about 45,000, are runaway children. Too frequently these runaway children turn to the streets and engage in delinquent activities as a means of support. This makes them extremely vulnerable to further violence and exploitation while on the streets.

A cornerstone of the federal government's efforts to protect Canadian children is the RCMP's missing children's registry. In operation since 1986, the registry is the major source of computerized information on missing children in Canada. It supports the efforts of Canadian and international police and concerned agencies in the search and recovery of missing children.

The RCMP has also joined forces with National Revenue Canada and citizenship and immigration in a joint initiative called "Our Missing Children". This partnership has resulted in a significant increase in the recovery and safe return of missing children here and abroad.

Protecting our children is a collective responsibility.

ABORIGINAL AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, May 22 to May 26 is Aboriginal Awareness Week. The goal of this week is to heighten public awareness of the aboriginal culture and to honour its contribution to Canadian society.

[English]

In keeping with the spirit of this event I am pleased to inform the House that last April marked the 3rd anniversary of the implementation of the federal government's first nation policing policy. The policy provides a practical way to improve the level and quality of policing services for first nation communities through the establishment of policing agreements.

[Translation]

As of May 1, Canada and the provinces had reached and signed 41 tripartite agreements with First Nations communities.

[English]

These agreements represent concrete progress and partnership at work among First Nations, the government and our provincial counterparts. I am sure all Canadians will join me in celebrating aboriginal awareness week and congratulating the Solicitor General of Canada for the ongoing success of the First Nations policing policy.

I would invite all hon. members to acknowledge the contributions of aboriginal people, which are all too often ignored by the official opposition.

MEMBER FOR CHAMBLY

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the "brotherhood of Bloc intolerance" welcomed a new member into the brood yesterday. It took him a few weeks to do it, but the Bloc member for Chambly has joined ranks with his colleagues, the Bloc members for Louis-Hébert and Chicoutimi, who are demanding that newcomers to Quebec be denied the right to vote because they fear that they will impede Quebec's independence.

In fact, the hon. member insinuated that Quebec's immigrants, who have contributed to the province's economic and social development for years, do not have the same rights as those Quebecers whose ancestors were among the first settlers. This tendency among Quebec separatists to create different classes of citizens based on their language or their cultural origins cannot be tolerated and must be emphatically condemned.

Quebecers do not want to create an independent Quebec which promotes discrimination and racism.

QUEBEC CITY CONVENTION CENTRE

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister said smugly that if Quebec City did not receive federal funding to build a new arena it was because its separatist mayor had decided to spend the money on something else.

Once again, the Prime Minister is so intent on putting sovereignists in their place that he simply forgets the facts. Construction of a convention centre in Quebec City was a first and foremost a promise by the provincial Liberals that came to fruition only because of the insistent lobbying by the Prime Minister's current chief of staff and the present Minister of Foreign Affairs, in other words, because another Liberal government got involved. The Prime Minister ought to know as well that Quebec City is not investing a single penny in the construction of this convention centre, which is being financed strictly by the Government of Quebec and the government in Ottawa.

Finally, I will repeat what was said by Mayor L'Allier and I quote: "We are penalized for not showing the flag. This is hardly what I would call democratic, and the real republic—"

WINNIPEG JETS

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals are continuing to seriously bungle the finances of the country, thereby threatening health care, welfare and post–secondary education. Unbelievably, they are to give $20 million to the Winnipeg Jets professional hockey team with its multi–million dollar, fast skating stick handlers.

The Manitoba Entertainment Complex applied to Revenue Canada for special tax status which will allow it to create some form of a crown owned entity which would be eligible to give instant tax receipts. Canada's tax gathering system means every Canadian will be supporting the Winnipeg Jets professional hockey team. This is an unconscionable use of tax deductions.

I call on the revenue minister to immediately shoot down this ridiculous Jets plan. The Liberals have stick handled their way into a hat trick with their $20 million for the Jets, private luxury boxes, new digs for the athletes and now tax deductions for supporters. The result is penalties to the Canadian taxpayer.

GUN CONTROL

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, aboriginal groups from across the country have made presentations regarding their concerns about Bill C–68, the firearms legislation.

The James Bay Cree and the Council for Yukon Indians have presented well documented briefs which illustrate the government did not initiate the required consultation process on this legislation. The onus was on these two groups to hold the government accountable for the agreements which have been made.

Given the CYI agreements were proclaimed in February of this year, it is quite shocking that barely four months later the Minister of Justice had not complied with certain aspects of the agreements.

While these agreements are between two parties, it is inevitably the First Nations that are expected to ensure compliance with even constitutionally entrenched agreements. Is it any wonder there is a high degree of mistrust of the federal government by aboriginal peoples?

The Inuit–Tapirisat, the AFN and the Metis have all presented their concerns. The minister has said he will consult. What he has not said is what he will do to meet these specific concerns. The minister has both a legal and a moral obligation to be forthright and address these issues today.

ONTARIO ELECTION

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, after listening to last night's Ontario leaders debate, there is no question Lyn McLeod is the best choice for premier of Ontario. She showed she has the intelligence and the integrity for the job and the determination to do what needs to be done. With her action plan she has the ability to achieve it.

• (1115)

Bob Rae was consistently put on the defensive by McLeod over his dismal economic record. He failed completely to live up to his billing as a champion debater.

Mike Harris failed to gain any ground, and the Liberal leader was successful at proving that Harris could not defend his unbelievable 30 per cent tax cuts. He failed to show himself as a potential leader of the province.

Lyn McLeod used the debate to sell her plan to Ontarians. She focused on the issue of jobs and highlighted the specifics of how her government will create these jobs.

McLeod won the debate and the respect of Ontario voters looking for credibility. She proved that her plan and her team can capably guide the economy in these challenging times. She will win the election on June 8 and restore growth and prosperity to Ontario.

ONTARIO LIBERAL PARTY LEADER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last night in the debate among the party leaders running in the Ontario election campaign, we again had the pleasure of listening to Lyn McLeod, leader of the Liberal Party of Ontario.

With great eloquence and sincerity, she showed that she is ready to take over the reins of the government in Ontario. Her style, clear and forthright, reflects her firm resolve to serve the people of Ontario.

There is no doubt in my mind that Lyn McLeod is worthy of representing her fellow citizens. A few weeks from now, Ontarians will at last be free and unencumbered by the savage constraints of socialism à la Bob Rae. At last they will be able to put their trust in their leaders.

WINNIPEG JETS

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the context of the announcement of $20 million in direct assistance to the Winnipeg Jets, Izzy Asper, the head of a group of businessmen trying to acquire the hockey team, has confirmed that discussions on federal funding for the Jets have been going on for a long time.

Would the Deputy Prime Minister confirm Mr. Asper's statement that discussions have been going on for a while between the federal government and the promoters trying to save the Winnipeg Jets?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the member is mistaken. There is no direct assistance for the Jets.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, pardon me if I laugh. Answers like that are a laugh for everyone.

Yesterday, the President of Treasury Board confirmed having found funding for the Winnipeg Jets with the cancellation of a $35 million highway contract. In the meantime, however, the Prime Minister was stating in this House that the funding had come from the cancellation of a series of small projects worth $3 million, under the infrastructure program.

My question is simple and straightforward and, I am hoping for an answer from the Deputy Prime Minister. Would she tell us clearly which projects were cancelled to pay for the government's $20 million subsidy to the Winnipeg Jets?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the very specific project that was referred to was a $30 million overpass near a CN mainline, and the member will know that the overpass project was opposed by many constituents. I personally received letters as Minister of the Environment in opposition to the project. The decision was made by the local community not to proceed with it.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the owners of the Winnipeg Jets will decide next Thursday whether the franchise will remain in Winnipeg. The federal government, for its part, yesterday agreed to pay $20 million toward the construction of the new arena the Jets need.

Would the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether the federal government's funding is conditional on the Jets' remaining in Winnipeg or whether it will still be provided to build a 22,000–seat arena even if the Jets leave Winnipeg?

• (1120)

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in putting the infrastructure system in place, we gave municipalities and provinces the option of making their own decisions.

We do not agree with the comments by the Leader of the Opposition, Lucien Bouchard, who has a hard time believing that Ottawa would spend public funds to refloat a hockey team. In his opinion, the federal government would be wrong to invest in Quebec City or in Winnipeg.

We do not agree with this approach, because we feel that, if the mayor of Quebec City chooses a project, he should be entitled to proceed with his choice. This is why we agreed to fund the infrastructure program in Winnipeg, just as we did in Quebec City.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister of Canada seems to be the only one not to know that she has just given the Winnipeg Jets $20 million. The premier of Manitoba and the mayor of Winnipeg both are not hiding the fact that they want to save the Jets franchise.

How can the Deputy Prime Minister put $20 million in a 22,000–seat arena for the Winnipeg Jets, without any business plan, whereas, last year, the attendance figure per game was 12,500 on the average and the team has lost $30 million over the past four years?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we did what people in Winnipeg and Manitoba wanted, just as we did when we decided to fund the congress centre in Quebec City, at the request of Mayor L'Allier who said, and I quote: "The congress centre has been a regional priority for the past ten years. Economic spin–offs are proven. We cannot sideline the centre which, year after year, employs thousands of people in the hotel and catering industry, for some infrastructure this area does not need, but which is needed by one company to survive here. This is the reason why I cannot support Marcel Aubut's approach". This is exactly what the mayor of Quebec City said.

We respect Quebec City's decision to spend money on a congress centre, just as we respect the wish of people in Winnipeg to spend infrastructure money on an arena.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, why is the Deputy Prime Minister refusing to admit that the federal government uses double standards when it deals with Quebec? Indeed, when asked to come to the rescue of MIL Davie—the industry minister knows this well—and its thousands of workers, who do not skate for one million dollars a year, the government demands to see a business plan, but when it comes to the Winnipeg Jets, the money is paid without conditions or guarantees.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we respect the will of cities to make their own economic decisions. Quebec City chose a congress centre and received $25 million from the federal government.

Similarly, Winnipeg chose to build an arena to promote economic development; this is why we are giving this city its fair share, just as we gave it to Quebec city for its congress centre, the first project awarded under the infrastructure program.

INFRASTRUCTURE FUNDING

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hockey fans and businesses in Winnipeg deserve a great deal of credit. They have come together and are well on their way to keeping the Jets in Winnipeg and in Canada.

What I have to question, however, is why infrastructure money is being used to build luxury boxes and to subsidize a professional hockey team. This program was supposed to improve sewer systems and make Canadian highways safer. Instead, it is going toward boccie courts, the Calgary Saddledome millionaire club, and the Peter Pocklington bottom line. The infrastructure program is a failure.

How does the Deputy Prime Minister justify Manitoba's reallocation of infrastructure funding?

• (1125)

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): In the same way we justified the decision by the city of Calgary to finance infrastructure funding for the Saddledome.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister is quite right that it is up to the province or the city and they make their request. However, the issue is why the infrastructure program is designed in such a way as to make hockey arenas, museums, and other sports facilities a legitimate expense.

Canada's sewers and roadways are deteriorating. It will cost taxpayers billions of dollars to replace them. Infrastructure that benefits the maximum number of taxpayers should be the goal, not political gain.

Where will the money come from for the real infrastructure spending that will be required?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that the member for Calgary, the city that hosted the Olympics, and the world had an opportunity to see his great city, is now saying that infrastructure is a bad investment.

Infrastructure in sports is also about nation building. That is why I am sure he would not want to turn his back on the infrastructure spending that paved the way for the Calgary Olympics, nor would he want to turn his back on the infrastructure spending that made it possible for the Saddledome.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, true infrastructure spending is fine, but direct subsidies to the private sector are not fine. The taxpayers are against that.

We learned yesterday that the save the Jets group in Winnipeg is considering applying for charitable status. That would make every donation tax deductible, and then tax weary Canadians would be picking up even more of the tab. The Minister of National Revenue said it was out of the question. However, the Manitoba Entertainment Centre applied for charitable status six weeks ago. Since the Jets have received so much government money and will be receiving more now, they should consider renaming themselves the Winnipeg Challenger Jets.

Will either the Deputy Prime Minister or the representative of revenue and taxation assure the House and Canadians that the Jets and their supporters will not receive charitable status?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member exhibits what I hope is an unintentional misunderstanding of the infrastructure program. He says there are direct subsidies. There are no direct subsidies.

What we have done for Winnipeg is exactly the same thing we did for Calgary at the request of the former mayor of Calgary, Premier Ralph Klein, who endorsed the Saddledome funding.

Frankly, I did not see the member for Calgary stand up and complain about the Calgary Olympics; he did not stand up and complain about the Calgary Saddledome. Heavens, he should not stand up and complain about the Winnipeg arena, which is going to permit a Canadian national institution to stay in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister said that $5 million out of the $20 million spent on saving the Winnipeg Jets came from the Pan American Games budget. Yet, no event featured in these games requires a 22,000 seat arena.

Since no event featured in the Pan American Games requires building a 22,000 seat arena, will the Deputy Prime Minister admit that, by taking $5 million from the federal contribution to the Pan American Games and giving it to the Winnipeg Jets, the government is in fact misappropriating public funds?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in fact, just as we will accept the decisions made by the Québec 2002 committee as to the need for a renewed infrastructure, should that city be selected, we accept the decision made by the Pan American Games committee to set aside $5 million, precisely because it wanted to put in place the infrastructure required for future Pan American Games in Canada. We respect the committee's decision, just as we will respect those of the Québec 2002 committee.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister's response makes no sense. This is appalling.

Since Winnipeg hosted the Pan American Games in 1967 and has just been selected as host of the 1999 games, in particular because it already has all the facilities required, why does the Deputy Prime Minister refuse to admit that the Prime Minister was the first to authorize the misappropriation of $5 million solely to serve the political interests of the human resources development minister, who is the person responsible for Manitoba and the member for Winnipeg South Centre?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I find unfortunate and dishonest—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: —about the opposition's stance is their claim that what we did for Winnipeg, we are not willing to do in other cases.

We simply respected Quebec City's decision, which was supported twice by Mayor Jean–Paul L'Allier, to build a convention centre in order to promote its economic development.

In the same way, we have accepted the request made by the City of Winnipeg and the Manitoba government, which feel that this infrastructure is important to Winnipeg's economic development.

If you agree with the principle that Quebec City is free to make its own decisions, why do you not accept it for other cities?

The Speaker: My colleagues, I must remind you that you should always address the Chair.

[English]

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, to set the record straight for the Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. member for Calgary Centre publicly denounced the government for the misuse of infrastructure funds on the Saddledome in Calgary. To bring him into it is absolutely unfair and uncalled for.

I want to continue to shed light on the Liberals' bailout of the Winnipeg professional hockey team. She did not answer the question. The Manitoba entertainment complex has asked for charitable status. Will she, on behalf of her government, unequivocally state that the government will not give the Manitoba entertainment complex or any organization related to this unconscionable bailout charitable status?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no bailout.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will ask the question again. Will the Deputy Prime Minister unequivocally state on behalf of her government that there will be no special status, no further tax grab from the Canadian wallet?

Is there anything she does not understand about my question?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the basic premise of the member's question is false. There is no bailout of any hockey team.

I am astonished the Reform Party, which swept into office in western Canada on the wave of allowing people to have their say locally, is now prepared to turn its back on the local initiative of the city of Winnipeg that sees this is a priority. Who are you—

• (1135)

The Speaker: In the heat of rhetoric we sometimes get carried away but I am feeling awfully lonely. Please address your remarks to the Chair.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Mr. Gauthier: Perhaps we will finally get an answer.

Mr. Loubier: Since he itabled his budget on February 27, the Minister of Finance keeps repeating that, next year, the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces will represent only a $350 million shortfall for Quebec, mocking the $650 million figure put forward by the official opposition.

Yesterday however, in his testimony before the finance committee, Bill Murphy, a senior official at the Department of Finance, assessed this shortfall at $625 million, which is very close to the amount put forward by the official opposition.

In light of the statements made by finance officials, does the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs still maintain, as his colleague from finance does, that cuts in the Canada social transfer will translate into a $350 million shortfall for Quebec in 1996–97, and not $650 million as suggested by the official opposition?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are three factor affecting transfers to the Province of Quebec: equalization payments, tax points and cash payments.

When Bloc members or the Parti Quebecois finance minister quote an amount of approximately $650 million, they are not taking into account tax points or equalization payments, or both.

I repeat that the exact shortfall figure, when you factor in the reduced transfers to Quebec and these three sources, is only $350 million.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has control over its cash transfers to the provinces and those are the transfers that were cut back in the last budget. These cuts total $650 million for Quebec. The federal government's own officials said so yesterday. They are the ones who brief the Minister of Finance and they should brief this government.

Why does the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs persist in denying the facts, if not to conceal from Quebec until after the referendum the true extent of Ottawa's cuts to social program funding? The shortfall will reach $650 million next year.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one cannot conceal the truth by playing with figures. It was clearly set out in the agreements negotiated by the federal government and the provinces—read them—that transfers to Quebec would be in the form of tax points and cash payments.

Also, equalization payments are not freebies given for one reason or another to the provinces. These payments are made to have-not provinces, so that all the provinces, rich or poor, can offer comparable levels of public services. Consider that more than 60 per cent of provincial expenditures are social expenditures. So, equalization payments are clearly part and parcel of the transfers designed to fund social programs.

Logic demands that the three types of transfers be taken into account in determining that the shortfall is only $350 million.

PENSIONS

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry thinks that highly paid CEOs set a bad example for ordinary Canadian workers. I think I have heard it all now.

The minister is eligible to receive $1.5 million in pension payments in a plan that is three times more generous than the best private sector plans. What kind of an example does he think this sends to the ordinary Canadian workers who are paying for it?

• (1140)

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain exactly the point I made in a speech I gave to the Canadian Association of Family Enterprises last week.

At this stage in our economic cycle when corporate profits are recovering, which is a very good sign, it is time for Canadians to continue to invest in further productivity gains and further competitiveness as we had through the economic cycle.

We have been very successful in gaining competitive points vis–a–vis the rest of the world although much of it has unfortunately been based on our exchange rate. We need to continue to save and continue to invest.

Canadians from coast to coast have lived on no increase in family income on average over the past 10 years. They will be asked by their corporate leaders to continue to keep their belts tight as federal public servants have and as all members of the House of Commons have by not taking a wage increase in over five years. The time is not yet to start raising wages. The time is now to continue to invest and save.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I respectively suggest that the minister and the government should save their managerial advice for the companies that managed to lose over $35 billion last year.

I wonder what business the government and the minister think they have commenting on the issue of private compensation when yesterday the government, in alliance with the separatists, decided that it would refuse to hear testimony from private citizens, from private organizations and from ordinary taxpayers on the issue of MP pensions.

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think one point needs to be made very clearly. I made the point in the interview I gave based on that speech. I really do not have any particular interest in what any CEO is paid. I am not a shareholder of any of the companies.

However what is clear is that Canada stands poised to succeed very well on issues of competitiveness in the world. Now is the time for us to continue to save and invest.

This man wants to talk about pensions. That is all they really think about. I will tell him something. When we deal with issues of compensation in the House, let us talk about what it costs many people to be here as well. Let us cost out what the forgone opportunities are. Then we will put everybody on an even footing.

At the same time let us also recognize that members come to Ottawa to serve their constituents often at great cost to themselves and their families. We are looking for a recipe for continuing competitiveness in the world. In that way we will benefit all Canadians.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Once again, the minister has refused to grant entry visas to three Algerian actors scheduled to participate in the Theatre Festival of the Americas, in Montreal. At the same time, we have learned that Mr. Abdennour who, according to the Quebec–Algeria committee, is a lawyer close to the Islamic salvation front, was granted a visa by the Canadian embassy, in Paris.

How does the Minister of Immigration explain the fact that a person close to the Islamic salvation front can come to Canada without any problems, while Algerian actors who denounce torture and fundamentalism cannot do so?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member is mistaken because the minister has refused no visitor visa to anyone. The visitor visa is done on a processed basis. It should be done fairly and not with any favouritism to anyone regardless of background.

There are a million applications for visitor visas. Surely the member does not expect a minister or a government to be interventionist with visitor visa applications easily and loosely. Eighty–five per cent of all applications are approved.

There is a process in place that if a visitor visa is refused, the remedy is to reapply and try to address some of the concerns. The member should know one of the three actors has gone to the embassy today to make such a formal reapplication. The other two actors have not seen fit to go back.

We should allow the individuals to do as they please, rather than to force the issue and play politics on the backs of a visitor visa program.

• (1145)

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's explanations, but this is not the first time that such a situation has occurred.

Given the obvious incompetence of his departmental officials at the Canadian embassy in Paris, who make surprising decisions almost on a daily basis, will the minister tell them to shape up, so as to put a stop to these errors in judgment, which have become too frequent?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, his leader used to be a Canadian ambassador to France, situated in Paris. It was under his leader's jurisdiction as well that some visitor visa applications coming through France were accepted, some were refused, and some were reviewed. That was the process when his leader used to be a Canadian ambassador in France. That continues to be the process today.

What I would suggest is that the situation in Algeria, by no means easy or by no means orderly, should be solved by the international community. What I would suggest to the hon. member, however, is that to utilize a visitor visa program for any one country is not the solution and it would jeopardize our visitor visa program internationally.

There is a way to deal with refugee crises. There is a way to deal with how to utilize a country's forces to address a destabilized area. That solution, however, does not lie in a visitor visa program.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question deals with international trade.

A recent study by the accounting firm KPMG has indicated that cheaper labour, cheaper benefits, and a cheaper dollar make Canada a very competitive place in which to do business, more competitive in fact than the United States.

Would the minister please tell the House what this study means to Canadian workers, to Canadian business, and to Canada's role in the global community?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): The report to which the hon. member for Hillsborough refers substantiates the conclusions of similar studies in the recent past that have emphasized Canada's highly competitive position in the global marketplace. Thanks to a number of measures that have been taken, including such factors as payroll and benefits, material and energy inputs, taxes, research and development costs, and distribution costs, as the report notes, Canada has become increasingly competitive.

I would want to emphasize that in creating jobs through such international competitiveness, the principal factor that is going to play in the future is the excellent budget the Minister of Finance brought down, which will increase further Canada's competitiveness.

EBOLA VIRUS

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, phone lines have been lighting up in my office in Ottawa and in my constituency over the Ebola virus. People believe that they are not being protected by their own government. They are frustrated with the health minister's non–answers to direct questions.

Now that we have the minister in a forum where she cannot run away, I ask the minister why she chose to withhold information from Canadians regarding the number of people who have been detained at Pearson because they were suspected of carrying the Ebola virus.

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, no information has been withheld. We have been quite straightforward about describing the two individuals.

The first individual arrived in Toronto. It had been three weeks since he had been in Zaire. The period of incubation had passed. The gentleman was nevertheless examined by a physician and was found to be in very good health.

The second individual arrived in Toronto. He claimed that his mother had died after visiting Kikwit. He has been detained, is under quarantine. Nevertheless, he is in good health and has no signs of illness.

These are the facts.

• (1150)

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is the same kind of babble we heard yesterday.

Canadians need to know if they have a Minister of Health and a Minister of Immigration who have the wherewithal to take direct proactive measures to protect the health of Canadians.

There is a simple solution to all of this. Will the immigration minister put Canadians' minds at ease by stopping the threat at the source? Will he place a temporary moratorium on visitors' visas from Zaire and surrounding regions until this disease is safely contained there?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find this member of Parliament irresponsible in the way he is trying to exploit the situation.

What the member should do is take a page from the health critic of the Reform Party, who yesterday said—and he is a doctor—that the government's action and approach to dealing with this dilemma were "sensible".

Today instead we have the immigration critic, who is not a doctor and not responsible or respectful of what his colleague said, saying his phone is lighting up and things are on the downslide. You are fearmongering, that is what you are doing.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Following a review of all outside research contracts awarded by the Department of Natural Resources in the last five years, we came to some pretty damning conclusions. Our study indicates that Quebec research centres and companies got only 10 per cent of these contracts.

How can the Deputy Prime Minister justify the fact the Quebec gets less than half of its fair share of those outside research and development contracts?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. Obviously, we are not responsible for the contracts awarded by the previous Conservative government. Obviously, we are not responsible for the funds allocated in the last five years.

We will of course try to direct our grants on the basis of need. For example, a national pulp and paper centre was set up in Montreal, because that is where most of the interest and the technology in that field can be found. I do not think we will start to allocate funds according to regional development. We should instead spend the money where the expertise is, such as for mining in Abitibi and PAPRICAN in Montreal.

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, again, the Deputy Prime Minister just sold us a bill of goods.

The Minister of National Defence said recently that he could not afford to be fair to Quebec in terms of the distribution of his department's spending. Are we to understand that the Deputy Prime Minister is in the same position and has neither the will nor the means to be fair to Quebec?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where some of these people get their quotes. I never said that at all. I would never say that.

I was pointing out a situation in which certain expenditures are made across the country. Certain installations are built across the country as a result of historic circumstances. To imply that there was something discriminatory in this is completely outrageous.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

The government has legislation ready to be tabled in this House that would ban the importation of MMT, a gasoline enhancer. The ban is based solely on evidence provided by only one of the two vested groups, namely the Motor Vehicles Manufacturers' Association.

The minister stated in the House on May 5 that "any cabinet decision to move on MMT is supported by all ministers of the government".

• (1155)

By making this ban, is the minister setting a precedent of bias for the process of decision making for all the industries within the purview of government, including natural resources?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my supplemental question is for the same minister.

By banning MMT her government is supporting the claims and data brought forward by only the MVMA. This must mean that the contrary scientific data from Ethyl Corporation is false and incorrect.

What conclusive information does the minister have that discredits the data provided by Ethyl Corporation that would cause the government to side with the MVMA and thereby perhaps place the environment at greater risk?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member has thought of a different use for the product we all buy at the pumps. Perhaps he has. I am not sure what it is. The last time I checked, most of it goes into motor vehicles.

He will know that Canada has benefited very well from the fact that there is a very strong continental market in motor vehicles. We produce about 17 per cent of the North American production and we only consume about 8 per cent. That benefits us very directly in terms of jobs and economic growth.

The vehicles that are being produced use the product at the pumps. It should have come to his attention that the new cars require fuel without MMT. If he would like to have his constituents purchasing vehicles that either cost a lot more or have their diagnostic systems unplugged, then he ought to be in support of keeping the MMT in the fuel. But until we find some other use for it—and perhaps he breathes it, I do not know—we have to have continental standards in fuel.

Mr. Elijah Harper (Churchill, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Aboriginal groups have criticized Bill C–68, the minister's gun control legislation. As a treaty and First Nations member, these criticisms are of great concern to me and I take them very seriously.

Treaties form the fundamental relationship that exists between the First Nations and the Government of Canada. Treaty rights are recognized and protected under the Canadian Constitution. Will the minister tell the House and assure the aboriginal people of Canada that Bill C–68 will not take away, abrogate, or derogate these treaty rights?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of this government to treat all Canadians fairly in connection with this legislation. We also are very much aware that aboriginal people have both aboriginal and treaty rights to hunt, and we intend to respect them.

I learned for myself as I travelled the length and breadth of the country last year and visited aboriginal communities how firearms are often treated as a tool and how their use is very much a part of their way of life.

The way we responded to this need is through consultation. Just after the action plan was tabled in the House last November 30, some 690 letters went out with copies of the plan to the aboriginal leadership across Canada. We wrote again to those same 690 leaders of aboriginal communities early this year. We followed up, with the help of about 70 of them, in assembling one of the most comprehensive and unprecedented consultation processes known to the government. In nine regions of Canada we are meeting with representatives of rural, urban, on reserve and off reserve aboriginal persons. In the coming months we will conclude that very direct and personal discussion process to determine how this bill can be implemented in a manner that is sensitive to the reality of aboriginal lifestyles, culture, and treaty rights. We will then prepare regulations, which will be sent in draft form for comment to those same people. We will then table them in the House for the 30-day review.

We intend to comply with our obligations and respect the rights to which the hon. member has referred.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is a shame that almost two years after having been elected, the government has not yet amended the Canadian Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation in the prohibited grounds of discrimination.

Will the Minister of Justice have the courage and the sense of responsibility to table amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act before the end of this session?

• (1200)

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what is not an issue is the commitment of the government to the changes in the human rights act to which the hon. member has referred.

I must tell the hon. member today, as I have in the past, that commitment remains unchanged. We have long recognized the need to amend the human rights act as he has suggested, not only to add sexual orientation as a ground upon which discrimination is prohibited but in a variety of other important ways. This is to bring that act up to date to reflect improvements that have been introduced in provincial legislation on the same subject, to meet the needs identified by the chief commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, and to fulfil commitments the government has made. We will indeed proceed with those changes.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, recently a program on Manitoba television, which included an interview with the department of Indian affairs supervisor in Manitoba, identified that the Jackhead Band had misspent money, cheques had been forged and the RCMP were investigating the disappearance of over $70,000 for house construction. This situation has placed individual band members in very tough financial circumstances. The department of Indian affairs has exhibited no interest in their welfare.

What has the minister done to ensure these abuses will be rectified and to obtain reimbursement of these moneys?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of what is going on in Jackhead. This is under review by the department. I am pleased the hon. member has risen today because he has not risen in a week. Usually I find all 10 of his toes do not touch the ground.

Last Friday, this hon. member made an allegation against the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River. I thought today this hon. member would stand up and withdraw. He said the hon. member was honoured by the chiefs and he was in a conflict position. Not only was he not honoured but it was not a conflict. I would have thought that if he wanted work to progress with aboriginal people, he would take Fridays and speak about the dignity and respect we are supposed to bring to aboriginal people, not bring unjust accusations which he usually does on Fridays.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

North American security is threatened more on the environment than on any other front. Now the U.S. clean water act and the clean air act are under attack. We learned that the U.S. House of Representatives has diluted the clean water act making it easier for industry to continue polluting the Great Lakes with airborne dioxins and furans.

What effect could these amendments have on Canada? What action is being taken to ensure the Great Lakes water quality agreement is upheld?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, indeed the member has underlined a very serious concern. If the proposed amendments that have passed the House of Representatives proceed through the Senate without amendment, they will gut the current provisions of an international agreement which affects the drinking water of 50 million people on both sides of the border.

The member will know the single largest international body of water is the Great Lakes. We do not intend to allow the Great Lakes water quality agreement to be watered down. We have been in touch with the office of the president.

Today I myself have contacted by letter the administrator responsible for the Environmental Protection Agency. We have also been in contact with Ambassador Blanchard by way of letter in advance of the decision of Congress.

We are going to do everything we can to ensure the amendments put forth by Congress do not see the light of day. We do not want to put Canadians' health and the environment at risk, which would be the effect of accepting these amendments.

The Speaker: That would bring to a conclusion the question period. I have notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Elk Island which I will hear now.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it has been over one and one–half years since I was elected as a new member to this most important Chamber in the country. I came here full of hope and anticipation of what the democratic process would be. The breach of privilege of which I speak today is such a severe aberration and breach of the most fundamental premises of democracy that I am really sorry I have to raise it.

• (1205)

I also recognize that what I am going to say is important. I realize your position, Mr. Speaker, is of tremendous importance here. In your office and in your person lies the ability to maintain the very basic premise of democracy and the rules under which it operates. I am asking today not only for your ruling, but also for your guidance because of my deep concerns.

I want to specifically give the reasons for my complaint. I was a substitute authorized member of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons on Tuesday and Wednesday. I know, Mr. Speaker, you heard one question of privilege already and you ruled on that, but my problem is a different one and much more serious. It has to do with the conducting of a vote in that committee.

Specifically, this is what happened. Our party moved an amendment. When the chairman of the committee called for the vote, we said yea. There was not a single nay heard. The chairman ruled that the motion had been defeated. Now that is so fundamental it is not even in the rule book. It is assumed in a democracy that when everybody who casts a vote says yea and the chairman says that it has been defeated that it is a flagrant and violent abuse of democracy such as we cannot tolerate if we want to maintain our system.

The chairman declared that motion defeated and of course I immediately challenged the chair. When I did that, the chairman of the committee said that his ruling would stand. I objected and the chairman then invoked the rules of order which ask for the majority of the people in the committee to decide if the ruling of the chair stands. The Liberal majority woke up and they faithfully fell into line and supported the ruling of the chair. I could not accept that.

This was such a serious aberration that I told the chairman he could not do that. He said he could. I suppose I should have apologized at that stage for becoming a little upset, but to me this was such a violent attack on the democratic process. I then moved to report this incident to the Speaker because it was my understanding that such an issue could not come to you unless it was reported by the committee. I may be wrong here and I have some reasons for considering that I may be wrong, but that was my understanding at the time.

I moved the motion that this be reported, but the chairman would not accept the motion and ruled it out of order. I told the chairman it could not be out of order. He then proceeded to ask if the ruling of the chair was sustained and the majority of the members present said yes. Now that is unbelievable. I cannot accept that.

I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, that this be corrected. There must be some things the committee does not have 100 per cent autonomy to do. It cannot by vote alter the truth. This is a democratic tradition that has been upheld for so long that an arbitrary rule of a motion defeated when in fact it has passed cannot be accepted.

If the majority of members were not paying attention and did not vote when they should have, just wishing that they would have been awake does not give them any justification for using their majority to override the previous vote. Only a person who voted on the side that won the vote can move a motion to reconsider. That was not done in this case. The chairman arbitrarily and incorrectly declared the vote lost and the members were not paying attention and chimed into his defence.

This is so serious, Mr. Speaker, that I appeal to you that some corrective action be taken. As I said in my preamble, I do require your assistance as well as your ruling because I want to know how to handle this. This cannot be accepted by this Parliament, the highest court of the land, as such a serious aberration of the democratic process.

• (1210)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with great respect for the comments the hon. member has made, there is a procedure for dealing with this matter. With the greatest respect, I think the hon. member ought to follow that accepted procedure.

The same point was raised in the House yesterday. Your Honour very properly ruled that there was not a question of privilege before the House because no report had been received from the committee.

I think the hon. member is confused, again with great respect to him, because I know he is trying to raise a very serious concern. He misunderstood the import of Your Honour's ruling yesterday, which was that this cannot be brought before the House until there is a report from the committee. By that statement I think he is inferring that there must be a report on the incident from the committee or else he cannot raise the matter.

I suggest that is not what Your Honour ruled or intended and it is not in accordance with the practice of the House. I refer the hon. member and Your Honour to citation 894 of Beauchesne's 6th edition. I will read paragraphs (1) and (3) under the citation:

> (1) Until the report and the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence have been laid upon the Table, it is irregular to refer to them in debate, or to put questions in reference to the proceedings of the committee.

Then I will skip to (3).

> If alleged irregular proceedings take place in committee but are not referred to in the report that the committee presented to the House, then it is not competent for the House to go beyond that report to debate this matter.

The hon. member can clearly raise it in the House at the time the report comes. Whether it will be debated, he can raise it and ask Your Honour to rule. Certainly, there will be some indication in a report if there was a vote taken that something happened. There will be minutes of the proceedings of the committee indicating there was an appeal from the ruling of the chairman. That will be reported in the minutes of the committee and that will come to the House.

All those things will be reported in there. The hon. member will be able to debate those and comment on them in the House and raise his question of privilege, if indeed there is a question of privilege here, when that report has come to the House. Then Your Honour will be seized of the matter, we will have the report before the House and will be able to make some comment.

The difficulty and the reason that Speakers have taken the view that the proceedings in committees are not within the purview of the Chair is that until a committee has reported, the committee is master of its own proceedings. It may change what it has done and correct any errors. That is part of the reason for the rule. Committees can undo what they have done in certain circumstances and redo what they have done and thereby make them correct if there has been some error.

I suggest it is incumbent upon the hon. member and his colleagues on the committee in question to go back to the chairman of the committee, raise the issues before the chair and seek to have the matter rectified in the committee. I think the hon. member knows that there have been efforts made to see that this happens.

I suggest to him that the proper course to follow under the circumstances is to raise the matter with the chairman of the committee at another meeting of the committee instead of boycotting the meetings of the committee and make an effort to resolve the matter. I suggest if that is done it would be unnecessary for him to come to the House with a question of privilege. He would probably find that perhaps not all, but the majority of his concerns would be fully dealt with. He would realize the wisdom of the actions of the chair at one point or another in the proceedings and we could get the matter resolved there, which with all due respect, is where it should be resolved.

I do not want to suggest that this sort of thing has not happened before. I was in opposition before. I know how committees work. Sometimes things can happen in committees that hon. members feel strongly about and they wish had not happened. That happens on both sides of the House.

I assure the hon. member that I know in this case the chairman of the committee is eminently reasonable. If the hon. member will meet with the chairman in an effort to resolve the matter, I think there can be a satisfactory resolution so far as we can arrange it before the matter comes back to the House in the report. At that time if the member wishes to debate the proceedings of the committee, he is free to do so pursuant to the standing orders.

The Speaker: I will listen to the hon. member for Fraser Valley East.

At this point, it is my interpretation that with what was brought up yesterday in the House there seems to be a slight variation on the whole thing. May I ask, was the hon. member present at the committee?

• (1215)

There seems to be a slight variation on the whole thing. Was the hon. member for Fraser Valley East present at the committee?

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): No.

The Speaker: I will permit an intervention by the hon. member but it should deal precisely with this point and not refer to any other decision taken.

Mr. Strahl: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a separate incident from the one I brought forward at a previous date because of a series of events that continues to happen in the committee.

The Speaker has asked for us to wait for the report to the House. The problem is when incidents such as the one the hon. member for Elk Island has mentioned come up in committee and we ask it even to be reported to the House we are told it will not be reported to the House. We not only cannot debate but we cannot introduce amendments, we cannot ask questions of witnesses, we cannot in some cases even vote.

Then when the votes happen sometimes they are overturned by the hammer of the chairman. Then when we raise these issues and say could it not be reported to the House we are told no. Then they appeal to the committee and the committee says it will not report it.

We are at wits end. We cannot do any of the democratic roles of an opposition. We cannot do any of the things I have described, the legitimate role in opposition. When we want to raise it for investigation or for future reference we are told we cannot even do that. We cannot do any of the roles given to us, privileges as members of Parliament. When we raise points of privilege we are told they will not even be reported to the Chair.

We are at wits end. We cannot fulfil our job, our duty and our responsibility to raise issues of great concern to Canadians. We really feel the Chair needs to intervene. This is the second case, I realize.

The transcripts are in. We could start to go over them. There is a serious breach of democratic rights. We must get it addressed before this committee continues.

To say we refuse now to attend is true. I cannot go to a committee in which the chairman says I have no rights and asks me to sit down.

The Speaker: I will hear from the hon. parliamentary secretary first.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my only reason for intervening is this incident has affected the Standing Committee of Foreign Affairs and International Trade.

A Reform member came to bring in a motion that the chairman abide by the standing orders because of an incident which happened in that committee. I hope the Chair will not start intervening in the affairs of individual standing committees.

Sometimes the opposition forgets it is in a minority position in committees, as it is in the House. There is a steering committee to decide the agenda. When something is put to a vote, as it was yesterday in our committee, the majority has to rule. Sometimes people are not satisfied with what the majority has voted on.

I hope the Chair will respect the independence of each committee and that what goes on in one committee should not be brought to the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and International Trade.

The Speaker: I will permit an intervention from the hon. House leader of the Reform Party.

Before further intervention by members I would like them to stay within the confines of the point of privilege the hon. member for Elk Island has brought forth. Please do not go outside of these confines.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate now to comment in light of the comments you just made. Would you give me permission to very briefly answer the concerns made by the parliamentary secretary?

• (1220)

The Speaker: No. We are having a debate here. I do not want to get into debate. I want to stick precisely to the question of privilege. I am granting a great deal of leniency and latitude for all members.

Again, I ask members to speak to the question of privilege. I do not want the House to be seized of a debate.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the issue raised by the hon. member this morning may be different from the incident raised yesterday.

No doubt it is a parallel one involving the same committee. The Speaker's previous ruling on the issue brought by another hon. member the day before would be applicable to the case before the House this morning.

Furthermore, yesterday the committee of procedure and House affairs, pursuant to part of the ruling by the Speaker, has been doing some preliminary work in the whole area of rules as they apply to the work of committees.

We adopted a motion proposed by one of the members who has at least attempted to rise on a question of privilege this morning from the Reform Party to address those very rules.

Earlier this morning there were informal negotiations to attempt to solve the dispute at hand. I do not want to describe them as it would be improper. I am hoping we will continue those discussions in the next few minutes to come to some kind of consensus by which we can afford the House to function properly in its committees.

I recognize, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has said, the importance of the work of the opposition in the House. The Deputy Prime Minister and I have probably served longer in opposition than anyone else in the Chamber. We served too long in opposition.

In any case, we recognize that situation and we are attempting through some of these negotiations to resolve it. I hoped to continue with those private negotiations prior to this question of privilege.

The Speaker: I will go to a final intervention by the hon. member for Elk Island if he has new information to bring on my ruling.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two very important things.

First, the incident I reported which grieves me so seriously occurred after the member for Frazer Valley East came to you to give his intervention yesterday. It happened afterwards. That is very significant. It is also of a completely different nature.

Second, I was using the instruction as I understood it from Standing Order 48(1):

> Whenever any matter of privileges arises, it shall be taken into consideration immediately.

This says to me I have the right to not wait until that committee gave me the permission to come here. That is why I took the initiative to come.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: Colleagues, the points are well taken on both sides. I do not come from another venue. I am one of you and I can understand many of the frustrations when a member is in opposition.

I can also understand, having served in government, that the government has a right to get on with its legislation. Therefore there are two things to be balanced here.

Your Speaker is always guided by the rules of the House of Commons. He is also guided by the precedents of other Speakers and in other Parliaments.

• (1225)

I heard today that in this circumstance one of the committees of the House is trying to—I hate to use the word rectify—at least ameliorate the situation so all sides can get on with what the hon. member for Fraser Valley East has said is their job, to represent the people of their constituencies.

On the specific point of privilege, the Speaker will respond to a report from the committee. That is the responsibility of the Speaker. However, your Speaker cannot be expected to be in all committees, to know precisely what is happening in all committees, except through their chairs which the House has approved.

We now have a circumstance of a committee's carrying out its responsibilities. That all members do not agree with what is happening in the committee is normal for this place.

However, I will wait until I have a report from the committee. When the report comes in, whatever is in there, if the hon. member at that time chooses to raise a point of privilege, I give notice now, as is the precedent of the House, that I will hear the point of privilege.

Concerning the rules stating a member must make intervention as soon as possible, the hon. member has done that. He is here now in front of me. Should it be brought up again at a future date, when the report of the committee comes out your Speaker will entertain such a point of privilege.

However, for the time being it is my decision that the committees are masters of their own work and that committee work must follow procedure and be brought to us here in the House. If there is a problem which can only be resolved by the House, then the House will become seized of it.

However, I rule at this time the hon. member, with all due respect, does not have a point of privilege.

PETITIONS

VIOLENT OFFENDERS

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present this petition. It is signed primarily by residents and citizens of the Paradise Valley area of Alberta.

They would draw to the attention of this House the fact that they are very concerned about our streets being made safer for citizens and are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have a few petitions to introduce.

As I am duty bound, I have a petition signed by constituents mainly from Regina and from Fort Qu'Appelle and district that asks Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicides are enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes to the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, as I am duty bound, I have a petition mainly from constituents of Regina criticizing Bill C–41.

These petitioners ask that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act, or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships.

IMAGE CABLESYSTEM

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am also duty bound to introduce this petition from constituents of Fort Qu'Appelle.

The constituents and the petitioners are not happy with Image Cablesystem, which has changed their programming and rates. The petitioners ask Parliament to regulate Image Cablesystem and all cable companies in regard to program services and rates, regardless of subscriber numbers.

They also ask Parliament to address their immediate concern of requesting the CRTC take the steps necessary to restore their previous service, with new programming being offered in additional group packages at a competitive rate.

CRIMINAL CODE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do not normally read the entire petition, but in this case I will.

I have over 7,706 signatures that I have received from a group in my community called Fair Justice, which came into effect after a very tragic killing in our community.

Their petition reads: In 1990 an average of two Canadian women per week were murdered by their husbands or male partners. Over the period 1974 to 1992 a married woman was nine times more likely to be killed by her spouse than by a stranger. Whereas the domestic killer is treated less harshly than any other by Canadian courts, the crime is usually defined as manslaughter. Killing family is much more likely to involve provocation or the heat of passion than killing acquaintances or killing for money or sex. While almost 60 per cent of those who kill during the commission of another crime are sentenced to life imprisonment, only 20 per cent of family killers receive this penalty.

Therefore, your petitioners pray and request that Parliament amend section 236 of the Criminal Code to include a minimum sentence of 10 years when a person pleads guilty or is found guilty of manslaughter of a spouse or partner.

I will therefore table these signatures that number 7,706, as I mentioned before.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition signed by Cariboo–Chilcotin constituents from 100 Mile House, Forest Grove, Canim Lake, and Lone Butte, British Columbia.

Those who signed the petition are of the opinion that existing controls on law–abiding, responsible firearms owners are more than enough to ensure public safety. They therefore call upon Parliament to support laws that will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime; support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions that recognize and protect the right of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms; and support legislation that will repeal or modify existing gun control laws, which have not improved public safety or have proven not to be cost effective or have proven to be overly complex so as to be ineffective or unenforceable.

• (1240)

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition that has been circulating across Canada. This particular petition comes from the Calgary, Alberta, area.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession, which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also say that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPHIN

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a petition from 258 residents of the province of Saskatchewan, who request and call upon Parliament to desist from legalizing the use of rBST in Canada. They further request that legislation be passed requiring it to be mandatory that all imported products from BST and rBST treated cows be so identified.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to rise today and table in the House a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston and the Islands, who call upon Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 147, 148 and 168.

[Text]

Question No. 147—Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing):

For each of the calendar years 1990 to 1994, has the government developed detailed data measuring actual cigarette consumption, and if so what are these estimates for each province for which the data are available, and if not, why not?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): No consumption data are available for 1990 to 1994. However, domestic cigarette sales have always been considered an accurate proxy of retail sales and therefore consumption in the long term. All analysis of consumption have used these data in this fashion.

For statistical data on domestic cigarette sales refer to answer to Question No. 148.

Question No. 148—Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing):

For each of the calendar years 1990 to 1994, has the government received data measuring domestic cigarette sales and if so what are the total sales in each province for which data are available?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): The following are figures on domestic cigarette sales, excluding domestic sales of fine cut tobacco, for the years 1990 to 1993. All data for 1994 have not yet been released by the third party source and as such are not available for distribution.

Year	1990	1991	1992	1993

Question No. 168—Mr. Robinson:

On which occasions since September 1, 1994, has Gordon Campbell, the BC Leader of the Official Opposition, communicated by letter, fax or telephone with the Prime Minister or the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, or any officials within their offices, concerning the Kemano II completion project and what were the nature of the representations made on each occasion?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): I am informed that in so far as the Prime Minister and his office are concerned, Mr. Campbell sent a letter and other documents via fax to the Prime Minister on October 11, 1994 in which he outlined the British Columbia Liberal Party's position toward the Kemano completion project.

In so far as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and his office are concerned, on October 11, 1994 Mr. Campbell wrote to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to express the British Columbia Liberal Party's position toward the Kemano completion project.

Also, there was one telephone communication on January 23, 1995, the day the province of British Columbia announced the cancellation of Alcan's Kemano completion project. Mr. Campbell was informed of the federal government's public response.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–82, an act to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise again in the House to debate an issue that is of importance to Canadians.

I would like to begin my intervention by simply stating that the intent of Bill C–82 is to establish a new $2 coin for Canada. The parliamentary secretary this morning, in introducing the bill in the House, gave a fair amount of rationale for it. I will not repeat those things, which we obviously agree on. They are already on the record. However, I do want to make a number of comments about what he said and refer directly to the provisions of the bill.

One thing I think we ought to understand is that even though in his presentation this morning he made rather voluminous reference to the changing of other coins—the penny, the nickel, the dime and the quarter, which are all being changed in content and hence in weight—that has nothing to do with Bill C–82. He was merely talking about another initiative, which is done by regulation and which apparently is going to proceed whether this bill is passed or not.

The fact of the matter is that if Bill C–82 does not pass and if Parliament fails to approve the authorization of the new two–dollar coin, then if the other regulations are implemented there will be wholesale changes required in order to manage the currency of our country by many, many merchants and vendors, irrespective of what this bill does.

I am not proposing that we ought to change the rules and that everything should be done in the House, because we would undoubtedly run out of time. I believe there is a proper role for setting of regulations that will determine certain aspects.

• (1245)

The introduction of the coin is not terribly controversial. We have had very little feedback. That is probably due to the fact that this initiative is not yet well known. I doubt whether it will generate a great deal of public outcry. It could even be that the bill will be passed before the public becomes aware of it. I do not think it has sufficient importance that it will grab the attention of the media. It looks as if it may be pushed through faster than what we can normally communicate via usual communication methods to our constituents.

In order to keep our options open we in the Reform Party will most likely oppose the bill. When I say that immediately the cry is: "They are in opposition; they are against everything". That is not true. In this instance we are doing it with a very open mind. In the event that the unanswered questions we have at this time receive satisfactory answers, we will have no hesitation to show support for the bill.

As I understand, the primary motivation for introducing the $2 coin is as a cost saving measure for the government. Much is made of this point. I cannot help at this stage to talk about the very important issue of cost cutting. The government would like Canadians to believe that it is cutting costs at every turn. If we look at the issue we are down to a very small amount of petty change. I say that in relation to the deficit and debt. If members opposite listen carefully they will hear in the next few minutes what I mean. I am not saying things to evoke a reaction. There is empirical, numerical evidence of what I am saying now.

We have a tremendous debt and a huge deficit. We commend the Liberals for bringing it down; it is better than increasing it. It is good that the deficit has been reduced. We ought not to delude Canadians into thinking that our debt problem is solved or that our debt is decreasing because it is not.

Not only does the budget of this year call for total government expenditures of $2 billion in excess of what was spent last year, but at the end of the fiscal year we will have another $32 billion of debt that we did not have when we entered this fiscal year. That is the straight fiscal reality. I am merely echoing what was reported by the Minister of Finance when he tabled his budget.

While I say that it is wonderful to be reducing spending and thereby hopefully reducing the rate at which we are going into debt, I also need to criticize it. Perhaps I can use a sports analogy. It is wonderful for the football team to gain a yard. That is better than losing a yard. On the next play it gains another yard. However, if only two yards in two plays have been gained in Canadian football the ball has to be kicked away. The opportunity has been lost.

At this time the matter is severe. Even though the government is saying this and I will echo it, there is a savings of $254 million over the next 20 years. I am not opposed to that savings, but it is as though we are gaining another yard and meanwhile the game is slipping away from us. We need to be cognizant of that fact. We need to address it very seriously.

I hesitate to say this. If Canadians hear me say that $254 million is petty change I will get hammered for it. I do not mean it. It is a lot of money, but relative to the total picture what we are doing in this measure is barely whittling away at the edge of the problem. The problem is so large that it is as if we are trying to take the water out of the Pacific Ocean with a teaspoon. It will never happen.

Let me bring the numbers into perspective. I have shared before in the House that mathematics is my game. I have had some 31 years of experience teaching the subject. I have loved it and have used mathematics since I was a child.

In preparing my speech I immediately got out my calculator, did some number crunching and thought about what it meant. We need to be aware that the mention of savings, which is so highly touted by the other side, is extremely mediocre. Let me tell members how little the savings really are. I am sorry that we are spending time in the House today dealing with this one while the big ones are getting away from us.

A famous politician one time said: "I do not have time to be shooting rabbits when I should be after bear". That was a quotation of Tommy Douglas. That is what we are doing.

I ask the House to listen to the numbers. The $254 million savings is over 20 years. Usually when the government wants accolades for its savings it says a quarter of a billion dollars, which is a wonderfully big number. Then its voice drops when it whispers quietly "over 20 years" so that nobody notices that it is over 20 years.

What does this mean? It means $12.7 million in savings per year. We are going to deny it but we need to get it into the perspective of what it actually means in terms of the taxpayer.

I did a couple of side calculations. Here is one of them. Because of our massive debt, our interest payments of some $40 billion per year work out to about $110 million per day. Let us remember that I just said this was a cost saving of $12.7 million per year. Therefore we will save in this measure $12.7 million over the whole year. Meanwhile we are spending $110 million per day on interest. In the perspective of how viciously we are attacking the budget, this is not the measure.

Another way of putting it is that the savings "to be realized" by the implementation of the $2 coin will pay for our annual interest. This savings will account for the interest payment for two hours and 47 minutes of the year. That is the big saving.

Let us do it but let us recognize that if we are to do it and finally bring the debt under control, we will have to take some big steps. We will have to stop stepping gingerly. We will have to start looking at the big expenditures and at the big savings. Otherwise we will lose the game while busily wondering whether we made a yard or six inches.

I would like to bring it down to the individual because it is very appropriate. Not only does it put the savings into perspective. It also puts the economics into perspective. I made some assumptions because I do not have access to instantaneous figures. We are not yet on Internet in the House. It is impossible to get that technology going so it is difficult to get up to date measures.

I made a few assumptions on data that was several years old. It was the best I could get. Assuming 29 million Canadians, the savings this will produce will amount to the sum of 44 cents per year per Canadian. Over the whole year, after we have implemented the plan, every Canadian will say: "I have an extra 44 cents in my pocket this year".

Let us stop to think about it. The change in coinage will probably result in every coin operated machine in the country, telephones, food vending machines and lottery machines which I do not approve of in any case, having to be changed.

• (1255)

With the measure Canadians will save 44 cents per person per year. If the merchants increase the price on vending machines by 10 cents to recoup the cost of changing the machinery, any individual who uses a machine more than four times a year will end up spending more money. That puts the economic perspective of the measure into a different light. We need to think about these matters. Whether Canadians are paying money via their taxes or whether they are paying via the goods and services they purchase, it is still money out of their pockets.

I did another calculation. There are approximately 13.5 million Canadians who while filing income tax also pay tax. There are approximately six million taxpayers who file to receive the refundable tax credits. They are really out of the tax picture; they are only doing the paperwork. Those who are actually contributing to government income via the tax system number around 13.5 million to the best of my knowledge. If we forget about the people of Canada and only talk about the 13.5 million taxpaying Canadians, the savings are quite a bit more because there are now fewer people who are sharing the savings. The $254 million that will be saved by introducing the $2 coin gives every taxpayer a break of about 94 cents per year.

As a taxpayer I am sure that I use a coin operated machine more than 10 times per year. I am presuming. Maybe they will only increase the price by 5 cents. Maybe some of them will not increase the price at all, which I doubt, because it is our information that to change the coin recognition mechanism of machines will cost $500 per machine. That is the smallest number I have read about. I believe every coin operated machine in the country will increase their prices. I can anticipate a Pepsi or a chocolate bar which now costs 90 cents undoubtedly going up to $1, so it will require a loonie. Maybe the new machine will accept a $2 coin and give a loonie back, so people will have almost exactly the same money in their pocket in terms of weight as before.

It has been mentioned that one of the reasons for doing this is that $2 bills do not last. That is also true. I know I cannot use props; I really know the rules around here. I cannot haul out a $2 bill, but I looked at one before I came here that was worn. The $2 bills get a lot of mileage. It reminds me a bit about the way the Canadian government handles grain. The government likes to put it on trains and give it a joy ride before it arrives at its destination. We do that with our currency as well.

The $2 bill undoubtedly does a lot of travelling. Statistics tell us that on average the $2 bill we have been using extensively since the $1 bill was discontinued lasts only a year and then it must be reprinted at a cost of 6 cents. It costs 6 cents every year for every $2 bill in circulation.

The coin, because it will last for 20 years, will not have that cost. It will cost approximately 16 cents to produce, but as we all know coins last for a very long time. To show that I am a true Reformer, when I was walking down the sidewalk the other day I saw a penny and I stopped to pick it up, as Reformers would be wont to do. I was amazed to see that the penny was almost as old as I am. Somebody had just dropped it. It was not quite as old as I am. The date on it as I recall was 1945 and I am six years older than that. But I thought it was really significant that that coin could last as long as I have. I assure you that no bill in circulation would last that long.

I have stated the cost per taxpayer and the saving per Canadian of 44 cents per year as a counterbalance to the statement of the parliamentary secretary. I think I wrote down the quotation correctly. He said: "This will be a big load off the debt". With all due respect, I think not.

I will indicate some other reasons for the temporary statement that we are going to be resisting the bill. I have already indicated that to the individual Canadian it may not be nearly as big a saving as is being touted. I want to find out before I vote in favour of the bill whether it actually is economically feasible. I am not certain. I have not had sufficient data on it to convince me.

Also I somehow feel that we ought to be presenting Canadians with more than just this option. We now have a $1 coin and we are jumping now to a $2 coin and then a $5 coin. The $2 coin is the one in question.

To my knowledge no studies have been done on the viability and feasibility of dropping the $2 bill and going from the $1 to the $5. I cannot use props here, but I could hold up four coins and show that those four loonies would represent two $2 bills. After we pass the $4 dollar mark we could then use a $5 bill. You do not ever need more than two $2 bills. That means we would never need more than two $2 coins. Which means that if we did not have a $2 coin we would have to have up to four loonies.

I looked at the spec sheet. The loonie weighs 7 grams. The new proposed $2 coin is going to weigh 7.3 grams, just slightly heavier. Canadians are going to say: "If I have to have yet another coin, then there is going to more weight in my pocket". Well, this is what it is: four loonies weigh 28 grams. My generation likes to hear it in the old British system, which is about an ounce. If you had two $2 coins they would weigh 14.6 grams, which for all intents and purposes is about half an ounce.

We are asking Canadians to approve the introduction of a new $2 coin with huge costs to all the vending industries and all the coin operated machines in order to save, at maximum, the necessity of carrying an extra one–half ounce in their pockets. I suppose that could be justified. I am interested in studying it further. I am certainly interested in hearing from Canadians to find out whether they are really going to say: "Yes, let us go for the $2 coin because I walk lopsided if I have an extra half ounce on that side". I am being facetious. My apologizes. That was supposed to be a joke to wake up members opposite.

Too many questions of this type remain unanswered. In fact, there are some problems with the bill itself. Consequently, our initial response is that we respectfully submit that we are going to oppose the bill, with the option that if proper answers are given to our questions, then we will show that we are willing to support the bill.

One thing the government has done based on the data we received from it, was a poll which found that Canadians support the $2 coin. We actually question the accuracy of the poll. The difficulty with the poll is that the only option given was whether they liked the $2 coin or not. They were not given the option of not having the $2 denomination at all. Therefore, Canadians were not given a number of choices, but a very narrow choice.

I was also told, and I hope this is correct, that the first poll taken was not supportive. The question was changed in order to get a positive poll so that the proposal for the $2 coin could be advertised as having the support of Canadians. When I found out that this was done, I wondered about the motivation behind it.

Another question we definitely want answered is: Who will actually benefit from the introduction of the coin? I am making no allegations, but it is a question which we will always and carefully ask on this side of the House. I am not going to say which Liberal supporter, but we will ask who is going to benefit from this. Who has the contract? Which are the businesses that change the machines? If there are any problems with that, we are going to try to find that out and make sure that the motivations are all above board.

I will also talk a little bit about the retailers. I am sure a lot of Canadians are not aware that when a purchase is made with currency there is almost always change. Very seldom does the customer present the exact change. In any case, every merchant has the option of having the facility to accept a credit card. We understand that a great deal of merchandising is done via credit cards. The mechanism for processing credit card and debit card purchases has been refined to a great extent. That system is fairly efficient, but we still have a coinage system. We still have the rules of currency and legal tender. Therefore, the merchants are required to have change.

If you were ever to look into the till, you would see that there are different compartments for pennies, nickels, dimes, quarters and loonies. We have very few 50–cent pieces in circulation; I think most of them are hoarded by collectors. With the introduction of a new coin, every tray in every till in the whole country is going to be put on the garbage heap and replaced with a new tray with an extra compartment because of the new coin.

Another aspect to that which was indicated by the parliamentary secretary is when the $2 coin was introduced, the government said it was going to do the vendors a favour by changing the metal content and hence the weights of the other coins at the same time. The vendors could then build new coin recognition systems and do that change only once.

That is commendable, but the government is not going to instantly take all of the old coins out of circulation. Therefore, the job for the coin vendors is to have a coin recognition system that no longer recognizes nickels, dimes, quarters and loonies, which is a total of four coins, but they are going to need a total of eight coins recognized. There will be two different kinds of nickels, dimes, quarters, loonies and the $2 coin, doubloonies, I guess we will call it.

When that happens the mechanism is going to have to be much more sophisticated and undoubtedly more expensive. I read an estimate that the vending machine industry is probably going to have to lay out approximately $25 million to change the machines. Remember I did the division by 20 on the projected savings. I said that if the saving is $254 million in 20 years, it is $12.7 million in one year. By the lowest estimates, we will be spending twice the annual savings of the government in order to change the machines when we start out.

Hopefully if there is some stability to our currency system, that change should not have to be made again soon. It is interesting to note it was approximately eight years ago when all the machines in the country had to be changed. I do submit one of the things we would call for is a longer period to guarantee Canadian businessmen the coinage will not change. Eight years is really much too short a period.

I would also like answers to questions like these: What are the actual total costs to industry? What are the total costs to Canadians?

It would also be appropriate to talk about seigniorage, which is the difference between the value of the coin and what it costs to produce it. We are told that based on this component, we expect to have an input into the Canadian government coffers of $449 million in two and one–half years. I will admit I am a mathematician but I am not an economist, so I do not fully understand how that accrues to actual value to the Canadian government.

I stand to be corrected but it seems to me that if we can actually bring in $500 million in two and one–half years to the Canadian government wealth and if it is real wealth, not inflationary wealth, because of the introduction of the new currency—and I understand that part—we will presumably be taking the $2 bills out of circulation when we bring in the $2 coin. If there is an actual accrual to the government of $449 million of added value, then I ask a very elementary question: Why do we not just greatly increase the number of $1 and $2 coins? Let us produce them in sufficient numbers to pay off the debt. If it really works then we should do that.

Now I think I know enough about economics to know that would not work. Unfortunately that is not the kind of economic policy that would keep us as a country in good light with all of the other trading partners. Our currency would undoubtedly be devalued by that.

Another aspect of this is profit to the mint. I like the fact that our mint is a money maker. I am sure many people are aware that the Canadian mint not only produces Canadian currency, but also provides a sizeable import of dollars by producing and shipping coins to other countries.

I understand it is definitely economical for the mint to tool up to produce a new $2 coin. Like a car manufacturer tooling up to make a new model of car, it is always economical because that will be recouped in sales. It is undoubtedly correct for the mint to do this.

I would like to know the details of the mint's cash flow. How is this actually going to work out? We also need to recognize there are ramifications to moving from the printing of paper currency to the production of the coins. Initially there will be a large flurry of activity in producing the new coins, but what happens to productivity once we have saturated the Canadian currency with the required number of $2 coins? Those are simple questions.

With respect to the bill itself there needs to be a long term plan which is not present in this very short bill. All it says is that we are going to make a new $2 coin. That is basically all it says in layman's language. What we really should have is some sort of coherent, long term currency plan Canadians can count on.

• (1315)

There is a really serious question we ought to be asking, whether we should keep the penny. The penny costs about 70 per cent more to produce than what it is worth. It costs about 1.7 cents to manufacture a penny. It does not make a great deal of sense to keep manufacturing pennies. Think of the savings we could incur if we stop doing that. We could presumably go for many years utilizing the pennies out there now because their rate of replacement is not great. They are very sturdy coins.

Has there been any study on replacing the $5 bill with a $5 coin? If it is so good for the two, could it also be done for the five? Should it be done at the same time? Obviously if we are to make a change, to do it at the same time makes a great deal more sense than making this change now and then five or eight years down the road saying introduce a new $5 coin requiring all the vendors and all of the businesses once again to adjust.

These are some of the questions I want to have answered before I can support this bill. It could be that we are missing an opportunity of being very efficient if that is the long term direction we are to go. We need to have studies. We need to have answers to those questions.

I appreciate the opportunity to be able to address this question. Obviously in my limited knowledge I will not have explored all aspects of it. Undoubtedly there are other things we must also take into account. We will certainly be watching and participating eagerly in the House and in committee, provided we are allowed to vote in our committee and other things.

We will pay close attention in committee and we will be eagerly asking for the answers to these questions. I want to reiterate the bottom line for us is not a saving to government but a saving to the taxpayer. If the taxpayer in total is to land up with a higher expense then we will be opposed to this bill.

I seriously doubt, based on the numbers I gave at the beginning of my intervention, the added costs of making the changes to the commodities sold through vending machines primarily will eat up the pockets of the taxpayers more than what will be saved for those taxpayers through this avenue of government.

I also want to make sure that before we give consent to this bill all of the costs have been anticipated. Too often in government we start on a project and hear the estimates. How often have we heard of overruns? Over and over; it happens with great frequency. We want to make sure there are very precise accounting and estimates of the total anticipated costs to the taxpayers. I want to make sure we have an open and honest discussion.

In my first year and a half in the House there have been times when I have really enjoyed the work. I have felt what I have been contributing has been very helpful to the Canadians I was sent here to represent, broader than the Elk Island constituency, all Canadians from sea to sea.

I hope in this bill, which is such an innocuous bill, we will be able to embark on a debate, a study in committee free from the acrimony and the bull headedness that has been displayed in some of the committees, particularly in the past several days.

It is so important that we as parliamentarians—in the committee we are backbenchers—have, as the Liberal Party promised in its red book, a more meaningful role. That role will have to be found in committee because of the sheer numbers.

• (1320)

Not many members have the privilege I have today to make a 40 minute speech. Members on the Liberal side almost never get that opportunity. When a bill is introduced either the minister or the parliamentary secretary takes that opportunity. All of the other backbenchers really do not have a role.

In committee we can have a real role provided it is permitted, encouraged and acknowledged and that there is a genuine and honest recognition that the recommendations of the committee are to be taken seriously. I look forward to working on this bill in the committee. Provided our answers can be forthcoming very quickly I am sure we can come up with a solution to this problem.

It is not a big problem for Canadians. It is a problem of some significance. We can come up with a solution that will be best for all Canadians. I am thinking of those ordinary Canadians who work from day to day struggling to pay their bills, struggling to pay their taxes. Those are the people we want to represent. We want to make sure they get very best possible shake out of this legislation and other legislation like it.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Elk Island finished stating not very many backbenchers have the opportunity to speak for 40 minutes on any bill. That is a very pithy comment.

Many people would have a great deal of difficulty trying to figure how one could speak for 40 minutes on Bill C–82, which is a major struggle. How on earth does one go about speaking for 40 minutes on a debate on the introduction of a $2 coin?

A few minutes ago I was told we need to keep this debate going for another 10 minutes and do I have something to say about this. I thought sure. The automatic response was who needs a $2 coin? I have travelled extensively in the United States and I have never seen a $2 bill. Why replace the $2 bill? If we do not want to have it, we should get rid of it. If we do not need it, we do not need it.

That is a question that will be answered in committee where wiser minds than mine will be debating this important consideration of the day. With a $2 coin if we start trying to figure out how much our country will be in debt on a daily basis, it would only be $60 million $2 coins rather than 120 million loonies. We could divide it that way and perhaps it does not seem that much.

There are some really important considerations in this bill. For those watching this debate, the country is into debt at $120 million a day. We have Bill C–68, the firearms bill. We have looming on the horizon the most important question facing our country outside of the debt, our relationship with Quebec and how we will deal with and get past this hurdle. We will get past it and it is my desire we will do it together. Here we are using up the potential of five hours of debating time to talk about the introduction of a $2 coin. We already have a $1 coin.

Some hon. members opposite said we are wasting our time. How can we argue with that? Some things do not require the same amount of consideration except if one happens to be in the vending machine business. Everything we do in the House affects someone somewhere. While it may not affect all of us to the same degree all the time, it affects someone substantially some of the time.

• (1325)

If I were in the vending machine business now and a member of Parliament asked what I thought of the debate on the $2 coin, I would say it could very well be the difference between my staying in business or going out of business. Think of the huge cost to the vending machine business with the introduction of the loonie a few years ago. It important we in the House have some consideration of the effects of what we do on others outside the House.

We all recall what happened with the introduction of the loonie. What happened to the cost of newspapers from vending machines? By and large there was an increase from $75 cents to a loonie. The vending industry raised prices from 25 cents to 50 cents to 75 cents to a loonie. It was not taking advantage of a situation. If it has to make mechanical changes it might as well make them to last.

What will happen if we introduce a doubloonie, a $2 coin? A vast number of ideas have come forward about what to call the new coin. Ideas came from the west saying we should put a picture of a deer on either side and call it the two buck coin. Another member said we could put a picture of the leader of the Reform Party on one side, the Leader of the Opposition on the other and say flip a coin.

There is a substantial cost, particularly to the vending machine business. As we make decisions and changes for the nation, things that seem pretty simple and straightforward very often have a result that extends far beyond what we are doing here.

I have two $2 bills in my pocket and a loonie. One thing brought to my attention the other day was if we get rid of the $2 bill, what will happen to the amount of change we carry in our pockets. I have a loonie and some quarters. I am trying to stretch this out. I suppose we are looking at effects this will have down the road, beyond the vending machine industry and beyond inflation. I suppose to some people the amount of coins they would have to carry in their pocket would be something of a consideration. Without a $2 bill and because we do not have a $1 bill, we would have to carry around a whole lot more loonies or doubloonies.

Mr. Abbott: It would make the tailors happy.

Mr. McClelland: While it might upset the vending industry, it would certainly make the tailoring industry happy since people would be walking around with holes in their pockets or their purses. However, it would be something of a problem.

As the debate winds to a conclusion I hope some of these points will be considered. In my opinion we do not need another coin. If we are to get rid of the $2 bill, let us get rid of it and make do with our happy little loonies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 1.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

ADM AGRI–INDUSTRIES LTD. OPERATIONS ACT

Mr. Raymond Lavigne (Verdun—Saint–Paul, Lib.) moved that Bill C–313, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of the operations at ADM Agri–Industries Ltd., be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to introduce Bill C–313 in the House today. However, I regret the fact that this legislation is necessary to put an end to the dispute at ADM Agri–Industries Ltd. The events leading up to Bill C–313 are as follows: a labour dispute between ADM Agri–Industries Ltd. and the National Syndicate of Employees of Ogilvie Flour Mills Company Ltd. has affected about 150 employees involved in production.

The parties started negotiations on the renewal of the collective agreement that expired on January 31, 1992. A conciliator and then a mediator were appointed to help the parties settle their differences. Unfortunately, very little progress was made.

The union called a legal general strike on June 6, 1994. This strike, which has been going on for 11 months, has not prevented the employer from continuing operations, since the employer hired replacement workers, which has undermined the bargaining position of ADM's regular employees.

Bill C–313 proposes final offer selection as a way to settle the dispute. Within 30 days after being appointed, or within such greater period as will be specified by the Minister, the arbitrator shall, first of all, determine the matters on which the employer and the union were in agreement at cut–off time; second, determine the matters remaining in dispute at cut–off time; third, select, in order to resolve the matters remaining in dispute, either the final offer submitted by the employer or the final offer submitted by the union; fourth, determine a back to work protocol.

Meanwhile, employees would go back to work in accordance with the provisions of the protocol. The bill would contain provisions obliging the parties to abide by the back to work protocol and resume operations. The bill's enforcement provisions include fines in the case of an individual who contravenes a provision of this legislation. Bill C–313 is not anti–scab legislation.

The purpose of this bill is to deal with a specific situation that currently exists at ADM. Many of my constituents have worked for ADM for more than 20 years. Today, they are out of work and have little hope of getting back their jobs. They want to go back to work, and they want to negotiate. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I said the employees' union wants to negotiate.

On April 26, following promises from the company that it would go back to the bargaining table and because there was some hope of obtaining a negotiated agreement, the National Syndicate of Employees of Ogilvie Flour Mills Company Ltd. sent me a fax in which they asked me to withdraw this bill.

• (1335)

On May 1, the union met with the company, and by May 2, before the bill could even be withdrawn, yet again, the union sent me another fax saying: "Since our letter of April 26, we have been to two mediation sessions with Warren Edmunston and Rock St–Hilaire. The attitude of ADM Ltd. at those sessions, despite the fact that the strike has dragged on for 11 months now, has made us reconsider our position regarding the bill that you tabled. Effectively, on the critical issues, ADM's vice–president has said that there was no reason for compromise".

"Do you know what that means? That means that there is no reason for them to compromise. Needless to say, the hope of reaching a negotiated settlement has never been so dim".

"That is why we are now asking you to bring Bill C–313 before the tripartite committee of the House of Commons. Of course, when the time comes, we would like to be heard with regard to this bill, because we could suggest a few amendments".

"Nevertheless, in principle, the bill is an acceptable mid term solution and will at least guarantee that the workers at the Ogilvie flour mill will have a decent future and that they can return to work their pride intact".

"It is certain that a negotiated settlement would be the preferred solution. However, this cannot end up being a settling of accounts in which one party squarely comes out the winner. That is why we believe that this bill could very well be the preferred solution to the stalemate in which we dread we will find ourselves".

"I hope to hear from you soon and would like to thank you for the interest you have shown in the workers I represent".

The letter was signed Claude Tremblay, president of the National Syndicate of Employees of Ogilvie Flour Mills Co. Ltd.

I am convinced that it was very difficult for them to reverse their decision about having the bill withdrawn. As some of you already know, ADM Ltd.'s factory at Candiac and the union came to an agreement very quickly. There is, however, a major difference between the Candiac factory and the one in Montreal, located in my riding. The difference is as follows: the Candiac plant processes flour and is under the control of the provincial government. It is covered by anti–strikebreaking legislation, and the union could have halted ADM's activities there.

In Montreal, however, the ADM mills come under federal legislation, which permits the hiring of replacement workers. As we say, "the company has the big end of the stick". It can say to the union, through its vice–president: "We have no reasons for compromise".

This is no way to treat people. Faithful employees, who have given twenty years of service or more to this company are now, after an eleven month strike, in debt, without hope and unable to feed their family.

Workers have pride too and are happy to earn their living. As the Prime Minister put it in one his speeches, a father is proud to earn a living in order to be able to put food on the table for his children. When they came to see me at my office, they were not looking for handouts. They simply wanted to be able to bargain in good faith and to return to their jobs, which have been given to replacement workers.

As we know, whenever a company has the upper hand, it is forever critical of the people who have given their life for it. People may have worked 30 years of their life for a company and have it say today: "No, not a chance. You will be out in the street with no chance of renegotiating your seniority". The employees of ADM are not asking for a salary increase; they earn between $17 and $19 an hour. They are proud of what they earn. All they want is recognition of their seniority. The owner, Dwayne

Andrew, a multimillionaire, does not want to negotiate with ADM.

• (1340)

I therefore request the unanimous consent of this House to move:

That Bill C–313 be declared a votable item, pursuant to Standing Order 93.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion of our colleague for Verdun—Saint–Paul?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead has the floor.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C–313, which was tabled in this House by the hon. member for Verdun—Saint–Paul, who is a government member.

One can see that, while Ogilvie's may be experiencing problems, this is also the case on the other side of this House. Indeed, there seems to be a disagreement regarding the taking of a vote on this bill. Some day, we may find out exactly why. In the meantime, I want to make some comments on the legislation as such. I will take a few moments to relate the chronology of this dispute at Ogilvie Mills Ltd., which is located in Montreal, in the riding of Verdun—Saint–Paul.

The collective agreement in effect at Ogilvie's expired in January 1992, and the company was sold in June of that year by its owners, Labatt, to an American multinational, Archers Daniel Midland.

After the change of ownership, bargaining became very difficult. The new employer behaved somewhat as if it were in a banana republic, brazenly trying to impose its rules and not caring one bit about our traditional ways of bargaining. It showed contempt towards the men and women who work for Ogilvie's. Consequently, on June 6, 1994, the workers voted 97 per cent in favour of a strike.

Why did they make that decision? Contrary to what several may think, particularly on the management side, people who hold a regular, well paid job allowing them a decent quality of life never decide gladly to do without their income and to go on strike. Such a decision is never made for the fun of it but, rather, for serious reasons.

This was the case at Ogilvie's, since the demands made by the new management were utterly excessive in the eyes of any objective observer.

• (1345)

Since then, for close to a year now, the employees have been out on the street, without any hope for a settlement, since the company, taking advantage of the fact that it is federally incorporated and that there is no federal anti–scab legislation, has hired substitute workers and is operating as if nothing had happened, while the real employees, those who worked for the flour mill for over 20 years, are still out on the street and might stay there for quite a while yet.

My colleague for Verdun—Saint–Paul insisted earlier on the fact that this private member's bill is not an anti–scab bill. He is right this bill has nothing in common with an anti–scab bill, but this shows the lack of responsibility on the part of the government which, despite the official opposition's repeated requests over the years and especially recently, has refused to pass anti–scab legislation in this House, which, I am convinced, would have led to a quicker settlement.

Across Canada, 75 per cent of employees working for provincially incorporated companies are protected by anti–scab legislation. This means that, in all the companies governed by provincial laws, in Quebec, Ontario or British Columbia, employees can go through the collective bargaining process, then go out on strike in a civilized and orderly manner, thus establishing a real balance of power. The federal government still refuses to pass such legislation which, as I said, would certainly have solved the problem in this particular case.

I only have a few minutes left, but I want to stress that point, because it is not the first time that we are confronted with this kind of situation, which is likely to occur again many times in the future. The government must realize anti–scab legislation is a necessity. Members opposite seem to want to make absolutely sure that this legislation is not passed in this House, so as not to apply to federally registered companies.

The official opposition supports Bill C–313, which deals with what is called the final offer selection. This is better than nothing. It is reluctantly that the official opposition supports such a measure since, in the context of labour negotiations, the final offer is truly a last resort. Such a solution is often used when every other avenue has been explored, and when workers are at the end of their rope. I know that Ogilvie workers and their representatives hope, after a work stoppage of almost a year, to see such provisions come into effect.

Again, as far as the official opposition is concerned, we unanimously support this approach. We would have liked a vote on this bill, which would have given every member of this House an opportunity to express his or her views by voting for or against it. We already know, however, that there are deep divisions on this issue within the government majority, within the Liberal Party. That is regrettable since, as I said earlier, we are discussing the fate of men and women who have been on the street without any income for nearly a year. They have children to support, mortgages and rents to pay. An agreement must be negotiated as soon as possible.

I hope that, once this bill is passed, once these employees have gone back to work, they can resume their activities in acceptable conditions, in a climate that is not too hostile.

In conclusion, I hope that the government will think about, really think about, introducing in this House an anti–scab bill that would benefit all workers subject to the Canada Labour Code.

[English]

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Verdun—Saint–Paul.

The bill proposes that the government implement final offer selection as a mechanism for resolving the year long labour dispute at ADM Agri–Industries, otherwise known as Ogilvie Flour Mills.

I was a bit surprised that a member from the government side would sponsor the bill. When the hon. member for Lethbridge was seeking support for his final offer arbitration in Bill C–262, which called for basically the same as the bill today only it applied to grain handling disputes, government members did not want any part of it.

If the hon. member from Verdun and perhaps the rest of his caucus truly believed in the concept they would have spoken in support of Bill C–262 at the time it was debated in the House.

How can he promote final offer selection or arbitration in one case and oppose it in others? Since flour mill workers are grouped into the same category as grain elevator operators they fall under federal jurisdiction. If the hon. member and his colleagues were really concerned about the workers at Ogilvie Mills, they would have got the ball rolling on March 20 by supporting the bill of the member for Lethbridge on final offer arbitration in grain handling disputes.

We know the government runs hot and cold. The fact the member could not get unanimous consent for his bill is a perfect example as far as final offer arbitration is concerned. They did not like Bill C–262 and they came out in force to ensure that it did not survive.

The Minister of Human Resources Development in a news release announcing that royal assent had been given to the West Coast Ports Operations Act was quoted as saying:

> The imposition of the final offer selection procedure in this particular legislation should encourage the two sides to demonstrate a strong sense of rationality in deciding on the positions they place before the arbitrator.

That is what we said in Bill C–262, that it was a tool that could be used by either side in a dispute.

The transport committee in its recently released national marine strategy recommended a final offer selection mechanism for settlement of all disputes between pilots and their customers. It seems to work in some areas. As the mover of the bill mentioned, it is not something union people are objecting to. There seems to be growing popularity for the concept of final offer arbitration.

The committee also recommended that the new Marine Transportation Act should provide for final offer selection for the settlement of all disputes between the new not for profit Seaway Corporation and its employees. The chairman of the committee spoke on final offer arbitration during the debate on Bill C–262. He spoke at length about the need to maintain essential services. He also said:

> Employees either have the right to strike or not.

• (1355)

He went on to say:

> We have to roll with the change. I do not feel the way to begin a positive and co–operative renewal of labour relations is by introducing legislation which begins to erode what labour considers a basic right.

We are getting mixed signals from the government.

Last week in the human resources development committee I had an opportunity to ask the Minister of Labour if she would consider implementing final offer arbitration as a solution to ending disputes involving essential services. She conceded that it might be an interesting concept but that it would be difficult to use as a method of settling disputes, especially complicated disputes like this one. I got the distinct feeling that she would not support that sort of move. I am not surprised my hon. friend could not get unanimous consent to make his motion votable.

Obviously he has one other colleague in his caucus that feels the same as he does. The member for Vaudreuil introduced exactly the same bill but it has apparently been withdrawn. I am sure they both thought there would be no repercussions since the government employed final offer selection as a way out of its problems with the west coast ports.

My friend from Verdun—Saint–Paul is probably thankful in some ways that it is not votable because if it were he would have to vote in favour of it and we have seen the government sometimes punish people who vote for their constituents.

The Reform Party believes in the bargaining process. We do not want to interfere in the process of two parties coming to an agreement. We see final offer arbitration as tool that is useful to both labour and management. Certainly my friend across the way has alluded to having support of the union in this case.

We on this side are concerned about the impacts that strikes and lockouts have on workers, employers and Canadians who most often have to bear the brunt of the costs and inconveniences when the services of monopolistic industries are withdrawn. When all efforts to solve the disputes through the regular collective bargaining process have been exhausted, final offer arbitration should be available to all parties.

The recent strikes in the railway helped to underline the weakness inherent in the Canada Labour Code from preventing a shutdown to essential services. The federal government has a responsibility in this area to act in the best interest of Canadians. Transportation and communication services are essential to the daily movement of people, goods and services.

Canada's competitive advantage is determined by the efficiency and reliability of the transportation and communication network that it relies on. We cannot afford any major shutdowns in the network that links the country together. A case in point was the recent railway strike that is estimated to have cost the Canadian economy in the neighbourhood of $3 billion.

Final offer arbitration is the most effective and impartial means of obtaining a solution to the concerns of labour and management where an impasse occurs that inflicts significant damage on Canadians. It requires both parties to negotiate in good faith and quickly, while keeping in mind their overall interest as an organization.

There is nothing to prevent both sides from achieving their deal providing they are being fair, open and expedient with each other. Tremendous pressure is put on both sides to reach an agreement if the arbitrator is in a position to adopt all of one or all of the other side's proposals.

The threat of arbitration should be enough for both sides to reach agreement if the arbitrator is in a position to adopt either side's proposals. The threat of arbitration should be enough for both sides if they want to reach an agreement.

In cases where fundamental issues are at stake, such as employment security, an agreement may never occur through the collective bargaining process. A strike or lockout only makes matters worse and nobody wins in those situations. The best solution is for someone respected by both sides to make a decision on the fairness of one proposal and for the process to be viewed as legitimate by both sides.

Section 57 of the Canada Labour Code contains a provision for final settlement by an arbitrator for disputes that occur during the life of a collective agreement. The parliamentary secretary from York North referred to this provision on March 2 when he said: "Our system of compulsory collective agreement settlement through arbitration or some other peaceful means contributes to a high degree of stability in our industrial relations system". The message government is sending on this issue is one of confusion. Government is for it in some instances and not for it in other instances.

I am certainly not trying to circumvent the collective agreement process. I do want to ensure that in areas of essential services Canadian people are protected from costly disruptive work stoppages that could affect their safety and their livelihood. We need an amendment to the Canada Labour Code which would expand the provisions contained in section 27 to include final offer arbitration in work stoppages in essential services as soon as the existing agreements expire.

The Ogilvie workers and their employers have been involved in a bitter labour dispute as has been mentioned, for almost a year. Those people would certainly like to get back to work. It is unfortunate that this bill is not a votable one. If it were, I would be suggesting to our caucus that we should support it.

I encourage the government to come forth with legislation considerably similar to this that would work as a long term solution and not a piecemeal approach to the problems.

ADM AGRI–INDUSTRIES LTD. OPERATIONS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–313, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of the operations at ADM Agri–Industries Ltd., be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on Bill C–313 which is an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of operations at ADM Agri–Industries Ltd.

In short, the bill uses final offer selection as a dispute settlement mechanism. It would empower the minister to appoint an arbitrator to select the final offer submitted either by the employer or the union. In effect, the bill calls upon the federal government to impose a settlement process on the two parties.

On the face of it, the proposal sounds reasonable. However, I am a firm believer in the free collective bargaining process and the long term interest of collective bargaining would not be served otherwise. Having said that, I want to express to the member for Verdun—Saint–Paul that I share his concerns about the dispute.

On June 6, less than a month from now, the strike will be a year old. Surely in today's highly competitive economic environment it is reasonable to expect the parties to a labour management dispute to reconcile their differences in far less time.

It is noteworthy that one of the parties, the employer, is owned by Archer Daniels Midland, a very large U.S. based transnational corporation. To be frank, I wonder how aware the employer is that the industrial relations culture in this country is different from the industrial relations culture that exists south of the border.

• (1405)

Without overstating the differences between the two countries, I think it is fair to say that generally, employers and managers in this country possess a greater willingness and ability to work with labour unions. They tend to avoid the kind of power bargaining that seems to predominate in the U.S.

Dr. Pradeep Kumar, associate director of the Industrial Relations Centre at Queens University, pointed out in his study of industrial relations in Canada and the United States that: "While U.S. employers have become increasingly hostile to unions, practising a wide range of union substitution and union avoidance activities in pursuit of lower cost and greater flexibility in compensation and work arrangements, Canadian managers appear to have shown greater willingness to work together with unions to facilitate adjustment and adaptation to changing markets and technology. The growing U.S. trend toward a union free environment is less evident in Canada".

Dr. Kumar goes on to say: "Unlike U.S. employers who have vigorously demanded concessions and forced unions into submission using their enhanced bargaining strength, Canadian managers, while jealously guarding their right to manage the workplace free of influence of organized labour whenever feasible, have been more accommodating and receptive to union goals and objectives and have attempted to find consensus on areas of mutual concern".

Also, I think Canadian unions rely more and place a higher value on the collective bargaining process. They certainly enjoy greater public support as evidenced by the fact that the percentage of unionized workers in the U.S. is about half of what it is in Canada.

Professor Kumar and others have also noted that Canadian labour legislation differs markedly from U.S. legislation in many respects.

For example, Canadian collective bargaining legislation provides a relatively simple procedure by which trade unions can acquire collective bargaining rights. In most Canadian jurisdictions a union can be certified without a vote upon evidence that 51 to 60 per cent of employees in the bargaining unit wish to be represented by the union. In the U.S. all applications for certification are contested, requiring a vote to establish that a union represent a majority of employees.

No Canadian jurisdiction has right to work laws, but 21 states in the United States of America have such legislation. Canadian labour legislation permits all forms of union security, closed shop as well as union shop. Dues check off is a common provision.

Most Canadian jurisdictions have successor right provisions, providing that where a business is sold the successor employer acquires all the rights, privileges and obligations of the predecessor. The successor is bound by any collective agreement in force. In the U.S. the effective change in ownership on the union and the collective agreement is uncertain, depending on various factors.

A number of Canadian jurisdictions provide for advance notice and consultation on technological change. This provision is not found in the U.S. legislation.

First contract arbitration is available in the federal jurisdiction, British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec. There is no such provision in the United States.

The use of replacement workers during a strike is prohibited in Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia. In the U.S. if employees choose to go on strike, their employer can immediately and permanently replace them.

As Paul Weiler, professor of labour law at Harvard University put it: "For employees who may have spent 20 years with the company building up a stake of experience and seniority that can rarely be duplicated elsewhere, the stark reality is that if they do go on strike, they can be replaced by the company with people who in less than 20 minutes on the job gain permanent priority over the striking veterans".

Labour standards and occupational safety and health legislation in the United States is also very different from such legislation here in Canada. For example, U.S. legislation, unlike Canadian legislation, does not require the establishment of a joint health and safety committee, nor does it contain a right to refuse unsafe work. The right to refuse unsafe work by health and safety committees exists in every single jurisdiction in Canada.

While all Canadian jurisdictions have mandatory maternity and paternity leave provisions, with the right to return to former jobs and the continuation of benefits, very few jurisdictions in the United States require employers to provide pregnancy leave.

There are no individual standards for notice of termination or any severance pay legislation in the United States. In Canada, on the other hand, all jurisdictions require an employer to give notification to an individual being terminated, and Ontario and the federal jurisdiction provide for mandatory severance pay.

In Canada most jurisdictions require advance notice of plant closures involving 50 or more workers. Recent U.S. law sets minimum notice requirements for plant closures and mass lay–offs by employers of more than 100 employees, but there is no provision for consultation with the unions similar to that found in many Canadian jurisdictions.

My point is to show that the industrial relations climate or culture in Canada differs in significant ways from that in the United States.

In the dispute we are talking about today we have a relatively new employer, perhaps used to another way of doing things and having attitudes and assumptions not yet aligned with the Canadian attitudes and assumptions, and perhaps too ready to adopt a hard bargaining strategy. In this dispute the employer has chosen to use replacement workers, a decision which, not surprisingly, has greatly angered the workers. In their view, the use of replacement workers is the reason the dispute has lasted so long.

As members of the House know, the federal government has been examining the Canada Labour Code very intensively. It has been consulting with representatives from business, labour, and other interested parties. One of the issues being studied is whether the federal government ought to follow the examples set by Quebec, Ontario, and British Columbia in their legislation to prohibit or restrict the use of replacement workers. Those who favour restrictions on the use of replacements argue that when an employer continues to operate during a strike the collective bargaining process is frustrated and the employer's incentive to negotiate is removed, work stoppages are lengthened, and picket line violence is often inevitable.

It is also argued that the use of replacements serves as a disincentive for employees to join unions. Workers who know they can be replaced easily during a strike will wonder about union effectiveness and will be less likely to opt for unionization.

Those who oppose restrictions on the use of replacement workers say that such a move would tilt the balance of power toward labour, inevitably resulting in higher labour costs. They claim that it would deter new investment. The point is also made that most federally regulated industries are infrastructure industries. If they are completely shut down the entire economy would suffer.

The issue is complex and divisive. The arguments on both sides are persuasive. Also persuasive is the fact that 75 per cent of the workforce under provincial jurisdiction is governed by legislation prohibiting the use of replacement workers.

I will end my remarks by reiterating that I cannot support this bill because I believe firmly in free collective bargaining. The state has no business intervening in what are essentially private disputes.

At the same time, I have concerns about the heavy handed and less than accommodating attitude of the company. Like many others, I whether the impasse would have lasted so long had there been restrictions on the use of replacement workers in the Canada Labour Code.

IMMIGRATION ENFORCEMENT IMPROVEMENT ACT

The House resumed from May 12 consideration of the motion that Bill C–316, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Transfer of Offenders Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member on his initiative. I know how hard he has worked in order to introduce this private member's bill. His constituents are very fortunate to have him as their representative. He is hard working and I wish him well.

The bill relates to immigrants or refugees in Canada who have criminal records. On the surface the bill would help the government deport those refugees or immigrants immediately after sentencing provided a provision is made to pass the authority to the provinces to deal with this issue.

On the surface the bill makes a lot of sense. It is precise and to the point. However, it causes quite a bit of confusion when one goes a little deeper into it.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has already indicated publicly that he supports the intent and the spirit of the bill but has raised a number of concerns which I will reiterate. On November 1, 1994 the minister tabled a document entitled "Into the 21st Century: A Strategy for Immigration and Citizenship". He made a number of comments but I will mention only a couple which I believe are relevant to the legislation before us.

• (1105)

The minister said: "A number of legislative changes will be considered to the control and enforcement provision of the act. For example, currently deportation orders can only be issued by an immigration official. Consideration is being given to authorizing judges to issue deportation orders at the time of sentencing rather than requiring a separate step".

He also said there may be other improvements we can usher into the system. One such recommendation coming from chiefs of police is to permit judges to not recommend deportation at the time of sentencing but to order deportation at the time of sentencing so that the system is leaner and the issues of individuals are all dealt with at the right time and that there is full due process for the individual, counsel and lawyer to react to the judge's ordering of a deportation rather than recommending and then having it go back to immigration and before an immigration appeal division and so on.

In other words, the minister is already trying to streamline the process and make it easier for the justice system to deport people with criminal records who are here as refugees or landed immigrants.

He further stated that as parliamentarians we should be interested in this issue and also be prepared to look at making the relevant amendments if we think the amendments will work, which is very important, and if we think those amendments are fair. The minister supports the spirit and the intent of bill C–316. However, I will outline some concerns of the Department of Justice as well as the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Immigration falls under federal jurisdiction when it comes to deliberation and delivery of the justice system. If we were to pass on this jurisdiction to the provincial level there would be a number of problems. The department which deals with the issue of immigration is not the same department which deals with delivery of other relevant aspects of immigration.

If this were transferred to the provinces since this is where the issue would fall under Bill C–316, we would have to introduce training for judges and lawyers in some cases. That would cause more delays. Over and over we have seen cases tossed out of court because they were delayed for too long. It would mean more appeals. We already have an overloaded provincial court system.

When dealing with the provincial justice system we know attorneys can make recommendations to the court based on a number of factors which are not part of immigration agenda but are a part of other aspects of the justice system such as plea bargaining. Judges would then require proof beyond a reasonable doubt which would make the issue before the court difficult to prove.

This legislation contravenes the charter of rights when it comes to challenges. A number of sections could be challenged such as section 11(h) which deals with double punishment. It could be argued that deportation is a second form of punishment in addition to any other sentence; only a non–citizen would be subject to this punishment.

Section 12 deals with cruel and unusual punishment. It could be argued that removing the permanent resident from Canada would offend standards of decency by denying for life the person's right to be with family and friends.

Under section 15, equality under the law, it could be argued that permanent residents were being treated differently from Canadian citizens under the law. Two persons convicted of the same offence would be subject to different consequences based on their immigrant status.

Simply by looking at these recommendations from both the Department of Justice and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, while the intent of the bill is good I suggest my colleague might want to take it back and look at it with the view that if anything is put before the House it should be consistent with the charter of rights and freedoms and should meet the criteria set out by the Department of Justice and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I remind members that when in doubt in seeking the floor please rise; do not depend on any lists that might or might not be in circulation.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this bill which if successful and sufficiently improved could be a good first step in ensuring the quick deportation of foreign born criminals.

I appreciate the work the Canadian Police Association has done on the bill. I appreciate that my colleague from the Liberal Party was brave enough to sponsor it. Clearly the goals of the bill are not shared by the minister of immigration. If they were, these measures would have been amended to Bill C–44 when it was up for debate.

The minister knew the recommendations of the Canadian Police Association but chose not to act on them. He chose to ignore these common sense measures which, when the legal language is cleared up by a competent lawyer, would take a small step toward ensuring non–citizens who commit serious crimes in Canada will make two stops after they leave the court room, one to the prison and one to the airport where, unless Canadian immigration allows them to run away on the tarmac as was the case last week, they will be sent where they belong, out of Canada.

The bill has a lot of serious problems that will require serious study and fixing before the bill can be made effective. I trust it is the intention of my colleague to work on these weak points. I hope the bill is not window dressing, the sort of smoke and mirrors tactics the minister of immigration loves to engage in.

My colleague from Cariboo—Chilcotin dealt with the bill's problems admirably during the last hour of debate. I will not beat that dead horse. However, before the bill goes any further it is necessary to look at the big picture of deportations. It is necessary to understand what the Reform Party wants to see with deportation policy.

The Reform Party's stand on non–citizen criminals is clear, simple and in line with what the majority of Canadians want, something the minister for immigration would have a hard time understanding. Our policy for non–citizen criminals would not result from bargaining with special interests or with refugee lawyers but from consulting with our members, our constituents and with the people of Canada.

I am sure my hon. colleague, the sponsor of the bill, understands what the people are saying on immigration matters. I understand a lot of Liberal backbenchers are feeling the heat from their constituents. It is too bad they cannot do anything about it. It is too bad they have to toe the Liberal Party line.

• (1115)

We believe that the people who have not exercised a claim to Canadian citizenship or who have not lived in the country long enough to claim citizenship and who commit serious crimes have violated a moral contract entered into with the people of Canada.

The Reform Party believes that immigration to Canada is a privilege, not a right. We believe that the people of Canada, the citizens of Canada, have the collective right to determine who comes into Canada, how many people are allowed to come into Canada and under what conditions.

A newcomer to this country enters into a moral contract with Canada. There are several terms of that contract. The most important of them is that the newcomer must abide by the laws of this country. There is nothing that angers my constituents like recently arrived immigrants to Canada who commit crime. That drives them up the wall, and rightly so. Canadians collectively have the right to be morally outraged when the wonderful gift of Canadian residency is extended and then the recipient of that gift violates our laws.

We are above all else a nation of laws. That defines Canada. We demand of anyone who immigrates here that those laws are to be respected. That is a demand. When someone ignores that demand, violates the moral contract with Canadians and makes a mockery of the Canadian generosity by breaking the law, then that person should be removed quickly and permanently.

I challenge the government. I challenge the immigration minister and the Prime Minister to poll Canadians, ask Canadians if they feel that newcomers who break the law should be removed quickly and permanently. Mr. Speaker, I will bet you Sergio Marchi's pension that they will say yes.

Some hon. members: Order.

An hon. member: You know better. You are not a rookie any more.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I am sure that although we have been away from this place for a week, colleagues will remember very well the traditions and rules of the House in referring to one another either by riding name or portfolio in terms of ministry.

Mr. Hanger: Mr. Speaker, I will heed that caution.

Immigrants are responsible for a small percentage of crime in Canada. Immigrants are under represented in Canadian prisons. That speaks to the character of immigrants to Canada. That speaks to the gratitude of the immigrant population. The immigrant population, like in all populations, there are some who will break the law.

Immigrants have come to me on a tragically regular basis asking me to do something about crime in their communities. When we deport foreign born criminals, we are not picking on immigrants; we are protecting them. Immigrants come to this country seeking a better life and because the overwhelming majority of immigrants do not break the law, Canada has a duty to ensure that the problems and the crime that many immigrants have left behind in their countries of origin stay there, out of Canada. That is our duty.

Do immigrants who break the law deserve to be doubly punished? No. Should they serve more time because they are immigrants? No way. However, if a non–citizen breaks the law then they have done more than just violate our law, for which the criminal justice system will deal with them. They have also broken a moral contract: they have broken their promise to obey the laws of the country they have adopted and that has adopted them.

As a result of the violation of that contract Canada has the right to say we don't want to include them in our national family. We have the right to view that period of time between the date the newcomer comes to this country and the date they receive their citizenship as a period of probation. If that probation is violated, then there is no onus on Canada to provide a home for that person any longer.

The Reform Party supports quick deportation after conviction. We will support this bill on the condition that the gaping holes in this legislation are plugged by the committee. We will cooperate with the sponsor of this bill to work out those problems, despite the fact that those are huge problems as the bill is presently written.

Today let me speak briefly to one of the big problems in this legislation, and that is the problem of reciprocal agreements with other countries.

• (1120)

This bill says that a criminal court judge can only order deportation back to countries with which we have a co–operative agreement. In other words, the only countries we can deport people to are countries that say they will take them back.

The problem we run into is that a lot of our foreign–born criminals come from countries that are notorious for not taking back their own. What is this bill going to do about that problem, the so–called travel document problem? It does nothing except to give in to it. That is not good enough. It means that a large part of the overall problem will not be dealt with by this legislation.

I do not expect my colleague to be able to single handedly fix that problem, but the government can fix the problem. The inability to secure travel documents is no excuse for not being able to deport.

The Reform Party today is putting this government on notice that we will no longer accept the excuse of not being able to get travel documents. We give away far too much foreign aid for that excuse to be valid. If a country will not take back its citizens who commit crime in Canada, then the minister of immigration should recommend to the Minister of Foreign Affairs that all foreign aid in any form be suspended to that country until they change their tune.

No deportation, no foreign aid: it is a simple solution. Most of the solutions to Canada's immigration problems are simple ones. They only require a little political will.

I thank my hon. colleague for sponsoring this legislation. I hope this gesture has implications within his caucus. I hope we can impress on the immigration minister the need to get serious with immigration policy. So far the minister has not figured that out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The hon. member for Roberval would like to raise a point of order. Please give me a moment, as I would like to check something.

• (1125)

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to raise my point of order. I would like to seek from the House unanimous consent for an emergency debate. I realize that, according to the order of business—I will be brief—such a request can normally be made only after the regular period of routine proceedings, which will end at approximately 3.15 p.m. today.

However, given the importance of the issue in question and the need to prepare ourselves for the debate, if the House were to accept my proposal, I think that you would find unanimous consent in this House for the following motion: "That the House take into consideration the situation of Canadian peacekeepers in Bosnia–Hercegovina".

Given the extremely serious situation there, it is important that the House immediately consider this request for a three hour emergency debate, to begin at 6.00 p.m. The details of the debate could be worked out with the government later, but it is important that we immediately make up our minds on the necessity of the debate.

Therefore, I would ask my colleagues whether they will give their unanimous consent right now to holding a debate at 6.00 p.m. tonight on the situation of the peacekeepers, an extremely important issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Firstly, I would like to thank the hon. member for Roberval for his patience while I verified the rules governing this process. I give the floor to the parliamentary secretary to the Leader of the Government.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the same point. I can see the hon. member's point of view, but I am quite surprised that he did not inform me that he planned to introduce this motion this morning.

[English]

I am prepared, to enter into discussion with him. We are always willing to entertain such discussions with hon. members in the opposition when they have suggestions concerning House business. However, I am aware of no such discussions on the subject this morning.

In the normal course the hon. member and others may wish to bring forward an application under Standing Order 52 at three o'clock. I think it is entirely appropriate that this be done, and the Speaker then will consider whether the circumstances exist for an emergency debate.

Tomorrow is an opposition day. It has been designated as such and it is available for discussion on the subject should the opposition choose. There is plenty of opportunity for the House to engage in the debate, and I do not feel there is need for us to set aside business and indeed the hon. member is not suggesting that we set aside the business that is scheduled today for the House. I suggest we proceed with it at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before I give the hon. member for Calgary Centre the floor I would like to remind the House to be cautious. I do not intend to get into the debate at this time. As soon as possible I would like to put the question to the House with respect to the request from the hon. member for Roberval for unanimous consent. I do not want to prejudge what the decision of the House might be in the matter.

I will hear the hon. member for Calgary Centre on a brief intervention.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, I would like you to clarify whether in fact under the standing orders other business can be brought up or new items can be brought up during Private Members' Business. Do we not have to stick to the agenda for the hour and then seek unanimous consent? I am just questioning the timing of the request.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): That is exactly the point I was taking time to get more information on while I asked the hon. member for Roberval to be patient before getting the floor.

I have been assured that the request can be made for unanimous consent at any time and the House will deal with the question as it arises.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the hon. member for Red Deer has already made an application to the government to have an emergency debate on Bosnia.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Let me deal with the matter at hand, following the intervention of the hon. member for Roberval.

[Translation]

You have heard the hon. member for Roberval's arguments for unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): No.

Therefore, let us resume debate.

• (1130)

[English]

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this morning to deal with private member's Bill C–316.

I know there has been a lot of discussion surrounding this issue in the larger cities of Canada, but make no mistake, this issue is not just of concern to large cities. I represent the people of Souris—Moose Mountain, a rural riding in southeast Saskatchewan. Crime for them is of great concern as it is to all Canadians.

The people of my riding are honest hard working individuals. They work every day to see that the future of Canada is a good one for their children. We are not so different from the people in Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver. We dream of the future and we hope for our children. We feel strongly that we live in the best country in the world and we want to keep it that way.

Let me say that the murders of Georgina Leimonis and Constable Todd Baylis were reprehensible crimes. The sad thing is that these are not isolated events. We should be able to stop these kinds of things from happening in our country. We must work together to see that we reach a balance which protects the rights of individuals and allows for freedoms, but also provides for security for us to live and raise our families and walk our streets in safety.

I congratulate the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. He has done an admirable job this past year and one–half in producing reforms and actions that have and will greatly improve our immigration and deportation system.

Measures contained in Bill C–44 have limited the rights of serious criminals to appeal under the immigration system. However, there still seems to be room for further tightening on the rights of serious criminals. There is still room for a criminal to fall through the cracks between the courts and the Immigration Act.

Many appeals are available to a convicted criminal both through the criminal process and the Immigration Act. Bill C–316 would still permit the criminal to have access to appeals through the criminal process. It would only limit his or her access to the appeals in the Immigration Act. Remember, we are talking about convicted criminals who have committed a serious crime.

This bill applies to criminals convicted of an offence punishable by a sentence of 10 or more years. The measures contained in this bill will accelerate deportation by allowing the court in addition to any other sentence to order the removal of a non–citizen.

It would save the Canadian taxpayer money because the two separate hearings, immigration and sentencing, would not be needed. Instead of two hearings, the courts would decide both the sentencing and deportation. It would not just save money; in the case of Todd Baylis, it may very well have saved his life. We believe strongly in freedom in this country but we cannot allow our freedom to go so far as to limit our security.

Some people have criticized this bill because they believe it punishes non–citizens more than it does Canadian citizens and it treats them differently. Of course this is already true of our current laws. Non–citizens cannot vote. Under the current law non–citizens are already subject to deportation.

The only difference contained in Bill C–316 is that the sole responsibility for both the criminal sentence and deportation would lie within the courts and not within those two bodies, the courts and immigration. Taking out this extra step leaves less room for error, less room for bureaucracy to step in and less room for criminals to get lost in the shuffle.

• (1135)

Let me cite one incident. Mr. Ng, the individual who came from California, ended up in Calgary. There he stayed for five or six years while the taxpayers had to absorb the cost. Hopefully this mechanism put forward by my fellow parliamentarian would alleviate this kind of excessive tax burden on individuals having to put up with dangerous criminals hiding within the existing law.

This bill has been endorsed by the Canadian Police Association and the Metro Toronto Police Association. Certainly that should tell us something. These are the people who come face to face with these problems each day. They are trying to make our streets safer. We would do well to give them a hand.

An additional measure in the bill that ensures fair treatment of non–citizens is the provision that it does not apply to anyone who arrived in Canada before the age of 16 years, as long as that individual remained free of criminal charges for a period of five years. That is a very important feature. We do take responsibility for those who have been raised in our society whether they are citizens or not.

Before concluding let me touch upon a couple of issues that have come forward with regard to party line. Within the framework of this bill we have the ability to cross party lines to support those initiatives that make good sense to all taxpayers.

The member of Parliament for Cambridge has wrestled with the bill. I am sure he is prepared to entertain any amendments that would strengthen it. In that way we can resolve that those people who do not understand it is a right and a privilege to be here and want to abuse both, we would rather not have them as citizens of our country. It would be much better if they were back in their own country.

Concerning the criminal element, we have some real problems. As some amendments go before the committee we will deal with the deportation aspect. I have strong reservations about suggesting that because criminal elements come here from foreign countries that we would then punish those people by removing foreign aid. I would not support that.

The private member's bill by the member for Cambridge is a good one. It has given us reason to think on how we can improve our society.

In conclusion, I support and commend my colleague the member for Cambridge for a job well done. He certainly has the best interests of his constituents and his country at heart. I urge other members of the House to consider the intent of this bill very carefully. We want to make our streets safer. We want to create a society which will continue to be the number one country in the world in which to live, as stated by the United Nations.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in the debate on Bill C–316, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Transfer of Offenders Act.

I congratulate my colleague, the Liberal member for Cambridge, for getting involved in this matter. Crime is a matter of the highest concern to myself and the members of the Bloc Quebecois, as it is to everyone. We believe that government has the obligation and also the right to protect people against criminals, whether they are born in Canada or elsewhere.

• (1140)

The aim of Bill C–316 is to improve the process of deporting those who have committed violent crimes and to transfer the powers of the Department of Immigration to the courts. As justification for this bill, the member cited two murders, which took place in Toronto last year and which moved the public, including the members of the Bloc Quebecois. We deplored these two murders—one of a young woman, the other of a police officer. We do not, however, consider the bill justified in the present context. I believe it will create more problems than it hopes to resolve. I note the hon. member included a clause providing for an exception whereby, for example, young immigrants under the age of 16, who had arrived in Canada at an early age, would not be deported. This is an excellent principle, but contained in a flawed bill.

I have often said that young people who arrive in Canada when they are very young become the products of Canadian society rather than their society of origin. Poverty and adversity—problems we have here in Canada—sometimes lead to crime, and we must fight these problems at their very root.

A few months ago, here in this House, we debated Bill C–44. As we know, present legislation already gives the Department of Immigration powers to deport criminals who have committed crimes here in Canada and to prevent foreign criminals from entering the country. Bill C–44 accords additional powers to the Department of Immigration and, particularly, to the minister.

As you know, and my colleague knows this because he sits on the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration with me, just about every organization, except the police association, came and testified against Bill C–44. We understand why the police association always adopts the same position against crime.

One of the observations made in the discussions on Bill C–44 was that the bill would impose a double penalty for the same crime, that is, it would punish an individual twice for a single crime. This is unacceptable in any legal system, here or elsewhere. Under Bill C–316, this is even more clearly the case. An individual would be punished twice, particularly by the courts. The courts would punish the offence and then add a second punishment: deportation.

To date, deportation, the expulsion of immigrants, has been an administrative process. It is the responsibility of the Department of Immigration, and, according to my colleague's bill, it should be the responsibility of the courts. We all know that the courts lack jurisdiction to decide on matters where human life is at risk. There are matters of life or death involving the application of the Geneva convention, which imposes certain conditions on signatory countries, such as Canada.

Existing legislation provides a process whereby those accused may turn to the law. Deporting an individual requires a decision by an arbitrator. This decision may be appealed before the Immigration and Refugee Board.

• (1145)

This bill also addresses the issue of transferring criminals from Canada to other countries. True, some bilateral treaties now in effect allow such a transfer if requested by the offender; if there is a bilateral agreement, these people are sent back to their countries of origin. However, not all countries are willing to sign such treaties. Why would the country of origin pay the cost of incarcerating a criminal for several years for a crime that was not committed on its own territory? In this sense, I do not find this bill realistic.

This bill would also penalize the families of criminals. Having been trained as a lawyer, I know that this infringes on the most basic of rights. This is unacceptable. Why should two year old or three year old children pay for their father's crime or a woman for her husband's crime? In my opinion, the philosophy currently evolving in Canada against immigrants with criminal records goes too far.

I read the presentations carefully and I listened to my colleagues earlier. No one in this House mentioned that the crime rate among immigrants is lower than among those who were born here. Statistics show that the percentage of immigrant inmates in Canadian prisons is lower than the percentage of Canadian–born inmates. So punishing an individual by association is both unacceptable and inhumane.

I have noted that Reform members have serious reservations in this regard and that Liberal members support this bill. I really followed with great interest the speech by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and I agree with her analysis.

I think that this bill raises many constitutional issues as well as many questions in connection with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It violates the following sections—which I did not have time to read—namely section 11, which provides that any person charged with an offence has the right not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause; section 12, which provides that everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment; and, above all, section 15, which provides that every individual has the right to equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination based on race, religion, national origin, and so on.

For this reason alone, this bill is unacceptable. But there are other compelling reasons to reject this bill. There are always humanitarian considerations that anyone can invoke. The current law, as well as Bill C–44 now before the Senate, provides that a person can always invoke humanitarian considerations. This bill, however, would prevent these considerations from being put forward.

The current legislation is adequate. In fact, every day, the minister of immigration and his officials prevent hundreds of potential immigrants with criminal records from coming here. Every day, dozens of people are removed from Canada to foreign countries. Since the minister already has this power, I think that this bill is totally unnecessary, and that is why I will vote against it.

• (1150)

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, Bill C–316 is a private member's bill put forward by the member for Cambridge. In short, the bill proposes to give provincial court judges the power to order deportation at the time of sentencing.

On the surface the proposal seems to make sense. In spirit and intent the bill would simplify the bureaucratic process, eliminating the need for a deportation inquiry. Instead, a foreign born criminal would be ordered deported at the time of sentencing and hopefully be removed without incident following the completion of his or her sentence.

Both the Canadian Police Association and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police have called for this type of legislative change. There are a number of gaps in the present system through which foreign born criminals can disappear underground between the time they complete their sentences and the time they are called for the deportation inquiries.

The minister is sensitive to the concerns raised by the Canadian Police Association. He has discussed the possibility of such a change on two separate occasions. On November 1, 1994 the minister tabled a document entitled "Into the 21st Century: A Strategy for Immigration and Citizenship". In the document the minister raises a number of possibilities for legislative change:

> A number of legislative changes will be considered to reinforce the control and enforcement provisions of the Act. For example, currently deportation orders can only be issued by an immigration official. Consideration is being given to authorizing judges to issue deportation orders at the time of sentencing, rather than requiring a separate step.

That can be found at page 59. He further referred to such a possibility in his speech at second reading of Bill C–44.

> There may be other improvements that we can usher into the system and one such recommendation, for instance, coming from some of the police chiefs is to permit judges to not recommend deportations at the time of giving sentence but to order deportation at the time of sentencing so that the system is leaner, so that the issues of that individual are all dealt with at the right time, and that there is full due process for that individual's counsel and lawyer to react to that judge's ordering of a deportation rather than recommending and then having it go back to immigration and before an immigration appeal division and so on.

In light of the foregoing it is safe to say the minister supports the spirit and intent of Bill C–316. However, there have been a number of technical concerns raised not only by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration but also by the Department of Justice and the Solicitor General.

Take a look at some of the concerns from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. This legislation raises some serious constitutional questions. The supreme court has established that deportation is not a form of punishment but rather an administrative decision taken by Canada. Bill C–316 seeks to change this. By making deportation a sentencing option it suddenly becomes a criminal punishment.

There are no fewer than three constitutional clauses that could be used to argue against the sentence. For instance, section 15 deals with equality under the law. It could be argued that two tiers of punishment would be available to judges if Bill C–316 came into effect, one for citizens and the other for non–citizens. We would have a case where two people commit the same crime, yet the punishment would be harsher for one than for the other.

Section 11 deals with double punishment. It could be argued that removal from Canada would represent a second form of punishment in addition to any other sentence. In effect, non–citizens would face the prospect of being punished twice for the same offence.

Section 12 deals with cruel and unusual punishment. It could be argued here that removing a permanent resident from Canada is tantamount to denying for life a person's right to be with family and friends, to earn a living or to communicate freely in the course of daily living.

• (1155)

Let us look at some of the concerns raised by the Department of Justice. There is a clear potential that even the simplest case could become mired in constitutional wrangling, which could stretch on for years and cost the taxpayers hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars.

If the bill were to pass we would be transferring the responsibility for removing potentially dangerous criminals from the federal immigration department, whose representatives are experts in the field, to the provincial crown attorneys and judges. We should not dilute federal responsibility for something as important as the deportation of violent offenders.

It would take both time and money to train lawyers and judges to deal with immigration cases. The international obligations that Canada has with respect to immigration matters are not well known to judges acting in criminal matters.

Plea bargaining could become a convenient way for people who should not be in the country to stay in the country. There would be also be more appeals to our overloaded courts.

Deportation can be a complex process requiring travel documents and international co–operation. These are affairs which are best handled by the immigration department, which will continue to be responsible for all other deportations of persons who have entered Canada illegally, have been convicted of serious crimes in other countries or have otherwise violated the Immigration Act.

Judges require proof beyond a reasonable doubt before they can issue any court order. Bill C–316 as it stands could not withstand a charter challenge. The federal court has established that deportation is not a form of punishment but rather is an administrative decision taken by Canada.

Let us look at some of the concerns raised by the Solicitor General. The purpose of the Transfer of Offenders Act is to accommodate non–Canadians serving sentences by making it possible, on the basis of an arrangement between states, to transfer offenders so they can serve time in their homeland. This act is not meant to support orders which may have been made by the court.

Bill C–316 proposes that the act be amended to allow Canada to remove any foreign criminal serving time in a Canadian prison. There is absolutely no incentive for foreign countries to pass treaties with Canada whereby we would transfer to them the cost of punishing offenders who have committed crimes in Canada.

The government wants to ensure that all dangerous foreign offenders are ordered removed. We also want to ensure that the humanitarian concerns, which are an important part of the immigration system, are consistently applied to all persons subject to removal orders.

Bill C–44 seeks to remove all appeal rights from the Immigration and Refugee Board by dangerous criminals hoping to delay or prevent their removal from Canada. It also would prevent the release of unescorted convicted criminals under deportation order from Canadian prisons until they can be removed from Canada.

Many of the proposals which this bill would seem to resolve have already been dealt with in Bill C–44. The system works, but it could work far better than it does at the present time. The hon. member for Cambridge is clearly pointing out that there is need for change. We are taking action, but we must weigh our options carefully. All too often there is a difference between what sounds good and what is practical.

• (1200)

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to address the House of Commons today on the issue of Bill C–316, an act to amend the Immigration Act and Transfer of Offenders Act, tabled by the hon. member for Cambridge.

There is no doubt that Canada is one of the most welcoming countries in the world for those emigrating for family or business reasons and for those fleeing persecution around the world. Because of this tradition, the people of Canada were awarded the Nanson medal by the United Nations high commissioner for refugees, a recognition of the entire nation's outstanding efforts on behalf of refugees.

We all want to preserve this tradition. However, it has become apparent in the past few years that a system that was designed to be fair, compassionate, and open became overburdened with the number of applicants waiting to come to Canada. The system showed signs of breakdown. Cracks began to appear. Some immigrants and refugees were being processed who perhaps should not have been. Many immigrants who had arrived as youngsters may have found themselves in their teens or early twenties in the midst of a recession and perhaps with a lack of opportunities.

Any society during tough economic times sees the crime rate rise as people become frustrated. Several high profile horrendous crimes that were prominently reported in the newspapers involved non–citizens. I think of the tragic shooting deaths of constable Todd Baylis and Georgina Leimonis. Canadians began questioning what had gone wrong. Why had these young men with lengthy criminal records slipped through the cracks?

When this government was elected it promised to make homes and streets safer places for all Canadians. In response to our promises and to address the problems demonstrated by these high profile crimes, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration introduced Bill C–44. This bill took steps to eliminate the cracks that had previously appeared in the immigration and deportation systems.

My hon. colleague from Cambridge has been moved by the letters and interventions from constituents in his riding, young and old alike, and has therefore taken the initiative to learn what could be done and to respond with legislation on the issue.

The highlights of Bill C–316 can be summarized as follows. The proposed bill aims to improve the way in which deportations of violent offenders who are non–citizens are carried out. The bill enables the court, in addition to any other sentence, to order the removal of a non–citizen convicted of an offence punishable by 10 or more years. The bill accelerates the deportation process, thereby saving Canadian taxpayers much money.

The bill does not apply to anyone arriving in Canada prior to 16 years of age as long as that individual remains free of criminal convictions for a period of five years. We must, as Canadians, take responsibility for some of those who are raised in our society.

Foreign offenders could be returned to their country of origin if reciprocal conditional release conditions existed and if so ordered by the courts. Currently an offender is transferred if he agrees to be transferred.

I too have heard from constituents on this issue. Many are outraged over the senseless killings of constable Baylis and Ms. Leimonis. I support the general intent of this bill and I believe it to be in keeping with both our immigration and justice policies.

I do have some concern that the dependants of individuals would also be subject to removal. This perhaps could be an area that could be revisited on a case by case basis as the practical implications are considered.

It is my understanding that provisions allowing the judge to order the removal of offenders is something that may be considered by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration at some future time. While some of our hon. colleagues have difficulty with the constitutionality of this provision, some say that such treatment would discriminate between citizens and non–citizens. Non–citizens are, under the law, subject to removal in any event under the current immigration policies. This bill only provides for an expedient and cost efficient alternative as to who might make this removal order. I do recommend, however, that safeguards be built in as to the ability to avoid plea bargaining to avoid the removal order. I would like to see some provisions that the removal order not be dealt with in conjunction with the sentence.

I certainly support the addition of the clause that provides for exception for those offenders who entered Canada before the age of 16 years and who have been free of criminal conviction for five years. This is fair and in keeping with our immigration policy principles. I refer to the situation of Mr. Clinton Gayle, who came to Canada at a young age and was under a removal order. It was over two years old. While Mr. Gayle may have been socializing in Canada, it was determined that he should be removed. These removal orders must be dealt with immediately.

The bill before the House does not deal explicitly with the issue of enforcement and process. One can conclude that if an offender is in custody and has been sentenced and a removal order made, the offender will not be released back into the community. Deportation of undesirables who have no respect for the laws of our country and who jeopardize our safety and security should be removed. This should be done swiftly, surely and immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY DEBATE

BOSNIA

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On Friday I sent letters to the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Official Opposition, and the Speaker's office requesting an emergency debate on the Bosnian situation. I believe that Canadians are totally outraged by the lack of action and the lack of information.

I rise and ask for unanimous consent to suspend the business of the House for today and begin an immediate emergency debate on this issue. Canadian troops are being held hostage and are in imminent danger. It is therefore vital that Parliament immediately deal with this issue.

I realize that the BQ has asked for unanimous consent to begin debate at 6 p.m., but given the urgency of the situation I do not believe we should wait any longer. We need a debate now and I am asking for that decision now.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member heard my remarks earlier in response to the House leader for the official opposition when he rose a half hour ago and made essentially the same request.

I am aware that the hon. member regards the situation as urgent. Standing Order 52 of the rules of the House of Commons provides an opportunity for the hon. member to ask the Speaker to order an emergency debate. That opportunity will be afforded to him at three o'clock this afternoon. That is only three hours away. I am sure the hon. member can wait.

We have a significant number of urgent government bills before the House to be dealt with today, and members are here and ready to deal with those.

Mr. Silye: MPs' pensions.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says MPs' pensions. That is not one of the bills on today's Order Paper, and he knows that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I would not want to set the precedent that when any member from any party from any side of the House should want to ask for unanimous consent we would engage in a debate before the actual question be put to the House.

I know the subject matter is one that is deemed of great importance. This is twice today that we are dealing with this question, and possibly we will deal with it again later today or maybe even now, whatever the choice may be by the House.

I simply put the question to the House following the intervention from the hon. member for Red Deer for unanimous consent for an emergency debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK OF CANADA ACT

On the Order: Government Orders:

May 29, 1994—The Minister of Industry—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Industry of Bill C–91, an act to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name Business Development Bank of Canada.

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.) moved:

That Bill C–91, an act to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name Business Development Bank of Canada, be referred forthwith to the Standing Committee on Industry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to begin debate on the motion to refer Bill C–91, the Business Development Bank of Canada Act, to committee before second reading.

I have every confidence that the members of the committee will bring their ideas and convictions to bear on this legislation, which establishes a new mandate for the Federal Business Development Bank under the name of the Business Development Bank of Canada.

The objective of Bill C–91 is to make government assistance in the area of commercial financing more efficient, effective, and relevant to the needs of small business.

[Translation]

The bill reaffirms the bank's mandate, which is to provide management, consulting and training services to Canadian entrepreneurs. Small business is faced with a variety of challenges, ranging from the tax burden and deregulation to skills improvement and technology acquisition. But the most pressing need certainly remains sufficient financing and adequate consulting services in commercial management.

Without financing and adequate consulting services, small business cannot set out to conquer either the national or the international market.

• (1210)

It is essential that small businesses have access to financing through debt financing, as well as equity financing at every stage of their development, but especially at the initial stage.

Let us look at the challenges small businesses face when seeking debt or equity financing, in terms of four weaknesses in the services currently provided by Canada's financial markets.

First is the risk factor, as several lending institutions are reluctant to grant loans to certain small businesses, even at rates that take into account the higher risk associated with such loans.

Second is the size of the loan. Whether the loan requested is for $1 million or $50,000, the cost to the bank or venture capital holders to prepare and assess business plans and financial proposals as well as to monitor the progress of the venture generally remain constant.

Third is knowledge. Often financial institutions are not familiar with the nature of industries emerging in the new economy. They do not have any tried and true method to assess the risk associated with granting a loan to new industries or investing in them.

Fourth is flexibility. Lenders are often reluctant to provide financing to potential winners on flexible terms. Traditional lenders usually require payments to spread over the term of the loan. This type of financing can prove overwhelming for businesses at the product development stage, as these businesses have not yet reached the point where they can generate enough sales revenue to offset their debt.

These four problems arise from the fact that our economy is changing rapidly. In meeting the challenges of a knowledge based market, small business has modernized much more rapidly than traditional financial institutions.

[English]

The small business community in Canada must move swiftly to innovate and to secure a share of emerging business opportunities. The Canadian economy as a whole relies upon their abilities and entrepreneurship to sustain economic growth and to create jobs.

Here is an instance where government can make a difference to the marketplace. No one is suggesting that governments can replace private sector financial institutions in meeting the needs of the marketplace, but it is in situations such as those I have described where government can provide leadership. We need leadership to demonstrate that it is possible to address the needs of small business in the knowledge economy. One government institution has experience and skills to provide that leadership: the Federal Business Development Bank.

Members may be aware that the bank is approaching its $3.2 billion statutory ceiling for capital and liabilities. With no change to this ceiling, the bank would have to ration credit, turning away qualified entrepreneurs who otherwise are positioned to create jobs. Under this legislation the bank's capital and liability ceiling would be removed and the bank would be subject to a 10–year legislative review, which is similar to the requirements imposed on chartered banks under the Bank Act.

Hon. members will recall that in the 1995 budget the finance minister said that the bank and regional agencies will forge new strategic alliances to ensure co–ordinated delivery of business financing. The bank's new mandate will encourage stronger partnerships and increased cooperation with the regional agencies and other federal financial institutions such as the Export Development Corporation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the issue of regional development by showing how important the Federal Business Development Bank is in Quebec. Its head office is located in Montreal, and nearly twenty per cent of its offices are in Quebec.

• (1215)

Over the course of 50 years, the FBDB has provided more than $4.5 billion in loans to small and medium size businesses in Quebec. At present, the loan portfolio for Quebec totals $1.1 billion, shared among 3,600 clients. These past five years, FBDB clients have created 8,500 new jobs and more than 9,000 entrepreneurs in Quebec have benefited from management consulting services provided by the bank.

[English]

A similarly impressive story can be told elsewhere in the country. The arrangements we are making with regional agencies, in co–operation with the provinces and territories, will avoid costly overlap and duplication.

Finally, I want the House to understand that Bill C–91 is a key element in our commitment to provide leadership in creating a business climate that promotes small business growth, innovation and job creation. I believe that the innovative approaches the Business Development Bank of Canada will take after this legislation comes into effect will show the chartered banks in Canada that there is a profitable future for them in the service of Canadian small businesses.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak on Bill C–91, an act to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name Business Development Bank of Canada. I want to draw your attention immediately to the fact that the legislation proposes to continue the Federal Business Development Bank. However, after my comments, you will see that this is hardly the case.

We oppose this bill. As the critic for industry, I oppose this bill for three main reasons, but also for another reason which my colleagues will tell you more about and which concerns regional development. The three main reasons we oppose this legislation are the name change from Federal Business Development Bank to Business Development Bank of Canada, the change in the status or purpose of the new Business Development Bank of Canada, compared to that of the original Federal Business Development Bank and, finally, the issue of the new so–called hybrid capital instruments, which we will discuss in greater detail.

I will first deal with the name change from Federal Business Development Bank to Business Development Bank of Canada. The issue was discussed by members of the Standing Committee on Industry, after the parliamentary secretary made that proposal somewhat unexpectedly. The committee did not reject the suggestion for reasons of courtesy and also to avoid any conflict. However, even Liberal members seemed uncomfortable with the idea. The proposal made by the parliamentary secretary sought to change the name Federal Business Development Bank to Canadian Bank for Small Businesses.

Again, committee members accepted that proposal out of respect for the parliamentary secretary. If you read the report tabled by the committee, you will not see any mention of that proposal. That recommendation was made out of the blue, and everyone felt that the name Canadian Bank for Small Businesses was too restrictive. The fact is that the Federal Business Development Bank is involved in the financing of more than just small businesses. Consequently, the proposed name was too restrictive and should have been rejected, but was accepted out of courtesy.

Now we find ourselves at the other end of the spectrum with the name Business Development Bank of Canada. Please note that the French name of the new bank makes no reference to "business". So what we have with this bill is a switch from small businesses alone to the development of the whole of Canada. And this is just as extreme. I do not think that Canada's development is related to a bank, nor is that of Quebec. All this is to say that the original name, Federal Business Development Bank, is well–known and respected in Canada and Quebec, and we do not see why it should be changed. Such a change would result in a waste of money and energy, given the costs generated in terms of paper burden, logos, etc. Again, this change would result in useless spending and a waste of energy.

The name Business Development Bank of Canada is no better than that of Canadian Bank for Small Businesses.

• (1220)

The second point that deserves criticism, and a fundamental one, is the change of mandate implied by the so–called maintenance of the Federal Bank, which is becoming the Business Development Bank of Canada. This is being done without debate or consultation. It has come out of nowhere and is not based on any mandate. Nobody asked the federal government to change the name of the Federal Business Development Bank. This is done in a routine manner, on the sly, by administrative means, the way this government likes to do things; and that may be the Canada of the future, where things will be done in a routine manner, on the sly. They have come up with this proposal that has nothing to do with what the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Industry, of which I am the vice–chairman, led us to expect. There was no recommendation to that effect.

Previously, the Federal Business Development Bank had a very specific mandate as the last resort for small and medium size businesses. Its primary concern was the development of small and medium size businesses, as stated in section 20(1)(b) which specified that the borrowing legal entity could get a loan if: "credit or other financial resources are not otherwise available to that person on reasonable terms and conditions".

That is what led the Federal Bank to be described as a last resort bank. After one or two refusals at the hands of lending institutions, the borrower, provided it had a good record, could get a loan from the FBDB, once those conditions were met.

At that time, the federal bank was concerned only with economic development through the assistance provided to small and medium size businesses. As we can see in subclause 4(2) of the Business Development Bank of Canada Act, the purpose of the bank will now be to support Canadian entrepreneurship. In carrying out its activities, the bank must give particular consideration to the needs of small businesses.

What is being proposed is a far cry from the last resort bank totally dedicated to small businesses development in Canada. As we will see later on with my colleagues, the scope of the bank's activities is being extended. Clauses 20 and 21 of the bill allow outright interference in everything related to development in Canada, at the expense of provincial governments, and more particularly the Quebec government, by promoting regional development in Quebec's stead by way of unconstitutional or virtually unconstitutional dealings, with Quebec parties.

We already know the Canadian government will try to entice Quebec institutions and companies by telling them: if you want our money, you should ask an equal amount from the Quebec government; if it refuses, that will put an end to our involvement. We can see through that kind of trickery, specially on the eve of the referendum.

If Quebecers vote no at the next referendum, it is that kind of centralist instrument that will be used in the Canada of the future.

With Bill C–91, the bank will not be a last resort bank but a complementary lender to other traditional banks on the market. It will be empowered to make agreements with any organization to become its agent in order to provide services, programs, and financing. It will also be allowed to set up lending consortiums. This is a far cry from the development of small businesses. Those lending consortiums could include both private and public partners.

We think that the complementary role of the Business Development Bank of Canada should be limited to filling the gaps on the market and thus improving the situation. We should specify that its primary role and mandate is to meet the needs of small business, as is said in the act.

Before I conclude, I would like to touch briefly on the new so–called hybrid capital instruments. That means that the federal bank will be able to tap private capital instead of relying solely on government funds, as it has up to now.

• (1225)

Nowhere is it mentioned that, in order to attract private capital, there will be a fixed rate of return. So, the new bank may have to focus on profit maximization in order to provide the most interesting rates of return possible. This will mean a complete turnaround for the new bank, since the old one had fixed rates and could focus solely on economic development.

I want to draw the attention of members to clause 36 that provides for the confidentiality of the information held by the bank. It says that the bank has to protect the information it gathers.

Members have to remember that the committee recommended that information be systematically gathered from all financial institutions in Canada under the direction of the Bank of Canada, Statistics Canada and the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. This bill will hopefully include a provision in order for the new bank to co–operate in inquiries supported by Parliament.

By the way, I see that the Bankers' Association is against the bill, which is a good indication that the government has some very concrete plans in mind. We all know that the Liberal government and the bankers usually agree, but not this time. Why? Probably because the government has some other motives that are political and not economic, especially where the province of Quebec is concerned, in order first to influence the referendum and then to be the only one in charge of economic development in Canada, hence building a centralized and increasingly unitary state.

These are some of the reasons why we will vote against this bill.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would like to take a moment to remind the House that pursuant to Standing Order 73, under which we are presently conducting our affairs, members have 10 minutes for their interventions, without questions or comments.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in the debate. Once again I am moved to ask myself the rhetorical question: What is it about getting elected that makes venture capitalists out of us all? What is it about getting elected that makes us feel we should be imposing our collective wisdom on the private sector? I would like to address my short remarks at this juncture to that basic premise.

When those of us in this body get together to deliberate, to create laws and entities, the overriding principle we should have, is this: Government should not be involved in any enterprise which is being carried out or could be carried out by private enterprise. We have no business, in my estimation, getting involved in any way, in setting up a crown corporation, which is what we are doing, in competition with existing businesses.

We may not like the banks. Canadians may not get up in the morning and say: "Thank God we have the Royal Bank" or "Thank God we have the Toronto–Dominion Bank" or any bank for that matter. We already have mature, functioning and very capable banking institutions.

In the context of what the establishment of a crown corporation in the financial sector will do to enhance the competitiveness of Canadian business, to promote entrepreneurship, to be an incubator of new business, or in any way enhance the standard of living in Canada, we will find that the legislation falls far short of the mark. All it does is create one more bureaucratic organization.

Having said that, I do not fault the rationale or the thinking behind the initial desire to do this. Not too long ago the people of Ontario and Quebec, in particular, found that the heavy hand of recession dealt a vital and terrible blow to the entrepreneur and to the people involved in the business sector, particularly the small business sector. In the west particularly in Alberta, we felt that about 10 or 12 years earlier.

• (1230)

The industry committee, in its report dealing with small business which we worked on for months and months and months, the whole idea was to make the banking institutions in Canada far more responsive to the needs of Canadian business, small business in particular. Then what is it about this new expanded Federal Business Development Bank that is going to change all that?

The role of opposition is to oppose legislation preferred by the government. The intent is to make the legislation better, to point out weaknesses in the government's legislation. Looking at it from that perspective and looking at this legislation and the rationale behind the change in the Federal Business Development Bank, we would first have to ask what the mandate is.

Looking at it from the devil's advocate point of view, what is the mandate of the new Federal Business Development Bank, renamed the Business Development Bank of Canada? According to a news release under the minister's hand the mandate of the new bank is to develop and deliver innovative responses to small business financing and managerial needs. If ever there was a motherhood statement, that has got to be it. How could we possibly argue with such a motherhood statement?

I am a small businessman. The Reform Party is 100 per cent behind the notion of incubating, helping and working with small business. However we are not in the business of competing with existing businesses, even if those competing and existing businesses are, God forbid, banks. Banks already exist.

There is no need for Canadian taxpayers, however tenuously, to be supporting or propping up yet another crown corporation which is what this new entity will be. We are at this very moment trying to get rid of crown corporations. There is the privatization of CN and the recent privatization of Air Canada. Why on earth would we want to set up a crown corporation in the banking sector?

I have already covered the point that there are many people in Canada represented by this side of the House, and I am sure many people in Canada represented by the people opposite, who feel that we should not be reinventing the wheel. We should not be putting our energies into creating something that already exists.

Then the question is: Will this new entity do something different? I tried to find out if it would or would not. I went into the historical record. A speech was delivered to the Board of Trade of metropolitan Montreal on October 25, 1994 by Mr. François Beaudoin. Mr. Beaudoin is now the president and chief executive officer of the new Business Development Bank. He quite accurately pointed out that there are three developing sectors of our economy that need attention: export markets, the new economy, and working capital. He said that these are three areas in which business really needs some significant support.

He makes the case that 85 per cent of Canada's exports are generated by only 900 businesses. Only 900 businesses in Canada represent 85 per cent of our total exports. The majority of our total exports is in lumber and cars. That very clearly identifies the fact that we should have far more emphasis in our country on entrepreneurial zeal in exporting. What then is this new bank going to do that the Export Development Bank does not already do? We already have the Export Development Bank. Its mandate is to do exactly that.

• (1235)

That portion of the business development bank's new mandate that has as its central purpose the incubation and education of entrepreneurs is something we can support very handily. This new bank is to be nothing more than a bigger, broader representation of the bank which is already in place.

The legislation allows the federally funded crown corporation business development bank which is eventually backed by the Government of Canada to have as an asset base almost $20 billion. The total small business portfolio of all the banks in Canada combined is something in the region of $40 billion. According to the banks, there is more money available than there are people asking for it, based on quality loans.

The last thing in the world we want is the situation whereby the existing banks in Canada are able to tell people who ask them for a loan: "Hey, we think you have a great idea but it is a little risky for us. Why not go over to the new business development bank and ask it for the money?" Therefore, the government is going to absorb the responsibility and liability for all these loans which should rightfully go to the chartered banks. They are the ones that exist in Canada and have the utility, ability and the experience to do everything that is already being done. Our role is to make sure they do the job. Our role is not to put together a complementary lender.

One area the Federal Business Development Bank wants to get involved in is providing working capital loans based on receivables and inventory. Well, where has it been? Does every bank not extend operating loans based on receivables and inventory?

In the vast majority of loans existing with the Federal Business Development Bank today, 53 per cent are in loans of $100,000 to $500,000. The loan portfolio for loans of less than $25,000 for the Federal Business Development Bank which is really the incubator of small business is 1.2 per cent of its total portfolio. Writing these small loans is very risky and very expensive. Of course, the banks do not want to do it. However, we in the House should be very careful that we do not increase the liability to individual Canadian taxpayers just so we can make it easier for the banks to slough off their responsibility to the government funded bank.

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support Bill C–91, the Business Development Bank of Canada Act. The legislation represents the next step in the evolution of an institution that has a long and honourable tradition of helping Canadian business respond to the changing demands of the economy.

Fifty–one years ago the industrial development bank was created to help wartime manufacturers convert their facilities for peacetime operations. These businesses needed special attention because it was virtually impossible for them to obtain term loans. At that time chartered banks were prohibited by the Bank Act for making loans against mortgage security.

The majority of IDB loans during its early years went to companies such as machine shops, sawmills, textile and garment factories, flour mills and auto parts manufacturers. In other words, the bank responded to the emerging industries of the day in a nation that was converting its wartime industrial capacity to new challenges.

As the nation's economy changed, so did the nature of the bank's customers. The business community began to respond to new opportunities of the post–war boom and the bank began to lend to wholesalers, retailers, restaurants and the hotel industry among others.

In the 1950s and 1960s the bank began to open branches in non–metropolitan areas of the country. This was a bold move at the time. The chartered banks followed the experiment with a great deal of interest. By the end of its second decade, the IDB had 22 branches across the country.

• (1240)

[Translation]

In 1971, the bank began to give businesses regular advice on how to run their operations efficiently. The bank became the only national organization to provide management services, such as consulting, training and planning, to small businesses.

In 1975, the Federal Business Development Bank was created as a crown corporation. Since then, businesses could no longer rely on government grants to execute their bank transactions. The new agency also decided to take up the challenge of providing risk capital to entrepreneurs. Today, the bank has offices in all provinces and territories. It employs 900 people who furnish financial as well as management services to Canadian small and medium size businesses.

Last year, the bank's share financing increased by 45 per cent, for a total of $80 million. As the years went by, the bank acquired an excellent reputation in the field of customer services. According to the most recent survey, 97 per cent of the bank's customers said that they would deal again with the bank and the same proportion of customers said that they would recommend the bank to other people.

[English]

It has become apparent that the FBDB must continue to evolve to meet the changing demands of the economy. This need to change has been widely discussed. In its report "Taking Care of Small Business", the Standing Committee on Industry recommended that the mandate of the FBDB be "refocused as a complementary lender to small and medium sized businesses and that it be authorized to use new financial instruments to fulfil its mandate".

The small business working committee emphasized that government sponsored programs should be refocused to fill financing gaps that are not now served adequately by the private sector. Among its recommendations are the following: "To enforce the FBDB's mandate to ensure that its activities are filling the financing gaps, and funding small businesses in all regions of the country including those associated with small and micro businesses requiring loans of less than $100,000, as well as addressing gaps in regional and sectoral lending and working capital requirements". The committee stated: "These objectives should be pursued on a full cost recovery basis".

The Federal Business Development Bank Act has not been amended since originally passed in 1974. It requires updating to reflect market developments such as the use of financial instruments that had not been invented in 1974. Moreover, the bank is now operating at near its statutory ceiling and financial ratios. To respond to forecasted business volume we need to act quickly to provide the legislated authority to increase the bank's equity. If the statutory lending cap is not changed soon, the bank could be forced to ration credit to businesses in the near future.

Under its proposed expanded mandate the Business Development Bank of Canada will be better positioned and equipped to address the specific needs of small business through innovative financing. It will operate where market forces fail to provide access to financing for promising business ventures.

Under its new mandate the bank will continue to be active in smaller loans and investments in its lending and venture capital programs. It will increase quasi–equity and working capital financings. It will also focus more on knowledge based firms without abandoning its traditional activities.

The Business Development Bank of Canada Act will provide the bank with the ability and resources to keep abreast of changing requirements at a time when the small business community in Canada needs the flexibility the bank can offer.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to rise in the House to talk about Bill C–91, which aims at changing the function and mandate of the Federal Business Development Bank and at renaming it the Business Development Bank of Canada.

I have a few questions to ask about the bill. It is a bit disturbing because the Federal Business Development Bank as we know it works very well.

• (1245)

I met its president in Quebec City. As we know, the Bank lends almost one third of its money—about $1.3 billion—in Quebec. Finally, it serves very well its purpose of bank of last resort. Moreover, the Federal Business Development Bank, as it is now, gives training courses for people who want to start new businesses. These are excellent courses and many Quebec entrepreneurs have taken them. Right now, the bank is self–financing and does not cost Canadian taxpayers one penny.

Nonetheless, Bill C–91 will change the mandate of the bank and radically transform its capital structure. The bank now has a statutory borrowing limit of about $3.2 billion but it is proposed to eliminate that limit and to allow the new bank to borrow as much as it wants. I will come back to that later. This change in the capital structure is disturbing because it will allow the bank to enter into partnership with other organizations and other banks.

The capital structure and the mandate of the bank will be changed completely. Right now, the bank is a last resort lender. It makes loans to business people who cannot borrow from commercial banks via the usual channels. There is a real need for that kind of service. But the Federal Business Development Bank will not necessarily have this last resort mandate any longer since the new mandate will require the FBDB to support other projects through partnerships or through top–up funding. This compromises its original mandate which was to offer last resort funding to businesses.

This is quite disturbing because one has to wonder who will do this job if the Federal Business Development Bank is no longer doing it. If the FBDB changes its mandate and works increasingly in partnership with other banks, who will take over the mandate that is presently carried out so efficiently by the Federal Business Development Bank? It is just as though all last resort cases will be ignored.

But the most troubling question regarding this bill relates to the government's motive for introducing it. Why is the government proposing to change the bank's capital structure and mandate? Why is it removing the loan ceiling and telling the bank not to be a last resort lending institution any longer but to go into partnership with other banks and other agencies in projects related mainly to small and medium size businesses and exports? There are good reasons for trying to find out the motive for such changes.

Do we really want to help small and medium size businesses or do we want to compete with existing financial institutions? We have to ask the question because this bill allows the Federal Business Development Bank, under its new mandate, to compete directly with existing financial institutions. It is troubling.

In fact, should the federal government compete with the private sector? The government has already made such an attempt in another bill, Bill C–52 brought forward by the Minister of Public Works, giving itself the power to compete directly with engineering and architecture firms. Strangely enough, this bill was withdrawn when we started to criticize the government after realizing that these engineering and architecture firms were concentrated in Quebec. We realized that 90 per cent of the businesses that the government would compete with were located in Quebec, and that is why the bill was withdrawn.

But the government is at it again, giving the Federal Business Development Bank a similar but broader mandate since we are no longer talking about one sector, engineering and architecture, but almost any kind of partnership for economic development. And anybody who takes the time to read the definition of the mandate in clauses 20 and 21 will see that it is very broad. There are no limits to this new bank's mandate.

This is what is troubling, because we know that some of the best examples of the growth of small and medium size businesses in Canada have been in Quebec. It is well known that, if there is one sector in Quebec that has distinguished itself, and is on the cutting edge, it is the small and medium size business sector.

We have established funds in Quebec for the development of small and medium size business, such as the solidarity funds of the FTQ and the CNTU, and a number of programs, such as those of the caisses populaires. It is a very active sector. Why, then, is Canada changing the mandate of the Federal Business Development Bank in order to enter this sector? Does it want to compete with Quebec's caisses populaires? Does it want to compete with the solidarity funds of the FTQ and the CNTU?

Ultimately, can it overstep the authority of the province, which has already established a regional development program, in order to once again increase the visibility of the federal government in Quebec, as it has done elsewhere in Canada furthermore, but particularly in Quebec? Is there a hidden agenda in this bill, a deliberate wish to weaken the many programs that have been established in Quebec by the banks and the solidarity funds, as well as the programs established by the Quebec government itself?

These are some of the questions that come to mind with respect to Bill C–91. There is no compelling need for the Federal Business Development Bank to have a new mandate, when the one it now has is perfectly sufficient. One could wonder whether beyond the economic purpose of this bill there is not another deeper political purpose. That, in fact, is why I personally will not support this bill. Basically, the purpose of this bill is a purely political one. Coming from Quebec, from the riding of Québec–Est, I can see that the Federal Business Development Bank, this new bank, holds nothing for us. It would be better to keep it in its present form.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we are debating whether Bill C–91 should be referred to the committee before second reading. In many ways that is positive in the sense that it opens up the debate and allows elements to be raised which would otherwise be restricted because of the conventions of the House. I hope that will be the case and that it will not be a way to circumscribe or limit certain amendments or debate which might otherwise receive the light of day in the House.

I have concerns about Bill C–91 which we ought to look at before we submit it to committee. Changing the name of this bank I do not think will change anything at all. It will cost a lot of money to print new stationery, to put up all the new signs and all those things. What will changing the name do to the actual purpose, function and operation of the bank? I submit it will do nothing.

It sets up a crown corporation which has as its capitalization part a number of instruments which are being used. It has common shares which have a par value of $100. It has preferred shares which are unlimited in number, as are the common shares. The preferred shares have no par value. Hybrid capital instruments will be part of the capitalization. These will be paid in capital by the Parliament of Canada by a parliamentary appropriation but there will be no indication as to how much. There will be retained earnings and contributed surplus to a maximum of $1.5 billion.

There are other provisions which I will draw to the attention of the House, particularly sections 21 and 22, specifically section 22(e). Section 22 includes the ancillary powers but section 22(e) is particularly interesting. The bank may acquire, hold, exchange, lease, sell or otherwise dispose of any interest in real or personal property and retain and use the proceeds of disposition. That kind of provision raises some very interesting questions. How much real estate will the new business development bank of Canada be prepared to buy? What will it do with that real estate? Will it deviate from its traditional role, which has been to lease real property in which it carries on its business, or will it develop a series of branches throughout the country?

Other sections of the bill also give to the board, to the Minister of Finance and to the cabinet powers which rightfully belong to the Parliament of Canada.

Section 27 gives some very specific powers to the board:

> Subject to the approval of the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, the board may make bylaws
> (a) setting out the rights, privileges, restrictions and conditions attaching to preferred shares, creating one or more additional classes of preferred shares and generally determining the rights and obligations of the holders of preferred shares, including
> (i) limiting the right of the shareholders to specific dividends or repayments, whether fixed or variable,
> (ii) authorizing the purchase or redemption of the shares by the bank, either at the bank's option or at the shareholder's request, and
> (iii) limiting or extending the rights of the shareholders in any other way;

That is the second class of shares which makes up the capital of this bank, which really gives to the board the authority to determine how the bank shall be structured. That kind of power ought not to be given to a cabinet. It ought to exist with Parliament because this bank through the Minister of Finance and the cabinet, given this provision, allows that group to create a liability of $18 billion for the Canadian taxpayer.

Who is the shareholder talked about in section 27? The shareholder is the Government of Canada. The Government of Canada now will be told it may or may not own these preferred shares. It may or may not be paid a dividend. It may be paid this much of a dividend or this little of a dividend. That becomes the issue.

Other provisions of the bill ought to be of direct interest to each of us. In particular, I would like to look at subsections 18(4) and (6).

Subsection 18(4) states that the bank may enter into any transactions for the financial management of the bank, including any financial instrument of financial risk such as interest rate or currency exchange agreements, options, futures contracts and any other similar agreements.

Another way of looking at this is that these are derivatives. It permits the personnel of the bank to enter into futures contracts, options, purchasing and selling of options with public money which should be considered a sacred trust. If we look at the way the options market operates and the futures contracts work it means the bank is speculating with Canadian money or has the opportunity to do so.

I am sure the argument will be presented that it will use this only for purposes of hedging interest rate and currency fluctuations. If the bill specified that there were limitations one might not have such grave concern. Because there are no limitations it does not prevent the manager or the president or whoever is in charge from getting into the market directly. It should be a major concern to all of us. Just remember what happened in the Barings bank.

Other sections of the bill should give us grave concern. The designated minister is identified in section 21. Who is the designated minister? At the moment it is the Minister of Industry. It is possible that cabinet could designate any other minister. For example, FORD–Q is one of the regional development portfolios. We heard the Minister of Industry say this morning that one of the purposes of the new mandate is to expand it so that it would include regional development and things of that sort.

Would it not be interesting if for certain matters the Minister of Human Resources Development were designated as the minister of the bank and could direct the bank? In another instance it could be the minister of FORD–Q and in a third instance it could be the Minister of Industry and so on down the line. There is nothing in the bill to prevent that sort of thing from happening.

The obvious questions we have to ask is what can this bank do that the other banks cannot do. What can the other banks do that the this bank cannot do? If it is none of those things and this bank is doing nothing more or less than what the other banks are doing, what in the world are we doing this for?

Some specific arguments ought to be addressed as well. The indication is that this bank shall be complementary to the existing financial institutions, particularly the banks. Then the bill does not define the word "complementary". The only reference in the proposed bill that deals with the previous act is that complementary is taken as that section which deals with the previous section saying that it must be the bank of last resort. In other words, the applicant has to be refused by some other institution before he can apply for money here.

Does complementary mean that it will make loans of an operational capital requirement? Does it mean that it will become a deposit taking institution? What will the Business Development Bank of Canada do that other banks do not? I submit that it will do nothing more or less than is currently available in the marketplace and it is not required.

I want to throw out two more questions. First, will the bank be able to expand its network of offices? Second, which is more important, is: What is a hybrid capital instrument? It is not defined in the bill. When asked what this means certain officials were unable to answer that question but more significantly than that hybrid financial instruments are different from any other capitalization that is provided for in the other sections of the bill.

• (1305)

The other one says that common shares, preferred shares and hybrid capital instruments are not given to the government but may be given to private individuals or persons other than the government. What does it mean?

We must answer these questions before the bill is presented seriously to the House.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to contribute to the debate on sending Bill C–91 to committee before second reading.

Before that however I would like to address a couple of statements made by the hon. member from Edmonton who questioned the need of the FBD bank and indicated in his earlier remarks that when there are already banks out there servicing the community, do we need this?

I want to address those concerns because it is a fair question. The very existence of this bank shows that the present banking system does not meet the needs of small and medium sized businesses. If it did, we would not need it. The present banks do not service the financial requirements, sometimes the operating line, and other needs.

As a small business person I and the hon. member who was also in small business, know that there are a lot of good ideas out there that often do not get financing, that do not get the funds or the financial support from the community. For example, small businesses may start as one or two person operations and expand to become 100 and 200 person operations. As a government we always have to look into the long term. We have to ensure that we have a financial infrastructure to provide small business people with the opportunities to expand and to create new opportunities and employment.

As the hon. member knows, it is the small businesses that are creating the jobs right now. We want to make sure that the infrastructure is there for them to continue to do that. He will know that many times many good ideas get lost because they are not financed.

We can bury our heads in the sand and say: "Everything is fine. Everything is great out there. Every businessman, small or medium, will be able to get financing. They will be able to get the money when they need it for a very good idea that has great opportunities," but that is not the reality.

Reality is a need for an organization such as the FBDB to ensure the financing of those ideas that exist, that have a future, that have potential. The government understands there is tremendous opportunity not only in the short term but in the long term to create employment and to create a strong, dynamic, vibrant economy. That is what we have to do as a government.

We cannot stick our heads in the sand and say: "Everything is fine. We will leave it up to the big banks. We will leave it up to the financial institutions. They will take care of small business. They will do all the funding. They will fund the new opportunities in the new economies". That is not reality.

Innovation has always been the hallmark of the Federal Business Development Bank. The secret of a bank's success has been the close co–operation it has enjoyed with entrepreneurs across the country. The bank has been able to stay abreast of rapidly evolving markets and major trends such as the use of information technology. It has always sought ways to offer new services tailored to meet the increasing, complex needs of entrepreneurs.

For example, a year ago the FBDB introduced a $50 million financing program called working capital for growth. The hon. member knows that one of the problems small businesses have is getting working capital which is very important for their success and growth.

Hon. members will recall that last year, the economy was starting to gain momentum. For many businesses the new opportunities were not matched by sufficient cash flow after several years of a recession. They lacked sufficient cash to finance the opportunities that arose.

The FBDB created its working capital for growth loans that top up financing when conventional lending institutions that the hon. member said would be able to provide these do not offer sufficient lines of credit to support a company's growth.

In addition, FBDB business counsellors work with business owners to ensure that their growth plan is well managed. The maximum loan amount under this program is $100,000 and repayment schedules are flexible and tailored to individual needs.

• (1310)

Another example of innovation by the FBDB is the pilot program called patient capital where returns take a long time and where the return is not over a year or two years but a much longer time. It responds to the needs of companies that do not have the necessary financial resources to service debt during their development stages. This is a problem particularly for new companies in the knowledge based economy that may not have tangible assets to offer as security.

These knowledge based economies have incredible barriers to financing because they are difficult to assess. It is very difficult for many bank managers to look at anything but basic fixed, hard, tangible assets and assess the knowledge based assets, the engineering, design and all the software knowledge. It is so hard to grasp the value of that and are very difficult to finance. They do not have tangible assets to offer as security and therefore financing is difficult.

The FBDB offers patient capital in quasi–equity forms of financing which provides firms with long term capital on flexible repayment terms. The repayment of patient capital can be postponed for up to three years until a company begins to generate revenues and a royalty on sales can be arranged.

The bank has been pilot testing this patient capital program in Kitchener–Waterloo in co–operation with the Royal Bank and Innovation Ontario. We hope that the test will prove successful so that the FDBD can begin to offer this service across the country. In this way the bank will help to close what the Minister of Industry has referred to as the flexibility gap, one of the four critical gaps that prevents small business from obtaining the financing they need.

The flexibility gap refers to the problems small businesses encounter when conventional lenders require a stream of payment over the term of the loan. This can be impractical, for example, for viable firms in the product development stages which are not yet generating a mature cash flow.

The FBDB has already demonstrated innovative solutions by providing quasi–equity financing approaches through long term loans with flexible repayment requirements. This is what Canada's small business communities need to obtain their capital requirements and the FBDB is leading the way.

The other four gaps that the minister described have also been addressed by the FBDB. Hon. members will recall that he spoke of the risk gap. Conventional financial institutions, to which the member would like to leave everything, are reluctant to set an interest rate for high risk, smaller term loans that would compensate them for increased risk. They tend to adopt self–imposed ceilings with respect to the rates that are charged.

This has advantages for companies that are able to secure financing. They will rarely pay more than the prime plus 2 per cent. But many companies will be willing to pay higher rates in acknowledgement of the increased risk the lender is taking.

A third structural weakness in the conventional financing requirements in Canada the minister has described as the size gap. I am sure many hon. members who have been involved in business know about this. It is a result of the overhead costs that a lender must incur in administering any loan, whether large or small. The administrative costs associated with loans are similar for the lender, whether it is a $50,000 loan or a $5 million loan. Comparing the profits that the lending institution can make by providing the two loans, there is no question that a conventional lending institution tends to serve its larger customers first.

In Canada today we can point to hundreds of examples of small customers who have grown to become big customers. The $50,000 loan of today may become the $5 million loan of tomorrow. The FBDB has been created precisely to respond to the needs of the smaller customer.

The fourth gap in lending institutions the minister has referred to is the knowledge gap. It is carefully interrelated to each of the other gaps but has a particular emphasis on what the lender understands about the nature of the new economy.

How does the lender take into account the assets that leave the building each night? I am referring to the human assets, the ingenuity, the creativity of engineers, the vision of the design teams, the basic entrepreneurial skills of the owners? In the knowledge economy these are perhaps the most valuable assets of all.

• (1315)

How can lenders assess the viability of new forms of enterprise? By what standards can they compare the economic performance of young companies in the newly emerging field of environmental technologies? For example, how can they measure the potential benefits and risks of a new software design?

Industries emerging in the new economy have trouble securing appropriate financing because they are knowledge based and may not possess assets that could be realized in the event of a default.

The team at the FBDB has made it its business to understand the needs of the new economy. Its clients have evolved with changes to Canada's industrial base. It is precisely because those gaps do exist under the present situation that we need the FBDB. That is why I am supporting this bill; to ensure small and medium size businesses that we have the infrastructure to fulfil their financial needs and create more jobs for Canadians and greater opportunity.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues before me did a good job explaining the subject matter of Bill C–91. Therefore, I will only say that it is mainly aimed at transforming the Federal Business Development Bank, commonly known as the FBDB, into the Business Development Bank of Canada.

To create this new entity, the government is not amending the Federal Business Development Bank Act; it is introducing a new piece of legislation, Bill C–91.

I will deal with three aspects of this bill. The mandate of the FBDB, as we know it, will be extended. Consequently, the modified FBDB will no longer be solely a financial institution geared to last resort funding. From now on, the new Business Development Bank of Canada will be able to provide complementary funding to other financial institutions.

Second, it will now be easier for the Business Development Bank of Canada to enter into agreements with public and private partners, either at the federal or provincial level, to set up financing syndicates.

Third, the bank will have financial instruments, such as shares, which will enable it to increase its capital without depending on government funds.

I will therefore focus on the disastrous consequences of this amendment on regional development. Unfortunately, it would appear that, under the guise of regional development, Bill C–91 is the new way the federal government has found to once again interfere in provincial affairs.

As in many other areas, it has not been clearly established whether regional development is a provincial or a federal responsibility. Some provinces, such as Quebec, have long demanded exclusive powers in this area. As you might expect, the federal government has always refused to recognize regional development as a strictly provincial responsibility.

At each round of constitutional negotiations, this claim was summarily rejected. However, under Quebec–Canada framework agreements the federal government had made a commitment to the Quebec government to limit its regional interventions.

• (1320)

The Economic and Regional Development Agreement for Quebec came to an end in December 1994 and the federal government refused to renew it. Clauses 20 and 21 of the bill will make the Business Development Bank of Canada more visible in the outlying regions since it will have the authority to sign agreements directly with other federal departments, regional agencies like the conseils régionaux de développement, and, eventually, with the corporations de développement économique and even with individuals.

If the bank can deal directly with local stakeholders, it could have a negative impact on provincial strategic plans since it could induce the CRDs to model their priorities on Ottawa in order to get money. Therefore, the bill disregards the joint efforts made by the provincial governments and the local business community. Once again the federal government comes trampling in, saying: "Make way, here we come with our spending power!"

Let me remind you that this famous spending power has given the federal government a debt which now stands at $550 billion. Let me remind you also that this $550 billion debt has been accumulated largely, if not totally, over the last 25 years. And except for a period of nine years, who were the leaders of this country during those last 25 years? We all know that the Liberal Party of Canada was in office during those years. That is what spending power gives us. They meddle in everything and often spend ill–advisedly. Just look at the facts. In the present case, a simple name change will cost Canadian taxpayers millions.

Mr. Nunez: It is a disgrace.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): This is indeed a disgrace. What is even more regrettable is that the federal will, once more, impose the same medicine to all the regions of Canada. Well–meaning civil servants will decide, from Ottawa, what is good for the regions and other civil servants, also well–meaning, will apply the decisions made in Ottawa.

Decentralization is presented as the way of the future but Bill C–91 shows that the federal government has no use for regionalization. The Government of Quebec is trying to decentralize certain powers and give regions the money they need to exercise them. Bill C–91 goes blindly in the opposite direction. At a time of cuts, when money is getting scarce, with Bill C–91 the federal government is opting for a less cost effective solution simply because it will get increased visibility. This is very sad for taxpayers.

The federal government would rather withdraw from social programs and use taxpayers' money to intrude needlessly on Quebec structures designed to deal with small and medium size businesses. These political choices are not made in the interests of regions but rather in the interests of the federal government. Therefore, I will oppose Bill C–91 because I respect the work done by the Government of Quebec and by regional stakeholders, and because I also respect the choices they have made. Using these means to foster the popularity of the federal government among the people cannot be justified.

I could mention all the duplications that are already costing taxpayers so much because they always end up paying the bill through their municipal, school, provincial and federal taxes. Let us take for example manpower training. It should come under provincial jurisdiction. Yet, because of this duplication, the federal government spent needlessly, in Quebec alone, $265 million in administrative costs. We are literally stepping on each others toes.

I have no objection to the federal government meddling in provincial affairs. It can show off its spending power all it wants. But it should start by paying its own debts. We had to fight, in this House, to obtain that the federal government pay its share of the 1992 referendum, a promise made by the previous Prime Minister that the present Prime Minister wanted to renege on.

The native crisis in Quebec cost hundreds of millions of dollars and we are still negotiating the federal government's share. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, rest assured that the Bloc Quebecois will oppose this bill that we consider totally useless.

[English]

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the comments of the hon. member for Vancouver South in response to the speech of my colleague from Edmonton Southwest. He said the Liberals feel we have to have a financial infrastructure to create a strong, vibrant and dynamic economy. That is exactly the problem with Canada at this point. The Liberals today feel the way they have felt for the last 25 years, that if the government does not do it then probably it will not happen.

The Liberals consistently are coming forward with legislation like this which will interfere even further in the affairs of ordinary Canadians in its own small insidious way.

I will speak about this issue from the point of view of what I call coffee shop common sense. There is a real vacuum of talk in the Chamber which comes from the common sense that we hear from Canadians as they gather in coffee shops, in their living rooms or around their kitchen tables at home. There is very little talk using the ordinary English or French used there. We always seem to end up hearing speeches from people using wonderful 75 cent words to describe dead end situations.

I suggest to my friend from Vancouver South that the Liberals, when using this act along with other acts to create a financial infrastructure, to create a strong, vibrant, dynamic economy, might do well to take a look at what capital is and where capital comes from.

As far as the Liberals are concerned, and many people of that thought process, the idea of taxation is to gather in the capital so it can be redistributed as the people who supposedly know best think it should be.

I believe, as do many people in my constituency, the big banks are failing small business. There may be a good intention on the part of the big banks, and certainly they do a lot of advertising and window dressing, but the biggest single problem is there is no real competition in the banking industry as it presently sits. I would be in favour of our looking at creating a situation, not as set out in Bill C–91, but a situation in legislation that would create some real competition between banks so that we could have a pool of capital.

We know the big banks are asking to get into non–traditional banking services. Of course they have gone into brokerage and now they are asking to break into insurance. They are looking at the fact that although they have countless billions of dollars flowing through their coffers on a day by day basis, nonetheless they can extract only a very small percentage of those dollars. They are therefore looking to insurance, to brokerage. I do not know what is going to come next.

The difficulty is that the banks are not in a situation where there is real competition so that they have to go out and gain the business. I say this on the basis of what I call coffee shop common sense. If I were to walk down Baker Street in my hometown of Cranbrook, or a street in Invermere, Fernie, Creston, Golden, or any of the towns in my constituency, and walk into a coffee shop and sit down with the local business people and ask what the real problem was that they were having, almost invariably they would tell me that the real problem they are having is in getting a sufficient amount of working capital. They are constantly constrained in the area of capital.

This government should really be looking at, and perhaps it can be looked at under Bill C–91 in committee, the creation of an independent investment pool of real dollars. These would not be dollars that are extracted from business by way of a tax grab, not dollars that are extracted from individuals by way of a tax grab, not money lost under regulation harassment that businesses are under these days, but real dollars that people would put into an investment pool.

Let us look at why businesses are having difficulty maintaining a capital base. They pay school tax and municipal tax. In many cases they pay water, sewer and garbage collection tax and provincial taxes. In my home province of British Columbia if a person has the audacity to have too much money, and it can be borrowed money invested in equipment in a business, that person will be taxed on the money that is invested in the items that are actually generating the profits in the first place. There is federal income tax.

There is the GST compliance costs, which of course we should talk very briefly about as a side bar issue. This government came to Parliament telling Canadians it was going to be doing away with GST and has done nothing. Anyway, there is the GST compliance costs and regulation harassment. There are good reasons for having municipal, provincial and federal regulations, but in many cases the application of those regulations for businesses becomes a harassment.

Why do many businesses have a problem keeping dollars in the business? Let us look at the list. The dollars go out to school tax, municipal tax, water, sewer, garbage, provincial tax, federal income tax, GST compliance costs and all of those things. It is no wonder that small business is having a difficult time retaining capital. There is a tax grab by all levels of government as they scrounge to find more dollars rather than doing the obvious which is to cut down on the expenditures.

This bill is going to committee. It is excellent that this bill has come to the House and under an agreement between the government and the opposition parties will be going into committee. There is the opportunity in committee for my very competent and capable Reform Party colleagues to bring some coffee shop common sense to that committee in order to move forward in an active and proactive way to make something of this bill which quite frankly I find to be a little questionable at this time. They could bring it forward with the provision that there is no attempt on the part of the industry committee to repeat the shenanigans of the human resources and development committee. This process has the opportunity to be open, constructive and positive. I encourage all members who will be working on that committee to be sure that process is capable of happening.

• (1335)

I say again, the Liberals have the idea that if it is worthwhile doing then surely the government has to do it. The Reform Party believes that the government should get out of the lives, get out of the faces, get out of the pocketbooks of ordinary citizens and ordinary businesses and let them get on with doing what they do best, which is to make profits, to reinvest them and to get this country going.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to talk today to Bill C–91, an Act to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name Business Development Bank of Canada, that was tabled on May 15 by the Minister of Industry. According to its drafters, over and above changing its name, the bill aims at streamlining the bank and modernizing its operations.

As we all know, the role of the Federal Business Development Bank is to promote and support companies which are starting up or at any other stage of development. It was created in 1944 under the name Industrial Development Bank. In 1974, it was incorporated under its current name as a crown corporation in accordance with a law passed by Parliament.

The Federal Business Development Bank offers three types of services to companies: financial services, venture capital financing and management consulting services, including consulting, planning and information.

This bill broadens the bank's mandate so that it will not only be a financial institution responsible for last resort financing. It will also, from now on, be authorized to offer complementary financing to other financial institutions and to set up subsidiaries.

Moreover, clause 21 of the bill allows the Minister of Industry to use the bank to promote entrepreneurship in Canada. Clause 20 gives more leeway to the bank to negotiate agreements with other federal departments and provincial and local agencies in carrying out its specific mandate and any other mandate that the minister could assign to it under clause 21.

My first criticism is that I do not see the need to change the bank's name. We are only wasting taxpayers' money.

However, the most important flaw of this bill is without a doubt the fact that the federal government is going to interfere even more in regional development throughout Canada. In Quebec alone, it intervenes through the Federal Office of Regional Development which implements all of the federal programs. The mandate of this office is to create a dialogue between federal stakeholders in Quebec. This office has already established contacts with these consultation structures in Quebec and even wants to sit at the consultation table for Montreal.

Bill C–91 constitutes another centralizing offensive from the federal government resulting in costly and needless overlaps.

• (1340)

This bill completely negates the role of provincial governments regarding support to small business. This goes against the declarations of the Liberal government which said it wants to eliminate overlapping and duplication with provinces.

Clause 20 of the bill allows the Federal Business Development Bank to enter directly into agreements with a person or agency, which means it will be able to sign agreements with regional development councils among others.

However the Quebec act respecting the Ministère du Conseil exécutif du Québec prohibits provincial agencies from entering into agreements with the federal government without the minister's authorization. Once more the federal government dismisses the responsibilities of the Government of Quebec and its very existence by giving itself the power to act without consulting provinces.

In the area of regional development the centralizing offensive of the Chrétien government goes directly against Quebec's regionalization policy. The federal government has always refused to recognize regional development as an exclusive provincial jurisdiction. The government dismissed this claim in all constitutional negotiations. Yet, the federal government had promised Quebec it would limit its action in regions under general agreements between Canada and Quebec. However, the regional economic development agreement expired in december 1994 and the federal government has refused to renew it.

Federal intervention in regional development is becoming scattered, without consultation with the Quebec government. It is competing with Quebec programs while trying to increase the federal government's visibility in the outlying regions and is using the Federal Office of Regional Development to establish Canadian standards in various departments.

What I find really shocking is that the federal government is financially getting out of social programs and using taxpayers' money to unnecessarily overlap Quebec structures that are dealing with small and medium size businesses. On the other hand, it refuses to get out of manpower training, as was asked by the Quebec government, labour and employer organizations, as well as by economic and social sectors in general.

In my riding of Bourassa, where there are numerous very small businesses, the Federal Business Development Bank has been involved with several projects that have created or maintained jobs. However, some business people tell me that this institution is taking too long to examine and respond to their requests or is asking for too many guarantees.

This institution should also be providing more consulting services and in particular, more consulting and training services to students who wish to operate small businesses during the summer. The government is already giving it grants large enough to allow it to carry out that part of its mandate. I hope that the FBDB will always be different from other financial institutions in that it will not try to maximize its profits, but only to recover its costs.

The Bloc Quebecois does not want the FBDB to compete with other development tools available to Quebecers, such as the Fonds de solidarité de la FTQ and the caisses populaires. Also, we would like it to have the means to support Quebec businesses.

I would like to take this opportunity to highlight the accomplishments of the FTQ's Fonds de solidarité over its ten year existence. I took part in the last annual meeting, during which the fund's 10th anniversary was celebrated. This fund has invested in, and helped, hundreds of businesses and has created or saved over 25,000 jobs in Quebec. I would like to pay tribute to its leaders, Louis Laberge, Fernand Daoust and Claude Blanchet. I would not like to see the Federal Business Development Bank duplicate the exceptional work already being done by the Fonds de solidarité.

The potential impact of Bill C–91 on the bank's role as an instrument of economic development is very worrisome.

• (1345)

Firstly, the bank is no longer restricted to its role of a last resort lender and will be able to offer complementary financing. The danger lies in the fact that the bank is moving away from its mandate of last resort financing and more towards complementary financing.

The bill must clearly stipulate that the bank's primary role is to offer last resort financing. Clause 21 gives the minister the discretion to involve the bank in initiatives which have nothing to do with its primary activity. Such a measure is unacceptable, because it could prevent the bank from concentrating on what it does best, which is providing last resort financing.

Clause 36 of the bill restricts access to information regarding the bank's clients. This practice is normal for a financial institution. It would be useful, however, to add a provision stipulating that Parliament could access this information for a parliamentary inquiry.

Like the other Bloc Quebecois members who preceded me, I would like to state that I do not support this bill.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to Bill C–91, the motion to refer the bill to committee prior to second reading.

I know other members before me including my colleagues the member for Edmonton Southwest, the member for Okanagan Centre and the member for Kootenay East have spoken to the contents of the bill and what they hope to accomplish in committee, the weaknesses and strengths of the bill regarding the Federal Business Development Bank.

I will take a slightly different attack. This motion refers the bill to committee prior to second reading. As members know, this is a new process which has just been implemented in this 35th Parliament. We are doing some experimentation with regard to how we pass legislation.

The Reform Party agreed with the procedure of sending bills to committee prior to second reading because the Liberals had promised that under this new process there would be ample time for substantive amendments to be debated and discussed in committee before the bill was approved in principle as it is during second reading debate.

I will read what the standing orders say with regard to referring bills to committee prior to second reading. Bill C–91 falls into this category. Standing Order 73(1):

> Immediately after the reading of the order of the day for the second reading of any public bill, a minister of the crown may, after notifying representatives of the opposition parties, propose a motion that the said bill be forthwith referred to a standing, special or legislative committee. The Speaker shall immediately propose the question to the House and proceedings thereon shall be subject to the following conditions:

In the case of Bill C–91 these requirements were followed. The minister did make a request that the bill go to committee prior to second reading and there had been consultation with the other parties.

Standing Order 73(1)(b) says: "the motion shall not be subject to any amendment".

That means as we debate this motion today we cannot implement any amendments. I can understand that because we are not dealing with the substance of the bill. We are dealing the procedural matter, whether the bill should go to committee prior to second reading. The standing orders preclude any amendments to this motion.

Standing Order 73(1)(c) states no member may speak more than once nor longer than ten minutes. Standing Order 73(1)(d) states that after not more than 180 minutes of debate, three hours, the Speaker shall interrupt the debate and the question shall be put and decided without further debate.

We are not having a second reading debate right now. We are debating a motion to refer Bill C–91 to the Standing Committee on Industry. The committee will be challenged with the task of reviewing the bill, listening to witnesses, proposing amendments and having a vigorous debate on the value of Bill C–91; whether it is a strong and good piece of legislation, whether it needs to be substantially changed or whether it should be defeated. I am sure when the bill goes to committee these issues will be looked at.

I am really concerned about whether we can take the government at face value when it says it will permit open and complete debate in committee prior to second reading. When we agree to this process we forego debate at second reading.

We are not really having a full blown debate right now because we are limited to 180 minutes. We cannot make amendments because we are dealing with a motion, not with the bill. It is critical that if we also lose our second reading debate we have a committee that functions well, is open to amendments, takes time to consider the bill and will not rush the bill through committee stage without proper analysis, without enough witnesses being called and without time taken at the clause by clause review of the bill.

I am concerned, not because of Bill C–91 and the industry committee, but about what happened in the human rights and disabled persons committee which also received a bill through this process. The member for Kingston and the Islands said that bill was before the committee for five months. Let me tell the House what the committee did for five months.

I think members of the committee allowed only four witnesses Reform suggested to appear before the committee. All others were government witnesses. That does not sound like a very open process. Maybe the Bloc had a few, I am not sure. Certainly the appearance of witnesses before the committee was restricted. That does not sound like the spirit of Standing Order 73. It certainly does not fall under the spirit of the red book. We are having some real problems with the credibility of the red book in light of all the broken promises we see amassing at a rapid pace. Almost on a daily basis we see new broken promises.

The bill came before the committee and it refused to hear our witnesses. We were let to sit a simmer for a long time. Suddenly it was time for clause by clause debate. Our members brought forward amendments, some prior to the clause by clause debate and some on the day of the clause by clause debate. These amendments were refused contrary to Standing Order 62 because the chairman said they were only submitted in one official language. I hope that does not happen with Bill C–91.

I understand the industry committee functions a little better than the human rights committee. It almost sounds like an oxymoron to use the term human rights when we are talking about the actions which transpired in the committee the other day.

The chairman ruled contrary to Standing Order 62 and refused to even consider debating amendments put forward by my Reform colleagues. Initially the committee refused to accept amendments from the floor, saying they had to be submitted ahead of time. It is contrary to the rules and spirit of the motion to submit these bills to committee prior to second reading.

There were some other problems. Suddenly a motion was passed limiting debate per clause to five minutes. I hope this does not happen with Bill C–91 because this makes a sham of the committee process. That five minutes included reading the clause; some clauses were a whole page, some clauses were difficult to complete in the time limit. After reading a clause all three parties had far less than five minutes to comment on each clause. That is not meaningful debate. It is not in the spirit of Standing Order 73. It is not why Reform supported this change to the committee process.

I trust this will not happen with Bill C–91. If this reoccurs it will indicate the government did not bring the changes to the standing orders forward in good faith. It was using this as a mechanism whereby the debate on bills could be shortened, particularly on contentious bills such as C–64, and therefore prevent the House from dealing with the bill at a second reading debate. This is a very serious matter and why I bring it to the attention of the House.

Furthermore, in the committee the chairman refused to hear points of order. I know, Mr. Speaker, you have never in the Chamber refused to hear points of order; neither have the Deputy Speaker nor any of the acting speakers. The standing orders indicate points of order must be heard. The chairman in the human rights committee refused to hear points of order, again a breach of the standing orders and the common procedures we follow in the House.

Therefore I hope Bill C–91 when it goes to committee prior to second reading will not face this type of abusive procedure on the part of the chair of the committee. I am sure it will not because I understand that committee works quite a bit more co–operatively.

In this committee the chair, if challenged on a point of order, said: "Do I have the agreement of the committee to proceed? Is my ruling sustained?" The Liberal members would jump up and say "sustained", and there was no debate on the issue.

The debate on the Federal Business Development Bank is important. It could be equally as important as the debate on employment equity, although the employment equity bill is certainly a more emotional issue. However, all bills are important. If they are brought to the House we expect them to be dealt with in a serious manner. We expect the rules of the House and the rules as they apply to committees to be followed.

I implore the government to review whether it is really open to honest debate in committee prior to second reading. When we use Standing Order 73 and refer bills to committee prior to a second reading debate, I challenge the government never again to implement draconian measures which would restrict debate on a particular clause to five minutes or less. That cannot happen. That takes away all credibility from the legislative process. It is demeaning to members of Parliament and, most important, it is absolutely wrong.

We will in good faith agree to send the bill to committee prior to second reading. I expect the discussion will be of a far higher quality than was the case in the human rights committee. Not only would I expect it, I think the House should demand it. Members of Parliament deserve to be heard and deserve to have their positions adequately expressed so there can be a vote taken after full and free debate. I recommend that for Bill C–91.

EMERGENCY PERSONNEL

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have grave concerns respecting the current status of infectious disease notification in Canada. Without regard for their personal safety firefighters, police and ambulance workers routinely provide emergency medical treatment in unsanitary field conditions on patients they know nothing about. As a consequence they can be exposed to an increasing variety of dangerous, contagious and sometimes deadly diseases.

Is it asking too much that these brave men and women be entitled to notification about possible exposure to an infectious disease? Is it asking too much that our emergency response personnel themselves be given the right to early treatment? Is it asking too much that their family, friends and literally everyone they come into contact with be protected from further transmission?

The answer is obvious. I implore the government through Health Canada to set the standard for uniform notification protocols in conjunction with those provinces that have endorsed national guidelines. The confidentiality of patients can and will be protected. The health of our emergency response personnel can and must be protected.

Canadians are entitled to nothing less.

JACQUES VILLENEUVE

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, racing driver Jacques Villeneuve won a brilliant victory at the 79th Indianapolis 500 on the weekend.

Overcoming a two lap penalty, Jacques Villeneuve made up his time, caught and then passed all the other drivers, moved into the lead, and stayed there to the finish.

This was the twenty–four year old driver's second time only at this American racecourse and his first victory. Quebecers will remember his father, Gilles, a Formula 1 driver and his brilliant victory at the Montreal Grand Prix. They will also remember with sadness his tragic death in 1982, during race trials in Belgium.

Quebecers will now be keen to follow the exploits of Jacques Villeneuve who, this weekend, reached the first milestone in a motor racing career that we hope will be long and happy.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Immigration says he is going to fix the refugee system, so let us look at a typical case.

I have the selection criteria he has laid out for fast–tracking refugees into Canada from Colombia. These are the people the Liberals say are at risk in Colombia: the police, military, judiciary, peace and human rights activists, political activists, former guerrillas, union leaders, peasants thought to be guerrillas or having perceived political affiliation, women, homeless youth perceived to be involved in criminal activities, journalists covering political or criminal issues, homosexuals, deserters from criminal organizations, members of wealthy families and prostitutes.

Tell us dumb Canadians, Mr. Minister, will there be anyone else in Colombia after you have opened the floodgates, or should Canadians apply for immigration to Colombia? By the way did the Liberals not leave Juan Valdez, the coffee man, off their list?

CHILD ABDUCTION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, child abduction is a serious problem in Canada. Each year thousands of our precious young loved ones are reported missing. They are either lost, runaways, or have been abducted by parents or strangers.

Child Find Canada gives us hope in recovering our cherished children and preventing the disappearance of many others.

The month of May has been designated the Green Ribbon of Hope Campaign to stimulate awareness across Canada about the serious nature of child abduction.

On May 25 National Missing Children's Day acted as a reminder of the children who remain missing and the work that still needs to be done.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, National Access Awareness Week, which begins today, is about learning, be it academic, vocational, or on the job training.

Halls of learning and new technologies that facilitate the learning process should be accessible to persons with disabilities. Technology, remember, enabled physicist Stephen Hawking, despite his disabilities, to share his brilliant scientific insights with all mankind.

Technology has allowed many Canadians with disabilities to share their special talents, one of whom is recognized annually with the Centennial Flame research award of Parliament.

All Canadians benefit when citizens with disabilities are integrated fully in our homes, schools, workplaces, and in sports. This special week reminds us of our national dream for our citizens with disabilities and of our will to realize this dream.

I am pleased this government has heightened its resolve to tear down the barriers that limit participation and to supply the tools that facilitate integration.

READER'S DIGEST LEADERSHIP IN EDUCATION AWARD

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure today to rise on behalf of the District of Nipissing to congratulate Sunset Park public school principal Rick Ferron and vice–principal John Stephens for being named winners of the 1995 national Reader's Digest leadership in education award.

These gentlemen were selected from 197 nationwide nominations for their efforts in creating a living community where outside social agencies come into the school to counsel at risk students and their families in a warm, nurturing setting. Their approach is based on the old African proverb that "it takes a village to raise a child".

Each gentleman will receive a $5,000 award and the school will receive $10,000. This foundation award, initiated in 1989, is considered one of the top prizes from a non–educational or non–government body.

As word of the Sunset Park initiative spread, some of the province's top education researchers jumped in to support it and have held it up as a model for the rest of the country.

PEACEKEEPERS

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, more than 370 UN peacekeepers and military observers have been taken hostage or are surrounded by Bosnian Serbs. Seventeen of them are literally being used as human shields.

• (1405)

We would like to express our deep concern for the Quebec and Canadian peacekeepers who are among the hostages and we wish to express our profound empathy with their families in this time of anguish and fear for them.

Of the 2,100 members of the Canadian military currently deployed in the former Yugoslavia, ten have been taken hostage. Eight of these ten are Quebecers, who are members of the third battalion of the Royal 22nd Regiment from Valcartier. Forty–five other members of the armed forces are confined to their observation post.

We all hope that the current negotiations will quickly lead to their release.

INTEGRITY IN POLITICS

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during the election campaign the Liberals emphasized strongly the issue of integrity. They claimed the Conservatives had callously broken election promises and destroyed public confidence in politicians. The Liberals promised to be different, but they were not. During the coming months you will see just how many promises they have broken. Reformers will parade them before you.

Reformers are happy the Liberals adopted so many Reform policies, but Canadians are rightly disappointed with the Liberals' broken promises. They are asking if the broken promises are a sign of Liberal incompetence or a sign of total disrespect for the intelligence of Canadian voters.

CRTC

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, last November the Minister of Industry assured this House that the appointment of a panel to review the CRTC's decision on direct to home satellite services was "in no way an overruling or the setting aside of the CRTC decision with respect to the exemption order that was issued. That order stands."

Now the government is changing that order. The government should not hold things up by retroactively changing CRTC decisions and creating new hurdles. Already we have a large grey market. Many Canadian homes are pulling in U.S. signals without any Canadian content regulations and sending money across the border.

We welcome Canadian competition. We urge more competition and the public wants more competition. However, further delaying the entrance of regulated D to H services will make it more difficult to reintegrate grey market users into Canadian regulated services.

Fairness to the public and program producers would—

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, for two children in my community the opportunity to learn, to play, to grow, and to love will never come again.

Last Friday, 10–year old Wilson and 8-year old Margret Kasonde were shot to death in their father's west end apartment. I can think of no greater horror for a family to face than the one their mother and little brother now face. Our hearts go out to them as they try to survive this terrible tragedy.

The children's school and others in the neighbourhood are seeking to reassure hundreds of children who have lost their sense of security and innocence with this tragic event. The pain of these two deaths permeates the whole community.

Tonight the people of Carlington will hold a candle light vigil in memory of Wilson and Margret and to declare their determination to end violence that destroys so many lives and to control the instruments of violence that can kill so quickly and so finally. I ask us all to join them in that determination.

ONTARIO ELECTION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Ontario Conservative leader Mike "just call me common sense" Harris says if elected he would offer $4 billion in tax cuts, $3.9 billion in spending cuts, and a balanced budget in three to five years. Imagine that.

• (1410)

Despite his slash and burn approach, Mr. Harris claims that he can gut provincial programs without damaging the delivery of essential services such as health and education. Furthermore, by forcing the needy to work for welfare the Ontario Tories are typically trying to carry out those massive spending cuts, as usual, on the backs of the most vulnerable people in our society. I wonder if Mr. Harris thinks a single parent struggling to survive with children while conducting a job search has the time and the energy to work for welfare.

Mr. Harris's numbers just do not add up. I am sure that on June 8 the people of Ontario will realize that what he is proposing is actually a nonsense revolution.

POVERTY

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, hundreds of Quebec women are marching on Quebec City to draw attention to poverty, which is rampant in our society, particularly among women. These women left Montreal, Longueuil and Rivière-du-Loup to reach Quebec City on June 4, when 10,000 women will hold a protest rally.

One of their nine main demands is that the Quebec government substantially increase the minimum wage so that lower paid workers can break out of poverty. This is an exceptional show of solidarity that is worth mentioning and supporting.

On behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, I wish to commend these women, and particularly Françoise David, president of the Fédération des femmes du Québec, who had the idea for this march and organized it.

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on May 29, 1987, a group of concerned Canadians made a decision that in a few short years would change the course of Canadian history. On that day delegates from the four western provinces gathered in Vancouver to discuss Canada's economic and political future. Most of these people had never met before, but they were united by their desire to build a better Canada and by a common belief that our political system was in need of urgent and fundamental change.

After much debate, this assembly made an historic decision by resolving to launch the Reform Party of Canada and thereby revitalize Canadian politics. On the anniversary of this event, I salute the visionary women and men whose courage eight years ago provided hope to Canadians that we could build a more prosperous and more democratic Canada for ourselves and our children.

BOSNIA

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in Bosnia our peacekeepers and those of our close allies are being used as human shields by those who have no respect for humanity and no allegiance to international law.

At a time when the entire United Nations system is being put through a severe test, it is important that we remember Edmund Burke's words: "All that is essential for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing".

As of this moment, when many Canadians are going through a trauma in the former Yugoslavia, it must serve to remind all Canadians of the necessity to fully support and understand what our Canadian forces personnel may well face on any day while serving their country and while serving humanitarian principles at the international level.

Our hearts go out to those soldiers and our support and thoughts must be with their families. We must change and improve the United Nations operations to deal with a vicious and unpredictable world.

PARTI QUEBECOIS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if we are to believe what the leader of the Parti Quebecois said at his party's general assembly over the weekend, the PQ is grappling with a communications problem. The PQ Premier tried to explain his party's decline in popularity among the electorate by saying that his government is better at taking action than at communicating.

By its lack of conviction, this remark is surprisingly reminiscent of the moral victories the PQ used to claim in the old days. The PQ Premier need not look very far for the reason why his government's popularity is dwindling. The people of Quebec do not want to separate and they are sick and tired of seeing their government waste time and money on trying to come up with one question after another.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to question the statement of an hon. member who promised voters that she would resign if the GST was not killed within a year of the Liberals taking office. It has been almost two years now since the election and the Deputy Prime Minister and her cabinet colleagues have failed to follow through on their commitment to kill the dreaded GST.

Reformers believe that a promise is a promise and the time has come for the hon. minister to do the honourable thing, own up to her promise and resign. After she demonstrates that kind of honesty in politics I have no doubt in my mind that the Deputy Prime Minister will have little trouble establishing herself in the private sector. I am sure that the severance package and the $2 million pension plan will help her through that difficult transition to private life.

It would be truly encouraging to see a member of the government fulfil a promise. We in the Reform Party would be so overwhelmed with that display of integrity that we would volunteer to throw the Deputy Prime Minister's retirement party ourselves.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

BOSNIA

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, in retaliation against the UN air strikes, the Bosnian Serbs bombed civilian populations, in Tuzla in particular, and took some 370 peacekeepers hostage, including 10 Canadians. The Serb forces went so far as to keep some peacekeepers chained to ammunition depots to be used as human shields against further raids by NATO.

My question is for the Prime Minister. What concrete measures does the government intend to take to free the 10 Canadian peacekeepers being held hostage by the Bosnian Serbs?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to state that the Canadian population is appalled by the events mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition. As you know, all the troops engaged in the humanitarian work that needs to be done in that troubled part of the world are doing an exceptional job, and I would like to take this opportunity to tell the soldiers posted over there and their families that the government and Canadians are very concerned, and that we will make every effort to support them.

We are currently in contact with most of the 10 Canadian hostages. As members know, the same thing happened last year, and we managed to have the hostages released after two weeks. The current situation is no worse than last year's. We are now making arrangements to talk with the Serbs. We may be in a slightly better situation than the French or the British, because our soldiers, those who were seized are only a few kilometres away from the base at Visoko. We hope that, once the situation calms down, our soldiers will be able to return to their base, and to safety.

In the meantime, we spent the weekend in contact with our allies who have troops over there to try, through diplomatic means, to bring things back to normal in that very complex part of the world. I spoke with the British Prime Minister, the French President and the Secretary General of the United Nations over the weekend. In particular, we want to change the troops' mandate because of the imbalance between the resources at their disposal and the positions they must take. The mandate must be redefined to make it difficult for any one of the warring factions over there, especially the Serbs, to engage in such hostage takings.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if this can be any encouragement to our fellow citizens being held hostage, they should know that they have the support and sympathy of all Canadians and Quebecers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard: As he just reminded us, the Prime Minister consulted with his French and British counterparts and with the Secretary General of the UN, Boutros Boutros–Ghali, over the weekend. In the light of those discussions, can he tell us what position his Minister of Foreign Affairs will defend at the NATO meeting tomorrow with respect to the peacekeepers' mandate and the safety of our fellow Canadians?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, the Minister of Foreign Affairs will meet with his NATO colleagues and defend Canada's position that the time has come for the United Nations to redefine the peacekeepers' mandate.

• (1420)

As I said earlier, the work to be done by our troops and the resources available to them must be reviewed so that small groups of peacekeepers are not as exposed as they are at present.

Through our ambassador to the United Nations, we outlined our position. I spoke with Secretary General Boutros Boutros–Ghali yesterday to express Canada's views before he submits a new plan to the Security Council tomorrow. This position will be defended by the Minister of Foreign Affairs at the meeting of NATO foreign affairs ministers tomorrow.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the government is surrounded by advisers, that the Prime Minister and his Minister of Foreign Affairs have the opportunity to talk with their counterparts in other countries, that they are well informed, and so on, but very complex questions are being raised.

Many people in Canada and Quebec are asking themselves whether we should keep sending troops over there, whether changes should be made to the peacekeepers' current mandate, and if so, what those changes should be. Will they continue to stand helplessly by and fall victim to the events? If we maintain a military presence over there, why, and on what conditions, will we do so?

In other words, Parliament must be consulted on this. In this context, can the Prime Minister tell us whether he will approve the opposition's request that an emergency debate be held today on the safety of the peacekeepers in Bosnia and the mandate of UN forces?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the House had the opportunity to debate our presence over there on three occasions—and I am very glad that it did.

I do not know the status of the discussions between the opposition parties and the government. Tomorrow is an opposition day and would be a very good opportunity to raise this issue. There would be more time available, instead of holding a debate late tonight.

I think that tomorrow's opposition day is reserved for the third party, and I hope they will use the opportunity to debate this issue. I know that the British Parliament will debate its position on Wednesday. I would welcome a debate in this House tomorrow.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to remind the Prime Minister that it is important that the debate be held today since the meeting is to take place tomorrow morning. If we want the debate to be relevant, it must be held today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jacob: My question is for the Prime Minister. In the context of the mandate, the French Prime Minister set certain conditions on maintaining troops in the former Yugoslavia. First, that UN soldiers be regrouped in order to minimize the likehood of further hostage takings; second, that those soldiers be provided with heavy artillery and given permission to use it; and, third, that a standing response force under UN and NATO control be set up.

Can the Prime Minister tell us if he agrees with the French Prime Minister on redefining the mandate, which he just mentioned, for UN soldiers in the former Yugoslavia along these lines?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what we are discussing with the UN Secretary General.

In my answer to the Leader of the Opposition, I indicated that it was important to redefine the role of our soldiers and to ensure that they are not exposed, as they are right now, several kilometres from their base, in small numbers and completely on their own; we have been adamant on this. As for the right to attack or take firmer defensive actions, they have the power to do so, but right now, the engagement rules need to be reviewed.

As far as setting up a standing response force, I would like to know exactly what they mean. In our view, we are there to maintain peace, not to start a war with parties which are already fighting with one another.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, by his answer, the Prime Minister has shown once again that we should have a debate today, and not wait until tomorrow.

This morning, the Minister of Foreign Affairs said that Canada intended to step up its diplomatic efforts and that a military approach would be a disaster.

Are we to understand from this statement that the Canadian government is opposed not only to redefining the mandate of the UN troops, as proposed by France, but also to any new air strikes?

• (1425)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are not against any new air strikes. Last week we said that we thought, and this was echoed by the French and the British Prime Ministers, that the air strikes had probably not been planned as well as they could have been.

Had we been given earlier notice, we could have taken the necessary steps to protect our soldiers. I raised this issue with the UN Secretary General who, to a certain extent, recognized the validity of my argument. I was pleased to hear the new French Prime Minister express the same point of view, yesterday, on French television.

A review of the situation is needed, but we cannot say that there will never be other air strikes because that would mean that, if we were attacked, we would not defend ourselves.

[English]

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are rightly outraged that our soldiers are being held hostage and their lives endangered. The government has failed our peacekeepers and has failed Canadians. It renewed our mandate in Bosnia without any criteria for evaluating the mission.

The facts are plain. The warring factions continue to target UN troops. Ceasefires are not respected. Humanitarian efforts are impossible and there is no peace to keep. The government knew this in October, it knew this in March and it knows it know. Will the government commit itself to the withdrawal of Canadian troops as soon as possible?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. member that at this moment when Canadian soldiers have been kidnapped it is not the time for the Canadian government to run for cover and be subjected to blackmail.

We are there to play a useful role. Thousands and thousands of lives have been saved because our troops are there. The Canadian troops are among the best, if not the best. I would like to tell our soldiers that we support them. When they went there they knew they were not going to a picnic. I am grateful to the Leader of the Opposition who said that we are backing the Canadian troops.

We have had similar incidents before and there will probably be more. In the meantime we are saving thousands of lives there, making sure that medication and food gets to the population.

The Canadian people are proud of this role and the Canadian people are backing the troops who at the moment are in difficulty.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, no one is questioning the calibre and the jobs our peacekeepers have done.

The Liberal red book promised that Canada would no longer be a foreign policy camp follower. In Bosnia however, we have become a camp follower to all of NATO and to a contact group with limited involvement in the conflict. Germany for example, does not have one single soldier on the ground, yet has more voice than Canada. Our soldiers are being chained to posts outside ammunition dumps. Why is the government being diplomatically correct in letting the governments of France and Britain make our decisions for what we do in Bosnia?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are not part of the contact group. As I said before, 25 countries are there, some with more troops than Canada in Bosnia, and they are not part of the—

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Not troops.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Some are and they are not members of the contact group. This is a diplomatic effort by the Russians, the Americans and three European countries which have more direct influence than we have. We do not have a traditional presence there and I admit that. However neither are the Dutch, nor the Belgians, nor the Spanish and many others. We should not take offence at that.

We are on the ground and we are making the decisions in relation to Canadian soldiers. We are participating in the discussions at NATO. We are participating in the discussions at the UN.

• (1430)

I had the chance to talk to many of the leaders, the president of Croatia, Prime Minister Major and President Chirac, and the minister of foreign affairs in Bosnia who unfortunately was killed over the weekend. I met him in Paris. He told me the best soldiers in that very difficult situation were the Canadians. Therefore we will keep backing them up.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we agree we have the best soldiers. They should also have a say in the decisions.

The Reform Party warned the government not to renew Canada's mandate. The situation was unstable and the lives of Canadians would be placed in unacceptable danger if they were recommitted to Bosnia. The government ignored this advice and for a third time Canadian soldiers are being held hostage.

Canadians are demanding action. According to a recent poll of thousands, 90 per cent wanted Canada to pull out now. Why is the government refusing to listen to Canadians? Why is it showing such a total lack of good judgment in setting its policy toward Bosnia?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have had discussions with the Canadian military and we are supported by people who know something about this very difficult circumstance. Canadians have always been there in difficult circumstances. I am very happy that all parties except the Reform Party are supporting Canadian troops and the Canadian position.

It has been a tradition that when lives of Canadians are at stake in a difficult circumstance we back them up. The government is participating in discussions and decisions. We will make the best judgments to save lives.

In the meantime I know the millions of people living in that region are very grateful that Canadians are there to save lives and provide food and medication in a terrible situation.

WINNIPEG JETS

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

It is unjustifiable on the part of the federal government to help a professional hockey club to the tune of $20 million, while cutting billions of dollars in social program funding.

After deciding that the federal assistance was inadequate, the Manitoba Entertainment Complex Save the Jets group applied to Revenue Canada for charitable status, so as to become eligible for indirect federal assistance in the form of tax deductions.

Can the Minister of National Revenue tell us what is the status of the application made by Manitoba Entertainment Complex and whether he intends to increase federal assistance to the Winnipeg Jets through tax deductions?

[English]

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the rules governing charities are set out by the courts, not by Parliament or the government. They are set out by a series of court decisions.

It has been determined over a fairly lengthy series of court cases that an organization entirely for the promotion of a sport is not a charitable organization. I cannot comment on the particulars of any one organization and where it stands within the process. I can as a general rule assure the hon. member that any organization strictly for sporting purposes would not qualify for charitable status.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of National Revenue confirm information suggesting that the donations made to Manitoba Entertainment Complex would be considered as donations to the state or to a provincial Crown corporation, thus substantially increasing federal assistance to the Winnipeg Jets by allowing the deduction of such donations for federal income tax purposes?

[English]

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again it is difficult to comment directly about a specific case. It is not our practice to do that.

However, in general terms I can assure the hon. member any attempt to avoid the existing law as it has been laid down by the courts will be objected to by Revenue Canada. The law should be applied directly and fairly to all, as it has been in the past. It is always possible for people to attempt to alter the nature of an organization's objectives or to alter the nature of gifts to a charitable organization or to bring it within a charitable status. That is within their right. We will examine it thereafter when we receive that information and determine whether it meets the law.

• (1435)

We insist any organization that attempts to get charitable status meet the full requirements of the law.

BOSNIA

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will make it plain from the outset that the Reform Party, like all parties in the House and all Canadians, supports and has great respect and admiration for our troops in Bosnia.

The Bosnian Serb reaction to NATO air strikes on Pale last week was entirely predictable, indeed a forgone conclusion. Was the Canadian government consulted on the decision to carry out the air strikes and if so did it approve?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a decision made by NATO and the UN. In my discussion with the secretary general of the UN yesterday he said he had agreed.

We have not been formally consulted like the others. It was a decision made at that moment by the people who have the authority. We were not formally consulted for this air strike. We discuss policies all the time but the people on the ground make these decisions. It was approved by the UN, as requested in the policy of double keys.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, while Canada may not have the largest contingent of troops in the former Yugoslavia, we certainly have had a substantial commitment throughout the conflict and that commitment is highly rated.

Why, with so many Canadians vulnerable to the hostage taking which resulted, did the Canadian government not insist its approval be sought before NATO air strikes were approved?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have to reiterate what the Prime Minister said.

A procedure was put down a year ago when NATO discussed the possibility of using air strikes. The United Nations has the authority in certain circumstances where warranted to ask NATO to perform those air strikes.

That procedure was followed last week and there was nothing abnormal about the procedures.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

With its bill redefining the mandate of the Federal Business Development Bank, the federal government is once again going over the head of the provinces by assuming the right to sign agreements directly with organizations which come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

How can the Prime Minister justify this new federal interference in regional development through the signing of agreements with organizations which come directly under Quebec's jurisdiction? Is this another example of what the Prime Minister calls flexible federalism?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada's constitution clearly states that banks come under federal, not provincial, jurisdiction.

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister.

By refusing to renew the federal–provincial agreement on regional development, Ottawa rejected any form of dialogue with the Quebec government.

Will the Prime Minister recognize that the federal government is laying the foundations of another confrontation with Quebec by allowing the new Business Development Bank of Canada to sign agreements directly with organizations which come under Quebec's jurisdiction, and also by keeping the province from playing any role in the process?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question is related to ERDA, that is the agreement between the federal government and the provincial government. I should tell the hon. member that, unless I am mistaken, I already had one meeting with Mr. Chevrette. Two letters were written, and I told Mr. Chevrette that we are ready, right now, to sit down to renegotiate an agreement. The ball is definitely in the provincial government's court.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, more questions have surfaced concerning the diversion of funds from highway 104 in Nova Scotia and the role of the public works minister.

The Prime Minister has said this is an issue for the Minister of Transport, and when one of his caucus members called it misappropriation of funds she was told to keep quiet.

If the minister of public works was such a minor player in all this, how could he have announced the funding diversion in February 1994 when according to a letter from the minister of transportation federal and provincial officials amended the agreement only three months after that? On whose authority was the minister of public works acting?

• (1440)

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been on a bumpy road with this line of questioning.

A meeting was held with the minister of transportation for Nova Scotia in January during which agreement in principle was achieved on the reallocation of the funds. In February the minister of public works on my behalf announced we had agreed to the funds being spent as was consented to by the province of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada.

I reassure my hon. friend this situation has occurred over and over again in these agreements. The reason it occurs is that, unlike my hon. friend, most of us on this side of the House understand that the construction of highways and the choosing of routing for highways are within provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is ironic the minister said that because in 1986 the Tory revenue minister diverted $20 million from a federal–provincial agreement to a road through his Nova Scotia riding and the Liberals here were incensed. Now the Liberal minister of public works has diverted $26 million from a federal–provincial agreement to his Nova Scotia riding and the Tories are incensed. It is déjà–vu.

Since the minister of public works refuses to answer anyone's question on this serious issue, we would like to borrow the words of the minister. Would the Prime Minister "put up or shut up?" Will he refer this issue to the ethics lap–person or is he content to go down in history as being just as big a hypocrite as Brian Mulroney?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is very unfortunate the hon. member does not understand that when the Government of Nova Scotia looked at the funding available for the highway to which the funds were originally dedicated it understood very little would be achieved in the spending of the very limited amount of money available.

It deemed it was in the best interest of Nova Scotians to allocate the funds to another highway. We consented to that, as is provided for under section 12.2 of the agreement where the agreement can be amended by consent. That is what occurred.

Unfortunately for the hon. member he will have to keep beating his dead horse because he does not seem to be able to find another one these days.

MONETARY POLICY

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to John McCallum, chief economist with the Royal Bank, the Bank of Canada's policy has been responsible for the steady drop in the standard of living of Canadians since 1990. And the new governor of the Bank of Canada has admitted that the bank is still implementing the policy introduced under the Conservatives by his predecessor, John Crow, a policy which the current Minister of Finance at one time denounced.

Does the Minister of Finance realize that the Bank of Canada's current monetary policy and the Conservatives' monetary policy are one and the same and that the policy is the direct cause of high unemployment rates and the drop in our standard of living, as he himself claimed during the last election campaign?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I find it difficult to understand why the hon. member has chosen this time to raise this point, since over the past two months, interest rates have dropped a total of close to 100 basis points.

It is very clear that the Bank of Canada's policy, which is to anticipate inflation, has a big impact on job creation. We cannot compare today's monetary policy to the monetary policy of four or five years past. There is an enormous difference and that is why the hon. member's claims do not wash.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion what does not wash is that the Minister of Finance sang a different tune altogether when he was still a member of the opposition. That is what does not wash.

I would like to know whether the Minister of Finance realizes that since he took office—I am mot talking just about the past five months—interest rates have gone up by one third. This stopped the weak economic recovery dead in its tracks, for, over the past five months, there has been no net job creation in Canada—a figure supported by Statistics Canada.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, 100,000 jobs were created in the private sector in the last quarter. That is nothing to sneeze at.

• (1445)

We must compare the Bank of Canada's current policy to that of four or five years ago. As we all know, interest rates were at their peak in 1989. Therefore, there is no comparison.

The hon. member was right to quote me and the solicitor general, who was finance critic when we were both in the opposition. We were opposed to the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada then. The government of the time, in which the Leader of the Opposition was a cabinet member, and many erstwhile Conservative members who are now Bloc members, defended the policy.

So, instead of putting his question regarding the McCallum report and the Bank of Canada's policy to the government, I would suggest that the hon. member talk to members of his own caucus and maybe even have a private conversation on the issue with his leader.

CHILD SUPPORT PAYMENTS

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Can the minister please inform this House as to when he intends to introduce proposed changes to the child support payment system that would prevent parents from neglecting their responsibilities for their children?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, while the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada last week in the Thibaudeau case may have resolved the question with respect to the constitutionality of the present tax system in relation to child support, it remains for the government to determine whether that system is the fairest and most effective in providing for children.

I have been working with my colleagues, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Human Resources Development and the Minister of National Revenue and the Secretary of State for the Status of Women in reviewing not only the tax system but the importance of enforcement mechanisms as well, as the hon. member has pointed out.

We have also looked at and published proposals for the establishment of guidelines to assist in the determination of the amount of child support to be paid, depending on the income of the parties.

Before the House rises at the end of June, we hope to put before the House proposals for change in those areas.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in January the solicitor general was asked to initiate an investigation into allegations of criminal activity by the Canadian Wheat Board. The solicitor general wrote to me, saying that the RCMP concluded there was not sufficient evidence to support these allegations.

Could the solicitor general provide me with a copy of the RCMP report, as was promised by his office to be done by May 22?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and solicitor general of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will check with the RCMP. I am not sure if it is customary for them to release details of their investigation beyond stating the conclusion of their work, but I will check into it further.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I met with the chief superintendent of the commercial crime division and two inspectors of the RCMP in Winnipeg and I was advised that there had never been a request for an investigation from the solicitor general. The information commissioner validated this by confirming that no RCMP report on this issue could be found.

Why did the solicitor general lie to me?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: My colleagues, sometimes in forming our questions we use words that are inappropriate. I would ask the hon. member for Lisgar—Marquette to reconsider and please withdraw the word "lie".

Mr. Hoeppner: Mr. Speaker, for four months I have tried to get to the bottom of this. The facts speak for themselves. I have two letters confirming—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1450)

The Speaker: My colleagues, in the course of the question period, in order to facilitate matters and to keep the flow of the questions and answers, sometimes your Speaker has to intervene. Usually when words that are unparliamentary are used hon. members will reflect and under the urging of the Speaker most of the time they withdraw.

I would put it to the hon. member for Lisgar—Marquette, would the hon. member please withdraw the word "lie", a simple yes or no.

Mr. Hoeppner: Mr. Speaker, I came to the House with standards and I will not lower them.

The Speaker: My colleagues, I do not want to take the time of this question period. Therefore, I will ask the hon. member to please stay in his seat and I will deal with this matter after the question period.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs.

The Quebec Minister of Public Security has criticized the federal government's inertia vis–à–vis the expansion of the Mohawk cemetery in Oka. According to the minister, the federal government, which is paying its negotiator a handsome salary, still refuses to buy the 60,000 square foot piece of land being offered by the Municipality of Oka for the Mohawks.

How does the Minister of Indian Affairs justify the fact that he and his department are dragging their feet and have yet to purchase the land made available by the municipality to expand the cemetery?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the premise. On the houses north of 344, it was 100 per cent federal money, several million dollars. On the houses the Province of Quebec requested we purchase south of 344, there was not one cent of contribution from the Province of Quebec.

We went in there and set up the Mohawk negotiator, the facilitator and the mediator and we purchased those houses. All the money being spent north and south of 344 has been 100 per cent federal money.

It is okay for Mr. Ménard to sit there and give me a lecture, but if he is serious about doing it they should be at the table offering some kind of contribution, more than just tokenism.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, all I know is that the problem is not resolved. It has cost over $350,000 for a negotiator to do nothing and leave.

How does the minister explain the fact that the negotiations conducted by the federal government with the Mohawks, which have cost a fortune to date, have resulted in absolutely nothing tangible, when a matter such as the purchase of land, if settled by the federal government, would prevent another confrontation between the Mohawks, the City of Oka and the Government of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member says there is nothing tangible. When we took over the government there were 70 or 80 illegally held houses north of 344. Now I believe we have it down to a dozen. We have a housing authority. South of 344 most of the houses are purchased; there are only three that are illegally held, and we are working on those. So there have been tangible results. There have been tangible results at the Mohawk round table and tangible results in individual negotiations with each of the three First Nations.

We are supposed to be honourable here. When the hon. member uses the death of two Mohawks and a funeral to further a political agenda, I think the hon. member falls below what is honourable in this House.

• (1455)

The Speaker: I wonder if the hon. minister would please reconsider his last words. They are, in my view, a personal attack and are not necessary in the course of the question period. Would the hon. minister please consider withdrawing that any other hon. member's conduct is less than honourable?

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Speaker, unlike the Reform, I unequivocally withdraw that remark.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, earlier today the Minister of National Revenue, in answering a question about the Manitoba entertainment complex applying for charitable status, thereby extending the $20 million this government has decided to throw at a professional hockey team to a further loss of about an extra $22 million if it is granted charitable status, bobbed and weaved as though there was a jet going overhead.

Can he not take a position in this House that he will ensure there will be no charitable status, no additional money coming out of Canadian taxpayers' pockets for this professional hockey team?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. member's question is incorrect. No money from the federal government is going to the Jets hockey team, as has been said by the Prime Minister and every other member of the government time after time. The basic premise of his question is incorrect.

With respect to the issue of whether any organization is entitled to charitable status, I have to tell the hon. member what I told my hon. friend from the Bloc a moment or two ago. That is, past decisions of the courts have said that organizations that are strictly for sporting purposes are not charities within the definition that has been put forward by the courts over the years. That is the situation in law. That is the law I must follow.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the point is that this government, which is cutting $7 billion from public spending in the area of health care, social assistance, and post–secondary education, suddenly found $20 million to put into a building to house a professional sports team.

Why cannot the minister do something very simple? He has given us the definition. Will he absolutely guarantee as a minister of the crown that the people of Canada will not be putting any more in than they are already going to be putting in at the figure of $20 million?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions it has been explained to the Reform Party that Calgary and Edmonton are using infrastructure money for hockey arenas. It is strange to me that in Winnipeg they want different rules. They want things to be done differently from the two Alberta cities that are receiving money in this regard.

With respect to the position in law, I cannot guarantee that I will refuse any application that comes before me. They are judged on the merits in accordance with the law. The hon. member may not like that, his party may not like the application of the law, but on this side of the House we obey the law in these situations.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The government is restoring hope to young Canadians and delivering on promised initiatives made in the red book. Youth–oriented programs such as Youth Service Canada and the youth internship program are giving young people the tools to build better lives for themselves and for our society.

Will the minister outline for us some of the actions the government has taken to ensure that Canada's youth gain valuable work experience this summer?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the first thing I should point out is that we have made a substantial addition to the budget for youth employment this year. We have increased the actual employment program from $193 million to $236 million so that we could ensure young people would have effective work.

We have enough money to provide approximately 30,000 jobs and to provide wage subsidies to private business and community organizations. A major investment has gone into loans so that students can start their own businesses, thereby creating their own employment. There is a substantial amount going into the summer youth service corps in order that they will be able to work with the municipalities to provide better policing and better environmental controls.

Overall, we are providing direct employment through federal resources of well over 50,000 jobs for young people. That is an indication of our interest in ensuring that not only do they have a job, they have a job that will enable them to get the kind of training they will need for permanent employment in the future.

• (1500)

The Speaker: That concludes question period.

The word lie used in this context, the word lie used the way it was, I judge to be unparliamentary.

I ask the hon. member in the name of the authority that has been placed in me by the House, squarely will he withdraw the word lie, yes or no?

Mr. Hoeppner: No.

The Speaker: Mr. Hoeppner, I have to name you for disregarding the authority of the Chair.

Pursuant to the authority granted to me by Standing Order 11, I order you to withdraw from the House for the remainder of this day's sitting.

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY DEBATE

BOSNIA

The Speaker: Colleagues, I have received notice of a request for an emergency debate from the member for Red Deer.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as you have mentioned, Standing Order 52(2) allows members to rise on a point of order when they feel it is in Canada's best interest that we debate a subject immediately.

For Canadians the lightning rod that created this urgency was the picture of Captain Patrick Rechner chained in that ammunition dump. That is the lightning rod that has Canadians demanding action. To them it was like that GI dragged through the streets of Somalia for the U.S. citizens.

The Canadian people have started to speak. Polls are asking us as parliamentarians to make—

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I wish to draw to your attention, with the utmost respect, Standing Order 52(3) which reads as follows:

> When requesting leave to propose such a motion—

That is for an emergency debate.

> —the Member shall rise in his or her place and present without argument the statement referred to in section (2) of this Standing Order.

Section (2) states:

> A Member wishing to move, "That this House do now adjourn", under the provisions of this Standing Order shall give to the Speaker, at least one hour prior to raising it in the House, a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed.

I respectfully ask you, Mr. Speaker, to insist that the hon. member comply with the rules of the House.

The Speaker: The hon. House leader is quite correct. I did receive notification one hour prior to this time. I would ask the hon. member if he would put his case forthwith.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the case that I am trying to present is why you should rule in favour of us debating this now. I am asking for your guidance. Can I present a case for why the Canadian people are asking for this to be debated immediately?

• (1510)

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I made the exact same request, therefore, I will join the member in asking, pursuant to Standing Order 52, if we could have an emergency debate tonight, after the adjournment, on the situation of the UN troops in the former Yugoslavia.

We know that the Minister of Foreign Affairs will be meeting with his NATO counterparts tomorrow. In this context, it is important for the House to give the minister its point of view.

The debate should enable us to assess the situation, analyze and evaluate the new developments and, finally, determine the conditions under which UN troops would remain in the former Yugoslavia.

It is in the public interest that parliamentarians be able to debate this matter before the government presents them with a fait accompli and, given the importance of the positions the government must take, it seems undeniable that there is every advantage in having this Parliament debate this matter tonight.

The Speaker: As my colleague said, I did receive a letter from the Official Opposition House Leader.

[English]

I would like to consider everything that has been said and everything that has taken place concerning this topic. I will return to the House as soon as possible, but I will return today before the adjournment motion.

PETITIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition on behalf of 25 Manitobans.

The petition calls on the government to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a child care expense deduction that is available to all families regardless of the income level of the parents, the amount of child care expenses incurred or the form of the child care chosen.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions. The first bears 100 signatures of petitioners from my riding.

They pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition bears 125 signatures.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition also bears 100 signatures.

The petitioners pray that Parliament not repeal or amend section 241 of the Criminal Code in any way and to uphold the Supreme Court of Canada decision of September 30, 1993 to disallow assisted suicide or euthanasia.

• (1515)

JUSTICE

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and honour to present a petition on behalf of residents of Kamloops, Clear Water, Barriere, Vavenby, Chase, Logan Lake, Little Fort, Birch Island, Blue River, Savona, Westwold and Cherry Creek, which brings to a total of 87,422 signatures on a petition circulated by JC–55 SuperCountry radio in Kamloops.

The petition basically points out the need to have the Minister of Justice take whatever steps are necessary to amend Canada's Criminal Code and parole system to ensure safety and peace in our neighbourhoods.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition from citizens concerned about making our streets safer for the citizens of Canada. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences. They pray that we make our streets safer for law–abiding citizens and families of victims of convicted murderers.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present on behalf of approximately 125 residents of Canada. They point out that discrimination against lesbian, gay and bisexual Canadians exists in every region of Canada and that this is unacceptable in a country known for its commitment to human rights equality and dignity for all citizens. It calls upon Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and to adopt measures to recognize full equality of same sex relationships in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 181 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 181—Ms. Beaumier:

With respect to the Department of National Revenue's Assessment 2000 effort, (a) why is there a provision for backhauling from a CW licensed warehouse to a BW licensed warehouse in cases where the department will not grant a BW licence, and (b) what is the threshold in terms of volum of business for granting a BW rather than a CW licence where all other criteria have been met?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): A BW sufferance warehouse is a primary public facility licensed by Revenue Canada for the receipt of in bond freight imported by highway. These facilities are serviced by Revenue Canada and are licensed when a demonstrated need exists for either a new or additional highway sufferance warehouse in a customs area.

A CW sufferance warehouse is a secondary facility for the private use of an operator for the deconsolidation of in bond freight arriving by any mode of transportation. In the case of highway freight, goods must first be reported to the primary BW highway warehouse before being transferred to a CW warehouse for customs clearance. These facilities are operated by freight forwarders, consolidators and deconsolidators for freight carried in their system.

In reference to part (a) of the question, an increasing number of companies have been applying for CW sufferance warehouse licences in the Toronto area. Faced with limited resources, local Revenue Canada officials introduced a system to allow freight forwarders to backhaul goods requiring customs examination to the BW sufferance warehouse rather than having Revenue Canada provide the service to the CW facility. This arrangement has permitted the department to license additional CW warehouses since no on site customs service is required for examination purposes.

In reference to part (b) of the question, the policy on the licensing of BW highway sufferance warehouses is one per customs area, with exceptions made for high volume locations. Current departmental policy provides for the licensing of an additional type BW facility if the volume of commercial highway traffic handled at a particular customs office exceeds 40,000 shipments per year over a sustained period of time and the potential operator demonstrates the ability to attract a minimum of 20,000 shipments per year.

There is no volume of business criteria for CW facilities, however the department must be able to service them within existing resource levels.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to present a petition.

The Deputy Speaker: Are colleagues agreeable to going back to petitions so that the member can present his petition?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the residents of my riding of Souris—Moose Mountain, I have the privilege under Standing Order 36 to pray on behalf of the petitioners that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK OF CANADA ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise today to speak to Bill C–91 on second reading.

Through this bill, the government wants to streamline the Federal Business Development Bank and modernize its operations, two words that are undoubtedly tied to the reality of markets as we near the end of this century, but which fool nobody as far as the intentions of the federal government are concerned. The government simply wants to interfere even more in regional development, and in the case of Quebec, to increase its presence in the most important economic development mechanisms of the Quebec state.

The government is proposing major changes with this entirely new act, the Business Development Bank of Canada Act, which changes the name of the Federal Business Development Bank and repeals the FBDB Act.

The Bloc Quebecois is therefore opposed to any amendment of the actual Federal Business Development Bank Act. This bank must not lose its role as banking service of last resort for small and medium size businesses in Quebec looking for venture capital and development capital.

In the past, the FBDB has always been a very efficient development tool, greatly appreciated by Quebec's small and medium size businesses.

• (1520)

It should be noted that more than 33 per cent of current FBDB loans are made in Quebec, that 23 per cent of the bank's offices are located in Quebec, that the annual volume of FBDB loans to Quebec is in the order of $310 million, or 38 per cent of the annual volume for the whole of Canada, and that 50 per cent of the organization's staff is active in Quebec.

That is why the Bloc Quebecois is proposing the status quo with respect to the FBDB. We should not forget that the Quebec state exists and that it is trying to create its own development mechanisms, despite strong federal interference in regional economic development. The FBDB remains a parallel structure, an administrative duplication, when it cannot adapt to regional specificity because of so–called national policies.

Several structures and programs of the government of Quebec are already geared to small and medium size enterprises in Quebec. The Société de développement industriel (SDI), with programs such as Aide à la production, which can contribute up to 35 per cent of capital expenditures for a minimum investment of $100,000, or Reprise de la PME, a program which provides loan guarantees covering up to 80 per cent of the net loss on a loan made by a financial institution, are among the many examples that attest to the economic involvement of the Quebec state in small and medium size businesses.

There is also the Fonds d'aide aux entreprises that is administered by the Conseils régionaux de développement, an association of individuals where a greater importance can be given to the specific policies of these same regions. There is also the Fonds décentralisés de création d'emplois that are administered by the Secrétariat au développement des régions, and other programs for small businesses, including Innovation, administered by the Quebec department of industry, commerce, science and technology, that also attest to the existence of a small business financing structure in the province of Quebec.

Moreover, in his last budget, Quebec finance minister Jean Campeau announced that he intends to really play the venture–capital card by increasing regional funds and by creating the Fonds de solidarité de la CSN. We already had the FTQ solidarity fund. By adding another solidarity fund, we expect to be able to create many more jobs. I would like mention one of these regional funds in particular: SOLIDE, a venture capital fund related to the SOLIDEQ program and designed to promote local development. SOLIDEQ is a joint venture of the Fonds de solidarité du Québec and the Union des municipalités régionales de comté du Québec.

I must also mention the Caisses populaires Desjardins, which play a major role in financing small business by granting loans at the local community level. This network of more than 1,232 credit unions accounts for nearly 25 per cent of all commercial loans in Quebec. This is unequalled anywhere in Canada.

There is no point in looking for more evidence of the fact that the new bank will not operate at that level, that broadening the Federal Business Development Bank's mandate as suggested in Bill C–91 constitutes not only duplication of small business assistance structures in Quebec and every other province in Canada, but also overlap of responsibilities.

The question we must ask ourselves regarding the role of the FBDB in Quebec is: How can this last resort institution be integrated into the assistance facilities already available in Quebec without causing duplication or overlap? For many years now, the FBDB has been moving away from venture capital financing and development assistance for new businesses.

The FBDB had its place in remote areas, where capitalization through the creation of medium or large size businesses often proves impossible. Why then mess with this assistance that remote areas need so desperately and start competing with provincial governments and traditional banking institutions?

The Bloc Quebecois members sitting on the Standing Committee on Industry prefaced their dissenting report by saying that the Quebec government is in a better position to assess the financial requirements of small and medium size businesses, as well as to develop and implement appropriate programs; yet, the federal government has currently taken over most of this area of jurisdiction, thereby causing many costly instances of overlap. It is obvious that, with Bill C–91 broadening the FBDB's mandate, the federal government is only reinforcing this tendency.

Furthermore, this bill could also have a very worrisome impact on the FBDB's role as an instrument for economic development. Indeed, since the bank will no longer be limited to its role of lender of last resort, it could provide complementary financing.

The risk, of course, is that the FBDB might go the easy way and concentrate on complementary financing, rather than on last resort financing such as stock or risk capital. Since complementary financing is less risky, the FBDB may naturally be inclined to concentrate its activities on that type of financing.

The expansion of FBDB's mandate, combined with the fact that it will now be able to issue hybrid capital instruments, is likely to distort the bank's role of supporting economic development, while also changing the nature of its mandate.

Before concluding, I want to draw the members' attention to clauses 20 and 21 of Bill C–91, which are totally unacceptable to the provinces, and particularly Quebec. Clause 20 reads: "The Bank may enter into agreements with, and act as agent for, any department or agency of—a province—for the provision of services or programs—on their behalf—"

That provision in the bill goes against the decentralization process undertaken by the Quebec state within its territory, where the regions want to take control of their own development.

With this clause, the federal government pursues its centralizing strategy, a political strategy the objective of which is to significantly reduce the power of the Quebec state to become involved in economic development and, ultimately, to keep it from achieving political independence.

By assuming the right to act, through the FBDB, as agent for Quebec organizations or departments, the federal government totally ignores the authority of Quebec's National Assembly and its executive council act, which provides that any Quebec organization or department must seek the authorization of the Quebec government prior to dealing with the federal government.

The new Federal Business Development Bank, or the Business Development Bank of Canada as it is called in Bill C–91, is now the federal government's main means of interfering in Quebec's economic and regional development. This government wants to act as a banker and take over the role of financial institutions in Quebec and Canada.

This is a definite departure from the FBDB's current mandate. The federal government wants to use the FBDB as a tool to limit the powers of the Quebec state to become involved in economic and regional development so as to take over provincial fields of jurisdiction and, ultimately, weaken the Quebec government's autonomy.

This is why the Bloc Quebecois opposes Bill C–91 and is in favour of maintaining the existing structure if the government is not prepared to propose new ways which would truly promote regional development and which would also help the regions take control of their development.

[English]

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add some observations about Bill C–91 before the legislation is sent to the Standing Committee on Industry.

[Translation]

This new bill will enable the Business Development Bank of Canada to expand its activities and to provide programs and services to meet the changing needs of Canadian small business, particularly with respect to improved access to financing.

[English]

It has been 20 years since the current Federal Business Development Bank was established by legislation. At that time the hon. member for Windsor West spoke in the House on the incorporation of the FBDB saying it would further encourage and assist the establishment and growth of Canadian small business and indeed it has. The bank has lent over $4 billion to Canadian entrepreneurs at no cost to taxpayers. This amount is estimated to have created more than 30,000 jobs in the past six years alone.

• (1530)

Hon. members are well aware of the important role small businesses play in the new knowledge based economy that has emerged in the 1990s, an economy characterized by rapid technological change, intense global competition and innovation.

As the economy becomes global the smaller players are becoming more influential. Small businesses have the flexibility to respond quickly to niche market opportunities; they can keep up with change and innovate aggressively. This was summarized by the Standing Committee on Industry in its report last October entitled "Taking Care of Small Business". The committee wrote: "The smallness of these firms is a clear advantage. It makes it easier for them to sustain innovation and an entrepreneurial spirit. Indeed, several of the most prosperous and competitive economies in the world today are based on small firms."

Canada now has about two million small businesses, an increase of one–third since 1982. Today, 99 per cent of all registered businesses have fewer than 100 employees. Since 1992, in the last three years, small businesses have created virtually all of the net new jobs in Canada. Canadians will continue to look to small business for new jobs and economic growth. Small businesses, including the self–employed, now account for almost two–thirds of private sector employment and 60 per cent of our economic output.

However, small businesses face unprecedented challenges. In the face of intense global competition, small businesses need to upgrade their management skills, find employees with the right skills mix for their market niche, develop or acquire technology that helps them to innovate, and develop very quickly the ability to tap into foreign markets.

The government has addressed small business issues in a variety of ways. I will point out that this government has placed a high priority on responding to the challenges faced by small businesses. We made small businesses the centre of our economic platform in the red book. We published a position paper entitled "Growing Small Businesses" to accompany the 1994 budget. Since that time we have received valuable input on small business issues from a wide variety of informed sources from within government, the private sector, and parliamentary groups.

We have had numerous combined discussions within our federal Liberal caucus, a working group set up under Industry Canada with the private sector and leadership from within Industry Canada. Throughout these various studies several recurring themes emerged. One message was that small business has a vast untapped potential for creating more jobs and more wealth. Another theme was the government role must be to facilitate the efforts of those outside government to build an innovative and entrepreneurial economy. Finally, the various studies brought home the point that government programs must become more efficient, effective and relevant to the needs of small business.

This government has responded through initiatives announced in the 1995 budget and in the report, "Building a More Innovative Economy". This legislation is not in a vacuum; it is in the context of a whole series of initiatives to allow small business to do what business does best, which is to grow the economy, grow new opportunities and new jobs for Canadians.

The Federal Business Development Bank has from its inception been designed to help tap the potential of small businesses to create jobs and wealth, and it has done so in a way that is self–financing. This legislation has been drafted so the new Business Development Bank of Canada can become more efficient, more effective, more relevant to the needs of small business.

The Business Development Bank of Canada will not compete with private sector lending institutions but it will provide complementary services.

• (1535)

The private sector banking community still faces many challenges in adequately serving the needs of small and medium–sized businesses. Four gaps particularly exist in the financing of small business. The first is the so–called risk gap, the unwillingness of lending institutions to provide certain small businesses loans even at interest rates that reflect the higher risks associated with those loans. The second is the size gap, the high transaction costs associated with smaller loans and investments relative to larger ones. Third is the knowledge gap, the reluctance of lenders to provide financing to knowledge based, soft asset firms. Finally, the flexibility gap, the unwillingness of lenders to provide flexible financing to promising businesses that have yet to reach cashflows sufficient to service debts.

The FBDB has been one of the government's primary policy instruments for responding to these gaps as well as to the need of small business for management services.

It is important that we move quickly on this legislation. I do not think there is a member of Parliament in the House who does not regularly hear from and meet with small business constituents who say consistently that lending, financing, dealing with their bank is a major problem for them. There has been a substantial change in that relationship. Whether it is an existing small business that has been going for many years and suddenly finds itself in a different situation because of a changing economy or whether it is a new entrepreneur wanting to start up and needing the foundation to get started, the problems we hear from our constituents, and certainly I do from many small businesses in Ottawa West, all focus around the problem of financing, either start–up or continuing or expanding business.

The initiatives being taken to give the Federal Business Development Bank more flexibility under its new name to allow it to seek out new partnerships will allow it to ensure that small business can continue to drive the Canadian economy forward into the 21st century. By supporting small businesses through the evolving stages of their development, the FBDB helps them create jobs and succeed. Now as the Business Development Bank of Canada it will have greater flexibility to respond to the changing needs of Canadian entrepreneurs.

I look forward to the range of debate that can take place in the industry committee on this bill and to seeing it reported back to the House of Commons quickly so that we can get on with the task of helping small business in this country grow the economy and grow prosperity for Canadians.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT ACT

The House resumed from May 19 consideration of the motion that Bill C–82, an act to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

• (1540)

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: When we last examined Bill C–82, there were 12 minutes remaining to the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege today to speak to Bill C–82, a bill that would see the Canadian Mint issue a new coin for use by Canadians. This would be a $2 coin to replace a $2 bill.

There apparently was a survey done by the mint that stated that Canadians would support converting the $2 bill to a $2 coin. It also stated that if this was implemented it would save Canadian taxpayers $250 million. It may seem odd that perhaps Reform would oppose a cost saving measure, but I do not think the whole story was told when this survey was implemented. It almost seemed like a bit of a fixed survey. Obviously the $2 bill is costing Canadian taxpayers because of its short shelf life. However, there were a lot of questions that were not asked in the survey such as whether Canadians are in favour of having a $2 denomination at all. Do we need a $2 denomination? In fact if we were to remove the $2 bill and not replace it with a $2 coin we would save even more dollars. However, I do not believe that option was included in the survey the mint used.

I think it is important that we not let this thing quickly slip through but that we do point out that perhaps there were some flaws in the survey and we do need to consider this matter a little further.

Before I get into this, it does surprise me that this is a high priority on the government's legislative agenda, that we are talking about the minting of a $2 coin. The House denied unanimous consent to debate the Bosnia situation. I guess the government members felt that the debate of a $2 coin was more important than our concern for our peacekeepers in Bosnia, because this is on the Order Paper and we are debating it now rather than debating the work of our peacekeepers in that very ugly situation.

One would have thought the government would have hurried the drunk defence bill through committee and to the floor of the House so we could debate that. There are several justice bills that the government tabled months and months ago. However, it seems to be willing to let them lay dormant until the very end of the session. It must want to just ram this legislation through at the end of the session to try to avoid public exposure to its bills.

Here we are today, very near the end of the month of May with just a few sitting days left and we are debating the minting of a $2 coin. I wonder what Canadians think of the Liberal government's priorities in this case. One would think that it would be more important to be talking about balancing a budget than creating new coins. This is just more money to go into the hole with. It is really strange that we are debating the minting of a $2 coin.

There has been lots of discussion as to what will be on this coin. I may get to that later in my speech. However, I do want to talk a bit about the survey the Royal Canadian Mint submitted. Approximately 80 per cent of respondents in the survey favoured the introduction of a $2 coin to replace the $2 bill. However, as I said, this result was achieved only after telling Canadians that they would be saved $250 million of their own taxpayers' money.

The Reform Party is not questioning the fact that the government will save the $250 million, which is over 20 years by the way, but we are having a problem with the Liberal government not taking the time to examine particularly what the cost would be to the private sector. At odd times the government pays lip service to the private sector and says it is supportive of the private sector. But when the rubber hits the road, actions always speak louder than words. Here we go again: the Liberal government is making a proposition that will cost the private sector a big bundle of their own cash.

My colleague from Elk Island outlined many of the different groups that were not consulted in this survey and that had opposition to the bill. The vending machine operators will take the brunt of the cost. It is vending machine operators who are dependent on coinage in their machines. The conversion of existing vending machines to accept the new $2 coins could cost up to $800 per machine. That is an additional cost to the private sector, small business.

What will it do with these added costs? Will it swallow them and see lost profit? I doubt it very much. Business is usually a little smarter than that. It will more than likely pass that cost on to the consumer. It will come out of the same old pocket again. The consumer taxpayer will be paying not only for the minting of this coin but the additional cost passed on by the vendors.

It is interesting to note that soft drink manufacturers such as Pepsi and Coca Cola are furious about the changes. Vending machine operators have still not converted all of their machines to accept the loonie. It has been eight years since the loonie was introduced. We still do not have all the vending machines accepting loonies and now we are talking about minting a $2 coin and all of the vending machines have to be adjusted to accept the new coinage.

The Canadian Banking Association has concerns. I know there is a member on the other side who was involved with the Canadian Banking Association. It has some real problems with issuing the new $2 coin. It estimates that right now it has between 30 and 50 million surplus loonies in its vaults. That is a lot of money. If those are recirculated perhaps we would not need a $2 minted coin.

Heather Sinclair, president of the Canadian Banking Association, suggested recirculation of the surplus loonies would provide all the coins needed during the removal of the $2 bill from circulation. We may be able to save Canadian taxpayers much more than $250 million if we take a longer look at this and do the right thing. The cost of this survey was approximately $20,000. It seems a shame to spend $20,000 on a survey that was incomplete and perhaps leads us to the wrong conclusions.

In the survey the mint also asked what 10 themes Canadians would prefer on the tail side of the coin. That is an interesting question to ask Canadians. I can imagine some of the answers. I imagine dead politicians were on the list, perhaps heroes, wildlife, landscapes. I wonder if anyone suggested putting Brian Mulroney's picture on the $2 coin. Nobody would use it in that case. It would be a symbol of bad luck, bad taste and would settle the matter right there and the coin would not be issued.

It seems the government wants to mint a new $2 coin and that this bill will follow the usual passage through the various stages. The Liberals will line up and like little voting machines they will vote for this piece of legislation without giving it very much consideration and we will have a $2 coin.

A number of groups have proposed designs for the new $2 coin. Some of them are rather plausible and certainly have some credibility. Others we kind of smile at a little and say we doubt very much whether Canadians would want that image stamped on to the new $2 coin. Apparently Glendon, Alberta has proposed the new coin take on the likeness of the town's symbol, a giant perogie on a giant fork. That would be great. We also have a big oil can in the town of Rocanville, Saskatchewan. I do not know if it has submitted that but it would be another worthy suggestion. There is the Ukrainian Easter egg from Vegreville. I am sure if we had the former finance minister with us that would be his suggestion.

I thought of a great Canadian symbol, probably the greatest symbol we have of a white elephant in Canada, the Mirabel airport. I do not know how we would stamp Mirabel airport on a $2 coin, but I am sure our former Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, would be very happy to see that stamped on a $2 coin in memory of his great project, probably the most under used airport in Canada.

We know the minister of public works is looking at a number of plausible suggestions for design on his coin. Perhaps the minister would want a dingy on it. Perhaps the minister of fisheries would want a turbot on it. If it were a turbot we would have to make sure it was not a small one. I am sure the minister would insist on a sexually mature turbot. That would be only reasonable.

• (1550)

We know the Liberal government is to implement this new design. It is very unlikely it will change its mind. It seems to be bent on minting a new $2 coin. I thought in all seriousness, if the House goes against my wishes and decides to mint a new $2 coin without looking further at the cost perhaps it would be time to have a prairie symbol stamped on a coin. The prairies have often been overlooked and they have much to contribute to the national perspective. We have contributed a great amount of money to the national economy, as my hon. colleague from Lethbridge has said. Canadians hold the prairies in high esteem and it is only fitting the new $2 coin, if it is passed by the House, be stamped with a prairie symbol.

I am sure even hon. colleagues from Ontario and Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and our western maritime province in the north realize they have had their fair share of symbols stamped on our currency. Perhaps it would be time to show some more recognition to the prairie region.

I have a proposal for the new coin. It is in the image of a white tailed deer. These deer are common species on the prairies. They are one of the primary game animals of the region. They are still plentiful across the prairies and can be found in northern Ontario and northern Quebec.

They are beautiful animals. They are enjoyed by sportsmen, by shutterbugs, by artists and by nature lovers alike. They are synonymous with Canadian history and the development of the prairie region. They helped sustain our aboriginal peoples long before white man even discovered the prairie region.

They were important to the pioneers who settled the area in the late 19th century. They are very much an appreciated species on the prairies.

White tailed deer hunting brings more money into Saskatchewan than any other hunting or fishing activity. The Saskatchewan ministry of the environment and resource management calculates $800,000 per year is put into provincial coffers alone from the sale of deer licences and a further $3 million is brought into the province each year by out of province and out of country hunters.

In 1993 a constituent of mine, Mr. Milo Hansen of Biggar, Saskatchewan, a progressive community in the Kindersley—Lloydminister constituency, was fortunate enough to shoot the world record white tailed buck. The old record was set in Nebraska in 1914.

That is an incredible accomplishment on the part of Mr. Hansen. It has become famous in my part of the world and it needs some national exposure. Since the Hansen buck was taken, hunting activity in the area has increased and more American hunters are coming to Canada.

A new $2 coin featuring the Hansen buck would be a fitting way to commemorate this internationally acclaimed achievement of my constituent.

Here are some historical reasons why a prairie symbol should adorn the new coin. While other parts of Canada have been represented on our coins in the past, none have strictly represented the prairies. For example, the maple leaf on the penny and the beaver on the nickel represent central Canada for the main part. The sailing ship on the dime, the beautiful and famous Bluenose, represents the Atlantic region. The moose on the quarter and the loon on the dollar represent the Canadian shield in the north. Putting a prairie symbol on the new $2 coin would create a regional balance on our nation's coins.

I understand the mint has done some public consultation about the nature of the new coin and I trust the continuing tradition of representing Canadian wildlife remains a popular option. I assure the House that the town of Biggar, Saskatchewan is supporting this proposal, as are many other Saskatchewan and prairie members of Parliament.

The Hansen buck is truly a great Canadian achievement and therefore I propose the new coin be designed in the image of a white tailed deer as nearly as possible in the minting of coins to the actual Hansen buck. I have a poster of it in my office. If any members would like to see this beautiful animal they are more than welcome to stop by. I would be very happy and very proud to show them how beautiful this specimen is.

I have been a bit facetious in some of my remarks about some of the potential images that could go on the coin. Probably we should not even mint the coin unless we are absolutely sure Canadians understand all the alternatives.

If that does not happen, if that dialogue is not permitted, if the mint goes ahead with this plan after it is approved by the House I would ask the House and the mint, the department of public works, to give serious consideration first and foremost to a prairie symbol being on the coin. Second, if it pleases Canadians, members of the House and the mint, and I hope it would, I ask they give serious consideration to stamping an image of the Hansen buck on the new $2 coin.

• (1555)

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster.

First of all, I would like to remind him that during the last election campaign and in our red book we undertook to reduce the deficit, and we believe that by introducing this new $2 coin we will realize some extremely interesting profits on the order of $250 million.

I am a little confused because, since their arrival in the House, the members of the Reform Party have repeatedly told us that we must make cuts in every way possible and now what do I hear but this member and the member for Elk Island telling us "yes, but". The member for Elk Island actually said that the Reform Party would go so far as to vote against the bill. I can hardly believe my ears, and I would like some further explanation from my colleague.

As for vending machines, it should be pointed out that operators will not be obliged to conform immediately to the new legislation and adjust to the new coinage.

It should also be said that vending machine operators will undoubtedly take the opportunity to increase their profits, since this $2 coin will make it possible to offer complete meals, that is meals that will cost a bit more. With the new technology, it will be possible to have hot meals, just as it will be possible to have larger refrigerated meals.

I ask my colleague, in all fairness to the Canadian men and women listening to us, to comment on what I have just said.

I would also like to say that during the survey done with respect to this $2 coin, Canadians were split almost equally in their response to the first question concerning their wish to have such a coin. In response to the second question, which pointed out that there would be savings of $250 million over twenty years, the percentage in favour rose sharply to 79 per cent. I would like my colleague's comments on this matter.

[English]

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. I took a stab at answering that question in my speech but I would be happy to review some of those facts with the hon. member.

As I said in my speech, all the options were not considered in that survey. We really should have asked Canadians whether they felt there should be a $2 currency at all. Maybe we should eliminate the $2 bill, which is very expenses, and not replace it with a $2 coin. Perhaps in five years with inflation having done its thing there would be a recommendation for a $5 coin. Then we would have to revamp all the vending machines, mint a new coin and go through the procedure once again.

We should be talking how we can save Canadian taxpayers the most money. I suggest in that consideration we look at whether there should be a $2 currency period, coin or bill. If it were determined we do not need that it would save much more than $250 million. That is what I was trying to get across to hon. members on the other side, had they been listening a little more closely.

• (1600)

Another thing we should be looking at is whether we still need the penny in Canada. Pennies are extremely expensive. We have been minting pennies because people hoard them. Pennies are put into jars and never get back into circulation. It is even worse than the loonie which apparently is being stored in bank vaults. There are millions of them.

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY DEBATE

BOSNIA—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: My colleagues, forgive me for interrupting the answer. Of course, the hon. member will have the floor when we have finished.

Earlier today we had a request from the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Roberval and I am prepared to make my ruling in the application for an emergency debate.

I have listened carefully to the application of the hon. members for Red Deer and Roberval under Standing Order 52 for an emergency debate on the current crisis in Bosnia–Hercegovina. I have decided that the two applications do meet the exigencies stipulated in Standing Order 52. Consequently a debate will take place this day at 8 p.m.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

There have been conversations among the parties in the House in anticipation of the ruling of the Speaker. I think you would find unanimous consent that the debate commence at 6.30 p.m. rather than 8 p.m. and that the debate finish at 10.30 p.m. rather than at midnight. The effect would be to have the usual four hours for the emergency debate but to allow for the debate to proceed immediately after adjournment at 6.30 p.m.

Mr. Speaker, if you were to offer that to the House, I believe you would find in the spirit of co–operation that such an agreement has been made among the parties and you would find consent to commence the debate at the time I have just suggested and to end it accordingly.

The Speaker: My colleagues, you have heard the explanation of the government whip. Is there unanimous agreement that the debate do begin at 6.30 p.m. and terminate at 10.30 p.m. this day?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–82, an act to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I was speaking about the penny in answering the hon. member's question. I suggested we should view whether or not we need the penny in circulation because it is of an extremely high cost to Canadians because they hoard them.

The real problem why we need the penny is rather ironic. It is because we have the GST which adds 7 per cent to everything. The Liberals promised to do away with the GST. I am sure that retailers and businesses across the country would be happy to deal in increments of 5 cents and we could do away with the penny. But how do they not charge GST on 39 cents or 59 cents of goods? If the government had kept its promise to eliminate the GST, perhaps we could be talking about not only doing away with the $2 currency but doing away with the penny as well and saving considerably more than $250 million for Canadian taxpayers and consumers.

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that a bimetallic $2 coin requires new technology. My opinion is it would be a terrific advantage. The Royal Canadian Mint and Canadian suppliers are working together to compete for foreign production contracts for bimetallic coins.

I would be interested to hear from the hon. member about the advantages and the source of revenue this might provide.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I tried to follow the question but I missed a little bit of it there.

• (1605)

It seemed to me that the hon. member was talking about the opportunities to market the minting of coins which would stimulate jobs and would have some economic spinoff. Certainly, if we can do that internationally that is fine. If the Mexicans want to mint a new peso and they ask us to provide the technology, that is wonderful. If we can have a long term plan to improve the minting of our own Canadian coin that would be wonderful.

However, there are flaws with this survey. It states that there are two main concerns with the implementation of the $2 coin. First, it seems as though there is no overall strategy with regard to our currency. We are talking about different weights and the fact that we may have to re–mint all of our coins. Why are we going to implement a new $2 coin and then find out that we have to change our loonie, quarter, nickel and dime because the weights are not right?

It is going to be a cruel joke on Canadian business. Certainly it will be a cruel joke on those who are manufacturing vending machines because they are going to have to refit those machines annually or every two or three years. It is just not well thought out. We also have to consider the cost to the Canadian consumer which would be immense, far more than $250 million and far more than any economic stimulus generated by the minting of new coins in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Asselin (Charlevoix, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise in the House today to speak about Bill C–82, an act to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act.

Allow me to begin my speech with a digression. I am making my comments in the House of Commons today as the Bloc Quebecois' deputy critic for Government Services and Public Works; the Bloc Quebecois' main critic for this department is the hon. member for Québec–Est, Jean–Paul Marchand.

As deputy critic and member for Charlevoix, it is my pleasure to take the floor regarding this bill. I may be present in the House today, but my thoughts are elsewhere. In my riding, workers are threatened by the closure of employment centres in La Malbaie, Forestville and Baie–Comeau. I am also thinking of all of the problems associated with unemployment in my riding, which affect all workers, unemployed persons and welfare recipients in the RCM of Charlevoix East and West.

The parliamentary secretary may feel that this has no bearing on the bill. If he lets me continue, he will realize that what the people of Charlevoix want is to work in order to have money in their pockets, whether it be in the form of a bill or a coin. This is a superficial issue and, in my opinion, discussing whether the denomination is made of paper or another material is a waste of time: the people of Charlevoix are concerned with working and earning money.

I would also like to remind the parliamentary secretary of what he mentioned earlier to the Reform member regarding the red book, and I would ask him to reread the three little words which got the government elected: "jobs, jobs, jobs". Closing employment centres, declaring the employees of manpower centres surplus and determining unemployment zones will not stimulate local economies.

If this legislation is passed, the two dollar bill will be replaced by a two dollar coin at the beginning of 1996. All two dollar bills will be returned to the Bank of Canada for disposal. The federal government can only introduce this new two dollar coin if it obtains Parliament's approval, since the proportion of nickel, bronze and aluminum in this new coin is not specified in Part II of the schedule to the Royal Canadian Mint Act.

If Part II of the schedule to the Royal Canadian Mint Act already specified the coin's composition, the government would not be required to obtain Parliament's approval prior to minting it.

• (1610)

The government's main argument in an effort to get the House to adopt the bill is that the introduction of a $2 coin will generate savings of approximately $250 million over 20 years. They do say every little bit counts, but, taken over 20 years, this amount is almost negligible compared with the amount of the deficit.

In its information paper, the Royal Canadian Mint states that the introduction of a $2 coin, which, in passing, will be larger and heavier than the $1 coin, serves the needs of business. They should have said, "some businesses", because not all business people look kindly on this bill. The proof lies in the fact that the federal government had to conduct two surveys of businesses and consumers, since the results of the first survey were not in favour of introducing the $2 coin.

The surveys were done by the Environics firm. It surveyed 1,020 people in Sherbrooke, Toronto and Calgary—far too few in my estimation. The first survey revealed strong opposition of 46 per cent and weak support of 50 per cent. In the second survey, they let it be known that the federal government would save $250 million over 20 years. The government's project then received the approval of 80 per cent of respondents.

Clearly the Royal Canadian Mint wanted immediate public support for the introduction of a $2 coin. Further on in the report, we note that some survey respondents felt that any saving made by introducing a $2 coin would be offset by the start up costs of producing the new coin and that jobs would be lost in the pulp and paper industry as a result.

The government report also indicates, and I quote: "The introduction of the $1 coin was accompanied by increased use of the $2 bill, indicating that the public might resist the introduction of a $2 coin".

Given that the trial coin chosen for the new $2 coin is heavier and larger than the loonie, I am sure the public will not support the introduction of such a coin.

Here is a surprising point about the survey questions. At no point did the Environics survey include a question about completely eliminating the $2 denomination. It is a bit odd, is it not? Instead of introducing a $2 coin, the federal government should simply eliminate the bill and the $2 denomination and encourage people to use the loonie more.

Many countries, such as the United States and Great Britain, have never had a $2 denomination or have simply done away with it. So, we can certainly do without it.

This is how the federal government could make real savings. There would be no new coin to strike nor new bills to print for the Royal Canadian Mint. There would be no expense for retailers. And, finally, better use would be made of the $1 coins. The Canadian Bankers' Association speaking on behalf of the financial institutions, has reached the same conclusion. What is more, many retailers' and consumers' associations have no official position on Bill C–82, quite simply because they do not know the government is preparing to introduce a $2 coin. They have heard nothing about it and are surprised to discover that the bill has gone so far.

• (1615)

Once again, the government seems to be trying to pull the wool over our eyes, if I may say so. If it had really wanted to take the pulse of the nation, it would have launched an information campaign on the possibility of legislating the replacement of the $2 bill by a $2 coin. The response to such proposed legislation would certainly have been negative. People are still having a hard time accepting the loonie, and eight years later, the government wants to burden their pockets with yet another coin.

Contrary to what the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Public Works and Government Services would have had us believe, last week, the $1 coin is not as popular as the government would like it to be. The proof is that more than 50 million $1 coins lay dormant in the vaults of Canadian banks. According to its own management, the Royal Canadian Mint must manufacture 1.25 times more $1 coins than it did $1 bills, because people empty their pockets, stockpile the coins at home, and then deposit them inn their bank or credit union account. It is estimated that there are around $10 million worth of $1 coins in Canadians' piggy banks. This is really incredible. Subsequently, financial institutions must store these coins in their vaults. I have trouble imagining the amount of space necessary to store all these coins and the personnel required to handle this job.

Moreover, I would like to point out to my colleagues that financial institutions do not earn interest on the coins they have in their vaults, which translates into lost revenues for them, and that they cannot return them to the Bank of Canada. It does not take back uncirculated coins, and banks and credit unions will have to manage their own stock of coins.

Although the government is anticipating savings of $250 million over 20 years, one should not forget that there are costs associated with the introduction of this new coin. We only have to think of all the cash registers, the vending machines, the parking meters, and the laundromat machines, and other automated dispensers of all kinds which will have to be modified in order to accept this new coin.

The government estimates that it will cost $25 million to modify vending machines. Owners, for their part, will have had to modify their machines twice in less than 10 years since, as you may recall, the federal government introduced the $1 coin—also known as the loonie—eight years ago. And if that was not enough, the government now wants to alter the composition of the penny, the nickel, the dime, the quarter and the fifty cent coin to make them lighter. This will entail the additional cost of altering vending machines so that they can take all Canadian coins whatever their composition. In addition, the alloy used for the penny would be of much lower quality than the current version. This will result in premature rusting of the coin.

Who will pay for all these changes? You and I, Mr. Speaker, along with all Quebecers and Canadians. The items now available for $1.75 or $1.90 from vending machines will cost $2 tomorrow, as happened after the $1 coin was introduced, when the cost of items formerly priced at 80 or 90 cents quickly rose to $1. This point was also raised by the people polled by Environics. As usual, the government passes the cost of the changes on to retailers, who can only pass it on to their customers.

In conclusion, I suggest that the federal government should launch a publicity campaign aimed at finding out the opinion of the Canadian people on this issue. However, the government must play fair and promote all possible alternatives, that is, to issue a new $2 coin, keep the $2 bill or simply eliminate the $2 denomination.

I am sure that, in the end, the people would choose to abolish the $2 denomination in order to achieve greater savings in the short, medium and long term. Finally, with the developments in debit card technology, people will see a gradual reduction in the number of bills and coins in circulation, as they are being replaced with electronic money.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what my hon. colleague from Charlevoix said, and I note that he recognizes that substantial savings, to the tune of $250 million, will be made.

Must I point out at this time that, if this measure were also applied to the penny, nickel, dime, quarter and 50 cent coin, we would save an extra $500 million? That is a rather significant amount.

I must say that the technological know–how gained while producing this new $2 coin will certainly be used in the future for other Canadian coins and, as a bonus, we can export this technology anywhere in the world for a profit.

Although my hon. colleague from Charlevoix did not refer to it specifically, I would like to address the initial remarks made by the public works critic, my hon. colleague for Québec–Est, who put forward extremely alarmist figures in his remarks, stating that it would cost coin–operated vending machine operators approximately $400 million to adjust to the introduction of the new $2 coin. I am sure that my hon. colleague from Charlevoix, who just spoke in support of his colleague from Québec–Est, will be able to explain to this House and to all Canadians where this $400 million figure comes from, so as to not scare people needlessly.

Vending machine operators will have a full year after this bill receives royal assent to adjust. Even then, they will not be required to do so. We must always bear in mind that any vending machine operator who decides to raise his prices will have to hold up to the competition.

I would like my hon. colleague from Charlevoix to comment on these two points, explaining where this $400 million figure comes from and whether competition should continue to come into play with respect to vending machines.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, first, it goes without saying that we support the idea of saving money; the government mentioned the figure of $250 million over a 20–year period by replacing two dollar bills with two dollar coins. True, the coin would last much longer; but there are costs involved in issuing such a new coin. The government does not need to issue another coin; it should simply abolish that denomination.

If the two dollar bill is replaced by a two dollar coin, it will result in savings of $250 million over 20 years, but how much would be saved if we issued more two dollar bills?

In reference to the figure of $400 million mentioned in the speech made on Friday by the Bloc critic, the hon. member for Québec–Est, Jean–Paul Marchand, it may be that I am missing some element, but I said that, in my opinion, it would be possible to save $25 million, in the short term.

I challenge anyone in this House to tell me just how much, give or take two dollars, it would cost the municipalities to make the necessary changes to their parking meters, not to mention such other items as vending machines. What would be the costs of such changes?

I doubt anyone here can provide such an accurate figure. However, before passing such legislation, we have to take a look at the costs involved for those who own vending machines. These costs will also be passed on to consumers. Indeed, consumers always end up footing the bill.

In conclusion, the government should seriously consider abolishing the two dollar denomination. This would help circulate the $10 billion in one dollar coins which are currently unused and kept in Canadian banks. The minute people have a couple of one dollar coins in their pocket, they exchange them for a two dollar bill, because they find these coins to be cumbersome.

Indeed, when we have a few of these coins, we quickly exchange them for bills. Consequently, if you add an even heavier and more cumbersome two dollar coin, you will create a problem for everyone, and that becomes a real nuisance.

[English]

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member. It would seem to me that if someone gets $4 in change, four loonies would certainly be heavier than two $2 coins, so I am having difficulty understanding that argument.

Has the hon. member taken into consideration in any of his numbers the value of the new technology and the advantages we as Canadians could receive from exporting such technology?

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I explained that earlier. Consumers are turning increasingly to electronic money, to cards from various financial institutions. We must get used to this technology. But I think that the purpose of today's debate is not to determine whether four loonies weigh more than two $2 coins. Let us get real.

We are ready to help the government reduce the deficit, and we are ready to eliminate the $2 denomination, and I am convinced that, in the interest of eliminating the deficit, the Canadian public will certainly agree. The loonie which was put into circulation eight years ago, can be used for a much longer period of time that the dollar bill it replaced. If we did away with the $2 denomination, the loonie could be used more effectively.

The United States and Great Britain have eliminated the $1 coin and the $2 bill and the two pound note. Let us follow their lead and we might save even more that what we are now contemplating. The government just decided one day to issue a $2 bill and today finds itself wondering whether this denomination continues to serve any purpose.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague for Charlevoix for taking such a responsible stance. He demonstrated, for example, that we in this House are reduced to discussing bills of this kind which are of little or no importance. This bill does not really create savings, will actually cost consumers money and, to top it off, does not even create any jobs. I agree that we should use more of our time to debate bills that are much more serious than this one.

I would also like to ask my colleague, if you will allow me Mr. Speaker, if in effect he can see any good in this bill? Regarding the $400 million he mentioned, we calculated that business people are going to have to buy new cash registers, that municipalities may have to install new parking meters and that all vending machines will have to be recalibrated and changed. This will cost the private sector a lot of money and consumers will ultimately foot the bill.

• (1630)

The consumer will be the one who pays. In fact, the only party that this bill will help is the Royal Canadian Mint. So I ask my colleague for Charlevoix if he can see anything good about this bill.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Québec–Est for his question. It has enabled me to digress and say that, this afternoon, I felt I was wasting my time in the House. I would have preferred to be in the riding of Charlevoix, working with the people there who are threatened with losing their jobs and who will be declared redundant as the result of the Axworthy reform.

I think we are wasting our time discussing such a trivial matter as the introduction of a $2 coin. We are not talking about the real problems of the economy. We are going to create problems. The purpose of government is to resolve problems, not to create them.

I am a bit embarrassed knowing that, in my riding of Charlevoix, the unemployed have mobilized to combat the Axworthy reform. Some of them are now on welfare. As I was saying, as far as paying for groceries is concerned, it makes little difference whether $2 is a bill or a coin; the main thing is to have some money. People are willing to work to earn some money.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, to start with, I would like to tell my colleague from Charlevoix that I am in complete agreement with him, especially on what he said in the conclusion of his speech. Not knowing that he would talk in the House about the workers in Charlevoix, and the relevance of the $2 coin, I will start my speech this way.

I was pleasantly surprised to hear that the Liberals had given in to the joint demands of the Bloc and of the Reform Party and agreed to an emergency debate on Bosnia, but not before this evening. In spite of the fact that 326 hostages, including 55 Canadians, are being held in Bosnia, that we have learned that the head of Bosnian diplomacy was killed yesterday, that the conflict has led to 200,000 deaths, that the Reform Party and the Bloc Quebecois are asking for an emergency debate to be held immediately on a matter of extreme urgency, we are told that there are too many emergencies, too many important debates, such as this one on the $2 coin.

We now know what the priorities of our colleagues opposite are. Canadians soldiers and UN troops have to take a back seat to the debate on the relevance of the $2 coin. In this context, I will be pleased to spend a few minutes discussing whether the $2 bill should be maintained or withdrawn from currency.

First, I would be pleased to provide you with a few facts and figures. Today, in Canada, it costs around $30 million a year to produce, print and issue $2 bills. They have approximately a one year life expectancy, some do not last as long, but the average life expectancy is around one year; as I said, the total cost of producing $2 bills is approximately $30 million.

So, we question and rightfully so—the thinkers and mandarins are probably conducting studies on the subject and they will spend tens of thousands of dollars, maybe millions—whether we should continue this great Canadian tradition of a $2 bill with the Queen's effigy.

A $2 coin could save $250 million over a 20–year period. Therefore, many Canadians will say: "Down with the $2 bill and up with the $2 coin which will make us save $250 million over 20 years". A simple decision.

However, we should go a little deeper and look at more rational arguments. Earlier we were talking about technology. If we do not proceed with a $2 coin will we still have nickels, dimes, quarters and loonies? Why not apply technology to this? Do not try to make us believe in a lot of things which make no sense.

First of all, the Royal Canadian Mint and it alone will save money, not you and me, not the taxpayers, not the merchants and certainly not the people operating vending machines.

• (1635)

There was no lobbying from vending machine manufacturers because the whole thing was obvious. We had estimations based on the same principle as the figures given to us earlier. As the member for Charlevoix said, it is estimated that the $2 coin will necessarily cost vending machine manufacturers around $300 million.

This is an estimate just as our colleagues opposite used the word "estimated" to say that there will be savings of around $250 million. Why an estimate? Because there has been no serious study on a change like the introduction of a $2 coin.

Therefore, I and the Bloc Quebecois propose to abolish the $2 bill or at least to undertake a serious study showing the real savings that could result from the replacement of the $2 bill with a $2 coin.

While bringing these changes to the Canadian monetary system we could take the opportunity to abolish the penny, which costs one and a half cents to produce. There are presently an estimated 10 billion of those coins in circulation. Ten billion one cent coins which cost one and a half cents each to produce. It is important to repeat it. Lets put an end to that waste by eliminating the one cent coin and the two dollar bill. For once the government could recover that money, that is tens of millions of dollars a year, and put it clearly and totally into a definite policy designed to create jobs and help the poor.

Tens of millions of dollars, even billions of dollars, are currently being cut in transfer payments to provinces and systems such as these will be allowed to continue.

What we are saying is that we will save tens of millions of dollars by abolishing the $2 bills, but instead of losing this amount in overall public spending, we should develop a good framework and put in place a specific program of job creation or assistance to poor people.

In view of the current economic and social situation, we have neither the right nor the means to invest funds in areas such as these, when thousands of our fellow citizens live below the poverty line and destitute people are knocking at our doors every day.

To quote only one example, a lady came to my riding office. This 62–year old lady cannot get old age benefits from the federal government and does not have any salary insurance because she never had a job. Many women of her generation stayed at home, so they are not eligible for salary insurance. So, this woman is getting welfare payments of $642 a month. She came to me asking: "Is there a solution to my problem?" Situations such as these, how many dozens are there in my riding, how many thousands are there in Quebec and in Canada? And here we are discussing changing $2 coins for paper bills. As my colleague for Charlevoix was saying earlier, I think that it is a shame to brag about such things in the House.

Do not tell me that the government has no other possibility or place to spend the savings that could be made, to help people like that woman or thousands of others in our ridings, rather than perpetuating a timeworn system or replace it with a system just as inappropriate, because the $2 coin would be inappropriate. Our American neighbours have no $2 bill, and they are not any worse off for it. The same can be said of other countries. It is a very easy system to understand.

The Royal Canadian Mint—someone talked earlier about the Royal Quebec Mint but there is no such thing—says its position is based on a survey. Before we go to the questions and comments period, it is important to put this survey in its true context. This survey was biased because of the questions it contained. You will ask how it was biased. Simply because it asked people if they were in favour of keeping the $2 bill or if they preferred to save tens of millions of dollars. People were never asked if they were in favour of abolishing the $2 denomination, because the answer was known already. Quebecers are used to biased surveys. They have seen many of them in the past.

People never had a chance to ask themselves if they were for or against the abolition of the $2 denomination. I am convinced that we cannot allow such a waste of public and private money at a time when our society faces serious problems and our country is sick.

• (1640)

My speech is a drop in the ocean of words spoken in this House on this debate. However, it is through such savings that we must show our concern for the population. If we wish to restore people's confidence in politics, politicians and the House of Commons, minor debates that may not seem very important can enable us to save tens of millions of dollars per year, as we have seen in this case, perhaps even hundreds of millions of dollars with one cent coins and two dollar bills, in order to ensure proper redistribution among our businesses, create jobs and help the disadvantaged, as I said earlier.

Concrete examples such as those I just listed would allow us to save millions of dollars and hopefully create thousands of jobs.

In closing, simply eliminating the $2 denomination would save some $30 million a year and the one cent coin, several millions of dollars. In addition, except for children with piggy banks, everyone would be happy not to have these coins in their pockets.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple question to ask my hon. colleague for Terrebonne. He nevertheless recognizes that rather substantial savings will be made, to the tune of $250 million. I would like to say a few words about the metal content of the new coin. It will be made of copper, aluminum and nickel. Would it be more acceptable to the Bloc members if the base material for this coin came from Quebec?

Mr. Sauvageau: Let me just say this to my hon. colleague that I do not know the periodical chart by heart; perhaps a chocolate coin wrapped in gold foil would be better. Seriously, our point is that the $2 coin your are proposing makes no sense. The people of Canada know it. Content—whether nickel, plutonium or what not—is not the issue, but rather the basis or rationale for this bill. Tell me which clause deals with coin alloys in the bill before us, then I will take your question seriously.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the recorded division on this motion stands deferred until 5.30 p.m. tomorrow.

AGREEMENT ON INTERNAL TRADE IMPLEMENTATION ACT

The House resumed from May 15 consideration of the motion that Bill C–88, an act to implement the agreement on internal trade, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I will finish the speech I started a couple of weeks ago on Bill C–88, an act to implement an agreement on internal trade.

Just to set the stage, Bill C–88 is like Bill C–85, which is the bill dealing with pension reform. There is a lot more fluff than real substance in this bill. Indeed it is another failure to deal with the serious problems that we have in Canada.

Past federal governments have preoccupied themselves with provincial concerns such as social programs. They have spent time rewriting our Constitution over and over while failing to live by the one already in place. They have stepped on provinces, taken their resource revenues and used them to fund their grant infrastructure projects, but they have not enforced the constitutional provisions which require free trade among provinces.

• (1645)

The federal government has also been and continues to be the instigator or accomplice in a number of interprovincial barriers. Because of various fiscal transfer programs such as regional development and block funding, Ottawa manages to hide the true costs to provincial residents of the barriers their provinces have erected.

If jobs are killed in one province due to barriers, then federal welfare dollars and federal grants to inefficient business help to alleviate the fiscal pain that a province would otherwise suffer. In fact, the more inefficient a province is, the more it is compensated by Ottawa. There is no incentive here for a province to correct its mistakes.

Ottawa also inhibits the free movement of labour. The unemployment insurance scheme the Liberals so cherish has provided incentives for the unemployed to remain in place rather than moving to regions where jobs are more plentiful. This is indisputably borne out by the facts.

For example, our Atlantic provinces continue to suffer from chronic higher unemployment than the rest of the country. This is due in most part to the incentive provided by unemployment insurance for the unemployed to remain in place. The problem is especially severe because in regions that do not fare worse than others, the federal government has increased the benefits available, sinking those who use the benefits further into dependency on the government.

We have been hearing for a long time now about social program reform and the wonderful job our human resources development minister is doing, but we have yet to see meaningful changes to the system that will actually give a hand up to Canadians rather than just a hand out. When this happens, consumers will see more clearly that certain provincial policies have worked to their detriment and that eliminating barriers is in everyone's best interests.

It is long past time for the federal government to take leadership on these issues. This problem is costing the economy billions of dollars and thousands of jobs. Yes, the Liberals were given a mandate to govern using the methods they find most appropriate, but this was based on a series of promised outcomes contained in the red book, most of which have been broken.

The red ink book promised: "A Liberal government will be committed to the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers within Canada and will address this issue urgently". Where is the elimination of trade barriers which was so clearly promised in the election rhetoric? Yes, it looks fairly certain that a few barriers may be reduced with this agreement but as I have already pointed out, new barriers could also arise.

We are a long, long way from barrier elimination. Based on the current pace of progress, we are not going to see this promise fulfilled by the next election. This is the time the Canadian people will have an opportunity to judge these Liberals for their failure to keep their promises. By then the Liberal inaction will have cost billions more dollars and will have prevented thousands of Canadians on the welfare and unemployment lists from finding meaningful employment.

Reformers have the policies and the people to implement a Canada–wide free trade plan. If the Liberals will not do this, then I believe the Canadian people will give Reformers the mandate to do it.

What are the problems I am talking about? Where are the barriers today? Obviously, I am not going to list each of the several hundred, but I would like to mention a few major barriers that must come down quickly.

The first barrier which comes to mind is one that has a large effect on employment in my riding. There is a modern brewery in Simcoe Centre that employs hundreds of Canadians. Over the years this brewery could have employed more people, expanded its operations and even become efficient enough to compete with major American brewers. This did not happen because its market has been restricted by trade walls erected by provinces, including Ontario, in an attempt to protect their local brewers.

The protectionism that insulated and sustained these inefficient brewers for so long will now be the death of many of them. International trade pressures are already forcing smaller, inefficient breweries out of business. Brewing is a $9.6 billion retail industry in Canada so even small reductions in production costs due to greater economies of scale will produce better prices for consumers and a more competitive economy.

To their credit, some brewers have taken the initiative and have used our external free trade agreements to their benefit. As a result, it is now easier to find certain New Brunswick brands of beer on store shelves in San Antonio and Los Angeles than it is to find them in Toronto or Montreal. It saddens me that this is the current twisted reality.

Unfortunately, the success story I just described has a downside at least for those breweries that are not ready to compete. American brewers are gaining more and more access to our domestic beer market through GATT, NAFTA and free trade and will force out those who cannot compete.

As an example, a single brewery in Colorado Springs, Colorado produces all the beer under a particular label for the entire United States market, a market of 250 million people. The facility is so large it ships bulk product 3,000 kilometres to Virginia for canning. Then it is distributed up and down the east coast of the United States. How can we expect breweries that produce only enough product for a few hundred thousand consumers to remain in business? It is difficult to compete with that economy of scale.

I believe Canadians wish to see these impediments to freedom done away with and receive the most efficient and economic value possible for their hard earned wages. Beer is such an obvious area of concern for consumers that I was amazed to learn the industry had been exempted from the provincial agreement altogether. We need to focus serious efforts in this area or risk losing thousands more jobs in an increasingly competitive world.

Another barrier of major importance that must be dealt with quickly is the barrier each province erects when conducting its own government procurement. The provinces have a long history of purchasing from within their own borders regardless of cost. This raises the cost of purchasing.

According to the Consumers' Association of Canada some provinces pay up to 10 per cent more for local products, which in turn raises government expenditure and taxes. It also costs jobs in other provinces because the most efficient producers cannot sell outside their own provinces. Some jobs may be protected locally but just like the brewing industry, these local producers are insulated and inefficient.

The higher taxes affect all Canadians and cost more jobs in total than attempting to protect the local industry they will save.

One writer on economics remarked 200 years ago: "It is the maxim of every prudent master of a family never to attempt to make at home what it will cost him more to make than to buy. The tailor does not attempt to make his own shoes, but buys them from the shoemaker. The shoemaker does not attempt to make his own clothes, but employs a tailor. The farmer attempts to make neither the one nor the other, but employs those who can.

"All of them find it for their interest to employ their whole industry in a way in which they have some advantage over their neighbours, and to purchase with part of its produce, whatever else they have occasion for. What is prudence in the conduct of every private family can scarce be folly in that of a great kingdom".

Adam Smith wrote that in The Wealth of Nations. Yet it would seem that centuries later our brilliant political elite has not yet been able to grasp this simple truth.

The industry minister attempted to achieve a deal on the issue of government procurement but due to the shortsightedness of some provinces their agreement was window dressing only. Crown corporations which do much of the procurement in question are completely exempt from this arrangement. With all the exemptions available elsewhere in the agreement it is unclear if there will be any meaningful improvement in government procurement either.

It is important that we make it a high priority to get the provinces back to the table and to remove these barriers to competitiveness. Interprovincial barriers to trade and financial services create once again a higher cost to consumers, cost financial institutions their competitive position and cost Canadians jobs.

This also affects another major employer of my riding, a trust company which finds restrictions on selling its services outside Ontario. Conversely, trusts from outside Ontario also find difficult and expensive barriers to entry to the Ontario financial markets.

Trust companies find barriers to trade in the different regulations each province sets up. A highest common denominator approach must be taken to selling services in more than one market, thereby increasing costs. A standard set of regulations for all provinces would eliminate administrative overhead, would produce more competitiveness, would lower costs for consumers and ultimately would create more jobs.

A further barrier to trade is the restriction placed on various types of labour mobility between provinces. This is a particular concern to an area such as Ottawa–Hull which straddles a provincial boundary but it still affects other Canadians in serious ways.

• (1655)

Many of us are familiar with the dispute which erupted last year between Ontario and Quebec on the issue of construction. It was one of many trade barriers which prevented professionals and labourers from offering their services across Canada. It meant that competition was reduced and it resulted in higher costs and taxes for consumers. Fortunately, Ontario and Quebec managed to resolve their differences on this single issue to the benefit of both.

That deal is the exception rather than the rule. It is time for us to dispense with these issues once and for all. For generations we have allowed the inefficiencies of small, protected, regional markets in many goods and services to constrict the economy, hurt our political and cultural objectives and cost us jobs.

Labour mobility is an area of trade which has been opened up between Canada and the United States under the free trade agreement. Once again as with beer, professionals such as accountants and engineers can more easily ply their trade between Ontario and the American states than they can between Ontario and Quebec. If we are to remain a developed country we must keep on developing our resources, especially our human resources, or risk losing them to more developed countries.

It is important to look at other examples of trade arrangements to determine what is best for us. The United States is a good example of a country where wide open commerce between jurisdictions negotiated and enforced by a national government has led to greater prosperity for the whole nation. Barriers were challenged and eliminated in the United States early in the history of the country and it has prospered ever since. The previous example of the Colorado brewery is a good example of the reason that Canadians need the same freedoms.

In Canada we have spent great energy concentrating on our external trading relationships which account for 25 per cent of our economy. The Americans count on exports for only 8 per cent of their economy and yet are a far more prosperous nation. There is certainly a message for Canada in this. We must become more focused on reducing barriers when it comes to domestic trade.

The European Union is a modern day example of a trading relationship which has sprung out of the realization that free trade benefits everyone regardless of language or region. There are some real lessons for Canadians in this. The European Union has not only established free trade in goods, produce and capital, but also has free trade in labour as well. The citizens of any European country now have the right to work in any other European country. Because labour was made more transferable, common certification had to be implemented in a number of areas.

While the system has not achieved perfection yet, it is an improvement in the lives of all citizens. Surely if Europeans of different languages and ethnic backgrounds can achieve such an agreement over the borders of nations, then Canadians must be able to resolve the few differences which exist between provinces.

In present day Canada there is over $146 billion worth of trade between the provinces. There are also at least 500 barriers to interprovincial trade in Canada and each one costs jobs, money, growth and competitiveness which has hurt all Canadians directly. They are forced to pay higher prices for products such as eggs, milk, beer and financial services. They have to pay higher taxes in order that the provincial government can favour inefficient local producers over best value for money producers elsewhere.

These barriers are a problem which can be solved unilaterally in many cases by a determined federal government. Even small improvements in reducing barriers can mean big gains for the country. It is time for us to get serious about dealing with them.

Reformers have written policies on these issues. I will share them with the House.

The Reform Party supports the removal of interprovincial barriers to trade through agreements which include trade dispute settlement mechanisms among the provinces. Should the provinces fail to co–operate in the removal of interprovincial trade barriers, the Reform Party supports constitutional challenges to such impediments wherever possible.

I believe this statement is self–explanatory and I mentioned earlier that Reformers have a plan to deal with trade barriers. It is the constitutional law already set in place to deal with exactly such problems.

Section 121 of the British North America Act states: "All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free into each of the other provinces". Also, section 91 of the British North America Act states: "The exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to the regulation of trade and commerce".

• (1700)

It is obvious from these two sections that interprovincial trade is an exclusive federal jurisdiction and the provinces are violating the intent of the Constitution when they erect barriers to trade. A Reform government would do everything necessary to enforce these constitutional principles.

The industry minister stated, after signing the deal last July, that: "Our governments have achieved this voluntarily, not through arbitrary and contentious attempts to use federal powers or other forms of coercion". This statement underlines the fundamental difference between Liberals and Reformers. Liberals, always anxious never to rock the boat or step on any toes, are happy with tiny steps or even stepping backward if they think they can put a good face on it.

Reformers are much more interested in dealing with reality and solving problems. It is plain to see that the provinces are violating the intent of the Constitution. In the best interest of all Canadians, Reformers wish to see the situation rectified. If this means using some federal power or coercion to see fundamental constitutional law complied with, then so be it.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, also a constitutional appendix, states:

> Every citizen or permanent resident of Canada has the right to move to and take up residence in any province and to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province.

This right has been successfully used in court challenges to strike down provincial laws that prevent professionals from working in different jurisdictions. Most notable was the case of a New Brunswick accountant who wished to conduct some affairs in P.E.I. Because island law prohibited him from working there, he took P.E.I. to court and won, based on his charter mobility right.

Reformers support the free movement of labour across provincial borders. We believe the government must work quickly to ensure that these goals are achieved.

In analysing the facts, it is all very well and good to say that Canadians have these rights, but what businessman has the time, money and patience to pursue court cases in every jurisdiction just so he can go to work? This has to be recognized as an impediment to the free flow of labour and it is past time for the provinces to remove these impediments. They have significantly added to the cost of doing business and have deterred new business. We benefit our American cousins when we abuse our own citizenry. Many now look south to expand because the walls east and west in Canada are too high to climb over.

Governments, not private citizens, have the responsibility to deal with these issues and to do so urgently, as the industry minister stated.

Reformers find themselves unable to support a bill that lends credibility to the first ministers' failure of last summer. We demand that the federal government enforce the Constitution which contains the necessary authority to allow free trade between the provinces, especially section 121, section 91 and the charter mobility right and to do everything in its power to ensure that all provincial barriers are eliminated.

We also demand that federal programs that compensate for provincial barriers by redistributing wealth and programs that inhibit the free trade of labour be eliminated.

The bottom line is that interprovincial trade barriers mean lost jobs for Canadians, higher taxes and product costs, and a less competitive economy with which to face the world.

As I said at the opening of my remarks, Bill C–88, approving the trade agreement in its present form is a major disappointment for two major reasons. The first is that it fails to give Canadians a golden opportunity to create the thousands of jobs so desperately needed today.

The second and perhaps more important reason is that it is another broken red book promise. This is at a time when all of us here should be doing all we can to restore that lost trust between voters and the politicians. Another lost opportunity, another step backward.

For all the reasons stated, I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:
>
> That this House declines to give second reading to Bill C–88, an act to implement the agreement on internal trade because it fails to eliminate all interprovincial trade barriers.

• (1705)

The Deputy Speaker: The amendment of the member for Simcoe Centre is receivable.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate on this very important bill, which has almost gone unnoticed and has the potential to alter the very basis of internal trade in Canada. That is why I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C–88, an act to implement the Agreement on Internal Trade.

We will recall that this agreement is the fruit of very difficult, very strenuous negotiations that went on from 1987 to July 1994, less than a year ago, when 11 governments, together with the governments of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, finally came to an agreement. The purpose of the agreement was obviously to enter into some kind of domestic free trade agreement for Canada.

This agreement affects 11 main fields of economic activity, which I shall list for the sake of clarity. These fields of activity are as follows: government procurement, investments, work force mobility, consumer standards, agri–food production, alcoholic beverages, natural resources processing, communications, transportation, energy and environmental protection.

At this stage, I want to tell this House that the Bloc Quebecois, as the official opposition, is for internal trade and, in that sense, supports the bill. On the other hand, the Bloc Quebecois flatly rejects the role, powers and importance the federal government gives itself in this bill. And this is what we will be illustrating.

We disagree with this bill in three regards: first, the context in which this bill was introduced; second, the actual wording of clause 9, which is the main clause in Bill C–88; and third, the rationale behind clause 9.

First, with respect to the context in which Bill C–88 was presented, it is very shocking as it exemplifies this government's logic, its habit of making decisions without prior consultation with the provinces, preferring to do things on the sly, while at the same time having no mandate to do so. We learned from a reliable source that, at the last meeting of the federal and provincial ministers responsible for internal trade in Canada, which was held on April 10, 1995 in Calgary, the federal government never stated its intention and never received from the parties the mandate to do what is being proposed today.

Second point with respect to the context, although the parties agreed that the dispute settlement mechanism, which is often the stumbling block in this type of agreement, should be based on the good faith of the parties and not on judicial procedures, that is what the federal government chose to do, again without consulting anyone. It chose the judicial route through clause 9, to which I will come back in a moment.

Finally, still as regards the context, this bill shows how the federal government sees its role in internal trade and gives itself the power to interfere in interprovincial disputes, although this power is not granted anywhere in the agreement.

• (1710)

I now come to clause 9 which, as I said earlier, is the cornerstone of this bill. I will read it to you because it is worth reading. I can assure you that this clause will soon change the way this country is run. Through clause 9, the federal government gives itself the following powers:

> 9.(1) For the purpose of suspending benefits or imposing retaliatory measures of equivalent effect against a province pursuant to Article 1710 of the Agreement, the Governor in Council may, by order, do any one or more of the following:
> (a) suspend rights or privileges granted by the government of Canada to the province under the Agreement or any federal law;
> (b) modify or suspend the application of any federal law with respect to the province;
> (c) extend the application of any federal law to the province; and;
> (d) take any other measure that the Governor in Council considers necessary.
> (2) In this section, "federal law" means the whole or any portion of any Act of Parliament or any regulation, order or other instrument issued, made or established in the exercise of a power conferred by or under an Act of Parliament.

Two phrases are worthy of note: "by order" and "pursuant to Article 1710 of the Agreement". I will look at this clause more closely with the emphasis on the words "by order".

Therefore, the governor in council may, "by order", suspend benefits or impose retaliatory measures of equivalent effect against a province. "By order" means that, without consultation, debate, or resolution of the House of Commons, the rights or privileges granted by the Government of Canada to said province at fault may be suspended under the agreement or a federal law.

The governor in council may, "by order", modify or suspend the application of any federal law with respect to the province. The governor in council may, "by order", extend the application of any federal law to the province. And, as if this were not enough, the federal government may, again without any mandate, "by order", take any other measure considered necessary.

This is why Premier Parizeau referred to this as a trade war measure. This is quite a statement, considering it comes from the Premier of Quebec.

There is also the reference "pursuant to Article 1710". Let me read you quickly the provision which, I feel, is the most important one of the 13 paragraphs of Article 1710.

Paragraph 7 reads:

> In considering what benefits to suspend, or retaliatory measures to impose, the complaining Party shall:
> (a) suspend benefits or impose measures in the same sector as the measure found to be in violation of the Agreement; and
> (b) only if such suspension or imposition would be impracticable or ineffective, suspend benefits or impose retaliatory measures in other sectors covered by the Agreement.

We are referring to Article 1710 which implies that, if there is a problem with manpower mobility, and if it is not possible to impose a similar retaliatory measure against the province at fault, it is implied that retaliatory measures could be taken regarding natural resources, communications or investment, for example. This is what is provided.

It must be pointed out that this whole agreement, and particularly Article 1710, is very vague as regards the role of the federal government. Can the government intervene in a dispute between two provinces, once it is determined which province is at fault? This is not at all clear in the agreement as it is worded.

Given our Canadian history, we know how much the federal government resents any vacuum.

• (1715)

Now, we are faced with a legal vacuum. We know how much the federal government abhors a vacuum. Given the way it has used its spending and residual powers in the past, we can count on the federal government to take full advantage of vague wording in the bill. As a matter of fact, it just took the necessary means to be able to interfere freely to have unruly provinces toe the line.

Reactions have been quite interesting. The Minister of Industry, who is the minister responsible under the act, said that the official opposition's reaction is paranoid and that our remarks are weird. However, Manon Cornellier, who has been following this issue for years, questioned two officials of the internal trade secretariat, Mr. Lecherson and Mr. Knox, hours after the tabling of the bill.

Mr. Lecherson is a senior strategy advisor. When asked about the scope of the bill and its compliance with the intent of the agreement and the scope of the bill, he said: "As a matter of fact, the bill goes further than the agreement itself". Mr. Knox, who is the executive director of the secretariat, said: "In theory, the government could take retaliatory measures deemed appropriate in any sector, but that is very unlikely. They would be basically economic measures".

Now, we are dealing here strictly with economic issues. These remarks suggest that the federal government would even target social programs in order to make an unruly province, Quebec for example, toe the line. That door has been opened, and that is why it seems legitimate to impute motives. Given the lack of openness of this government, we are justified in imputing motives.

There was an official reaction, and I want to quote paragraphs 3 and 4 of a letter Daniel Paillé, the Quebec Minister of Industry, Commerce, Science and Technology, sent to his Canadian counterpart, on May 10, 1995: "The government of Quebec thinks it is unacceptable, pursuant to a Canada–wide agreement where the federal government enters into a partnership with the other parties to an agreement and where the scope of action given to the various partners is well defined by chapter 17 of the agreement, that the federal government found it important to give itself such extended powers as those mentioned in clause 9 of the implementing bill. Therefore, the government of Quebec is opposed to this provision, which gives the federal government very extended powers that go beyond what is needed to implement the retaliatory measures provided for in chapter 17 of the agreement".

I think that is quite clear. We have to imagine what all this would mean in the normal course of events. Although a number of examples were given earlier, we could give some more in order to really show all the significance of the issue being underhandedly addressed here. For example, any province at fault could be denied federal subsidies. If Quebec, for instance, were to be found at fault in some hypothetical situation, Hydro Quebec could be prevented from selling its electricity to another province.

Natural gas shipments to a province at fault could be banned. This is a very serious issue. In terms of work force mobility, it could mean that workers from one province could be prevented from working in another province recognized as the party at fault in a dispute between these two provinces. These are powers the federal government is assuming, because nowhere in the agreement is it mentioned that Ottawa has to introduce such a bill.

This may not have been the government's intention, but if this bill is adopted in its present form, the federal government will be able to take such measures under clause 9, and that is what makes the situation so serious. Finally, we have reservations regarding the origin of clause 9. I was shocked when it was first drawn to my attention.

In fact, clause 9 is essentially identical to section 21 of NAFTA except for certain references to the fact that the latter is an international agreement. What the government did in clause 9 is to replace the word "country" that is found in section 21 by the word "province". As far as I am concerned, there is no better example of a lazy or careless government.

It seems too easy to copy almost word for word such an important document because the problems are different and the relationships that exist between sovereign countries are not similar to the ones that can exist between a central government and its provincial counterparts. I find it rather astounding that the government would take the liberty of just changing the word "country" for the word "province" while taking the opportunity to give itself enormous powers.

Perhaps there are visionaries in the Langevin Block—which is not impossible—who saw that there will soon be a need for an international treaty between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec and who thought that it would be better to save some time, money and energy and recognize immediately, in a rather subtle way, that Quebec would be party to an international agreement because the day is coming when Quebecers will have to deal officially at the international level with Canada as well as with the United States and other countries. This goes with the Bloc Quebecois's recent suggestion that there must be an economic association, that the closest ties must be maintained and that we must be good neighbours.

In closing, I think that clause 9 must be amended so as to reflect the spirit of the agreement and to limit the federal government's intervention as an injured party, otherwise Bill C–88 is likely to create problems instead of solving them.

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to debate Bill C–88, the implementing legislation for the supposed internal trade agreement within Canada.

Of all of the bills that have come through the House in the past months this one is perhaps of more importance than many others. As my hon. colleague who spoke mentioned, it seems to have slipped through with very little interest on the part of the House and Canadians at large.

In my comments today I would like to spend a few minutes talking about what the trade barriers cost us as individuals. Also I am going to spend a good deal of time talking about the relationship between Quebec and the rest of the country. This is really what it boils down to. When our friends from Quebec talk about a relationship with the rest of the country, post separation, they are really talking about how they would keep all the benefits that we have together in this northern part of North America without shooting each other in the foot.

This has to be of paramount importance to the people of Quebec. They would not be very happy if they found themselves in an independent country, bankrupt and no one to trade with. Nor would the rest of Canadians find themselves in a very happy situation. I want to spend a few moments if I may to record exactly how important this trade is between Canada interprovincially, Canada nationally.

• (1725)

I am indebted for much of what I am going to say to the Fraser Institute and in particular—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McClelland: Liberals opposite go into a state of shock when I mention the Fraser Institute. Also, by good fortune, the Canadian and Quebec Chambers of Commerce have just sent information to all members in the House. I will be quoting from both of those sources during the course of my comments.

A few of the Liberals opposite might recall that when the free trade agreement was implemented they were violently opposed to it. Am I remembering this correctly? Was that just a suspicion?

Mr. Milliken: Yes, yes.

Mr. McClelland: Yes, it is correct. I hear members opposite saying: "Yes, I can remember we were against the free trade agreement. We were violently against the free trade agreement". One of the reasons members opposite were against the free trade agreement at that time was that they were afraid we were going to get beat up by the Americans because we had fairly inefficient industries across the country.

For the longest time particularly the west suffered and were righteously aggrieved by the fact that the resource producing areas of the country, the west, the north and the east were subsidizing central Canada. We were exporting raw materials to central Canada and buying manufactured goods from central Canada at a sometimes severe tariff.

It cost us a lot of money to be Canadians. A lot of people, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, saw the free trade agreement as a vehicle whereby these barriers were reduced and came down. Canada found itself in a situation where it had to compete.

The free trade agreement was not so terrifying for other regions of the country. I can recall during the great free trade debate—I am sure members in the House can recall—we had high interest rates. Remember that? We had a high dollar. Remember that? We were going to go into a free trade agreement with one of the toughest trading nations in the world and we wonder why we got the stuffing kicked out of us. We had to be brain dead to have these interprovincial trade barriers all across the country, a high dollar, high interest rates and getting into a free trade agreement with the United States.

It was kind of like the Monty Python movie where the knight gets his arm cut off, his other arm cut off, puts his sword in his mouth, gets his legs cut off and says: "Come on, fight like a man". That was Canada after the free trade agreement. We were sitting there with a sword in our mouth saying: "Fight fair. Fight fair". We have a free trade agreement with the United States, but do we have a free trade agreement within Canada? No, we do not.

When the federal government sat down at a table to negotiate a free trade agreement, as we did with Mexico and the United States, we had three players around the table and all of the minions that made the deal work. Can members imagine what it must have been like when we had the federal government and 10 provinces sitting around the table trying to negotiate a free trade agreement?

The provinces varied. British Columbia had demands about an inch thick saying: "This is what we want. This is what we want to protect". The province of Alberta's demands were on one sheet of paper which said: "There should not be any barriers to trade. There should not be any barriers to the movement and the transportation of capital, of ideas and of people.

Ontario which had the most to lose in a free trade agreement in Canada because it controls the bulk of the trade was one of the most accommodating provinces at the debate. It was prepared in the national interest to have its internal trade barriers come down for the common good.

The reason that I am speaking against this legislation is not that it is not a step in the right direction.

• (1730)

The federal government in its role as the leader has the fiduciary responsibility when it comes to dealing with the economic affairs of the nation to take charge and say we need competitive industries in Canada. How can we possibly compete internationally if we are not first competitive at home?

How can we as a nation deal competitively with other nations if we do not first take down all of the barriers in Canada so we have free movement of trade, people, capital and ideas to become as efficient as we can before we start trading elsewhere? That is why it is so important to have all of these internal trade barriers done away with.

I will use as an example some of the daily problems that come up when we have trade barriers or distorting subsidies within the country. We know Quebec has been working very hard at developing export and increasing the export potential of industries based in Quebec. It has been fairly successful. I do not know the exact the numbers but Quebec has had a substantial increase in recent years of exports by Quebec based industries.

Let us say the Quebec government gives company A a subsidy in order to export outside the country but company A is manufacturing a product which is also manufactured in Ontario or British Columbia or Nova Scotia and they do not have subsidy. What happens when they both start to compete for same domestic customer? The company that has the $200,000 government tax funded subsidy wins and the company that does not have a subsidy loses because its costs are higher. That does absolutely nothing to enhance the competitiveness of our industries. All it does is reward industries that are perhaps failing, that are perhaps not as competitive as others at the expense of those businesses that can stand on their own.

That is one of the reasons governments should not be picking winners and losers in the marketplace, creating subsidies so one company in one province has a competitive advantage over another company in another province. All it does is move a job from A to B.

A while ago in the automobile industry a company in Brampton received a huge grant from the federal government to build a plant in Quebec. The people in Quebec would want it. The company would end up manufacturing the same number of cars. It would close the plant in Ontario, open a plant in Quebec, lay off 200 people in Ontario, hire 50 people in Quebec. It would cost the country 150 jobs in one province plus the infrastructure investment to build the plant in the second province.

If we as legislators, as a Parliament, are prepared to throw this money around, can we blame industry for saying it wants a piece of it? If we ourselves in business and we are competing against another business with the advantage of a government grant or subsidy, in order to stay in business we have to get our hands in the trough as well.

That is why we need to break down the barriers to capital. We need to break down the mobility barriers and we absolutely have to stop taking tax money into the government and picking winners and losers in the marketplace.

When we talk about interprovincial trade, historically if we look at what has gone on in Canada, where did the Bank of Nova Scotia start? Rhetorically I ask, did it have its head office in Toronto or Montreal? It was in Halifax. What happened in the trading arrangements or what happened in Canada that all of a sudden somehow the Bank of Nova Scotia's head office moves to Toronto? We have distorted interprovincial trade so that it has protected industries across the country.

• (1735)

The traditional trade at the time the Bank of Nova Scotia was incorporated was not east–west but north–south, just as the trading blocks all across the country traditionally have been. We artificially make them east and west. However, is it focuses all the financial resource and the competitive resource where most of the people are.

The same thing may happen in Canada today. We will continue to have this migration of wealth into the resource. When I say the resource rich I am talking about the vote rich parts of Canada, in downtown Toronto and Montreal, at the expense of the rest of the country unless we have this free mobility and free trade within all provinces.

I will put a few facts on record concerning trade between Quebec and the rest of the country. This is of particular importance because our friends from the Bloc, representing a good number of people in Quebec, are trying to put forth the premise that Quebec would be better off not attached to the rest of the country and the rest of the country would be better off not attached to Quebec.

We would survive. Those of us who live in the west would survive better than others but it would hurt all of us. Most of all, it would hurt the people who live in Quebec. We should not be so naive as to suggest for a moment that a separate Quebec would enjoy all or any of the privileges it enjoys today. It is certainly a long stretch to imagine the rest of the country would tell Quebec to go its way and we will continue to pretend nothing has happened and it is business as usual.

The premier of Quebec and other leaders in Quebec can say whatever they want to but it is important for the people in Quebec to know those leaders do not set the stage or make the rules for the rest of the country. The rest of the country will bring an entirely and completely different perspective to that table.

I will quote from a pamphlet prepared by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, la Chambre de commerce du Québec, "Interprovincial Trade: Engine of Economic Growth", prepared in May: "This report also points to the fact that these strong, commercial and personal relationships bind us together and reinforce our strength as a trading nation. Strategic and dynamic partnerships are often formed among Canadian companies and entrepreneurs to win in international markets in the new global environment.

"Our message is clear and simple. Together we prosper. Together we are the vehicle for job creation for the next generation in this country, and our interprovincial trading relationships are the engine of that growth. Together we must continue to build on these existing relationships which only enhance our competitive position, internationally improve our ability to create jobs and confirm our status as the best country in the world".

What is this trade to Quebec? The pamphlet further says that while all provinces are dependent on interprovincial trade, Quebec is much more economically dependent on trade with the other provinces than the other provinces are with Quebec. Quebec exported more to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in 1989 than to any country in Europe, including France. It sold as much to Ontario as it did to the United States. The rest of the provinces exported more to Quebec than to the European union and Japan combined.

• (1740)

Four hundred and seventy thousand jobs in Quebec were directly and indirectly attributable to interprovincial exports in 1989. It is not only the Montreal based enterprises that export goods and services to markets in other provinces. Manufacturers in other regions such as Estrie, Mauricie, Bois–Francs and Abitibi–Témiscamingue are also highly dependent on sales to other parts of Canada.

Quebec was the only province other than Ontario that registered a surplus in interprovincial trade, helping to offset partially its trade imbalance, trade deficit with the rest of the world.

Ontario is Quebec's most important trading partner within Canada. Quebec ran a deficit in its trade with Ontario. Quebec's surplus in trade with other provinces came from the more distant provinces, suggesting the importance for Quebec of access to those regions.

This is perhaps the most important part of Bill C–88 and what we are talking about today. It really speaks to the whole nature of our union, what it is all about. We do not all have to speak the same language. It is not even necessary for us to be able to understand each other's first language. It is important for all of us to understand that when we reach into our pocket and pull out a $5 bill or $1 bill or perhaps even a $2 coin and exchange it, we are speaking the same language. Trade has no language. The nature of our country is that if there is commercial discourse in commercial trade and if we keep the lines and avenues and rivers of trade open between all parts of Canada, particularly between Quebec and the rest of the country, everything else is bound to follow.

As a nation we are talking about maintaining trade links with other parts of the world. If we trade with other countries we learn about other countries. We must ensure trade between provinces so that we will learn from each other. It is difficult to have a bad relationship with someone with whom we have a good trading relationship. If we have a commercial relationship which benefits both parties, we will be far more reticent to do or say anything that would imperil that relationship.

I am happy to have had an opportunity to put a few thoughts on record in this debate. I am sorry the government did not use the opportunity to be far more forceful in ensuring the many barriers that still exist are torn down.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I just listened to the Reform member's speech, about which I would simply like to raise a few small points.

He said that if Quebec were to declare its sovereignty, the rest of Canada would most certainly refuse to trade with it and to maintain current business relationships. I can only wonder if they are merely sabre rattling or if there is something more behind this. Can the frustration of western Canada still be so near to the boiling point? I do not know.

• (1745)

But when I imagine an independent or sovereign Quebec, I can only wonder whether you will refuse to sell us the beef we are accustomed to buying from you. After sovereignty, would you refuse to sell us beer made by Ontario breweries? Would you force us to buy our cars from the United States or France? Even the cold war with eastern block countries did not prevent members of the Reform Party, westerners, from selling thousands of tonnes of grain to Russia yearly, despite conflicts in ideology, to say the least.

I would like to ask them on what basis they would decide to cease selling to us—because Quebec attained sovereignty, took full possession of its means and its tools? I think that they would only be shooting themselves in the foot and scoring in their own nets. At any rate, that is my opinion and I would ask him to answer me. Is this anything more than sabre rattling?

[English]

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, if I left the impression that the rest of the country would not trade with Quebec, I certainly did not mean to do that. The point I wanted to make was how important trade is among all the provinces of Canada, including Quebec, and how vitally important trade is to the province of Quebec, probably more so than other provinces in the country, because Quebec has a resource very much built on trade and export.

What I did say was that the people of Quebec should not be misled into thinking that it would be automatic that things would go on as before. If the people of Quebec think for one minute that they would be able to exist behind trade barriers that would not be the case.

I would certainly hope, and I agree with my hon. colleague, that we would not do anything to shoot each other in the foot. That would not do any good. It would be a hard nosed commercial relationship. It would mean that instead of having our market, our critical mass would be 25 per cent lower. We would not have the same economies of scale. It would be far more difficult for Quebec in an international world market to be a world scale producer, because Quebec could not depend upon having the Canadian domestic market to enable it to be an international producer. It would hurt everybody, and it would hurt Quebec perhaps more than the rest of the country.

I would not suggest for a moment that we would do anything to shoot ourselves or Quebec in the foot.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to respond to comments by the member for Edmonton Southwest and I will have an opportunity to do so during the debate on Bill C–88. However, I must first provide a few details on the bill.

Often, when we are discussing bills in the House, people tune us in on television or come in to the House not knowing what the discussion is about. This is why I would first like to provide a few details about Bill C–88 itself. This government bill is aimed at promoting freer trade between Canada's provinces. It puts a number of administrative measures into effect to permit freer trade as of July 1, 1995, that is, in barely a month or two.

• (1750)

A whole series of measures are involved, as are a number of laws governing, for example, transportation, public liability, communications and other matters. Therefore, first and foremost, this bill, puts into place the measures that will lead to freer trade in Canada.

When we speak of liberalizing trade, we mean that, in principle, people, capital and goods should move as freely as possible and that uniform standards and rules will be established so that one province cannot prevent the free movement of goods, capital and people.

The most striking example is, of course, the limits on the movement and production of beer in Canada. Each province was required, so to speak, to produce a certain volume of beer, which could not be exported from one province to another. Quebec could not export its production to Ontario and vice versa. Marketing will now be freer, and not only for alcoholic beverages, but also for such sectors as farm products, food, communications, transportation, energy and, of course, manpower.

This bill from all appearances improves the trading system in Canada. I should point out that, as regards the liberalization of trade in Canada, Quebec has always been in favour of freer trade. It strongly supported free trade with the United States. We believe in unrestricted competition. In Quebec, we believe in the ability to compete on the open market.

However, this bill contains a few flaws, important flaws, such as the fact that a panel can be set up if disputes arise. Problems may occur. Disputes may have to be settled. In such cases, this bill provides for the creation of a panel to review disputes. Should one province accuse another of not playing by the rules, the mandate of such a panel would be to review the situation and recommend retaliatory measures on behalf of the injured party, the one that would have been somehow wronged.

This panel would have no power to enforce. It would only have the authority to review the problem and recommend retaliatory measures where required. And here we come to the troubling part, since, in the end, retaliatory measures will rest in the hands of the federal government.

Not only will the members of this panel and of the committee that will oversee the enforcement of this piece of legislation be appointed by order in council without being ratified by the House of Commons—which is a flaw one must point out—but once again, through this bill, the federal government is seizing additional powers, the authority to enforce the panel's decisions, and even to intervene when it, the federal government, is not involved.

Indeed, the wording of clause 19—or more precisely article 1710, but mainly clause 19—leaves room for interpretation, in such a way that if there is a dispute between two provinces, and the federal government is not directly involved, it can intervene. It can exercise its power of judgment so that one province is favourably judged, even favoured over another.

In fact, the federal government is taking on a lot of power, too much power, in our view, the power to intervene in disputes between provinces, if need be. These are powers it has assumed, without being asked to. The federal government is assuming the power to intervene in disputes between provinces. We think that this is in fact an abuse of power. Why would the federal government interfere in interprovincial disputes in which it is not involved?

This is not the first time this government has tabled a bill in an attempt to give itself additional powers. As you probably know, it tried to give itself additional powers through Bill C–52, for example, which would allow the government to compete with engineering and architectural firms in Canada, and Bill C–91, which would change the mandate of the Federal Business Development Bank. Again, the federal government gives itself new powers that would allow it to centralize operations and intervene in the country's development, thereby putting some provinces at a disadvantage compared to others.

In the case of Bill C–52, for example, it is obvious that the powers the federal government tried to give itself could be used against Quebec in particular, since we know that engineering and architectural firms are concentrated in Quebec. In the case of Bill C–91 regarding the Federal Business Development Bank, we can ask ourselves if the government is once again giving itself additional powers and trying to compete with very successful Quebec institutions such as the credit unions and the FTQ and CNTU solidarity funds, which are very effective in developing small and medium size businesses.

We also know that small and medium size businesses have experienced significant growth in Quebec over the years. That was one of the reasons why Quebec supported free trade with the U.S. Industry and trade in Quebec are locally based. Quebecers have worked to set up their own businesses and establish themselves in Quebec. It is something that should be pointed out to those who do not know Quebec.

• (1800)

The difference is visible for instance between Quebec and Ontario. As we know, Ontario benefited from American investments and most major business concerns established in Ontario were American companies' subsidiaries. In fact, that is one of the reasons why so many jobs were lost in Ontario after the free trade agreement with the U.S. was signed. American companies established in Ontario simply packed up and moved back to the U.S. They can trade with Ontario from the other side of the border. But many jobs were lost because of this in Ontario, where there are more people on UI and welfare today than just about anywhere else in Canada.

While we, in Quebec, were hit quite strongly, and we can say that the federal government did not do much to help us, we nonetheless are blessed with a strong small and medium size business sector which is still developing in many areas. In Bill C–88, as in Bill C–91 and Bill C–52, the federal government is abusing its authority. It gives itself powers that it did not have before, which could have the effect of putting Quebec at a disadvantage in rulings on trade between Quebec and the other provinces.

Finally, this is the main reason prompting us to propose to the government an amendment providing that the federal government be required to rule only when it is directly involved, instead of any time it feels like stepping in to tip the scales in favour of one province at the expense of another.

As I said at the very beginning on my remarks, Quebec has always been for free movement and the freest trade possible, because this is in our interest in Quebec, since our economy is solidly grounded. Much remains to be done, but we are nonetheless building on solid ground, relying on small and medium size business firmly rooted in Quebec. Much remains to be done to strengthen it.

Were it not for this abuse of authority on the part of the federal government, interprovincial trade liberalization would be great for the rest of Canada as well as for Quebec. Again, Quebec is in favour of this kind of liberalization. For example, Quebec imports from Ontario alone goods and services totalling $25.852 billion per year, while its exports to this province total $22 billion. That is almost $30 billion in trade just between Ontario and Quebec.

In fact, trading between Quebec and all Canadian provinces is quite substantial. In Alberta, Quebec sells $2.8 billion in goods and services and buys $3.25 billion in petroleum, natural gas and the like. In the central region, we buy wheat. I think that these trade relations will be maintained after sovereignty is achieved. We are working at making Quebec realize that it will be to its advantage, in the medium and long term, to opt for sovereignty, take charge and be in control of its economy and its future.

Once Quebec has achieved sovereignty, existing trade between the provinces will most likely be maintained. There is no reason to believe that it will be reduced. It would be disadvantageous to the other provinces, including Ontario and even Alberta, to refuse to sell their products to Quebec, and vice versa. It would not make economic sense. In fact, economic sense dictates that current trade be maintained.

We live in a world where trade liberalization is increasingly more prevalent. For example, GATT was set up precisely to liberalize trade between all the countries of this world. Some agreements and regulations were implemented under GATT, and they will also be maintained once Quebec becomes a sovereign nation.

The same is true as regards free trade agreements with the United States. There is no reason to believe that these agreements will not be maintained and that trade will not continue. It is only those who seek to instill some unfounded doubt or fear who say: "We will cut or block trade between Quebec and the other provinces". This is nonsense. It goes against economic sense. It goes against the common sense which governs existing treaties, including GATT and the free trade agreement.

Bill C–88 does includes many provisions which make it appealing to the Bloc. As I said earlier, Quebec has always been in favour of liberalizing trade between provinces and countries, and it always will be, because this is its forte. We can compete with others. We supported free trade because Quebec has the economic, cultural and social confidence required to face its North American competition.

It is for these reasons that Quebec will be in an even better position once it achieves sovereignty, and that is also true for the other provinces. Indeed, English Canada will also benefit. I think it will get along better with Quebec, and it might even manage to reduce the power of the federal government, which is not necessarily concerned with the interests of the individuals or provinces. It is concerned with its own interest. And the federal interest here in this Parliament is not the same as that of the provinces.

This is why we oppose Bill C–88 which is another example of abuse on the part of the federal government, which seeks to gain additional powers, to centralize, and possibly interfere in inter-provincial trade so as to favour the interests of one province at the expense of another. This is one of the reasons why we will oppose Bill C–88.

• (1810)

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the various points raised by my colleague across the way.

[English]

I believe he substantially misrepresents the clause about which he obviously has some qualms. I believe it is clause 9 of the bill.

It is interesting to note that while the current minister of restructuring of the Quebec government was president of the Quebec Manufacturers' Association he totally supported the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers. Yet when the agreement was signed at the time when Mr. Parizeau was premier he dismissed the agreement as laughable because the dispute resolution mechanism did not have new devices for sanctions or retaliation.

We now hear the Bloc Québécois member saying that the provisions for sanctions are far too strong and are a grab for power by the federal government and would act as a disadvantage to the provinces.

Let me begin by saying that this bill is the result of a long process that in my view demonstrates admirably—

The Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member may have misunderstood. This is questions and comments. Is the member asking a question or making a comment or is she making her speech?

Ms. Catterall: Debate.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any questions or comments regarding what was just said?

[English]

Is there anybody who wishes to ask a question or make a comment to the speaker who just finished? The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, on a question or comment.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I thought this was resuming debate.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry. I said in French, questions or comments. Does the hon. member wish to make a question or a comment?

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): No.

The Deputy Speaker: The deputy whip for the government has the floor on debate.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I believe I was in the process of saying that the procedure by which this bill comes before us and by which the internal trade agreement that gave rise to it was reached was a demonstration of how federalism can work for all partners. It was a totally co–operative process, involving the provinces, the territories, the federal government, and the private sector, which had the unanimous agreement of all parties.

On behalf of the Minister of Industry, I appreciate this opportunity speak on Bill C–88. This is one more step in a process that has been under way in Canada for the better part of a decade to create a new internal trade regime. Our objective is to reduce barriers to interprovincial trade and remove restrictions on the movement of people and capital within the domestic marketplace.

Passage by Parliament of Bill C–88 will be a necessary step to implement the agreement on internal trade that was signed last year by every province, the territories, and the federal government.

At the invitation of the Prime Minister, first ministers met in Ottawa last July to formally accept and sign the agreement that the committee of ministers of internal trade had finalized at the end of June. With this accord we were committed to have the appropriate legislative and regulatory changes in place so that the agreement could be legally implemented. In this sense, putting this legislation before the House is meeting an obligation to provincial and territorial governments that we incurred when we signed the agreement in June 1994.

This was an important step in the quest to create an integrated domestic market in Canada. This seems to have been a pattern in the development of our nation. As we go back through history to the voyageur and the Hudson's Bay Company, we see that trade is what has opened up the vast expanse of this northern half of the North American continent. As we thought to link ourselves together with the national railway and later with the national highway and national airline, trade has been one of the driving forces both for the development of the links among us as a people and for the development of the prosperity the country has enjoyed.

However, in the 128 years since Confederation, we have also seen a hodge–podge of protectionist measures and trade conventions develop which have inhibited interprovincial trade and restricted the flow of goods, capital and talent between and among provinces. These measures range from outright restrictions to bidding on government contracts to a patchwork of regulations and incompatible standards.

The government has felt strong and repeated pressure from the private sector to deal with the problems associated with internal barriers to trade and conflicting regulations on cross border flows of people and of capital.

We have received representations from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Business Council on National Issues, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Bankers Association and the Canadian Construction Association. The list is long and the problems are deeply felt and broadly experienced.

Such barriers put Canadian businesses at a competitive disadvantage by restricting the size of their available marketplace by shrinking the domestic market for Canadian businesses in a time of increasing global competition and more open markets in other parts of the world. This can have the negative result of putting Canadian businesses at a disadvantage to international competitors even in our own market.

In addition, there is an economic cost related to marketplace inefficiency. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has estimated that barriers to trade cost Canadians about $7 billion annually in direct job and income loss. However, let us consider the other side of the story which is equally telling.

A Canadian Chamber of Commerce report released on May 17 highlighted the importance of international trade and investment as powerful generators of economic growth and job creation throughout Canada. The study indicates that Canadian interprovincial trade was worth $147 billion; almost 21 per cent of GDP in 1993. It estimates that 1.9 million jobs are directly or indirectly dependent on internal trade within Canada. The report shows that the provinces and territories constitute one of the most economically interdependent regions of the world and that interestingly, Quebec is the province most dependent on internal trade, the province that benefits most from internal trade and has the most to gain from improvements in internal trade.

The study attributes 470,000 Quebec jobs, 20 per cent of the province's GDP directly and indirectly to internal trade and values the province's trade with the rest of Canada at $64 billion. With a trade surplus of $1.1 billion with the rest of Canada, Quebec exported more to Ontario than it did to the United States, more to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick than to any European country.

The report confirms that businesses across Canada have been able to take advantage of the political and economic links created by the federal structure to forge a large national market that has worked to the benefit of all Canadians.

In years past when external trade barriers protected economies like ours from international competition, the economic cost of internal trade barriers were tolerated and maybe tolerable. When Canadian industry was sheltered from international competition by tariff barriers of 10 per cent or even 20 per cent, the economic cost of internal barriers were not so obvious. However, a marketplace sheltered from international competition is no longer the reality. Barriers and tariffs are down. The market is global and the competition is fierce. We will not, we cannot be successful in an open global market if we operate in a closed market at home. We need to adapt to the realities of trade in today's global economy.

Bill C–88 and the agreements it implements is an important aspect of the process. It is part of the more fundamental process of economic renewal that the government is following toward its strategic objectives for economic growth and job creation.

Last December the Minister of Industry introduced in the House the government's plan for building a more innovative economy. We outlined our intentions for improving the economic climate of Canada in four ways: to build a positive entrepreneurial climate and to help small businesses grow; to expand markets for jobs and growth through trade; to create an efficient and modern infrastructure; and to make technology work for Canada.

These are areas in which the government can have the greatest impact on job creation. While Bill C–88 will support all of these objectives, it has special relevance for the objective of expanding trade. To grow and prosper business needs an efficient and open marketplace, an environment which encourages innovation and expansion free of unnecessary barriers.

With the agreement on internal trade and now with this bill we have the elements to establish a new internal trade regime, one which will allow us to make the most of our interprovincial domestic market by encouraging innovation and expansion and by removing unnecessary barriers.

The Canadian economy is in a period of transition. Fundamental changes are taking place because of the globalization of trade and the rapid pace of technological change. The competitive advantage in today's world depends less on location and natural resources and more on innovation, the ability to respond to changing market conditions and to achieve economies of scale.

As we continue the transition from a resource based economy to one where innovation, knowledge and flexibility are the underpinnings of competitive advantage, we need to ensure that the domestic trading environment will accommodate and expedite the necessary changes. Bill C–88 will provide a supportive environment for the economic transition process that we are now experiencing.

The legislation before the House is the result of a long process of negotiation and consultation which has involved many Canadians; Canadians with many different perspectives: ministers of the federal government, ministers of all the provincial and territorial governments, officials of all of these governments and representatives of the private sector.

It is interesting to note that political parties of all stripes have co–operated in the negotiations leading to this agreement. They have different perspectives and different priorities, but a shared belief that a more open trading environment will be good for Canada and good for Canadians.

A striking feature of the process leading to the bill has been the high degree of co–operation and good will that has been demonstrated on all sides. Those Canadians who have been involved in the process understand the compelling need to open up our internal markets and to ensure that the Canadian marketplace works to the advantage of all Canadians.

Over the last two years the negotiations and background work were under the guiding hand of Mr. Arthur Morrow, a well known Canadian businessperson, who acted as chair of the committee of chief negotiators and worked tirelessly to keep the process moving toward its objective and in producing the agreement that ministers signed last year. The work leading up to the bill was exhaustive and thorough, and it will be ongoing. It is our duty to keep the process moving.

The process began in June 1988 when federal and provincial agriculture ministers compiled a list of barriers to internal trade in agriculture and food products. While the focus of this group was relatively narrow, the process had begun. Governments were now dealing with the problems of internal trade barriers in an organized way. Federal–provincial discussions continued and the focus widened. Ministers began to consider the need for a dispute resolution mechanism as part of more comprehensive trading arrangements between provinces and territories.

In December 1989 a memorandum of understanding on internal trade in agricultural products was signed by seven of the provinces. The process was beginning to move. Negotiators continued to meet. Agreement was reached and memoranda of understanding were signed on a number of individual issues such as transportation and government procurement, a major economic factor in our economy.

By December 1992 the committee of ministers of internal trade at the time recommended the process be accelerated and that all parties commit to the goal of reaching a broad and comprehensive internal trade agreement by June 1994.

Agreement was reached on three specific principles: that governments treat people, goods, services and capital equally regardless of where they originate in Canada; that governments reconcile standards and regulations to provide for the free movement of people, goods, services and capital within Canada and that governments ensure their administrative policies operate to provide for that free movement of people, goods, services and capital within Canada.

An intensive series of meetings was held during the period of January to June last year. These culminated in ministers agreeing to the text of the internal trade agreement at the end of June. Finally, in July 1994 the Prime Minister and all other first ministers affirmed their acceptance of the agreement with a formal signing on July 18.

Last year's agreement on internal trade was a major step in a long process. It has demonstrated that all governments can work together to achieve a common objective that will benefit all Canadians.

The agreement on internal trade sets out general rules that prohibit any new barriers to trade and eliminate old ones in 10 specific sectors or issue areas. Unfortunately there is no time left to read them all. However, it is fair to say that while this bill does not solve all the interprovincial trade problems that have built up since Confederation it has moved us a considerable way along that track. It is an ongoing process. For instance, in the energy sector a separate set of negotiations is under way toward a similar deadline this year.

With this legislation we are ensuring the framework is in place and we are confirming our belief that the fundamental principles of free trade will work within Canada. Trade agreements deepen and broaden with use and experience and this one will too. Bill C–88 will provide the foundation of moving toward a domestic trading environment that will allow for the free flow finally of goods, services, people and capital within Canada.

S. O. 52

The Prime Minister and other ministers, including first ministers, have been actively involved in broadening the marketplace for Canadian goods and services in export markets and the Team Canada approach has been highly successful in doing that. We must bring the same spirit to improving the domestic market for our businesses and workers. Bill C–88 is an important step in that direction, which is why we brought it to Parliament and support it.

• (1830)

The Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the consideration of a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing an important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the current situation in Bosnia–Herzegovina.

EMERGENCY DEBATE

BOSNIA

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.) moved:

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Hermanson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent to allow the leader of the Reform Party, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest, to lead off this debate, and the hon. member for Red Deer would then speak in his normal turn in the rotation.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would gladly give my consent provided, of course, the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean be permitted to speak on behalf of our political party when the time comes.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, in a spirit of co–operation, we give our consent. I believe there is unanimous consent for the leader of the third party to speak first, for the Leader of the Opposition to follow and for the Minister of National Defence to be next.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the deteriorating situation in the former Yugoslavia warrants an emergency debate on the situation there and on whether or not and how to withdraw Canadian peacekeepers from that area.

I wish to thank the House for responding positively to the request for this debate made by the hon. member for Red Deer.

At the outset I wish to take the opportunity to publicly express the thoughts and feelings of the Canadian people on this matter, and I trust that other members will take this opportunity as well. These thoughts and feelings include pride in the record of performance of our peacekeepers. Our peacekeepers are the best in the world, and that has been demonstrated again over three and a half years in the former Yugoslavia.

However, those thoughts and feelings of the public also include concerns and outrage: concern that there is no peace in Bosnia to keep and that the fighting is escalating, and outrage that Canadian peacekeepers are being taken hostage, used as human shields, and prevented from doing the job they were sent there to do. Peacekeepers and their friends and families and the Canadian people want a decision from their political leaders on where we go from here.

Six months ago the Reform Party's defence and foreign affairs critics endeavoured to persuade the government to adopt a more realistic and commonsense position on the presence of Canadian peacekeeping in the former Yugoslavia. We urged the government to define certain specific criteria to be used to decide when Canadians should go on peacekeeping missions, how long they should stay, and when they should be withdrawn.

In particular, we outlined several key criteria that should be satisfied if Canadian peacekeepers were to remain in Bosnia. Those criteria were that aggressive moves by belligerents against UN peacekeepers cease and that any UN detainees be released immediately; that the blockage of airports and roadways to humanitarian flights and convoys cease so that at least UN humanitarian aid to civilian populations could proceed unimpeded and that a ceasefire be in place so that there was at least some minimum peace initiative to enforce.

• (1835)

Our position was that if these three minimal criteria for effective peacekeeping could not be met, our peacekeepers should be withdrawn. Since that time, every one of those minimum conditions for effective peacekeeping has been violated and violated repeatedly. Let me go through the recent check list.

With respect to the criterion that warring factions agree to cease aggressive acts towards the UN peacekeepers, in total there have been about 300 peacekeepers held hostage.

On May 2 the Serbs took 122 UN hostages as human shields and confiscated their flak jackets, helmets and radios. On May 16 three Canadian peacekeepers were robbed of a vehicle and communications equipment. On May 22 Serbs broke into a UN heavy weapons depot near Sarajevo and removed large calibre guns. French peacekeepers were immobilized by land mines in front of their quarters.

On May 23 six UN officials were injured in Sarajevo by machine–gun fire. On Saturday, May 27, eight Canadians were detained. Of course on Friday, May 26, two Canadians were held hostage: Captain Patrick Rechner tied to a post in an ammo dump and Captain Ryan Lapalm detained in quarters.

With respect to the second criterion, that humanitarian aid be allowed to proceed without interference by any of the warring factions, the humanitarian airlifts were suspended on April 8 after the Serbs fired on a U.S. cargo plane.

As a result of the Serbian siege, UN workers hear comments like "If you cannot give us food, then at least give us poison to relieve us from this misery". So reports the UN High Commissioner for Refugees on May 13.

Sarajevo's airport has been open only sporadically over the last number of months. On May 18 a UN cargo plane was forced to turn back in mid–flight. According to a National Defence briefing earlier today, aid is shut down throughout Bosnia almost completely.

With respect to the third criterion, that a ceasefire be in place so that there is some peace to keep, the four–month ceasefire expired on May 1, with neither side reportedly willing to extend it.

During the first week of May the Croatian offensive was taken into western Slovenia and prompted Serb rocket attacks on the Croatian capital.

On May 8 UN officials criticized Croatia for breaking and overrunning UN monitoring positions and for having snipers deliberately target fleeing Serb civilians.

On May 15 there was a face off between heavily armed Croatian and Serb troops inside a sensitive buffer zone, which has rendered the 13,000–member UN force largely powerless and raises questions about its viability, according to UN chief spokesman Fred Eckhard.

Finally, on May 17 and 18 the heaviest fighting in two years in Sarajevo wounded 13 people, including Russian and French peacekeepers.

My point is that every one of those three basic UN peacekeeping criteria has been repeatedly violated time and time again. We therefore call upon the government to proceed to organize the withdrawal of Canadian peacekeepers from the former Yugoslavia, including negotiated release or rescue of those Canadian peacekeepers held hostage.

Can anything further be done to hold the belligerents in the former Yugoslavia more accountable for their actions against UN peacekeepers and for the atrocities they have committed or are preparing to commit against civilian populations? I believe the answer is yes. We call on the Government of Canada to lay before the United Nations a resolution calling for that body to declare again, with greater force and clarity, certain acts to be international crimes punishable under international law in the courts of any member nation agreeing to the resolution.

The proscribed acts to be declared international crimes with greater clarity and certainty than they have ever been declared before shall include the following: the forcible detention by belligerents of any UN peacekeeper; the use of any UN peacekeeper or humanitarian aid worker as a human shield; the closure of any airport, seaport, rail line, or roadway to the passage of any UN approved humanitarian aid flight, ship, or convoy; the violation of any UN sanctioned ceasefire to which belligerents are a party; the commission of acts of violence against civilian populations in any area subject to a UN peacekeeping mandate.

How would such a resolution, if approved by the vast majority of UN member states, help the current situation? Perhaps the immediate impact would be small, perhaps not. Properly done and forcefully communicated, such a resolution could send this message to all the belligerents in the former Yugoslavia "Perhaps for a moment in your tiny enclave, an armed corner of the world, you may be able to get away with such crimes as holding UN personnel hostage, using them as human shields, blockading humanitarian aid to women and children, wantonly breaking ceasefire agreements, and violating the most basic human rights of civilian populations. If you, the military and civilian leaders and field personnel responsible, continue these practices and if you ever step outside your own borders, even for a minute, anywhere in Europe, anywhere in the world, you will be arrested, tried, and convicted for crimes against humanity and civilization just as certainly as day follows night".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Manning: In other words, we need a world sanctioned UN resolution sponsored by Canada that any belligerent who takes a UN peacekeeper hostage will himself be held hostage by the world community until justice and peace prevail.

The issue we are debating today is beyond partisan politics. A great deal of rhetoric and words will not change the situation and may just muddy the waters. We conclude simply by urging upon the government three things. First, to establish and publicly state its own criteria for determining when Canadian peacekeepers should go to a troubled spot in the world, when they should stay, and when they should be withdrawn. Second, to recognize that all the basic criteria justifying the presence of Canadian peacekeepers in the former Yugoslavia have been violated innumerable times and that the time has come to bring our peacekeepers home so they might better serve the cause of peace another day. Third, to lay before the United Nations the resolution I have described so that hostage–takers might themselves be held hostage by the forces of peace.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first of all, on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois and the official opposition, I would like to thank the Speaker of the House for accepting the petition for an emergency debate this evening. I believe that this decision pays tribute to the sense of public interest and moral authority that come shining through in the magnificent way the Speaker of the House carries out his duties.

Secondly, it goes without saying that all members of the official opposition are extremely concerned about the safety of Canadian soldiers stationed there, in particular those being held hostage. We hope that these soldiers and especially their families, who are extremely worried about them, know that the public overwhelmingly supports, admires and thanks them for what they are doing to uphold humanitarian values and keep the peace.

Of course, things are not going very well and the current situation is more than deplorable, it is worrisome and has stirred the indignation of many. After all, the soldiers stationed there did not go to make war, did not go to stick their noses in other people's business; they went there simply to try to relieve the horrors and suffering often imposed on civilians by the reprehensible acts committed there. They are prohibited from using their weapons and they are behaving, I would say, like boy scouts. What they are currently experiencing is utterly unacceptable, considering that the Serbs have taken some of them hostage and even chained some of the hostages like animals to ammunition depots as a means of holding their positions, the Serb army's current defence against air raids.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that that is good reason to take action. But, before deciding to go one way or the other, we should recall the facts. On March 29, a debate took place in this House, which enlightened the government on the decision to be made regarding a six–month extension of the Canadian forces' participation in the UNPROFOR mission to the former Yugoslavia. What we did was to renew Canada's commitment to the peacekeeping mission for six months. This means that, normally, the government will have to reconsider its decision in September and determine whether to extend its commitment.

Meanwhile, the four–month truce expired on April 30 and was not renewed. Consequently, Serb and Croatian forces are now engaged in open hostilities and the area is in a state of war. In addition, what is even more unfortunate, is that the humanitarian air lift to Sarajevo, our very reason for being there, has not been in operation for two months. That is very serious, because one can imagine what happens when medicine, water and food stop being supplied to a major city like Sarajevo.

Just imagine what life is like there. In addition, the six Muslim enclaves, which are protected zones, are under constant attack, and, as the leader of the Reform Party said, nobody's word is respected and no promises are kept. The law of the jungle prevails there.

What is particularly serious, and we say it in all good faith and with all due respect for the UN, is that it would seem that the UN has been fairly lax, nevertheless. We understand the considerable difficulty, but the UN has been lax to some extent. For example, it has allowed dozens and dozens of its decisions to be defied in recent years. Furthermore, almost consistently, UN leaders refuse to accept the recommendations of the military personnel on site. Again, a few days ago, the military personnel on site asked the UN for authority to intervene. The UN refused. The American president considered that it was a mistake, and, on Thursday and Friday, NATO intervened with air strikes. These air strikes hastened the events that led to the deterioration of the situation, that is the hostage taking.

The number of hostages has reached 400 peacekeepers now. They are not all Canadians, of course, but almost 400 peacekeepers are surrounded and are, for all intents and purposes, hostages.

Diplomats, who have fine words to describe things, describe them as people with restricted mobility, but in the honest language of reality, they are hostages. I see no need to protect sensitivities by not calling a spade a spade, when we have people who are supposedly civilized holding hostage 400 soldiers who have come to their country to keep the peace. In addition, ten of them are Canadians, eight are Quebecers, members of the third battalion of the Royal 22nd Regiment from Valcartier, and 45 other Canadian military personnel are confined to their observation post. Here again, we have to understand what this means. It means that they cannot leave, that they are there, that they are prisoners for all intents and purposes, and that they too must be considered hostages.

What is happening all this time? Of course, negotiations are going on, as they should. We know that negotiations do not lead to much there, because agreements are rarely reached and, when they are, they are systematically broken. However, in terms of international diplomatic relations, a process is under way. And so, this evening, the representatives of the contact group will be meeting. The contact group is the main operational group of the countries in this operation. I noted that Canada is not a member. I will say something about this shortly. Therefore, this evening, there will be a very important meeting to decide the course of events. Canada will not be at it.

Tomorrow morning, the Canadian Minister of Foreign Affairs will be meeting with his NATO colleagues in Brussels to decide on a position. We are not too sure what the Canadian position is exactly; in fact, it is very vague. I hope that the present debate will shed some light on the issue so that the government can define more precisely, and in any event, certainly more firmly, more clearly, and more decisively, the position it will adopt tomorrow.

When we hear the plain facts, when we know that scores of peacekeepers have already been killed over there, that altogether we have spent hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars, it is very tempting to think of withdrawing. If we are not careful, we will be tempted to say—as the leader of the Reform Party has just done and I know as many Canadians believe, not the majority though, I think—"Let us get out. After all, we have nothing to gain there. We went there out of sheer generosity, in a humanitarian spirit, to help people. If they do not want to be helped, and if they shoot at us and, on top of that, take us prisoners, hold our people hostage, chaining them like animals to weapons, let us get out".

It is tempting for all of us, and I must admit we, in the Bloc, are not immune to this temptation. However, we must resist doing so, for several reasons. The first reason, and the most important one, is that physically we cannot withdraw. To withdraw at the present time would mean leaving behind the expiatory victims Canadian peacekeepers would undoubtedly become, having gone there to defend humanitarian values, on the orders of this government and in compliance with the parliamentary debates we held. All of a sudden, in the thick of things, after what has just happened, we would leave them there as victims, we would abandon them. No, Mr. Speaker. It is impossible for Canadians and Quebecers to accept such a thing. No. For this reason alone, we must stay and save these people's lives.

Second, there is a more profound reason. We are not there by chance; it is not because we just happened to be around that we were taken prisoners and held hostage. We decided to go there. We went in after serious consideration of compelling reasons. These reasons still hold true.

Although we went over there to save millions of lives, as our fellow citizens deployed over there were courageous enough to do, there are still lives to be saved since the situation has not changed. The war rages on as unarmed civilians, women and children are shot at and mowed down like dogs on the street. We sent troops over there because we believe in peace and democracy and because we felt the need to intervene in order to prevent atrocities. This has not changed. That is why we must stay.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard: We often say the former Yugoslavia, meaning Bosnia. There are roughly 2,100 Canadian soldiers over there, half of them in Croatia and the other half in Bosnia. The peacekeeping mission is based in Croatia—and we are really keeping the peace in that region. We are really keeping the peace between two factions that fight only sporadically. In Bosnia, however, what we do is purely humanitarian since the fighting continues. A war is being fought before our eyes while we carry out humanitarian work. Our convoys bring food, drinking water and medicine to entire civilian populations. Thanks to our efforts, children who would otherwise die of infection are cared for in hospitals, and people have food to eat. Should we stop doing this work? No.

Let us keep in mind that we decided to go over there because we feared that a failure to send troops would lead to a conflagration in the Balkans since, next door, so to speak, are Greece and Macedonia. Several major international conflicts originated in all these countries. The whole region is a potential powder keg. The war in that region is also fought along religious and ethnic lines. All the elements are in place for an all–out war, perhaps even a world war, with the various alliances that could be formed.

We decided to go over there because we wanted to prevent the conflict from spreading. We managed to achieve this goal and to carry out humanitarian work. As long as these conditions prevail, we must stay. Stay, yes, but not in the present conditions.

• (1855)

In this respect, I agree with the leader of the other opposition party that the criteria must be tightened; in at least three debates, we have repeated the same thing over and over to the government. On three separate occasions, in public debates, we have asked the government to tighten its criteria, but we never got an answer from the government.

Today, we insist strongly that our support to continued Canadian participation in peace missions is conditional upon this. It is particularly important to act to change what is going on over there right now. For example, the French Prime Minister, Alain Juppé, just tabled a new plan, which basically calls for an intensification of UN military presence, an intensification of the military aspects of the peacekeepers' role. Response forces would be put under unified command and a tactical group able to deploy rapidly if required would be formed.

If our information is correct, one of the reasons why morale is low over there, a source of concern and outrage for troops participating in this particular mission, is the fact that they have to stand helplessly by as things happen before their very eyes. They see children shot down in the street along with their mothers, but they cannot do anything about it; they are not allowed to shoot. They can only stand by. This is awful for a serviceman or woman, especially one from Canada.

In addition, they are barely allowed to defend themselves. They can do so only when their lives are in imminent danger. When is that exactly? The Serbs basically have a free hand at taking them prisoner. They merely have to get close to an observation point and tell Canadians: "Follow us". And Canadians must follow them without doing anything. In fact, they are prohibited from doing anything. We send Canadians troops there and we prohibit them from doing what soldiers must normally do.

We must absolutely follow up on the French plan, so that a response unit can be organized, and that the soldiers be allowed to shoot, protect themselves and intervene when they witness unacceptable situations. They must be able to act like soldiers, otherwise who are we going to send?

They must also have adequate equipment. For example, we are told that the armour of Canadian vehicles can be perforated by any Serb gunfire. That is unacceptable. If we send peacekeepers over there, then let us provide them with the equipment to succeed. If we need to allocate more funds to allow Canadian forces personnel to have the required equipment, then let us do it, otherwise let us bring them back. Either they are there, and rightly so, or else they come home. But if we send them over there, we have to accept the consequences. We have to be consistent in our commitment.

The government must ensure that Canadian troops sent to Bosnia have the means to do the job which they have been mandated to do under the new mission.

As for the UN, it goes without saying that Canada must co–operate with other UN members. Obviously, democracy and diplomacy, not to mention the common sense governing the new international order, require that the UN be in charge of the whole process. We must therefore continue to support the UN, but that does not mean allowing it not to assume its own responsibilities.

If we are indeed transferring to the UN responsibilities that our ours, it must assume them. But there is a certain lack of resolve on the part of the UN. It is essential that the military be listened to, be heard, that the UN not just adopt resolutions, hold debates and then engage in never–ending discussions, while its decisions are continually ignored.

Why are the UN's decisions systematically ignored? The answer is that the Serbs have got used to doing as they wish, without penalty. If a more stringent approach had been adopted initially, we would not be seeing the present parade of atrocities. A weak position leads to abuse, that is clear. So, either we are there and we do what we have to do, or we stay home.

I would also like to criticize the government for agreeing not to be a member of the contact group. The contact group is the main group, the operational group, it is where decisions are made, strategy is mapped out, criteria are adopted and military missions and instructions are agreed on. The Americans and Germans are there and they do not have any soldiers in Bosnia; we have 2,000 soldiers in the region and are not in the group.

How can the Canadian government agree not to be a member, not to have a say, not to take part in the decisions of this forum that plays such a vital role in the course of events there? I do not understand it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard: I would like to hear the Minister of National Defence tell us why he is not there today.

• (1900)

Why is he not at the contact group tonight to tell the UN and his colleagues what it is that Canada wants to do to defend our Canadian soldiers who are now being held hostage over there? We should at least have the right to talk if we have the right to die.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard: I will conclude by supporting what I perceive as the government's will to maintain our commitment in the former Yugoslavia, but we have to ask the government tonight to tell us clearly what its position is. I do not see how Canada's interest could be threatened or compromised in any way if the minister told us clearly tonight, a few hours before the meeting in Brussels, what instructions were given to the minister who will attend the meeting.

And if he finds that the instructions that the minister has received and the position that he will defend tomorrow in Brussels are not compatible with what the opposition wants, he must contact the minister immediately and change his mandate so that the Canadian minister who will attend the meeting can defend Canada's true position and Canada's true interest which, in this case, happens to be peace.

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the debate this evening and the initiative of the leader of the Reform Party, joined by the Leader of the Opposition. I have listened intently to their speeches. They have made many constructive suggestions which the government will reflect on in the days ahead.

[Translation]

The situation in the former Yugoslavia is sad. A few days ago, 55 of our troops were taken hostage. One of them, Captain Rechner, is an hostage in the real sense of the word. But, in fact, they are all hostages.

[English]

They are all hostages. They are hostages to oppression, to invidious forces. They are hostages to an evil application of hostilities that have arisen over the past centuries and which have culminated today in a civil war in the former Yugoslavia.

[Translation]

Tonight, our thoughts are with our troops. Our thoughts are with each and every one of them; they are with the members of the third battalion of the Royal 22nd Regiment, based in Farnham and in Valcartier, in the province of Quebec. Our thoughts are also with their friends, who must be very worried. Our thoughts are with all of them.

[English]

The debate is taking place in the context of the deterioration of the situation in Bosnia for a third time, as I have just outlined and which has been acknowledged by the previous two speakers. We have seen Canadian soldiers treated in a most unfortunate way.

In the case of Captain Patrick Rechner, the image of a proud Canadian peacekeeper chained to a pole is something we could never have countenanced before and which has brought the level of conflict in that part of the world to a new low. It represents an escalation in tactics that are reprehensible. It constitutes an attempt to blackmail not just Canadians, because Canada is not the only country affected, but the blackmail will not work. The people of Canada and the Government of Canada and members of the House will not give in to blackmail.

The real questions are not why we are there or how we got there. Those were matters decided in another time in response to the fragmentation of what was then a very civil state in southern Europe. The questions tonight, as have been acknowledged by the leaders of the Reform Party and the official opposition, are really whether the mandate of the United Nations as presently constituted is still valid and if so, is it being properly discharged? Is it being discharged effectively?

I do not think anyone believes the mandate is being properly discharged as was intended. If it is not, how can we reformulate the mandate to ensure its objectives are met and to ensure the safety of personnel, particularly our own proud Canadian soldiers who are acknowledged by all members of the House to be among the best peacekeepers in the world?

There is validity to this mandate. We sent peacekeepers to Bosnia and Croatia on humanitarian missions to help deliver aid to suffering civilians. We must not lose sight of the fact that, despite our natural outrage and the difficulties our troops are facing at the moment, there has been success with this mandate over the past three years.

When Canadians went into Sarajevo in 1992 Sarajevans were cut off, unable to receive food or medical supplies and were without safe drinking water. Canada helped open the Sarajevo airport. We have participated in an airlift which ensured humanitarian assistance could be delivered. For months on months it was the one Hercules flight a day from Ancona, Italy going into Sarajevo amid bullets and other mortar attacks that delivered the aid.

Canada is justly proud of our soldiers on the ground and our air force personnel who have taken on those dangerous missions with Hercules aircraft, and our sailors who have been in operation sharp guard on the Adriatic coast. The three forces of the Canadian Armed Forces have been present and have discharged their duties effectively.

We have provided protection for relief convoys and refugees. We have monitored ceasefires in the safe areas of Srebrenica and Gorazde. Who can forget what Canadians 18 months ago did in going into Srebrenica and saving thousands and thousands of the Muslim faction in that safe haven? Canadians should again be justly proud.

I believe, perhaps because I am an incurable optimist about life, about humanity, that the detention of over 300 UN personnel at the moment including 10 Canadians is a temporary challenge. As I said earlier, Canada will not give in to blackmail, the international community will not give in to blackmail, but we will attempt to negotiate the release of our peacekeepers. We have succeeded in the past and I hope we will do so again.

Therefore, as long as the mission remains valid, and we have seen that validity as I have described over the last few years, if there are temporary road blocks, we must overcome them. We must deal with the problems, with the mandate and its application.

[Translation]

Given the current crisis, we must examine a number of conflicting elements in the UNPROFOR's mandate, mostly in terms of the safety zones, the no–fly zones and the use of force as support for our humanitarian assistance operations.

The current situation also brings to light the conflicting measures taken by the various stakeholders. The lack of a strong consensus within the security council and the contact group, some of the specific diplomatic initiatives undertaken and the differences of opinions expressed by the countries sending troops over there are among the elements that leave the door wide open to manipulation by the warring parties. Such an approach, which is too often defined by domestic political considerations and narrow national interests, can no longer be tolerated.

[English]

Perhaps we have failed by not speaking with one voice. Whether it is members of the contact group, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Reform Party are correct, Canada should have been there. We cannot look back. We have to look forward. Even members of that group have not spoken with one voice. The true contributors have not spoken with one voice. That has invited manipulation on the part of certain factions in ex–Yugoslavia and it cannot continue.

• (1910)

At this decisive moment for the future of UNPROFOR, Canada believes that three conditions are necessary for the international community to continue with the initiative.

Firstly, the multitude of approaches has created uncertainties which the warring parties have used to their advantage in their dealings with the various players. Consequently, the political process of negotiation must be reduced to a common denominator. The international community must develop a common position in these negotiations and speak with one voice.

[English]

We have to speak with one voice. Not just Canada and our allies in NATO but the entire international community.

[Translation]

Secondly, our collective effort should be spearheaded by an effort to re–establish a functional link between the negotiation process and the military operations on the front. As recent events have shown, a UNPROFOR devoid of its political mandate could quickly become a bargaining tool for the warring factions.

In such circumstances, each failure, each major obstacle encountered by UNPROFOR forces us to call into question its existence. To close the gap between the negotiation process and military operations, all of the players will have to work to improve co–ordination between the contact group and the countries contributing troops.

[English]

Whether we are let in the door of the contact group is not the issue tonight. The issue is there must be better co–ordination between that group and countries like Canada that contribute thousands of personnel.

[Translation]

Thirdly, the current situation has demonstrated that the parties in conflict rate UNPROFOR very low on the credibility scale. On the short term, Canada believes that the credibility and the viability of the peacekeeping forces depend on four factors: consolidating troops to avoid diluting or weakening the capacity of UN forces to defend themselves.

[English]

In other words, we have to consolidate our troops to better defend themselves and to be effective in their mission.

[Translation]

Once the hostage crisis is over, reviewing UNPROFOR's mandate, concentrating on activities which are most likely to succeed, given the resources currently provided to troops and their safety.

[English]

This crisis will end. It will take some negotiation. Once it is over we should revise the UNPROFOR mandate given the resources we all have as contributing countries and given the need for security of our forces.

[Translation]

The third factor is the withdrawal of military observers from territory under Serb control, in order to reduce their vulnerability.

[English]

Happily we have only two UUNMOs, unarmed United Nations military observers, in Serb held territory, Captain Ryan Lapalm and Captain Rechner. These two people have been captured.

As I said earlier, no matter how one slices it, they are all hostages. All of the 300 tonight are hostages to hostages to an unacceptable blackmail.

We probably have to think about the withdrawal of the UUNMOs in those areas to prevent this kind of occurrence again.

[Translation]

The last factor is the use of force to retaliate against violations of UN resolutions, including frequent air strikes to support the work of peacekeeping troops.

• (1915)

[English]

In other words, it is the greater application of force where necessary and where our security is threatened, including air support. We have to make sure that the strict guidelines laid down for NATO air support negotiated last year are applied appropriately.

There is one thing I do disagree with in what the hon. Leader of the Opposition said and perhaps I am doing him an injustice in repeating it. He said that if we are going to die we should be part of a group to talk about our future, or words to that effect. I am sorry to have to paraphrase it. I have acknowledged the fact that it is regrettable we are not part of the contact group. Canada believes there has to be this greater co–ordination as I have outlined. However we are not prepared to say that any of our Canadian soldiers will die in this crisis or in the future. Every single Canadian life is important. We do reject the notion that somehow we are on a downward spiral which cannot be stopped.

Europe has given us terrible crises and wars in this century. The area of the Balkans was the caldron for the beginning of the first world war. It was in August 1914 that Archduke Ferdinand was assassinated in Sarajevo in the middle of Bosnia which led to the catapulting of the European nations into what was then called the great war. The government and I fear that unless certain steps are taken, unless the UN succeeds and unless negotiations succeed we could be drawn into an ever greater conflict.

The leader of the Reform Party has said that perhaps it is time for us to withdraw. Do Canadians want to withdraw from a country that until two or three years ago was relatively civilized and which has contributed many people to our cultural and social mosaic? Do we want to let those people lapse into an abyss of hostility, brutality and torture as we come to the dawn of the 21st century? Do Canadians want to be part of that? Perhaps that would be one of the results of a UN withdrawal.

There are parallels today with what went on in the 1920s and the 1930s. We see throughout Europe and in our own country where the forces of tolerance are being strained. We see people persecuted for their beliefs and for the colour of their skin. We see phobias developing not just in Europe but also in North America. We see that lack of civility occurring every day on television. We hear it on the radio and read it in newspapers. Only a few weeks ago we saw graphic evidence of man's inhumanity to man with the bombing in Oklahoma City.

There are parallels with what western society is going through today and what it went through 50 and 60 years ago after the first world war. In those times the leaders, perhaps in their naivete, in their honesty went down certain paths. They went down certain paths of appeasement. They went down certain paths of retreat, of isolation. Do we want to do that again in 1995?

Those paths led to the second world war. They led to an even greater carnage where millions upon millions of civilians were butchered, were bombed. I saw the result of that growing up in London after the war. I saw those craters. I saw those kids without fathers. I never want to see that happen in my time. I do not want my son to be sent over to another European war.

I am not overdramatizing the situation. The situation is grave. It is serious. Let us not try to take the easy way out. As Canadians, let us try to talk this out to bring some of our tolerance and civility to that country.

There is a reason that the Canadian peacekeepers are the best and that the Muslim faction, the Croat faction and the Serb faction respect us the most. It is because we are a culturally pluralistic society which knows that discussion, compromise and accommodation can keep multi–ethnic, multi–religious and multi–racial societies together.

Canada has something to tell the world. Those peacekeepers currently are from the Royal 22nd Regiment, the third battalion, and of course the second battalion in Croatia, and we must not forget the work that it is doing. Others are from the service battalions and from other support groups, the transport groups. All those people are representatives of the values we all share as Canadians. Those values are of trust and tolerance, people who believe the world can be made into a better place.

Tomorrow there is the meeting of the foreign minister and my colleague the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who will be leading Canada's position at those discussions. I hope they will reflect upon the suggestions we make and which my colleague will make tomorrow to redesign this mandate, to make sure that we do not give up just because things get a little tough.

Canadians are justly proud of the sacrifices we have made in two world wars, in the Korean war and through countless peacekeeping missions. Over 100,000 Canadians lie buried in Europe. Over 100 peacekeepers have been killed in the last 40 years in the service of the UN. Those 100 peacekeepers did not die in vain because those UN missions prevented scores, hundreds, thousands of other deaths.

Only by the continuation of the UN presence in ex–Yugoslavia can we make sure that more deaths are prevented, that more hostilities, brutality and torture are prevented so that we do not go back to those days of 1992 where there was ethnic cleansing, butchery and savagery in the heart of Europe on the dawn of the 21st century. That is why Canadians must not give up on the UN mandate.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I too want to thank the Speaker. It is important in something so critical as this debate tonight that we get the opportunity to express our views and the views Canadians are trying to express to their elected members.

I will start by asking why we originally went to Bosnia. I certainly do not want to dwell on it, but we were pulling out of Europe. We were closing our NATO bases. I believe it was an opportunity for us to simply convince NATO that we would just take a right turn and we would be still in Europe but we would now be in the former Yugoslavia.

I believe that in so doing we were camp followers. The red book indicated that we were no longer going to do that. We joined every UN mission we could get involved with regardless of of the criteria or whether we could achieve a goal.

Most of us would agree that we cannot do that any longer. We have to develop a set of mandates. We have to look at and analyse what the criteria should be. We do that for a number of reasons.

• (1925)

The original mandate in the former Yugoslavia was humanitarian aid. I do not think there is one person in this House who would not say they have the same sense of feeling seeing those children and women, those people maimed in the terrible war that has gone on.

I do not think the human atrocities we read about and see so graphically on CNN and other newscasts affect any of us any differently. They are terrible. It would be wonderful if they did not happen in the world, but the atrocities are still going on. They go on at night. Seventy young people are bombed because they all happen to be in a restaurant at the same time. Those atrocities make us question the mandate, they make us ask if we are really stopping anything in terms of humanitarian aid.

We also have to ask what we are doing about the peace process. Obviously we have encouraged and we have tried to help. We would do most anything. Our troops have done a wonderful job of trying to prevent the sorts of atrocities we have talked about. I do not believe we are delivering a peace process any longer. I do not believe there is a will for that peace. I am not even sure our presence is not prolonging a potential peace.

Some might say there would be massive killing. There might be, but maybe they do not have the stomach for that either. Perhaps they are simply carrying on with that killing in a slow fashion because we are there. It seems that one month one group is leading the charge and is ahead and then the other group comes along and moves ahead. We feel sorry for one side or the other, but I am not sure we are preventing or stopping any of it and that is the problem.

If we were at least keeping the warring parties apart, if we could somehow form that wedge as we used to do in peacekeeping, even then we could understand our role better. Each piece of the mandate seems to have fallen apart.

We are not able to deliver that humanitarian aid. It is not happening. We can feel terrible about it but we are not getting through any longer. The Sarajevo airport is closed. We are not getting supplies in. The UN peacekeepers are being fired on. They are all literally hostages. Some of them are confined to barracks. Some of them have mine fields around their barracks.

Warring parties are fighting now full bore and are going after each other. They are having spring offensives, summer offensives, fall offensives and the war is carrying on. I cannot imagine being a peacekeeper and watching that sort of genocide. I cannot imagine not getting involved. I have to give our peacekeepers credit for not getting involved when they see that happening in front of them. It is obviously due to the discipline and training they have received.

The Canadian peacekeepers are the best in the world. We cannot debate that and it is not the issue. It goes without saying that we are grateful for their skill and ability. It certainly hurts us when someone says that we are running down the Canadian peacekeepers. None of us is doing that nor do we intend to.

Canadians are saying that enough is enough. They have had enough of this war. We have been there three years and we are no closer to peace today than we were three years ago.

We are sometimes compared to the French and the British. After all, we have the third largest contingency. However we cannot be compared with them because the French and the British are closer to home. They have naval forces and air forces there. They have brand new equipment. I know from talking to the British about the equipment they have that it does not compare to ours. Let us not be compared to them because we are different.

Consider the spiralling costs of this whole thing. What does it cost Canadians and what have we achieved with the expenditure of that money? The danger has increased in Bosnia. When I listened to the Prime Minister's speech last Wednesday he said that nothing much had changed in six months. I could not believe it. No one said that other than the Prime Minister.

• (1930)

We have mentioned the lightning rod in this whole issue, which is the picture of Captain Patrick Rechner chained to a post at the ammo dump. That is the lightning rod that has Canadians involved in the issue. I do not think we can emphasize how much.

A similar lightning rod turned the Americans away from Somalia when they saw their GIs dragged through the streets. I do not think it is that much different. We feel patriotic and say: "That is one of ours they are humiliating". We feel the love of country and say: "They cannot do that to us. We cannot be humiliated that way". That is the feeling that wells up and that is why Canadians are now so involved in the issue.

The Reform Party warned that the war could escalate and time and time again asked: "Will this not happen?" The minister is right, we did start by saying: "Let us go and do what we can". However we came to the conclusion some time ago that we could not accomplish the mandate and we were not equipped to stay and carry it out.

As well, we have been assured there is a plan for getting our troops out. Assurances have been given four or five times during question period that there is a contingency plan in place. Canadians need to know and believe that. It cannot be just an answer to a question in question period. They want to know about the contingency plan, not that it will not work, but to know and have confidence that the plan is in place.

Canadians are shocked, outraged and humiliated by what is happening. Canada does not need a Vietnam. We talk about escalation. I want to quote from a CP story that came out at 3.15 this afternoon. "Britain with 3,300 troops in the UN force was to start sending more troops to Bosnia today. About 1,200 soldiers are to be sent within three weeks and 5,000 more were placed on alert for possible duty".

Canadians will ask: Why would we want to be in that escalation of this no win war? The Germans were in the former Yugoslavia, tried to subdue the problems there and did not succeed. Why would we want to get involved in any escalation, if the story is true? That is what people will be asking.

We must have a reason for being there. We have to feel that we are accomplishing something. No Canadians want a repeat of the scene of the past few days of the soldier chained to the post. That is the graphic lightning rod that gets people involved in this issue.

Look at what happened to the Americans. They pulled out of peacekeeping and will not go back for many years. It has hurt world peace because the American people responded so violently. We could say it was wrong that the picture appeared in every newspaper but it happened. Another picture has ignited emotions in the people of Canada. I really believe it is true. What do I base that on? Nothing large or scientific, just a feeling I get from what Canadians are saying.

I have been asking people, as well as the minister and many MPs, what they think. I will give a couple of examples. On a BCTV phone in show over 90 per cent of callers, over 3,000 people said: "Pull out"; 211 people said: "Stay in".

I was on the Anne Petrie show on Friday night and every single caller said to pull out. I was on four phone in shows today and every caller said pull out. Canadians are getting involved. They are concerned and are saying: "We are not prepared to risk Canadian lives for this cause". We should push for a multilateral withdrawal. That is the only obvious thing to do. However, I think the Minister of Foreign Affairs should be pushing for withdrawal, not escalation. The biggest thing we should be pushing for is negotiation. In that way we can make sure the situation does not escalate and involve the Russians, the Turks or the Greeks. That is where the diplomacy needs to occur. That is where the emphasis should be.

I do not believe we should be waiting to see what the French President or the British Prime Minister are going to say. We can show some leadership.

The government says it will not cut and run. However, what we we need to emphasize is that Canadians have served bravely for years. We have done everything possible to keep the warring parties apart and to try to get them to find some sort of peace. We have delivered humanitarian aid to the best of our ability and it has been great in some areas.

The UN secretary general has said that the UN mandate is not being fulfilled. We all agree with that. The hostage taking shows the Bosnian Serbs have no respect for UN peacekeepers. Withdrawal makes common sense and would in no way be a humiliation for Canada. We should emphasize that.

Canada is not a member of the contact group. The minister has said that is not the way it should be but that is the way it is. The Prime Minister admitted today that Canada was not consulted before air strikes were carried out even though the UN must have known what the Bosnian Serbs would do. It is a disgrace that Canadian lives are being threatened and the UN does not even consult us. That should not happen.

The government already has said that Canada will not withdraw. I then feel rather disheartened by this debate. If we are not going to withdraw then obviously the government is not willing to listen to any other ideas. It is sad that the government had to be forced to hold this debate. We were told: "Let the third party use one of its opposition days". More than just the third party is interested in this issue. Hundreds and thousands of Canadians are interested in this issue.

If the government learns nothing else, let us at least say that we must set some criteria. We must know how long we are going to be there, how much it is going to cost, the minimum goals that we will agree to, the conditions under which the mission will be scrapped and provisions for parliamentary approval of peacekeeping missions in the future.

As has been said many times, we cannot be the 911 number for the world. How many hot spots are there? What is coming next? We need those criteria now.

There are still opportunities for Canada. Canada should be in peacekeeping. We are good at it. We are proud to be peacekeepers. However, it must be targeted and the criteria must be in place. Although we would like to help out in Bosnia, all of the things we have seen have illustrated that we just are not able to be peacekeepers in that area any longer.

The Canadian people are demanding leadership from the government. It cannot bury its head in the sand and wait for Britain and France to make a decision. The UN mandate is a flop. Our peacekeepers are extremely vulnerable and getting more vulnerable every day. With no peace in sight the only fair thing for the government to do is bring our peacekeepers home. I know how difficult it will be. However we did have a president of the United States come to this place and say that he would help to make that happen. It is not cap in hand, it is reality and it is saving Canadian lives.

At the NATO meeting tomorrow the government should call for a multilateral withdrawal. It should work with our partners to bring it about as quickly and as safely as possible and then get into the job of negotiating. The emphasis should be on diplomacy. The emphasis for us has to be on what kind of future laws and administration we can put in place to prevent the atrocities that people visit on one another. We must do that in the world. I realize it is easier said than done. However, we must have that mandate. I believe we have to try. I believe no Canadian needs to hold his or her head down. I believe that those troops should and must come home.

Hon. Christine Stewart (Secretary of State (Latin America and Africa), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this emergency debate on the very critical situation which Canada and the leaders of the world face in Bosnia.

I am very pleased the government has lived up to its commitment to allow the House of Commons, the Parliament of Canada, to participate in an emergency debate in situations like this in anticipation of decisions which have to be made this coming week and in the weeks to come on this very difficult situation. It is not something that happened in the previous Parliament in which I participated and I am pleased that we all have the opportunity this evening.

Unfortunately, we do not have any Solomon or Solomina to enlighten us on a path through the darkness which we call Bosnia. It requires the opinion and the reflection of all of us to come forward with some ideas about how Canada can best move through the emergency situation with which we are confronted today.

Recent events compel us to confront the realities of the situation on the ground in Bosnia and our responsibilities as members of the international community. I welcome the opportunity. However, I would like to acknowledge before I begin to explain the values, the principles and the priorities of the government, the participation of many of my constituents and so many other Canadians in the Bosnian situation. They serve with pride and they deserve distinction in that arena as they do in so many other peacekeeping arenas around the world.

I have had the privilege of visiting some of our peacekeepers on the ground in different parts of the world. In our very simple, informal conversations together they cannot know the pride I have in what they are doing and the gratefulness which I experience on behalf of myself, my family and all Canadians for the great contribution they make for us to the world and its peace.

We must first acknowledge that in the Bosnian situation the belligerents on the ground are well aware of the consequences of their actions and of the CNN world. The Bosnian Serbs have improved on the practice of Saddam Hussein in ensuring that their uncivilized treatment of UN personnel is broadcast repeatedly to every country whose soldiers are now held as human shields. Such barbaric practices, which the UN has rightly characterized as worthy only of terrorist organizations, are repugnant.

As the Prime Minister has underlined, Canadians are not quitters. We will not cut and run. We will not give in to blackmail. We will uphold those principles which the blue berets represent, unarmed military observers or UNPROFOR troops. Canadians have persevered through two other similar incidents. As we speak, our commanders on the ground and UN staff are negotiating the release of those held hostage and detained. However, all Canadians are surely right in asking: How did we and the UN come to this point? What can be done about it? How can we prevent a recurrence of these outrages?

My colleague across the floor just asked a few minutes ago: Why did we go to Bosnia? I consider that he gave a very cynical answer to that question. Canada was one of the first to call for UN intervention in the Yugoslav conflict. Canada has responded generously, both in support of direct humanitarian assistance and through our contribution of Canadian forces on the ground. Our aim has been to provide relief to the victims of the conflict and to help stabilize the situation so the negotiators could achieve a peaceful settlement.

We will not take sides and our practices on the ground are recognized by all parties to have been exemplary. From the outset we recognized the risks. Each of the 10 deaths and numerous casualties has reinforced the reality that UN missions, especially in the former Yugoslavia, are not for the faint hearted.

We are committed to the UN mission in the former Yugoslavia provided our forces do not face unacceptable risks. The purpose of this mission is to help stabilize the situation on the ground and in so doing help create conditions where negotiations can succeed.

We do not accept that the outcome of this conflict on the doorstep of Europe should be solved by armed force, either by the Bosnian Serbs who control 70 per cent of Bosnia's territory or over time by the Bosnian government which despairing of the diplomatic process may hope to regain territory by force.

Hence we have consistently opposed the lifting of the arms embargo and have been resolute in supporting a series of diplomatic efforts aimed at achieving a negotiated settlement. That this has not yet occurred is not cause for despair but for continuing resolution.

Those who advocate a general withdrawal of forces seem indifferent to the risks of such a move; a rapid escalation of the conflict with the threat that it would spread north and west to Croatia, south to Kosovo and the former Yugoslav republic of Macedonia, beyond to involve NATO allies. Responding to such crisis would require a quantum leap in the number of forces and assistance Canada and its allies are currently providing in the former Yugoslavia.

The current crisis should also not obscure the very real achievements of UNPROFOR. The UN succeeded for many months in keeping the Sarajevo airport open for humanitarian assistance. At the local level, as any visitor to CANBAT II in Visoko will testify, UN blue helmets have brought vital humanitarian relief to the most defenceless of civilians such as those in the hospital for orphans in Fojnica.

Our intervention has meant the difference between local misunderstandings flaring into broader scale conflict. Canadians and other UNPROFOR forces have been carrying out this process of building peace from the bottom up by ensuring local ceasefires work, patiently and behind the scenes.

Perhaps our most notable success has been the endurance of the Croat–Muslim ceasefire, now over a year old and still holding. Patient negotiation that has meant local farmers could plant and harvest crops and the demand on international agencies to meet basic needs are increasingly being filled by normal commerce.

Our presence, as in Srebrenica, has prevented a recurrence of the gross violations of human rights we now know as ethnic cleansing and the deliberate mass rape of women as a means of pursuing military ends. Without UN eyes the sheer violence and destruction of this conflict would have been far worse.

We must acknowledge that short of a more comprehensive diplomatic solution, these local initiatives and successes cannot endure. The recent actions of the Bosnian Serbs strike at the very heart of the UN mission.

This is why Canada and our Prime Minister have been so active in recent days trying to ensure the mission continues with Canadian participation but with greater effectiveness and greater security for our forces.

I will outline some of the government's thinking at this point and welcome members' comments. We need to avoid the wide dispersal of troops on the ground. Once the current hostage crisis is resolved we need to concentrate our efforts on those parts of the mandate that we can actually achieve under the current circumstances.

We need to consider withdrawing UN military observers from territory where they have been repeatedly threatened and harassed. We are prepared to be more forceful on the ground in responding to harassment and violations of UN security resolutions within the means available to our forces on the ground.

The government and I believe all Canadians want to be actively engaged in the key foreign policy issues confronting the new, post–cold war era. In the Yugoslav crisis this has meant substantial commitments on the ground and substantial risks.

• (1950)

We are not prepared to retreat when pushed. We remain committed to a solution which safeguards the rights of all communities within the states of the former Yugoslavia and a more secure and stable Balkans. In the final analysis, this is in our own long term interests as a multi–ethnic trading nation and a key partner in the community of transatlantic values.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate in this debate tonight. It has been two months since we last debated this issue. I have listened intently to presentations. While I do not agree with all the aspects, they have been instructive. I think it is beneficial to the Canadian public to witness this debate. I do respect even the points I disagree with.

Very quickly I want to review where our troops are and how many are there, give some indication of the successes we have had to date and then give a personal aspect of this because I and other members of the House were in the area of which we speak last year, and because of the connection of the number of people from my province who are represented throughout the region.

I want to look at the participants we have in the area of ex–Yugoslavia. We have roughly 40,000 military personnel. Canada has 2,100 on the ground and 234 on the HMCS Montreal doing a patrol in the Adriatic. They are located in a number of main positions.

There are three main positions. A mechanized battalion group of 757 personnel is in southern Croatia. These personnel are involved in traditional peacekeeping, separating two closing forces. The next group is a battle group of 825 personnel near the Sarajevo area, actually stationed in the camp in Visoko which we hear was recently shelled. This group provides humanitarian aid, manning observer posts, the main group from which the hostages or detainees were taken.

The third group is a logistics battalion group in the southern part of the area based in Primosten. Its function is to provide logistic support to the other two groups.

In addition, we have a headquarters group in the Zagreb area and other areas. Basically we have a total of about 230 personnel acting as headquarters groups. We have 20 observers in various groups throughout the ex–Yugoslavia area which regrettably is the area the two hostages, Captain Rechner and Captain Lapalm, are from.

I say with the deepest of conviction the hearts of all members of Parliament go out to their parents and theirs friends and relations for the dedication and suffering they are going through. We certainly appreciate it and understand the difficulty.

It is very difficult to put into perspective, with the hardships and difficulty we are going through right now, what good we are doing. I want to recount a number of areas I and other members of the House are familiar with. We have spoken about the Sarajevo airlift. The Canadian forces have kept that airport open since July 1992. We remember CNN photographs of the difficulty these aircraft had landing under fire, unloading under fire and taking off under fire. It was not an easy situation. We had a total of 1,775 flights transporting more than 12,000 personnel and 25,000 tonnes of supplies. Most of this was humanitarian aid. The total dollar value was around $60 million.

In addition, Canadian forces personnel have been actively involved in many humanitarian efforts up to and including the distribution of firewood, clothing, supplies and building materials to all three warring factions.

• (1955)

The work has two purposes. The first is to provide much needed help to the local civilian population to which our hearts really go out. The second is to develop a sense of trust and goodwill between the parties and UN personnel, including the Canadian contingent.

I will give some other indications of the work that was done. I know some hon. members saw a situation in Vacovici where there was a hospital for mental patients. As a result of the conflict not too long ago the patients were murdered, raped and set on fire. It is almost too vicious to bring to the floor of the House. When we were there as part of the parliamentary special committee, Canadian forces were guarding the hospital to make sure the surviving patients were looked after. One would have to have a very hard heart not to be moved by this aspect of what we are doing in humanitarian aid.

On a daily basis Canadian peacekeepers do a lot to relieve the pain of children as well as handicapped and abused individuals. Last Christmas Peacekeepers left their base for the Filip Jakov hospital near Croatia's Adriatic coast, close to where the logistic group is, to hand out some 120 teddy bears and dolls to 65 children under the age of 15. That was a pretty great thing to do at that time of the year.

I cannot forget the sailors. HMCS Halifax provided aid to a refugee camp in Slovenia. Sailors are well known for their generosity and donated about 50 bags of toys and clothing to the residents of the camp. Eight of them donated four days of their time to do general maintenance, including plumbing, carpentry, roofing and painting. Kitchen repairs were important, as all Slovenia refugee camps were required to buy and prepare their own food. These are some examples that we in the House should remember.

I want to go very quickly to some personal feeling about Canada's peacekeeping, continuing to peacekeep and be involved in peace operations. We all agree we are not talking about traditional peacekeeping operations or peace operations in the general sense.

I am very proud that when I was with the parliamentary committee of 15 members plus staff which did our investigation and spent time in Bosnia and Croatia 25 per cent of the group in Croatia and the main group in Bosnia were from Newfoundland. That is a large percentage. We make up 2.2 per cent of the population and 25 per cent were involved in these two main combat groups. In addition, the ships Preserver and Halifax were in the Adriatic at the time. It was roughly the same proportion, 25 per cent.

I do not want to draw any conclusions except to say this gives me licence to make some comment in addition to the general comment I would make as a parliamentary secretary.

There are three things that come to mind. While it was not in the former Yugoslavia, as a result of the mop–up operations from the gulf campaign, one soldier in my riding lost his foot in a mine clearing operation. My wife and I went to see his parents within two days after it happened. We were involved in bringing him home and setting up some rehabilitation. Initially we were with his parents for almost an hour and a half and never once did they mention they did not think he should be there. I was really struck by that. I saw them perhaps a dozen times in the course of the next year and a half. That last time was when their son was awarded the 125th anniversary medal. They did not mention it then.

On November 11 last I was in Port de Grave, a district of my riding well known for its fishermen. A gentleman came to me after I had conducted the business with the fishermen and said he wanted to speak to me. He said his son is in Croatia and asked if I could tell him what he is doing. I told him and he said he was proud his son is there.

Tonight I got a call from a minister of the Anglican church in Baie de Verde in my riding who said he knew it is a difficult decision but he believes we should stay there. Those are very important points, and in consideration of the number of Newfoundlanders involved I think they should be somewhat significant in the presentations we are making this evening.

When we did the special committee work, which was eight to nine months of intensive work, we spoke with over 500 Canadians, received 350 submissions, met in 50 or 60 locations. The biggest decision we had to make was whether we would continue our peacekeeping efforts. The decision was yes, based on the evidence we received from Canadians.

It is not an easy judgment to make, but I believe we are there for a reason. It is not easy right now, but I believe we have to stay. I wish it were otherwise. However, there is a difficulty in doing anything other than staying the course right now. Right now there are two Canadian hostages and 53 Canadian detainees. They are being held by the Serbs. If we were to try to withdraw I would suggest there would be other detainees. It would not be an easy situation. We have the fifth–largest contingent out of 35 countries. I can only repeat what the Minister of National Defence said, which is that it is really important that we talk with one voice.

I believe we should stay the course, continue to negotiate, get over this very difficult milestone, and, yes, look at the mandate again and hopefully come up with a better solution for the former Yugoslavia, for Europe, and indeed for Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to all those who have taken part in the debate and cannot help thinking of all that they said on February 25, 1994, when we started with a debate on the purpose of peace missions. Here again, we were talking about peace missions and particularly about Bosnia.

I remember very well that either the Minister of National Defence or the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the members of the Reform Party and the Leader of the Official Opposition reached a sort of consensus that peace missions should exist based on the information we had and what we had seen of the events in Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia. There was no choice but to maintain peace missions and, more importantly Canada's role at that point, which was a humanitarian role supplying food to the civilian population, which needed it desperately and continues to do so.

Today, the debate has changed context. The Reform Party is strongly recommending, I believe, if I have understood properly, that we withdraw Canadian troops from Bosnia and from the former Yugoslavia and that we continue negotiations through diplomatic channels.

I have some difficulty with this position, Mr. Speaker, and I will explain a bit what happens.

The initial discussion on this issue took place in February 1994. These troops, by the way, come in large part from the Valcartier base, which is in my riding. On the weekend, I had an opportunity to meet the wives and mothers of soldiers who are involved in the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. Not once did I hear anyone say that these soldiers should not be there or that there was no reason for Canadians to be there. I heard something else, which I will mention during my speech.

Therefore, as I was saying, 15 months after the February 1994 debate, we are faced with a situation that is even more alarming than when we spoke in this debate. The situation is also a rather curious one.

This afternoon, during question period, I asked the Prime Minister to hold a debate before the contact group meets tonight and tomorrow morning, so that the House can express, through its discussions, a position which would reflect the views of people across Canada and what they expect of their leaders, as well as the opinion of the military personnel who have been there, and have come back.

• (2005)

Then we realized, during the debate and listening to the defence minister's speech, that Canada is not represented on the contact group; in any event, through various channels, we can still have a certain influence. I would like to point out that four to six weeks ago, the defence minister was asked why, given that the Canadian military contribution was the fourth or fifth largest, Canada was not a party to the decision making process of the contact group.

I remember the minister's reaction. He mentioned that, indeed, it was a shame for Canada not to be part of this decision making group and that the Prime Minister would mention it during his trip, with the hope that Canada might take part in those discussions. I believe the Prime Minister forgot to raise the issue because, once again, Canada has been excluded from the discussions. The government policies are very laudable, as the Leader of the Opposition clearly explained. The raison d'être of peacekeeping and of the present mission of the Canadian army in the former Yugoslavia, in my view and in the view of the Bloc Quebecois, is not at issue.

We do not doubt the usefulness of peacekeeping missions nor the effectiveness of Canadian peacekeepers. In fact, as the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence said earlier, we had the good—or bad—fortune of spending a few days with Canadian peacekeepers in the former Yugoslavia, which probably convinced us even more of the usefulness of their actions.

Travelling in an armoured vehicle and seeing five and six year old boys and girls as well as people working in the fields stop to blow kisses or wave whenever a UN armoured vehicle went by, I realized that these people feel grateful for the positive actions of UN peacekeepers from Canada and other countries.

This debate was requested by the Reform Party. We supported their request, although not exactly for the same reason. As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, we are in favour of maintaining Canadian troops and peacekeepers in the former Yugoslavia. We could even go back to what was pointed out by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence. Indeed, the Standing Committee on Defence spent several months reviewing Canada's defence policy; the Bloc Quebecois, for its part, tabled a dissenting report calling for the reform of UN peacekeeping missions, for an overhaul of the Security Council, and for clearer peacekeeping criteria.

The comments made by the government through the minister and the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs show that they have not progressed beyond wishful thinking. They want more concentrated forces, whether it is Canadian troops or all UN forces. We must keep in mind that when Canadian troops left in March as part of the rotation, we asked the UN to keep them together in the Primosten region of Croatia, so that they could fulfil their role in preparing humanitarian convoys and carrying out humanitarian missions.

We realize that, once again, they did not really listen to us. I understand that the conditions are difficult and that the Bosnians, who are using Canadians as an insurance policy in Visoko, might not accept our departure.

• (2010)

I realize that the Serbs are taking advantage of the situation. We will remember that, for months on end, a French speaking Canadian of whom we should all be proud—I am referring to General Dallaire—had been saying that the UN had lost its credibility. The Minister of National Defence himself recognized a moment ago that the credibility of the UNPROFOR and UN missions had decreased sharply.

The Serbs have defied some 150 or 200 UN resolutions, figuring that they had nothing to fear since the UN passes resolutions but does not enforce them. General Dallaire often indicated that the reform process should be intensified and steps should be taken to give this mission and any further mission credibility.

This advice was overlooked and I cannot see in the government position, as stated by the defence minister or the foreign affairs parliamentary secretary, anything more than lip service. The minister spoke of the diversity of approaches being taken, causing some confusion in the negotiations with the Serbs, or the Croats, or the Bosnian. I do not think that the diversity of approaches is to blame, but rather some degree of laissez–faire within the UN.

I clearly recall a statement the Canadian Minister of Foreign Affairs made in New York last summer to the effect that the UN should undergo reform, going as far as suggesting that a standing response force of sorts be established. The Bloc Quebecois supported this idea but it would seem that the defence minister used doubletalk at a time when the Canadian government should have had a single voice.

I would like to add that I do not think that the Quebec and Canadian troops deployed over there are not proud to be there, as both the minister and the parliamentary secretary mentioned earlier. Among them are some 1,800 troops from the base in Valcartier. I have met members of their families. This is a second or third tour of duty for many of them and all of them are proud to do what they have to do. They are proud of what they have accomplished as well.

At times, they find the limited latitude and flexibility the UN gives them frustrating. Some individuals made revelations upon their return and there have been descriptions of barbaric acts said to have taken place in this region of the former Yugoslavia. Unfortunately, during that period, some journalists exploited the situation and said that peacekeepers were there to count the bodies. I think that some individuals were very affected by the atrocities, the killings and the bloodshed which they witnessed, as well as by the fact that they could not intervene.

Today, we expected to hear that Canadian peacekeepers would remain in Bosnia because Canada agreed to carry on that mission. The troops participating in this exercise are proud to do so. They were not forced to do it. They are there of their own volition because this is their job and they want to do it. However, they have been asking for a number of things for months and even years. In that regard, the government should have shown more leadership vis–à–vis the UN or UNPROFOR.

It is a fact that Canada, and consequently Quebec and Quebecers, is the country which has participated in the largest number of peacekeeping missions since the UN was established.

• (2015)

Canada has gained expertise and, as mentioned by a government member, Canadian soldiers are undoubtedly the best in that role. However, they too are asking their government to show some support and leadership. They want more leeway in terms of their power to intervene. Unfortunately, given the four criteria mentioned by the Minister of National Defence, I do not really see how their situation will improve.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned that if Canadian soldiers have the right to die when they take part in these missions, they also have the right to a voice on the contact group, to a say in UN decisions.

On a number of occasions, we have asked about the measures being taken to ensure the safety of certain individuals and so on, and the government members have said that discussions were being held with members of the Security Council or the contact group.

Given the importance, the expertise and the talent of Canadian soldiers, I have great difficulty understanding why Canada is not represented on the contact group, which is negotiating what is taking place on the ground where Canadians are present, and why it can express its opinion only indirectly.

Even this afternoon, the Prime Minister told us that in the case of the decision regarding air strikes, he was consulted only indirectly. This is all becoming a bit troubling. There is something else we should be thinking of—and many have spoken about it—but with respect to the families of these soldiers, at the risk of repeating myself, I have yet to hear, after the events that have taken place, a mother, wife or brother telling me: "Pull them out of there, it makes no sense, we cannot leave them there".

On the other hand, I have heard that there should be greater latitude, and improved equipment, communications and protection for these soldiers. Having worn a bullet proof vest and a helmet, I would suggest that, instead of wasting money on submarines, we see to it that our soldiers are properly equipped for our peacekeeping missions.

In closing, I would like to stress in this debate that in the current context of austerity, the public is finding it difficult to understand why we are sending troops. The public realizes that there are humanitarian grounds, but still has difficulty understanding why we are doing it, given Canada's current financial woes. The public would also like to see that if Canada really is going to take a leadership role, that we enforce it and make it stick.

I would also like to stress that the Bloc Quebecois, as the Leader of the Opposition already said, wholeheartedly supports the soldiers stationed in the former Yugoslavia, who, for the most part, come from the Valcartier base. I admire the role that these people are playing—I saw it with my own eyes. I also admire the courage of the families of these people who are currently in a relatively difficult situation.

Lastly, I urge the government, through the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence, to take a leadership role in the UN, and to stop beating around the bush and waffling in discussions. We know very well what modifications Canadian generals requested regarding the UN. We know very well that the Canadian contingent which replaced the other one asked for a concentration of forces. I think that Canada should make this a condition for its continued support. Moreover, before participating in any other peacekeeping mission, Canada should carefully consider its conditions, and stop going about it piecemeal, as it unfortunately does all too often.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for this opportunity to intervene in a debate that has been carried forward at a very high standard and in a spirit of constructiveness. It has a special interest for me as an international lawyer, very briefly as a flyer when I hear politicians calling for air strikes, and not least as somebody who has known the former Yugoslavia over a period of 30 years. I have had the privilege of lecturing at the universities and academies in Croatia and in Serbia on federalism and how to keep the state together, because it was inevitable that once Tito died it would go. I have been most recently in Macedonia meeting with government officials and lecturing to the University of Thessaloniki on post–succession Yugoslav problems.

There are two problems that need to be separated. One problem is the immediate and short term one, which is getting our peacekeepers who are being held hostage out safely. That is a short range problem, which calls for special skills. I must compliment the minister on what seems to be the government's approach. I just came in by plane and am dependent on press reports. We are exercising quiet diplomacy, and that may include bilateral talks with people in the vicinity, with para–governmental groups in Belgrade and elsewhere. It is a very necessary part.

I do hope that the government will persuade some of our friends and associates who talking about air strikes, particularly when one has no ground forces oneself in the locality, is not the most constructive way of getting the present peacekeepers home safely. Quiet diplomacy on this particular issue has its merits.

I want to return to the larger problem, which is the problem of the breakup of the former communist republic of Yugoslavia and what to do about it. I appreciated the valuable comments of the leader of the second opposition party and his suggestions for international law making. I would simply say, as an international lawyer, that the larger issues he raised are already covered quite adequately by the law of war and there is nothing a UN resolution would add. In fact UN resolutions, according to most views, are not law making; they are declaratory. If it becomes a weak consensus resolution it is possible it could damage the quite specific and in my view quite mandatory provisions of the existing law of war. However, the suggestions he made were constructive, and I think reinforcing the existing law is something the government would want to take notice of.

The problem with Bosnia is the larger problem of an artificial state that was created by two great congresses, one in Berlin in 1878 with the threatened breakup of the old Ottoman empire, and again in Versailles in 1919 in the World War I peace treaties and the special ones that related to the creation of the new multinational state of Yugoslavia.

It was apparent, since that state required compromises to create it and required in many respects a strong authoritarian government to keep it together with the royalists between the two world wars and Tito's government under the communist regime, that if it broke up the territorial frontier and other settlements that were included in it would have to be re–examined because they did not follow natural ethnocultural lines or even necessarily recognize the lessons of the quite different histories of the disparate parts.

One of our problems here is that we have been operating and the UN has been operating under the guise of a classic peacekeeping operation, but the issue of political motivation has come in. It is inconsonant with peacekeeping in the classical sense to have a particular political agenda. I think one of the problems has been that several of the main players have had a political agenda, which has not necessarily been fully thought out.

I have not been happy from the beginning with the UN proposals, which seem to me to run in the face of all the teachings of good federalism and constitutionalism for multinational states.

• (2025)

I was not happy with the U.S. policies once they left the original Eagleburger proposals for keeping the old multinational state together. That led to some strange decisions on the Skopje republic and elsewhere that we now in a certain sense have to live with.

I think the western European powers too tended to revive conflicts pre–1914 when the Quai d'Orsay and the Wilhelmstrasse had competing views of the future.

Our Canadian position is one entered into by the predecessor government. I think it was entered into in good faith but hurriedly and perhaps naively not insisting on a clear definition that if there was to be a political mandate what it would be, and participation not merely in the definition of the mandate but in its redefinition and restatement to meet changing political conditions. I think that is where a good deal of the problem lies.

I would raise again the position we put forward in Parliament in March debate. Facts are created by actions of states, and once Canada entered into the Croatian–Bosnian situation the normative quality of the facts took over. We have become players, and it is not a situation we can abandon overnight without notice to all the people who are dependent on us. It would be dishonourable and it might create more chaos than I think would come from pursuing other alternatives.

While the government is looking for advice, and in the spirit of constructiveness that I think both opposition parties have shown, let us look to what can be done for the future. I think there must be effective Canadian participation in the political decision making in the future, including participation in the issue of whether to have air strikes. That is something in which Canada must be involved. It may be too late, because constitutional machinery has a life of its own, to become part of the contact group, although that can be explored, but new and parallel decision making structures can be created and it is my understanding that our foreign minister at the moment is pursuing that in Europe. It seems to me that if we maintain the commitment that must be a necessary corollary of it.

I would stress again the need for a comprehensive plan for post–communist Yugoslavia. I think it was a mistake to get into the business of the breakup of Yugoslavia without clearly defining the territorial frontiers of the new entities or without, in the alternative, setting up an objective process for establishing those frontiers in the future. Adequate means exist under international law for the definition of territorial frontiers. There are international courts and international arbitral commissions. Indeed, I have argued before that the Versailles related treaty and Saint–Germain–en–Laye provide just such a machinery.

One of the great advantages, if we can get agreement on establishing the process, is that we make an ally of time. In essence, the situation becomes jelled legally and the parties can work together and bring their arguments forward. However, I do not believe we are going to get a lasting conclusion in the Balkans until we get a global view, in the regional sense, of the whole Balkans and what we are going to do with post–communist Yugoslavia. It is not our fault that this was not done in 1990–91. The previous government made the decisions and the present government honoured those obligations. It could do no less, as they were entered into by the previous government. We are a part of the situation. We are players. I am happy to say that we are not players in the sense that the Americans were in the Vietnam war, caught and sort of dragged along by the currents of history.

I think the essence of Canadian policy is that we are pragmatic and that we re–examine. In the short range, let us talk directly where we can in terms of getting our peacekeepers out safely and soundly, but let us consider the long range issue as well.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that I agree wholeheartedly with the leader of the official opposition and my own minister that we should keep our troops in Bosnia as long as possible, as long as it appears they are saving lives. In the context of the hostage taking, I think we have another reason for firmness. We must show the world and certainly countries like the former Yugoslavia that the civilized world even in situations of war will not give in to tyranny, blackmail and barbarism. That is what we are seeing with these hostage takings in Bosnia today.

• (2030)

The member for Calgary Southwest made the observation in his remarks that Canada should be going to the United Nations and seeking some kind of special resolution that would condemn hostage taking as a crime against humanity. I certainly sympathize with his remarks in this regard because we are appalled by what has happened in the former Yugoslavia. I do point out that there are already United Nations statutes on the books that make what is happening in Bosnia today a crime.

I refer to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which comes out very forcibly against this type of hostage taking. I refer also to the International Convention against the Taking of Hostages, again a United Nations document that very clearly condemns what is happening in Bosnia today. Most especially I refer to the Geneva convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war. The reason I cite that is that the two other pieces of international legislation deal essentially with the taking of civilian hostages. The Geneva convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war deals with military personnel.

I realize in this instance the UN personnel, the Canadians and the soldiers from France and other countries are not combatants in Bosnia. They are quite the opposite. It would be normal, seeing that they are military personnel, to accord them the same rights as would be required had they been combatants and had they been captured by the troops of either side but in this case, the Bosnian Serbs.

I would like to read an excerpt from the Geneva convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war which will put some of what is happening in Bosnia in context. Article 3.(1) deals with a war situation, and certainly we have a war situation in Bosnia at this time. It begins: "Persons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention or any other cause shall in all circumstances be treated humanely".

It goes on: "To this end, the following acts are and shall remain prohibited at any time and in any place whatsoever with respect to the above mentioned persons: (a) violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture; (b) the taking of hostages; (c) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment". We have certainly seen an instance of humiliating and degrading treatment with one of our Canadian soldiers chained to a post in Bosnia. Finally, "the passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court".

If our peacekeepers are killed because there is a NATO strike and the ammunition is dumped where our soldiers or any other peacekeepers are chained to posts, then I submit it is certainly a crime against the Geneva convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war.

There is an irony here if we look at the historical context and go back to the second world war. The Geneva convention I made reference to springs out of the 1929 Geneva convention. The situation in the second world war was that Nazi Germany by and large applied the rules of the Geneva convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war on the western front but ignored it on the eastern front. When the Germans invaded Yugoslavia all kinds of atrocities occurred. The result of that was the situation of ethnic hatred and the killing and brutality we now have in Yugoslavia.

• (2035)

In the context of what is now happening in the former Yugoslavia, we come back to Captain Rechner who we saw chained to a post. I take the words of the Minister of National Defence very much to heart.

Captain Rechner is an example of civilized military behaviour in a country that has lost sight of civilized behaviour, where brutality and tyranny has a grip on the people. I know I cannot show it but I have a picture here of this young man, Captain Rechner, with his arms around a post and he has a look of defiance. This is not a defeated soldier. This is a soldier who is winning. It is a message to the world.

I very much support what our Canadian peacekeepers are doing over there. We can be very proud of them.

I would like to address another point raised by the minister of defence. He said that Canada, along with some other countries involved in Bosnia, has to reconsider the UN mandate. I would like to give him certain words of caution.

He made three points. He said there may have to be a reconsideration of the conditions of the use of force. He suggested that possibly more air strikes might be permitted. I suspect, although he did not actually say it, that he is also talking about broadening the rules of engagement for peacekeepers over there so they can defend themselves in a broader range of circumstances rather than being captured quite so easily.

The second point he made was to withdraw the unarmed observers. I am not sure that is a good idea either. Again, those unarmed observers are an example to the Bosnian Serbs that we are a brave country that believes in peace and we are not afraid to go out and enforce peace. We might send the wrong message if we take those unarmed observers away, even though they are at great risk.

Finally, he made the point that troops might be deployed to better defend themselves. I would like to combine that with his point about using a bit more force and remind him that throughout the history of this kind of warfare, this has been a formula for escalation. There is always a danger in telling soldiers that they can step up their violent response a couple of notches. What happens is that the response from the belligerents increases in violence as well. There is a classic example in recent history of this type of thing occurring.

The problem is that if Canadian peacekeepers are concentrated in one defensible position, it becomes more of a target for the type of action which has occurred over there recently and it becomes a costly target. It becomes a temptation to attack that target in order to involve the countries in rescuing the target.

I point to the example of the experience of the French at Dien Bien Phu in Vietnam where there was an enclave and the French put everything they could into it. The terrain was very similar to that of Bosnia. It eventually collapsed.

I present a word of caution and I hope the defence minister and the cabinet will give very, very careful consideration to the dangers of any kind of escalation.

I conclude by saying that the example of bravery on the part of our Canadian troops goes further than guns will ever go in establishing peace in that land. Canada has a long tradition of requiring bravery of its soldiers. That bravery ultimately saves lives.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in commencing my remarks, I would like to advise the House that I will be splitting my time with the hon. member for St. Albert.

I am pleased to participate in the debate tonight because it appears to be an non–partisan debate. It is one that is of genuine concern to Canadians and one that should be treated as a Canadian problem to which all of us are keen to find a solution.

• (2040)

It is important to point out there is a substantial difference between a retreat from a battle that is being lost and a withdrawal from an operation that is not succeeding. There are many comments made that the UN, if it should withdraw its troops from Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia, would be admitting defeat. I contend that is not the case at all. The UN would be recognizing that what we are doing right now is not working and therefore, we have to try something different.

The fighting in the former Yugoslavia broke out in the summer of 1991 when Croatia and Bosnia declared independence. Canadian forces were committed in April 1992, supplied initially from our Lahr detachment. They went first to sector west, then were subsequently moved from sector west to sector south.

I would like to point out the excellence of our Canadian troops. They were asked to do this because no other force there was considered capable of doing it. The force that did this move in record time was a force of combined regular and reserve soldiers, in fact a very high percentage of reserve soldiers. As a result of doing it, they were awarded the commander's commendation.

Our commitment in the former Yugoslavia was to peacekeeping in Croatia and to humanitarian assistance in Bosnia. We also committed a logistics battalion to the Dalmatia coast at Primosten.

Canadians have been involved in all aspects of the operations in the former Yugoslavia. We have a large contingent in Zagreb which provides co–ordination and administrative support. We have ships and have from the start had ships committed to Operation Sharp Guard in the Adriatic. At one point we had a supply ship and a frigate. At the moment, HMCS Montréal is in the theatre and I believe it will be replaced by HMCS Ville de Québec in July.

Also supporting Operation Sharp Guard were Aurora aircraft, two aircraft from the home base at 14 Wing Greenwood, Nova Scotia and two from 19 Wing Comox, B.C., on rotating commitments. This commenced in September 1993 and ended in May 1994 but has just been renewed for a four–month tour. There will again be two CP–140 Aurora maritime patrol aircraft patrolling the Adriatic Sea in support of operation Sharp Guard.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence has referred to Air Bridge, the resupply operation which has brought absolutely crucial supplies to the relief of not only people in Sarajevo, but throughout Yugoslavia. They have in the period of their commitment since July 1992 moved 11,600 passengers and 23,150 tonnes of relief supplies to Sarajevo. To give some indication of the mammoth task, a Hercules will carry only 20 tonnes at a time, which is well over 1,000 flights in and out of a very critical airfield that is quite often subject to harassment fire and direct fire.

Our personnel with the airborne warning and control system in Geilenkirchen have been supporting operation Deny Flight which is to keep the air forces of the factions in Yugoslavia out of the fight. With one small exception which ended very quickly, they have been absolutely successful in doing that.

Furthermore, Canadians were among the first deployed to Macedonia in one of the most successful operations to prevent the escalation. This has worked extremely well and we only hope it will continue to do that. Canadian forces are not only well trained, they are well respected. We operate in the only area, I believe, where a UN force is contending with all three segments of the population in the former Yugoslavia, the Croats, the Serbs and the Muslims. It is difficult to do that because they look with great suspicion on the armed forces there as to whether they are showing favouritism or bias to one or the other elements.

• (2045)

Canadians have proven and established themselves as reliable to the three protagonists. As a result they are able to effect a far greater degree of resolution of problems than some of the others committed to areas there.

This has not been an easy situation for Canadians. We have 2,600 people basically committed to the area in question. Our people have been harassed. On three different occasions hostages have been taken. Early on almost a dozen were held hostage by some drunken Serbs who fired not at them but around them and really got their attention.

We had 50–odd held hostage in and around the town of Ilijas before and once again we are finding ourselves with 53 in that area curtailed and 2 others, 1 in Sarajevo and 1 in Pale, who are actual hostages.

This seems to prove the UN under the current circumstances is impotent. The UN established six safe areas at Bihac, Gorazde, Sarajevo, Srebrenica, Tuzla and Zepa. We all know what happened last week. There was an artillery shell into Tuzla and 70 people were killed. Every day in Sarajevo people are wounded or killed. In Srebrenica the same thing happened. This seems to happen because there is no respect for the UN capability to respond and prevent this. That was also evident when the UN agreed to the air strikes against the ammunition dumps, and the Serb reaction was not only predictable, it was almost automatic.

This is an indicator that the UN has to rethink the way it will attack or move to resolve the Yugoslavian situation. The suggestion from the Reform Party to withdraw Canadian troops and preferably all UN troops is not to say we want to wash our hands of the whole area or wash our hands of the situation. That would not be right and proper. We are saying this is not working therefore find a better way to do it.

It could be said if we withdrew all UN forces from the former Yugoslavia that air power, the ability to survey and strike against actions by any of the three protagonists which were contrary to directed input from the UN, could be quickly struck and would show very quickly they cannot do this without retaliation. It would take away from the Serbs or the Croats or the Muslims the ability to take a UN hostage and therefore say: "You cannot do this or you will lose your hostage".

The government seems to have failed to establish criteria for what Canadians are supposed to achieve. There are no measurements scales that say we are winning, losing, we are accomplishing what we went there for. All we see really is that we are there for peacekeeping in Croatia, humanitarian assistance in Bosnia and that neither one is working particularly well.

We also hear different messages. We hear the minister and the Prime Minister say air strikes are okay. We also hear from our UN ambassador that the Canadian government is opposed to punitive air strikes against Bosnian Serbs and that air strikes as NATO carried out last week were not useful. It would be nice if everybody were on the same net.

In responding to our UN ambassador's statement, Bosnian UN ambassador Muhamed Sacirbey is quoted as saying: "Those who are not prepared to fulfil their mission in Bosnia–Hercegovina to defend their troops, to live up to their commitment to defend the safe areas do not have any business being in Bosnia".

I do not believe Canadians think Canadian peacekeepers should have to defend themselves. They are there to keep the peace. They are not there to attack or subject anyone. Why should they have to defend themselves?

• (2050)

There is a misunderstanding in the groups there. Surely the UN has to rethink its approach to actions in the former Yugoslavia. I am concerned about the indication that French and British forces will upscale their commitment to the former Yugoslavia. What will this mean? Canadians in the former Yugoslavia are not adequately equipped to participate in a full scale war. If it goes to an escalation they will be in a very precarious position.

What the minister has proposed is a step in the right direction, to withdraw our people from very exposed positions, to consolidate our resources into a more defendable posture.

The answer for Canada and for the United Nations is to say withdraw our forces, establish what we will do and then set that mechanism in motion so we can resolve the situation in the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to take part in this serious debate about our situation in the former Yugoslavia.

I will start by paying tribute to all the Canadian peacekeepers who have been to Bosnia, who have put their lives on the line for the Canadian reputation as peacekeepers, the soldiers who are there today who have their lives on the line as they represent Canada in a peacekeeping; especially for Captain Rechner who, as we all know, is chained to a pole, whose life is in very serious danger. The hearts of all Canadians go out to him and to his parents in this time of trial he is facing.

Every Canadian has seen his face in the papers and it has been a heart wrenching experience for all of us. We are proud of the way our soldiers have been acting over there.

Canada has a great history of peacekeeping. We created the idea 40–odd years ago. Former Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson was awarded the Nobel peace prize for the creation of the peacekeeping forces he had championed.

As Canadians we have kept that commitment over the years. We have kept the peace in many parts of the world. We have been in dangerous situations around the world but we have always given what Canada has become noted for and what we are great at doing, offering our soldiers to make the peace and to keep the peace.

There is no peace in the former Yugoslavia. There is no peace to keep and there is no peace to make. That part of the world does not have a tradition of peace. Its history goes back 1,000 years, and much of that is a history of people at war.

Twice this century alone we have seen genocide in that part of the world as one ethnic group fights the other. The result is atrocities, millions dead and another generation of people born with hatred in their hearts. Hatred, bigotry, racism and prejudice are very much part of the social fabric of that part of the world.

I call it the social earthquake zone where the Slavic nations from the north and the Germanic races from the northwest and the Muslim races from the east come together and that is why we have the fractured situation in the Balkans with small ethnic groups here and next door an ethnic group of entirely different extraction. With the racism, the bigotry and the prejudice in that part of the world it takes a Herculean effort to keep them apart and from going at each other's throats.

If we take a look at what has happened over the last number of years since the second world war, we have now recognized there always has been that underlying current of ethnic violence and hatred kept in place by a very strong government.

• (2055)

When that passed away a few years ago the nationalism and the hatred rose to the surface again. They were back at it again for the umpteenth time. This is not something new or something strange to the history of that part of the world.

Try to remember the western world could not really tolerate the idea of a civil or ethnic war in Europe. We have seen it in other parts of the world, in Africa and Asia and so on. We said these things happen in that part of the world but it does not happen in Europe. Let us send a few soldiers in. Let us put the lid on this situation because it is Europe, it is civilized and these things do not happen anymore, 50 years after the second world war. In a couple of months the boys will be back home.

We did not look at history. Because we did not look at history it repeats itself and we are caught wanting again because we now find we are embroiled very much in a situation that has no real resolution.

In Canada we pass laws saying we shall not discriminate and it is illegal to be prejudicial. Yet it is absolutely systemic in the way of life over there. We were caught unprepared because we did not look at the history or the traditions. We thought they were like Canadians, tolerant, peaceful and willing to live side by side with their neighbours, which they had done for some number of years because a strong government kept a lid on it. When that was removed it was painfully obvious the hatred that had been there for many generations was still there. Given the slightest opportunity, which they were, the hatred rose to the surface again.

For the dream of a greater Serbia for the Serbs and for the Croats who had committed the atrocities during the second world war and so on, the recipe was there. We walked into it with our eyes open and yet we could not see it. Now the lives of our troops are very much on the line as we speak tonight. Their lives are very much at risk because this government and the previous government walked in, eyes open, and yet were blind to what would happen.

The minister of defence said he will not submit to blackmail. This is not blackmail. The minister of defence is playing Russian roulette with the soldiers of Canada over there who he says are doing peacekeeping duties. However, I can assure the House, as every Canadian knows, there are no peacekeeping duties in the former Yugoslavia. Those men and women are fighting to protect their own lives as they try and help others. The point is this Russian roulette has to stop.

A young soldier's photograph we saw in the newspaper today, brave, defiant, disciplined, a soldier who makes every Canadian proud. We certainly cannot be proud of the Canadian government's policy that keeps our soldiers over there and keeps sending more.

Discretion is the better part of valour. It is the minister's discretion that keeps them over there and it is our Canadian soldiers' valour that keeps the image of Canadians high and makes us proud of their efforts while the government has the opportunity, the capability, the decision making powers to say bring our soldiers home. That is what it should be doing today.

I do not see any point whatsoever of endangering our soldiers, our men and women who were brought up in an atmosphere of tolerance, sending them over there with the expectation that they will provide humanitarian assistance to women and children. We cannot even get the humanitarian assistance in. Local soldiers are acting like barbarians. They are disregarding every rule of war and law in the books today. We have seen torture and various other criminal acts committed. These are the types of things that have nothing to do with peace. That is why I join with my Reform colleagues in calling on the Minister of National Defence to bring the soldiers home.

• (2100)

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I sat in my office for a few minutes this evening putting some notes together, I could not help but note the seriousness with which the House was taking this debate. Members who have spoken have done so with their own convictions, beliefs and feelings. Important debates such as this on external affairs and on the United Nations must be treated in depth with all the seriousness which these occasions deserve.

I want to repeat something the minister said, which is that every single Canadian life is important. I am sure that if we took ourselves into the homes across the country of the people who are thinking of their relatives in the former Yugoslavia, some of whom are in captivity, we would realize the feelings of those families, those relatives and what their friends are going through. Every Canadian life is important and every Canadian would believe that every one of their allies' lives is important too.

Families of military personnel are watching the debate tonight. Some of them will be watching it with well informed opinions because many have had family members who have already been there and back, some a couple of times.

One thing has come out in the debate tonight which I feel is extremely important in international affairs. It cannot be underlined enough because it is part of a chain of command. The contact group must speak with a united voice. The contact group must speak with resolve. The contact group must speak with a political will. It must speak with one voice. Collective links must be put together, co–ordinated and followed. Any enemy will discern the weakness in the armour of those whom they face. There is no greater gift tonight that the western free world, the United Nations and the contact group can give to our military personnel serving in the former Yugoslavia and other hot spots around the world than to have a united voice behind them.

It has been said that Canada must be a part of all group discussions. No one would agree with that more than I, and no one would agree with that, I am sure, more than the minister, his parliamentary secretary and the Government of Canada. In the actions which have already been taken there is no question that Canada has been part of that process through the respect alone which this nation holds around the tables on these very important topics. We have earned that right over the years. We deserve it and we must be a part of it in the future.

It is not a time to withdraw. I know what some people are saying. We in the House know what they are saying. However, when we come to a time in world history when people start saying it is time to withdraw, that is the way the world starts to drift into serious trouble.

• (2105)

Certain paths of retreat become paths of isolationism where we close our eyes to the rest of the world. How can anyone with humanitarian instincts and qualities turn his or her eyes away from what is happening to the women and children in the former Yugoslavia? Canada is a very important partner there.

To give the House and the nation another example of how generous Canadians are, of how thoughtful Canadians are, of how the average Canadian supports humanitarianism in the world, I want to say that a rural township in my constituency, Ross township, an almost totally farm community, has just shipped 12.5 tonnes of clothing, footwear, toys, linen, towels and so on to the hospitals at Drin and Bakovici. One of those hospitals is the one that our soldiers took over and managed for a period of time.

Ross township in Renfrew county shipped some of these goods through World Vision and some via other means. Heather Rowlands, who headed up this campaign, is married and her husband Mike returned from Visoko on May 10. He adopted many of the children in these hospitals. His wife in Canada started the ball rolling in rural Ross township in Renfrew county. Today the 12.5 tonnes of goods they sent are in port at Split.

I want to pay tribute to these people in Ross township for the excellent job they have done. Yesterday afternoon at two o'clock they had a meeting in Ross Presbyterian Church with World Vision officials and others and celebrated sending these goods to the two hospitals in the former Yugoslavia.

In conclusion, the discipline of our Canadian forces is not just something to be admired, it is something to treasure. Our Canadians who are now under pressure are using that discipline which they have learned to see their way through this.

I agree with others who have spoken tonight that we are going through a very difficult time. It is time for everybody to move together, including the contact group, to work together to support the humanitarian efforts and to say to the aggressors in the former Yugoslavia that we are not going to back away from this situation. We are going to see it through. We are going to help strengthen the United Nations in the years to come because if we do not continue to contribute to the solidarity of the United Nations and international efforts to maintain peace in the world then we will not be remembering those who died.

If we do not remember those who died then we are guilty of having allowed them to die in vain. That is not Canada and that will not be Canada.

S. O. 52

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Dear colleagues, there are nine members still wishing to speak. If the members could shorten their remarks, all those wishing to speak could do so.

[English]

I believe the hon. member will be splitting his time with the hon. member for Durham.

• (2110)

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise to speak in the debate concerning Bosnia–Hercegovina.

There are many people in Canada who have relatives and friends in that war torn country. Many of them are concerned tonight about their welfare and their safety. In my riding of Durham, in Oshawa, many people question Canada's commitment and our obligations to that war torn country, Bosnia–Hercegovina.

I listened intently tonight to the dissertations of the Reform Party. I was taken back to thoughts of pre–second world war, in particular the United States, where Americans thought they could be insulated, protected from the world, they were not part of a bigger world, and they could find themselves somehow reserved from it. This was a failure.

The member for Red Deer who led off the debate for the Reform Party said: "Britain and France are closer". Are we not repeating the errors of our past? Britain and France are closer, it is their problem.

Tonight I can go home and get on the Internet and talk to people in Bosnia–Hercegovina. Technology has brought the whole world closer. We have national boundaries and national borders. The reality is that we are all one world.

It seems to me the Reform Party would have us run away from our commitment in Bosnia–Hercegovina. No one says that what has happened in that war torn country has been a success. There have been some failures and some setbacks for the United Nations forces. However those setbacks create strength. It is time for people to sit back and ask, what did we do wrong? How can we strengthen our position and how can we go forward.

A quote says: "Those who ignore the past are doomed to repeat it". I have had the good fortune to have lived in a skipped generation. I say that because my father fought in the second world war. He fought because there was a realization that the war that spread throughout Europe put the world in crisis. I say a skipped generation because I have been able in my lifetime to avoid the horrors of war.

My son, who is almost 21 years old, has joined the Governor General's Foot Guards. In fact he is in the riding of the hon. member who just spoke, in Petawawa. He said: "Dad, this is really tough. I go out at night and they make me sleep out in the woods. It rains on me and I get wet. After two weeks of living out in this environment, just sleeping in a normal bed with a roof over my head I never realized was so great". I said to him: "What are you going to do about this? Are you going to hang in?" He said: "Yes, Dad, I am going to stick with it". I think that is indicative of Canadians. We give them a job and they stick with it.

That is what Bosnia–Hercegovina is all about. We have made mistakes. The area of Bosnia–Hercegovina has been a bloodshed area. Only in the last 20 years has that area been contained.

• (2115)

We are not talking about Bosnia–Hercegovina. We are talking about the greater issue of how that war could possibly spread throughout the Balkans and Greece. We will be sending a lot more people to that war torn area.

I would like to take a couple of minutes to digress about something that concerns me personally, which is our inventory of armaments. I was surprised to read today that Canada is the seventh largest supplier of conventional weaponry to third world countries.

The United Nations reports that conventional weaponry is still the weapons of choice in most nations. Why do we not take an inventory of the armaments that are pointed not only at Canadians in Bosnia–Hercegovina but also the French and other United Nations forces? Where are they manufactured? Why do we have a two–tiered system of sending armaments to third world countries while at the same time we send our troops to defend from them? This is illogical and makes no sense. We need to examine our foreign policy in the bigger framework of our commitments to arms manufacturing.

As I said, I have digressed somewhat. The Minister of National Defence has discussed a number of objectives to be achieved by changing our mandate in Bosnia–Hercegovina. He has talked about the fact that we need to speak with one voice in the contact group, that we need to create political and military linkages. He has also talked about defending our commitments in Bosnia–Hercegovina. He has talked about the ability to shoot back, to use an analogy, to protect our own troops there.

We are not talking about military intervention. We are talking about human dignity. We are talking about the right of people to live their lives. In all societies there are groups of people who seek to disrupt the society. In Bosnia–Hercegovina there is what is called ethnic cleansing.

There is nobody in this room who would support the concept of ethnic cleansing. It means if you are not of the right ethnicity we have the right to kill you. Canadians do not believe in that. It is not part of Canadian culture. Canadians are in Bosnia–Hercegovina to ensure that is not the state of the world so the people of Bosnia–Hercegovina can learn to live in peace and harmony.

In conclusion, I am very happy to be supportive of our Canadian efforts in that war torn country to bring human dignity to the people.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time I have risen since my election to Parliament in 1993 to speak on the situation in the former Yugoslavia. The first time was on January 25, 1994, during a discussion of Canada's future in peacekeeping.

I repeat what I said then. We must put a stop to the massacre of innocent people, of women, of old people, of young people and of children in the territories of the former Yugoslavia. The situation remains extremely serious.

• (2120)

The Bosnian Minister of Foreign Affairs has just been killed when his helicopter was shot down near Bihac. Shots were fired at NATO aircraft. Hostages were taken at Tuzla. Three hundred and twenty–six UN peacekeepers and observers are being used as human shields. The Serbs are more threatening than ever before. Ten Canadian peacekeepers are among the hostages. The Bosnian conflict has already resulted in more than 200,000 deaths. It is high time this massacre stopped.

Things are also very bad in Chechnya. Russian aircraft yesterday bombarded the headquarters of the rebels at Vedeno in the Caucasus Mountains. The situation there is becoming increasingly awful and is turning into an ethnic and religious war. The Russian intervention in Chechnya is to be condemned. The international community should also look for a solution to this conflict.

What is going on in Europe, the cradle of civilization? I cannot believe that these conflicts are allowed to drag on indefinitely and that nobody is able to put an end to them. Canada has sent 2,100 peacekeepers to the former Yugoslavia and must decide, by the end of September, if it will renew its commitment to the United Nations Protection Force, UNPROFOR.

As the leader of the Bloc Quebecois said earlier, I believe that now is not the time to withdraw our peacekeepers from this area. The situation would worsen and the loss of lives would be even greater. But, in my view, their mandate should be modified so that they can be more effective in putting an end to hostage taking, for instance.

Of course, the mandate of peacekeepers should always be peacekeeping and participating in relief operations in the former Yugoslavia. It is my fervent hope that the contact group will be able to make constructive recommendations to help resolve this never ending conflict.

I also hope that we will see the release, without further delay, of the ten Canadian peacekeepers, including eight Quebecers, who are being detained by the Serbs.

This morning, I received a phone call from a constituent in my riding of Bourassa, asking me to intervene in the House regarding the present situation in the former Yugoslavia. His sister is a member of the Canadian contingent. The whole family is very worried by the hostage taking and the worsening of the situation in this part of Europe, which I visited on several occasions while I was studying in Belgium. This family is all the more worried as the Canadian government has refused to reveal the names of the hostages who, for the most part, come from the Montreal area, it seems.

Since the beginning of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, in 1991, this is the third time that Canadians have been taken hostage and thus prevented from carrying out their mandate. I do hope that they will be released very soon.

I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the peacekeepers from Canada and Quebec in the former Yugoslavia.

• (2125)

As you know, I come from Chile, where, unfortunately, the military engaged in all kinds of extortion schemes, committed systematic human rights abuses and put an end to democracy. That is why I am not overly fond of the military.

However, I feel a great deal of affection for Canadian and Quebec peacekeepers posted abroad, especially those who are part of the UN Protection Force. I think that the troops deployed in the former Yugoslavia are doing an exceptional humanitarian job. I salute them and their families in Quebec and Canada.

As you know, I came here because of a coup d'état, because of the flagrant human rights abuses in Chile. Other Latin American countries have experienced deadly conflicts. In Central America, however, tens of thousands of people have died as a result of these conflicts.

We must use all the means at our disposal to end the many conflicts shaking up the world, especially the one in the former Yugoslavia.

I support the military objectives of the UN peacekeeping forces, which include the Canadian contingent. It is a matter of doing our duty to assist those in danger and fulfilling our moral obligation to those in dire straits. This humanitarian tradition so deeply rooted in Canada and Quebec must continue to grow.

We must not, however, expose our soldiers to dangerous situations. We must increase their safety level by providing them with what they need, adequate equipment, to defend themselves and carry out their mission effectively. Now is not the time to withdraw our troops. This could have tragic consequences for them as well as for the local population; hostages could even be put to death.

Canada must intensify its diplomatic efforts to promote conflict resolution through negotiation.

We should be represented in the contact group established by the United States, Russia, Great Britain, France and Germany. The U.S. are part of this group, even though no American troops are involved, but we are excluded, while 2,100 of our troops are deployed over there. Why are we not included this very important forum? There is no excuse for excluding us, and the Canadian government should demand to be represented in the contact group.

The conflict in the former Yugoslavia and the interracial confrontations in Bosnia and in Croatia have resulted in the displacement and fleeing of hundreds of thousands of people. Exactions, abuse, rape and murder were committed against civilian populations and ethnic minorities.

As of November 1993, over 4.2 million people living in Croatia and in Bosnia–Hercegovina were either forced to abandon their homes or exposed to crossfire. More than 800,000 of them fled to other countries.

Again, I want to pay tribute to the UNHCR, which is primarily concerned with providing humanitarian assistance, with the co–operation of peacekeepers.

• (2130)

The office does an exceptional job in that part of the world. Since the ceasefire ended in April, the distribution of food, medication and clothes has become a much more difficult task. People working for humanitarian organizations are often harassed and even attacked and they need to be protected by peacekeepers.

The international community, particularly Germany, Hungary, Sweden, Switzerland and Austria, works very hard at accepting refugees from the former Yugoslavia. As for Canada, it has opened its doors to more than 10,000 refugees since 1991. A large number have settled in Quebec. I know a few of them. They are highly qualified and energetic people, including professionals with major university degrees. They make an important contribution to Canada's and Quebec's society.

I think that Canada should increase its efforts to accept a greater number of refugees, especially women and children. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration must take the necessary measures to make the Women at Risk Program more effective. Often, women from the region affected by this conflict qualify for this program, but they cannot come to Canada because they do not have the money and because the government refuses to give them a loan to pay for the trip.

Canada must decide, at the end of September, if it will renew its peacekeepers' mandate. During the last debate, the Bloc Quebecois was in favour of renewing the mandate of our troops in Croatia and Bosnia. Our position remains unchanged. However, I think that Canada's participation in the UNPROFOR must be linked to conditions that are favourable to a peaceful solution to this conflict. The truce that was signed on January 1 between the Bosnian government and Bosnian Serbs and Croatians ended on April 30. Another ceasefire must be implemented without delay.

I call on the Canadian government to play a more active diplomatic role in the resolution of this conflict. I also hope that the United Nations will be more efficient in carrying out its peacekeeping mandate in the world and that the international community will soon be able to find a negotiated solution to this endless conflict.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this emergency debate sponsored by the Reform Party and my colleague from Red Deer, the Reform's foreign affairs critic.

Emergency debates such as we are having tonight are an important part of the parliamentary debating process. They allow Parliament to deal with issues that are indeed pressing and important to Canada. They provide an opportunity for us as members of Parliament to comment on the issue at hand, preferably with input from our constituents. The conditions for an emergency debate are outlined in Standing Order 52. It must be a genuine emergency.

A letter sent this morning from the hon. member for Red Deer, the foreign affairs critic for the Reform Party, to the Speaker of the House reads:

> Pursuant to S. O. 52(2) I wish to advise you of my intention of asking for an emergency debate on the deepening crisis in Bosnia and the dire plight of the Canadian soldiers who are being held hostage there.
> This is an issue of national importance, and it is extremely urgent that Parliament immediately debate the issue. Even a delay of one day in this debate could lead to tragic events that I would not like to contemplate. If there was ever a time for immediate action, it is now.

• (2135)

Tonight the Reform Party condemns this government for failing to acknowledge the serious deterioration of the situation in Bosnia and refusing to call for a full UN withdrawal of our troops.

First let me comment on our policy of peacekeeping. Peacekeeping was a concept and policy formulated by Canada, and proudly so, after the second world war through our participation in the United Nations. Since that time our Canadian troops have set a world standard and have served in peacekeeping duties around the world. For instance, Canadians have served in peacekeeping roles on many continents: in the Middle East in the Sinai, in Lebanon, and Syria, in the Mediterranean on the island of Cyprus, Southeast Asia, Cambodia, on the continent of Africa in Somalia, in the Caribbean in Haiti.

Canadians have given exemplary service to the high calling of peacekeeping and they have been recognized internationally in their peacekeeping efforts around the world. Now Canadian troops are serving in Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia and they too are continuing this Canadian tradition of service.

Canada has 2,100 troops in the region. It is the fifth largest contingent in the area. It is the tradition of peacekeeping that I firmly believe in and support. I know that our troops have done and want to do an excellent job. They have done that with outdated equipment, 30–year old tanks and so on. They have done that under difficult circumstances.

However, the situation in the former Yugoslavia is no longer a peacekeeping environment. It has deteriorated to such a level that the lives of our Canadian troops are now imperilled. Right now the United States is sending an aircraft carrier to the region. The ceasefire has been broken. Prohibited weapons are being used. This is a war zone. There is no peace to keep. Canadians and other peacekeepers in that land are now pawns in a losing game.

The present hostage taking should be of no surprise to anyone. Canadian troops have experienced this situation before. In fact, it is the third time Canadians have been taken hostage. In December 1993 eleven Canadians were held by Serbs. In November 1994, Serbs took 55 Canadians hostage in and around Ilyas.

This time the role of the Canadian peacekeepers in Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia is an issue that strikes very close to home for me as a member of Parliament. This evening I pay tribute to Captain Patrick Rechner, who is one of the UN military observers being held hostage by the Bosnian Serbs. He is being held as a human shield. He is from my constituency and the town where my office is, Port Moody.

Canadians have watched appalled at the TV footage of Captain Rechner chained to that pole in that far off land. He bravely stands there close to an ammunition depot that the Bosnian Serbs wish to protect. He stands there serving as a human shield to prevent NATO war planes from bombing that or other targets in the area. We must remember that the bombing by NATO was in response to the ceasefire that was broken by the Bosnian Serbs. So there he stands as a human shield. In addition, he has been forced to make a statement that if NATO did not cease its bombing he would be killed.

The story of Captain Rechner and his family is one of a typical Canadian family. The Rechner family are originally from Prague, Czechoslovakia. The family of five emigrated to Canada in 1970 and initially settled in Toronto before moving to Coquitlam and Port Moody in the early 1980s.

Captain Rechner joined the army cadets at the age of 13. After graduating he studied at Royal Roads Military College in Victoria and at the Sorbonne in Paris. He has served in the former Yugoslavia since June 1994 and was scheduled to return home next month.

I met with his mother and father last Friday, Vincent and Katrina. The bravery their son shows on the clips we have seen is reflected too in their eyes as they quietly wait for word about their son and always hope.

The common hope of all parents I think is reflected in the memory his mother shared with me. As teens her boys had motorcycles. Perhaps members can relate to this if they have had teenage boys or girls. She would wait up when they were out on their bikes. If they were late she would wait and wait, wondering what had happened to them. She told me that she shared the same feeling now that she felt then: she knew they would always come home.

• (2140)

The emotions she feels are the emotions all parents would experience in circumstances such as this. All Canadians who see the image of Patrick must share with his parents the fear, the worry, the anger, and the hope that now fills their days and nights. It is not only Captain Rechner who is endangered. There are no fewer than 53 other Canadians from the Royal 22nd Regiment who have been detained as a result of the aggressive and unjustified actions taken by the Bosnian Serbs. Their fate too hangs in the balance.

In addition to the Canadians, the Serbs are detaining and holding hostage UN peacekeepers from Great Britain, the Czech Republic, and Poland, among others. In total, the Serbs are holding over 300 UN military personnel.

We must ask why we are involved in peacekeeping in the former Yugoslavia. Is it for humanitarian reasons? In fact no humanitarian aid is now reaching those who need it most. The airport is closed, the highways are closed.

Does our government have any real input in the decision making process? No, we have no input. We are not part of the contact group, even though we have the fifth largest UN contingent in the region. Do we have clear government policy? Do we know how long our troops will be committed there? Is there an indication of future direction of the policy, of what it will cost, of what our vision is as a country? I submit that the government does not know these things. It has no direction.

We ask the criteria for our involvement there. I believe there are no criteria. Instead this government and its policy has stumbled along a path that has led us to this situation and placed our troops or our sons of our citizens in great peril.

The debate tonight is a very serious one. It will influence the outcome of the future of the Canadian role in the former Yugoslavia. We should not only be considering the diplomatic, strategic, and statistical manoeuvring that are all part of the game of international politics and international relations, we should also be considering the impact upon individuals and families involved. We can think of the families in Yugoslavia. The atrocities there have been great. I ask this government: Are we preventing atrocities with the involvement we now have? I would suggest that in fact we are not. In fact we may indeed be prolonging that very situation.

As I have stated, we should be considering the thoughts and feelings of the people who are separated from their loved ones by half a world. We should be considering how to return men who were sent not to war but to prevent war home safely to their families and communities.

I believe it is therefore time for a timely withdrawal of our Canadian troops from Bosnia. Such a withdrawal would have to occur in a precise and ordered fashion. We have been calling for such a withdrawal over the past year. Since that time it certainly is no easier to do so. Do we wait for more carnage, more complication, and more indecision? We now find our troops entrapped in these UN established enclaves because of ill thought out policy and poor decision making. Do we compound a great error with even greater indecision and more unfocused action?

Canada has fulfilled its commitment to the peacekeeping tradition in the former Yugoslavia. We have had troops stationed there since 1992. The war escalates even as I speak. Our peacekeepers are eye witnesses to a genocide they have neither the mandate nor the equipment to prevent.

Once again I call on the government to withdraw the Canadian contingent from the former Yugoslavia and Bosnia. Along with my colleagues I call on the government to regroup and to establish an operable mandate not only for this mission but for all such peacekeeping missions in the future.

Vincent Rechner was quoted in the Vancouver Sun this weekend, and I would quickly like to refer to that. It states:

> "The situation, according to Collenette's word, is getting worse", said Rechner from his Coquitlam home on Sunday. "It is more dangerous". "Evil people have revenge in mind", Rechner said of the Bosnian Serb forces holding his son. "Why would they do this to someone who is there just as a humanitarian to help the people? He is not there to hurt anyone. I do not understand."

• (2145)

Canadians demand an answer to the dilemma of Vincent Rechner. Canadians want a government with determination to act on principle, one that shows leadership and will admit not to defeat but to the recognition of a reality in a far off land. In the former Yugoslavia I repeat there is no peace to keep.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a rare privilege, opportunity and challenge to enter into a very serious debate.

The hon. minister said we remain committed to keeping Canadian troops in Bosnia. Why? It is because we have a job to do. The job, as he illustrated, had three parts: to serve the cause of peace, to resupply the towns that require help and to provide humanitarian assistance.

Let us examine each of these parts, the first being to serve the cause of peace. What is peace? Peace is a state of harmony in which people work together in co–operation and pursue a common goal of decency and respect for one another without fear. What a contrast those words are to what is happening in Bosnia today.

Within this context we also have to remember at the same time Canadian forces are there to keep the peace in Bosnia, Canada in 1993 was the seventh largest contributor of arms to third world nations. It is a bit of an irony that on the one hand we are known as the world's best peacekeepers and on the other hand we supply arms to third world nations to bring about violence and destruction to one another.

What is the cause of peace? The cause of peace is patience and to prevail in spite of the most difficult conditions. Here we have to pay a special tribute to the troops there. The colleagues of the soldier who was chained to the post must have felt the greatest urge to get in there and shoot or fight or somehow get even with the people who were doing this to their comrade. Imagine his mother and father who would have liked to do something but found themselves powerless to do anything. Therefore we asked his mother and father what we could do for them. The answer was we could not do anything. The hands of these armed people have been tied because they are there to keep a peace that is not there.

As my hon. colleague said but a moment ago, we need to withdraw from Bosnia. That does not mean we would withdraw in the sense that we have nothing to do with these violations of human rights, but rather the United Nations has to re–examine what mandate we should be pursuing in these countries where there is strife, dissension and bloodshed.

It means more than being an example of strength and courage. It means being strong, honest, friendly and caring for other people. Imagine the soldiers who have been brought up in the severest of discipline and trained to kill, whose job and function is to sit at the bedside of someone who is mentally handicapped or ill. It is a tremendous tribute to a person who can handled both of those obligations; to on the one hand be prepared to attack someone and on the other hand to stretch out the helping hand, the healing hand to someone in trouble.

It is possible Canadians can handle those two positions because we are a nation that has developed in its citizens a belief that democracy works, that democracy can handle opposing points of view. We believe it is okay to disagree with one another providing we maintain basic decency and respect for one another.

It is not a matter of an elite group getting together in some kind of an oak panelled room and deciding what is best for the nation or a matter for lobby groups and pressure groups to decide that a particular decision be made. It is in the election and the determination of majority vote that things are decided.

• (2150)

It is not possible in Bosnia. I ask the House and the United Nations how can the matter be resolved when a soldier is chained to a post? How can it be done when somebody is about to strike an arms deposit? How can this be done when a part of Canada can demonstrate the way to do this is not through armed conflict but rather through democratic process? How can this be done without a plan?

My hon. colleague says there probably is no plan. She sees no plan. I see no plan or evidence of a plan. How can this be done if we are not at the consultation table? How do we do this when we are not involved in NATO decisions?

Much has been made by the minister and members opposite who have said we have to get to the negotiating table. The one thing common to every negotiating table is the parties at the table want to resolve the issue.

When one looks at the history of this part of the world one has to wonder if anybody in this group really wants to solve the problem. How is it possible that for hundreds of years these people have tried and other countries have gone in and tried to bring about peace and there is no peace? That is one part of our task, to bring about peace.

The attitude that needs to change is one of peace building, not peacekeeping. There is no peace there now. I am not at all convinced the way to build peace is by shooting somebody.
