INTRODUCTION

Les documents reproduits dans le présent ouvrage complètent l'histoire, commencée au Volume 10, de la politique extérieure du Canada pendant les derniers mois de la Deuxième Guerre mondiale et la période de transition qui devait conduire à la paix. De par son contenu, le présent volume adopte un ton résolument plus optimiste que le précédent, dans lequel transparaissait la lassitude qui caractérisait les dernières étapes d'un long conflit. Le Volume 11 laisse entrevoir la naissance d'un nouvel ordre mondial dans lequel il serait possible, espérait-on, d'éviter la répétition des événements qui avaient provoqué les hostilités. Ce désir était si ardent que, pour la première fois, il donna lieu à des mesures spéciales en vue de la planification des initiatives canadiennes en matière de politique étrangère (Chapitre I). Comme cela avait été le cas depuis l'entrée en guerre des États-Unis à la fin de 1941, les responsables de l'élaboration de la politique étrangère canadienne désiraient avant tout obtenir, que soit pleinement reconnue, sur la base du principe de la représentation fonctionnelle, la contribution du pays au développement des relations internationales (Volume 9, p. xviii).

À titre de pays créancier largement tributaire des marchés internationaux, le Canada avait tout intérêt à prendre part aux négociations visant à établir les fondements de la stabilité commerciale et financière d'après-guerre (Chapitre II). On a sans doute sous-évalué la contribution canadienne à la réussite de la conférence de Bretton Woods, au New Hampshire, qui eut lieu en 1944, et au cours de laquelle fut conclue l'entente devant mener à la création du Fonds monétaire international et de la Banque internationale de reconstruction et de développement (documents 34-36). À cause du caractère officieux de cette conférence, les documents portant sur le Canada, aussi bien que sur la conférence elle-même, sont plutôt rares.[1] On trouve davantage de renseignements sur les négociations concernant la réduction des barrières tarifaires. Malgré les nombreux efforts qui furent consacrés à la recherche d'une solution multilatérale à ce problème, la difficulté de réconcilier les nombreux intérêts divergents des différents pays rendit séduisante l'idée de conclure des accords bilatéraux, notamment avec les États-Unis (exemples : documents 45 et 53).

L'aviation civile constituait également un domaine dans lequel le Canada entendait jouer un rôle au niveau de la réglementation internationale (Chapitre III). Il y allait non seulement de la place du Canada en tant que puissance aérienne, mais également de l'efficacité d'une organisation d'après-guerre vouée à la sécurité mondiale (document 184). Fort de cette conviction, le Canada élabora un projet de convention internationale sur le transport aérien et participa activement à la Conférence internationale sur l'aviation civile qui se tint à Chicago du 1er novembre au 7 décembre 1944. Le Canada, que le chef de la délégation, C. D. Howe, décrivit comme l'une des «grandes puissances»

INTRODUCTION

The documents reproduced in this volume complete the story, begun in Volume 10, of Canadian external policy during the closing months of the Second World War and the transition to peace. The contents of the present volume are more optimistic in tone than were those of its predecessor, which reflected the war weariness of the last stages of a long conflict. Volume 11 looks ahead to a reshaped world order, in which, it was hoped, repetition of the circumstances which had given rise to the war would be avoided. So important was this aspiration that, for the first time, special arrangements were made for planning the Canadian response to issues in foreign policy (Chapter I). As had been the case since the United States entered the war at the end of 1941, one of the main concerns of those responsible for developing policy was to ensure that Canada's contribution to international relations be fully acknowledged, on the basis of the functional principle (Volume 9, p. xviii).

As a creditor nation and one heavily reliant on international trade, Canada had a major interest in the negotiations to establish a basis for financial and commercial stability after the war (Chapter II). The contribution to the conference at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire in 1944, which produced agreement to establish the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, is perhaps underrepresented here (documents 34-36). Owing to the informality which prevailed at Bretton Woods, the Canadian documentary record, like that of the conference itself,[1] is not substantial. Somewhat fuller is the documentation on negotiations for the reduction of trade barriers. While considerable attention was given to the search for a multilateral solution to this problem, the difficulty of reconciling a variety of divergent international interests lent attraction to the alternative of bilateral arrangements, especially with the United States (for example, documents 45 and 53).

Another activity in which international regulation was important to Canada was civil aviation (Chapter III). Bringing this about was considered vital not only to Canada's position as an air power but also to the effectiveness of a postwar world security organization (document 184). This conviction was reflected in the preparation of a draft international air transport convention and active participation in the International Civil Aviation Conference, held in Chicago between November 1 and December 7, 1944. At the conference, Canada, which the head of the delegation, C. D. Howe, described a one of "the great powers" present, assumed the role of "honest broker" in dealing with differences between the United States and the United Kingdom (document 282). Canada became a member of the Council, or executive, of the Provisional Civil Aviation Organization which emerged from the conference, a distinction whose value was diminished by the size of the body, which had twenty-one présentes à la conférence, y assuma le rôle d'«intermédiaire intègre» en s'efforçant d'apaiser les différends entre les États-Unis et le Royaume-Uni (document 282). Le Canada devint membre du conseil, ou de la direction, de l'Organisation provisoire de l'aviation civile qui vit le jour lors de la conférence. Cet honneur perdait toutefois de sa signification en regard de la taille de cet organisme, qui comptait vingt et un membres. Il fut néanmoins décidé que le siège social de l'organisation provisoire serait établi au Canada et, le 15 août 1945, le conseil se réunissait à Montréal.

Selon la conception qu'en avait le Canada, la future Organisation des Nations Unies devait être la clé de voûte du monde d'après-guerre (Chapitre IV). Les autorités canadiennes accordèrent une attention particulière à la rédaction de la charte par les représentants des États-Unis, du Royaume-Uni, de l'Union soviétique et de la Chine réunis à Dumbarton Oaks à l'été 1944. Les Anglais se chargeaient par ailleurs de transmettre les observations du Canada, qui jugeait capitale la position des états qui, sans être de grandes puissances, avaient démontré lors de leur participation à la guerre «leur empressement à intervenir conjointement à la fois contre toute forme d'agression et de possession d'installations industrielles et militaires étendues» (document 409). En vertu du principe de la représentation fonctionnelle, on déploya des efforts considérables pour permettre à ces états de jouer un rôle accru. Au moment de la conférence de San Francisco, qui eut lieu un an plus tard, la délégation canadienne en arrivait toutefois à la conclusion qu'il fallait accepter la domination des grandes puissances si l'on voulait assister à la naissance d'une organisation mondiale qui comprendrait l'U.R.S.S. et les états sous son influence. Le 10 juin 1945, Norman Robertson déclarait à San Francisco : «À notre avis, il vaut mieux nous satisfaire de cette Organisation-là et, une fois cette décision prise, cesser de vouloir remettre en question le fragile consensus auquel les grandes puissances sont parvenues» (document 478). Pareil réalisme n'altéra nullement l'optimisme qui transparaît dans les documents publiés dans le présent volume, surtout lorsque les «rencontres privées» entre grandes puissances ne jouaient pas un rôle déterminant (document 499). Les états moins importants eurent davantage la chance de se mettre en évidence lorsque le comité exécutif de la Commission préparatoire se réunit par la suite à Londres pour mettre au point les derniers détails concernant le fonctionnement de la nouvelle organisation. Ces séances et celles de la Commission elle-même permirent au Canada de raffermir ses espoirs quant à son rôle éventuel au sein des Nations Unies.

Mais les responsables de la politique étrangère canadienne étaient davantage inquiets des conséquences de la course à l'armement nucléaire (Chapitre V). Avant l'explosion, le 6 août 1945, de la première bombe atomique, la principale préoccupation du Canada touchait la production nucléaire et la coordination de cette production avec les États-Unis et le Royaume-Uni. Par la suite, le Canada s'intéressa aux répercussions que cette production pourrait avoir sur les plans militaire et diplomatique, de même qu'aux mesures à prendre pour en arriver à un contrôle à l'échelle internationale. Même s'il était préoccupé à l'idée qu'une grande puissance pût exercer un monopole à cet égard (document members. The conference decided that the headquarters of the interim organization should be in Canada. On August 15, 1945, the Council met in Montreal.

The centrepiece of Canadian planning for the postwar world was the prospective United Nations Organization (Chapter IV). Canadian policy makers paid close attention to the drafting of the charter, by representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union and China meeting at Dumbarton Oaks in the summer of 1944, the Canadian comments being conveyed through the British. Of paramount importance to Canada was the position of states which, while not great powers, had revealed through their participation in war "both readiness to join in concerted action against aggression and the possession of substantial military and industrial capacity" (document 409). Considerable effort was expended in seeking an enhanced role for such states, on the basis of the functional principle. By the time of the San Francisco conference a year later, however, the Canadian delegation had concluded that, if a world organization were to come into being and include the Soviet Union and states within its orbit, great power domination would have to be accepted. "Our view," Norman Robertson reported from San Francisco on June 10, 1945, "is that it is better to take the Organization that we can get and, having come to that decision, to refrain from further efforts to pry apart the difficult unity which the Great Powers have attained" (document 478). Such realism did not destroy the optimism characterizing much of what is published here, especially when "penthouse meetings" of the great powers were not a determining factor (document 499). There was more scope for smaller states when the Executive Committee of the Preparatory Commission met later in London to develop the practical arrangements for the new organization. These sessions, and those of the commission itself, encouraged hopeful expectations of Canada's role in the organization.

More troubling for the makers of foreign policy were the consequences of atomic warfare (Chapter V). Prior to the first use of the atomic bomb on August 6, 1945, the principal Canadian concerns were production and coordination with the United States and the United Kingdom. Thereafter, attention shifted to the implications for war and diplomacy and to the arrangements for international control. Despite concern about a possible great power monopoly (document 614), Canada, as one of the three atomic powers and the source of uranium, was a full participant with the United States and the United Kingdom in the discussions which produced agreement to create the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission.

As the arrangements for the regulation of atomic energy indicated, the United Nations assumed an importance far surpassing that of other international organizations (Chapter VI). The most important such organization before the war, the League of Nations, was of course supplanted by the new international body. The aspirations of another, the International Labour Organization, were regarded with some reserve because of the possibility of conflict with United Nations bodies (document 669). The attitude towards the Pan-American Union was cautious, in the absence of an indication that

Comme les dispositions concernant la réglementation de l'énergie nucléaire l'indiquaient, les Nations Unies prenaient une importance qui dépassait de loin celle de tout autre organisation internationale (Chapitre VI). La plus importante de ces organisations d'avant-guerre, la Société des Nations, fut évidemment supplantée par le nouvel organisme international. Quant aux aspirations de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, elles étaient considérées avec une certaine réserve sous prétexte que l'O.I.T. pouvait entrer en conflit avec certaines institutions au sein des Nations Unies (document 669). Faute d'indication quant aux intentions des États-Unis concernant l'adhésion du Canada à l'Union panaméricaine, la prudence était de mise à cet égard. Une note de service datée de mars 1944 laisse d'ailleurs entendre qu'il était «nécessaire d'établir des relations amicales avec les États-Unis avant de songer à coopérer avec les états latino-américains» (document 720).

Le plus important événement à se produire au sein du Commonwealth (Chapitre VII) fut la tenue, pour la seule et unique fois au cours de la guerre, d'une rencontre des premiers ministres à Londres, au printemps 1944. Les préparatifs en vue de cet événement provoquèrent des débats sur de nombreux aspects de la politique canadienne, comme en témoignent les documents reproduits dans les chapitres appropriés. Même si le Canada était loin de songer à remettre en question son appui indéfectible au Commonwealth, diverses propositions en faveur d'une centralisation à Londres des prises de décision ne firent qu'exacerber encore une fois les susceptibilités canadiennes. En effet, le Canada tenait notamment à éviter que les pays indépendants fussent écartés du processus d'instauration d'un nouvel ordre international. Le manque de solidarité du Canada à l'égard du Commonwealth était dû par ailleurs à des problèmes intérieurs, comme le laisse clairement entendre le discours prononcé à Toronto, en janvier 1944, par l'ambassadeur britannique à Washington, Lord Halifax (document 731). Le Canada reconnaissait toutefois qu'en tirant adéquatement parti de ses liens avec le Commonwealth, il pouvait renforcer sa présence dans les affaires internationales (document 734). La tâche consistait par conséquent à exploiter habilement la situation tout en évitant de provoquer des remous au pays ou de créer des malentendus à l'étranger quant au rôle joué par le Canada à l'échelle internationale. C'est d'ailleurs en s'appuyant sur cette prémisse que le Canada aborda les diverses questions qui se posèrent à lui en 1944 et 1945 concernant son adhésion au Commonwealth.

La question de l'indépendance du Canada face à son voisin américain se posa également lorsque les États-Unis manifestèrent le désir de réaliser des projets de défense et de poster un nombre élevé de soldats dans le Grand Nord canadien. Les règles du jeu avaient toutefois été établies au cours de la guerre, de sorte que les deux pays s'entendirent relativement bien, d'autant plus que les accords convenus prévoyaient le démantèlement ultérieur des installations ou

Canadian membership was encouraged by the United States. "Friendly relations with the United States," observed a departmental memorandum in March 1944, "must precede cooperation with Latin American states" (document 720).

Within the Commonwealth (Chapter VII), the most important event was the holding, for the first and only time during the war, of a prime ministers' meeting in London in the spring of 1944. The preparations for this event prompted review of a broad range of Canadian policies, as documented in the relevant chapters. Although continuing support for the Commonwealth was not in question, Canadian sensitivity to suggestions of centralized decision-making in London was as acute as ever. One reason was not to undermine independent participation in the postwar international order. There was also still an important domestic dimension to the Canadian position on Commonwealth solidarity, as was made clear (document 731) when the British ambassador in Washington, Lord Halifax, lent support to the idea in a speech in Toronto in January 1944. Yet it was also recognized that, handled properly, the Commonwealth relationship could be a source of strength in international affairs (document 734). The task, therefore, was to exploit this opportunity while avoiding division on the Commonwealth connection at home or misunderstanding of Canada's international position abroad. This, it might be said, was the premise on which Canada approached the various questions arising from Commonwealth membership in 1944 and 1945.

Questions of autonomy also arose in the relationship with the United States (Chapter VIII), as a result of that country's interest in defence projects here and the stationing of large numbers of American personnel in remote parts of Canada. The ground rules, however, had been worked out earlier in the war, and the relationship, much of which involved arrangements to dismantle the projects or turn them over to Canadian control, proceeded comparatively smoothly. Defence relations were an important consideration in planning for the future. There was sensitivity to the vulnerability of Canada's position between the United States and the Soviet Union, should tensions between those two countries revive, and acceptance that the close relationship for continental defence which had developed during the war should continue, together with the instrument for coordination, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. It was also recognized, that, to avoid the possibility of infringements on sovereignty, Canada should remain responsible for the defence of its own territory.

In other bilateral relationships (Chapter IX), the most interesting developments were perhaps those affecting France and the Soviet Union. Once the former had been liberated from the enemy, its international position ceased to be a matter of major concern to Canada for domestic or external reasons. The documentation on relations with France, therefore, is much less than in the earlier volumes on the war. With the defection of Igor Gouzenko just after the end of the war, it became apparent that relations with the Soviet Union would be much more troublesome than had been the case since the decision to establish diplomatic relations in 1942. Here was a clear warning that the geopolitical concerns affecting the defence relationship with the United States leur remise au gouvernement canadien. Ces relations de défense constituaient un élément important de la planification de l'avenir. On était sensible au fait que le Canada, coincé entre les États-Unis et l'U.R.S.S., demeurait vulnérable si les tensions devaient renaître entre ces deux pays. On admettait également que les relations étroites portant sur la défense du continent nord-américain, et qui avaient été établies au cours de la guerre, devraient se poursuivre, de même qu'il fallait garder intact cet instrument de coordination qu'était la Commission permanente canado-américaine de défense. On en vint également à la conclusion que, pour éviter toute limitation éventuelle de sa souveraineté, le Canada se devait d'assumer la responsabilité de la défense de son territoire.

Dans le cas d'autres relations bilatérales (Chapitre IX), les changements les plus notables semblaient se produire entre la France et l'U.R.S.S. Une fois la France libérée, le Canada cessa, pour des raisons de politique intérieure aussi bien qu'extérieure, de se préoccuper de la place de cette dernière sur l'échiquier international. Les documents portant sur les liens du Canada avec la France sont par conséquent plus rares que dans les précédents volumes traitant de la période des hostilités. Par suite de la défection d'Igor Gouzenko tout juste après la fin de la guerre, il devint évident que les relations avec l'U.R.S.S. seraient plus difficiles qu'elles ne l'avaient été depuis que le Canada avait décidé, en 1942, d'établir des relations diplomatiques avec ce pays. Cela signifiait clairement que les intérêts géopolitiques allaient bientôt avoir une influence réelle et déterminante sur les relations de défense avec les États-Unis. Le vent d'optimisme qui souffle dans le présent volume ne durerait guère plus que le temps de savourer la victoire.

On trouvera dans l'introduction au Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi) les grandes lignes qui nous ont guidés dans le choix des documents contenus dans le présent volume. Une explication des mécanismes et des principes de rédaction se trouve dans l'introduction au Volume 9 (p. xix). Là comme ici, une dague (†) indique que le document n'a pas été publié. Le document 1252 a été édité conformément à la Loi sur l'accès à l'information. Aucune autre restriction n'a touché les documents publiés dans le présent volume.

Il est fait mention, dans l'introduction aux Volumes 7 à 10, de certains ouvrages traitant des efforts de guerre et des relations extérieures du Canada au cours de cette période. Le lecteur aura également intérêt à consulter les comptes rendus de deux témoins de certains des événements relatés : A. F. W. Plumptre, Three Decades of Decision: Canada and the World Monetary System, 1944-75, Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1977; Escott Reid, On Duty: A Canadian at the Making of the United Nations, Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1983. La publication suivante traite également de la participation canadienne à la création des Nations Unies : Clyde Sanger, réd., Les Canadiens et les Nations Unies, Ottawa, ministère des Affaires extérieures, 1988. L'ouvrage suivant aborde la question des relations canado-américaines dans le Grand Nord : Shelagh D. Grant, *Sovereignty or Security? would soon become a reality, and that the optimistic mood pervasive in this volume would not long outlast the euphoria of victory.

The guidelines followed in selecting documents for this volume are those quoted in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi). The editorial devices and principles are explained in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. xix). As in that volume, a dagger (†) indicates that a document has not been printed. Document 1252 has been edited in conformity with the Access to Information Act. No other restrictions have affected the publicaton of documents in this volume.

A number of works dealing with Canada's involvement in the war and with external relations during the period are mentioned in the Introductions to Volumes 7-10. Users of this volume will be interested as well in the accounts of two participants in some of the events treated here: A. F. W. Plumptre, Three Decades of Decision: Canada and the World Monetary System, 1944-75 (Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1977); and Escott Reid, On Duty: A Canadian at the Making of the United Natons (Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1983). Canada's involvement in the founding of the United Nations is also dealt with in Clyde Sanger, ed., Canadians and the United Nations (Ottawa: Department of External Affairs, 1988). Canadian-American relations in the north are examined in Shelagh D. Grant, Sovereignty or Security? Government Policy in the Canadian North, 1936-1950 (Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 1988).

REMERCIEMENTS

Eric Gilmour a assuré la direction des travaux préparatoires pour le présent et le précédent volumes. F. J. McEvoy a participé au choix et à l'annotation des documents. Je tiens à souligner le précieux apport de MM. Gilmour et McEvoy à la réalisation du présent ouvrage. Les sources des documents publiés ici sont indiquées dans la liste de provenance des documents. Jeannette Fournier et ses collègues de la Direction de la gestion de l'information documentaire, ainsi que le personnel des Archives nationales du Canada, m'ont largement fait bénéficier de leur aide au cours du processus de sélection des documents.

A. F. Hart était directeur de l'ancienne Direction historique pendant que j'effectuais ma recherche en vue de la préparation du présent volume. Janet Bax, qui était directrice de la Direction des relations avec les universités, a assumé la responsabilité des travaux d'histoire pour le Ministère au moment de la conclusion des accords pour fins de publication. Je les remercie tous les deux de leur intérêt et de leur soutien. La préparation technique a été menée à bien, sous la direction de E. A. Kelly, par Isobel Cameron, Elizabeth Heatherington, Dawn Jones, Liza Linklater, Laurel Pardy et Catherine Preston. Mme Cameron a procédé au choix des illustrations et préparé la liste de provenance des documents, la liste des personnalités et l'index. Le manuscrit a été produit au Centre de traitement de texte du ministère sous la direction d'Aline Gélineau. Francine Poirier a assuré la coordination entre les membres de l'équipe de production. Je leur suis reconnaissant du soin et de la patience dont ils ont fait preuve tout au long de leur travail. À titre d'éditeur, je garde la responsabilité des omissions et erreurs qui ont pu se glisser dans le présent ouvrage ainsi que des opinions exprimées dans l'introduction.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Work on this volume as on its predecessor was begun under the direction of Eric Gilmour. F. J. McEvoy was associated throughout in the collection and annotation of material. I am glad to acknowledge the valuable contribution of Messrs. Gilmour and McEvoy to the text produced here. The sources of the documents published are shown in the Location of Documents list. Jeannette Fournier and her colleagues in the department's Records Management Division and the staff of the National Archives of Canada were of great help during the selection process.

A. F. Hart was director of the former Historical Division while I was engaged in research for the volume, and Janet Bax was director of the Academic Relations Division, which has assumed responsibility for the department's historical work, when the arrangements were completed for publication. I am grateful to both for their interest, encouragement and support. The technical preparation was carried out, under the supervision of E. A. Kelly, by Isobel Cameron, Elizabeth Heatherington, Dawn Jones, Liza Linklater, Laurel Pardy and Catherine Preston. Mrs. Cameron chose the illustrations and prepared the Location of Documents list, the List of Persons and the Index. The manuscript was prepared in the Department of External Affairs Word Processing Centre under the direction of Aline Gélineau. Francine Poirier coordinated the movement of the manuscript among the various members of the production team. I am indebted to all for the careful and patient attention given to the work. Responsibility for the views expressed in the Introduction, is mine as editor.

POST-HOSTILITIES PLANNING

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

CANADIAN PLANNING FOR THE INTERNATIONAL SETTLEMENT[1]

1. The time has arrived for preparing more comprehensive Canadian material on the various aspects of the armistice period and peace settlement. Our current preparations do not cover the whole ground and have made very uneven progress. We have made most progress in the two fields of international civil aviation and international economic policies. As these are parts of a related whole, it is becoming important that our studies in other fields should catch up with what has been done on these subjects. For example, the security aspects of international civil aviation are left hanging in the air until we can relate them to the world security organization. We have, however, developed fairly clear ideas of what we should reject and what we can support in such questions as civil aviation, monetary stabilization and commercial policy.

2. Exchanges of views are about to begin in Washington between the United Kingdom, the United States and perhaps the Soviet Governments on the world security organization forecast by the Moscow Declaration.[2] It is certain that at the Prime Ministers' Conference in London these questions and many related matters of political, defence and economic policies will be discussed. On these subjects it would be wasted effort for Canada to attempt to plan from the foundation upwards, since as a secondary country we have not a great enough influence to make our views prevail. We should, however, be in a position at least to decide what is not acceptable and to advocate changes or additions to fit our particular interests.

3. It seems, therefore, most desirable that we should both start an orderly study of special questions which have hitherto been neglected, and at the same time follow very closely the plans which are being developed between the Great Powers so that we can comment on them from the Canadian point of view with confidence and celerity.

4. With regard to special studies, the Advisory Committee on Post Hostilities Problems can through its dependent Working Committee institute a programme covering the field of Canadian Defence and security. The preparation might be put in hand of a basic paper on possible dangers to Canadian security after the war. This should be supplemented by special studies on a number of particular topics such as: post-war defence arrangements with the United States; the position of Canada in the case of difficulties between the United States and the Soviet Union; Canadian defence policy with respect to Newfoundland, Greenland and Iceland; and the Canadian position in a North Atlantic and a North Pacific security zone. An important question which may at any time become pressing is the relative advantage to Canada of regional or of world-wide security arrangements. Another problem which may assume importance is whether air training in Canada should after the war be restricted to domestic needs.

5. The topics just suggested, to which others could readily be added, relate to definite Canadian interests in security arrangements. At the same time it is desirable that close attention should be paid to the plans being developed for application in other regions. The bulk of our information comes from the United Kingdom, and we are now receiving their draft plans in great volume covering all sorts of questions from the location of the North Eastern Italian frontiers to the military aspect of any post-war security organization.

6. In addition to questions directly related to security further thought should be given to broad political and economic problems. In the political field the Canadian Government will before long be called upon to answer such difficult questions as: How far can authority reasonably be concentrated in the hands of the Great Powers after the war? How great commitments can be accepted by Canada to maintain peace and to further prosperity? Should Canadian membership in the British Commonwealth involve any exclusively Commonwealth commitments? Should Canada seek to act mainly as a secondary world power or as an influential member of the Commonwealth?

7. What is agreed upon before the end of the war is likely to determine the course of history for many years to come. The problems mentioned in this note are mainly long-range problems. Nevertheless the answers to them will grow out of wartime decisions, reached often in a hurry so as to take advantage of personal conferences of leading statesmen or of an opportune moment to secure a firm reply from one of the leading powers. To pay attention now to these problems is, therefore, a necessary complement to meeting the problems of the conduct of the war. The conduct of the war, indeed, is already beginning to be mixed up with the framing of the peace, and this process will accelerate as the end of the European war draws nearer.

8. It is recommended that:

(a) the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems should initiate a programme of special studies, to be undertaken by its Working Committee, on questions relating to Canadian security of the type mentioned in paragraph 4;

(b) comments should be prepared, by the Working Committee or by the Department of External Affairs or other agency appropriate to the subject, on draft proposals relating to the armistice and peace received from the United Kingdom or other sources when Canadian interests are directly involved in these proposals;

(c) draft statements of Canadian policy covering the type of questions referred to in paragraph 6 should be prepared in the Department of External Affairs.

Mémorandum du ministère des Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Department of External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] April 19, 1944

POST-HOSTILITIES AND POSTWAR PLANNING

CANADA

(1) The War Committee of the Cabinet constituted a Post-hostilities Advisory Committee on December 16, 1943. It consists of Messrs. Robertson, Wrong, Heeney, W. C. Clark, J. E. St. Laurent, and the chiefs of staff. Ad hoc meetings of the persons now comprising the Advisory Committee had been held since July 22, 1943.

(2) This Advisory Committee has appointed a Working Committee on Post-hostilities Problems. This Working Committee has held fortnightly meetings since August 1943. The chairman is Mr. Wrong, and the secretary Mr. Holmes from the Department of External Affairs. It includes representatives from the planning directorates of the three Services, External Affairs, and the Privy Council Office. It has been studying the U.K. P.H.P. papers and has sent comments to the U.K. Committee on them. Australia and New Zealand are setting up P.H.P. committees and, at New Zealand's request, Canada is exchanging papers with New Zealand.

(3) The Working Committee on March 2, 1944, submitted a memorandum to the Advisory Committee which was subsequently approved of by the Advisory Committee. The memorandum reads as follows:

"The working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems desire to report that a stage has been reached in their work at which a more exact programme should be laid down for their guidance. The Committee have hitherto been occupied mainly with the study of papers received from the Post-Hostilities Planning Sub-Committee in London and related documents, and on these they have from time to time submitted reports to the Advisory Committee.

Experience has shown that it is desirable that the activities of the Working Committee should be expanded. It should remain an important part of their functions to study the papers received from London. Their study of these papers should be directed to two principal ends:

(1) The offering of comments from time to time to the London Committee from the Working Committee on drafts under consideration in London; this has already been done in the case of the papers relating to the security aspects of international civil aviation and comments are now being prepared on the paper entitled 'Military Aspect of any Post-War Security Organization.' When papers are received at an early stage of preparation which involve either general or particular Canadian interests, the Working Committee can in this way bring to notice of the P.H.P. Sub-Committee in London considerations which seem to them to have been overlooked or under-emphasized. This can be done in an informal manner without committing the Canadian Government to a definite opinion. This procedure was proposed to the Prime Minister before the Working Committee's comments on the paper dealing with civil aviation were submitted, and it received his approval.

(2) The preparation of observations and reports based mainly on these papers and designed to insure that the responsible Canadian authorities are familiar with the main lines of the plans being framed in London, so that they will be in a position to comment, if necessary, at a later stage when the plans become a question of intergovernmental consultation. General reports of this character dealing with plans for the occupation of Germany have been submitted to the Advisory Committee, and have been employed by the Advisory Committee in submitting observations to the Cabinet War Committee.[3]

The Working Committee has not as yet undertaken the preparation of original papers dealing with particular Canadian security problems. While all such planning must be hypothetical and contingent until the outlines of the international security system are fixed, nevertheless it is desirable that attention should be directed to questions of the type listed below, even if it be found impossible to frame specific recommendations. It is, therefore, suggested that the Advisory Committee should authorize a programme of study, which might include the following subjects:

(i) Advantages and disadvantages to Canada of organizing world security on a regional or on a universal basis;

(ii) Post-war defence arrangements with the United States;[4]

(iii) Canadian policy towards the defence of Newfoundland;[5]

(iv) The Canadian military interest in Greenland and Iceland;

(v) The Canadian position in the event of strained relations between the United States and the U.S.S.R.;

(vi) The Canadian role in North Pacific defence;

(vii) Advantages and disadvantages of continuing the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan."

(4) The Working Committee has started to work on topics i and ii. Topic iii is being pursued through other channels.

Le ministre, l'ambassade aux États-Unis,
au sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Minister, Embassy in United States,
to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Washington, April 27, 1944

Dear Mr. Wrong,

On April 22nd, under cover of our despatch No. 1014,† we sent to you a memorandum of April 21st† which Reid had prepared on planning in the United States State Department on the international political aspects of the peace settlement.

I think it would help us to get more information from the State Department on their views in this field if we were able to give them some indications of how our own minds are moving. Do you think it would be possible for you to let us have papers prepared by your working committee on post-hostilities problems which we could give informally to the State Department? It could be made clear that the papers did not commit the Canadian government, but had been prepared by your working committee as a basis for discussion.

Some of the papers prepared by the committee would not, I realise, be in a form in which they could appropriately be transmitted to the State Department since they are comments on United Kingdom P.H.P. papers. However, I would assume that these papers could be recast in a form in which they were not comments on U.K. papers, but were self-contained.

One paper which I think would be of special interest to the State Department would be the one on advantages and disadvantages to Canada of organizing world security on a regional or on a universal basis.[6] Clearly one of the most difficult problems which the State Department and Foreign Offices of the other principal United Nations have to face is that of reconciling regional security arrangements and mutual defence pacts with a universal security system.

I do not, of course, know whether an offer by us to give the State Department some of our studies would result in their being willing to give us some of theirs in return. It might be difficult for them to do that since at the moment their intention is to circulate papers only to the U.K. and the U.S.S.R. However, the chances of our getting useful information from them would undoubtedly be increased if we were to give them the papers. There is also, of course, the possibility that our papers might have some influence on their own thinking before their views had become too crystallized.

If you do decide to send us papers for transmission to the State Department, it would be necessary to decide what channels we should use. It seems to me that Reid might give them either to Notter or to Pasvolsky. The advantage of giving them to Pasvolsky is that this would put us in direct touch with the key man in the State Department planning. On the other hand, you might feel that this was putting the exchange on too high a level.

Whatever your decision is on whether or not to give us papers for transmission to the State Department, I hope that you will find it possible to send us papers for our own consideration.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

P.S. I do not know whether you are contemplating doing a paper on the relationship between functional international organizations and the general international organization. This is a subject on which I know you have done a good deal of thinking. It would be a good subject for treatment in a paper to be given the State Department since they are particularly interested in it.

4. DEA/7-ADs

Le sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures au ministre, l'ambassade aux États-Unis

Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister, Embassy in United States

SECRET Ottawa, May 11, 1944

Dear Mr. Pearson,

We have been considering the suggestions made in your letter of April 27th, looking to the possible exchange of material with the State Department on the planning of the international settlement. The more information that the Embassy can secure from the State Department on their plans the better. I am afraid, however, that if they should prove willing to exchange papers with us on a barter basis the traffic would not be large.

The first enclosure to this letter is a note entitled "Canadian Planning for the International Settlement,"[7] which I prepared on February 22nd. This indicates the nature of the methods which we are employing and the limited scope of our endeavours. You will observe, from the fourth paragraph on page 1, that we are refraining from any attempt to draw up Canadian schemes for the organization of world security and are confining ourselves largely to the study of proposals which reach us from other countries, and especially the United Kingdom. It might be advantageous for us to attempt more than this if we had the time and the people to do so.

We have not sent to you all the papers which would be useful to give you a picture of what is being done here. In despatch No. 916 of August 16th, 1943,† the organization of the Working Committee on Post Hostilities Problems was explained. In despatches No. 1399 of December 3rd† and No. 70 of January 24th† the first and second reports of the Working Committee to the Advisory Committee were forwarded. I enclose some additional papers, which may be of interest, as follows:

(2) Note by the Working Committee on a London P.H.P. paper entitled "Military Aspect of the New Postwar Security Organization;"†

(3) Views of the Working Committee on London P.H.P. paper "Civil Air Transport and Security Problems;"†

(4) A study by the Working Committee, which has now been forwarded to the Advisory Committee, entitled "Advantages and Disadvantages of the Regional Organization of Security and Defence."†

I am also sending to you, under a separate letter, a memorandum,† approved by the Working Committee, dealing with the Soviet proposals that members of the German armed forces should be made prisoners of war at the Armistice.

None of this material is in a form in which it can be handed to the State Department without change, although a good deal of it may be useful as a guide when these matters are being discussed by the Embassy with officers of the State Department. We have, however, prepared a revised version of the paper on "The Regional Organization of Security and Defence" which could be given to the State Department if it is desirable to do so. Please remember, however, that we are not likely to produce many papers of this sort, and consider whether you should hand them this paper without receiving some undertaking to reciprocate on their part.

If you feel it desirable to attempt an exchange, I think it better that this should not be done on as high a level as Pasvolsky. We have found it essential in our contact with the Post Hostilities Problems Committee in London to reach an understanding that the papers produced by them and by us should receive only a very narrow circulation, and should be regarded merely as expressing the views of the individuals concerned. At this stage at least, therefore, you must, I think, keep any arrangements of this sort that you can make with the State Department on the same level.

We have now had twenty meetings of the Working Committee. I think we could agree to send you the Minutes of all future meetings if you would like to have them. I am enclosing the Minutes of a meeting held on April 27th,† which was called particularly for the purpose of hearing the views of Lieutenant Commander Todd on the P.H.P. Committee in London. Todd, who used to belong to the Working Committee here, has been in London for some months, and is the Naval Liaison Officer with the P.H.P. Committee. Actually, the Minutes do not give full weight to the point of view which he felt that the

P.H.P. Committee held, but you will see the kind of impression that he got. I think that this attitude of mine [mind?] is more firmly rooted in London in the Service Departments than in the Foreign Office or other civil Departments concerned with the planning of the settlement.

I noted, particularly, your remark that it was the intention to circulate United States papers to the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R. We had heard nothing about this before and it seems rather important to know the extent to which it is to be carried on. One of the difficulties we have at the moment in sending you material for the State Department is that a good deal of it takes the form of commentary on P.H.P. papers. So long as there is no United Kingdom-United States exchange we do not feel that we can even indicate the subjects on which the P.H.P. Committee is working. If, however, there was at least some exchange of papers or reports, we could feel more free in this way. I am, therefore, writing to Mr. Ritchie to ask him if he has any information on this point.

The suggestion made in the postscript to your letter is interesting, but I also find it rather frightening, and I think that it is not a suitable subject for study by the Working Committee, since it really does not concern the Service Departments. Furthermore, it would involve the development and evaluation of so many assumptions on the probable form of international organization that I hesitate to hold out any prospect that we shall undertake it.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

P.S. I forgot to mention that the final enclosures are two copies of the paper on regional organization, altered so that it could be seen by the State Department. The enclosures numbered 1 to 5 are, of course, for use in the Embassy only.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures au ministre, l'ambassade aux États-Unis

Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister, Embassy in United States

SECRET Ottawa, June 2, 1944

In continuation of my letter of May 23rd† dealing with the planning of the international settlement, I enclose, herewith, a copy of the Minutes of the meetings of the Post-Hostilities Working Committee held on May 5th and May 19th.† I am afraid that these Minutes will not be very intelligible since they constantly refer to papers which we are not in a position to pass on to you. If, however, you notice in them any question of special interest on which you would like to receive further information we shall do our best to satisfy you.

On further reflection, I think it would be unwise for Mr. Reid to give the State Department an informal memorandum on the question of an international police force. There is, of course, no harm in discussing the possibilities along the lines of the draft memorandum enclosed with your letter of May 19th but I would rather not let the State Department have a document which might acquire in the process of circulation a greater degree of authority as expressing the Canadian point of view than is warranted by the facts.

I am not yet able to let you have a copy of the draft United Kingdom paper on the Organization of World Security which was before the Prime Ministers' Meeting. There are only 2 or 3 copies in Ottawa and we cannot spare one at present. In any case, some revision of this paper was agreed upon in London and further changes are, so far as I know, still under discussion. I gather that when conversations on the subject begin in Washington it is likely that Sir Alexander Cadogan will come from London and that Mr. Jebb will accompany him.

The main task before the Working Committee at present is the preparation of a paper on defence arrangements between the United States and Canada after the war. This has now reached draft No. 2 but it will have to be substantially revised before it goes further. I may be able to send you a copy after the next revision in perhaps a fortnight or so as I shall be glad to have your comments before the paper takes its final form.

Yours sincerely,

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures[8]

The representation of the Department on the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems has become too cumbrous and it is necessary to re-examine the position. At the last meeting of the Working Committee there were seven members of this Department. The Air Force, Navy and Privy Council Office were each represented by one officer and the Army by two.

The original representation of this Department consisted of myself as chairman, Glazebrook as alternate and Holmes as secretary. Since then Ignatieff has become assistant secretary in view of the heavy volume of documents to be handled.

As chairman of the Committee, I think that the best organization for us to adopt would be for the regular departmental representation to consist of myself, Holmes and Ignatieff. When problems of direct concern to other Divisions of the Department are under consideration a representative of the Division would be invited to attend and in any case copies of the more important documents would be circulated for information to other Divisions. The Committee is designed to be an interdepartmental study group and its

Dear Mr. Wrong,

On May 11th you wrote to me† enclosing a copy of a letter from Mr. Pearson of April 27th on the subject of closer liaison between the State Department and ourselves on the planning of the settlement. I have had a talk with Colonel Cornwall-Jones, the Secretary of the Post-Hostilities Planning Staff, about the questions raised in your letter. He tells me that at the present time there is no exchange going on on the Post-Hostilities Planning Staff level between themselves and the Americans. It is felt here that any exchanges of papers at this level would have to wait until the forthcoming discussions on Future World Organisation have been launched in Washington. After the Foreign Office memoranda on this subject have been tabled it would then be desirable to have further exchanges at a lower level, probably through the British Staff Mission in Washington.

One of the reasons for waiting until after the Washington talks for any unofficial exchanges of views is the anxiety of the United Kingdom authorities to avoid anything that might arouse suspicion in the minds of the Russians that there had been unofficial agreement between the United Kingdom and American authorities before the tripartite discussions began, and that the Russians were in fact being "ganged up on." I have told Cornwall-Jones of the steps which we have taken in the direction of exchanging papers with the State Department and I have also assured him that none of the views of the Post Hostilities Planning people in London would be passed on through this channel to the State Department.

Yours sincerely,

C. S. A. RITCHIE

Colonel Collinson explained that the revision of "Draft 2" of the longer paper on Canadian defence relations with the United States was not yet ready for submission to the Committee but he hoped to have this available for the next meeting.

The Chairman expressed the view that it might soon be necessary to review the organization of the Committee, and consider whether it might not be necessary to have a small group of junior members who could give greater attention to the drafting of papers and the study of subjects referred to them. The subjects under consideration by the Committee could be divided roughly into two groups:

(a) short-term — armistice, arrangements for the occupation and control of Germany in the immediate post-surrender period.

(b) long-term — future international organization, defence arrangements between Canada, the United [States], the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries, base facilities and other questions involving the definition of post-war Canadian strategic policy.

The questions under consideration belonged to group B, and as suggested in the "Preliminary Paper" on post-war defence arrangements with the United States,† there were three main aspects of Canadian defence policy, each of which was closely related to the other two. The Chairman thought that it would probably be necessary to give parallel consideration to each of these, if a balanced view of Canadian military policy were to be developed. It was difficult to make much progress until agreement had been reached on the form of the future international organization and until there had been some definition of the military obligations which might arise under the new world security organization.

4. Post-hostilities Joint Drafting Group.

It was agreed to establish a Post-hostilities Joint Drafting Group consisting of representatives of the three services and External Affairs. The Service members of the group would remain as part of the planning section of their respective services, but would seek to devote whatever time was necessary to the preparation of drafts for consideration by the working committee. It was agreed that it would not be necessary to secure further authority for such a step, as it could be taken on the responsibility of the respective Directors of Plans and of the chairman for External Affairs. Mr. Wrong expressed the view that although there was no pressure at the moment to produce papers, it was desirable that such a group study the problems which would have to be faced, so that they could be ready to produce plans quickly when the need arose.

It was agreed that Lt. Commander Hodgson, Lt. Col. Smith and Mr. Ignatieff would serve on the group. Mr. Wrong was requested to discuss with Group Captain Hanna the views of the Air Force and if they were agreeable, to the appointment of an Air Force representative. After discussion with Group Captain Hanna, Mr. Ignatieff would be instructed to call the group together.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut commissaire en Grande-Bretagne

TOP SECRET Ottawa, January 3, 1945

Dear Mr. Massey,

We have recently been approached by the United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office concerning the work carried on in London by the Post Hostilities Planning Staff and certain new developments in the relationship between the Post Hostilities Planning bodies in Ottawa and that organization. This question was referred to in Mr. Ritchie's letter to Mr. Wrong of December 19th.†

As you know, as the result of the reorganization of the P.H.P. organization in London, the Post Hostilities Planning Staff some time ago came under the Chiefs of Staff Committee and assumed a predominantly military character. The United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff are now reviewing the United Kingdom's post-war security position in all possible contingencies. On the one hand they are preparing plans on the assumption of a creation of an effective world security organization and the continuance of existing alliances, including the twenty years' Anglo-Soviet treaty. On the other hand, their appreciations of the long range security position of the United Kingdom must also take into account alternative hypotheses such as that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals remain unrealized and the Anglo-Soviet alliance is broken.

The preparation of such appreciations has been entrusted to the Post Hostilities Planning Staff. This body is in a position to prepare papers on the basis of assumptions without committing in any way the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff or any Government authority. However, as these studies are predominantly of a military character it is intended that questions arising from them should be handled solely through service channels and not through the Dominions Office or Foreign Office as heretofore.

We are assured that it is the intention to keep the military authorities in Canada in touch with the studies of the planners in the United Kingdom, and the P.H.P. Planning Staff propose to continue to send their papers for transmission to the post hostilities planning bodies in Ottawa. While the exact channel to be employed is not altogether clear, it would seem to be most probable that the papers are to be sent to the Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London, which would, in turn, be at liberty to transmit the material to the Chiefs of Staff in Ottawa.

I suggest that you should discuss this question with the principal officers of the Joint Staff Mission with a view to establishing this channel of communication. It is important, however, to make it clear to the United Kingdom authorities that we appreciate the extreme secrecy of P.H.P. Staff papers, and that we understand that the views expressed in them in no way represent the views of the United Kingdom Government or the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff.

For your information I should explain that the two Post Hostilities Planning Committees in Ottawa are not comparable in organization to the Post Hostilities Planning Staff in London. The constitution of the Committees here is essentially on a joint military and civil basis. They have been studying long-range security problems of concern to Canada, but little of this material would be in appropriate form to pass on to the Post Hostilities Planning Staff in London. Most of their papers are prepared for submission to the War Committee. They, therefore, tend to be of a less tentative character than the products of the Post Hostilities Planning Staff in London. We shall continue to send copies of certain of the papers both to Canada House and the Joint Staff Mission, and some of this material may be suitable for passing on to the Post Hostilities Planning Staff.

I might mention that the Prime Minister, who has been informed of this question, considers that any United Kingdom papers which may be communicated to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff should be made available to those who are working on similar problems here. The Joint Staff Mission might be informed of this.

Yours sincerely,

N. A. ROBERTSON

Le haut commissaire en Grande-Bretagne
au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

High Commissioner in Great Britain
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [London,] February 6, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I should like to refer to your letter of January 3rd, in which you discussed the channels by which studies of the Post Hostilities Planning Staff in London might be communicated to the Post Hostilities Planning Committee in Ottawa.

This subject was raised at a meeting between the Canadian Joint Staff Mission and myself held on January 16th, a copy of the minutes of which was enclosed with my letter of January 22nd.† It was agreed at that meeting that the proposal to change the channel of transmission to a Service-to-Service basis instead of from the Dominions Office to External Affairs, in view of the changed nature of the Post-Hostilities Planning Staff in London, should be raised by the Canadian Joint Staff Mission with the British Chiefs of Staff at a meeting to be held on the 19th January. It was not possible to discuss this matter at that meeting, but the Canadian Joint Staff Mission has pursued the matter subsequently with the British Chiefs of Staff.

The British Chiefs of Staff remain exceedingly nervous about the circulation of their papers, in view of the acute embarrassment which might be caused if their purpose were misunderstood. They have agreed to provide four copies each of their papers to the Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London on the understanding that one copy will be retained and three copies will be sent to the Chiefs of Staff Committee in Ottawa, one for each of the Services. They insist, however, that if a copy were provided either for Canada House or for the Department of External Affairs the change in the method of transmission would make no difference at all, as the papers would in the end have the same distribution as previously.

When it was pointed out to them that the Post-Hostilities Planning Committees in Ottawa, unlike those in London, included as active participants representatives of the Department of External Affairs, they agreed that it would be difficult for the Service members not to let the political members of the Committee see the documents sent to them. They seemed to desire that this should be carried out discreetly, and I do not think they would approve of a copy being made for the Department. They could not agree to the provision of a copy for Canada House, nor to allowing members of this Staff to see the papers in the hands of the Joint Staff Mission. The difference between situations in Ottawa and London presumably is that in Ottawa there is a Post-Hostilities Planning Committee which makes sharing practically unavoidable.

You will find the proposals of the Post Hostilities Planning Staff described in detail in C.J.S.M. 15 addressed to the Chiefs of Staff in Ottawa.† In paragraph 4 of that signal it is stated that I am prepared to agree to the omission of Canada House from the distribution of P.H.P. papers, at least until it becomes apparent that the papers are of some political value. This report was based upon a misunderstanding. While I was at first inclined to think that we might let matters ride, upon reflection it seems to me that the present proposals ought not to be accepted. These papers may be prepared by military authorities, but they have important political significance. Although the role of the Foreign Office in their preparation has been considerably reduced, it has not been totally excluded. For our part we need not ask even to be provided with copies but simply to be allowed to be kept in touch with the contents of the papers by our own Service representatives in London. If it is possible to allow representatives of External Affairs in Ottawa to see these papers, there seems no legitimate reason for excluding representatives of External Affairs in London. We appreciate perfectly the basis on which these papers are prepared and the need for the utmost discretion. As a matter of principle it would, I think, be unfortunate if information of this kind were placed in the hands of Canadian Service representatives in London and not shared with representatives of the civil power.

The Secretary of the Canadian Joint Staff Mission is, I believe, sending a message to the Chiefs of Staff,† correcting the previous report as to my views. I thought it wise, however, to supplement his telegram with a more adequate explanation of my opinion. It should not be implied, however, that there has arisen any difference of opinion between the Staff Mission and myself over this issue.

Yours sincerely,
[VINCENT MASSEY]

4. Post-War Canadian Defence Planning. The Chairman recalled that at the last meeting a paper on the Post-war Canadian Defence Relation with the British Commonwealth, prepared by the P.H.P. Joint Drafting Group,[9] had been under discussion, and that it had been decided that considerable revision would be necessary in the light of this discussion. Subsequently, Wing Commander Austin had circulated a comment† on the Drafting Group paper which stated as a conclusion that "final recommendations on the matter of organization, training and equipment of our armed forces should be left open until a sound appreciation of our strategic situation is made." The Chairman was inclined to agree that there were too many unknown factors in the post-war situation affecting the problem of Canadian defence policy to enable the Committee to make specific recommendations on some of Lord Cranborne's proposals.[10] Much would depend on the kind of arrangements which were made under a World Security Organization, and also on the plans adopted by the great powers for the enforcement of peace against Germany and Japan.

He thought that perhaps the Committee should be informed about talks which he had had in Washington in relation to these matters. These had been with the Department of State, and Mr. Pasvolsky had been the principal spokesman. It had come out early in discussions that the State Department were thinking of separate long-term commitments to enforce the peace settlements with Germany and Japan, and regarded such arrangements as coming under Chapter XII of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Paragraph 2 of this Chapter stated that "no provision of the Charter should preclude action taken or authorized in relation to enemy states as a result of the present war by the Governments having responsibility for such action."

Hitherto there had been little information regarding the longer term arrangements for the enforcement of peace. We had no information of agreed Plans extending beyond the period of full military government, which might continue for two or three years, and would probably be followed by a period of civil control under a High Commission. Discussions with the State Department revealed that they were thinking along the lines similar to the proposals made by Senator Vandenberg. It was proposed that there would be a continuation of the alliance, at any rate between the great powers, to enforce the peace settlement imposed on Germany and Japan for a lengthy term of years.

Such an arrangement would seem to have the effect of removing some of the principal security problems from the jurisdiction of the international organization, and would tend to diminish the importance of the Security Council. It would have the effect of increasing the relative importance of those functions of the organization which were not concerned with the maintenance of peace and security, and thereby enhance the position of the Assembly and the functional bodies associated with the organization.

The question would arise as to whether Canada and other secondary States would be associated with the peace enforcement arrangements, and what effect these arrangements would have on the military agreements contemplated in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. It was likely that if the Great Powers accepted responsibility for the enforcement of peace terms against Germany and Japan, they would not be willing to share the making of decisions to take action with any one else. On the other hand, it was possible that other countries may be associated with the arrangements, especially those territorially adjacent to Germany and Japan.

As regards the special military agreements between members of the international organization under Chapter VIII B, paragraph 5, of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, Mr. Wrong said that the position was by no means clear. He had gathered from his talks in Washington that it was expected that the Great Powers would have to make their agreements first. The other members might be associated with these agreements, possibly, on a regional or group basis. These, however, were only tentative suggestions, and in the circumstances Canada could not develop her planning until the U.K., U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. had reached some agreement on their own responsibilities.

Apart from any agreement under Chapter VIII B, paragraph 5, Mr. Wrong said that it seemed to be expected in Washington that member States would undertake a general obligation to make transit facilities available to forces deputed to take enforcement action arising out of decisions of the Security Council. This would naturally concern Canada's defence relations with the United States. Such an obligation could be regarded as a minimum contribution — the contribution of the use of ports, railways, and airfields to facilitate the movement of forces operating under the direction of the Security Council. It seemed likely that little objection would be taken to our insisting that the Security Council should not have the right to require the despatch of any Canadian forces overseas without the express consent of the Canadian Government. In conclusion the Chairman mentioned that he did not think that there would be a detailed discussion of military agreements at the San Francisco Conference; this would probably have to be left to be dealt with later on. At San Francisco the pressure might well be to include in the Charter language very similar to that in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Preliminary to the San Francisco Conference there would be a discussion of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals in London between Commonwealth governments.

In the discussion which followed Group Captain Hanna asked to what extent Canada might be involved in any peace enforcement agreement reached between the great powers. He pointed out that as a member of the Commonwealth Britain might expect Canada to take a share in this obligation. The Chairman said that it would be difficult to make an exclusive military agreement to this end with the United Kingdom, but Canada might consider being associated with a joint commitment with the United Kingdom and United States. It was essential for the success of the scheme that the United States should participate. Mr. Wrong recalled the failure of the Treaty of Triple Guarantee which had been sought by France as the principal measure of enforcement action after the last war.

As regards the paper on Commonwealth Defence and Lord Cranborne's proposals, it was agreed that it would not be possible to formulate definite recommendations at present.

As regards further studies by the Working Committee the Chairman suggested that it might be desirable to examine what defence interests, if any, Canada had in the North West Staging Route, the Alaska Highway and other United States defence installations in the north-west. The Canol installations and the north-west communications system would also have to be examined. It was agreed that arrangements would be made for drafts to be prepared by the P.H.P. Joint Drafting Group. As regards further meetings of the Committee, it was agreed these should be called by the Chairman as required, or at the request of any member to the Secretary.

2. Exchange of Papers with the Post Hostilities Planning Staff, London.

The Chairman explained that the question under consideration was whether the reports produced by the Post Hostilities Planning Committees here should be made available to the Post Hostilities Planning Staff in London in exchange for the papers which are now being sent through the Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London. The London papers were essentially strategic and military studies and it was clear that we had nothing equivalent to offer to the London Committees. The papers produced by the Canadian Post Hostilities Planning Committees contained political considerations and when approved by the War Committee were intended to serve as guidance in policy on various matters.

Certain Canadian P.H.P. papers had already been made available to the United Kingdom authorities, such as the study on the "Advantages and Disadvantages of the Regional Organization of Security and Defence" (C.P.H.P. (44) Report 2 (Final), April 21st, 1944).† The Chairman suggested that the paper on Post-War Canadian Defence Relationships with the United States, which had been given War Committee approval, might be passed on to the United Kingdom authorities through the Canadian Joint Staff Mission, London, informally without indicating that it represented approved Government policy.

It was agreed that in principle reciprocity with the United Kingdom P.H.P. Staff was useful but in practice few of the Canadian P.H.P. papers were of a kind which could be shown to the United Kingdom authorities. The study on Canadian Post-War Defence Position in Newfoundland, for instance, contained a number of political questions which made it unsuitable for passing on to the P.H.P. Staff. It was agreed that in the case of the paper on the Post-War Canadian Defence Relations with the United States, Mr. Wrong and General Pope would look over the report and decide whether it was suitable for passing on to the Post Hostilities Planning Staff.

[11]Le procès-verbal avait été préparé le 5 avril.
The minutes had been prepared on April 5.

As regards the paper on Newfoundland, Mr. Heeney stated that there had been no appropriate opportunity for the consideration of the Advisory Committee's report by the Cabinet War Committee and there was little prospect that it would come up [for] some time.

The Chairman stated that a further question had been raised with regard to the papers of the Economic and Industrial Planning Staff in London. It was thought that some of the studies of this body might be useful in connection with the consideration of reconstruction problems in Canada. It was felt that little was known about this organization and it was agreed that after enquiry through Canada House, the Secretary should report to the Advisory Committee before any decisions were taken regarding the request for papers from the E.I.P.S.

Discussion of the Programme of the Working Committee.

Mr. Wrong said that in his capacity as Chairman of the Working Committee he had to report a decline in the activity of the Committee. The programme recommended by the Advisory Committee had been largely completed, with the exception of the study of the Canadian relationship after the war in matters of Commonwealth defence. There was no prospect at present of any agreed recommendations on this subject unless the assumptions on which the Working Committee should proceed were clearly defined. Such a definition seemed to be inadvisable until a good deal more was known about the general arrangements governing security after the war. A study had been made of Lord Cranborne's proposals but only tentative recommendations could be made at present.

The Chairman said that, while appreciating the difficulties mentioned, he felt that we might be faced at any time with an agreement between the big powers on the enforcement of peace in relation to Germany and Japan, and Canada might be required to define her position. There was also the related question of the engagements against Germany made by the United Kingdom, such as the Anglo-Soviet Alliance, the proposed guarantee of Polish frontiers, and a possible pact with France and the Low Countries. Mr. Robertson said that a study might be made of implications of the various alternatives of policy which Canada might adopt in relation to such arrangements. Some discussion took place on this question. It was agreed that further study in this regard would have to be primarily the responsibility of the Department of External Affairs.

SECRET Ottawa, March 21, 1945

Dear Mr. Massey,

I was interested to receive your letter of February 6th on the subject of the channels by which the studies of the Post Hostilities Planning Staff in London might be communicated to the Post Hostilities Planning Committee in Ottawa.

This question has now been considered in consultation with the Chiefs of Staff Committee and after full consideration it has been decided that the terms suggested by the British Chiefs of Staff to the Canadian Joint Staff Mission governing the distribution of these papers should be accepted. Accordingly, the Chiefs of Staff Committee have, as you doubtless are aware, informed the Joint Staff Mission in London that the procedure suggested in C.J.M.S. 14[1] is acceptable.

I quite appreciate your own position in the matter as outlined in the last paragraph of your letter. In view of the political significance of some of these papers it would have been desirable, from our point of view, that you should have copies. We should also have liked to have copies made available to the Department of External Affairs, but, under the present arrangements, members of the Department will only be shown copies if they are members of the Post Hostilities Planning Committee.

Our view of this matter was that the anxiety which the British Chiefs of Staff felt regarding the circulation of these papers and to which you refer in your letter was quite comprehensible. We felt that in the circumstances it would hardly be appropriate for us to press the British Chiefs of Staff to extend the circulation of these papers to the Department of External Affairs, nor, indeed, did we feel that any result would be achieved if we attempted to do so in view of the attitude taken by the Post Hostilities Planning Staff in their discussions with the Canadian Joint Staff Mission. The civilian members of our Post Hostilities Planning Committee are to be shown copies of these papers and it was not considered that we should be justified in asking for more than this.

Yours sincerely,

N. A. ROBERTSON

15. DEA/7-ABs

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

POLITICO-STRATEGIC PLANNING

This note is merely an attempt to list as a basis for discussion the chief matters connected with post-war defence policy and organization which are now pending or are likely to call for active consideration in the near future.

1. Newfoundland.

The questions of Canadian defence properties, civil aviation rights, continuing Canadian responsibility for defence and the political and economic policy to be followed towards Newfoundland are all closely connected and require consideration together. The P.H.P. Paper completed in January is already out of date. Do we require some new interdepartmental organization to deal with Newfoundland problems together, containing representatives of External Affairs, Privy Council, Chiefs of Staff and Finance, with authority to co-opt other members for special purposes? Is the time ripe for suggesting a small Cabinet committee on Newfoundland matters?

2. Post-war Continental Defence.

The general question has already been raised in the PJBD and informally by the State Department. A study of defence installations in the North West is in draft form.[12] Any decisions should be related to our general appreciation of the international situation over the next ten or fifteen years and that [sic] this appreciation must take into account the views formulated in Washington, at any rate in so far as the maintenance of defence installations in Canadian territory is concerned.

3. Naval bases in Halifax and Esquimalt.

The position of the Admiralty in these naval bases under the Orders-in-Council adopted on their transfer to Canada has been under consideration and a revised recommendation that the Orders-in-Council should be cancelled has been prepared.† This is not a matter of urgency and need only be pursued as a minor aspect of any arrangement with the United Kingdom on post-war defence responsibilities.

4. Organization of Politico-Strategic Planning.

It is probably desirable to wind up the existing P.H.P. Committees (which have dealt in the main with short-range problems arising in the course of the war) and to substitute some more permanent machinery for the continuous review of policy. The Working Committee in particular seems to have lost most of its utility and has not met for some time. A senior official body should be part of the machinery with the chairman from External Affairs and with representatives of the Services and the Cabinet Secretariat. This body might establish ad hoc sub-committees to prepare studies on particular problems, the present Working Committee being wound up. The machinery on the official level, however, must be related to whatever ministerial machinery is devised. It is essential for close contact to be maintained with the Ministers who carry the chief responsibilities in this field and policy recommendations should be reviewed in a body smaller than the full Cabinet.

The C.G.S. not long ago requested that the Advisory Committee should consider the post-war arrangements regarding policy and military defence committees in Canada. This request is part of the general problem.

5. Post-war Service Establishments.

The War Committee on March 29th directed the Advisory Committee "to initiate a preliminary study of the nature and extent of the permanent forces which Canada should establish and maintain in the period following the conclusion of hostilities." The Services have done some preliminary work on the subject but it would seem unwise to frame specific recommendations until further progress is made in securing an agreed assessment of the general post-war strategic position.

6. Post-war Defence Relationships within the British Commonwealth.

At almost any time pressure may be exerted by the United Kingdom Government to secure some agreement on this question. Should there be an Imperial Conference or Conference of Prime Ministers within the next year Canada will undoubtedly be called upon to take a definite position. While studies have been made of the "Cranborne proposals" put forward in London in May 1944, no conclusions have been reached and no reply has been made.

7. General Politico-Strategic appreciation.

If feasible, it would be of great assistance in making progress on the matters listed above if an appreciation of the international prospects during the next few years could be approved by the Government. Without such an appreciation (and to some extent even with it), we may find that Canada is involved in a series of commitments, expressed or implied, which have been undertaken separately. In the first instance, this appreciation should be prepared in the Department of External Affairs and circulated for comment as a complete draft. If sufficient progress is made, a general appreciation might be supplemented by special reviews of the position affecting the Services, scientific research in relation to defence and production of strategic supplies.

MINUTES OF THE NINTH MEETING OF THE ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON POST HOSTILITIES PROBLEMS HELD ON TUESDAY, JULY 31ST IN ROOM 123 IN THE EAST BLOCK.

PRESENT:

N. A. Robertson, Esq., Department of External Affairs (Chairman)
Vice-Admiral G. C. Jones, Chief of the Naval Staff
Lieut.-General J. C. Murchie, Chief of the General Staff
Air-Marshal R. Leckie, Chief of the Air Staff
Major General Maurice Pope, Privy Council Office
A. D. P. Heeney, Esq., Secretary to the Cabinet
H. H. Wrong, Esq., Department of External Affairs
Dr. W. A. Mackintosh, Department of Finance
Captain H. G. DeWolf, Assistant Chief of the Naval Staff
Captain D. K. MacTavish, Privy Council Office (Secretary)
G. Ignatieff, Esq., Department of External Affairs (Assistant Secretary)

1. Probable Extent and Character of the Post-War Defence Forces in Canada.

At the invitation of the Chairman, Mr. Heeney explained that the Prime Minister had raised the question of the post-war defence forces of Canada at a recent meeting of the Cabinet and had expressed the view that the Government should be in a position to inform Parliament regarding the forces required to be maintained until the end of the Japanese war, both in terms of home and oversea establishments, and also to indicate the extent and character of the post-war defence forces of Canada, giving approximate figures of the numbers and the financial commitment involved. These were two separate problems, and the Committee was concerned only with the post-war plans of the defence forces. As this question would be considered by the Cabinet on the following day, Mr. Heeney thought the Advisory Committee should make some recommendation.

In the discussion which followed it was pointed out by Mr. Wrong that it was difficult to distinguish sharply between the requirements for armed forces in Stage 2, namely, until the defeat of Japan and certain war requirements such as the army occupation duties which Canadian forces might continue to undertake for a period in Germany and Japan. The C.G.S. pointed out the difficulties already arising with regard to defining the terms of service for Canadian occupation forces in Germany. There was a natural anxiety on the part of those who have been detailed for this service to know the approximate date on which they might expect to return to Canada.

The Chairman suggested that there were two separate problems involved in this connection. On the one hand there was the understanding between the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments that at the end of the present fiscal year the Canadian Government would review its commitment to furnish occupation forces in Germany in the light of existing circumstances. This had to be distinguished from the administrative problem of arrangements governing the terms of service of personnel for the occupation forces. The first problem had to be decided in terms of conditions in Europe, the extent to which other countries would be in a position in the course of the next months to take over occupation duties, and also the agreements reached between the Governments of the United Kingdom, United States, the Soviet Union and France who had assumed final responsibility for the occupation and control of Germany. The problem of supplying personnel to the Canadian occupation forces which might be left at the end of the present fiscal year might be considered in relation to arrangements that were made for the establishment of Canadian permanent forces after the war. There was no doubt that there would be considerable pressure on the Government to bring back those who were entitled to demobilization at the conclusion of hostilities.

In this connection the Chief of the Air Staff said that the Air Force were planning to use squadrons which would become part of the permanent R.C.A.F. The Chief of the Naval Staff explained that the position of the Royal Canadian Navy was somewhat different. They had no European commitment for occupation forces. Plans have already been made for meeting the Canadian naval commitment in the Pacific war. Apart from the permanent establishment of 10,000 which had already been agreed to, demobilization of personnel was going forward as rapidly as possible.

The Chief of the General Staff explained that a partial process of reconversion was already in progress in the Army, and permanent force personnel were being substituted wherever possible for those entitled to demobilization which is proceeding according to plan. In any case the infiltration of individual permanent force personnel could not offer a solution to the problem of supplying occupation forces overseas, as it would not appear to be possible to substitute entire units. General Murchie also expressed the view that a delay in formulating the post-war army policy would have a bad effect on the standard of any permanent force. Good officers were being lost to civilian employment since it was not possible now to offer them prospects of employment in the permanent forces after the war.

Mr. Wrong suggested that two conflicting considerations were involved. On the one hand it was agreed that in the absence of plans for post-war permanent forces it was inevitable that good men would be lost to the Services; on the other hand, there were too many unknown factors at present to enable plans, except of a very tentative nature, to be submitted to the Government at the present time. However, it was recognized that it would be necessary to draw up a series of reasonable hypotheses upon which plans for the post-war defence forces of Canada could be based. While some work had been done to prepare a basic Canadian politico-strategic appreciation, it was evident that Canada's position would depend largely on the strategic appreciations accepted by the United Kingdom and United States governments. Although something was known of the post-war planning of the United Kingdom, there was less information available from the United States.

Mr. Heeney mentioned that the Government had under consideration the establishment of a continuing Committee of the Cabinet to consider matters of defence to take over some of the functions of the War Committee. Such a Committee of the Cabinet would no doubt be the most appropriate body to deal with this kind of problem. Should this Cabinet Committee be established an official committee would also have to be set up to act in an advisory capacity. Such a Committee should consist of the Chiefs of Staff and representatives of at least two civilian Departments including External Affairs.

After further discussion it was agreed that Mr. Heeney should submit a note to the Prime Minister† indicating that the question of the post-war defence forces of Canada had been discussed in the Advisory Committee and that it was the view of the Committee that the reports prepared by the three Services on their post-war plans might appropriately, in the first instance, be considered by a Cabinet Committee on Defence.

ARMED FORCES: CONTINUING REQUIREMENTS IN STAGE II; OCCUPATION FORCES; POSTWAR ESTABLISHMENTS; CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE

5. THE SECRETARY, referring to the decision at the meeting of July 26th, submitted reports prepared by the Services setting out, in terms of manpower and money, their respective requirements for the current fiscal year, together with a summary thereof, copies of which were circulated to the Ministers present. The Service reports, which had been circulated prior to the meeting, also made reference to the extent and character of postwar military establishments.

On present plans the strength of the Army on March 31st, 1946, would be 308,500, of whom 39,000 would be outside of Canada in the Pacific force and 97,500 elsewhere abroad (including occupation duty); the strength of the Navy would be 43,900, of whom 13,400 would be in the Pacific; the strength of the Air Force would be 130,160, of whom 15,000 would be in the Pacific force and 13,100 elsewhere abroad.

Total costs of the three Services for the maintenance of these forces including personnel remaining in Canada (Army 172,000; Navy 30,500; Air Force 102,060) during the current fiscal year were estimated at some $2,435,541,241.

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE requested consideration of the policy to govern the length of service of personnel engaged in European occupation duty, and submitted a memorandum, copies of which were circulated.

The period of the Canadian commitment to provide occupational troops had not been fixed although it had been pointed out to the U.K. government that the matter would be subject to review at the end of the current fiscal year.

7. THE CABINET, after considerable discussion, noted the reports submitted by the Minister of National Defence on behalf of the three Services, and agreed:

(a) that a Cabinet Defence Committee be constituted for consideration of Defence questions, the said Committee to report to the full Cabinet upon major matters of policy relating to the maintenance and employment of the three Services, the said Committee to consist of:

The Ministers of National Defence,
The Minister of Veterans Affairs,
The Minister of Finance,
The Minister of Agriculture,
The Minister of Justice,
The Minister of National Health and Welfare,
The Minister of National War Services;

the Chiefs of Staff, the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Secretary to the Cabinet, and such other officers and officials as might from time to time be required, to be in attendance upon the said Committee;

(b) that the said Committee examine and report to the Cabinet upon the programmes of the three Services for the period of continuing hostilities against Japan and, subsequently, upon the extent and nature of postwar military establishments;

(c) that it was desirable to reduce, as rapidly as possible, commitments for occupation duty in Europe and that, in this connection, a draft message to the U.K. government be prepared, for the Prime Minister's approval, stating that the government would wish to begin withdrawing Canadian occupation forces (Army and Air) at the end of the present fiscal year and, in any event, would not wish to have Canadian forces employed in occupation duty for more than one year thereafter; and,

(d) that the Minister of National Defence be authorized to state, as a matter of government policy, that Canadian occupation forces would serve for a limited period only and that personnel thereof would not, in any event, be required to serve on such duty for longer than two years; also that in relation to such personnel no changes were contemplated in present policies in the matter of Income Tax and War Service gratuities.

Memorandum by Second Secretary[13] to Members[14] of Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems

RECONSTITUTION OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE P.H.P.

At the meeting of the Cabinet War Committee of December 16th, 1943,[15] the establishment of the Advisory Committee P.H.P. was approved as shown below:

Composition

The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, (Chairman)
The Chief of the Naval Staff
The Chief of the General Staff
The Chief of the Air Staff
The Secretary to the Cabinet
The Deputy Minister of Finance
The Vice-Chairman of the National Harbours Board Commander MacTavish (Secretary).

Terms of Reference

"To give direction and guidance to a Working Committee, to refer to it matters requiring detailed study, and to submit to the Cabinet War Committee, recommendations on Post Hostilities Problems as occasion may arise."

The main purpose of the Advisory Committee was to provide a body in which the three Services and the civil Departments of Government principally concerned should discuss and make recommendations on problems mainly relating to the defence and security of Canada. Certain other questions requiring joint consideration between the Services and the Department of External Affairs, such as Canadian participation in the control of the defeated countries, were also considered.

The need for such a body still exists although a reorganization is required in order that it should conform with the new arrangements made by the Cabinet for the consideration of defence problems under the special Cabinet Committee on defence questions. Certain questions requiring joint study by inter-Service and civil officials prior to making recommendations to the Cabinet include the following:

the implications of the release of atomic energy;
the post-war defence arrangements in Newfoundland;
Canadian military commitments under the United Nations Organization; functions of the Canadian Military Mission in Germany;
post-war Intelligence activities.

It is recommended that the Advisory Committee be reconstituted on a panel basis as follows and serve as the official Advisory Committee to the Cabinet Committee on defence questions:

Composition

Chairman, the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, or the Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
Clerk of the Privy Council
Chief of the Naval Staff
Chief of the General Staff
Chief of the Air Staff
The President, National Research Council
The Deputy Minister of Reconstruction

In attendance;

Secretary from the Department of External Affairs
Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee.

Dear Mr. Macdonnell:

I wish to refer to your memorandum of August 19th,† enclosing a copy of a letter from the Deputy Minister, Department of National Defence for Air, dated August 9,† asking for clarification regarding the status and functions of the Post Hostilities Advisory Committee and its associated subcommittees.

The general position of the cabinet defence organization and related committees was considered at a meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee on November 12, 1945, at which it was decided that until such time as permanent arrangements were made, problems having both civil and military aspects be referred to the Chiefs of Staff Committee, meetings of which would be attended by the appropriate senior civil officials when questions of this joint character were under consideration.

I would suggest, therefore, that until such time as the Post Hostilities Committees have been formally abolished, they should be deemed to exist, but that any questions which would previously have been referred to such committees should be referred to the Chiefs of Staff Committee.

This arrangement appears to be working smoothly and it is customary for Mr. Robertson or Mr. Wrong and Mr. Heeney to join the Chiefs of Staff at their meetings as required.

Yours sincerely,

J. R. BALDWIN

1. The papers distributed by the United Kingdom officials on the subjects of the talks consist of the agreed statements resulting from the United States-United Kingdom conversations of last October,[2] together with the covering report in each case. The papers on commercial, commodity, cartel and employment policies are the same as those received some time ago in Ottawa.[†] The papers on monetary policy include a "final text" on proposal for an international monetary fund as agreed upon between experts of the United States and United Kingdom Treasuries. This document is a revision of the Washington statement[3] in accordance with agreement reached on outstanding differences by subsequent correspondence. The United Kingdom has dropped the monetized unitas proposal and changed union to fund. The other outstanding points generally have been settled in favour of the United Kingdom. The amount of holdings of gold and gold convertible exchange for purposes of gold subscription is left to agreement between member and fund. The United Kingdom and United States are very near the final stage of agreement on the monetary proposals. Only a few matters of secondary importance remain outstanding about which correspondence is still taking place. A copy of the present document will go forward by bag immediately.†

2. We were surprised to find that the monetary proposals are to be one of the main subjects of the discussion. The discussions are to cover to [sic] whole field of Article 7.[4] The discussions on monetary, commercial and commodity policies will take place in separate Committees on these subjects. There will probably be a further Committee on full employment policy and the United Kingdom have indicated that they would like to have some discussion also of cartels and international investment. The work of the Committees is to be coordinated by a Steering Committee under the Chairmanship of Sir Richard Hopkins and consisting of the Heads of delegations. It is intended that the Committee meetings should not overlap and all of the Canadian group could attend all of the discussions. Under the present plan the talks are to continue for three weeks but it is possible that this may be shortened.

3. The first plenary meeting was held yesterday at which the Heads of delegations were asked to make a statement on the general attitude of their groups towards the proposals. The delegations were anxious to hear a report on the Canadian-United States talks[5] and Mackintosh and McKinnon gave a general summary. In addition they stressed the need for rapid progress on each of the proposals which are interdependent and constitute the desirable framework within which to achieve full employment. Full employment and expansion of trade should be achieved simultaneously and not successively. Melville of the Australian delegation stated that the proposals fall short in that they do not go far enough in the direction of agreed action on domestic measures for expansive domestic policies. In his view domestic expansive measures must take precedence over the reduction of trade barriers and substantial tariff reductions must await completion of the transition period and the achievement of full employment. Liberal trade policies by small countries can only come after there has been a demonstration by the large industrial powers that their employment obligations have been met. He suggested that the first task is to prepare a draft agreement for concerted domestic full employment measures. He challenged the view that the conditions for bold action were more favourable now than later. He gave a prepared statement and it appeared that he was acting under fairly close instructions. Fisher of the New Zealand delegation said nothing of consequence. Van Eck of South Africa said that his group were in agreement with the general lines of the proposals under discussion. The Indian High Commissioner said that India would be prepared to participate in international monetary and commercial policy agreements provided that she can join on a basis of complete equality, and provided that she may have a specified measure of freedom to pursue certain policies which are particularly important to her, e.g. industrialisation.

We have agreed with this procedure.

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Canadian Delegation Economic Policy Talks, Begins:

1. You will have received by Dominions Office telegram[8] and by air bag latest version of United States-United Kingdom statement of principles on International Monetary Fund.† Committee's discussion of document has proceeded to 4 (3). Main discussion centred on sizes of quotas suggested by United States, namely, United States 3 billion: United Kingdom 1,300 million, Canada 300, Australia 150, India 300, New Zealand 54, South Africa 150, Russia 901, China 600, Brazil 100, France 500. United Kingdom is satisfied with 1,300. In response to the Australian objection that its proposed quota was altogether inadequate owing to high variability of exports, Keynes' proposed modification of United States suggestion to the effect that quotas between 200 and 300 be increased to 300 and those below 200 be doubled but not to exceed 300. Thus Australia, South Africa and Canada would have the same quota of 300. Also this operation would increase the total size of the Fund by about one billion. We stated that the direction of the change was desirable but entered a reservation to Keynes formula since a general increase in the quotas of a lot of countries would considerably increase the call on scarce currencies.

2. Australia made strong plea for raising the right of access to the Fund during the period of a year from twenty five per cent of the country quota to at least one third. We stated that we thought twenty five per cent adequate.

3. We have forwarded by air bag copy of extracts of letters from Keynes to White† covering:

(1) Extent of present commitments and future procedure.
(2) Proposals in regard to transitional period.

TELEGRAM 400 [Ottawa, March 3, 1944]

Your No. 498. Secret. Following from Robertson[9] for Canadian Delegation Economic Policy Talks, Begins:

1. We have no particular comments on future procedure suggested by the United Kingdom and United States Treasuries. It would be helpful if you could ascertain United Kingdom ideas regarding time table for drafting committee and conference.

2. The United Kingdom proposals for the transitional period are the inevitable result of the restricted size of the fund. We would have preferred a fund large enough to obviate the necessity of special arrangements for the transitional period and would not have attached too much importance to a country remaining in debt for sizeable amounts over a considerable period of years. The special arrangements for the transitional period carry with them the risk of trade deals of the type which the fund proposals seek to avoid. In view of the apparent impossibility of increasing the size of the fund, however, this risk will have to be accepted. We have considered the possibility of incorporating safeguards which would prevent undue advantage being taken of paragraph 11 of the new statement but have been able to think of none better than those already incorporated there. Everything will depend on how the policies permitted under that paragraph are carried out. Could you ascertain in private conversation with the British how they do in fact expect to operate? There appears to be a hint that they might try to negotiate a separate currency-holding arrangement with the United States.

3. There is one general point regarding the transitional proposals about which we are puzzled. Would the United Kingdom contemplate that the fund should be set up at once and that they should become a member and have access to credit without, however, assuming the obligations of 2(ii), 4(v) and 10(iii)? Have they considered how this would affect the attitude of Congress? The main advantages to the United States are those incorporated in 2(i) and 2(ii) but only the former becomes immediately operative. If they have in mind a direct stabilization credit from the United States or other similar arrangements to deal with the transitional period, many people in the United States will probably take the line that they should proceed with the special arrangements for the transitional period but wait a few years to see whether an international fund is necessary and if so, what type.

The text was prepared by the Foreign Exchange Control Board.

4. We can merely raise these questions without suggesting a solution because with a fund of the size proposed some special arrangements for the transitional period are clearly necessary for the United Kingdom.

5. We have noted with approval the reservation you have entered regarding Keynes' formula for increasing the smaller quotas and we assume that on this point no one will be committed until there are wider discussions among all countries. Ends.

1. Regarding monetary discussions, we shall raise points requested in your telegram No. 400 at the appropriate time and report the answers. No discussion of transitional arrangements has taken place but Keynes indicated that what they had in mind was freedom to act as circumstances might require rather than provision for plans already thought out.

2. Discussion of statement of principles has proceeded to end of section 4 and no significant differences of opinion have arisen. Keynes stressed, and showed obvious satisfaction with the degree of independence of the Fund under paragraph 4(iv). A new text of paragraph 4(viii) as revised by correspondence with Washington has been circulated and is contained in the next following paragraph. United Kingdom is satisfied with the substance but wishes to improve the wording.

"So long as a member's holdings of gold and gold convertible exchange exceed its quota the Fund, in selling foreign exchange to that country, shall require that one half the net sales of such exchange during the Fund's financial year shall be paid for with gold. Furthermore, if at the end of the year a member's holdings of gold and gold convertible exchange have increased, the Fund may require up to half of the increase to be used to repurchase part of the Fund's holdings of its currency, so long as this does not reduce the Fund's holdings of a member's currency below 75% of its quota, or the member's holdings of gold and gold convertible exchange below its quota."

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Canadian Delegation Economic Policy Talks, Begins:

1. In discussion of transition period arrangements with reference to Monetary Fund United Kingdom stated their position as follows. They propose that certain features of plan come into operation upon signature but not earlier than end of Japanese hostilities. Plan would come into immediate effect with respect to partial payment of subscriptions, provisions regarding exchange rates and establishment of organization. Under Clause 11 any member may defer obligations respecting maintenance of multilateral payments and convertibility of its currency. During a period of three years such members are completely free to make whatever arrangements they wish concerning their international payments but they would undertake to "pay continuous regard to the principles and objectives of the Fund." At end of three years members wishing to retain restrictions must consult with Fund but are not required to abolish these except when they are satisfied in their own judgment that their balance of payments position enables them to do so. United Kingdom attach considerable importance to freedom of individual members' judgment in this matter. For transition period arrangements United Kingdom have made clear to United States Treasury that they may wish to use payments agreements and open-end currency holding agreements with provision for periodic consultation respecting disposition of balances. With regard to use of credit facilities of Fund, United Kingdom lay much emphasis upon provision in Clause 11 stating that Fund not intended to provide facilities for relief and reconstruction or settlement of blocked balances. United Kingdom have made it clear to India that latter problems must be settled outside the Fund. United Kingdom envisage three alternative possibilities respecting utilization of quotas during transition period (a) no credit until assumption of multilateral obligations, (b) no credit for any member receiving relief or reconstruction loans, (c) extension of credit under quotas with adequate safeguards against use for relief and reconstruction. They are not prepared to state which alternative they prefer until they have clearer idea of magnitude of reconstruction problem and nature and extent of assistance which United Kingdom and other countries might obtain during transition period. United Kingdom fully aware of implications of this problem with reference to attitude of Congress.

2. Clause by clause discussion of monetary plan has been completed. Australia in commenting upon whole plan expressed fear that its adoption would weaken Sterling Area and stated preference for continuation of sterling currency bloc. Instead of international plan they suggested key currency approach based upon United States-United Kingdom credit arrangement. Keynes and Edie [Eady][10] made a powerful statement in favour of multilateral approach which we strongly supported.

3. In discussion of transitional arrangements regarding provisions of commercial convention, United Kingdom proposed that this period should have two phases, (a) first phase lasting two years during which only minor obligations would be undertaken and signatories would be free to impose quantitative restrictions, (b) second phase when tariff cut goes into effect and signatories begin progressive abolition of quantitative restrictions. Commercial convention proposals contain provision for permanent let-out on use of quantitative restrictions on balance of payments grounds which is not envisaged in monetary plan. It is clearly desirable that the transitional and let-out provisions in the two sets of proposals should be synchronized. We are suggesting that the provisions and commitments in both schemes in this respect should be as definite as they can be made and that the right to use quantitative restrictions or to depart from multilateral practices should be based as far as possible upon objective criteria. We are urging that the full tariff cut should go into effect as soon as possible after the close of Japanese hostilities.

4. The discussions of cartels, Investment Bank and draft Employment Agreement have been completed. In each case United Kingdom have asked us whether we would prefer that they present agreed statements to the United States or present their own views reached after discussion with Commonwealth countries. We told them that the latter course should be followed. The final statement arising out of the discussion of the commercial convention proposals[11] will be in the form of a summary of views expressed rather than an agreed document. It is possible that the discussions as a whole will be completed about the middle of next week.[12] Ends.

There was further Commonwealth discussion of these questions at the Prime Ministers' Meeting in May. See Documents 49-51 and 765.

1. We are not clear whether White intends to extend a formal invitation to Canada to participate in simultaneous publication of Monetary Fund statement. The question as to whether this matter should be cleared with the United Kingdom depends upon whatever understanding exists between White and the British concerning procedure. We feel that it is not up to us to clear with British but a matter between White and the British in accordance with any understanding which they may have. As far as we are concerned we are prepared to proceed on the basis of a direct formal invitation from the U.S. Treasury and to seek approval for Canadian participation from Cabinet War Committee tomorrow. If a formal invitation is received and Cabinet War Committe approves Canadian publication we would, as a matter of courtesy, simply inform the British that we have received the invitation and have agreed to participate. Please ascertain from White whether he intends to extend a formal invitation.

2. We have one drafting point in the Joint Statement of Principles which we would like to have clarified. In IV.5. it is stated that "an agreed uniform change may be made in the gold value of member currencies, provided every member country having 10 per cent or more of the aggregate quotas approve." We would interpret this to mean not simply the approval of every member country having 10 per cent or more of the aggregate quotas but both agreement by the majority of votes and the approval of every member country having 10 per cent or more of the aggregate quotas. This is a matter of considerable importance to us and we would urge that, if at all possible, this clause be rephrased, prior to publication, to state this meaning explicitly so that there can be no misunderstanding.

3. With reference to the proposal to publish simultaneously the plan for a Reconstruction Bank we are puzzled at the implied suggestion that the British are willing to be associated with this plan in the manner suggested. For your private information which is not to be transmitted to White, the British, at the recent London discussions, made it clear that they consider White's plan to be wholly unsatisfactory and that they consider it important that wider international discussions should not proceed on the basis of the plan in its present form.[13] We share the British view and could not give it our blessing through agreeing to participate in joint publication. It would be helpful if you could ascertain from White whether the British have actually agreed to sponsor publication of the plan, and if so, in what manner.

TELETYPE WA-2387 Washington, April 19, 1944

IMMEDIATE. Following for Dr. W. C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance, from Plumptre, Begins:

This will acknowledge your EX-1631 and confirm our telephone conversations this morning regarding it.

2. I have indicated to White that before publishing the statement on an International Monetary Fund, we would like to have a formal invitation and that such an invitation would be welcome from the United States side if he felt free to issue it. He replied that he had a general understanding with the United Kingdom that they would maintain contacts with the Dominions on matters affecting the Fund. He understood from Opie,[14] who had called on him yesterday evening, that the British were in fact communicating with all the Dominions to secure publication of the joint statement at the end of this week as widely as possible. (This fits in with the statement which Opie made to me earlier today). He had told the British, probably on an earlier occasion, that he regarded it as very important that Canada should publish the joint statement.

3. Accordingly, he officially handed me a draft of the joint statement on the Fund. In doing so, he said that if the British were not inviting us to publish, he was doing so. He said that he would tell Opie this when seeing him later today.

4. In regard to the text of the joint statement which he handed to me, there are the following amendments to introduce into the draft which I sent you on April 17.† These are as follows:

(a) The title now reads "Joint Statement by Experts on the Establishment of an International Monetary Fund."

(b) The next to last sentence of the preamble will be reworded to read as follows: "The principles set forth below are designed to constitute the basis for this Fund." You will notice that this sentence differs from the one which Opie gave me which I transmitted to you earlier today in WA-2374† in that it uses the word "constitute" instead of the word "B"[be?].

(c) The draft does not contain the other two changes mentioned by Opie and also transmitted in my WA-2374. In other words, it appears that there will be these two differences in the texts published in Washington and London.

(d) I understand from Opie that the text is going to print in London this afternoon and therefore no further revisions can be made. This applies particularly to the suggestion made in the second paragraph of your EX-1631 to the effect that a sentence in Part IV, Section 5, should be amended. Further, it was Opie's belief that the text, read as a whole, would cover your point because of the express stipulation regarding majority votes. In any case, he gave complete[15] interpretation we desire. (I omitted to check this point with White but will do so at a convenient opportunity).

[14]Redvers Opie, conseiller, Ambassade de Grande-Bretagne aux États-Unis.
Redvers Opie, Counsellor, Embassy of Great Britain in United States.

5. In regard to the time of announcement and publication, my earlier teletype (WA-2374) is misleading. It is the announcement of the plan, and not publication, which is to take place at 5 p.m. in the United States and 11 a.m. in the United Kingdom. As for publication, the plan is to be released in the United States at 8 p.m. on Friday April 21. It is the intention that it shall be carried in the Saturday morning papers.

6. In regard to the proposal for an International Bank, I have the following information:

(a) Opie has transmitted to London White's new document which I transmitted to you on April 17th. As a result of a telephone conversation with London, he expects instructions to reply along the lines indicated in annex E of the official document put out by the United Kingdom covering recent Commonwealth discussions of monetary and commercial policy (United Kingdom Document ASD (44) 16).† He says that the United Kingdom is definitely anxious to go as far as possible along with the United States Treasury in this matter. (He himself would be inclined to accept the new United States document, but does not think London will go this far). Accordingly, there is still a possibility, although rather a remote one, that a compromise document will be produced and published on Friday.

(b) I have told White that we are unlikely to publish and associate ourselves with the document which he handed us in view of the relatively little thought which we have given to the matter and the shortness of the time available for consideration. However, I said that the matter was not yet settled. (Opie has promised to keep me informed of developments on the British side.)

(c) White said that he was uncertain whether or not the United States would proceed to publish his new document unilaterally if no other country would do so.

(d) In any case, White definitely and formally extended an invitation to Canadian official experts to come to Washington about the middle of next week to discuss with the United States Treasury the proposal for an International Bank.[16] Please let me know as soon as possible whether Canadian officials will be coming down and if so who and when.

7. Since dictating the above, I have had a telephone call from White who has now seen Opie again. He has told Opie that he is inviting Canada to publish the plan for a stabilization fund and Opie has since telephoned him to say that a message has been received from London requesting the United States Treasury to provide Canada with the text of the plan and to facilitate its publication. White also made three further points:

(a) The announcement in the United Kingdom on Friday will simply be to the effect that agreement has been reached and a document will be published on Saturday. (By mistake I have implied above that 11 a.m. in London was the same as 5 p.m. on the same day in Washington which is obviously not the case).

(b) The United States Treasury advises us to follow the British in regard to the points mentioned in paragraph 4 (c) above. The United States will follow the British if they don't hear from Moscow in the meanwhile. Some doubt still surrounds Russian publication.

(c) In regard to Paragraph 4 (d) above, the United States understanding is the same as the British but like the British they say that no further textual alterations can be made now.[17] Ends.

DESPATCH 148 Ottawa, May 26, 1944

Sir:

The publication of the joint statement of technical experts recommending the establishment of an international monetary fund and setting forth the principles for such a fund has been deeply gratifying to the United States Government as marking an important step toward postwar international economic cooperation. Undoubtedly the Government and people of Canada have been equally pleased by this evidence of the common desire of the United Nations and the nations associated with them in the war for meeting the economic problems of the postwar world.

The President of the United States of America now proposes, as a further step toward the realization of this objective, to call a conference of the United Nations and the nations associated with them, for the purpose of formulating definite proposals for an international monetary fund and a bank for reconstruction and development. It would be understood of course that the delegates would not be required to hold plenipotentiary powers and that the proposals formulated at the conference would be referred to the respective governments and authorities for their acceptance or rejection.

I have the honor therefore, on behalf of the President, cordially to invite the Canadian Government to send one or more delegates to participate in a formal monetary and financial conference of United Nations and the nations associated with them to be held in the United States beginning July 1, 1944. I am pleased to inform you that the delegation of the United States to the conference will be headed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The names of the other delegates of my Government, as well as information regarding the seat of the conference and arrangements for the meeting will be communicated to you at a later date.

Because of my Government's belief that the formulation of definite proposals for an international monetary fund and a bank for reconstruction and development in the near future is a matter of vital concern to all of the United Nations and the nations associated with them, my Government sincerely hopes to receive the favorable reply of your Government at the earliest possible moment, together with the names of all members of the Canadian delegation.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. My telegram Circular D. 822,† International Monetary Fund.

1. We have heard from our Embassy at Washington that United States Treasury are taking the line that Committee to prepare agenda for Conference should begin work June 15th, notwithstanding that our experts and those of European Allies and China cannot reach Bretton Woods before June 15th, with whatever representatives of countries chosen are then available and should make whatever progress may be possible, even if it would be necessary to reopen every issue and begin afresh when United Kingdom and other experts from London arrive. In this connection they have suggested:

(1) That United Kingdom Treasury representatives in Washington might attend Committee on our behalf pending arrival of United Kingdom delegation.

(2) That United Kingdom and Allied experts travelling from London might do corresponding preparatory work en route, with result that there would, in effect, be two drafting bodies which could be merged into one on arrival of our experts at Bretton Woods.

2. We are greatly disturbed at this suggested program which seems to us to be most ill-considered and to open up alarming possibilities of confusion and friction. Causes for delay over arrival of our experts at Bretton Woods are imposed on us by highest military authority, and this applies to the European delegations who include men of exceptional practical experience which will be invaluable to work of Committee. Leader of Chinese delegation will similarly be travelling from London. It seems to us idle to pretend that a Drafting Committee, whose work is to command any respect at the Conference, can meet without representatives from the countries which, next to the United States, have most at stake in these two international financial projects. Moreover, it will clearly put these delegations in a very difficult position if, on arrival at Bretton Woods, they have either to ask Drafting Committee to begin again or to be content to go on from point which the Committee may then have reached. Telescoping of work in this way, with less than a week before opening of Conference, would be very unsatisfactory and delegations so treated would be bound to feel slighted at this apparent indifference to this value, a position which would not make things any easier at the full Conference. Suggestion that appropriate representatives in Washington might attend Committee pending arrival of experts from London would be impracticable for us since they could not be adequately briefed in time, and still more so for Allied Governments in view of present restrictions on cypher communications.

3. Urgent telegram is accordingly being sent to His Majesty's Ambassador expressing our concern at the procedure proposed by the United States Treasury, pointing out above consideration and asking him to take up the matter personally with Mr. Morgenthau. We feel strongly that only sensible solution is that Drafting Committee should not begin work until experts travelling from London have arrived at Bretton Woods, and further that in order to allow reasonable time for work of Committee, meeting of full Conference should be postponed until say July 7th. Lord Halifax is being asked to urge this on the United States authorities, at the same time assuring them that on their arrival our delegation will do all they can to assist in bringing the business forward as rapidly as possible.

4. If, as we hope, your Government will agree with our view, we should greatly welcome their support in the representations which Lord Halifax has been asked to make. It would be much appreciated if, for this purpose, your Ambassador in Washington could be asked to concert action with Lord Halifax, and in particular to support him in deprecating proposal to call the Drafting Committee together in the absence of experts from the United Kingdom, the European countries and China.

5. A telegram in similar terms is being sent to the Australian Government.

No. 53 Ottawa, June 5, 1944

Excellency,—

I have the honour to refer to your note No. 148 of May 26th in which you transmit on behalf of the President of the United States an invitation to the Government of Canada to send one or more delegates to participate in a formal monetary and financial conference of United Nations and the nations associated with them to be held in the United States beginning July 1, 1944. I shall be glad if you will be good enough to inform your Government that the Government of Canada will be pleased to send delegates to participate in this conference. It is noted that the delegates would not be required to hold plenipotentiary powers and that the proposals formulated at the conference would be referred to the respective governments and authorities for their acceptance or rejection.

It is hoped that the Canadian delegation will be headed by the Honourable J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance. However, it may not be possible for Mr. Ilsley to be present throughout the period of the conference owing to the pressure of work in Parliament which is now in session. I shall advise you of the names of the remainder of the Canadian delegation in the very near future.

Accept etc.

Canadian Government have accepted invitation to participate in Bretton Woods conference and have advised United States Government that it is hoped that Canadian delegation will be headed by the Minister of Finance who, it is expected, would be present at the conference for at least a part of the time. Remainder of the Canadian delegation will be determined in the next few days.

For reasons given in the Telegram under reference we agree that it would be advisable to postpone the drafting committee until the United Kingdom and other European experts have arrived. In the absence of the Ambassador, the Minister-Counsellor of the Canadian Embassy in Washington has been asked to get in touch with Lord Halifax and to concert with him in the endeavour to secure postponement.

CONFIDENTIAL. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Reference your EX-2355, June 5th,† International Monetary Fund Conference:

Yesterday afternoon Lord Halifax, accompanied by Mr. R. H. Brand (who will be one of the United Kingdom delegates to the Conference) discussed with Mr. Morgenthau and Mr. Harry White questions raised in D.O. telegram No. 84.[18] Mr. Brand called upon me this noon and said that newly proposed arrangements by Treasury Department are that United Kingdom Treasury representatives in Washington would meet with United States Treasury representatives at Atlantic City on June 19th for preliminary discussions on agenda.

Treasury Department intend to invite to the Atlantic City meeting experts from Canada, Russia, China, Brazil, Mexico, Czechoslovakia, possibly Cuba, and the Philippines. Groups participating Atlantic City meeting would be known as Agenda Committee and not Drafting Committee as previously suggested. Treasury Department consider that such preliminary discussions would be helpful pending arrival of United Kingdom and Allied experts from London about June 24th.

Following arrival of these experts, Agenda Committee would continue discussions in Atlantic City, until formal opening of Conference at Bretton Woods — July 1st. Mr. Brand understands that Treasury Department in addition to sending out invitations for meeting, June 19th, to above mentioned countries including Canada, will also issue a brief press statement explaining that the discussions at Atlantic City will be similar to those that have taken place between United Kingdom and Allied experts in London.

Lord Halifax is reporting latest developments to London. Meantime, support suggested in D.O. telegram No. 84 unnecessary at this stage.

Mr. Angus was with me when Mr. Brand called this morning and will be able to inform you of certain other details mentioned by Mr. Brand.

TELETYPE WA-3842 Washington, June 26, 1944

Following for Robertson from the Canadian Delegation at Atlantic City, Begins:

With the arrrival tonight (June 23rd) of the United Kingdom delegates and others from overseas, the Conference at Atlantic City takes on a new and more formal character. It is therefore appropriate to report on developments so far.

2. Representatives of the following countries have been present: U.S.A., U.S.S.R., China, France, Netherlands, Czechoslovakia, Brazil, Cuba, Mexico, Canada and Australia. Mr. Opie of the U.K., appointed as an observer, has acted as Chairman of a committee but has not taken a leading part at plenary meetings. Sir Theodore Gregory, representing India, arrived yesterday.

3. So far the Conference has devoted itself exclusively to the Fund; there has been no consideration either of the Bank or of an agenda for Bretton Woods. The Conference has had plenary sessions each afternoon at which reports have been heard from the four Committees. These have been as follows;

I. Purposes, policies and subscriptions, (Chairman, China; Reporter, Brazil; attended by Plumptre);

II. Operations of the fund, (Chairman, France; Reporter, Rasminsky);

III. Organization and establishment, (Chairman, U.S.S.R.; Reporter, Mexico);

IV. Establishment of the Fund — including the transitional period, (Chairman, U.K.; Reporter, Czechoslovakia; attended by Deutsch, who twice took the chair in Opie's absence.)

4. Most of the discussions in the Committees have centred on typewritten documents produced by the U.S. Secretariat. Some of these documents have merely paraphrased sections of the Joint Statement of April 21st, 1944; others have involved amendments of that Statement; others have paraphrased sections of earlier plans put forward by U.S.A.; and still others have put forward entirely new material. We anticipate that the British may feel put out by this procedure, particularly by the circulation in their absence of new material and amendments of the Joint Statement. (See paragraph 6 below).

5. However, the Conference has run smoothly so far. No crises have developed. There has been a satisfactory interchange and clarification of ideas. It may be worth mentioning that the delegates of the U.S.S.R. seem anxious to obtain the maximum concessions and special advantages based, sometimes irrelevantly, on the wartime damage to their country. The Chinese, however, have adopted a broader attitude and have on more than one occasion dissented from Russian proposals.

6. Amongst the points of special interest that have come under discussions are the following:

(a) The State Department has finally realized the full implications of the scarce currency provision, Article VI of the Joint Statement, which provides that in "rationing the limited supply amongst its nationals, the member country shall have complete jurisdiction." State Department is very apprehensive as to the possible consequences of this "complete jurisdiction" upon their policy regarding most favoured nation treatment and the treaties containing this clause to which they have attached such great importance. Consequently the U.S. group has proposed the addition of a new paragraph 4 to Article IX as follows: "Not to prejudice through the use of exchange restrictions which are authorized under the Agreement or requested by the Fund, any existing or future international commitments regarding the non-discriminatory application of exchange restrictions or undertakings for the progressive relaxation of barriers to trade." In any case there is the legal question whether the provisions of the Joint Statement would, if adopted, in fact supersede prior commitments entered into in commercial agreements. The above U.S. proposal was made for greater certainty even though this question has not been answered.

(b) With respect to the transitional period the U.S. group now propose (as a partial amendment of X, 3) that "not later than three years after the date on which the operations of the Fund commence any member country still retaining restrictions, arrangements or practices inconsistent with Article III, Section 5, or Article IX, Section 3, shall consult with the Fund as to their further retention and shall retain them only with the approval of the Fund." Thus countries taking advantage of the transitional period arrangements would lose the right of independent decision at the end of three years, which is an important change from the provisions of the Joint Statement. Ends.

RECORD OF INSTRUCTIONS

SECRET

Record of Instructions given to Canadian Delegation, Bretton Woods, July 1, 1944

Present:

Mr. Ilsley
Mr. Abbott
Mr. Blanchette
Mr. Clark
Mr. Towers
Mr. Mackintosh
Mr. Deutsch
Mr. Plumptre
Mr. Rasminsky

1. Acting Head of Delegation. Mr. Ilsley informed the meeting that in his absence Mr. Mackintosh was to act as head of the Canadian Delegation.

2. Quotas.

(a) The Canadian Delegation is to oppose any flagrant manipulation of quotas for political reasons, such as the increase which the United States is proposing in the Chinese quota from approximately $300,000,000 as determined by their formula, to $600,000,000.

(b) The Canadian Delegation is not to support any upward adjustment of quotas on the basis of special pleading, such as that of Australia, who is insisting on a substantial upward revision of their quota of $150,000,000. If it becomes necessary to take a position against Australian representations in this direction, it is to be based on the following grounds:

(i) The Australian difficulties arise primarily out of the fact that their present sterling balances are not freely available to meet current deficits which they may face in their balance of payments after the war and not even necessarily to meet such portion of those deficits which may arise in their dealings with the sterling area; the Fund, however, is explicitly not intended to meet the problem of blocked balances.

(ii) The current account of deficits which Australia anticipates will arise, if at all, largely out of unusually heavy imports for reconstruction purposes; and here again, the Fund is not designed to provide facilities for such purposes.

(c) In general, the Canadian Delegation is to use its influence to prevent an undignified scramble for quotas from occuring at formal meetings of the Conference.

(d) The proposed Canadian quota of $300,000,000 is to be regarded as generally satisfactory for Canada. If, however, the total size of the Fund is increased, a new situation will have been created, and this decision is to be reviewed.

(e) The relative sizes of the Chinese and Indian quotas are to be regarded by the Canadian Delegation as primarily the concern of those two countries, on the one hand, and the United States and United Kingdom, on the other, and the Canadian Delegation is not to attempt to exercise any influence in this matter. If, however, a decision satisfactory to the countries mentioned is reached which involves a scaling down of the Chinese quota and a scaling up of the Indian quota, the Canadian group is not to oppose, even though this results in India having a quota larger than that of Canada.

(f) The Canadian Delegation is to give its support to a proposal to give the United States its natural voting power based on its quota, notwithstanding their previous commitment to the United Kingdom regarding the limitation of their voting strength to 25 percent of the total. We do not recognize the contention that the voting strength of the British Commonwealth can properly be regarded as a unit which must not exceed that of the United States; the above decision, however, will render unnecessary any such comparison of voting strengths.

3. Exchange Rates.

Consideration was given to the suggested redraft of Article IV of the joint statement regarding exchange rates by the U.K. Delegation, dated June 28, 1944, and the following instructions were given:

(a) Mr. Towers is to see Mr. White informally and try to ascertain what the American reaction to the U.K. suggestions is. If it appears favourable, he is to express to White our preference for a form of words closer to the original and which contains a definite undertaking on the part of member countries not to vary their exchange rates without the approval of the Fund except under defined conditions.

(b) If the British draft, notwithstanding the above representations, remains acceptable to the United States, we are to suggest a revision in paragraph 3 of that draft to make suspension from the privileges of the Fund automatic if a country changes its exchange rate in spite of the opposition of the Fund. The Fund should, of course, retain the right to expel a member which persists in maintaining an exchange rate of which the Fund disapproves. This change will remove from the Fund the onus of positive action with respect to suspension of privileges which it might find embarrassing, and will put countries which act against the Fund's wishes in a position where undesirable consequences flow automatically from such action.

(c) The Canadian Delegation is to attempt to reconcile differences of view between the British and the American Delegations regarding the incorporation of a clause in the document under which countries commit themselves not to change their exchange rates beyond specified amounts without the prior approval of the Fund, but if there is open disagreement between these two Delegations, the Canadian Delegation is to support the incorporation of such a clause.

4. Management.

(a) The Canadian Delegation is to oppose strongly the American principle under which the members of the Executive Committee are regarded as "Ambassador"- Delegates of the countries responsible for their election.

(b) As regards the number of countries having permanent seats on the Executive Committee, the Canadian Delegation is to oppose a system under which more than three countries have permanent seats unless this system provides enough permanent seats to include Canada.

(c) If there are more than three permanent seats, the Canadian group is to press for a permanent seat for Canada, basing its representations largely on our anticipated creditor position.

(d) The Canadian group is to oppose the American suggestion that members of the Executive Committee should be continuously available at the headquarters of the Fund.

5. No Instructions.

The following matters were raised at the meeting, but no instructions were given:

(a) Location of head office of the Fund.

(b) British proposal to lengthen "target" of the transitional period from three to five years.

(c) Relationship between scarce currency provisions of the plan and prior commitments regarding non-discrimination in commercial treaties.

(d) Proposals for an increase in the aggregate size of the Fund.

(e) United Nations Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

1. Questions from Canadian Delegation.

Mr. L. Rasminsky called me from the Bretton Woods Conference at 6 p.m. yesterday to ask for instructions to the Canadian Delegation, on the three following points:

(1) The Exchange Rate Formula.

The British Delegation had stiffened up a little bit the formula which they had prepared on the boat coming over to Atlantic City and which was, in effect, a blank cheque for a country to change its exchange rate without the approval of the Fund. Under the new revision, the onus of suspending a member country which had depreciated without approval of the Fund or of withdrawing from it the credit facilities of the Fund, would be on the Fund rather than on the defaulting member country. In other words, no automatic suspension was provided for.

Keynes told Rasminsky that he had received a cable from the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressing the desire to have a definite statement in the Agreement reached at Bretton Woods that a member country could change its exchange rate without the consent of the Fund. Keynes himself seemed to feel that the Canadian point of view was right and had done his best to change the view of his Government, but he said that it represented a political situation which would have to be accepted.

Bernstein had told Rasminsky that the United States was prepared to accept.

(2) Executive Committee and Management of the Fund.

Everybody at the Conference continued to gripe at the abnormally high quota which the United States were proposing for China, and U.S.S.R. was now asking for a quota as large as that of U.K., which would mean $1 billion 300 million rather that $800 million.

All proposals that had so far been put forward, suggested only five permanent members on the Executive Committee and there was such a unanimity of opinion on this point that Rasminsky felt it would be difficult for us to insist on only three permanent members and impossible to insist on seven permanent members. Apparently the U.K. has agreed with the complicated formula for election of the remaining members suggested by U.S. with the one amendment, namely, that each elected member would only cast the vote of his own country rather than the votes of all the countries which had elected him.

Mr. Rasminsky had a brain wave and was prepared to suggest that after the Fund had got started, the permanent members of the Executive Committee should at all times include delegates from the two countries which are in the largest creditor position vis-à-vis the Fund. In other words, you would start with five permanent members, being representatives of the five countries with the largest quotas. However, at the second election and later, if it were found that the above five did not include the two largest creditor countries, then any such creditor country not so included would automatically be elected until the next election.

Mr. Luxberg, Solicitor of the United States Delegation, had at first been cool to the proposal but later seemed to be converted. Prior to Mr. Rasminsky's call to me, Luxberg told him that he had mentioned it to Harry White who was enthusiastic about it.

The British were proposing a change in section I(3) of the Agreed Statement of Principles which would limit what we believed was the over-riding obligation of a member country to maintain convertibility of its currency, not an obligation conditional on the country having an unutilized quota in the Fund (in accordance with the technique suggested in section III(5)). The British proposed to insert a phrase in section IX(3) reading "save as otherwise provided," which was obviously a reference back to the qualification indicated in III(5). The effect is that the obligation to maintain convertibility would only apply as long as a country could buy foreign exchange from the Fund.

Keynes had practically refused to discuss the British proposal with Rasminsky. Without it, he said, the Fund would practically be a gold standard and U.K. would have to remain out. Rasminsky was therefore unable to point out to him that an undisciplined country could run through its quota and then say it was not bound to keep its currency convertible, even though it remained a member of the Fund.

Mr. Rasminsky therefore proposed that a phrase be inserted in section III(5) after the word "currency" in the third line, reading somewhat as follows: "or so long as it has independent monetary reserves in excess of its quota."

As the Canadian delegates at Bretton Woods desired instructions on the above points, I called into conference Messrs. G. F. Towers, Norman Robertson and R. B. Bryce and I later discussed the points with Mr. Ilsley.

In regard to #1, it was agreed to tell Mr. Rasminsky that if only one or two countries disagreed, Canada should probably not engage in a "knockout, drag-out fight" on the point but should limit itself to "viewing with alarm." Mr. Ilsley nevertheless felt that it might mean that Canada would have to remain out of the Fund and we all agreed that there would be very little, if any, chance of the United States accepting the Fund if the British view in regard to exchange rates prevailed. The Conference might merely prove to be an academic exercise. We also thought it advisable to have our delegates try to get the British delegates to impress their Government with the virtue of taking a reasonable gamble because of the facts already mentioned.

In regard to #2, we felt that Mr. Rasminsky's formula was okay and should be stressed more under the circumstances. We also felt the Canadian delegates should fight against any "cooking" of the quotas.

In regard to #3, we agreed with the amendment proposed by Mr. Rasminsky to section III(5).

I called Mr. Rasminsky this morning and gave him these views over the telephone.

3. Further Questions.

Mr. Rasminsky raised two more points:

(1) The present draft agreement requires a majority of quota votes for an all-round change in the value of gold. Mexico is suggesting that such a change be effected by a majority of countries rather than by quota votes or a majority of countries having 10% or more of the quota. South Africa was proposing that the decision be by a majority of quota votes of those countries having 10% of the quotas and including at least one-third of the member countries.

I agreed with Mr. Rasminsky that the Canadian Delegation should continue to press for the formula as it is in the present draft.

Mr. Rasminsky indicated also that an embarrassment had arisen yesterday because of an amendment advanced by Mexico which would have the effect of allowing silver holding countries to get an additional quota equal to 80% of their present quotas by pledging silver. In the discussion yesterday only Dennis Robertson of the British Delegation had opposed this proposal, and other countries seemed unwilling to "stick their necks out."

I agreed with Mr. Rasminsky that he should oppose this proposal, but using as much discretion as possible.

Memorandum by Deputy Minister of Finance

[Ottawa,] July 10, 1944

BRETTON WOODS CONFERENCE

Re: Telephone Conversation with Dr. Mackintosh.

Dr. Mackintosh called me today to report on four points.

1. Executive Committee.

He said it was now very likely that five permanent directors would be named — U.K., U.S., Russia, China and France. We had made our own position clear but it was impossible either to limit permanent directors to three or to increase them to six (with the inclusion of Canada). We had also pressed our supplementary suggestion (providing for representatives on the permanent directorate of at least two creditor countries) but we were doing it on grounds of principle rather than as a means of "fobbing off" Canada. The United States technicians were enthusiastic about it and were pressing it strongly. At my suggestion, Mackintosh agreed to keep our own pressure up.

2. Exchange Rate Formula.

The Conference or one of its sub-committees appears to have adopted the British suggestion, but this has been greatly strengthened and seems now to be reasonably acceptable from our point of view. Under the present draft, if a country depreciates against the wishes of the Fund it is suspended from the use of the Fund's facilities unless the Fund actively intervenes, and will be thrown out by the end of the year unless the country reaches a satisfactory agreement with the Fund.

The United States Congressmen on the U.S. delegation thought this revised formula was better from the point of view of the U.S. Congress, and this attitude swung the U.S. delegation over.

3. Convertibility.

Discussion of this problem is not yet completed but the British will apparently accept both tests of convertibility; (in other words, they will accept the addition to Section III(5) of the test which we suggested the other day, namely, "or so long as it has independent monetary reserves in excess of its quota.") It is not yet clear that the U.S. will not wish to be stiffer than this but we will play along behind the U.S., that is to say, we will accept the British suggestion if the United States is willing to, but if the United States is unwilling to we will support their stand.

4. Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Dr. Mackintosh asked us for some instructions as to what the Canadian subscription ought to be. Keynes had raised the question with our delegates, pointed out that the Bank was a more flexible instrument than the Fund and that anything from $300 to $500 million might be desirable. Non-committally, our men said that in a $10 billion institution our share might be of the order of $325 million. Mackintosh says there is no doubt that the British and United States will wish to give us a prominent place in the Bank including a permanent seat.

We are going to have some fun with other delegates by pointing out that we do not know why subscriptions to the Bank should be any different from the quotas given to various countries in the Monetary Fund.

The United States apparently expects to put up $3,500 million, but nothing is known as yet about the probable subscriptions of other countries.

I promised to let Mackintosh know our views in the next day or two.

N.B. (1) The U.S.S.R. is still pressing for a quota in the Fund approximately the same size as that of U.K. (perhaps $1100 or $1200 million) and are likely to get it. This will mean an addition to the size of the Fund, bringing it up to perhaps $8400 million. Mackintosh thought there had been a modest reduction in the Chinese quota, and India and Australia were still trying to get their quotas lifted somewhat.

(2) He also said that the silver agitation would not get anywhere. Mexico had created some embarrassment but was not getting any real support and their proposals were likely to fall through.

Dear Dr. Clark,

The American Ambassador told me today that he had had a word this morning with Dean Acheson about the position of the Bretton Woods proposals in Congress. Prospects in the Senate were favourable, but the division in the House of Representatives would probably be very close, and it might be necessary to concede some token amendment to conciliate the opposition. Any amendment the Administration accepted would be innocuous and they hoped easily acceptable to other Governments.

I showed Atherton the draft reference to Bretton Woods which the Prime Minister proposed to use in his speech tonight.[20] He thought such a statement would have a very helpful effect in Washington where Acheson had said that any indication that "the other creditor country" was disposed to go ahead with the Bretton Woods proposals would have some influence on the faint-hearted Congress.

Yours sincerely,

Press Statement by Minister of Finance

Ottawa, July 26, 1945

PRESS STATEMENT BY HON. J. L. ILSLEY

The intention of the Canadian Government to introduce legislation at the next session of Parliament to provide for Canadian participation in the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development was announced by the Hon. J. L. Ilsley in a press statement this morning.

In speaking to the Press, the Minister of Finance said, in part, "You will recall that the Bretton Woods Agreements reached a year ago on July 22nd, were the result of a series of discussions among treasury and central bank officials of a large number of countries, beginning as early as 1942. Separate plans were originally put forward by United Kingdom and United States officials in the spring of 1943. These plans were circulated to other governments and were made public so that they might be subjected to the scrutiny of public opinion as well as to the analysis of experts. Canadian officials took an active part in these discussions as well as in those of the Bretton Woods Conference and I think I am right in saying that the general opinion abroad as well as at home is that the part they played was a helpful and constructive one.

The Bretton Woods Conference was a conference of Government representatives but no government was in any sense committed by the Agreements reached there. It remained open to each government to decide whether or not it wished to ask its legislative body to approve participation in the proposed institutions.

The United States Congress has approved by large majorities the participation of that country in these two institutions. The Unted States is thus the first of the forty-four countries represented at the Conference to decide through its legislative processes on participation. The Canadian Government warmly welcomes the decision of the United States and finds in it an encouraging indication of determination to provide leadership in seeking the 'bold and imaginative' solutions of world economic problems which the Prime Minister and the late President Roosevelt agreed were necessary, when they last met.

For our own part, the Canadian Government intends to introduce legislation at the next session of Parliament to provide for Canadian participation in the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. I do not propose to say anything about the rather complex details of these institutions but they appear to me to represent an attempt to avoid some of the errors and evils of the past and to deal with international financial and monetary matters through co-operative action amongst nations.

The International Monetary Fund provides a system of exchange relationships among nations which avoids both the excessive rigidity of the automatic gold standard and the excessive flexibility of completely unregulated exchange rates. Under the Agreement, competitive currency depreciation will be debarred and so, also, will multiple currency practices involving a variety of exchange rates as used by Germany before the war. Each country joining the Fund will fix the par value of its own currency and will undertake not to change this except to correct a fundamental disequilibrium. A leeway of ten percent is allowed for subsequent changes which may be made by the independent action of each country, but for changes beyond this members agree to consult first with the Fund. For its part, the Fund must approve changes if they are necessary to correct a fundamental disequilibrium. Hence, no country need fear that it is putting on a strait-jacket by agreeing to these provisions.

When the Plan is fully in operation, one currency should be freely convertible into any other currency, so that a country can export with the assurance that it can use the proceeds of its exports to any part of the world to pay for its imports from any other part of the world and that it does not have to balance its accounts with each of its trade partners individually. To enable countries to do this, a pool of credit totalling $9 billion is established to which each country contributes and from which each country is entitled to draw according to a set of quotas reflecting roughly the economic capacity of each country. The quota for Canada is $300 million in terms of United States funds. Of this, we shall put up $75 million in gold and the balance in Canadian funds which the Fund will have available for sale to other countries for the purpose of making payments for goods and services purchased in Canada. If from time to time our own current payments abroad are in excess of our receipts, we shall have the right to buy foreign exchange from the Fund to the extent of 125 percent of our quota or the equivalent of $375 million United States funds.

Whereas the International Monetary Fund provides for financing temporary deficits in the balance of payments of member countries, the other proposed institution, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, is intended to help provide long term capital requirements. It is to do this partly by making direct loans itself to aid in reconstruction and development but mainly by guaranteeing loans issued through the private investment market. The Canadian participation in the capital of the Bank is equivalent to $375 million (U.S.). Of this only twenty percent is to be paid in at once, two percent in gold and eighteen percent in Canadian dollars. The balance will be subject to uniform call on all members if it is necessary to make good on guarantees given by the Bank.

The Canadian Government believes that these two institutions, if established, can play a very important part in facilitating the economic reconstruction of the world. They can minimize economic friction among nations and can help to provide the monetary conditions necessary to attaining a high level of world trade on a non-discriminatory basis. They can be of particular benefit in the immediate future to the countries materially and economically devastated as a result of the war. Canadian participation in the Fund and in the Bank is one way in which we can help toward the rehabilitation of these countries and the re-establishment of their economies.

But our interest in seeing these institutions set up is not solely altruistic. We think that this country has a great deal to gain from their establishment. Foreign trade is very important to us and foreign trade cannot possibly flourish under conditions of chaotic changes in exchange rates, competitive exchange depreciation, blocked currencies and so on. A reasonable degree of exchange rate stability is necessary if trade is to be carried out without excessive risks. Moreover, as we all know, we have normally sold more to the United Kingdom than we buy there, while we buy more from the United States than we sell to them. When the Fund is fully functioning, it should be of assistance in enabling us to use our surplus with the United Kingdom to cover our deficiency with the United States. To attempt to balance our accounts bilaterally with both the United Kingdom and the United States would only result in great economic disorganization and a lower standard of living in this country.

We have another important interest in these institutions. Canada is one of the few countries which is likely to be in a position to lend abroad during the next few years. At times we will wish to do so in order to maintain employment in our own export industries. It is of interest to us that loans made or guaranteed by these institutions will help to maintain our export trade. This may well turn out to be a useful supplement to our direct loans under the Export Credits Insurance Act.

I have referred to the advantages of the Bretton Woods institutions but it is important also to recognize their limitations. They provide a framework which will help greatly in the development of favourable economic relations among nations, but they do not guarantee that nations will in fact adopt commercial policies of an expansive rather than a restrictive sort. Quite independent action will be needed in this field. Neither do the Bretton Woods Agreements solve the problems of countries whose international financial position has been greatly worsened as a result of the war. The Agreements recognize that some countries may not be in a position to assume immediately all the obligations of membership in the Fund.

Specifically what this delay means for us is that the International Monetary Fund will not immediately have the effect of making our surplus sterling convertible into United States funds. This, in turn, means that we must look forward to a continuance of exchange control in Canada. We have to anticipate deficits in our current account transactions with the United States and if we are to be able to meet these deficits we must be in a position to prevent any unnecessary export of capital. I would hope and expect, however, that the exchange control could remain as it is now, confined to controlling capital movements, and that there need be no restrictions on ordinary current account transactions.

The institutions for which the Bretton Woods Agreements provide are immensely important in the rebuilding of international economic relations. It is in this belief that the Canadian Government proposes to recommend Canadian participation in them. The Government is, however, keenly aware that if the Bretton Woods Plans are to achieve the full measure of their purpose, they will have to be followed by other agreements in the field of international economic policy and particularly by action designed to reduce trade restrictions and to deal constructively with the immediate financial problems of the countries whose position has been most seriously undermined by the war."

Mémorandum de l'adjoint spécial en temps de guerre du sous-ministre des Finances au ministre des Finances

Special Wartime Assistant to Deputy Minister of Finance to Minister of Finance

RE: BRETTON WOODS LEGISLATION.

In the White Paper on Employment and Income the Government endorsed these plans and expressed the hope that Parliament will in due course approve the draft Agreements. In the Speech from the Throne[21] the legislation was mentioned as being in the program for this session.

In the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund it is provided that on signifying its willingness to join the Fund, a country shall pay into the United States 1/100 of 1% of its quota. In Article XX, section 2, paragraph (e), it is provided that the Articles of Agreement shall be open for signature until December 31, 1945. It is further provided that the Articles of Agreement shall come into force when countries holding 65% of the total quotas have signified their intention of joining. In paragraph (d) of the same section it is provided that if the Fund has not come into force on December 31, 1945, the initial contributions above referred to shall be returned to the countries which paid them.

The Articles of Agreement of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development are identical on these points.

It is clear that unless the adherence of countries holding 65% of the quotas is obtained by the end of December, the Articles of Agreement will lapse. There is no provision in them for any extension. I would think that it would not be impossible to obtain some agreement to extension but it would be decidedly awkward and risky. The United States are inclined to be very critical of the United Kingdom for holding up their approval of Bretton Woods and it has been reported to us that Vinson[22] has said that if the Agreement lapses on December 31st, it is dead as far as he is concerned as he will not go back to Congress to get a new approval.[23]

The British appear to be bothered considerably by the approach to the problem of preferences and multilateral tariff reduction which developed out of the Canadian-United States talks.[26] Their immediate reaction was that the United Kingdom approach had been turned around. They state that their objective was to achieve a drastic scaling down of the very high rates by means of a ceiling, say 25%; only a relatively small reduction, much less than 50%, in the moderate rates and no reduction of the low rates, i.e. rates below a floor of say 10%. They seem to feel that the emphasis has been reversed by the discussion of a general 50% cut which would not bring down the very high rates sufficiently while effecting a very substantial cut in the moderate rates. With regard to preferences, they do not rule out the possibility of increases in British preferential rates to reduce or eliminate margins. We have explained our position fully and have emphasized that in our discussions with United States officials we made it clear that we also preferred a ceiling, but that even with a ceiling, substantial general cut in rates should be achieved. The British appear to be delaying discussion apparently in order to give them time to consider the implications of the Canadian approach.

The discussions of this matter will be resumed not earlier than Tuesday. If you have any comments we should be glad to receive them. Ends.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for McKinnon from Robertson, Begins: Following comments on United Kingdom approach outlined in your telegram No. -13 may be of some assistance:

(1) A multilateral commercial convention open to general accession with a minimum of reservations should be as simple and uncomplicated as possible. This seems to me a powerful political argument in favour of the simplest formula that can be made to appear reasonably equitable, i.e. a fifty percent reduction in all rates qualified if feasible by agreed ceiling and floor.

(2) Suggestion that multilateral tariff reductions should be brought about by differing percentage cuts in various classes of rates would appear to involve all the technical problems encountered in examination of ceiling proposals including difficulty of comparing specific and ad valorem rates of duty and F.O.B. and C.I.F. methods of valuation, plus new complications akin to the "notch problem" in income taxation arising out of the transition from one class of rates which would be subject to given percentage reduction to the next lower class where a lower coefficient of reduction would apply.

(3) "Drastic and comprehensive" tariff reductions should be of an order that would make reasonable the United States-United Kingdom objective of the total abolition of quantitative import restrictions and substantial elimination of preferences. I do not think a general reduction of less than fifty percent would meet these tests.

(4) So far as possible the "elimination" of preferences should be a consequence of overall tariff reductions, thus lessening the scope and plausibility of United States requests for special capitulatory concessions in respect of Imperial Preferences. Obviously the further you go in reducing tariffs generally, the problem of the residual preferences diminishes in difficulty and vice versa.

(5) There is a good deal of validity in United States contention that a fifty percent cut in a forty percent tariff rate is likely to be of more serious economic consequence than a fifty percent cut in a twenty percent rate. For this reason I am not greatly worried by optical inequality of sacrifice which would result from application of a single formula of reduction to high and low tariff countries. Ends.

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Canadian Delegation, Economic Policy Talks, Begins:

1. Commercial policy discussions yesterday and today were devoted largely to technical aspects of applying any formula to specific duties, the incidence of which was changed since pre-war owing to price level and exchange rate changes. One United Kingdom suggestion is that the reduction of specific duties should be adjusted to compensate for changes in exchange rates and price levels. Rates on the United States dollar and the United States price level would be taken as basis for the adjustment. To help meet problem of specific rates generally, the United Kingdom has suggested that provision be made for deferred enforcement of ceiling with earlier operation of overall reduction, thus providing time for the collection of relevant statistical data for the calculation of ad valorem equivalents of specifics for the purposes of the ceiling. We urged that ceiling be expressed as an ad valorem rate on specified basis of valuation more than which no importer would be required to pay. While recognizing in theory the validity of contention regarding reduced incidence of specifics under today's values, we urged that the complications and anomalies resulting from crude adjustments for price level and exchange rate changes should not be introduced except for countries in special circumstances which would be dealt with separately.

2. As soon as discussions left technical issues for concrete matter of precise formula, Australian delegation in general statement of their position questioned seriously the practicability of the multilateral approach to tariff reduction. Their statement explained in detail difficulty of undertaking to reduce rates, the inequities involved in a general reduction, serious technical difficulties, etc. They suggested instead that multilateral approach might be confined to a tariff truce with an aspirational statement to reduce duties in the future. India came out in favour of something along the lines of Formula D which will give them freedom as to which items the reductions will be applied. It is not clear how seriously this is to be taken. They are probably only concerned about relatively few rates of an infant industry character. The United Kingdom, it appears, is not inclined to apply any serious pressure to Australia because of political reasons. The problem of preferences has not yet been discussed as such. It will come up at the next meeting when we intend to make a full and frank statement of our position regarding both preferences, tariff reduction and the multilateral approach.

3. Present forecast is meetings will continue to about March 17th, adjourning then for long weekend to permit United Kingdom consultation of Ministers and reassembling following week to draft document for conclusions. Ends.

TELEGRAM 560 London, March 8, 1944

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Canadian Delegate, Economic Policy Talks, Begins: Regarding commercial policy.

Following general statements by Dominions, United Kingdom have now outlined their position regarding the tariff reduction formula and preferences.

1. Tariff reduction. United Kingdom still prefer formula providing for ceiling of 25%, floor of 10% and a reduction of 25% in rates between ceiling and floor. They recognise that ceiling of 25% might be too drastic for high tariff countries, but think it important that high rates should be cut further than moderate rates. Consequently they forego ceiling as an immediate measure and suggest a graduated reduction of M.F.N. rates obtained by application of the formula one half of the rate in 1939 plus 5% ad valorem originally proposed by South Africa. Thus previous M.F.N. rate of 100 would be reduced to 55 and M.F.N. 30 to 20. They feel technical problems of this method not insuperable if general reduction is not applied immediately which would allow time for collection of statistics. If quantitative restrictions are to be permitted during transitional period they think it may not be possible to obtain immediate application of tariff cut in any case.

2. Tariff floor. United Kingdom propose floor of 10% under which there would be complete freedom to adjust rates including free rates.

3. Infant industries and new duties: United Kingdom propose countries might be permitted to give protection for limited period not exceeding specified rates on any commodity where domestic production is less than a given proportion of consumption. After expiry of limited period duties must be reduced.

4. Preferences. United Kingdom agree with Canadian position that Convention should not contain anything which would require or would result in a general raising of B.P. rates in order to reduce preferential margins. They do not envisage an absolute prohibition against increases in B.P. rates but no one should be compelled to do so. They propose that the preference margins should be reduced by the graduated reduction of M.F.N. rates in accordance with above formula, but that no preferential margin need be reduced below 5% ad valorem. Thus M.F.N. of 50 and B.P. of 30 would be reduced to 30 and 25. Contrary to Canadian suggestion regarding unbinding of margins, United Kingdom oppose unbinding of B.P. margins or rates on the ground that this might lead to countries of Commonwealth making bargains at expense of one another and give rise to intra Commonwealth discrimination.

5. In stating preliminary Canadian reaction we said that we could not oppose the principle of graduated reduction provided it is substantial, but that we saw considerable technical difficulties in respect of specified rates. We said we were most doubtful that the United Kingdom proposal regarding preferences would be acceptable to the United States. They replied that they are prepared to put the proposals up to the Americans and to argue strenuously in this matter, which they have always regarded as a case for striking a bargain between the amount of tariff cut and reduction of B.P. margins. They explained that in agreeing to Article 7 it was understood that the reduction of tariffs and the "elimination" of discrimination could both be gradual. We reserved our position completely regarding their opposition to our suggestion for the unbinding of margins. We are informed unofficially that there is now a group in the United Kingdom Cabinet, namely Beaverbrook, Amery and Hudson,[27] who are not prepared to accept a relaxation of the B.P. system. The opposition to our suggestion concerning unbinding is probably not unconnected with this situation.

6. The immediate reactions of other Commonwealth representatives were non-commital. The Australians felt that the proposed general reduction in tariffs would, on the one hand, be inequitable in its effect on their individual protected industries and on the other, not achieve an adequate reduction in the barriers to their products in the United States market.

7. We are anxious to hear your views.[28] Ends.

Dear Dr. Clark,

I am enclosing copy of High Commissioner's telegram No. 560 of March 8th, setting forth the United Kingdom approach to questions of tariff and preferential policy. The distance between the United States and the United Kingdom positions appears to have widened a good deal since they first met in Washington in October. In general, objectives seem to be shrinking and receding. It seems to me that, as the multilateral programme becomes more modest and more remote, we shall have to look more seriously and more quickly at the specific problem of Canadian-American trade relations. I had envisaged a bilateral agreement with the United States, supplementing a general multilateral tariff reduction, but if effective multilateral action is to be indefinitely deferred and, when achieved, prove modest, then I think we may have to look at the question again from the continental viewpoint.

Yours sincerely,

N. A. ROBERTSON

TELEGRAM 585 London, March 10, 1944

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Canadian Delegation, Economic Policy Talks, Begins: Regarding Commercial Policy.

1. In course of discussion of provisions of proposed Convention regarding removal of quantitative restrictions, United Kingdom outlined some of their preliminary views concerning latitude they require during transitional period. They propose that any member should be free to use quantitative restrictions to deal with immediate post-war emergencies without limitation for a two year period save to consult with other members who may be injured thereby. This would be followed by a second phase lasting three years during which all quantitative restrictions would be eliminated progressively. They attach two-fold meaning to transitional period (a) transition from war to peace, (b) transition from higher to lower levels of protection. With respect to latter, they are inclined to think that from practical standpoint of reaching agreement, the abolition of quantitative restrictions and reduction of tariffs should both be gradual. Thus they propose signature of Convention as soon as possible by group of countries with substantial proportion of world trade. Convention would become operative immediately with respect to establishment of organization. Collection of statistics and consultation regarding quantitative controls during transitional period. Partial tariff cut might begin at end of hostilities and continue progressively until full reduction is reached at termination of special transitional arrangements.

2. We expressed view that full tariff reduction should go into effect at once as soon as possible following close of hostilities in order to facilitate and hasten whole process of MPCAS statement. Since it appeared in our discussions with United States officials that they were showing signs of giving sympathetic consideration to this course, we felt it unwise for United Kingdom to suggest possibility of gradual or delayed reduction. We were supported in our attitude by New Zealand and South Africa and it seemed we made some headway in convincing United Kingdom. Australians on other hand said that until there was an opportunity to examine the effect of the proposals on their industries they could not say whether they are acceptable on basis of either immediate or gradual application. If effects are severe they feel they would need time and have freedom to use quantitative restrictions during transition period.

3. This discussion was preliminary. Full and detailed consideration of transitional period arrangements will come later under monetary discussions.[29] Ends.

Dear Mr. Robertson:

Thanks for your note of March 10th transmitting copy of High Commissioner's telegram 560 of March 8th, which sets forth the United Kingdom's approach to questions of tariff and preferential policy.

I agree with your comments and your general approach. In fact, for some time I have been growing increasingly skeptical of the possibilities of real achievement under the multilateral program and therefore increasingly concerned with the advisability, from our point of view, of a radical continental approach coupled with a radical Canadian-British program.

You will probably wish a conference on the reports of our delegation in London and particularly on despatch 560 in order to give further instructions to our delegation. Unfortunately it now appears that I will have to be out of

Dear Mr. Robertson:

With reference to your letter of February 17th, 1944,† and subsequent exchange of teletype messages† concerning discussions between Canadian and United States officials on commercial policy, I enclose herewith twelve copies of a mimeographed statement received this morning from Mr. Southworth[30] dealing with the conversations at Washington and at New York.

The suggested changes by the United States group in our draft statement† have been incorporated in the United States revision. The only other change that I notice is in IV (5), where we use (x%); you will note they have inserted (say 50%).

In conversation yesterday with Mr. Southworth, he said that they hope within the next two or three days to submit to the Committee on Post-War Programs a statement which will consist of the undertakings formulated during the discussions, and in the event of clearance on this high level, the United States hope to proceed with conversations with other countries.

Yours sincerely,

M. M. MAHONEY

ECONOMIC POLICY OTHER THAN MONETARY AND FINANCIAL

SECTION ON COMMERCIAL POLICY

The procedure adopted for the American-Canadian talks on commercial policy, of which this is a summary, was a topic by topic discussion of the commercial policy section of the joint statement of October 16th, 1943† resulting from the earlier informal talks by the American and British groups on economic policy other than monetary or financial. Where it is stated below that the Canadian group concurred with or had no objection to any designated portion of the United States-United Kingdom statement, the implication is that the American group had not changed its position with regard to such portion since formulation of that statement. Numerical references to that statement hereinunder are to the section on commercial policy.

I. MULTILATERAL APPROACH

1. It is highly desirable to negotiate a multilateral convention on commercial policy covering both quantitative import restrictions and tariffs. Such an attempt should be made at the earliest possible moment while conditions of relative commodity scarcity still obtain and foreign competition is of relatively little concern to domestic producers and before demobilization of war industry has set in and vested interests in war-time restrictions on imports become too highly developed. The Canadian group suggested that the convention should cover an initial period of at least 10 years.

2. The multilateral convention should be so drawn that all states could accede to it including industrially undeveloped countries as well as industrial countries and countries with largely state-directed economies as well as countries where private enterprise predominates.

See Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 17. See also Volume 9, Documents 610, 612.

3. The American group felt that if it should not prove feasible to remove quantitative import restrictions and reduce tariffs simultaneously serious consideration should be given to the negotiation of a convention providing for immediate removal of quantitative import restrictions and for subsequent bilateral negotiations to reduce tariffs. The Canadian group felt that, on the contrary, since quantitative restrictions and tariffs are often alternative forms of protection, undertakings to eliminate quantitative restrictions and to reduce tariffs ought to be reciprocal and simultaneous. With respect to the carrying out of these undertakings it was urged that during the transitional period there may well be circumstances which would require that certain countries with unbalanced economies should be given an agreed period in which to liquidate quantitative restrictions while tariffs should be reduced forthwith.

4. In general the Canadian group was in accord with the United Kingdom view expressed in the United States-United Kingdom statement (I 1, page 6): that a definite commitment to abolish quantitative restrictions should be accompanied by an equally precise commitment to effect substantial reductions in tariffs. In the view of the Canadian group the extent of the overall reduction should be of the order of, say, 50% in most-favoured-nation rates.

II. NEGOTIATION, ADHERENCE AND GENERALIZATION PROCEDURE.

There was general agreement that the following procedure regarding negotiation, adherence, and generalization with respect to the proposed multilateral convention on commercial policy might be desirable:

(1) Agreement should be reached first among the United States, the United Kingdom, the countries of the British Commonwealth, the U.S.S.R., and as many other countries as practicable, on a draft convention designed to be feasible of adherence by all countries.

(2) Prior to signature by the original group, the draft convention would be submitted to other countries with a view to obtaining their agreement thereto without any important exceptions or reservations in respect of any particular country.

(3) The convention should come into force upon adherence by a group of countries which could form an adequate nucleus.

(4) When the tariff reductions and other benefits of the convention enter into force they should be extended to other countries for a stated time to cover the period of notice generally required for the revocation of trade treaties and most-favoured-nation arrangements. After the expiry of this period the benefits should be withdrawn from countries which have not adhered to the convention; it might well be desirable for the international organization to be granted authority to extend the period for adherence or to make exceptions in the terms of the convention in justifiable cases for particular countries.

(5) The convention should include a provision for the abrogation and prohibition of all commitments regarding the maintenance of margins of preference and rates bound against decreases so that all rates would become and continue to be freely negotiable. (Although the United States group agreed with the substance of this statement, it questioned the appropriateness of including it in Section II rather than in Section IV).

(6) The convention should provide that all reductions in rates resulting from the tariff reduction formula and all subsequent reductions in rates by any signatory country must be extended automatically and unconditionally to all the signatories of the convention.

III. TARIFFS.

1. Tariff-Reduction Formulae.

The first three alternative formulae in the United States-United Kingdom statement (I 2, pages 7-8) were discussed on the understanding that they referred solely to most-favoured-nation rates — not to preferential rates nor to any rates higher than the most-favoured-nation rates. The Canadian group felt that formula A — uniform reduction with a ceiling and a floor — would most effectively accomplish the purpose of world tariff reduction. However, recognizing the technical difficulties of applying the ceiling formula to specific duties and different valuation systems, the Canadian group thought that consideration might be given to a modified form of formula C. Both groups agreed on the following modification of formula C as a tentative basis for further discussion of tariff reduction in the proposed convention: all duties to be reduced by a given percentage of their level as of a given date, say, July 1st, 1939, with a provision that no country is obliged to reduce any ad valorem duty below 10%, on the basis of a specified method of valuation, and that any country may instead of reducing a duty of a form other than ad valorem substitute for such duty an ad valorem duty not to exceed 10% calculated according to a specified basis of valuation. It might be found necessary to allow certain countries lacking experience in valuation to establish reduced duties of other form to a level not exceeding 10% in ad valorem equivalent; the question as to what is the ad valorem equivalent thereof to be reviewed by the proposed international commercial policy organization.

No duty which has been reduced in accordance with this convention shall thereafter be increased, nor shall its form (e.g. ad valorem, specific, compound, etc.) be changed except that any other form of duty may be changed to an ad valorem duty which is of no higher rate as determined, in case of necessity, by the proposed international commercial policy organization. No duty which has not been reduced by this convention, shall hereafter be fixed at a higher rate than was in effect on July 1st, 1939, nor shall it be expressed in a form different from that in use at said date, except that any other form of duty may be changed to an ad valorem duty which is of no higher rate, as determined, in case of necessity, by the proposed international commercial policy organization. No duty shall hereafter be established or maintained on any article which as of July 1st, 1939, was free of duty.

2. Revenue Duties.

In general the proposed exemption of revenue duties from the provisions respecting tariff reductions and tariff binding and the definition of revenue duties in I 3 (page 8) of the United States-United Kingdom statement, were satisfactory to the Canadian group. However, discussion brought out the need of assuring that where such duties are used to provide funds for paying subsidies the revenue duty does not become in effect a protective duty.

3. Infant Industries and Security Industries.

It was agreed that, in general, subsidies should be relied upon as the mechanism for governmental assistance to necessary infant industries and security industries.

Both groups emphasized that no exceptions should be allowed to the terms of the convention on security grounds. Whatever legitimate claim "infant industries" may have to special measures of assistance might be met in one or more of the following ways:

(a) through the granting of exceptions in appropriate cases by the proposed international commercial-policy organisation in accordance with agreed criteria and procedure;

(b) through subsidies (see VII below);

(c) through international assistance by provision of long-term capital or otherwise.

4. Tariff Quotas.

It was agreed that where a tariff quota was in existence as of July 1st, 1939, the tariff reduction formula should apply to both the upper and lower rates thereof. The Canadian group felt that in a convention abolishing quantitative restrictions, tariff quotas, which in the last analysis are of the same nature, should be dealt with in the same way. In the possible event that provisions for tariff reduction in the multilateral convention should apply only to the lower of the two rates on products subject to tariff quotas, the situation with respect to such products if such quotas were not abolished would be as restrictive as before the convention took effect, if not more so.

IV. PREFERENCES.

1. The following statement on preferences is contained in the agreed summary of the British-American discussions (II 1, p.9)

"Article VII of the Mutual-Aid Agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom provides for agreed action looking not only toward the reduction of tariffs but also toward the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce. No convention of the kind proposed would give final effect to these obligations unless it makes definite provision both for an adequate reduction of tariffs and for the ultimate substantial abolition of preferences. There remains for determination at the proper time the difficult question of what reduction of tariffs, at one step or by stages, would be adequate to make possible the substantial abolition of preferences. It has become clear in the course of the discussions that United States opinion would not consider it equitable or reasonable to contemplate drastic and comprehensive reduction of tariffs (assuming this to be feasible) if it were not accompanied by the simultaneous substantial abolition of preferences."

2. The Canadian group pointed out that if agreement could be reached on a multilateral reduction — of say 50% — in most-favoured-nation rates, that in itself would eliminate a great many preferential margins and would reduce every one of the remaining margins by at least one half. In the opinion of the Canadian group this would go a long way toward the "substantial abolition of preferences" and is all that could reasonably be attempted in the multilateral convention. The reduction of residual margins might be accomplished in the following ways: (a) by simultaneous bilateral agreements for the further reduction of duties and the reciprocal exchange of free rates — this would be possible since all rates would be freely negotiable as a result of the abrogation in the convention of commitments regarding the binding of rates and margins; (b) by the possibility of eliminating certain preferential margins by distinguishing, for more general purposes, between preferences freely exchanged between the countries of the British Commonwealth and those granted in the non-selfgoverning colonies, particularly in what were open door areas prior to 1932.

3. The Canadian group felt in principle that it would be unreasonable for the United States to expect to achieve, in a multilateral convention, reductions of preferences below the level to which the general 50% reduction in most-favoured-nation rates would bring them. The request for the elimination of all preferences would require either (a) the removal of all duties on all products now admitted duty free from the United Kingdom, or (b) the imposition of new or higher duties on hundreds of tariff classifications on which the British Preference rate is now free. In the opinion of the Canadian group procedure (a) would clearly not be practical for Canada, while procedure (b) would run counter to traditional use of British Preferential rates as a means of reducing tariffs and would be in conflict with the main purpose of the proposed convention.

4. In the view of the United States group the extent of the tariff reduction called for in the Canadian suggestion would clearly place it within the scope of the phrase "drastic and comprehensive" used in the joint statement of October 16th, 1943, and would therefore need to be accompanied by provisions for the simultaneous substantial abolition of preferences as indicated in the statement (see sub-section II, point 1, p.11). While it is not possible at this stage to determine with accuracy how far the Canadian proposal might go toward the elimination of imperial preferences, it seems clear that a significant proportion of them would remain. It would be extremely difficult to defend a convention providing for drastic tariff reductions while leaving in existence an important segment of the preferential system to be negotiated away in supplementary bilateral agreements involving still further tariff reduction. Such a convention would be open to the criticism that the United States had used up almost all its tariff bargaining power without achieving the objective with regard to discriminatory treatment set forth in the Mutual Aid Agreements. It would, moreover, be extremely doubtful if the United States Congress would grant the necessary authority to negotiate supplementary bilateral agreements providing for tariff reductions beyond those brought about through the multilateral convention.

5. The United States group suggests that consideration might be given to provisions along the following lines which would accompany provisions for the adequate reduction of tariffs (x per cent.) under a multilateral formula and which might meet, in part, the requirements for the simultaneous substantial abolition of preferences:

(a) If there is no or only insignificant domestic production, the non-preference duty must be reduced 50%, or to the level of the preference rate, whichever gives the lower rate.

(b) Provided that if the country wishes to maintain the duty as a revenue duty it may fix it at any level not exceeding the present level if preference is entirely eliminated.

(c) If the non-preference rate is 10% ad valorem or less, either it must be reduced 50% or the preference rate must be raised to equal the non-preference rate.

(d) If the reduction of the non-preference rate by 50% would bring it below 10%, it may be fixed at any figure not over 10% provided the preference rate is raised to the same level.

6. The United States group stressed the need for a general formula to deal with residual preference and suggested for consideration the following, which would be supplemented by 5(a) and (b) above: no margin of preference remaining after the application of the tariff reduction formula would be left higher than x per cent of what it was on, say, July 1st, 1939.

V. Prohibitions and Quantitative Restrictions on Imports.

1. It was agreed that, as set forth in the United States-United Kingdom statement (III 1, page 10), import prohibitions and import restrictions such as quotas and licensing systems are among the devices most destructive of international trade, and, as part of a multilateral convention, should, except in certain special cases which would be held to a minimum and closely defined, be prohibited. In no case should their use for the purpose of protecting home industries, including infant industries and industries deemed necessary on grounds of national security, be permitted. (See I 3 above).

2. The Canadian group had no objection to the granting of exceptions to the prohibition on quantitative restrictions during a specified transitional period on grounds of balance-of-payments difficulties, for the purpose of implementing a recognised international commodity agreement, or for other agreed purposes, along the general lines laid down in III 2 (pages 10-11) of the United States-United Kingdom statement.

3. The Canadian group likewise had no objection to the proposals for temporary emergency exceptions and for rules of fair conduct in respect to permissible quantitative import restrictions, as stated in United States-United Kingdom statement (III 3 and 4, page 11).

4. In view of the fact that a question had been raised with regard to the meaning of III 5, page 11, of the United States-United Kingdom statement, it was explained that the paragraph means that countries should be forbidden to use exchange control to evade the general prohibition on quantitative restrictions, and has no reference to the question under what circumstances, if any, exchange restrictions might be permitted.

VI. EXPORT TAXES AND RESTRICTIONS.

The Canadian group endorsed the recommendation in sub-section IV, on export taxes and restrictions, of the United States-United Kingdom statement that there should be agreed action looking toward the abolition of export taxes and restrictions, and expressed general concurrence with the lines of such action as proposed in the said sub-section. Both groups agreed that it may be desirable to consider including special provisions in the multilateral convention on commercial policy to permit restrictions on exports of certain natural resources in the interest of conservation, subject to the approval of the appropriate international economic authorities.

VII. SUBSIDIES.

1. Both groups agreed that, as a general principle, export subsidies and other forms of two-price systems should be banned. However, it was felt that price and income supporting measures, particularly with reference to primary industries, are inevitable in the post-war period in many countries. Also certain countries may consider that if they drastically reduce their tariffs and eliminate quantitative restrictions on imports as a result of the proposed multilateral convention, it will be necessary for them to use subsidies as a method of assistance. It is therefore important that agreement be reached as to the means by which governments may render such assistance without having to resort to quantitative import restrictions and export subsidies.

2. It was thought that one such method might be the use of income subsidies which do not affect prices in the market. Another might be governmentally guaranteed prices to producers. It was recognized, however, that either of these methods could have as injurious effects on particular surplus situations as direct price supporting measures which involve two-price systems and import restrictions.

3. Both groups thought that certain surplus situations affecting internationally traded commodities might well arise which would call for special international commodity agreements. In such cases the use of two-price systems might be permitted in accordance with the terms of such agreements. In this connection the Canadian group thought that it would be very desirable to explore further the possibilities of the use of buffer stocks as a device which might prove adequate for many cases which might otherwise be thought to require special intergovernmental arrangements involving two-price systems.

VIII. STATE TRADING.

1. The Canadian group thought that it might be undesirable to require countries with a complete state monopoly of foreign trade, such as Russia, to commit themselves to purchase minimum global quantities of products as a condition of becoming associated with the convention on reduction of trade barriers and of receiving its benefits (see subsection VI, para.10, page 15). Such a provision is not needed from the viewpoint of exporting interests in private enterprise countries, for if Russia cares to make use of the improved opportunities for exporting its goods which would result from the convention, it would ordinarily increase its imports pari-passu. Futhermore, Russia might well feel that an obligation on its part to buy should be coupled in the convention with a counter-obligation on the part of other countries to sell. The allocation of such a counter-obligation among countries of supply might present difficult problems. Also at times — for instance on the occasion of Russia possibly receiving large loans — the countries which had agreed to supply minimum amounts might face acute difficulties in meeting their commitments.

The United States group recognized that, since a country such as Russia tends to import to the limit of its ability, a global purchase commitment might not be of great practical benefit to exporters in private-enterprise countries. Nevertheless, in the view of the United States group, it would appear highly desirable, if not essential, that complete state-trading countries give some visible quid pro quo for the benefits received from private-enterprise countries. The proposal for a global purchase commitment should not be discarded, therefore, in the absence of some more satisfactory visible commitment.

3. It was felt by both groups that if tariff reduction and removal of quantitative import restrictions are effectively carried out by all countries adhering to the convention, increased pressure for state-operated importation might face some governments which because of budgetary difficulties or other reasons do not find subsidization feasible.

4. The Canadian group suggested that the proposed requirement that the foreign purchases and sales of state monopolies be governed solely by commercial considerations, i.e. on a nondiscriminatory basis (see VI, para. 8, p.14), might be strengthened by supplementary provisions requiring the publication of price and other data on state trading which would serve as a means of verifying its objectives and nondiscriminatory character.

5. Both groups felt the need of further thought before formulating a definite position on state trading.

IX. INTERNATIONAL COMMERCIAL POLICY ORGANIZATION.

It was agreed, in conformity with the United States-United Kingdom statement (VII 1, page 16), that the creation of an appropriate international commercial-policy organization seems essential to the successful operation of any general multilateral commercial-policy convention. The Canadian group was in general agreement with sub-section VII of the United States-United Kingdom statement regarding the functions of such an organization and the principles on which it should operate. The Canadian group thought that formal connection should be established by the new body with existing international bodies and that the latter should continue to function where appropriate, in close relation with the new organization.

POST-WAR INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC POLICY

The broad objectives of the United Nations regarding post-war international economic policy are a prominent part of the general statement of aims in the Atlantic Charter and the Mutual Aid Agreements. Since early in 1942 experts and officials of governments, particularly in the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada have explored, in a non-commital manner, the methods by which these broad objectives might be given practical effect. This exploration has proceeded from the standpoint of a broad international approach; one in which all the United Nations could participate in the formulation and control of arrangements on the functional principle, and assume obligations on a multilateral basis in contrast to the alternative of bilateral agreements or exclusive undertakings within regional or special groupings. The field which is being explored is comprehensive. International collaboration and specific arrangements are sought in all the spheres of complementary international economic policy which can be combined into an integrated programme for the attainment of expanding trade, rising standards of living and full employment throughout the world. Thus concrete proposals, based on the multilateral approach, are being considered in respect of monetary and exchange policy, international investment policy, commercial policy, commodity policy, cartel policy and employment policy.

The proposals concerning monetary and exchange policy are designed to provide for reasonable stability and orderly adjustment of exchange rates, short term assistance to countries which have a temporary deficit in their balances of payments, the free convertibility of currencies and the prevention of discriminatory currency practices. The so-called Keynes plan (U.K.),[32] the White plan (U.S.)[33] and the plan prepared by Canadian experts[34] are all directed to these ends and differ mainly in the methods suggested. These plans have been discussed fairly widely among experts of the United Nations and throughout the past year many exchanges of views have taken place between the officials and experts of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. Commonwealth discussions took place in London in the autumn of 1942[35] and again recently during February and March last.[36] As a result of all these conversations a compromise statement of principles has been prepared which carries the agreement of the British, American and Canadian experts.[37] We have been informed indirectly that it is probable that President Roosevelt will call a United Nations monetary conference during the next month or two at which the agreed statement of principles would receive formal consideration by governments.

In Article VII of the Mutual Aid (Lend-Lease) agreements the United States and the other signatory governments agreed, among other things, to enter into post-war arrangements directed to the "elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce, and to the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers." Early in 1943, United Kingdom experts, in preparation for conversations with the United States regarding the undertakings in Article VII, submitted to Commonwealth governments a comprehensive proposal concerning post-war commercial policy. This proposal suggested the adoption of a multilateral commercial convention, embracing as many countries as possible, which would provide for (a) a ceiling on tariffs and the multilateral reduction of duties by an agreed formula, (b) a general scheme for reducing preferential margins, (c) the abolition of quantitative restrictions to trade except for certain specified and limited purposes, (d) the prohibition of export subsidies and export taxes, (e) the formulation of rules governing state trading, and (f) the establishment of an international institution to administer the convention.[38] This far-reaching and courageous proposition was discussed in London between experts of Commonwealth Governments in June 1943[39] and it was agreed that the United Kingdom should, on its own responsibility, submit the proposals for informal consideration to officials of the United States Government. This was done during the British-American exploratory Article VII conversations held in Washington during September and October last.[40] While many practical difficulties were foreseen, the general reception by United States experts was encouraging. This was significant in view of the reliance hitherto placed by the United States on the narrower and slower bilateral negotiations involved in the Hull trade agreements programme. Agreement on a precise formula for the multilateral lowering of tariffs and reduction of preferences was not attempted at that stage but an agreed British-American document was drawn up by the experts on the two sides in which the general provisions of the proposed commercial policy convention were further elaborated.

In January last Canadian officials were invited to Washington to engage in exploratory discussions on Article VII subjects with United States representatives. The talks centred mainly on commercial policy. The Canadians strongly supported the multilateral approach and found the American officials prepared also to explore the proposal seriously. The conversations took for their agenda the agreed British-American document and an attempt was made to achieve progress through a preliminary examination of various specific possibilities for the reduction of tariffs and simultaneous modification of British Preferences. In this connection the effects of a 50% multilateral reduction in all duties, with a proviso that no duty need be reduced below 10%, was explored. While the United States representatives regarded such a cut to be drastic they were not unwilling to consider it. However, they maintained that a reduction of this magnitude, in order to give it a chance of political acceptance in the United States, must be accompanied by the virtual elimination of the preferential arrangements in the British Empire and Commonwealth countries. The Canadian officials suggested that the proposed 50% reduction should apply only to most-favoured-nation rates and not to British preferential rates so that in every case the preferential margin would be cut automatically by at least one-half and would be eliminated entirely in a large number of items accounting for more than half the Canadian trade. The Canadian group suggested further that if all bound preferential margins were unbound by an appropriate provision in the convention, additional reductions in preferences could be accomplished through supplementary trade agreements between the United States and Commonwealth countries. The only other alternative for the reduction of preferential margins would require the raising of preferential tariff rates — a procedure which was impossible of acceptance by Canada. The United States officials did not consider the above methods for the reduction of preferences to be adequate. The Canadians maintained that the British Preference could not be accepted as being more vicious than high tariffs and that reductions in preferential margins should be achieved through the general process of lowering duties. In the discussions in January and a subsequent discussion in February it was not possible to reach agreement on this matter between the two groups of officials and the question was left for further consideration.

Renewed informal conversations between Commonwealth officials on Article VII topics were held in London during February and March last. The British and Canadians reported on the results of their talks in Washington. The most important outcome of the discussions on commercial policy was the disagreement of Australia with many of the vital points of the proposed commercial policy convention and the noticeable narrowing of approach on the part of the United Kingdom. The Canadian representatives argued for a comprehensive and courageous approach on a wide international basis such as could enlist the essential adherence of the United States and would be adequate to the task of the rapid restoration of world trade and world prosperity after the war. The Australian officials felt that the objective of a significant multilateral reduction of tariffs which would involve an important modification of the British Preference was in some respects misguided and in others not feasible for Australia. They placed greater emphasis on purely domestic policies for the attainment of full employment and preferred to negotiate a bilateral tariff agreement with the United States and the virtual full retention of the British Preferential system, or as much of it as they could hold after such a bilateral agreement. The British officials were prepared to support the adoption of a formula for a substantial multilateral reduction of tariffs, but they placed considerable emphasis on the preservation of the core of the British Preferential structure — a condition which has small chance of meeting the position of the United States. Furthermore, in view of their immediate post-war balance of payments and reconstruction problems, the British urged postponement of the application of some of the most important provisions of the proposed commercial policy convention. In particular, they wished to retain complete freedom, which would be open to other countries also, in the use of quantitative restrictions on imports for a period of five years after the end of hostilities. The views of the South African and New Zealand officials were generally closer to the Canadian than to the Australian, or in some cases the British, approach.

In the Anglo-American, Commonwealth and Canadian-American discussions officials have also explored in a preliminary way specific proposals for international arrangements regarding commodity policy, international investment, and cartels. The objective sought for commodity policy is the establishment of an international code to govern international commodity regulation schemes in the future. Worthwhile progress has been made in this direction and it is not likely that serious disagreement will arise. In matters of international investment and cartel policy the initiative has properly been left very largely to the United States. In the field of cartels United States officials have made some path-breaking proposals for the registration and publication of all private cartel agreements and for the prohibition of a list of what they regard as harmful cartel practices. United Kingdom officials have shown considerable reluctance to going along with these suggestions. Because of the importance attached to them by the United States and because they have some merit, Canadian representatives have urged that the proposals should be taken seriously and that an effort should be made to co-operate at least with respect to those aspects of the problem which clearly need attention.

In general, the exploratory discussions of post-war international economic policy began on a hopeful and courageous note and were based on a broad international approach. However, a number of important difficulties have been encountered, particularly in the vitally important field of commercial policy. It is not surprising that the Preferential system, the Sterling area arrangements and the very real problems of the United Kingdom and other European countries during the transition period following the close of hostilities, should constitute some of the principal difficulties. The task is to adapt and modify the special inter-Commonwealth and Empire structures respecting tariffs and currency matters so that they can be fitted into and make possible desirable arrangements on a broad international basis. Also, agreed action on a comprehensive programme should be taken almost immediately following the end of the war before economic systems are reconstructed into the old molds and before vested interests have everywhere grown up. At the close of hostilities the situation will inevitably be fluid and thus constitutes a unique opportunity which will rapidly disappear. This is no less true in Canada than elsewhere. There will be risks but these will have to be taken if the large benefits are to be obtained.

The alternatives for Canada to timely action on a broad international basis are not attractive. Canada would have to look principally to special bilateral arrangements with the United States and the United Kingdom. In the case of the United Kingdom, unless an international arrangement for the full convertibility of currencies is agreed upon, Canada would have to cope for many years with the type of sterling exchange problem with which we have had to deal during the war. An attempt to reach a large-scale bilateral trade agreement with the United States is certain to face a major attack on our preferential tariffs. This attack would come upon us individually rather than be resolved as part of a general scheme and would very probably result in serious strains on our economic and perhaps political relations with the Commonwealth. In any case special arrangements with the United States and the United Kingdom will not give us, following the great expansion of Canadian industry during the war, the outlets which we will need in the important market of Continental Europe. In the circumstances of the Canadian position the greatest assurance of continuing prosperity, and harmony with both the United States and the Commonwealth, lies in the achievement of effective agreements on the widest possible international basis.

SECRET. May 7th. Following for Wrong from Robertson, Begins: Consideration of questions of economic and financial policies will come up at tomorrow's meeting of Prime Ministers. The United Kingdom has circulated a very cautious and non-committal paper† summarising without endorsement the conclusions reached by the meeting of experts in March. Internal political divisions within the United Kingdom Government, which are not likely to be resolved during the next few months, make it unlikely that resumed conversations with United States officials could lead to concrete and useful results. This fact, plus coincidental approach of United States elections, makes me doubtful whether any advantage can be expected from a showdown on main questions of principle at this juncture. I am inclined to recommend a six months' hoist of negotiations and to oppose possible alternative suggested by the United Kingdom that procedure followed in case of International Monetary Fund might be pursued with respect to proposed Commercial Convention. I feel progress in the field of commercial policy must involve Government responsibilities at each stage of negotiations and that interim publication of "Agreed Statement of Principles" — assuming such a document could be drafted — would probably be mischievous in its results. SECRET. Following for Robertson from Wrong, Begins: Reference your No.1070 May 7. Commercial policy proposals.

Deutsch and I have discussed your telegram with Clark, Mackintosh, McKinnon, and Master. We all agree with your view that in the circumstances it would be advisable to recommend a six month's hoist of negotiations and that it would not be wise to attempt to produce a "Statement of Principles" at the expert level. It is most unlikely that such a document could be prepared without guidance on important matters of policy from governments. A non-committal statement by experts would either be without content or reveal wide differences in attitude. Until a clear line of policy is formulated in the United Kingdom and the difficulties of the impending United States election are out of the way, further negotiations between these two parties are likely to be conducted with such caution and rigidity as to be pointless and harmful. However we feel, subject to your judgment of circumstances in London, that it is highly desirable to put forward vigorously and clearly to the United Kingdom authorities the Canadian view regarding a comprehensive international approach.

Do you consider that this will delay progress with Monetary Fund? It seems certain that United States suggestion that International Monetary Conference should be convened before party conventions is now impossible of adoption.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS

on Monday, 8th May, 1944, at 5.30 p.m.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had already stated his views on the proposals for an international monetary fund in the Canadian House of Commons, at the time when he had tabled the draft principles for the fund as recommended by experts. The views he then expressed were the views he held to-day. He did not think he could do better than repeat to the present meeting the remarks he had made in the Canadian House of Commons. He had spoken as follows: —

"This statement of principles on international monetary relationships is conceived as part of a general plan of international economic co-operation which as a whole will have for its objects the progressive expansion of international trade, high levels of employment, improved standards of living, reasonable stability of prices and machinery for orderly exchange arrangements. The Canadian Government is thoroughly aware of the importance of establishing international monetary arrangements favourable to the expansion of trade and employment, and is keenly sympathetic with the particular objects to which this statement of principles is directed. It is equally anxious that common views should be reached on other parts, also, of a general plan of international economic co-operation, particularly on a reduction in the barriers to trade expansion, a reduction vital to Canada's welfare, and necessary if conditions favourable to stable monetary arrangements are to be achieved. The view which will ultimately be taken by the Canadian Government of any proposed monetary arrangement will be greatly, perhaps decisively, influenced by the progress which it is possible to make in achieving agreement on other aspects of international economic policy with which monetary arrangements are inseparably linked."

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had already expressed his views on the proposed international monetary fund, but the turn of the discussion was leading to examination of the second issue before the meeting, viz., Commercial Policy. His views on that subject were as follows: —

He did not think that the full employment and higher national income which Canada must seek to achieve could be secured within a restricted imperial trade system — nor could they be attained by a series of bilateral deals with individual countries.

For these reasons Canada was, he believed, strongly in favour of the widest development of international trade as soon as possible after the war.

Canada needed to expand her reciprocal trade with the countries of the Commonwealth, with the United States, and with Europe. For this reason Canada welcomed the multilateral approach to freer trade through a general commercial convention — to which all countries could adhere.

We should strive for a simultaneous reduction of protective tariffs and the removal of quantitative restrictions. At the same time we must be prepared to offer freer access to our own markets, in return for greater export opportunities.

In this effort we would require the active co-operation of the United States, which should be helped and induced to reverse her traditional commercial policies.

We must recognize that the United States tended to attach exaggerated importance to the elimination of Preferences in the field of commercial policy. Some of us were perhaps inclined — for different and complementary reasons — to attach a similarly exaggerated importance to their integral retention. He thought that we must face the fact that serious reductions in protective tariffs in other countries of the world must involve a corresponding reduction of tariff preferences.

In the discussion on foreign policy last week we had all been concerned about the possible spread of social disturbance after the war. He believed that the best way to check it was by co-operating in parallel policies designed to bring about full employment and higher real incomes for our people. This we could not do in national isolation nor within an Empire group. We needed to carry the other countries with us in these policies.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS had spoken wisely of the importance we must all attach to the restoration of Western Europe. The difficulties in the way of a purely political solution of their problems were great. He believed they could be partly overcome if we were to offer them our economic co-operation in terms of generous reciprocity.

These problems were difficult and very complicated. Bold solutions involved risk-taking which we would all wish to avoid if we could. He felt, however, that postponement of new departures in the field of commercial policy until the end of a "transitional period," which he heard might be as long as five years, would be to accept defeat in advance. If we were to make a fresh start — our great opportunity would follow close on the end of hostilities. We should be prepared to seek it. If we waited, special interests in each of our countries — in Europe and in the United States, which have been subordinated to the pressing needs of a war economy, would assert their special claims. Each of us must inevitably face grave problems of industrial reconversion when hostilities end. He felt that these very difficulties would give us an immediate opportunity to build up our most efficient industries on firmer foundations than before. In so doing we could remove many causes of international friction and rivalry, and make sure that the economic bases of a world security organization were securely laid.

POST-WAR COMMERCIAL POLICY

It is necessary to give early consideration to the Canadian attitude respecting post-war commercial policy in the light of the circumstances as they now exist. Up to the present the exploration of this vitally important matter has centred on a proposal for a substantial multilateral reduction of trade barriers over a wide area immediately after the war. An approach of this nature and scope was regarded desirable on the ground that the obstacles to trade as they existed in 1939 and extended during the war constitute such a tight and universal network of restriction that the rapid recovery of a large flow of world trade would be impossible without broad and far-reaching international action. The piece-meal method of negotiating bilateral trade agreements and bargaining on individual tariff items would be both inadequate in its results and too slow in encompassing a wide area of trade. The importance of an early application of such a multilateral program is stressed for the reason that the conditions governing the international interchange of goods must be established before the war economies everywhere are reconverted into the old molds after which the removal of restrictions would become extremely difficult.

However, the discussion of this multilateral proposal with officials of the United States and Commonwealth governments has brought out a number of practical difficulties which are serious obstacles in the way of any immediate action. The United Kingdom authorities have made it plain how far their external economic policies during the first few years following the end of hostilities will be dominated by the necessities of their balance of payments position. They estimate that over the first three post-war years they will need to increase their exports by the large sum of £750mm annually. The settlements they will be able to make regarding the huge sterling debt will, under the best circumstances, impose a considerable burden. They estimate that in addition the United Kingdom will have to obtain credits from abroad to the neighborhood of £1,000mm during the immediate post-war years. In view of this situation the United Kimgdom authorities do not feel that they can enter into commitments to abandon, or to limit their freedom in the use of, quantitative restrictions on trade for at least three, and more probably five, years after the end of hostilities. Furthermore, until they see their way more clearly regarding the extent to which their export and credit requirements will be met they do not wish to accept undertakings regarding the non-discriminatory use of such restrictions. Problems similar to those faced by the United Kingdom will exist during the transition period in many of the countries in continental Europe and they are likely to take the same attitude.

The proposed multilateral convention calling for a substantial reduction of tariffs and the abolition, except for specified and agreed purposes, of quantitative restrictions encounters obstacles also in the case of undeveloped countries such as India which intend to use protectionist devices to industrialize their economies. It would be difficult to avoid making important concessions in this regard. Australia, where high protection is a large factor in national policy, has stated its opposition to the suggested provisions of the multilateral proposal.

On a realistic appraisal it would seem that a multilateral convention could not be concluded unless it contained important exceptions and concessions to take care of the national aspiration of various countries and the genuine post-war transitiional difficulties of others. The exceptions and the delays are likely to be such that it would be very optimistic to hope that the convention would be acceptable to the United States Congress, and for that matter to the Canadian Parliament. The United States on the other hand will ask for the virtual abolition of the British Preference — a field in which the United Kingdom would make modifications but is not prepared to abandon except at a price which would involve difficult and protracted bargaining.

In short, it appears that it would take a considerable time to negotiate an effective multilateral convention of the kind that has been proposed. Furthermore, it seems highly improbable that the really significant provisions of such a convention could be brought into operation much short of five years after the end of hostilities.

We must therefore consider whether we should continue to concentrate our efforts on promoting a multilateral convention in spite of the probable delays or whether we should seek some other alternative which has promise of more immediate although more limited results. The arguments for some early action are very strong. There is no need to emphasize again that the large-scale re-conversion of industry and re-allocation of labour which must be undertaken immediately after the war is a unique and most opportune time to re-establish the economies of the world into a basis of large and expanding international trade. More specifically, the speed with which the serious difficulties and widespread repercussions caused by the weak balance of payments position of the United Kingdom and many of the liberated countries of Europe can be overcome will, to an important degree, depend on the extent and rapidity with which the exports from these countries can be increased beyond their pre-war levels. In Canada, where the wartime distortion of industry is as great as anywhere, it will be extremely important to have a definite and early indication of the role of international trade in the post-war period. If there is continued uncertainty as to whether adequate outlets can be found in export trade, whether we will be forced to become more self-sufficient, or whether protection to domestic producers is to be increased or reduced, the task of planning for a prosperous peace-time economy in Canada will be little short of hopeless for both private industry and governments. Furthermore, Canada will have some important balance of payments problems of her own. To what extent should exports to the sterling area continue to be fostered on the basis of credit and in exchange for currency we cannot use, or should policies be adopted which would lessen the dependence on these markets? If a shortage of United States dollars should develop — a possibility which is not unreal — should imports from the United States be restricted or should we borrow in the United States in the hope that we might be able to use the proceeds of our sterling exports in the not too distant future? If four or five years must intervene before we can have answers to these uncertainties, it will be extremely unpleasant. We must explore every possibility of obtaining some of the more important answers in the next six or twelve months.

During the transition period the trade policy of the creditor countries — particularly the United States — is the crucial factor. The world supply of United States and Canadian dollars will be an important determinant of the pace of reconstruction in Europe and Asia and of the nature of the longer-run import and export policies which the countries in these areas will seek to adopt. Consequently some method must be found whereby an effective reduction in the trade barriers of the United States (and Canada) can be brought into operation not at the end of the transition period but at the beginning. How might such speedy action be achieved?

In the United States the most immediate instrument at hand is the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. During the early part of the war negotiations for a new United Kingdom-United States agreement under this Act had been nearly completed. Australia, New Zealand and South Africa had made considerable progress in negotiating agreements with the United States. These negotiations were suspended in 1940 in anticipation of the coming into force of Lend-Lease. As a first step, it would seem that these negotiations should now be resumed. In view of the progress already made it should be possible to complete them without too much delay. In this way the conditions of trade in an important sector of international commerce could be improved fairly quickly, and the exchange position of the whole sterling area strengthened.

The conclusion of such arrangements would be generally helpful but they would not meet the requirements of the situation as far as Europe is concerned. However, an attempt to negotiate bilateral trade agreements between the United States and a considerable number of countries would be a long drawn-out procedure. In the case of Canada something which will bring substantial and direct results is required. The possibilities under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act have been very largely exhausted in the Canadian-American agreements of 1935 and 1938.[41] A further significant reduction of trade barriers between Canada and the United States would, under existing United States legislation, call for the conclusion of an agreement which would require the approval of the United States Congress. Because of the lack of a better alternative which could promise early results, the possibility and probable scope of a Canadian-American agreement of this character should be fully explored. Owing to the very close and successful co-operation between the two countries during the war and the generally favourable attitude towards Canada in the United States there is a good possibility that an objective of this kind is not a forlorn hope. The aim of such an agreement should be to obtain a comprehensive reduction of duties both as between the two countries directly and in the barriers which each maintains against the rest of the world. In other words, reductions in barriers would be sought not only on items which are of leading importance in the trade between Canada and the United States but also on as many as possible of a wide variety of items important in world trade generally which would be extended to all countries by means of a "most-favoured-nation" clause.

The conclusion of an arrangement of this nature which would go into effect at an early date would be a realistic and substantial contribution by the two leading creditor nations to the reconstruction of world trade and of healthy international economic relations as a whole. Furthermore it would not be altruistic, it would be very much in their own best interests. As far as Canada is concerned we would have to be careful that the increased trade with the United States resulting from the adjustment of tariffs would not impair our United States exchange position. In fact, one important objective would be to try to improve it. Indirectly, the Canadian exchange position should benefit. If countries in Europe and elsewhere get greater access to the United States market they will have more United States dollars which they could use to pay for imports from Canada.

These proposals are, of course, open to various objections and are not free from difficulties. One important objection that can be made is that if the benefits from the lower duties in a Canadian-American agreement are extended to all countries through a "most-favoured-nation" clause then concessions will have been given without the receipt of reciprocal benefits and bargaining power will have been thrown away. This factor, however, would not have much significance during the transitional period immediately after the war. During this period the controlling influence on the amount of goods purchased from North America by European and many other countries will not lie in the import barriers as such, but in the supply of United States and Canadian exchange which they are able to obtain. There will be a great shortage of goods and materials in the war damaged countries. The more quickly they are able to get the necessary exchange the more quickly they will be able to buy the goods needed to restore their economies, strengthen their balance of payments position and participate freely in a more liberal system of international trade. However, as a precaution, the generalization of benefits under the "most-favoured-nation" clause should not be unlimited as to time. The benefits might be extended generally during an appropriate transitional period of four or five years after which they would be subject to withdrawal. After that the benefits could be withdrawn by either party to the agreement in cases where countries discriminate against either Canada or the United States or follow policies prejudicial to international trade. In this way the bargaining position would be protected and a powerful instrument provided for promoting desirable international economic relations.

Another objection that can be made is that Canada, in attempting to obtain a comprehensive trade agreement with the United States, will face a strong onslaught on the British Preferential system. However, this problem will come up in any general effort to reduce trade barriers in which Canada and the United States participate. The problem cannot be avoided, it can only be postponed at the price of inaction.

These proposals, namely the resumption of trade agreement negotiations between the United States and the United Kingdom, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand and the conclusion of a comprehensive Canadian-American agreement, are presented as a possible method for securing important reductions in trade barriers in a large area of world trade at a time sufficiently early to be a significant factor in the reconstruction of the world economy along lines which are desirable in the Canadian as well as the general interest. The suggestions are made with the thought that they might merit further exploration.

POST-WAR COMMERCIAL POLICIES

1. There appears to be some danger of discussions on this subject taking the form of bargaining and of policies being pursued during the transitional period which will be very hard to arrest.

2. It is suggested that we should keep two principles before us:

(a) The normal period for which plans should be made should be thought of as one in which the income of mankind is to be brought up [to] the highest possible point and, therefore, as one in which there must be full employment of human and material resources and of which full advantage must be taken of any specialization which will give effect to comparative advantages in production.

(b) The transitional period should not be merely a period during which exceptional action may be taken which may conflict with the guiding principles in the normal period but should be a period in which we prepare ourselves for the conditions of the later period.

3. If discussion can be guided by these two principles, several consequences would follow:

(a) Less emphasis, or perhaps no emphasis at all, will be placed on undertakings such as those in the Lend-Lease Agreement exacted by one country from another.

(b) We should not think of reductions in one tariff being a sort of quid pro quo for reductions in another tariff, but those tariffs would be brought under review which constituted obstacles to full employment or specialization.

(c) Special consideration might be given to the need for exports of countries which are relying on export trade not merely as a means of obtaining full employment for their citizens but primarily as a means of paying for debts and of procuring the imports which they need. Exports are not the only means of ensuring full employment but they are the only means of paying debts.

(d) Tariffs which were essential in order to diminish reliance on imports by countries which found difficulty in meeting their debts and paying for their imports would, on the other hand, be viewed much more tolerantly.

(e) Some bilateral or barter agreements might even be considered as desirable in the general interest, though if they interfered seriously with full employment and specialization they would be condemned just as strongly as they are now condemned by those who denounce bilateral trade as such.

(f) The type of approach which has been indicated would concentrate attention on the real objectives of international trade and not on the rules of the game or on specific undertakings. It would, therefore, to some extent reverse the burden of proof and place those countries in the position of having to apologize for their policies which were promoting any measures hostile to full employment and specialization. A country would not be drawn to say "We have promised to reduce trade barriers but cannot do so because of special conditions which we did not foresee or to which we did not give adequate weight," but a country might have to say "We asked for undertakings and enunciated policies which will not conduce to international objections for nations which have the welfare of humanity at heart."

(g) Any restrictions which it might be sought to impose on security grounds or to satisfy political pressures would naturally be subjected to the most severe scrutiny.

(h) Finally the transitional period would have to be viewed as one in which planning was of supreme importance in order to facilitate the emergence of the normal period. It would not be a period during which concessions would be made to political pressures with impunity but a period during which political pressures would have to be encountered with resolution.

Is our rigidly practical, ad hoc, approach to these questions really justifying itself?[42]

Dear Mr. Robertson,

You and the members of your Department will already be quite familiar, both through despatches† which I have sent to you and the position taken by Australian officials at recent international conferences, with the importance which the Australian Government attaches to securing an international agreement pledging countries to pursue policies of full employment and rising living standards, as a basic approach to all international economic collaboration. I believe that the attitude of the Canadian Government and its economic advisers is rather different.

I think that you consider that the freeing of international trade will, itself, promote high levels of employment and real income, and that the removal of obstacles to international trade must not await the achievement of something approaching full employment through domestic measures in each country.

Whatever your position on this subject, I think it will be very helpful to me if you could send me a statement indicating the Canadian attitude to the policy consistently advocated here that the approach to international economic relations must be through domestic full employment.

Yours faithfully,

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
au haut commissaire en Australie

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in Australia

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, October 10, 1944

Dear Mr. Davis,

I am referring to your letter of September 14th in which you ask about the Canadian views concerning the importance attached by the Australian Government to securing an international agreement pledging countries to pursue policies of full employment. At various international conferences the representatives of Australia have advanced the view that their Government, and indeed all Governments, will have to provide for the full employment of their people. This will be a political necessity as well as economic good sense. They further argue that international trade flourishes and that it is politically possible to lower tariffs and to remove other trade barriers when full employment and general prosperity exist. Unemployment, they say, gives rise to trade barriers.

As against this position in its extreme form it can be contended that a country which uses trade barriers to secure full employment builds up a number of vested interests which could not withstand the impact of foreign competition. In order to maintain this unsound economic structure, it may then find itself compelled to continue to restrict trade. It would obviously be preferable if full employment could be attained in the face of international competition which would prevent the creation and growth of uneconomic industries.

At some conferences, for instance the Food Conference, the Australian representatives have objected to limiting protection to suitable industries. The representatives of India took a similar line. It seems to follow that the Australian objective is not merely full employment but also some degree of diversification in industry even if the effect is to reduce the general level of prosperity.

With this introduction I may quote from a memorandum prepared in the Department of Finance concerning the Australian position at recent conferences:

"The Australian proposal for an international agreement on full employment policy was brought up in London discussions of February-March, 1944. It was at first suggested that under it a country would agree to pursue policies of full employment, furnish statistics of employment to an international body and participate in a conference of senior officials when serious unemployment threatens, and that it would be free to urge that unemployment developing in other countries (e.g., U.S.) prevented it from adhering to its obligations under any monetary agreement, commercial agreement, et cetera. The last part of the proposal was quickly withdrawn. In its amended form, Canadian officials gave moderate support to the proposal. They questioned whether a pledge to other governments to maintain full employment was more binding than a pledge to one's own people. They refused to recognize any priority of the employment proposal over monetary and trade proposals, and refused to consider making other agreements contingent on the employment agreement.

A similar proposal was made at the I.L.O. meeting in Philadelphia, but I am not aware that Canadian delegates took any strong stand. The U.S. was strongly opposed to it.

A resolution was moved at Bretton Woods to the effect that countries should be invited to sign the employment agreement at the same time they signed the monetary agreement. Canadian delegates again stated that they had no objection to the Australian proposal as such though they thought it could well be combined with a resolution on international trade and other matters. They did object, however, to any suggestion that signature of the monetary agreement should be contingent on signature of the employment agreement, and argued that this was implied in the invitation to sign simultaneously. They were unable to avoid the conclusion that the chief purpose of the Australian proposal was to provide Australia with an excuse for renouncing other agreements if a depression developed after the war. In other words, Australia would qualify her acceptance of obligations under all economic agreements. They were careful, however, to avoid opposing the substance of the Australian proposal.

The United States registered very strong opposition to the Australian proposal. They recognized the same objections that Canada had raised, but their chief objection was political. Such an agreement in their view would brand Bretton Woods as a New Deal enterprise, and jeopardize the chances of Congressional approval."

The Australian doctrine of full employment, if ruthlessly applied, might place processing countries, such as the United Kingdom and Japan, in an almost impossible position since they must import and pay for raw materials and foodstuffs. At one remove, therefore, the Australian policy would be awkward for countries including Australia herself which rely on being able to sell primary products to processing countries. It, therefore, seems unlikely to us that there is any reason to expect that a ruthless or doctrinaire application will be given to the Australian policy. It serves as a theoretical defence against a demand for the removal of trade barriers and the reduction of tariffs. It has a strong basis in the fact that, if full employment cannot be attained consistently with a high level of international trade, the political demands for protective measures are likely sooner or later to become irresistible. It is, however, in our view a dangerous doctrine if it is used to prevent or to handicap an effort to secure full employment together with international specialization.

Yours sincerely,

N. A. ROBERTSON

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 125 London, January 20, 1945

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Addressed Canada and Union of South Africa, repeated to Australia and New Zealand and His Majesty's Ambassador, Washington.

During Article VII discussions with Dominion officials in London in March, 1944, it was agreed, subject to approval of Ministers, that Australian draft of an International Employment Agreement, as amended, should be put forward to United States authorities as an essential and central part of arrangements for implementing Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement and the Atlantic Charter. Subsequently, matter was raised by Australian delegation in Philadelphia at I.L.O. Conference which, although it did not accept proposal that Conference should recommend Governments to enter into undertakings on lines of Australian draft agreement, passed resolution recommending to Governments that, in association with Governing Body of I.L.O., a Conference of Government representatives should be called at an early date to consider an International Agreement on domestic policies of employment and unemployment. Australian Draft Agreement was also tabled at International Monetary Conference at Bretton Woods, but was held to be outside terms of reference of that Conference which confined itself to recommending to Governments that they should reach agreement as soon as possible on ways and means whereby they may best facilitate by cooperative effort, harmonization of national policies of Member States designed to promote and maintain high levels of employment and progressively rising standards of living, which, [sic] towards end of last year, Government of Australia suggested to us that joint approach should be made by them, New Zealand Government and United Kingdom Government to United States Government to ask whether they would join in calling an Employment Conference or would attend such a Conference if called. Text, which Australian Government have subsequently suggested should be used as basis for this joint approach and with which we are in general agreement, is contained in a following telegram.†

3. We have fully in mind that the subject is one which falls within field of Article VII discussions, but in our view this need not preclude the calling of a separate Conference to consider it and, in view of great importance attached by Australian and New Zealand Governments to the holding of such a Conference, we have agreed to support their proposal. Accordingly, we are instructing United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington to concert with his Australian and New Zealand colleagues with a view to joint approach being made to United States Government in the near future. If United States reaction to this approach is favourable, we intend to suggest as next step that discussions should be held between officials of the four Governments regarding agenda, scope and objective of the Conference in order that ground may be carefully prepared before invitations to Conference are issued. Arrangements would, of course, be made for keeping in touch with other Commonwealth Governments during these discussions. We should also propose that Russian, French, Chinese and perhaps other Governments should be informed of proposal to hold Conference prior to any public announcement.

4. In meantime, question of action to be taken to implement I.L.O. resolution referred to above is coming up for consideration at meeting of Governing Body of I.L.O. and its Employment Committee now being held in London. At this meeting we are taking the line that Employment Committee might usefully consider manner and extent to which Governing Body of I.L.O. would wish to be associated with any Intergovernmental Employment Conference that may be called. We do not intend to mention at this meeting the contemplated approach to United States Government.

5. We associate ourselves with the hope of the Australian and New Zealand Government that course of action proposed above will commend itself to Governments of Canada and Union of South Africa and that they will be prepared to give their active support to attempts to press forward with the project for an International Employment Conference. Grateful if any comments you may have at this stage could be telegraphed to us and repeated to Australia and New Zealand at an early date. On assumption that you will see no objection to the proposals, our aim would be that joint approach should be made on January 29th.

SECRET January 23, 1945

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I was interested to read Dominions Office telegram No. 125 of January 20th addressed to Canada and South Africa, reporting plans for an International Conference to discuss the Australian draft of an International Employment Agreement.

The United Kingdom Government has apparently agreed to concert with the Australian and New Zealand Governments in an approach to the United States Government in the near future. I should be interested to know whether the Australian Government at any time asked the support of the Canadian Government in such an approach.

Australian methods of Commonwealth co-operation are interesting to study. In spite of their anxiety to achieve more formal methods of communication, it has seemed to me that their chief policy is to consult members of the Commonwealth other than Great Britain much less frequently than is the custom of the Canadian Government. It may very well be, of course, that our economic authorities had in an informal way made it clear to the Australians that we were not in sympathy with their proposals. My impression has been, however, that although we have been very cautious about the rather sweeping Australian proposals on the subject of full employment we have not taken a definite stand against them at international conferences. Perhaps the discussions over the Mutual Aid Agreement[43] led the Australians to consider us unfriendly on this subject. There seems a possibility that Australia is going to consider Commonwealth collaboration only in terms of New Zealand and the United Kingdom. You may, of course, be perfectly happy to be left out of this approach, and I dare say that you are not considering a resentful note to Canberra. Nevertheless, these events may prove to be useful for reference if Australia again revives her plans for greater co-operation and co-ordination of policy.

Yours sincerely,

J. W. HOLMES

INTERNATIONAL EMPLOYMENT AGREEMENT; AUSTRALIA-NEW ZEALAND PROPOSALS

4. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported that, at the instance of the government of Australia, the U.K. government had agreed to associate themselves in a joint approach to the U.S. government in proposing an early conference with the object of concluding an "international employment agreement."

It was argued in the text to be used in submitting the proposal to the United States that the achievement of a high and stable level of employment in all countries was one of the main objectives of international co-operation and that agreement upon fundamental conditions in this field was a necessary complement to agreements already negotiated upon other classes of subjects.

The hope had been expressed that Canada and South Africa would be prepared to give active support to the project and our comments had been requested.

(Telegrams, Dominions Office to External Affairs, Circ. D. 125 and No. 14,† Jan. 20, 1945).

5. MR. ROBERTSON read and commented upon the Australian government's proposed note to the United States.

Australian representatives on other occasions had taken the view that arrangements for full employment should take priority over international commercial agreements. So far, the United Kingdom and the United States had been inclined to agree with the Canadian viewpoint that employment questions were dependent, in large measure, upon satisfactory understandings for the removal of trade barriers and that efforts in this direction should receive first attention.

It was to be feared that the Australian proposal might raise hopes yet have little practical effect, and that it might result in a setback to more important multilateral commercial agreements.

Canada could not very well oppose such a meeting, the general objectives of which, as stated, being unexceptionable, but if the conference were to take place, it should be made quite clear that the prior achievement of full employment should not be a prerequisite to the removal of tariffs and trade restrictions.

6. THE PRIME MINISTER questioned the desirability of holding another international conference at this stage of the war. It would constitute an untimely distraction from the main task, and with little likelihood of achieving results of practical value.

There was a danger, too, that an international conference on this subject would be taken as a way of escape from essential collaboration in the freeing of international trade.

7. THE ASSOCIATE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS referred to the difficulties which the government had encountered in concluding a Mutual Aid Agreement with Australia.

In this connection it would be important, in any international agreement on the subject, to guard against the implication that full employment must be achieved before effective national action could be taken toward the freeing of international trade.

8. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE was apprehensive as to possible isolationist implications which might be read into an international agreement on employment.

It should be remembered that a substantial proportion of Canadian manpower was engaged in occupations dependent upon exports. Full employment in Canada was inextricably linked with the maintenance of a full measure of international trade.

9. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs prepare a draft telegram to the U.K. government based upon the foregoing discussion.[44]

Le sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au deuxième secrétaire, le haut commissariat en Grande-Bretagne

Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Second Secretary, High Commission in Great Britain

Dear Mr. Holmes,

You wrote to me on January 23rd about the Australian proposal for an international conference on full employment policies. The only word that we have received on this subject since the two Dominions Office telegrams of January 20th, apart from your despatch A-39 of February 12th,† has been a telegram of February 3rd† from the High Commissioner in Canberra. In this Mr. Davis reported that he had heard that officials of the United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand missions in Washington made a joint approach to Mr. Clayton, the Assistant Secretary of State, at which Mr. Clayton indicated distinctly that he did not favour such a conference and promised a furnish a reply in writing later on.

Mr. Davis added that the Australian official most concerned with the matter was very annoyed at the way in which it had been handled since the heads of the three diplomatic missions did not themselves make the approach which was addressed to Mr. Clayton at a time when both the President and the Secretary of State were in Washington.

We have not ourselves expressed any view to the Australian Government on their proposal nor have we indicated that we should object to a conference on employment policies. At various international discussions at which the question had been raised by the Australians (including the talks in London a year ago, the International Labour Conference at Philadelphia and the Bretton Woods meeting), I think that the Canadian representatives have confined themselves to pointing out that it was impossible to consider employment policies in isolation and that progress should be made simultaneously in dealing with commercial and financial international cooperation.

I think that you are right in suggesting that we are happy to have been omitted from the recent approach in Washington. As you point out, the lack of consultation with us is something to keep in mind for possible use in other connections.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

Mr. Homer S. Fox,

These discussions took place at the hotel Chateau Laurier, in Ottawa, on July 14 and 15, 1945. They were held for the purpose of exploring further the various methods of implementing tariff reductions in connection with the proposed multilateral agreement on commercial policy. The discussions were arranged at an earlier meeting between Canadian and American officials which took place in Washington on July 9 (see memorandum of July 9, 1945,† summarizing the results of this meeting).

Mr. Robertson opened the discussion. He said that before going into the details of the various methods of selective tariff reduction he wished to make clear the Canadian view regarding the proposal for the horizontal reduction of all duties by a uniform percentage. He said that the Canadians were deeply disappointed and dismayed by the change in the American position which, prior to the passage of the Trade Agreements Act, had seemed tentatively to favor the proposal for horizontal tariff reduction. He recognized that difficulties had been created by the Trade Agreements Act but felt that they might not be insuperable. With regard to selective methods of tariff reduction he expressed the view that any selective method would be "hopelessly inadequate" to the needs. He thought that failure to go forward with the horizontal cut would mean the loss of three great advantages:

1. Timing. Of all times the present offers the best chance of effecting substantial trade-barrier reduction in all the major trading countries. Because of economic dislocation in Europe and reconversion in other areas, production and trade are in a state of flux. This would be the psychological moment, here and elsewhere, for bold action. If the selective method is adopted this opportunity would be lost.

2. Preferences. Horizontal tariff reduction would have substantially solved the problem of preferences, which is certain to be the most difficult problem from the viewpoint of the United States. There is no hope for any really substantial action on preferences under the selective method of tariff reduction. Moreover, under the selective method, the United States would have to pay more for what it gets. Finally, preferences cannot be handled at all by a purely bilateral approach. Since the protection afforded under a preferential system extends to foreign as well as home industries they must be attacked by dealing with several countries at once. Selective tariff negotiations involving several countries are complicated and slow.

3. Compulsion of outsiders. Under the plan for horizontal tariff reduction it would have been possible to compel reluctant countries to participate in the plan by threatening to withhold the tariff benefits if they did not participate. This would have been politically feasible internationally because the requirements under the plan for a horizontal tariff cut would be equitable, simple, and easily understandable. Any selective method of tariff reduction would be complicated and to some extent inequitable via-à-vis outsiders and could not well be used as a weapon to force them in.

Because of the great advantages of, and need for, tariff reduction by the horizontal method, Mr. Robertson said that the Canadians had been wondering whether there was not some way to overcome the obstacles to the adoption of that method which had been created by the Trade Agreements Act. What appeared to be needed was an opportunity to take the matter up with Congress. Such an opportunity might be created, he thought, if other countries would take the lead and come out with the plan for horizontal tariff reduction. Or perhaps an opportunity would exist if the United States and Canada should endeavour to negotiate a trade agreement and if, because of the great difficulty Canada would have in granting us certain key concessions involving preferential protection to third countries (e.g. raisins, coal, tinplate, and fruits), the negotiations should fail. With regard to the question of other countries taking the lead, Mr. Robertson remarked that Mr. Clayton had appeared to think there were possibilities in this suggestion when it was originally put forward at the July 9 meeting in Washington.

In response to the foregoing it was stated on the American side that, as Mr. Clayton had indicated, the door was not completely closed to consideration or discussion of the horizontal tariff formula in the event other methods should fail. Nevertheless, both Mr. Acheson and Mr. Clayton were firmly convinced that, even apart from considerations growing out of the increased trade-agreements authority, legislative approval of the plan for horizontal tariff reduction could not be obtained and that it would be virtually useless to make the attempt. It was stated also that although other countries would of course be free to take the lead if they desired to do so, an initial approach by other countries might do more harm than good since Congress might feel that an effort was being made to put something over on the United States. If there was to be any approach to Congress at all, it would seem preferable as a first step for the Administration to talk directly and frankly with the congressional leaders. As to the possibility of creating an opportunity through an arranged failure of trade-agreement negotiations, this seemed clearly out of the question. In short, the obstacles in the United States to adoption of the horizontal plan were very formidable and the chances of its ultimate acceptance by our Congress were remote. On the other hand the United States was fully prepared to make substantial tariff reductions on a selective basis and had the ability to make such reductions effective under the increased authority in the Trade Agreements Act. It would be extremely unfortunate if we should neglect to grasp this opportunity to make substantial progress in the trade-barrier field in a vain effort to obtain an ideal solution.

Mr. Robertson then said that although the United States might be able to deliver selective tariff reductions, this did not mean much since the selective method was clearly inadequate to meet the requirements. It would be better to take even a long chance on an adequate plan, such as the horizontal approach.

Trial of the horizontal approach would be desirable in any event, since even its failure would have good results in stimulating countries to carry through a selective approach more vigorously.

In response to a question, Mr. Robertson expressed the view that failure of the United States to sponsor the plan for horizontal tariff reduction from the beginning would not be fatal to its success provided that the United States finally came along. He admitted, however, that the absence of vigorous initial support by the United States would weaken the effort vis-à-vis other countries.

The foregoing discussion occupied Saturday morning, July 14. Saturday afternoon and Sunday afternoon were devoted primarily to an examination of the various selective methods of tariff reduction:

1. Reduction of the over-all ad valorem equivalent of the tariff. It was explained by the American group that under this proposal each country would, in addition to accepting provisions regarding non-tariff trade barriers (e.g. abolition of quotas), agree to make such selective tariff reductions as would bring down the over-all ad valorem equivalent of its tariff by an agreed percentage, low duties (say rates of 10%) being disregarded for this purpose. Under this proposal the United States procedure would be (a) to issue a unilateral statement, or "White Paper," outlining the whole plan and calling for an international trade conference to discuss it, and (b) simultaneously with the issuance of the unilateral statement, to hold public hearings under the Trade Agreements Act on approximately 500-800 tariff items on which the United States would consider granting concessions to the other participating countries, as a group. After the hearings had been held, the United States would be in a position to state, at the international trade conference, the particular percentage of over-all tariff reduction which it would be prepared to support. In effecting the over-all reduction of its tariff each country would be free to decide what individual tariff reductions should be made, that is, particular tariff reductions would not be subjected to the bargaining process.

The advantages of the foregoing proposal, it was stated by the American group, were: (a) it would affect tariff reductions rapidly, and (b) since it would provide certainty as to the general extent of tariff reduction, it might make it possible to obtain firm commitments for the abolition of quotas and the removal or relaxation of other non-tariff trade barriers.

In presenting the foregoing proposal, the American group stated that although no final decision had been reached on the point, Mr. Acheson had expressed serious doubt that the plan could be effected under the Trade Agreements Act.

Apart from the doubt raised as to whether the United States could carry through on the plan for reduction of the over-all ad valorem equivalent of the tariff, the Canadian group felt that there were several objections to it:

(a) If each participating country were free to select the items for tariff reductions, other participating countries would have no assurance that individual items important in their export trade would be benefited. The only way to provide such assurance would be to negotiate the reductions. It would be extremely difficult, and probably impossible, to carry on such negotiations multilaterally.

(b) The plan would have some of the drawbacks of unilateral tariff reduction, i.e. each government would have to bear the whole responsibility for determining the individual reductions in its tariff and could not defend any particular reduction on the ground that it was essential to a bargain with foreign countries.

(c) The application of the tariff formula would be full of technical problems. The existence in the tariffs of several nations of seasonal rates of duty, tariff quotas, and other devices would make it difficult to determine how to weight statistically the contribution to the general lowering of the tariff or reductions on items affected by such devices.

2. Proposal for selective tariff reduction by a "substantial amount." This proposal was presented by the American group as being substantially the same as proposal 1, above, with certain modifications designed to remove any question as to its feasibility under the Trade Agreements Act. Under this proposal, the tariff section of the "white paper" to be issued by the United States would merely call for tariff reduction by a "substantial amount." The international conference would be called and agreement would be reached on the non-tariff provisions conditionally upon the completion of "substantial" tariff reduction. The United States would then hold hearings under the Trade Agreements Act, on the basis of which it would formulate a schedule of tariff concessions to be offered to all other countries as a group, conditional upon the offer by each of the other countries of a schedule containing equivalent tariff concessions. Such schedules would be considered equivalent if they reduced the over-all ad valorem equivalent of the tariff by the same percentage i.e. each country's tariff by the same percentage, i.e. each country's tariff would be uniformly reduced by say 25 percent, on the average.

The Canadian view was that proposal 2 would be impracticable since the precise extent of tariff reduction would not be known at the time that conditional agreement was reached on the non-tariff provisions. Countries utilizing primarily non-tariff controls would be inclined to take the position that the extent of tariff reduction which finally emerged in the schedules, whatever that might be, was not "substantial" enough to justify carrying out the conditional agreement reached earlier on the non-tariff barriers. This would involve endless argument and negotiation and would probably require the holding of another conference.

3. Proposal for bilateral offers of tariff reductions by the United States precedent to a multilateral agreement on tariffs and non-tariff trade barriers. This proposal was presented by the American group as an approach which would be practicable under the Trade Agreements Act and which would assure other countries, at the time their agreement is sought on the abolition of quotas and the removal or relaxation of other non-tariff trade barriers, of the extent to which the United States would be willing to reduce its tariff. Under this proposal, the procedure for issuing a "white paper" and calling an international conference would be the same as in 2, above. However, at the time of issuance of the "white paper," the United States would issue public notice of intention to negotiate bilateral tariff agreements with a number of foreign countries, including the major British countries. By the time the conference was ready to convene, the United States would have made definite offers of substantial tariff reductions to be incorporated in bilateral agreements with the countries for which public notice had been issued. This earnest of good faith on the part of the United States with regard to its tariff, might make it possible for the conference to agree on a multilateral agreement containing (a) firm commitments on non-tariff trade barriers and (b) a general undertaking to reduce tariffs by a "substantial amount" through bilateral agreements.

The Canadian group expressed the view that the machinery of proposal 3 was defective in that it did not provide for an earnest of good faith as to the extent of tariff reduction in agreements between third countries. In order to remedy the defect it would be necessary to have the conference preceded by bilateral tariff negotiations between such third countries as well. It seemed obvious that this could not be done if too many countries were involved, but it might be achieved among a relatively small nucleus of countries, say 8 to 12 of the major trading nations. The Canadian group was also of the opinion that in any event it would be undesirable to attempt to secure agreement by the method of holding a general international conference. They expressed the view that, judging from past experience, the presence at a general international conference of the less important, and for the most part protectionist-minded, countries, would inevitably result in a watering-down of the commitments which a smaller number of the major trading nations might find it possible to enter into. The Canadian group accordingly suggested the following modification of proposal 3:

A nuclear group of 8 to 12 countries would agree on the following procedure:

(1) Each member of the nuclear group would immediately begin to negotiate bilateral agreements with each other member of the nuclear group,[48] such agreements to incorporate substantial tariff reductions. In order to speed negotiations and assure the general extent of tariff reduction, an informal "working rule" might be adopted that the tariff reductions to be granted by each country should be such as to reduce the over-all ad valorem equivalent of the duties on imports from each other member of the nuclear group by not less than x percent. It might also be agreed that 10 percent duties need not be reduced and would not be counted for the purpose of determining the weighted average reductions.

The following note was in the original:

It was generally agreed in subsequent discussion that agreements between all the theoretically possible pairs of countries would not be necessary and that agreements might be dispensed with in cases where trade between a particular pair of countries was negligible.

The tariff reductions effected by the bilateral agreements would be required to be generalized to all members of the nuclear group. With regard to the treatment of tariff preferences, the following rules might be adopted:

(a) Preference-receiving countries would agree to waive their contractual rights to bound margins, thus permitting the preference-granting countries to reduce or remove margins of preference in agreements with other countries. This rule would apply during the negotiations among the nuclear group but might be adopted permanently.

(b) Reductions of most-favoured-nation rates would automatically operate to reduce or remove margins of preference, i.e. they would not be accompanied or followed by reductions in preferential rates.

(c) No margin of preference would be increased. Thus, if any preferential rate were reduced in a bilateral agreement between, say, Canada and Australa, the most-favoured-nation rate would have to be reduced to the same extent.

(2) The nuclear group of countries would also agree on provisions dealing with non-tariff trade barriers. These provisions would be the same for all members of the nuclear group and presumably would be negotiated through a multilateral commitee of some kind.

(3) When the negotiations under (1) and (2) had been completed, the resulting agreements would be concluded among the nuclear group, prior to the convening of a general international trade conference.

(4) The purpose of the international trade conference would be to discuss: (a) How other countries should be brought into the arrangement and (b) what treatment countries participating in the arrangement should accord to the trade of countries refusing to participate. These questions would, of course, require the re-examination of existing most-favoured-nation commitments.

The Canadian group was of the opinion that the nuclear proposal outlined above appeared to be the most promising of the various methods of selective tariff reduction which had been discussed. The American group was inclined to agree with this view, but had reservations as to (a) the possibility, under the Trade Agreements Act, of adopting even informal "working rules" regarding the percentage of tariff reduction to be achieved, and (b) the desirability of actually concluding the arrangements among the nuclear group prior to the holding of a general international trade conference at which the views of other countries would be obtained. In this connection, the Canadian group appeared to feel strongly that the arrangements among the nuclear group should not be kept open and thereby made subject to changes at the general conference.

With regard to the countries which would form the nucleus, discussion between the American and Canadian groups resulted in the following tentative list: United States, United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, France, Netherlands, Belgium, U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia and India.

There was a brief discussion of the possible tariff requirements which might be made of new members under the nuclear approach. There appeared to be two main possibilities: (a) the weighted average reduction of the tariffs of the nuclear group might be calculated and new members might then be required to make the same over-all percentage reduction in their tariffs, or (b) new members might be required to negotiate their way in by entering into bilateral agreements with each of the countries making up the nuclear group. It was agreed by both the Canadian and American groups that new members would, of course, be required to adhere to the non-tariff provisions of the arrangement.

With regard to the withholding of tariff reductions from the trade of outsiders, it was generally agreed that the reductions should be generalized to all countries for a probational period. Whether or not it would be feasible to withdraw the benefits after the expiration of the probational period would largely depend upon the possibility of working out a basis of adherence by outsiders which would be accepted as reasonable and equitable.

Near the close of the discussion the Canadian group suggested that it might be possible, in connection with either a trade agreement between the United States and Canada or a more general arrangement to which both countries were parties, to provide for duty-free treatment on both sides of the border in respect of certain products traded in both directions. The Canadian group attached considerable importance to this possibility, stating that there were a number of cases (e.g. automotive items) where, although tariff reductions would not be of much help, free trade between the two countries would bring substantial reciprocal benefits. Since any such arrangement would require legislative approval in the United States, it might be provided for in a protocol which could be submitted separately to Congress. The American group agreed to report this suggestion and to urge that serious consideration be given to it in Washington.

In concluding the meeting the Canadian group emphasized again their strong preference for the plan for a horizontal tariff cut and expressed the hope that the United States would eventually see its way clear to attempting that approach.

is reporting this discussion by air mail. In the meantime, you will have received a telegram from the Dominions Office† containing their appreciation of commercial position and a summary of instructions which are going forward to their representative in Washington.

2. The only comments I made at today's meeting on proposed declaration of principle concerning preferential policy were:

1. In proposing that there should be in no circumstances any increase in margins of preference, United Kingdom should be clear in their own minds as to base line from which such undertaking would be operative. (Cf. position of British preferences enlarged by wartime suspension duties in Canada on United Kingdom goods).

2. I thought any declaration of general policy respecting modification of preference as part of the general commercial policy arrangements should make it clear from the start that reductions in margins of preference were only to be brought about by reduction of duties on foreign products and in no case by increase in duties on Commonwealth goods.

3. Board of Trade representative did not argue against this general decision, but thought our interest could be safeguarded in intra Commonwealth agreement envisaged for pre-negotiation waiver of fixed margins of preference. Ends.

[London,] October 12, 1945

My dear Prime Minister,

The Washington discussions, with all that they imply as regards Imperial Preference, have now reached a stage at which we feel that it would be very helpful if we could take advantage of the presence in London of yourself and Dr. Evatt to discuss with you the issues which are arising, and to benefit from your counsel on questions which affect us all so materially.

With this in mind, we are hoping to arrange a meeting here at 12 noon on Monday, to which Dr. Evatt will be coming; and both the Prime Minister and I hope very much that you too will find it possible to be present yourself. I am sorry that we have not been able to give you longer notice, but if you can find the date and time convenient, I personally shall be very grateful to you.

Yours very sincerely,

HUGH DALTON

Mémorandum du Premier ministre
Memorandum by Prime Minister

CONFIDENTIAL [London,] October 13, 1945

While I was talking with Lieutenant Douglas Robertson, a note was handed me marked "Immediate" and "By Hand" from the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a slip marked "Urgent." I asked Robertson to excuse me while I opened the letter which was one from Dalton stating that a meeting had been arranged for 12. noon on Monday at which Dr. Evatt will be present to deal with the question of Imperial preferences, and matters arising out of the Washington discussions — asking if I could be present at 12. noon on Monday.

As soon as Robertson left, I re-read the letter and finding myself completely shaken by the continuous interruptions of the morning, with nothing overtaken, I realized that I was once again just about at the breaking point.

Handy[51] came in at this stage with a note saying that "a message has just been received from the Office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that the Chancellor will be presiding at the meeting on Monday." Also with directions as to how to telephone, etc.

I felt I would have to make a decision at once. First of all, I am not in a position to discuss financial and trade questions. I have not come over for that purpose and I should not without having had a prior conference with my colleagues in the Cabinet, wish to undertake so great a responsibility. In the second place, the mention that Evatt would be present and that the idea was to have opinion expressed from himself and myself, by no means added to my desire to be on hand at any discussion on that question with him.

Robertson had told me late last night that the meeting had been fixed for yesterday at Dominions Office to discuss matters with Evatt but he had not turned up. This meeting was being arranged so as to meet his convenience on Monday as he leaves for Washington a day or two afterwards.

Realizing the vast significance of the question, I thought it best to get on the telephone myself direct with Mr. Dalton's office. I got his private secretary. Asked once or twice who it was I was speaking to, each time got the reply "The Chancellor's Private Secretary." I then said to him I had received this note. While I was anxious to help in every way possible, I did not feel I was in a position to discuss questions of Imperial preferences or financial matters at this time and without prior consultation with members of my own Cabinet. That I would hope, therefore, it would not be necessary for me to be present at any meeting of the Cabinet.

The private secretary, whoever he was, said that the Chancellor would be very disappointed and I rather inferred from his remarks it was up to me to meet the Chancellor's wishes once they had been expressed. I replied I also regretted not being able to be present. I added to what I had said that I had come over on other matters which were not connected with trade or financial questions at all. I also was very tired. In fact, was used up and did not feel in shape to undertake discussion of a matter as important as that to which the Chancellor's letter referred.

J. E. Handy, Personal Secretary to the Prime Minister.

The private secretary still persisted in saying the Chancellor would be sorry to hear I could not come which caused me to repeat with a bit of insistence that I, too, was sorry but I had to consider my position and that of the government.

A few minutes later, the secretary added would I like to be represented in the event of my not being able to come myself. Knowing that Robertson was expecting to be present on Monday though he has left this morning for Holland, and hoped to have a day or two there, was coming back, I said I would have no objection to having Mr. Robertson who was with me attend the meeting to which the secretary replied he would so inform the Chancellor. As the meeting had been arranged, he thought it was best that that course should be followed. Matters were then left in that way. He would forthwith advise the Chancellor.

Le Premier ministre au Chancelier de l'Échiquier
Prime Minister to Chancellor of the Exchequer

London, October 15, 1945

My dear Chancellor,

I regret exceedingly not having found it possible to comply with the request of your letter of October 12th which I received shortly after noon on Saturday.

It was kind of you to say that you felt it would be helpful to yourself and others if advantage could be taken of the presence in London of Dr. Evatt and myself to discuss the issues arising out of the Washington discussions, with all that they imply as regards Imperial preferences; also that the Prime Minister and yourself hoped that it might be possible for me personally to be present at a meeting being arranged for noon today (Monday).

On receipt of your letter I immediately informed your private secretary that, as I had not thus far had opportunity to consider with my colleagues in the Cabinet at Ottawa the all important matters mentioned in your letter, I did not feel at liberty to enter into a discussion of them at this time with yourself and colleagues in London.

Knowing, as I do, how far-reaching any decisions with respect to the Washington discussions and, in particular, questions of Imperial preferences are certain to be, I should not wish to attempt any discussion of them without giving to these matters, in advance, much more thought than, thus far, it has been possible for me to give.

I am, as you know, most anxious, while here, to be of as much help as I can on any matter of mutual interest and concern. I am certain, however, that were

I, to the exclusion of representatives of other nations of the Commonwealth, to join with Dr. Evatt in initiating or in furthering discussion of financial and trade matters with members of the British Cabinet, sooner or later, my position would almost certainly be misunderstood both in Canada and in London.

I am sure, for example, that my colleagues, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Ilsley, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. MacKinnon, would think it strange were I to attempt discussion of these matters, on this particular visit to London, without having had with them some word of prior consultation.

Mr. Norman Robertson, who has been having conversations with officials of the United Kingdom Government on many matters will be present at this morning's meeting. I have asked Mr. Robertson to let you know exactly what my feelings are; also to say how much I regret having had to occasion you or the Prime Minister the slightest disappointment in any matter. I am sure I may rely upon your complete understanding.

With kindest personal regards,
Yours very sincerely,
[W. L. MACKENZIE KING]

The suggestions in para. 4 which you propose to have put forward to the U.S. authorities for incorporation in a statement of principles are in general in accord with our views, provided the statement will make it unequivocally clear that preferences are to be dealt with in conjunction with tariffs. We take this to be your understanding. If, however, you are considering as a quid pro quo for financial aid undertaking not to increase preferences and not to introduce new preferences and to reduce margins when general tariffs are reduced (para. 4 (a) and (b)), we would be obliged to give the question further serious study. We feel it imperative therefore to emphasize the consideration which we regard as all important that preferences cannot be considered apart from tariffs but must be treated as part of trade negotiations looking to reductions in tariffs and as part of satisfactory arrangements on commercial policy generally. Any undertaking to maintain even the status quo toward preferences should be conditional upon the satisfactory outcome of the talks as a whole and could not be operative indefinitely in default of such an outcome.

With reference to para. 5 (1), while we cannot object to your urging a current dateline for preferences, our view is that because we contend preferences are inseparable from tariffs there is a strong case for conceding the adoption of the same pre-war date for both. Ends. Message ends.

DESPATCH A.508 [London,] October 25, 1945

Sir,

With reference to my despatch No. A.483 of the 13th October† concerning the Washington discussions on financial and commercial policy, I have the honour to forward the following further information. It was obtained in the course of a conversation which Mr. Robertson (accompanied by Mr. LePan) had with Sir Wilfred Eady of the Treasury and Mr. J. R. C. Helmore of the Board of Trade on the evening of the 19th October. Sir Wilfred Eady and Mr. Helmore are the opposite numbers in London of Lord Keynes and Sir Percivale Liesching respectively. They are the operative officials who are dealing with the London end of the negotiations.

2. Sir Wilfred Eady warned that, in spite of the atmosphere of cordial sympathy in which the conversations were proceeding, there was still a real danger that the financial talks might break down. If they did, the break would most probably occur over the sterling balances. The United States, in his view, had never fully understood the sterling area and had believed that its working was much more mysterious and occult than was actually the case. Moreover, American businessmen were continually tripping over the regulations which governed the sterling area and were much more conscious of the way it affected their interests than they were of the consequences to themselves of the other topics under discussion. It would also be easy for the opposition in the United States to dramatise this issue; they could represent how iniquitous it was that the United Kingdom sterling area creditors, which they lumped pell-mell together, should not make a uniform contribution to assist the United Kingdom in the same way as it had been suggested the United States should do. For these reasons, he was afraid that the sterling balances might prove the chief stumbling-block in the conversations.

3. He repeated that it would be quite impossible for the United Kingdom to require its sterling area creditors to make a contribution according to any over-all formula, as the United States delegation was still inclined to urge. It was misleading, in fact, to speak of the sterling balances as though they constituted a single financial problem. In reality, they resolved themselves into a number of separate problems which were ultimately political. The great bulk of the sterling balances stood to the credit of India, and no Government in the United Kingdom could face the political consequences of exacting a large contribution from India on the grounds that it was an essential condition of a satisfactory financial agreement with the United States. Another country with large sterling balances was Egypt; and here again the negotiation of an agreement to scale down her balances would be beset by political difficulties. He recalled that the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty came up for renewal in 1946, and he said that the question of a financial settlement with Egypt must be seen in relation to recent Egyptian claims for the acquisition of the Sudan, to Arab unrest over Jewish immigration into Palestine and to the Soviet ambitions in the Mediterranean which had been made manifest at the Conference of Foreign Ministers. Any negotiations looking to the scaling down of the Egyptian balances would be extremely delicate. The conclusion was inescapable that the various creditors must be approached individually. On more general grounds, the United Kingdom was unwilling bluntly to inform her sterling area creditors that they must make a contribution, because of the effect which such a demand would have on her reputation as a borrower. On the other hand, he admitted, in reply to a suggestion from Mr. Robertson, that pressure from the United States might well prove a useful instrument towards securing satisfactory agreements with these individual creditors.

4. If a breakdown occurred in the financial conversations, the Treasury was anxious that it should come over an issue which not only was considered fundamental by the United Kingdom experts and by the Government, but could also be presented to public opinion both in this country and elsewhere in such a way that the soundness and the justice of the United Kingdom's stand would be clearly apparent. The proper treatment of the sterling balances was such an issue, he believed. He enquired whether, if a breakdown came over this question, Canadian opinion would think that the United Kingdom had been justified in refusing to retreat from their position on this point. Mr. Robertson replied that he personally thought such a stand by the United Kingdom would be regarded sympathetically in Canada, even though it led to a breakdown. On the other hand, however sympathetically Canadians might regard the United Kingdom's position if the present conversations resulted in failure, the Canadian Government obviously would have to review afresh all the elements in the situation as it affected Canada and adopt a policy dictated by Canada's interests in the new circumstances.

5. Sir Wilfred reported that the United Kingdom delegation could not have wished for more firm and continuous support than they had obtained from the present Government. Nor could he complain of any lack of understanding of the broad outlines of the problem. On the other hand, opinion in the Cabinet was sometimes ruffled by cross-currents which were not always helpful. In particular, members of the present Government were susceptible to appeals from the other Labour Governments in the Commonwealth and rallied perhaps too easily to the slogan "Labour Governments of the world unite!" This susceptibility should be kept in mind in estimating the present Government's policy both towards preferences and towards the sterling balances. There was also considerable suspicion of United States bankers and, sometimes, excessive optimism that with a controlled economy the United Kingdom could get along satisfactorily without United States aid. The Treasury was under no delusion that this was possible.

6. On commercial policy, Mr. Helmore reported that the Statement of Principles concerning preferences, which you will have seen in paragraph 4 of the Dominions Office telegram No. 1909 of the 12th October,† had now been presented to the United States delegation, and had been rejected by Mr. Clayton as unsatisfactory. Or, to be more exact, Mr. Clayton had said that the Statement would not be sufficient to satisfy Congress. In the course of the evening's conversation, it became apparent that, although the United Kingdom negotiators found Mr. Clayton to be a perfectly fair and open-minded negotiator, they thought that Mr. Vinson[54] understood more fully this country's present difficulties.

[54]F. M. Vinson, secrétaire au Trésor des États-Unis.
F. M. Vinson, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

7. Mr. Robertson asked whether, in the view of United Kingdom officials, the waiver of fixed margins of preference, referred to in 4(c) of Dominions Office telegram No. 1909 of the 12th October, should come before or after the series of bilateral agreements over tariffs and preferences, which it is now hoped will be made in Washington next March. Mr. Helmore replied that he had thought that such a waiver should follow rather than precede the bilateral agreements between the drafting countries. In any case, of course, the bilateral agreements would not come into effect until such waivers had taken place. Later in the evening, however, he remarked that he had more and more been coming to the conclusion that it might be useful to have a Commonwealth conference to consider preferences some time in February, before the March meeting in Washington. Mr. Robertson promised to consider this informal suggestion.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, November 5, 1945

Dear Hume [Wrong]

I am attaching hereto some notes on conversations which I had in Washington recently on the subject of U.K.-U.S. discussions. I do not know whether these notes would be of any use to Norman when he arrives in Washington,[55] but in any event you may wish to send a copy to the Embassy. I am therefore enclosing a duplicate.

I was very interested in the despatch from the High Commissioner in London, dated October 25th, on the subject of Norman's conversation with Sir Wilfred Eady and Mr. J. R. C. Helmore. Referring particularly to paragraph 4 of the despatch, I should think that if the U.K.-U.S. talks were otherwise satisfactory, a breakdown on the subject of sterling balances would be most unfortunate. I can understand that the English will not undertake a commitment to arrange a scaling down through the piece because their creditors are not all in the same position. Moreover, the U.K. is presumably not in a position to guarantee the exact amount by which the balances will be written down. Nevertheless, I think we would share the American view that something substantial should be accomplished in this respect — in spite of the serious political difficulties which the U.K. will face when dealing with India and Egypt.

I have no doubt that when Eady asked for Norman's opinion he got a very reserved answer, and I hope that Eady did not interpret the answer as being too sympathetic.

Yours sincerely,

Notes on conversations in Washington, October 18-24, 1945

On October 18th, at lunch with Lord Halifax, Lord Keynes, R. H. Brand[56] and Gordon Munro,[57] Keynes brought me up to date on their conversations with U.S. officials. Up to that time, the United States had made no specific proposals on the financial side. The conversations had been limited to the U.K.'s exposition of their problem; to questions by the U.S. on this subject; and to the discussions on the subject of preferences and commercial policy arrangements. From the attitude of the U.S. negotiators, it was clear that assistance to the U.K. in the form of retrospective Lend-Lease or a grant-in-aid was impossible, and it seemed likely that the U.S. might endeavour to —

(a) Whittle down the amount of the credit below $5 billions.
(b) Call for payment of interest.
(c) Link the question of preferences with financial aid.
(d) Obtain rather specific undertakings in regard to scaling down of "sterling" balances.

Keynes asked for my views on all these points, and I gave them to him as follows:

(a) Amount of credit: I expressed the view that the U.K. should strenuously resist such a scaling down of the credit as would necessitate the adoption of a policy of extreme austerity in regard to imports. I realized that some degree of austerity was necessary in the best of circumstances. If carried too far on a non-discriminatory basis, the repercussions would be serious not only in countries which had more expansive ideas on the subject of world trade than those held by U.S. negotiators, but perhaps even in the United States itself when they came up against the full force of import restrictions. I asked Keynes if the present drive to save dollars (U.S. and Canadian) was a sample of what could be expected if the U.K. were able to make reasonably satisfactory financial arrangements with the United States. He replied in the negative, adding that the uncertainties of their present position were such that instructions had gone out to economize on dollars in every conceivable way.

(b) On the question of interest rate, I suggested that a nominal rate, say ½ of 1 per cent, would not help U.S. Administration to get Congressional agreement. It would simply muddy the waters. On the other hand, I could see that if the U.S. called for payment of a commercial rate, the U.K. might feel that they could not accept the commitment. I gathered from Keynes that there had been some hint that the Americans might consider a flexible arrangement in respect to the payment of interest, i.e., that it might be deferred in certain circumstances. He asked what I would think of a proposal that interest should be payable only if U.K. exports (and probably invisibles) reached a certain figure. I replied that I did not think the U.K. could object to such an arrangement if the target figure was sufficiently high.

(c) On preferences, I said that I thought the Canadian view (except in this case, I took pains to stress that only personal opinions were being expressed) was strongly against any appearance of policy being amended as a quid pro quo for the loan. I asked if there was not a risk that the U.K. Parliament would be told one thing, and the U.S. Congress another. Keynes thought there was very considerable risk.

(d) Sterling balances: Keynes mentioned one or two suggestions which had been thrown out by the Americans for dealing with the sterling balance problem in some devious way, for example, that the U.S. might make an offer to U.K.'s creditors to discount sterling balances (regarded as blocked and non-interest bearing for a considerable period of years) on a 3 per cent basis, producing U.S. dollars for the creditors for an amount equal to half the nominal U.S. dollar value of sterling sold. The U.K. would then use a portion of their U.S. dollar credit to take over the sterling from the U.S. at the price paid for it by the U.S. For reasons which I need not detail in this memorandum, I expressed the view that such a policy would work out most unsatisfactorily.

On October 19th Brand and Keynes told me about the proposals which had been made by the Americans on the preceding afternoon, i.e., a $3½ billions credit, free of interest or amortization for the first five years, then repayment over the following 50 years with interest at 2 per centum per annum. Keynes had said that the terms were such that he would either have to pack up and go home, or start all over again. Vinson kept the ball in play by making a few jokes, but nothing more conclusive came out of the meeting. By the time I left Washington on October 24th, the British had not received London's reactions to the proposals, and no further financial discussions had taken place.

Mr. Stone and I saw Clayton on October 19th. Mr. Collado[58] and Mr. Hooker (?) attended the meeting. Mr. Clayton said that the financial discussions with the U.K. were going very well indeed, and he expected that a satisfactory arrangement could be made. I had thought that this might very well be his attitude, and, by arrangement with Keynes, was able to say that I knew what the proposals were, and could not share Clayton's optimism. I pointed out that Canada — in common with many other countries — had a vital interest in the discussions. It was our understanding that a financial agreement would include a promise by the U.K. not to practise discrimination in her import policy. If the size or terms of the U.S. credit were such that the U.K. had to keep her imports at an excessively low level during the transition period, then all suppliers of the U.K. would be adversely affected; and indeed for "U.K." one could read "sterling area." I expressed the view that both the political and economic implications of a penurious policy were extremely bad. What had happened to the idea so freely expressed a couple of years ago that post-war policy should be bold and expansive? Did not the present political and economic state of Europe make it more than every necessary that a timorous or restrictive policy should be avoided? — and so forth. Clayton was most agreeable, and gave us all the time we wanted, but did not go far in expressing his own views. I gathered from Keynes that Clayton has taken the lead in the discussions; that they have found him pleasant to deal with, but recently very "wooden". Vinson has kept a good deal to the side-lines. Harry White has been in the background.

I saw Harry White later in the same day, and covered much the same ground as I had with Clayton. Harry White said that he did not think that the U.S. should try to whittle down the credit to the U.K., but that, as a "technician," he had had to express the view that the figures put forward by the English, properly revised, did not indicate that they needed as much as $5 billions from the U.S. I gathered that the U.K. balance of payments figures, on which the discussions have been based, assume an average volume of imports some 10 per cent below pre-war, and assume import and export prices 100 per cent above pre-war.

Harry White asked what post-war credit arrangements we had made with the U.K., mentioning Keynes's pre-Washington visit to Ottawa.[59] I told him that there had been no discussions pending the outcome of the Washington talks. (The English had already told him the same thing.) I said that Canada's approach to the whole problem had been indicated by the suggestions which we put up to the U.K. early this year. I assumed that consideration would be given to the volume of Canadian export trade which it was desired to maintain, and to possible volume of imports from the sterling area, as well as other means of payment available to them. White said that was rather vague. What might it mean in terms of dollars? I replied that if the realistic examination threw out a figure of a billion dollars I did not think that would cause too great a shock. Naturally, I emphasized that these views were personal, and not based on discussions with the U.K., or even on discussions at home. White asked our attitude towards interest payments, and I said the subject had not been discussed.

See Volume 10, Documents 553 and 554.

I saw Vinson a few days later. When the conversation came round to their talks with the U.K., I repeated, but in very abbreviated form, the views expressed to Clayton, and followed the same procedure when Acheson lunched with Stone and myself at the Embassy. Acheson did not appear to know the exact terms of the proposals made by the Americans some days earlier. He said that he thought that the credit under consideration ranged from three and a half to six billions. ("Were our people trying to whittle down the amount?")

Eccles of the Federal Reserve, who has been participating in the discussions, was away. I saw Knapp, who is his right-hand man in this field, as well as Gardner and Goldenweiser, but thought it best to confine myself to some very general expressions of opinion when they brought up the subject of the loan to the U.K.

In general, I formed the view that the Americans were somewhat too confident of their ability to decide the terms of a financial arrangement and too little worried by the implications of an arrangement which left the U.K. in a weak position. They see — or think they see — such prospects for a good demand, domestic and international, for everything the U.S. can produce in the near term future that the selfish interest which the United States has in making a deal that could be regarded as a good one by the U.K. is not as much recognized as it might be. On one occasion I had to listen to the word "humanitarian" being used in connection with U.S. proposals. What Congress would or would not accept is, of course, constantly brought into the conversation; and no real effort has been made to show the problem to Congress or the public in its true light. One reason for this — according to Harry White — is that the Administration, not having made up its mind as to the proper course of action, has nothing to "sell" to the public or Congress.

MOST IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Your telegram D.2069 of November 6th,[†] commercial policy.

We see no objection to your supporting the revised U.S. proposals as a basis of discussions at the proposed international conference on trade and employment. We are, indeed, highly gratified at the progress your negotiators have made and at the degree of agreement reached.

In the discussions at the conference and prior to it we will wish to raise several points such as the number of exceptions in favour of quantitative restrictions and the application of subsidies to agricultural products.

We had hoped that a greater emphasis would have been placed on tariff reductions so that the document might present to the world a more positive programme for the reduction of trade barriers. The understandable concern over preferences has given them relatively an undue prominence in the document. We trust that the revision of the formula mentioned in paragraph (5) of your telegram D. 2069 will redress the balance.

The formula for dealing with preferences given in your telegram D. 2070† is, in general, acceptable to us, on the assumption that the agreement in paragraph 2 (c), that margins of preference on any product will in no case be increased and no new preferences introduced, is conditional upon a satisfactory outcome of the talks as a whole and would not be an undertaking operative indefinitely in default of such an outcome.

Mémorandum du ministère des Finances

MEMORANDUM ON PROPOSALS FOR CONSIDERATION BY AN INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON EMPLOYMENT AND TRADE

The United States is going to make public within the next week proposals for an International Conference on Employment and Trade. It will also issue shortly thereafter invitations to fifteen countries, of whom Canada will be one, to discuss in advance of the Conference the principles which it is proposed that the Conference should adopt, and to undertake negotiations with the United States and with each other of trade treaties for the reduction of tariffs and preferences.

While the announcement will be made by the United States, the proposals will in fact have been agreed to by the United Kingdom in advance and will probably be endorsed publicly by the United Kingdom Government following the announcement from Washington.

These proposals mark the culmination of discussions which have been going on with United States and among Commonwealth Countries since 1942. In most of these discussions Canadian officials have participated, although they are not participating in the present U.K.-U.S. discussions in Washington.

It is hoped that the Conference which the United States will propose will set up a new international body, the International Trade Organization, whose function would be to facilitate co-operation and agreement among member nations on matters of employment and trade, on commodity arrangements, and on the control of restrictive business practices (cartels). The articles of association of the new Organization would set out certain rules and principles for the conduct of international trade by which the members would be bound. These would include specific undertakings on the limitation of subsidies, quotas, import licensing, state trade, etc. They would also include a general undertaking to negotiate reductions in tariffs and preferences.

It is the intention of the United States that the negotiations on tariffs and preferences should be negotiated in advance of the Conference and that, if possible, the fifteen countries initially invited should have completed their negotiations by the time of the Conference, which it is hoped would take place about June 1946.

Prior to the Conference and at the Conference, Canadian representatives will have a considerable number of points to raise as to the principles which should be adopted in regulating the use of certain devices, such particularly as subsidies, quotas, and import licensing. There is no question of the Canadian Government being bound at this time by any of the proposals which the Government of the United States is making.

One of the most difficult points in the discussion between the United Kingdom and the United States has been the approach to preferences. The United States attitude has in the past been that preferences are discriminatory trade practices which should be eliminated. The British have taken the attitude that preferences are merely protectionist devices which should be reduced by negotiation, as other forms of protection are reduced. The draft United States proposals, to which the British are giving agreement as a basis for discussion, follow very closely the line which Canadian officials have maintained consistently over the past three years. Both tariffs and preferences are made the subject of negotiation. In the process of reducing tariffs it is proposed to reduce the most-favoured-nation rates without reducing the preferential rates, thus allowing the margin of preference to contract. The principle to be followed is that preferences are to be reduced through the reduction of tariffs and not reduced by increasing preferential duties. By this process some preferences would be eliminated but others would merely be reduced, and the extent of the reduction would depend on the willingness of the United States to make substantial cuts in her tariff.

In transmitting to the Canadian Government the proposals as agreed at Washington, the United Kingdom Government asked that we should state whether or not we had any objections to the proposals. There is no question of the Canadian Government being bound at this time by the proposals, but since we all have an interest in the ultimate course followed the United Kingdom Government asked the Dominions to state any objection which they might have to the terms of the proposed United States announcement.

A copy of the telegram[60] sent in reply to the United Kingdom's inquiry is attached hereto. It will be noted that the telegram does not commit the Canadian Government but in stating that we saw no objection to the United Kingdom's supporting the proposals, there has been created a presumption that the Canadian Government will be willing to participate in the proposed Conference and in negotiations which may be negotiated prior to the Conference.

au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Ambassador of United States
to Secretary of State for External Affairs

No. 417 Ottawa, December 11, 1945

SECRET

Sir,

Acting under instructions from my Government, I have the honour to communicate to you the following:

The Government of the United States refers to the document "Proposals for Expansion of World Trade and Employment"[61] which has been transmitted to the Government of Canada, and to the proposals of the Government of the United States that the United Nations Organization convene in the summer of 1946 a conference on trade and employment to consider and take action to realize the objectives referred to in that document.

It is the view of the Government of the United States that the success of the proposed conference can best be realized if there is thorough going preparation for it and that such preparation should include concrete plans which the principal trading nations of the world would be prepared to adopt, for the actual reduction of tariff and other trade barriers, and for the elimination of discriminatory trade treatment, in accordance with the objectives agreed upon in notes exchanged November 30, 1942, between the United States and Canada.

The Government of the United States therefore has the honor to ask the Government of Canada whether it would be prepared to appoint representatives to attend a preliminary meeting in March or April of 1946, to be held at a place to be determined. It would be the purpose of the meeting, which would be attended by the other Governments accepting invitations, to:

(a) negotiate for the consideration of the proposed conference, concrete arrangements for the relaxation of tariff and trade barriers of all kinds which would command the support of governments attending the conference; and

(b) to consult, and to reach such preliminary understanding as may be practicable, with regard to other topics on the proposed agenda for the conference referred to above.

In order that the representatives of the United States may make a practical contribution to the work of the preliminary meeting, it will be necessary for the Government of the United States, under the procedure required by the Trade Agreements Act, to issue public notice of intention to negotiate for the reduction of tariff and other trade barriers with the governments intending to participate in that meeting. In view of the public hearings and other procedures required by law this notice should be issued at least three months prior to the beginning of definitive international discussions by the representatives of the United States. Accordingly, the Government of the United States hopes to be able to issue, by the end of this year or early in 1946, a public notice of intention to negotiate with Canada. In order to make this possible, it is urged that the Government of Canada indicate, prior to December 31, 1945, whether it will participate in the preliminary meetings.

In accordance with customary practice, the proposed public notice will be accompanied by a list of the products which will be considered for the granting of trade concessions to Canada and on which public hearings will be held. The list will include those products of which Canada has been, or is likely to become, a principal supplier to the United States.

This invitation is also being sent to the following Governments:

France, United Kingdom, South Africa, New Zealand, Australia, India, Belgium, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Czechoslovakia, Cuba, Brazil, U.S.S.R., and China.

Accept etc.

Excellency,

I have the honour to refer to your note No. 417 of December 11th in which you communicate a message from the Government of the United States regarding the Proposals for Expansion of World Trade and Employment, already transmitted to the Government of Canada, and regarding the conference on trade and employment which it is proposed that the United Nations should convene in the summer of 1946 to consider and take action to realize the objectives referred to in that document.

The Government of Canada is heartily in accord with the view of the Government of the United States that nations should concert their efforts in the sphere of their international economic relations for the purpose of expanding the volume of world trade and maintaining high and stable levels of national employment.

The Canadian Government agrees also that the success of the proposed United Nations conference might best be realized by a thorough preparation including concrete plans, which the principal trading nations of the world would be prepared to adopt, for the relaxation of tariffs and other trade barriers and for the elimination of discriminatory trade treatment.

I am pleased to inform you, therefore, that, in accordance with these objectives and those agreed upon in the exchange of notes which took place on November 30th, 1942, between the United States and Canada, the Government of Canada will be prepared to appoint representatives to attend a preliminary meeting in March or April of 1946, to be held at a place to be determined.

DESPATCH 172 Moscow, May 23, 1944

Sir:

I have the honour to direct your attention to the reply given in the United Kingdom House of Commons on May 16th to two questions asked concerning post-war trade with the Soviet Union. In his reply the President of the Board of Trade referred to discussions taking place between experts of the two countries regarding the kinds and quantities of goods each country could make available to the other for their respective requirements.

2. In order to obtain more particulars regarding these discussions I had an interview on May 20th with Mr. Charles Gifford, the Commercial Secretary of the British Embassy, who has an office separate from the remainder of the Embassy. Mr. Gifford was kind enough to show me his file which indicated that while conversations have been going on between himself and Mr. Krutikov, Vice-Commissar of Foreign Trade, they have not resulted as yet in any very definite results nor have lists yet been produced of the goods each country would like to obtain from the other after the cessation of hostilities with Germany.

3. Developments commenced with two notes verbales submitted by the British Embassy to the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs on February 12, 1944. One of these notes offered a further credit of £25,000,000 under the provisions of the United Kingdom-Soviet Financial Agreement of August 16, 1941. You will recall that under this agreement provision was made for a credit of £10,000,000 to cover purchases of goods outside of the Protocol. This credit became exhausted in June, 1942, when a further credit of £25,000,000 was extended. The new credit, therefore, will bring the total amount extended under the agreement to £60,000,000 and it is expected that this will cover the period to the end of the hostilities with Germany.

4. The second note verbale raised the question of trade between the two countries after the cessation of hostilities with Germany and asked for a list of the orders Soviet organizations contemplated placing with United Kingdom firms and the quantities of Soviet products, particularly lumber and flax, which would probably be available for United Kingdom requirements in the period immediately following the cessation of hostilities with Germany. The note pointed out that so long as hostilities continued with Japan it would be necessary for the United Kingdom Government to give priority to orders for war purposes and it was to examine the situation in this light that they would like to have the list of orders which Soviet organizations contemplated placing with United Kingdom firms. The note concluded by proposing detailed discussions on the subject between the Commercial Secretary of the British Embassy and the People's Commissariat of Foreign Trade.

5. An official reply to these notes was received from the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs in April. This placed the question of long-term credits in the forefront and indicated that the Soviet Government considered the terms of the Financial Agreement of August 16, 1941, to be too onerous for the purposes of trade after the cessation of hostilities with Germany. It was agreed, however, that the Commercial Secretary of the British Embassy should conduct further detailed discussions with the People's Commissariat of Foreign Trade.

6. Since then Mr. Gifford has had several conversations with Mr. Krutikov on the subject. The latter has generally taken the position that it is difficult for them to prepare lists of goods to be exchanged between the two countries until it is known what terms of credit the United Kingdom Government will be willing to furnish to the Soviet Union for the financing of trade during the period immediately after the cessation of hostilities with Germany and prior to the conclusion of a comprehensive commercial agreement regulating trade between the two countries for the subsequent and longer post-war period. The telegrams from London have not ruled out the possibility of the extension of a long-term credit to bridge this period and presumably such a credit will be on terms more favourable to the Soviet Union than the Financial Agreement of August 16, 1941. Mr. Gifford is now awaiting further word on this point from London, where the whole question is being examined by the Treasury.

7. In the meantime Mr. Gifford is encouraged to believe that some progress is being made with the preparation of lists. Mr. Krutikov pointed out that, rather than have the Soviet Government prepare a list of the quantities of lumber, flax and other Soviet products the Soviet Union may be able to supply, the United Kingdom Board of Trade should indicate the quantities of Soviet products they are likely to require. London has hesitated to be committal on this point, pointing out the relation of lumber supplies from the Soviet Union to the general question of trade with Canada after the war. Mr. Gifford is still pressing for action on this Soviet request and believes that, when something more definite is available on the question of credits, London will give him some idea of United Kingdom requirements of Soviet products, whereupon he will receive from Mr. Krutikov a list of the orders Soviet organizations will be desirous of placing in the United Kingdom following the cessation of hostilities with Germany.

8. United Kingdom experience is a valuable guide to what we may expect when we initiate discussions with the Soviet Government on the subject of post-war trade. It is obvious that we shall have to be prepared to discuss terms of credit simultaneously with a discussion about the kinds and quantities of goods the Soviet Union is likely to require from Canada. We shall either have to be prepared to offer the Soviet Government a revolving credit of up to, say, $100,000,000, repayable after five years, or a government guarantee of bank credits covering Soviet purchases of Canadian goods of a like value spread over a period of five years. Any other terms are likely to be less generous than those which will be offered by competing countries and the term of five years for repayment of the credit may prove to be too short. It will be much more difficult for the Soviet Government to prepare a list of the orders their organizations are likely to wish to place in Canada than it will be for them to prepare such a list covering their probable requirements of United Kingdom goods, because Canada, unlike the United Kingdom, has never been a regular source of supply for any of the products imported into the Soviet Union. Apart from the question of credits everything will depend upon the ability of our manufacturers to quote prices competitive with those quoted by other countries. We should profit by United Kingdom experience and point out frankly to the Soviet Government at the outset that, whereas Canadian industry is in a good position to supply the kinds of goods the Soviet Union requires for reconstruction purposes, Canada is not likely to provide an extensive market for Soviet products. We can hold out the hope, however, that after the war Canada should again afford a possible outlet for up to 250,000 metric tons a year of Soviet anthracite coal, and quantities of the other products formerly imported from the Soviet Union in excess of the pre-war volume, as well as a possible new trade in other Soviet products, such as petroleum and manganese, provided always that Soviet prices and other conditions are competitive. We shall have to be careful to forestall any attempt to base the repayment of credits on our acceptance of an equivalent value of Soviet goods, requiring that such repayment be made out of the proceeds of multilateral trade or in gold. The volume of probable shipments of Soviet anthracite coal to Canada should be indicated in advance not with a view to suggesting restriction at the outset but in order to have something to fall back upon in case the United Kingdom maintain their present bargaining mood and decide to exploit the obvious analogy between Canadian purchases of Soviet coal and United Kingdom purchases of Soviet lumber.

9. I should greatly appreciate your comments on the different points brought out in this despatch in order to prepare the ground for subsequent instructions which it may be necessary for you to send me on the whole question of trade between Canada and the Soviet Union after the war.

I have etc.

TELEGRAM 140 Ottawa, July 26, 1944

SECRET. Your despatch No. 172 of May 23rd, post-war trade with U.S.S.R.

1. Your despatch has been extremely helpful in stimulating interest not only in the particular problem of post-war trade with the Soviet Union but in the general problem of post-war export credits.

2. We have discussed your despatch interdepartmentally through the External Trade Advisory Committee and there is general acceptance of the necessity of putting ourselves in a position to extend credits. Enabling legislation is now before the House.[62]

3. With particular regard to the U.S.S.R., if you consider it advisable, you may advise the Soviet Union of the proposed legislation and sound them out as to the terms desired for such a credit if available — in particular the length of the credit, rate of interest and method of repayment.

4. There is evidence of a liberal attitude here toward imports. You and we might well explore at once the possibilities with a view to approaching a balance of trade. However we agree with your views on repayment as expressed in paragraph 8 of your despatch.

5. We are anxious to take prompt advantage of post-war trade opportunities with the Soviet Union. We would like negotiations to be in your hands and would welcome your advice as to what steps we should now take. Suggestions made here include, in addition to credits:

(A) Set industry to work to develop offerings. While we appreciate the overriding importance of long term trade, heavy industry particularly will need exports during the transition period to facilitate orderly reconversion. The continued supply of raw materials by our extractive industries may be possible.

(B) Initiate discussions with the Soviet Union on items clearly in long Canadian supply, chiefly surplus war assets.

(C) Send a mission to the Soviet Union and invite a Soviet mission to Canada. Would it be of assistance to you if we sent you two or three people to aid in the discussions?

6. We would welcome advice as to how the Russians will negotiate. Will direct negotiations with the Canadian industry, with the Government's help, be adequate, or would we fare better by conducting the negotiations on a Government-to-Government basis?

7. There is concern that in our immediate activities we might lose sight of our long run objectives and retard the return to multilateral trade. However, if credits and contracts deal only with trade in the transition period, this may be lessened. In the meantime we feel we cannot let trade opportunities escape because of uncertainties in the general position. As regards long term trade, we cannot at the present time enter into agreements inconsistent with multilateral trade for the establishment of which we are pressing with vigour. Should our efforts fail, we must be prepared to try to hold our own.

SECRET. Your telegram No. 140 of July 26th, regarding post-war trade with Soviet Union.

1. Have appointment with Vyshinsky on July 31st when I shall raise questions relating to post-war trade and suggest that he arrange for me to have preliminary discussions with Commissar of Foreign Trade.

2. First question to be settled is that of credits and then the kinds of goods the Soviet Union is likely to require. It would help me if you could indicate now whether the Canadian Government favours granting of straight credit, revolving credit or guarantee bank credits. Would also appreciate by telegram more information about nature of enabling legislation referred to in paragraph 2 of your telegram.

3. It would be premature to invite offers from Canadian industry or to initiate discussion about items in long Canadian supply until Soviet authorities indicate the kinds of goods they are likely to require. Chief requirements will be in machines and appliances for industry which the United States are better able to supply than Canada. During the first few years consumer goods may be imported in large volume and during this period there will probably be a world shortage of these goods. Demand for raw materials of our extractive industries will be curtailed with cessation of abnormal war demands and Soviet industry should be able to supply bulk of reduced demand. Canadian surplus war assets will be mostly of same type as Soviet surplus war assets, although there may be some openings such as tank spare parts to repair automotive equipment.

4. Proposal for trade mission to Soviet Union may have some merit on publicity rather than practical grounds. Will explore possibilities of this later. Have no need of assistance for preliminary discussions but Commercial Attaché should be assigned to Moscow as already recommended. He will not have much to do until trade becomes active.

5. Regarding paragraph 6 of your telegram, Soviet organisations will place orders direct with Canadian industries (see my despatch No. 111 of August 25th).† Recommend that action of Canadian Government should be confined to granting of credits.

6. Regarding paragraph 7 of your telegram, extension of credits to the Soviet Union for purchase of Canadian goods is consistent with principles of multilateral trade provided that is repaid out of multilateral trade or in gold. We would be foolish to compromise our position or to injure prospects for international trade on a multilateral basis by adopting any practices akin to bilateral balancing even during transitional period. United Kingdom is being compelled to do this by reason of her precarious balance payments position. We shall also have problem of finding United States dollars until multilateral credit is established but trade with Soviet Union on bilateral basis will not help solve this problem. Moreover, capacity of Canadian market to absorb products indigenous to Soviet Union is strictly limited. Canadian industry should be fully occupied during transitional period of supplying deficiency of consumer demand while export trade can provide little help towards solution of problem which will confront heavy and extractive industries because their products will be surplus in all industrial countries. Hence trade with Soviet Union should be approached from long term standpoint and it is essential to guard against undue optimism based on inflated war demands.Ends.

7. Would appreciate if you could send me detailed statistics of Canadian trade with Soviet Union for last six years. Ends.

DESPATCH 249 Moscow, August 5, 1944

SECRET.

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your telegram No. 140 of July 26th regarding post-war trade between Canada and the Soviet Union. I sent you a reply with my telegram No. 219 of July 29th and it now is necessary for me to elaborate in this despatch certain of the points dealt with in that telegram.

2. In paragraph 1 of my telegram No. 219 I stated that I was seeking an appointment with Mr. A. Y. Vyshinsky, Vice-Commissar of Foreign Affairs, on July 31st when I would raise with him questions relating to post-war trade and suggest that preliminary discussions on this subject be conducted with People's Commissar of Foreign Trade. My appointment with Mr. Vyshinsky was duly arranged and I am submitting herewith for your information a copy of a note verbale which I left with him. In taking this step I followed the procedure identical to that taken by the British Embassy when they presented a note verbale to the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs as referred to in paragraph 4 of my despatch No. 172 of May 23rd.

3. We had more than usual difficulty in decyphering your telegram No. 140 of July 26th and in order that there may be no misunderstanding, I am enclosing a copy of this telegram as decyphered at this end[†] and I should appreciate if you could point out any divergencies from the original text.

4. Underlying your telegram No. 140 of July 26th there appears to be the assumption that the Soviet Government will follow the policy of bilateral balancing of trade with the different countries and require Canada to accept Soviet products in repayment of the credit which we propose to extend for the purchase of Canadian goods. We have no indication as yet what will be the post-war policy of the Soviet Government in this respect but I should like to point out that before the war the Soviet Government did not follow the policy of bilateral balancing of imports and exports. They did conclude agreements with European countries on this basis, but this was on the initiative and insistence of the other countries who were parties to these barter agreements. With the rest of the world trade was conducted in accordance with the principles of multilateral trade.

5. The conduct of the State monopoly of foreign trade by the Soviet Government has been governed almost exclusively by commercial considerations ever since it was established in 1918. The trade organizations of the People's Commissariat of Foreign Trade have purchased and sold goods to the best advantage in accordance with the same principles as govern the actions of private traders. The Soviet Government, like any other government, has endeavoured to secure as favourable opportunities as possible for the sale of Soviet products in other markets but they have used their buying power only when absolutely necessary to accomplish this objective.

6. Trade on the multilateral basis is much more satisfactory from the point of view of the State monopoly of foreign trade. This enables the Soviet Union to sell products in those markets where they will bring the highest prices and to purchase those goods which are most suitable for Soviet requirements. For instance, United States machine tools, machinery and appliances are the goods they are most anxious to obtain, but the United States market offers less opportunities for the sale of Soviet products than countries like the United Kingdom and Belgium. It is, therefore, to the advantage of the Soviet Union to be able to sell more than they buy in the case of countries like the United Kingdom and Belgium and use the surplus to help pay for the goods they are so anxious to secure from the United States. The bilateral balancing of trade would greatly reduce their freedom of action in this respect.

7. In view of these considerations I shall be surprised if the Soviet Government require that we should accept repayment of the credits extended to them in the form of Soviet products. They may very well raise the question of more favourable tariff treatment for their goods imported into Canada. In this event, we shall have to enter into negotiations for the conclusion of a commercial treaty or trade agreement on the usual lines. I think you will agree that this might be desirable, but it would be better to let the Soviet Government raise this point at a latter stage of the discussions.

8. For the present all that can be discussed are the question of credits and the kinds and quantities of goods the two countries can exchange with one another. We must remember that all the energies of the Soviet Government are still being directed towards the winning of the war. They are receiving nearly all the goods they would like to obtain from Canada under mutual aid. For this reason it would be premature and unwise to submit offerings of Canadian products for sale in the post-war period. This should come when the question of credits has been settled and the Soviet Government has taken steps to set up an organization for handling trade with Canada, indicating that they are ready for business. Just now they are definitely not ready for anything more than preliminary discussions along the lines indicated in the attached copy of the note verbale submitted to Mr. Vyshinsky.

9. I can see no advantage in the Canadian Government setting up a special organization to handle trade with the Soviet Union. The Soviet Government either will continue to handle trade with Canada through the Amtorg Trading Corporation and other Soviet Organizations in New York or more likely will establish a "Cantorg" Trading Corporation or some similar organization for the trade with Canada. It is true that this organization representating a State monopoly of foreign trade will have the advantage of being able to play one Canadian firm off against the other, but competition already exists in that Canadian firms will have to compete for Soviet business with individual manufacturers in the United States and European countries and little would be gained by funneling Canadian offers through a Government agency. In fact I can see definite disadvantages as then our firms would not be able to exhibit the same skill in salesmanship and in "sharpening their pencils" as they would if they had to deal direct with the Soviet buying organization in competition with other manufacturers of the same type of goods both in Canada and in the United States.

10. We must clearly realise that Soviet import requirements are compiled on the basis of a carefully prepared plan. Only those goods included in the plan are purchased and up to the quantities specified in the plan. The Soviet buying organizations receive specific instructions to purchase in accordance with the plan and it is their duty to buy to the best advantage. Price, therefore, has an all-important influence in deciding on the source of supply, but no Soviet organisation will buy goods just because they are cheap. It is useless for Canadian firms to think that they can sell goods to the Soviet Union if they offer an attractive price. If the higher Soviet authorities have already decided that they do not need to import these goods or do not need to buy as much as the Canadian firm is offering to sell at the specially reduced price, no amount of persuasion will result in a sale.

11. I hope the members of the External Trade Advisory Committee have not been misled by journalistic exaggerations or by inflated war demands into assuming that the sales of Canadian products to the Soviet Union after the war are likely to be anywhere near on the scale of present shipments. There are definite opportunities for trade with the Soviet Union of which we must endeavour to take advantage, but the possibilities are definitely limited.

12. In paragraph 6 of my despatch No. 202 of June 23rd,† I mentioned that Mr. Mikoyan, People's Commissar of Foreign Trade, had told Mr. Eric Johnson, President of the United States Chamber of Commerce, that the Soviet Union will require to import four times the pre-war volume. Since total imports in 1938 were valued at $273,192,000 this would give an import volume valued at around a billion dollars, unless prices become very much more inflated than at present. It is not possible to tell what allowance, if any, Mr. Mikoyan was making for reparations from Germany. Obviously if the Soviet Union obtain large supplies of machinery and reconstruction materials as reparations from Germany their import needs from other countries will be reduced. Even allowing an importation from all countries, apart from reparations, of a value of around a billion dollars a year, Canada would be obtaining more than her full share of this trade if we secured 5 per cent or $50,000,000 a year.

13. Our probable exports depend very largely on the volume of shipments of wheat and flour. It is reasonable to expect that for some years the Soviet Far East will require imports of wheat and flour from abroad which will keep shipments from Canada up to the present level which represents a value of around $18,000,000 a year. The next most substantial item of our probable export to the Soviet Union after the war will be in the group of commodities embraced by the term "machine tools and miscellaneous machines." Under the Third Protocol[63] our commitments for this group have a value of $12,000,000. Naturally these are comprised largely of general utility machines for making shells and other military essentials. After the war the emphasis will be on specialty machine tools and machinery for re-equipping Soviet factories and for installing new productive capacity for the manufacture of consumer goods. In this class of machinery the United States is much better equipped than Canada to supply Soviet requirements. Still the Soviet need will be so great that it is not unreasonable to expect a continuation for some years of shipments at nearly their present level which represent a value of around $12,000,000 a year.

14. We have recently sold to the Soviet Union outside of the protocol hydroelectric plant installations of a value of around $25,000,000. I understand from Mr. Sergeev[64] that some of the turbines had been constructed for a Canadian hydroelectric development which had not been completed. The need in the Soviet Union for electric power installations and electrical equipment of all kinds will be very great owing to the large amount of destruction to existing power plant during the war and the ambition of the Soviet authorities to develop as rapidly as possible the power resources of the country. There is some doubt in my mind as to the ability of our electrical industry to compete in normal times of peace with electrical manufacturers in the United States, the United Kingdom, Switzerland, Sweden and Germany. I know that before the war our leading electrical manufacturers were precluded by inter-company arrangements from offering most of their products for sale outside of Canada and Newfoundland. I should appreciate any information you could give me regarding this aspect of the situation. It would be worth-while if the Canadian industry could secure a few large orders from the Soviet Union for electrical equipment during the difficult reconversion period after the war, even if the long-term prospects for trade in this group of products are not favourable.

15. Mr. Mikoyan also told Mr. Eric Johnson that a substantial proportion of Soviet requirements would be comprised of consumer goods, but he was probably referring to the immediate post-war period when some effort must be made to relieve the acute famine of consumer goods in the Soviet Union. The policy of the Soviet Government has been and probably will continue to be to produce consumer goods at home rather than to utilise import resources for buying these goods abroad. They have been content to allow the population to go without such goods until they are able to import machines and start turning out the goods in their own factories. I see no reason why the Soviet Government should follow a different policy after the war. If so, the imports of consumer goods will take place only in the immediate post-war period when there is a world-wide shortage of such goods and when Canadian factories are busy making up the deficiency in domestic consumer demand. Any trade with the Soviet Union in consumer goods during this period, therefore, would not be of help to the employment situation in Canada and if the goods are sold to the Soviet Union on credit, such trade would not help our deficiency in United States dollars during the transitional period before multilateral clearing is established. For this reason, while we may obtain some orders for consumer goods in the immediate post-war period, I do not look upon this as a trade we should especially encourage because from the long-term point of view there will be no permanent market to be developed in the Soviet Union for goods of this character.

Deputy People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs.

16. Before the war the Soviet Union was self-sufficient in iron and steel. There has been a great deal of destruction to iron and steel plants in the Donetz Basin, the Ukraine in 1938 having accounted for 61.6 per cent of pig iron and 47.8 per cent of rolled metal production for the whole of the Soviet Union. Judging from articles in the press, however, rapid progress is being made with the restoration of the Donetz Basin iron and steel industry. Every few weeks there are reports of newly restored blast furnaces being again producers of pig iron. In addition there has taken place during the war a great increase in iron and steel productive capacity in the Urals and in the Kuznetz Basin of Siberia. Output of iron and steel in the Urals is now double what it was in 1940, when this district accounted for about a fifth of total Soviet production. War demands have been enormous and great as though the demands for reconstruction may be they should not be beyond the capacity of Soviet industry. We can look, therefore, to little outlet in the Soviet Union for the products of our iron and steel industry to help it tide over the difficult reconversion period. There may be some imports of steel rails from Canada, but I should think the Soviet industry will be able to supply the requirements for this commodity as soon as it is freed from the necessity of producing iron and steel for munition purposes. Some flat cars may also be purchased from Canada during the first year or two after the armistice, although it is probable that Third Protocol shipments of these cars were to fill the gap in war-time demand for this type of rolling stock. In general I can see little prospect of the country that stood second in immediate pre-war world production of iron and steel requiring to import products of this type from Canada after the war.

17. We now have to consider another group of commodities which account for a large proportion of Canadian mutual aid shipments to the Soviet Union, viz., non-ferrous metals. In all cases the present shipments reflect inflated demands resulting from the war which will be sharply curtailed once the armistice with Germany is signed. Before the war the Soviet Union produced 87 per cent of normal requirements of aluminium. However, 72 per cent of the 1938 production of aluminium was in the Ukraine, where industrial plants and particularly electric power installations suffered greatly from the German invasion. It will take time for aluminium capacity in this region to be restored. In the meantime there has been a great increase in aluminium production in the Urals, that district now producing six times the quantity it did in 1940. A great deal will depend on post-war demand for aluminium, particularly for the aircraft industry. While some imports from Canada may be possible it may be expected that the Soviet Union for strategic reasons will seek to expand rather than curtail domestic production in order to make the country self-sufficient in this metal. There will also be a large source of supply in the immediate post-war period through the possibility of reclaiming aluminium from disused military aircraft.

18. The Soviet Union has not been able to attain self-sufficiency in copper, the domestic industry accounting for only 58 per cent of pre-war requirements. While there has been a great expansion of output since 1940 in the Urals and in the Altai, it is probable that imports will be necessary in the post-war period and Canada may be able to participate in this trade. Before the war the Belgian Congo was an important supplier of Soviet requirements for copper.

19. The Soviet Union produced practically all of the domestic requirements of zinc and 77 per cent of that of lead in the pre-war period. The principal mines are at Chimkent in Kazakhstan and at Ridder in the Altai. Production is said to have increased since 1940 and post-war imports of lead will depend upon the relation of demand to current output. The same may be said to apply to nickel, but in the case of this metal the position is much more obscure because so little is known of Soviet production and the post-war demand cannot be gauged.

20. The above represents a preliminary survey of the probable outlets for the sale of Canadian products to the Soviet Union. It is based on such information as I have been able to gather which necessarily is very limited on account of the little data now being made public about Soviet production of industrial and mineral products. One of the chief purposes of the talks I am proposing to have with the People's Commissar of Foreign Trade will be to elucidate more of the facts respecting the opportunities for Canadian trade with the Soviet Union. From what I have said in this despatch, however, I think you will agree that it is important for us to approach this whole question of post-war trade with the Soviet Union from the right perspective and not to be carried away by false optimism engendered by enthusiastic well-wishers of good relations between the two countries or by our success in supplying the Soviet Union with some of the goods they have so urgently required to defeat the German armies. The post-war world will present a very different picture and we will have to compete for our share of Soviet trade against all other industrial countries of the world. For this reason we shall have to lay our plans with great care. We should not take advantage of some short-term opportunities if this will prejudice long-term trade.

21. On the question of imports of Soviet products into Canada you will note that in the attached note verbale, I have asked for information about any new Soviet products not exported to Canada before the war which the Soviet authorities believe might be sold in the Canadian market after the war. Of the pre-war exports from the Soviet Union to Canada the commodity which offers the greatest possibility for expansion is anthracite coal. Unfortunately, Soviet shipments of this commodity enter into direct competition with the product of what was before the war one of the most depressed industries of the United Kingdom. During the transitional period before multilateral clearing is established imports into the United Kingdom from sources outside of the sterling area will be regulated strictly according to the volume of United Kingdom exports to the country in question. The United Kingdom will continue to buy Canadian wheat and bacon because they need them, but imports of many other commodities will be restricted on account of the unwillingness of the United Kingdom to allow Canada to accumulate sterling which will represent a liability the United Kingdom would have to take care of after multilateral clearing is established. For this reason we shall have to be careful not to make hasty commmitments to the Soviet Union or any other country regarding any commodity which is an important item of export from the United Kingdom to Canada. In the case of anthracite coal there is the further danger that the United Kingdom can always use the analogy between Canadian purchases of Soviet coal and United Kingdom purchases of Soviet lumber to curtail imports of lumber from Canada in favour of imports from the Soviet Union. This would have political repercussions in British Columbia and would be serious for the lumber industry of that Province if at the same time the barriers to the sale of Canadian lumber in the United States market had not been removed. For the present, therefore, I propose to proceed carefully on the subject of anthracite coal and will refer to you if the question of the sale of Soviet anthracite coal to Canada should be raised in concrete form during my discussions with the People's Commissar of Foreign Trade. I assume, however, that there will be no harm in telling him that the Soviet Union should be able to ship anthracite coal to Canada in quantities corresponding to those shipped before the war.

22. There is another possibility that may arise out of my discussions with the People's Commissar of Foreign Trade. The Soviet authorities may take the initiative in suggesting an understanding between the two countries in respect of lumber shipments to the United Kingdom market. This would bring us up against the whole post-war policy respecting commodity agreements and cartel arrangements. It would also have political repercussions which are difficult to foresee at this stage. An understanding between Canada and the Soviet Union probably would not be effective unless it also included other important suppliers of lumber to the United Kingdom, such as Finland and Sweden, and the conclusion I have reached is that it would be premature at this stage to discuss such a proposal. I shall immediately advise you if any suggestion to this effect is put forward by the Soviet authorities.

I have etc.

L'ambassadeur en Union soviétique

Ambassador in Soviet Union to People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs

Moscow, July 31, 1944

The Canadian Embassy presents its compliments to the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs and has the honour to advise that the Government of Canada has instructed the Canadian Ambassador at Moscow to institute preliminary discussions with the Soviet Government regarding post-war trade between Canada and the Soviet Union. In this connection it is desired to bring to the attention of the Soviet Government that legislation is being introduced into the Canadian Parliament to give the Government of Canada authority to extend credits for the purpose of post-war trade.

It would be of great assistance to the Canadian authorities in studying the particular problem of trade with the Soviet Union if they could receive from the Soviet authorities an indication as to the terms desired for a credit covering Soviet purchases of Canadian products after the war, such as length of credit, rate of interest and method of repayment. It would also be of assistance to the Canadian authorities if the Soviet authorities could furnish particulars regarding the kinds and quantities of products which the Soviet Union will be interested in purchasing from Canada, provided it is possible to arrange for the extension of a credit satisfactory to the governments of both countries.

The Canadian authorities believe that there will be increased scope after the war for the sale of Soviet products in the Canadian market, but in this connection also it would be of assistance if they could be informed by the Soviet authorities of any products which were not exported to Canada from the Soviet Union before the war and which the Soviet authorities believe should be available for sale in the Canadian market after the war.

Finally the Canadian authorities would like to learn if it is the intention of the People's Commissariat of Foreign Trade to establish in Canada a special organization for the purchase of Canadian products and for the sale of Soviet products in the Canadian market.

The Canadian Embassy is of the opinion that the most practical method whereby a preliminary exchange of views concerning post-war trade between Canada and the Soviet Union could be effected would be for the Canadian Ambassador to discuss this question with the People's Commissar of Foreign Trade or with his deputy and the Canadian Embassy would appreciate if the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs could take the necessary steps to arrange for such a preliminary exchange of views.

1. We favour guaranteed bank credits as far as they are feasible. There may be cases where we will be willing to give a direct credit to another government but on the whole we think it wiser and sounder that an agency of a foreign government should contract in the usual way with our manufacturers or exporters and if such manufacturers or exporters are unable to handle the transaction through ordinary banking channels we should make the deal possible by insuring a credit under the first Part of our new Export Credits Insurance Act.

2. The Department of Finance is in agreement with your views in paragraph 6. They feel we should be careful to avoid undue optimism in these matters and also careful to avoid rushing in to offer credits to the Soviet Union before we are fully acquainted with the policy that is likely to be followed by the United States and the United Kingdom. They suspect that the U.S.S.R. is likely to play off one country against another and to drive very hard bargains both in regard to the term for which a credit is granted and the rate of interest applicable thereto. They think a term as long as twenty years is likely to be asked for and a rate of interest as much below 3% as possible.

3. Finance is anxious to learn what terms the United States is considering in connection with certain kinds of civil goods or, alternatively, for all goods supplied under the Fourth Protocol[65] after the German war is ended, and feel some consideration should be given to the point made by the British that the U.S.S.R. has ample gold reserves and no need for credit on unduly generous terms. What we do with the Soviet Union will undoubtedly influence our transactions with The Netherlands, Czechoslovakia, and other countries which have already approached us for export credits of one type or another. We have offered the Soviet Union a twelve-year 3% credit in connection with the Hydro Electric equipment deal now under negotiation with Canadian companies. We expect the Soviet Union is holding off acceptance of these terms because she expects better terms from the United States.

4. We are forwarding statistics on prewar Canadian trade with the Soviet Union,† and a copy of The Export Credits Insurance Act.

L'ambassadeur en Union soviétique
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Ambassador in Soviet Union
to Secretary of State for External Affairs

DESPATCH 315 Moscow, September 17, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my despatch No. 172 of May 23rd, 1944, in which I outlined the discussions regarding the extension of credits by the United Kingdom Government for the purpose of financing post-war exports to the Soviet Union. In this despatch I propose to bring you up to date on the developments which have taken place since the above despatch was written.

2. Mr. Charles Gifford, the Commercial Secretary of the British Embassy, had an interview in June with Mr. Krutikov, the Vice-Commissar of Foreign Trade. In this conversation Mr. Krutikov made it clear that what the Soviet Government wanted was a long-term credit of twenty-five years. This was to apply not only to trade during the immediate period commencing with the cessation of hostilities with Germany and extending until the conclusion of a comprehensive commercial agreement between the two countries but also to non-military deliveries under the Fourth Protocol now being negotiated. In other words, the Financial Agreement of August 16, 1941, was to be set aside immediately and its place taken by a new agreement of which the essential feature would be the extension of a long-term credit of twenty five years granted by the United Kingdom Government to finance non-military exports to the Soviet Union both prior to and after the cessation of hostilities with Germany.

3. After this proposal was reported to London a reply was received instructing Mr. Gifford to come to London for consultation. He left at the end of June and only returned on September 3rd. He brought back with him detailed instructions covering a counter-proposal to be submitted to the Soviet Government. This counter-proposal was embodied in a long note addressed to Mr. Krutikov and signed by Mr. Gifford. A copy of the note was also sent to Mr. Molotov by the Ambassador. The note was dated September 10th, and the following day Mr. Gifford called on Mr. Krutikov and had a long discussion with him on the whole subject.

4. The note commenced with a frank statement of the financial position of the United Kingdom after the war. It pointed out that in the prosecution of the war the United Kingdom has had to liquidate foreign assets to the total value of £1,000,000,000 and to increase her external debt from £500,000,000 to £3,000,000,000. This means that after the war the United Kingdom at a time when her receipts from overseas investments are greatly reduced will have to export each year £100,000,000 worth of goods for which no equivalent in imports will be received. This financial position makes it very difficult for the United Kingdom to sell on other than a cash basis and renders impossible the granting of long-term credits.

5. A comparison was then given of the situation in the United Kingdom with that in the Soviet Union. It was pointed out that, while the Soviet Union had suffered terrible devastation, many of the materials required for reconstruction were found within the country and with the recovery of the Ukraine self-sufficiency in food should once more be attained. In contrast the United Kingdom had to import a great deal of the raw materials and food required to maintain the economy of the country. Finally a reference was made to the large gold reserves at the disposal of the Soviet Government.

6. The note then went on to outline the counter-proposal. This took the form of a five-year credit of £30,000,000, of which not more than £6,000,000 may be used in any one year, although in the later years this figure may be exceeded if the full amount of £6,000,000 has not been utilized in any one year. The credit may be drawn upon by Soviet buying organizations in the United Kingdom for the purpose of effecting 40 per cent of the payments due on contracts placed with United Kingdom manufacturers of industrial equipment. Provision will be made to safeguard against credit being granted on the same contract both by the manufacturer and by the government. In other words, the credit may be utilized only in the case of goods sold on a cash basis. The credit will be administered by the Export Credits Guarantee Department. While the use of the credit is confined to industrial equipment and then only on the conditions described above the note states that in respect of all other transactions exports to the Soviet Union will be accorded the same facilities as exports to any other country. The sums advanced under the credit will be repayable after five years and the rate of interest will be 2¼ per cent.

7. In the meantime the provisions of the United Kingdom-Soviet Financial Agreement of August 16, 1941, will be applicable to (a) all orders for non-military goods under the four protocols and (b) all orders for non-protocol goods placed before January 1st, 1945. The United Kingdom Government, however, agrees to reduce the rate of interest on payments due under the Agreement from 3 to 2¼ per cent. Before Mr. Gifford had left for London Mr. Krutikov had stressed the onerous nature of the provisions of the Financial Agreement of August 16, 1941, objecting particularly to the payment of 40 per cent in cash and payment of the balance over three to seven years. He had proposed instead a long-term credit of twenty-five years. The only concession offered by the United Kingdom note is the reduction in the rate of interest.

8. Mr. Gifford had a four hour discussion with Mr. Krutikov at the meeting on September 11th and the latter made it plain that the United Kingdom counter-proposal was quite inacceptable to the Soviet Union. A written reply to the note was promised but this has not yet been received. Very wisely Mr. Krutikov in his discussion with Mr. Gifford did not question the seriousness of the United Kingdom financial position, but stressed the economic plight in which the Soviet Union would find itself as a result of the war. He called attention to the destruction of Soviet assets and the long time it would take for exports to recover their pre-war volume. He emphasized particularly the exaggerated notions entertained abroad about the size of Soviet gold reserves and said that due to the concentration of effort on the war it had been possible to spare very little labour for the mining of gold. He mentioned that the United States authorities were taking a much more realistic view in that they had already agreed to the extension of long-term credits and he intimated that unless the United Kingdom did likewise their participation in Soviet import trade would be restricted to goods which the Soviet Union could not obtain from the United States.

9. From this you will observe that the negotiations about credits are taking their anticipated course and the Soviet representatives are unable to refrain from playing off the United Kingdom and the United States against one another. Mr. Gifford told me that according to the information they have received there have been no discussions between the United States and the Soviet Union regarding credits for financing post-war trade. All that has taken place is that in accordance with the provisions of the Lend-Lease Act there have been negotiations respecting payment for deliveries under the Fourth Protocol which are shipped after the cessation of hostilities with Germany. For these deliveries the United States authorities have agreed to accept payments commencing after ten years and extending over the ensuing twenty years. No doubt this will have an important influence on the granting of future credits and Mr. Krutikov is justified to this extent in stating that the United States authorities have recognised the necessity for long-term credits.

10. Mr. Gifford did not know the rate of interest to be charged by the United States on the cost of the post-war deliveries under the Fourth Protocol. He assumed that it would be the rate at which the United States Government is able to borrow plus a handling charge of one eight of one per cent. This is the formula used by the United Kingdom Government in justifying the rate of interest of 2¼ per cent. The note which Mr. Gifford submitted to Mr. Krutikov pointed out that there were no United Kingdom obligations with a five-year maturity outstanding but National War bonds bearing interest at 2½ per cent and maturing in ten years were selling at par and this probably was the best index available.

11. On this basis it would appear that our offer to the Soviet Union of a twelve-year credit with interest at 3 per cent in connection with the supply of hydroelectric equipment provides for a rate of interest slightly too high in comparison with competing offers of credits to the Soviet Union being made by the United Kingdom and the United States. Possibly a fifteen-year credit at 3 per cent interest would be more in line. In any event it is important for us to note the limitations which the United Kingdom is placing on the credits offered to the Soviet Union for the purpose of post-war trade. The most significant of these limitations is that the granting of credit is confined to the supply of industrial equipment. This is a very sensible approach to the problem and we should give consideration to a similar limitation. It is obvious that the Soviet Union should pay cash for the consumer goods urgently required but not coming within the category of relief supplies. This would apply to our sales of wheat and flour. It would also be applicable to any other types of consumer goods we may be in a position to supply. The same considerations would hold good in connection with the products of our extractive industries, all of which are raw materials for Soviet industry. This would narrow the field for the granting of credit down to the supply of machine tools and other industrial equipment. I have pointed out in previous despatches that in this type of equipment our industry is not nearly so well placed to supply Soviet requirements as the highly specialized machinery industries of the United States and the United Kingdom.

12. While recognising the validity of these arguments we have to bear in mind that after the domestic deficiency in consumer goods has been filled Canadian industry will be greatly in need of export outlets. From the long-term point of view, therefore, trade with the Soviet Union will have a certain importance for the Canadian economy. Canada is in a better position to extend credits for post-war trade than the United Kingdom. Accordingly we should be influenced less by what the United Kingdom is able to do and more by what the United States is likely to do. In view of our relative disadvantage in competing with other countries for the supply of industrial equipment to the Soviet Union, it would unduly prejudice the positive results to be gained from the granting of credits if they were to be confined to financing shipments of industrial equipment. The Canadian Government will be under domestic pressure to grant facilities for the sale to the Soviet Union of certain products, e.g., live cattle. In view of these considerations it would be preferable to exclude from the scope of the credits only goods which obviously should be sold on a cash basis. This could be accomplished by entrusting to the Exports Credits Insurance Corporation the administration of the credits granted to the Soviet Union.

13. I have not had any reply to the note which I left with Mr. A. Y. Vyshinsky, Vice-Commissar of Foreign Affairs, on July 31st (see paragraph 2 of my despatch No. 249 of August 5th). This is not surprising because the Soviet Government is not in the habit of dealing promptly with general requests of this character. My own view is that we should not force the pace and I am glad to see from your telegram No. 162 of August 26th that this view is shared by the Department of Finance. I consider it is to our advantage to await the outcome of the latest United Kingdom proposal and particularly the steps which the United States will take in regard to the financing of post-war trade with the Soviet Union. On this latter subject it is very difficult to obtain information here as the officials of the United States Embassy are reticent in talking about the negotiations of the Treasury Department in Washington with Soviet representatives.

14. It is obvious that all I can do here is to have preliminary conversations with the People's Commissar of Foreign Trade and that detailed discussions regarding terms of credit will have to be conducted in Ottawa. I shall do my best, however, to keep you informed and will advise you of such developments as come to my knowledge. I should also appreciate receiving any information that may become available in Ottawa respecting the conditions under which Canadian trade with the Soviet Union after the war should be financed.

15. I shall be submitting a later despatch† on the subject of Soviet gold reserves. Mr. Gifford is inclined to the view that stocks of gold are not much greater than at the beginning of the Soviet-German war and he thinks the estimate of Lord Keynes to be far too high. He agrees with me, however, that in view of their almost unlimited labour resources it is unlikely the Soviet Government permitted gold production to be reduced to any great extent during the war. The only disappearance of which Mr. Gifford is aware is the shipment of gold to the United Kingdom to meet obligations under the Financial Agreement of August 16, 1941. Mr. Gifford did not have any exact figure of the total shipments of gold to the United Kingdom but hazarded the guess that they could have reached the total of £40,000,000 during the period from June, 1941, to date. Even this figure seems to be on the high side, but I have not yet had the opportunity of going into this subject in any detail.

I have etc.

Mémorandum du ministère des Finances

MEMORANDUM TO DR. CLARK

I received from you the other day a copy of Wilgress' despatch No. 315 of September 17th, regarding credits for Russia. This is a very useful and interesting despatch, like most of them, but there is one point in it which seems to me unjustified and I want to draw it to your attention. Speaking of the U.K. policy in regard to credits for Russia, he says "the most significant of these limitations is that the granting of credit is confined to the supply of industrial equipment. This is a very sensible approach to the problem and we should give consideration to a similar limitation." Then he goes on to say that it is obvious that Soviets should pay cash for consumer goods, and implies the same in regard to raw materials, and so forth.

It seems to me far from obvious that this is the case except on an analogy with domestic business which is false. I can quite understand the U.K. putting this limitation in. In the first place, they are obviously reluctant to grant any credits to Russia, presumably for the very good reason that they need to get imports for as much as possible of their exports. Secondly, the U.K. has to import nearly everything else but industrial equipment, and it would clearly not wish to re-export consumer goods or raw materials on credit. Finally, of course, U.K. foreign investment has traditionally been associated with the export of capital goods and the building up of industries or transport abroad.

It may seem uneconomic for a country to import other than capital goods on credit on the analogy of an individual where the purchase of consumer goods on credit is frequently considered to be either immoral or evidence of financial weakness. I think that in the case of a country, however, one must take into account all the circumstances, and there may even be situations where an import of foodstuffs, raw materials or even consumers goods can be justified; for example, in the case of Russia it may be quite important to give the civilian population whatever consumers goods are possible in the next few years if only for the purpose of recompense for the tremendous sacrifices they have endured. On the other hand, there is clearly enormous capital development to be done at home. However, Russia's credit is good and her future export possibilities would seem to be substantial, particularly with the advantage of her state-directed economy. In these circumstances it seems to me that it may be the sensible policy for Russia to so dispose her economic resources as to engage in capital reconstruction at home and the preparation for the production of consumers goods, while at the same time importing certain consumers goods as well as raw materials from abroad if she needs raw materials.

I raise this point not as a purely academic criticism of an otherwise valuable despatch, but because it seems to me we, in Canada, may have a particular interest in this question if we are a producer of raw materials, foodstuffs and possibly other consumers goods. As you know, I have raised it in the case of China, but I can quite understand that China's case is different from that of Russia, and China may legitimately feel that her credit resources and other foreign exchange resources are so slender that she can afford to use them only for the most urgently needed capital equipment.

SECRET. My telegram No. 219 of July 29th regarding post-war trade with the Soviet Union.

1. Mikoyan, Commissar of Foreign Trade, received me on December 11th. Interview was not successful in eliciting any information regarding Soviet views on possibilities of Canada supplying their post-war requirements. In general, discussion turned out much as I expected and indicated, first question to be settled is that of credits.

2. I commenced discussion by enquiring if he thought we were in a position to supply their post-war requirements for a series of commodities. His reply to each was the same — that it was not possible for him to discuss details until he knew the conditions under which we were prepared to sell. He would not even commit himself on such relatively simple commodities as flour, metals and live cattle. His general attitude was that we had taken the initiative and should submit concrete proposals. I could not obtain any indication about their general views on post-war requirements. His reply was that their plans had not yet been worked out. At no stage of the discussion was there any hint of bilateral balancing.

3. Sensing that Mikoyan was waiting for me to introduce subject of credits, I asked him if he could indicate what credits they had in mind for durable goods not usually sold on cash basis. His reply was that we should submit proposals, but he then mentioned that Stepanov[66] was negotiating with the United States Government and it had been agreed that repayments should commence in the ninth year, continuing until the thirtieth year. Rate of interest had not yet been settled. They were asking for 2.1 and had so far been offered 2.38 percent. In reply to my enquiry, he said this proposal related to heavy industrial equipment as well as to goods supplied under the Fourth Protocol after the German war is ended.

4. British Commercial Secretary has informed me that there have been no new developments in situation reported to you in my despatches No. 315 of September 17th and No. 386 of November 3rd.†

5. On the question of organisation for handling trade with Canada, Mikoyan said AMTORG was now out of date. New forms of organisation would have to be established, but their plan had not yet been worked out.

6. Interview ended on friendly note. Mikoyan said good relations had been established between the two countries and he felt problems relating to post-war trade could be settled on basis satisfactory to both countries.

PERSONAL Ottawa, December 26, 1944

Dear Norman [Robertson],

We hear from several indirect sources, including Moscow, of the attitude of the United States authorities towards credits to Russia. The latest report is that the United States is willing to consider a thirty-year credit for a very large amount, with payments beginning in the ninth year and with an interest rate exceeding 2% by an amount which is still a subject of controversy. There are also various reports as to the terms on which Russia will settle for industrial equipment and civilian supplies requisitioned under the new Protocol if all deliveries have not taken place by the time the German war ends and if Russia is not then a participant in the war against Japan.

It seems obvious to me that the Russians and perhaps also the governments of certain other countries will play one country off against another in negotiating for export credit terms and that it may be unfortunate if the creditor countries compete too strenuously with each other in the attempt to get export business on a long-term credit basis. Do you not think it would be a good thing to have Mike Pearson discuss frankly the whole situation with the United States Government and get as much information as possible in regard to their attitude, perhaps with a view to exploring the desirability of acting on some concerted basis?[67]

Yours very truly,

DESPATCH 14 Moscow, January 5, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to report that on December 27th I had a long conversation with Mr. A. W. Harriman, the United States Ambassador, during the course of which we discussed the question of the granting of credits for the purpose of financing post-war exports to the Soviet Union.

2. Mr. Harriman took the broad and very sensible view that, while it would not be wise to give the impression of ganging up on the Soviet Union, the leading exporting countries should be careful to avoid competitive bidding with one another for Soviet trade by trying to outdo each other in the granting of credits. In his view it would be to the interest of the United States to allow the United Kingdom and other European countries to obtain their fair share of Soviet business. This would make it easier for them to purchase the goods they require to import from the United States. On this account he considers it would be mistaken policy for the United States to use their financial power to grant credits to the Soviet Union for the purpose of taking business away from other countries. In his view the granting of credits should be solely for the purpose of enabling the Soviet Union to obtain goods which otherwise they would be unable to import from the United States or any other country.

3. To illustrate his point Mr. Harriman mentioned certain transactions before the war of the United States Export-Import Bank. An order had been obtained from Brazil for locomotives at a price considerably higher than the quotations of United Kingdom manufacturers who had been accustomed to supply the Brazilian railways. The Export-Import Bank had deliberately arranged for the extension of credit terms sufficiently attractive to secure the business for the United States notwithstanding the non-competitive character of the offer of the

The following note was written on this copy of the telegram:
Copy given to L. B. P[earson] who will follow this up in Washington. R[obertson]

United States manufacturer. Mr. Harriman said there was no sense in this type of high-pressure financing of foreign trade and if applied after the war to trade with the Soviet Union it would lead to disaster. There was room for every country in the Soviet market. In a broad range of industrial equipment the United States was the only country capable of supplying the exact type of product the Soviet authorities wished to obtain. There were other products on the border line for the supply of which a number of countries would be competing, but here quality and price should be the governing consideration rather than availability of state-sponsored credit on generous terms.

4. When he visited the United States in October and November Mr. Harriman was greatly relieved to find that these views were shared to a very large extent by Mr. Morgenthau and the officials of the Treasury Department. They recognized the vital need for the United Kingdom to export on a larger scale than before the war and realised that it would be contrary to the long-run interests of the United States to pry trade away from the United Kingdom by granting credits on terms more liberal than purely financial criteria would justify. He had been relieved to find this attitude in the Treasury Department because when visiting New York before seeing Mr. Morgenthau he had found people full of recriminations against the United Kingdom for their plans to promote exports at the expense of United States trade.

5. Finding Mr. Harriman expressing views that so coincided with my own I was encouraged to elaborate what for many years has been a favorite thesis of mine. This is that it is just as discriminatory in its effect to grant loans to other countries under the condition that the proceeds are spent in the lending country as it is to grant a tariff preference in favour of the products of one country over those of another. Both make it more difficult for the country discriminated against to obtain the currency of the other country and be able to buy more of that country's goods. To my great regret I found that Mr. Harriman was not prepared to go along with me as far as that. He said it would not be politically feasible for any institution supported by the United States Government to grant loans the proceeds of which would be spent in some other country. It is this reluctance of United States Liberals to go the full length in their liberalism and their lack of full recognition of the vital need of educating their remarkably responsible public opinion that I find so discouraging for the future.

6. On the more specific question of post-war credits to the Soviet Union, Mr. Harriman told me that when he was appointed Ambassador in October, 1943, the President asked him to sound out the Soviet authorities as to what financial assistance they had in mind receiving from the United States for the purpose of post-war reconstruction. He had several talks on the subject with Mr. Mikoyan, People's Commissar of Foreign Trade, shortly after he arrived in Moscow. Mr. Mikoyan eventually said they would like credits at a rate of interest of one half of one per cent with repayment commencing in the fifteenth year and extending over the next twenty years. This would mean that it would be thirty five years before the credits would be repaid in full. Mr. Mikoyan had explained that it would be fifteen years before they had completed the restoration of the country and would be in a position to commence paying off the credits received for reconstruction. As regards the rate of interest he was not in the slightest degree perturbed when Mr. Harriman pointed out that the rate proposed was far below that at which the United States Government could borrow.

7. Since then the negotiations have been transferred to Washington. Mr. Stepanov, a member of the Soviet delegation to the Bretton Woods Conference remained over in the United States to conduct negotiations with Mr. Dean Acheson of the State Department regarding credits for heavy industrial equipment of a type which obviously could not be supplied under Lend-Lease and the terms for payment of goods ordered under the Lend-Lease Act but not shipped at the time hostilities with Germany ceased. These negotiations have been carried on for some months. Agreement has been reached that repayment should commence in the tenth year and extend over the ensuing twenty years. The United States Government have offered a rate of interest of two and one third per cent but the Soviet Government are sticking out for the two per cent. In this connection, however, I believe the rates of interest of 2.38 and 2.1 per cent respectively quoted to me by Mr. Mikoyan are more correct. (See my telegram No. 353 of December 15th). Mr. Harriman probably was talking in round figures. I also believe that the rate of 2.38 per cent offered by the United States Government represents the rate at which they are able to borrow plus a handling charge of one eighth of one per cent. This is what Mr. Gifford, the United Kingdom Commercial Secretary, told me was the basis of both the United States and United Kingdom offers (See paragraph 10 of my despatch No. 315 of September 17th).

8. Mr. Harriman said that Mr. Acheson has been showing the greatest patience in his talks with Mr. Stepanov. He has tried to understand all of their counter-proposals and has gone to great pains in explaining why it is not possible for the United States Government to agree to their proposals. For instance, Mr. Stepanov had claimed that it was not right that the United States tax on corporation profits should be included in the price of machinery sold to the Soviet Government, presumably on the grounds that no money should accrue to the United States Government on business with the Soviet Government. Notwithstanding all the consideration shown by Mr. Acheson in his discussions with Mr. Stepanov, Mr. Mikoyan had complained to Mr. Harriman that Mr. Acheson was being very unreasonable. From this and other evidence Mr. Harriman has come to the conclusion that Mr. Mikoyan as a typical Armenian is applying the technique of the carpet trade to international financial transactions. On a number of occasions he has mentioned to Marshal Stalin that Mr. Mikoyan is unduly tough, but he thinks Stalin probably thought he was being complimentary in a jocular way. The next time he will try to impart more seriousness to this observation.

9. Signs are not wanting that the Soviet authorities have not grasped the practicality of United States lend-lease operations and that they misinterpret United States magnanimity and generosity. Mr. Harriman told me that when the dispute arose over the seizure of oil-well equipment belonging to American oil companies in Roumania, Mr. Vyshinsky suggested to the United States representative that the United States Government should compensate the oil companies and charge the equipment up to shipments under the Lend-Lease Act. The Soviet Government have read so often that the contributions of other countries under Lend-Lease and Mutual Aid are small compared with the great sacrifices of the Soviet Union in human and material resources that they have derived the impression there is still a large credit balance on which they are entitled to draw.

10. Mr. Harriman said they were having great difficulty in Washington over reiterated Soviet requests for inclusion in the Fourth Protocol of industrial equipment which could not possibly be justified for its war use. For instance, they had asked for the most up-to-date equipment to be installed in the coal mines of the Donetz Basin. This included not only the latest coal-cutting devices, but also conveyor belts for bringing the coal to the shaft. It was the type of equipment the United States Government would not permit their own coal operators to obtain during the war. When this was pointed out to him the Soviet representative replied that this was quite understandable because the United States mines were operating whereas those in the Soviet Union had been destroyed and should be re-equipped as soon as possible with the very latest type of equipment. The United States authorities have agreed to supply under Lend-Lease a very large amount of equipment for restoring the Donetz Mines, but much to the disappointment of the Soviet Government they have refused to authorise the manufacture for Soviet requirements of the latest frills in coal-mining technique.

11. Some of the latest type of equipment which the Soviet Government wished to obtain was produced in the city of Indianapolis. The Soviet representative had confronted the United States authorities with figures showing the availability of steel, copper and other materials required to manufacture the equipment. He had then been told that the manufacture of the equipment could not be authorised on account of the shortage of labour. A few days later he appeared again with evidence that there were two thousand unemployed in Indianapolis. The fact that these unemployed were clothing rather than steel workers left him unmoved. The next step was a petition from the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce who had been approached by the manufacturer of the equipment urging that the contract should be placed in view of the employment situation in that city. This tactic bears close resemblance to the breaking off by the Soviet Trade Delegation in London of negotiations with United Kingdom manufacturers of automatic telephone and electrical apparatus on the grounds that the United Kingdom Government were not prepared to grant sufficiently long terms of credit to the Soviet Union (See paragraph 3 of my despatch No. 386 of November 3rd, 1943).† It is clear that the Soviet authorities are not above exploiting the selfish interests of private firms in capitalist countries to further their economic aims.

12. My conversation with Mr. Harriman did not disclose what type of financing of post-war trade with the Soviet Union the United States Government had in mind. I derived the impression that they are not yet clear as to whether this should be done by direct loans, by operations of the Export-

Import Bank, by government-guarantee of private bank credits or by the private banks themselves without government intervention. Mr. Harriman mentioned that the Johnson Act was still an obstacle to advances to Soviet Government organisations by the Export-Import Bank and presumably would preclude any form of United States government loans to the Soviet Union. It appears all that has been discussed so far has been the financing of shipments having some connection with the war and arising out of the operations of the Lend-Lease Act. I should be most grateful to you for any background information on this subject you may be able to supply, based on the information already available to the Department of Finance.

13. Our own course is clear. We should continue to do everything possible to watch the situation closely but should refrain from making any direct offers of credits to the Soviet authorities until the time is right. This I consider will be either when hostilities with Germany cease or when the United Kingdom and United States Governments complete their negotiations for the financing of post-war trade with the Soviet Union, whichever is the earlier. It is particularly important for us to know how far the United States Government are prepared to go and I see no good purpose served by entering into discussions with the Soviet authorities until the United States situation is clarified. In The Export Credits Insurance Act we have ready at hand the machinery for taking advantage quickly of opportunities for business with the Soviet Union that may arise after the war and it is still too early to judge the exact extent to which this country will offer a market for our products. Before the war trade between the two countries was practically non-existent and it is difficult to see how a country, whose imports are likely to be largely confined to capital goods, can offer much scope for Canadian exports, unless our more developed engineering industry proves to be better able to compete internationally than it did in the past.

TELETYPE WA-182 Washington, January 10, 1945

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Dr. Clark's letter to you of December 26th on the attitude of United States authorities towards credits to Russia. Plumptre has discovered from F.E.A. via Oscar Cox that a couple of months ago a proposal was made to the Russians to give them credits in relation to capital equipment on the following terms. The rate of interest was to be 2⅜ percent. The loans were to extend over a period of 30 years. The first principal repayment was to be due on the last day of the ninth year. Since this proposal was submitted to Moscow there has been no reply. This is interesting in view of Bill Batt's[68] insistence at a meeting of the Joint War Aid Committee some months ago that it was essential that Canada and the United States should work together in putting forward financial terms to the U.S.S.R.

Plumptre will be in Ottawa tomorrow and might be able to talk to you about this matter. Ends.

DESPATCH 96 Ottawa, March 20, 1945

SECRET

Sir,

I reply to your despatch No. 14 of January 5th on the subject of the granting of credits to the Soviet Union.

2. Your despatch, and in particular your remarks on tied loans, aroused a great deal of interest. The attached memorandum includes many of the views stimulated into expression by your despatch.

3. On the subject of the actual course of our negotiations with the Soviet authorities over export credits, the arrangements already concluded with the Soviet Government under the Export Credits Insurance Act relate only to guarantees to make possible the provision of credit during the period of production for the goods which Russia has ordered. We are still waiting on the Russians to take the initiative in coming forward again to resume discussions on the longer term credits which they wish to receive, and from the proceeds of which they will make the payments for the various items of electrical equipment which are now being produced for them and for others for which they may place contracts in the near future. Incidentally, the number and value of the contracts placed up to date are very much less than was contemplated a year or so ago. Deliveries under the contracts already placed will presumably commence next summer, and certainly by September at the latest. Consequently it will be necessary for us to conclude some further credit arrangements with the Russians by that time. It is our belief that the Russians are deferring any approach to us on the terms of export credits until they have completed negotiations with the U.S. Government. For this reason, it appears as though the deferment which you suggest in the opening sentences of paragraph 13 will likely occur without our deliberately putting off negotiations. On the other hand, we cannot put them off for many months longer. Secondly, it should be noted that the Russians have now agreed to purchase on credit terms still to be negotiated industrial equipment which has been ordered by the Mutual Aid Board for Russia but which remains undelivered at the conclusion of hostilities. As yet neither the Russians nor ourselves have taken any initiative in opening discussions on the terms of credit to be applied in these transactions. I assume that the Russians will wish to take up this at the same time as credits for the electrical machinery are discussed, and will themselves wish to wait until the U.S. situation is clarified.

[68]W. C. Batt, président adjoint, Commission de la production de guerre des États-Unis; représentant américain, Commission composée des matières premières et Commission composée de la production et des ressources.
W. C. Batt, Vice Chairman, War Production Board of the United States; U.S. representative, Combined Raw Materials Board and Combined Production and Resources Board.

4. On the subject of the difficulties which the United States authorities had over the Soviet requests for the inclusion of industrial equipment in the Fourth Protocol: The U.S.S.R. requested approximately $1,818,168,000 of industrial equipment. This total includes $126,517,000., estimated as undelivered from old orders of June 30, 1944; $224,369,000. authorized under the terms of the Third Protocol for delivery in the Fourth Protocol period; and $1,467,282,000. of new requests. The offering of the United States, as contained in their Schedule of Supplies attached to the Fourth Protocol, totalled $1,132,453,000. The old orders and the orders authorized during the Third Protocol for delivery during the Fourth will be made available during the period of the Fourth Protocol. The U.S. undertakes to consider the placement of new orders not to exceed $300,900,000. Items to the value of $481,807,000., regarded by the U.S. as requiring a long period to produce and as having a long period of useful life, will be subject to the terms of a proposed agreement supplementary to the Mutual Aid Agreement; and the Russians are also free to place orders for this class of equipment without the financial assistance of Lend-Lease.

5. The U.S. have been for some time exercising care in the use of Lend-Lease funds to ensure that supplies with post-war value were not made available. You may have hear that the House of Representatives in passing, last week, the Bill to extend the Lend-Lease Act for one year from June 1, 1945, added an amendment prohibiting the use of Lend-Lease funds for post-war relief, rehabilitation or reconstruction of foreign countries. The measure passed by a vote of 354 to 28 when the amendment was added after encountering considerable opposition in its unamended form.

6. We had hoped that by now we would have signed in Ottawa the Fourth Soviet Protocol since the period it covers expires June 30,1945. Arrangements had all been made indeed for signing last week, but last minute differences arose between the Soviet and the U.S. and U.K. Governments over the schedule of supplies. The signing has been postponed sine die.[69]

SECRET

The Canadian Ambassador to the U.S.S.R. in his despatch No. 14 of January 5th, concerning post-war credits for the purpose of financing post-war exports to the Soviet Union, discussed the general effect of tied loans.

It is his view that "it is just as discriminatory in its effect to grant loans to other countries under the condition that the proceeds are to be spent in the lending country as it is to grant a tariff preference in favour of the products of one country over those of another" and he regrets the reluctance of the United States Government to recognize this similarity.

While the analogy drawn between a preferential tariff and a tied loan is useful, it should not be pressed too far. A loan usually covers a shorter period of time than is contemplated by a tariff and it is usually open to any third country, which feels that it is being the victim of discrimination, to offer a loan on equally generous terms. Preferential tariffs favour imports from another country over those from a third country. Tied loans have no such effect. A better analogy is afforded by export subsidies which favour the exports of a particular country unless the subsidies are matched by similar action in other countries, and this is the effect of tied loans. However this may be, a tied loan can certainly operate as a form of discrimination and has certain points of resemblance both with long-term contracts and with export subsidies.

If the Canadian Government decides to discuss the question of tied loans with the Government of the United States in connection with proposals which have been made from time to time regarding future commercial policy and in connection with the inclination which the United States have shown to object to long-term contracts between the Dominions and the United Kingdom, it would be necessary to admit that in many cases it makes very little difference whether a particular loan is tied or free. These are the cases in which the supplies which the borrowing country procures would have to be obtained by it from the lending country even if the loan had not been tied — cases, that is to say, in which the lending country is the best source of supply under competitive conditions. Most operations in a sellers' market fall into this class, as do our own export credit operations to date, for example the Government guarantees provided to cover purchases of hydro electrical equipment in Canada by the Soviet Government. Credit arrangements will probably be made also to cover such industrial equipment provided for under the Fourth Protocol which will be undelivered at the end of the war and which equipment the Soviet have agreed to purchase. Such credit, while tied to the industrial equipment, cannot be considered objectionable. Any loans or guarantees made during the three-year term of the Export Credits Insurance Act, under Part II, must, by the provisions of the Act, be tied, but it appears likely that no unfair advantage will accrue to Canadian exporters since the loans will in all probability be tied to exports which would move on their own merits in the transition period of shortage. The extent to which operations under Part II of the Act or other tied loans would in fact be unfair practice or equivalent to export subsidies will depend upon the terms of individual transactions. Even here it will be difficult to draw a sharp line of distinction. For example, suppose we and the U.S. both made credits available to foreign governments at rates at which each Government can borrow in the domestic market, or at those rates plus a standard surcharge. In this event the U.S. would be providing credits at a lower rate than would we, because their domestic rates are lower. Can it be said in these cases that the U.S. Government is providing an export subsidy? Certainly they are providing an added incentive for purchases in the U.S. if the use of such credits are tied. Under such circumstances, however, we might be said to be providing an export subsidy by comparison with, say, Australia or some other country following the same general principle but where domestic interest rates are higher. In other words, if credits obtained in any country, either privately or through public channels, are tied to use within that country, then there will be a trade advantage for those countries with lower interest rates. Insofar as many private trade credits have in fact been tied, this condition has existed in the past without Government intervention. There isno taint to the assistance provided under Part I of the Act since the insurance is provided against payment of premiums which are estimated to cover the cost of the insurance. It should also be noted that Canada's adoption of export credit insurance and the direct provision or guarantee of export credits is more of a defensive measure than an aggressive one. Both the U.K. and the U.S. have been providing insurance, credits and guarantees for some time.

It is, of course, equally clear that tied loans may be abused in particular cases by being used as a form of price cutting or of export subsidy. The instance mentioned in despatch No. 14, paragraph 3, is an excellent illustration of this abuse.

There may, however, be cases in which the fact that a loan is tied is not a matter of indifference on the one hand or a means of disloyal competition on the other. A loan may be granted for the purpose of moving surpluses which would not otherwise be exported but which are not strictly competitive with potential exports in third countries. The loan in this case is an inducement to buy that harms no one. Before suggesting that tied loans should be condemned and eliminated like other forms of trade discrimination, it would be necessary to see whether these innocent uses of tied loans are sufficiently important to justify their continuance.

It can be contended that the general effect of a tied loan is similar to that of any other form of bilateral trade and that for a country to stipulate that the proceeds of the bonds which it buys must be spent within the buying country is not radically different from stipulating that the proceeds of the goods which it buys must be spent in the buying country. If it is replied that the granting of credit involves an element of risk which is not present in the purchase of goods, the answer seems to be that either this risk is offset by the interest charged or else that the acceptance of the risk constitutes a form of price cutting or export subsidy.

A useful and important argument runs that in the past, if a country which had borrowed money in the United States used the funds to pay for supplies imported from a third country, it might have been the case that the third country was in such a position that its nationals would increase their investments in the United States rather than buy U.S. goods. In such circumstances, the U.S. would have a claim against Country A, the counterpart of which would be the sale of the U.S. securities to the nationals of Country B. The loan would not have promoted employment in the U.S. In the foreseeable future, it is most unlikely that consequences such as those referred to above would flow from the extension of "untied" credits by the United States. Exchange control in most countries of the world will prevent the nationals of those countries from increasing their investments in the United States. Moreover, the policies of exchange control which would give effect to such action are already recognized and are not perhaps considered inconsistent with reasonable commercial policy. The exchange policy in point is that which does not allow the transfer of capital funds in scarce currencies. It is conceivable that a third country receiving part of the proceeds of a U.S. loan in payment for sales of goods to the borrower would add to its idle balances in the United States. It seems that this is most unlikely to take place on any substantial scale. In the interests of broadening international trade and financial relationships, the United States could well afford to expose itself to such slight penalties as might be involved. Moreover, it would always be possible for the U.S. to review its policy if that policy did not appear to be producing satisfactory results. To repeat: In the post-war period the United States can be almost sure that when it makes a loan that loan will be used to pay for U.S. goods and services either by the borrowing country or by any other country which falls heir to the U.S. dollars. The more definite assurance afforded by "tied credits" has serious international disadvantages. The above view applies particularly to loans at large. A tied loan, if used to aid a distressed industry still has a great political usefulness in the lending country though the purpose of the loan is often to exclude low-cost producers in other countries, as in the case of a U.S. loan tied to wheat.

The points considered so far have been in the main theoretical. A more practical argument is that cited in paragraph 5 of Mr. Wilgress' despatch when he quotes Mr. Harriman as saying that it would not be politically feasible for any institution supported by the United States Government to grant loans, the proceeds of which would be spent in some other country. It is difficult to expect any Congress or Parliament to provide large loans or assistance in the form of guarantees to make loans possible, if the proceeds of these loans can be spent by the borrower in financing purchases in other countries — perhaps in the countries of competitors. It may be possible, through the use of an international agency such as the International Bank recommended at Bretton Woods, to get some untied loans or guarantee authorities from public funds, but it is hard to believe that it will be politically possible to provide credits in general without having them tied to use in the country of origin. Canadian legislation permitting loans to other countries has been based on a somewhat similar assumption, although in order to avoid adherence to the policy of tied loans, the effective legislation has been limited to three years, Part II of the Exports Credits Insurance Act. It can be argued that it is better to have tied loans than to have no loans and that if the proceeds of commodity trading are free it may not matter much if the proceeds of loans are tied. Indeed, a tied loan tends to liberate buying power. It may set free the proceeds of commodity trading. China may, for example, be in a better position to buy from the United Kingdom after receiving a tied loan from the United States than before. If, therefore, tied loans are the only loans which are politically feasible, it might be inexpedient to condemn them.

It will not be the presence of tied loans that will create the most serious problems, but the absence of untied loans. There is no practical way of eliminating tied loans altogether since many arise simply as the financing of desired purchases, but care should be taken to see they are not abused. Internationally and nationally a very large amount of trade credit is in fact made up of tied loans but it is also possible nationally to obtain credit which is not so tied to specific purchases.

Our main hope for untied loans in the period immediately following the war will rest on the Bank for Reconstruction and Development and if substantial loans are available there it will contribute much to the flexibility of the whole world structure. Later it might be hoped that if the reconstruction proceeds satisfactorily there might be other untied loans when the credit standing of various countries had been improved and stabilized. The credits will have to come from the major creditor countries and particularly from the United States.

If it should in fact prove inexpedient to press the arguments which have been advanced against tied loans to the logical conclusion to which they lead, it may nevertheless be extremely useful to cite the adherence of the United States to a policy of tied loans as a defence against any objections which the United States authorities may advance to those forms of trade barrier or commercial discrimination which other countries find it politically difficult to relinquish. It may be worth establishing our case in respect of tied loans, even if we are to use it as a shield and not as a sword!

SECRET. 1. Negotiations under way here for months with Soviet authorities respecting credits[70] are still deadlocked. We have offered to lend at the borrowing cost of the Canadian Government plus a small charge for overhead. These are the identical terms we have offered to all other Allied Governments. The Soviet authorities still press for exceptional treatment, pointing out that the Americans have agreed to make loans to the U.S.S.R. at 2⅜% to clear up the amounts outstanding in respect of materials ordered under Lend-Lease. They say that their Government cannot see their way clear to accepting our interest rate which would amount to 3.1%. We have pointed out that the cost of borrowing to the Canadian Government is higher than to the United States and that in principle we were going further than the United States in that we were prepared to offer the same basis for determining interest rates in granting credits for reconstruction purposes as we were in granting credits to clean up Mutual Aid orders.

2. A further obstacle to agreement is that the U.S.S.R. is unwilling to make partial payment in cash. Here, too, we have asked the U.S.S.R. for no more than we have requested from all other Allied Governments.

3. I see no likelihood that we shall agree to grant the U.S.S.R. more favourable treatment than we are according other Allies.

4. Do you think that the U.S.S.R. is likely to persist in their attitude or will they modify their stand when they have closed with the United States on the terms of the U.S. credit? Our view is that we have no great interest in forcing credits on the U.S.S.R., and we have done our part in offering a credit to them on the same terms as to others. As a result of the difficulties we are experiencing in our negotiations we shall probably soon have to require the U.S.S.R. to pay cash for all purchases in Canada.

5. Soviet representatives have insistently asked for a 25% reduction in the price of certain industrial equipment ordered under Mutual Aid, cost of which they undertook to pay if deliveries were made after the cessation of Mutual Aid. It now seems likely that they may pay the full price in view of our willingness to reduce substantially the price of flat cars ordered as Mutual Aid but not delivered as such.

SECRET. Your telegram No. 222 of October 31st, regarding extension of credits to Soviet Union.

1. I did not expect Soviet Government to agree to make partial payment in cash because this might prejudice their negotiations for credits from other Governments.

2. On the other hand, I have thought that eventually they will agree to pay us a higher rate of interest than the United States, but may do so only after negotiations have been completed for a United States credit covering purchases for reconstruction purposes.

3. Members of the United States Congress, who visited Moscow in September, expressed doubts about purpose for which proposed credit is to be used. They want to be satisfied that large proportion of credit will not be used for essential military purposes.

4. This and general political difficulties merits delay in granting of United States credit. In this event, Soviet Government may become more inclined to agree to our terms. I see, therefore, no reason to make concessions at this stage.

We have been unable to settle our differences with the Soviet authorities relating to credits, both commercial and those covering goods originally bought as Mutual Aid, or relating to the prices to be paid for industrial equipment. As a consequence, we have not since November 11th extended credit and have required the Soviet authorities to pay cash for all purchases. In the case of wheat, however, we have agreed to fill the outstanding contracts and all the shipments of wheat which were scheduled for November will go forward on credit basis.

The Soviet Commercial Counsellor, Mr. Krotov, in an interview with Mr. Ilsley pressed hard for better terms for the Mutual Aid cleanup than for commercial credits on the grounds that the United States was extending special terms for the Lend-Lease cleanup, i.e. under the 3-C Agreements.[71] Our reply was that we are in fact granting the U.S.S.R. better treatment than the U.S. by offering the same terms for commercial credits as for Mutual Aid. In our case the interest rate on both is based on cost to the Canadian Government plus a small charge for administration. We have applied this basis to all borrowers and are not prepared to make an exception for the U.S.S.R.

Krotov expressed regret at the change he said he had detected in the Canadian attitude toward the Soviet. Relations had been most cordial during the period of Mutual Aid and he thought it a pity that we should allow relations to deteriorate because of the small amount of money involved in our differences. Our view is that with the cessation of Mutual Aid, the Soviet is attempting to drive inordinately hard bargains and that they give no weight to our liberal Mutual Aid attitude nor to the preferred treatment we granted them after the cessation of Mutual Aid. We undertook to supply them with ten mine sweepers after Mutual Aid ended and are also meeting the expenses in Canada of the Soviet crews.

In allowing them to buy on credit at all after September 2 we were treating them more favourably than we did most other Allied Governments who were required to pay cash until the credit agreements were concluded.

Dear Mr. Krotov:

Following our discussion the other day, at which you asked me if the Government would consider again the question of the terms on which it would advance credit to the U.S.S.R., I took the matter up with my colleagues in the Cabinet. I am writing now to inform you that the Canadian Government are not prepared to alter the offers that we had previously made to your Government in this matter.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have the honour to refer to the conversations of Dr. L. Feierabend, the Czechoslovak Minister of Finance, and myself with you, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Ilsley, and Dr. Clark, Minister of Trade and Commerce Mr. MacKinnon, and Mr. Oliver Master, regarding credit to Czechoslovakia for the purchase of Canadian produced goods, and to submit a memorandum outlining the extent of the credit, and the list of goods which the Czechoslovak Government would like to buy in Canada.

Accept etc.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Mémorandum de la légation de Tchécoslovaquie

Memorandum by Legation of Czechoslovakia

The present rapid development of the war and the necessity to bring help and relief to the Czechoslovak Republic and to assure employment of her population as soon as the Nazi forces are expelled from her territories, have already lead [sic] my Government in London to make preparations for the renewal of economic life at home and of commercial intercourse with the United Nations.

In view of the previous successful trade between Canada and Czechoslovakia, future relations with Canada will again be an extremely important factor in the life of the liberated Czechoslovak Republic.

1. Czechoslovakia will require a considerable supply of Canadian goods for her reconstruction, the value of which will amount to $15,000,000.

The goods which Czechoslovakia would like to buy in Canada are approximately as follows:

Articles	Quantity in tons [metrical]	Approximate Value in Canadian dollars
Metals and Minerals
1. Copper	7.000	2,198,000
2. Lead	5.000	1,342,000
3. Nickel	2.400	2,043,000
5. Mica	150	6,600
6. Aluminium	1.000	363,000
		6,259,500
Food
7. Wheat	108,000	6,000,000
8. Fish [Tinned]	2,600	893,000
9. Dried Milk	220	?
		6,893,000
Other Goods
10. Calf Hides [Wet]	500	188,000
11. Kobalt Compounds	15	36,300
12. Nickel	120	39,336
13. Silicon Carbide	1,300	28,600
14. Pulp Forage Manufactures	6,000	336,600
15. Special Woods	?	?

2. The six years of German occupation have resulted in the destruction of Czechoslovakia's industrial and commercial organization to such an extent that the Republic would be able to purchase these goods only if necessary credit were granted to her by the Canadian Government.

The Czechoslovak Government should, therefore, greatly appreciate any assistance that could be extended to it in accordance with the Export Credit Insurance Act in order that trade between Canada and Czechoslovakia may be facilitated and developed.

This credit could be granted either through a guarantee by the Canadian Government of a loan contracted by the Czechoslovak Republic with a Canadian Bank, or through a direct loan given to the Czechoslovak Republic by the Canadian Government that the Czechoslovak Republic may be enabled to purchase and to pay the costs of the Canadian produced goods.

3. The purchase of wheat depends also on U.N.R.R.A., which has been requested to give its consent that the quantity of wheat bought by the Czechoslovak Government directly in Canada, would not be subtracted from the wheat quota allocated to the Czechoslovak Republic by the U.N.R.R.A.

4. If the full amount of credit granted by Canada is not exhausted within the first year, the residual amount could be transferred to the second year, or could be used for the purchase of larger quantities of goods than outlined above.

5. The Czechoslovak Republic would be able to commence repayment of this loan after four years, and would be able to complete its full payment within a further period of five years.

6. In view of the urgent need for relief and reconstruction immediately after the hostilities have ceased the Czechoslovak Government would be very grateful if a favourable consideration could be given by the Government of Canada to this matter as soon as convenient.

Ottawa, January 31, 1945

Dear Mr. Master:

Re: Export Credits and the Government of Czechoslovakia

I have now heard from Dr. Pavlasek regarding the proposed export credit to be provided by the Canadian Government to his Government, about some details respecting which I had written to him on December 5, 1944.†

You will recall that there has been some delay, due to Czechoslovakia's desire to ascertain from UNRRA that the purchase of wheat from Canada on credit terms would not prejudice the amount of wheat which UNRRA was prepared to make available to Czechoslovakia. Mr. Wilson, of your Department, was kind enough to ascertain in Washington that UNRRA had replied to Czechoslovakia on this matter on December 8, last, and Mr. Bryce communicated this information to Dr. Pavlasek, who was immediately able to confirm it and has now written to me to say that there is now nothing in the way of preparing a final draft of the credit agreement for $15,000,000.

Czechoslovakia, as you will recall, has suggested a few amendments in the agreement which we proposed, on most of which we were able to meet her. There was one minor point on which we asked for some further elucidation, and that was the suggested inclusion of allowance for additional expenses incurred in connection with the purchase, such as brokerage and similar expenses. In reply Dr. Pavlasek says that they are not able to forecast in any detail what these additional expenses will be. He suggests they might include commissions to an export or purchasing agent, and travelling expenses for a mission which would be sent to Canada for the purpose of buying the goods under the credit. He acknowledges that brokerage expenses are usually paid by the seller and would not, therefore, have to be provided for. We are able under the Act, and specifically under the second regulation passed under it, to provide for services or supplementary work done or to be done in connection with the goods purchased, and it is possible that legally this could include certain expenses to which the Czechoslovakian authorities were put in Canada in order to make the purchase. I am asking Mr. Tolmie of this Department to consider the legal aspect of this point, but I would appreciate very much hearing from you concerning the desirability on policy grounds of our including provision for such incidental expenses, particularly the cost of sending a purchasing mission here, the inclusion of which I think is questionable.

Dr. Pavlasek says also that they wish to alter slightly the list of goods to be purchased under the credit. The main change is that they wish to get 4,000 tons of semolina flour. I understand from Mr. Bryce that there may be some question of our ability of supply this item, and if so, I think we should let Dr. Pavlasek know right away so that they may make any other adjustments in the list as quickly as possible.

I am replying to Dr. Pavlasek today to say that we shall proceed immediately to redraft the agreement along the lines agreed. I shall send you a draft of this in the next day or two.

Yours very truly,

W. C. CLARK

Dear Mr. Clark:

With reference to your letter of January 31, I agree that, on policy grounds, it is questionable to include in the credit arrangement with Czechoslovakia provision for incidental purchasing expenses to be payable out of the proceeds of the loan. Nevertheless, the circumstances are exceptional and if such a concession is considered by the Czechoslovakian Government to be of material importance to them I would be inclined to allow such charges up to a maximum, say, of one-eighth of one percent of the amount of the credit, or of such portion of the credit as is expended on goods that involve some special investigation or other purchasing difficulty. This would exclude wheat. So far as the terms of the agreement itself are concerned, I should think it would be well, before deciding precisely upon how this point should be covered, to put a little more pressure on Dr. Pavlasek to indicate what he thinks would be a reasonable maximum provision to meet purchasing costs of the type that he has in mind.

On the other question raised in your letter, semolina flour is normally made from Durum wheat and our information is that Canadian mills, now engaged up to their full capacity on ordinary flour, are not prepared to make the adjustments required to mill semolina from Durum wheat. Accordingly, if Czechoslovakia wants Durum semolina our supply position is unfavourable. If they are willing to take semolina produced from Red Spring wheat there is a much better prospect of making satisfactory supply arrangements.

Yours faithfully,

The Loan Agreement with Czechoslovakia concluded under the Export Credits Act was signed today by the Minister of Finance and the Czechoslovak Minister.[72] The loan is for $15,000,000, and attached to the agreement is a schedule of the supplies which the Czechoslovak Government intends to purchase in Canada with the proceeds. These are food stuffs and raw materials. I am asking the Department of Finance to provide a copy for our files.

Dr. Pavlasek came to see me after the signature in order to express his cordial thanks to all concerned for the assistance given his Government in the agreement and throughout the negotiations. He repeated what he has already said, that he hopes that his country will rely on imports of Canadian flour for a substantial part of its needs and that land now used for wheat growing will be put into pasture or employed for forage crops. He says that they wish very keenly to maintain an active trade with Canada and other countries to the west and he thinks that we can rely on his Government to support warmly plans for a return as soon as possible to multilateral trading and for the reduction of tariff barriers and other obstacles to commerce.

to whether it would be permissible to use the present credit also for the shipping expenses connected with the shipment of the material bought here to Czechoslovakia.

I am submitting this request to you as the Czechoslovak Government, under the present situation, is not in the position to finance the cost of the transportation of these goods from any other source and is unable to begin purchasing the goods in Canada unless the question of the transportation of this material is solved.

In view of the fact that the Czechoslovak territory has been liberated and that the Czechoslovak Government has returned to Praha, the rehabilitation of economic life in Czechoslovakia can now be executed.

I therefore trust that it will be possible for the Government of Canada to grant their consent to the extension of the use of the present credit facilities to the Government of Czechoslovakia for transportation purposes.

Dear Dr. Pavlasek,

I have your letter of May 10th relating to the credit agreement between your Government and the Government of Canada signed on March 1, 1945, and asking whether it would be permissible to use that credit to meet the costs of shipment to Czechoslovakia of the supplies purchased in Canada in accordance with that agreement since, you state, your Government is not in a position to finance from any other source the cost of transportation of these supplies.

As Mr. Bryce informed you by telephone last week, the Government has approved an Order-in-Council amending the Regulations under the Export Credits Insurance Act to provide for the use of funds made available under that Act for transportation charges outside of Canada "in cases where the Minister of Finance is satisfied that the cost of such charges cannot reasonably be met from other sources."

I have consulted the Minister of Finance in regard to your request and he has authorized me to inform you that he is satisfied in the case of Czechoslovakia that the cost of transportation charges from Canada to Czechoslovakia of the goods to be purchased under your credit agreement with Canada cannot at present reasonably be met from other sources, and that he therefore agrees that they may be met from the credits provided under the agreement.

You may take this letter, together with your own, as constituting an agreement to the use of the credit provided to the Government of Czechoslovakia for meeting shipping charges on the goods to be purchased in Canada in accordance with the terms of the agreement.

I am enclosing for your information and records a copy of the Order-in-Council P. C. 3357 of May 8, 1945,† amending the Regulations under the Export Credits Insurance Act to authorize the use of credits provided under that Act for delivery or transportation charges.

Sir,

I have the honour to express my thanks for the information contained in your letter of May 14th, that the Government of Canada has approved an order-in-council amending the regulations under the Export Credits Insurance Act to provide for the use of funds made available under that Act also for transportation charges outside of Canada.

I should also like to thank the Minister of Finance, the Hon. J. L. Ilsley, for his authorization that the transportation charges for the goods to be purchased under our credit agreement with Canada may be met from the credits provided for under the agreement.

As however, by using the credit also for the transportation costs the amount allotted for the purchase of goods in Canada would be considerably reduced — the cost of transportation being estimated at approximately four million dollars — my Government would be very grateful if the Government of Canada could kindly extend the credit agreement concluded on March 1st by a further four million dollars.

Should direct credit from the Canadian Government to the Government of Czechoslovakia not be available, my Government would appreciate it if this credit of four million dollars could be established in the form of a bank credit, backed by the guarantee of the Canadian Government, under terms similar to those in our agreement of March 1st.

Now that the entire territory of Czechoslovakia has been liberated and President Beneš has returned to Praha with the whole government, I am convinced that this great plan of Canadian assistance to Czechoslovakia will be successfully carried out. The fact that Hamburg will again be available as a port for shipments to Czechoslovakia will greatly facilitate the delivery of the commodities.

Dear Mr. Mackenzie:

Re: Amendment to Schedule of Export Credit Agreement with Czechoslovakia

The Czechoslovak Minister to Canada was in to see Mr. Bryce of this Department the other day to explain that because of the great destruction which parts of Czechoslovakia suffered in the closing months of the war in Europe, they find it necessary to import some supplies which they had hoped to be able to obtain from domestic sources. In particular, I understand, they want to secure meat and fats from North America and, if possible, some from Canada, to be paid for out of the credits which we have undertaken to advance to them. For this purpose it will be necessary to amend the schedule to the Agreement.

I am writing to say that this Department would be quite prepared to agree to any amendments to this schedule which your Department feels are feasible in order to meet the requirements of Czechoslovakia. I hope that every possible consideration will be given to Czechoslovak requirements at this time and that strenuous efforts will be made to assist them if at all possible. One for the considerations which I know this Department — and, I believe, the Government — had in mind in making this Credit Agreement with Czechoslovakia was the importance of a speedy economic recovery in that country in setting an example to other countries of Central and Eastern Europe and thus helping to promote a prompter recovery in this important area.

Yours very truly,

W. A. MACKINTOSH[74]

Dear Mr. Mackintosh,

Thank you for your letter of October 31st with reference to the Export Credit Agreement with Czechoslovakia.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon has expressed his agreement that, in so far as supply conditions permit, Canada should endeavour to meet the request recently received from Dr. Pavlasek that his Government be permitted to purchase fats and meats which were not originally included in the list of commodities to be purchased under the Credit Agreement.

In view of the request put forward on behalf of the Czechoslovakian Government and of the agreement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, coupled with the agreement of your Department, I should think that formal amendment of the schedule to the Credit Agreement is not necessary. Paragraph two of the Agreement, which reads as follows:

"The Government of the Czechoslovak Republic agrees to utilize the said credit in purchasing from Canadian exporters the Canadian-produced goods referred to in Schedule 'A' hereto, in the quantities therein specified, subject to such variations in quantity and such substitutions or additions of other Canadian-produced goods as may be agreed upon by the said Government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce of Canada."

was drawn, I understood, purposely to permit a considerable degree of freedom to meet Czechoslovakia's most pressing needs without formal change in the Agreement itself or in the schedule.

The real difficulty at present is in the supply position. Fats, in particular, are in very short supply and it is doubtful whether we should be able to export any at all during the coming winter. Tinned meats are under allocation to the Combined Food Board and no allocation has been made to Czechoslovakia for the last quarter of 1945. I may say, for your own information, that we have been urging the Czechs to present their requirements to the Combined Boards ever since March of this year.

I agree with you that every possible consideration should be given to Czechoslovak requirements at this time and can assure you that strenuous efforts will be made to assist them if it is at all possible. Czechoslovakian meat requirements, however, must still be passed by the Combined Food Board and if the Czechoslovakian Minister will continue to keep in touch with this Department everything possible will be done to make supplies available to them.

I shall be glad if you will be good enough to let me know whether an amendment to the schedule of the Agreement appears to you to require something more in the way of formal action than I have indicated. If it would meet the necessities of the situation I would be pleased to keep you informed of any additions to Schedule 'A' which are agreed to between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Czechoslovakian Government.

Yours very truly,

M. W. MACKENZIE

Dr. Steenberghe said he would not dwell on Holland's difficulties. They were well known. He hoped that the task of reconstruction would be assisted by an international loan at a later date, but, in the meantime, it was necessary to make credit arrangements to meet the Netherlands requirements for the next five years.

He said it was difficult for two reasons to forecast post-war trade between Canada and the Netherlands: first, the expansion in Canadian industry during the war offered additional possibilities for export; and, second, it was most difficult to determine what Holland's needs would be, particularly in the area yet to be liberated. However, he looked to a fifty per cent increase to $15,000,000 a year in imports from Canada.

At the moment The Netherlands cannot continue to pay cash for their requirements much less pay it in advance. They sought a credit to cover the needs of the next five years, $25,000,000 in the first year with the privilege of carrying over the unexpended portion to the second year; and $15,000,000 for the second to fifth years, inclusive: repayment to begin in the sixth year and continue through to the tenth year in equal amounts of $17,000,000. The $15,000,000 requested for the second through the fifth years is expected to cover imports from Canada during that period. The imports, particularly in the latter years will include much wheat. The increase in exports over the prewar figure will be made up of industrial items.

Dr. Clark said that our appropriation for export credits was limited and that we intended to ask for an increase. It might not at the moment be possible formally to grant a credit to cover the five-year requirements, but he thought an understanding could be reached. The Dutch said that they were willing to discuss the length of the credit although they would prefer to have provision made now for their full five-year needs.

Of their needs in the first year frozen meat, farm machinery and fertilizer would comprise the larger portion. They would want canned meat and medical supplies in lesser amounts and lumber, asbestos, newsprint, paper, woodpulp, pulp wood, trucks, general industrial machinery and equipment, aluminum, nickel, and insulating board. Some allocations had already been made by the Combined Boards for the third and fourth quarters of this year; others were being sought.

Mr. Robertson suggested that the list of commodities be discussed with Trade and Commerce. As to the meat requirements, he doubted whether the renewed agreements with the United Kingdom would leave anything available. However, it was pointed out that the food was under Combined Food Board allocation and the Dutch either had or would seek Combined Board allocations for all commodities.

In estimating the dollar requirements for the first year, no account had been taken of Canadian troop expenditures and no allowances made by the Dutch for troop guilders. The Dutch hoped for a credit that would cover all their needs, which would be partially off-set by the troop credits. Mr. Bryce said that no arrangement had yet been made with the Dutch for troop guilders obtained by Canada from Supreme Allied Headquarters.

On the subject of United States discussions, Dr. Steenberghe said he had in mind an arrangement similar to the one made by the U.S. with the French under which goods would move either on Lend-Lease or on long-term loan. The Dutch had submitted figures two months ago to the F.E.A. It was expected that negotiations would start next week.

Dr. Clark observed that the U.S.-French agreement calls for payment by the French of 20 per cent in cash on certain requirements. He asked whether the Dutch would request the U.S. to waive the cash payment. The Dutch replied that they expected to pay for all ships in cash but hoped for raw materials under Lend-Lease or long-term loan.

Mr. Rasminsky said that Canada had a twofold interest in receiving a part payment in cash, arising from the limited appropriation which will have to be used to meet in part the needs of other countries whose position was not as relatively good as that of the Dutch, and the Canadian United States dollar position. There was a rather high U.S. dollar content of exports and Canada would want to be left at least even on its U.S. dollar outlays.

He asked the Dutch if they would disclose their financial position. Dr. Riemens said that the short-term position was poor; the long-term position much better, particularly when the Dutch assets were unfrozen. Their foreign exchange holdings were limited. He mentioned the loan negotiated with private U.S. banks under the terms of which the Dutch pledged $100,000,000 in gold against a credit for immediate purchases. Apart from that they had $150,000,000 at their disposal plus $80,000,000 in gold blocked in South Africa. On a basis of U.S. Treasury figures, the Dutch had investments in stocks in the United States of some $600,000,000 and $100,000,000 in bonds held in Holland. (He excluded the holdings of the East Indies.) He undertook to provide the exact figures later. (See footnote)[75]

On the subject of the Netherlands East Indies, Dr. Steenberghe explained that whereas the N.E.I. were politically one with the Netherlands they made their own financial arrangements; borrowed on their own credit, either with or without guarantees of the mother country. The East Indian position was considerably better than that of the Netherlands, but although their immediate needs were not as urgent as those of the motherland, nevertheless, their long term position was not good because of the tremendous reconstruction requirements which will take up all the N.E.I. reserves. There was, therefore, no prospect of an N.E.I. loan to the Netherlands for anything longer than a few months.

In reply to the question as to whether the Dutch were seeking a general credit or one to be used against a definite schedule of purchases, Dr. Steenberghe stated that a general credit would be necessary because the Dutch are not in a position to know what their needs will be. They are sure that they will require large quanities of wheat in the second, third, fourth and fifth years, probably in the amounts taken prewar, but their other requirements were uncertain. However, if no credit was made available to them and they were unable to find foreign currency, they would be forced to use inferior wheats although their preference was to use a percentage of Canadian with their native and other wheats.

Mr. Robertson asked if the Dutch expected the continuation of a state import monopoly during the term of the agreement. Dr. Steenberghe said that because it would be necessary to control currency he felt it would be necessary to control imports and he expected buying to be done by the state. Dr. Steenberghe said this would not mean that the whole program of imports would be covered by a credit agreement. Their estimated requirements were conservative. Other items would be needed and the agreement did not represent the limit of export possibilities.

Mr. van Stolk felt he should distinguish between exclusive monopoly by the state and state control. What was envisaged was state control under which free enterprise would operate, and not exclusive state monopoly.

When questioned as to the omission of rolling stock from the Dutch requirements, Dr. Steenberghe explained that first the conditions in the Netherlands yet to be liberated was unknown. However, since it is expected that all the bridges will be destroyed, no rolling stock will be needed for the first or second years. In view of this the Dutch had increased their requirements for trucks. Further, railways were not an important means of transportation in Holland. Sixty per cent of all inland transportation had in the past been by barge.

> In later discussions it was explained that the figures were net. Allowance had been made for the Bretton Woods commitment of $80,000,000. There was moreover approximately $45,000,000 still available from the loan negotiated with private U.S. banks.

Mr. Robertson asked on what general economic policy the needs had been estimated. Did the Dutch intend to continue their prewar fiscal policy or to seek greater economic independence in the post-war to cut down exchange charges; e.g., are they planning to increase their production of wheat? Dr. Steenberghe emphasized the Dutch dependence on foreign trade and said that they would seek a great volume of imports and exports. If insufficient assistance were forthcoming from other nations, the Netherlands might be forced to self-sufficiency, but it would not be by choice. As to their wheat program he said that that Germans had increased the grain acreage somewhat but at the cost of pasturage. He did not expect that there would be any increase over the prewar wheat acreage because of the emphasis that would be placed on dairy products. The budget for transitional needs, he said, was based on the assumption of the resumption of wide international trade. Their objective is to reconstruct the normal economic life to active external trade. Holland, he said, must rely on foreign trade, shipping and specialized agriculture.

He expected there would be heavy Dutch requirements for livestock. It was estimated that thirty-five to forty per cent of the cattle had already been removed by the Germans. He feared that the livestock population might be reduced overall by sixty per cent of the prewar figure.

Mr. Robertson asked whether the Dutch looked for restitution in kind from Germany. The reply was that it was hoped for but not taken into account in the budget. There were, Dr. Steenberghe said, so many claims and some of them big ones.

Mr. Robertson suggested that the commodity position be examined with Trade and Commerce. Mr. Mackenzie arranged to do so at three o'clock the same day.

He suggested that the financial aspect be considered with the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada and a meeting was arranged for three o'clock in Dr. Clark's office on the following day.

As to shipping, the Dutch said that they had now been allocated 1,700 tons a day for the territory now liberated. They are seeking additional tonnage. The Dutch had assumed no responsibility for supplying the territory now occupied as it was still a military responsibility although limited to the prevention of unrest and disease. The 1,700 tons of shipping allocated was supplementary to military supply. The problem of stockpiles for non-liberated Holland was also a military responsibility but the Dutch were trying to have shipping and supplies made available to them. The arrangements with the United Kingdom were that any supplies released to the Dutch would have to be replaced.

On the subject of relief in Holland after V-E day when presumably the Dutch will be called to take over with the ending of military responsibility, a take over which may come more quickly than it did in Belgium, Dr. Steenberghe said that there was some difficulty between the governments concerned over this question. The Dutch claim they cannot take over responsibility unless more supplies are allocated, more shipping made available and improved opportunities to procure supplies are furnished. There is doubt too as to the length of the period of military responsibility.

The program the Dutch were presenting was not one however for military relief but covered the period beginning at the termination of military responsibility.

Mr. Robertson said that Canada had sent a note to all Allied Governments identical with a note sent by the United States and the United Kingdom on military relief setting out that accounts for civilian relief provided under military auspices would be presented in due course.[76]

As to the recent UNRRA offer of emergency assistance, the Dutch said they had not accepted it as the offer was very small being only $10,000,000 for all liberated countries. The Dutch[77] felt that if they can get their supplies themselves they will not need the help of UNRRA.[78]

I will redraft the letter, in respect of which there are several minor changes, and Clark wondered if you would get out a redraft of the agreement.

The amount of the credit in the agreement should be left blank for the time being, as it depends upon what is done in regard to the French. In fact, I think

The agreement should be drafted to be between the Government of Canada and the Bank for the Netherlands Indies, which is an agency of the Government of the Netherlands Indies having its Head Office in Paramaribo, Surinam. The obligation will be guaranteed by the Government of the Netherlands Indies. Dr. de Iongh will send us a legal opinion regarding the status of that bank. The bank was set up by the Government, and is owned partly by the Government and partly by some of the private banks of the Netherlands Indies. It exercises some, if not all, of the functions of a Central Bank, and all its obligations are guaranteed by the Government of the Netherlands Indies. Mr. de Iongh is to look into the question of whether any special action of the Government of the Netherlands Indies will be needed to guarantee this particular obligation, or whether it will suffice merely to have an official letter from the appropriate Minister of the Government, stating that the general guarantee applies to this particular obligation.

The terms, period, interest rate, etc., are to be exactly the same as in the Netherlands agreement.

Dear Dr. Crena de Iongh,

Referring to our conversations in regard to the export credit to be made available to the Netherlands East Indies, I am glad to be able to inform you that I am now in a position to recommend that the amount of this credit should be $15,000,000 rather than the smaller amount which we discussed while you were in Ottawa. I trust this will meet satisfactorily all your requirements up to the time when the second credit can be arranged.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the negotiations now taking place between the Minister of Finance of the Canadian Government and the Bank for the Netherlands Indies. It is intended that the Minister of Finance and the Bank should conclude an agreement whereby the Canadian Government will lend $15,000,000 to the Bank, to enable the Bank to provide funds to the Government of the Netherlands Indies to purchase Canadian-produced goods for export to the Netherlands Indies. The loan would be made under the Export Credits Insurance Act of Canada.

I desire to inform you that the Bank for the Netherlands Indies is an agency of the Government of the Netherlands Indies.

The Netherlands Minister for the Colonies on July 17, 1944, issued a resolution guaranteeing the performance of the obligations of the Bank for the Netherlands Indies; a copy of an English translation of the resolution† is already in the hands of the Minister of Finance, the Honourable J. L. Ilsley. The effect of this resolution is that, if the proposed loan agreement is made between the Minister of Finance and the Bank, the following will be guaranteed to the Canadian Government by the Government of the Netherlands Indies:

(a) the repayment of the loan according to the terms of the agreement;

(b) the payment of the bonds to be given as evidence of the indebtedness;

(c) the fulfillment of all other terms of the agreement.

I am glad to assure you that the Government of the Netherlands Indies will use the moneys advanced under the agreement exclusively to pay the costs of Canadian-produced goods purchased for export to the Netherlands Indies.

Dear Mr. Minister: —

You will recall the discussion in my office at which you and Dr. Riemens were present and in the course of which you asked whether it would be possible for the Government of Canada to increase by another $25,000,000 the amount of export credits which it would place at the disposal of the Netherlands Government for purchases during the twelve months' period commencing May 1st, when our credit agreement was signed. At the time, you and Dr. Riemens indicated that while you would prefer that this $25,000,000 be in addition to the total of $85,000,000 which we have already agreed to provide, it would be satisfactory to you if the $25,000,000 were transferred from the $60,000,000 which was to have been provided in later years.

The agreement was signed on October 9, 1945. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1945, No. 31.

I have now had an opportunity of discussing this matter with my colleagues in the Cabinet, and am able to tell you that when the Government's lending authority under the Export Credits Insurance Act has been increased by Parliament, we will be prepared to provide you with an additional $25,000,000 in credits for use as soon as you require it. We decided that, for the time being, we would prefer to limit our total commitment to the $85,000,000 already noted, leaving until later a decision as to whether or not the total would be increased if you should need more than $85,000,000 in all.

Mémorandum du ministère des Finances à l'adjoint exécutif au gouverneur de la Banque du Canada

Memorandum from Department of Finance to Executive Assistant to Governor of the Bank of Canada

Re: Netherlands Credit

As I believe I told you, the Netherlands Minister and Mr. Riemens have spoken to me about the possibility of the Netherlands getting a larger amount of credit from Canada than that upon which we had agreed in the past, and being permitted to use it more quickly than was contemplated when we made our arrangements last Spring.

Our original agreement with the Netherlands was made before the bulk of the Netherlands was liberated. Since liberation it has become apparent that the needs of the Netherlands are greater than was anticipated, and they have also found that more of the goods which they want to obtain are available in Canada than they had expected and can be obtained here at prices that are satisfactory to them. As a consequence of both these factors, they would now like to make larger purchases than they anticipated and would like to be able to borrow from us for this purpose. They described to me in general terms a program of purchases amounting to about $130,000,000, up to May 1, 1947. In general, this sounded to me like a practical sort of program from the point of view of the type of supplies they want to obtain. They suggest that for this purpose they would like to secure a credit of approximately this magnitude. I suggested, however, that they should allow in that program for some portion payable in cash, which would reduce the credit requirements to about $110,000,000, which is the figure they suggested some months ago to the Minister of Finance.

I would be quite prepared myself to support a credit of this kind to the Netherlands, all things considered. I would be very interested, however, in having your opinion and that of others in the Bank, if you can get an opportunity to speak to them about it. My own belief is that the Dutch are an excellent moral risk, and that while their economic future is undoubtedly more uncertain than it ever has been before, we can expect them to make pretty strenuous efforts to rebuild their trade and to repay what they borrow.

This, however, is not likely to be the end of it. Mr. Snouck has indicated to me that his Government would hope that we could lend them further amounts after May 1, 1947, which might raise the total of their indebtedness to us to something over $200,000,000. I have told him that I thought we should not endeavour to reach any agreement or commitment on this further amount for some time.

There are one or two other matters to be taken into account in determining the needs of the Netherlands for credits. We shall probably be paying them something on balance for goods and services supplied to the Canadian Army in excess of supplies provided by Canada for the Netherlands forces, including surpluses. This however, is unlikely to exceed $10,000,000 or $20,000,000.

The Netherlands representatives are to be in Ottawa December 17th, 18th and 19th, although their visit may possibly be delayed a day. I shall be getting in touch with you subsequently about attending meetings with these representatives and I hope you will be able to reserve some time for this purpose.

Mémorandum du ministère des Finances d'une réunion avec des représantants des Pays-Bas

The following met in Room 123 East Block to discuss further credits to the Netherlands and related matters:

For the Netherlands:	Mr. Snouck Hurgronje, Dr. Steenberghe, Mr. Phillipse, Dr. Riemens, Mr. Albarda.
For Canada:	Dr. Mackintosh Department of Finance R. B. Bryce
	Mr. Pierce Mr. Starnes Department of External Affairs
	The Department of Trade and Commerce was unable to send representative because of another meeting taking place at the same time.

Mr. Steenberghe, after noting the appreciation of his Government for Canada's action during this year, explained that their requirements from Canada were now a good deal larger than they had outlined in April last, because they had found after liberation that the Netherlands needed more than had been anticipated, and also because they had found Canada can supply much more in the way of things they need than had been expected. He also stated that the Netherlands would be glad to get any information Canada could give them regarding the articles which Canada would like to import from the Netherlands, as this would help them in making repayments. He stated in reply to questions that they have already made commitments of something over $39 million against the credits we have already provided them, including the interim credit.

Of this $40 m. some $15½m. is for wheat, and several million more for oats, barley, horses, linseed oil, meat, etc. He will give us the details subsequently.

He went on to state that they now estimate the amount of their requirements up until May 1, 1946, will be about $25 m. in addition to the $40 m. already obtained. For the following year, from May of 1946 to May of 1947, they estimate they will need an additional $75 m., making a total of $140 m. for the two years. In the three following years they expect they will be buying something of the order of $55 m. a year from Canada. The general nature of the purchases they wish to make on the scales indicated includes foodstuffs, particularly wheat, raw materials, chemicals, railway equipment, trucks and other transportation equipment, and machine tools. Their program beyond May, 1947, is still uncertain, of course, and even their program during the year May, 1946, to May, 1947, to some lesser degree. In answer to a question from me, he stated that their contemplated program in the U.S. amounted to about $500 million in the year 1946. The American purchases will cover requirements of a more temporary nature than the Canadian, and taper off more rapidly. They include large amounts of special food-stuffs, such as meat and milk, which the Netherlands will produce domestically later on, as well as substantial amounts of capital equipment to re-equip Netherlands industries. In answer to another question, he indicated that they expected to finance this largely on credit, although they were not sure as to whether it would be an Export-Import Bank loan or a loan more akin to that provided to the United Kingdom by the U.S., on more favourable terms and conditions. They are particularly concerned about the shipping requirements on American loans.

There was a question raised about the possibilities of buying materials in Canada for the assembly of Ford cars in Amsterdam. They do not know whether they should buy this in Canada or in the U.S., nor who should approach the Ford Co., — the Netherlands authorities or the Canadian Government authorities. It was agreed they should talk to the Department of Trade and Commerce about this matter.

I asked Riemens whether they expected to be able to make cash payments earlier than they had expected last April, i.e., before May of 1947, as this would affect their requirements at that time. He replied that their negotiations regarding the unfreezing of assets were going fairly well in the U.K., were proceeding now with some dispatch in the U.S., but were going ahead with least progress in Canada. They expected some agreement in the U.S. in the reasonably near future, but the process of unfreezing under the agreement will probably be a slow one and they will be uncertain as to the amounts they can count on. For that reason they do not feel that they can undertake to make their cash payments to us prior to May 1st of 1947.

Steenberghe then stated that his Government would like, in addition to increasing the amount of the credit to cover the program they had outlined, also to extend the period in order to make it similar to the credits we have granted the Belgians and undertaken to grant the French. Their wish would be to consolidate the $25 m. already provided with the amounts to be provided in future, including that for the repayment of the $15 m. interim advances, and to start repayment in 1950 and carry it on up to 1976 or thereabouts. They would also prefer, if possible, to arrange credits to cover the period up to 1950.

I suggested that it would probably be difficult for us to make commitments as to the amount of credit to be extended beyond May of 1947, and Dr. Mackintosh agreed, mentioning particularly that it would be difficult to do this when the amounts involved were so substantial. I also stated that it would be necessary if repayment did not commence until 1950 and went on until 1976, to charge an interest rate slightly exceeding 3%, although possibly lower than 3 1/10%. I suggested that they might consider the time repayment should start in the light of this interest question.

It was noted that we would go over their buying program in more detail during the afternoon at the suggested meeting with the Department of Trade and Commerce.

I mentioned the other major items involved in the Netherlands balance of payments with us. I stated that the Canadian Army owed the Netherlands a substantial amount for supplies and services obtained in the Netherlands while the Netherlands Army was, in turn, buying supplies and equipment from the Canadian Army and from the Department of Munitions and Supply here.[80] The Netherlands authorities themselves thought the amounts payable by the Canadian Army would be about 80 million guilders, and the amounts payable to Canada by the Netherlands Army about 40 m. guilders. I pointed out that in addition to these there were the more complicated items of the payment for the Canadian portion of the civilian supplies distributed by the military forces, and the "hot" or "black" guilders held by the Canadian Army. However, after account is taken of all these items there would, I thought, be some balance in favour of the Netherlands which could be utilized in buying here and which might therefore reduce their requirements of $140 m. although the amount of such reduction is very uncertain at present. Riemens asked whether we would be prepared to recognize net payments made as a result of these Army transactions as coming within the cash portion of the program. I said I would not like to answer that definitely without consultation with the F.E.C.B.[81] authorities, but that I thought it likely we would be prepared to regard any Canadian dollars obtained as a result of such settlements as convertible. (I felt that this was desirable in view of the attitude which the F.E.C.B. has recently been taking in regard to dealings with continental countries, and also in view of our obtaining the condition of convertibility from the Netherlands in regard to any guilders that we acquired.)

We agreed to meet again with the Department of Trade and Commerce and to endeavour to see Mr. Ilsley in the next few days.

Le ministre des Finances au ministre des Pays-Bas
Minister of Finance to Minister of The Netherlands

Ottawa, December 28, 1945

Dear Mr. Minister,

I have discussed with my colleagues in the Cabinet today the matters which were discussed last week with yourself and the party headed by Dr. Steenberghe, and I am writing to inform you of the substance of the views of the Canadian Government.

In the first place I want to assure you that the Canadian Government has a close and sympathetic interest in the needs of your country and in the problems of its reconstruction. The association of Canada with the Netherlands which arose out of the circumstances of the war, and particularly out of the presence in the Netherlands of a large part of the Canadian Army, is one that we cherish and which we hope will lead to enduring friendship between the two countries.

We have considered the program of purchases in Canada which your delegation showed to us last week, including supplies to the order of approximately $150,000,000 in the period May 1, 1945, to May 1, 1947, and supplies to a value of approximately $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 a year in the next three years. Broadly speaking, this appears to us a practical and reasonable program which we wish to assist you in financing.

We have considered this program as a whole but we do not feel prepared at this time to enter into commitments for financing more than the first two years of it, i.e., your estimated requirements up to May 1, 1947. We will be glad to discuss the financing of your requirements in later years some time in the latter part of 1946 or early in 1947, when we can see a little more clearly the way in which these operations would fit in with our general situation and policies, if this would be convenient to you.

At the present time we would like to limit the amount of credit to be provided to you under the revised agreement to a total of $125,000,000. As you know, we have made substantial commitments to other nations, and we must reserve some amounts to be used in meeting requests about which we have as yet only preliminary information. We believe that this amount would enable you to pay all the items in your program required up until early in 1947, and to cover such forward commitments as you are likely to have to make for deliveries up until April of that year. It should be possible for you to meet some portion of the cost of your program from receipts from Canada in respect of goods and services supplied to the Canadian Army by the Netherlands, even after allowance is made for offsetting payments in respect of the purchase of surplus stores and equipment and other Army accounts. In addition, unless serious new delays are experienced, it should be possible, I think, for the Netherlands to make some part, if not all, of the agreed amount of purchases for cash obtained from the sale to Canada of gold or foreign exchange in the early part of 1947, if not in the latter part of 1946. If there should be any difficulties in these other sources of financing prior to May 1, 1947, they could be taken into account when we meet to discuss the provision of further amounts of credit for later use.

The Canadian Government is prepared to agree to the revision of the terms of the enlarged credit along the lines discussed last week, that is, providing for repayment in twenty-seven annual instalments commencing in 1950, and with interest rates averaging approximately 3.05%.

I hope that these points will be satisfactory to your authorities and that we can proceed to complete the new agreement early next month.[82]

Yours very truly,

J. L. ILSLEY

IMMEDIATE. Following for Pearson from Clark, Begins: Would you please transmit the following confidential message as quickly as possible to M. Gutt,[83] care of the Belgian Embassy, from the Hon. J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance:

On Friday last the Mutual Aid Board considered at length the policy it would follow in respect to providing under Mutual Aid supplies to Belgium and certain other European Allies in the light of other requirements for Mutual Aid and the general war situation. The conclusion reached was that only supplies required for direct military use in the war could be provided as Mutual Aid to Belgium and such other countries, and that raw materials, foodstuffs, machinery, rolling stock and civilian type supplies generally could only be provided on the basis of cash or credit purchases. Any undertaking to extend Mutual Aid to these European Allied Nations beyond direct military supplies would involve an important change in Mutual Aid policy, which would have to be a matter for consideration by the Government to be responsible to the new Parliament, as the Government at present is restricting its action to that necessary to carry out established policy. There was keen appreciation of Belgium's urgent need for various civilian type supplies and every effort will be made to ensure that Belgium is enabled to obtain as much as possible of her essential requirements.

See Canada, Treaty Series, 1946, No. 19.
C. Gutt, former Minister of Finance of Belgium.

As all or practically all of Belgium's requirements from Canada appear to be of a civilian type and in view of the policy outlined above, we assume that there will be no need for any Mutual Aid agreement. We will therefore be prepared to arrange for settlement in cash for goods and services supplied to our forces by the Belgian authorities when satisfactory arrangements can be worked out by both sides with the United Kingdom, through whose agencies the Canadian forces receive these benefits from Belgium. We are also prepared to enter into a credit agreement with you along the general lines discussed when you were here.[84] In these discussions you originally suggested a thirty-year term but later indicated your willingness to consider a credit repayable in installments commencing in the sixth year and ending in the twentieth year. We would like to make the term of the credit accord as closely as possible with Belgium's needs and would be prepared to agree to repayment over a fifteen-year period, commencing with the sixth year, if you think this is the most appropriate term. However, as you were informed by Dr. Clark, the rate of interest we would be able to offer you would depend on the term of the credit, being higher for a longer term than for a shorter term. For an average term of about 5 years the rate would be two and one-quarter percent, for an average term of about 7 years, two and one-half percent, and for an average term of, say, twelve or thirteen years it would be approximately three percent.

When you were here you outlined a program which would have involved purchases of the order of $100 million. Whether supply conditions in Canada will make it possible to carry out the whole of that program, I am not in a position to say, but in any case it is practically certain that it will be necessary to spread your purchases over at least several quarters. This brings me to a difficulty from our point of view, which arises from the limited appropriation made available under our Act for direct loans to other Governments. As you will have noted, our statutory authority is limited at the present time, to $100 million. Some of that has already been used up and other credits are in various stages of negotiation. It is intended, however, to ask Parliament at the next session to increase our appropriation substantially and I have every confidence that some time next fall, we will have ample power to meet the whole of your requirements which may have to be financed by export credits. For the present, therefore, I would suggest that we arrange a credit of $25 million along the lines indicated above and that at the same time we have a supplementary exchange of notes expressing the intention of the two Governments to enter into a further export credit arrangement along the same lines as soon as we in Canada have obtained the necessary additional appropriation from Parliament. In the meantime, if you require additional amounts before such amendments can be obtained, we would be prepared to consider guaranteed credits under our Export Credits Insurance Act. As you are probably aware, we have already arranged to provide temporary advances under the powers of our war appropriation act to enable us to purchase as your agents locomotives and other items that will aid directly or indirectly in the prosecution of the war, and this should help to overcome any temporary shortage of funds under the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Mr. Gutt had participted in discussions in Ottawa on March 26, 1945.

You will recall the discussion concerning the agreed minimum proportion of your requirements to be purchased for cash. We would propose that purchases equal to twenty percent of the credits used, say, each month or each quarter, should be made with Canadian dollars obtained from the sale to Canada of gold or exchange convertible into gold. Any other Canadian dollars accrued or accruing to you from current payments to Belgium by Canada could be used to purchase here in addition and thereby reduce the amount of credit required. This would have the effect that five-sixths of Belgium's deficit on payments to and from Canada would be financed on credit, and only one-sixth by use of gold or its equivalent.

We would be glad to discuss these matters with you again at your earliest convenience, with a view to consummating an agreement as quickly as possible. A copy of this message is being furnished to Mr. Heyne[85] here.

Re: Export Credits for Belgium

I have already handed you a memorandum left with me by Mr. Couvreur of the Belgian Embassy, suggesting certain counter proposals in regard to export credits to Belgium. Mr. Couvreur's understanding of this proposal was that it would amount to an arrangement under which Belgium would offer credits to Canada, as well as Canada to Belgium, and at the conclusion of each year under which these credits were being drawn upon, a balance would be struck and the net indebtedness accumulated during the year would be reckoned. An amount equal to 20% or 25% of this net for the year would then be paid in gold or its equivalent and the balance would be funded in some way for a fairly long period on terms to be agreed in advance.

You will note that this resembles very much a combination of their proposed monetary agreement with an export credit arrangement to deal with the balance of indebtedness arising out of such a monetary agreement each year.

I am sending copies of the Belgian memorandum and this note to Mr. Pierce of External Affairs, Mr. Coyne of the Bank of Canada, and Mr. Max Mackenzie, of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mémorandum de l'ambassade de Belgique

Memorandum by Embassy of Belgium

The Belgian Government have examined the text of the cable forwarded by the Department of Finance to M. Gutt in Washington, as well as the dispatches from the Embassy of Belgium relative to the negotiations of M. Gutt and Baron Boël[86] with Canadian authorities on March the 26th at Ottawa. M. Gutt, who has communicated with the Belgian Government, has requested this Embassy to submit the following suggestions to the Canadian authorities.

As a rule Belgium does not wish to enter into a long-term credit with any other country with a view to securing agricultural and industrial commodities urgently needed for her economic war effort. Belgium's declared financial policy is to enter into mutual credit agreements with other countries. On these lines Belgium has signed agreements with the Netherlands, Great Britain and France. Belgium has also adopted this policy towards Argentina, Sweden, Portugal, Spain, etc.

The Belgian Government would like therefore the Canadian Government to consider the possibility of entering into a mutual credit agreement. In this case Belgium would be able to reimburse in Belgian commodities the amount of credit used. On the notice of withdrawal of the mutual credit agreement, Belgium would pay the balance due to Canada in gold or foreign currency. Canada and Belgium might also arrange that at the end of each year, the debtor country during that year pay in gold or in foreign currency to the creditor country 20% or 25% of its debit balance.

The Belgian Government would very much like to know what consideration the Canadian Government might be able to give to this counter proposal.

Reports from the Embassy of Belgium in Ottawa to the Belgian Government emphasize that Canada would not wish to be placed in the position of granting credits to Belgium if commodities purchased in other countries were paid for in cash (cfr. final paragraph of the notes[87] of the second meeting of March 26th held in Dr. Clark's office).

The Belgian Government wish to know if Dr. Clark's remark will be strictly adhered to. At present purchases in Argentina, Sweden, Portugal and Spain require either dollar or pound sterling. In accordance with the monetary agreement between Great Britain and Belgium, credits in excess of limit agreed upon are to be paid for in gold. Purchases made by Belgium in the United States are paid indirectly in gold.

M. Gutt will be in Ottawa at the end of this week or at the beginning of the following week, and upon completion of his negotiations he will leave Canada for Belgium. M. Gutt would very much like to bring the Belgian-Canadian financial negotiations to a definite conclusion before his departure from Canada.

TELETYPE EX-1670 Ottawa, April 30, 1945

Following for Stone from Clark, Begins: Would you please transmit the following message to M. Gutt at the Belgian Embassy, from me:

We have received from your Embassy in Ottawa a memorandum commenting on the export credit arrangements discussed with you and containing certain counter proposals which your Government have put forward for consideration. We may not fully understand all aspects of the counter proposals but generally speaking they seem to ignore several of the points important from Canada's point of view which we had explained to you and Baron Boël in our several discussions and I fear that they are not such as the Canadian Government could entertain.

In the first place, they appear to incorporate many of the features of the monetary agreement which you had discussed with us earlier in a preliminary way and which, for reasons we made clear, we had decided to defer. My feeling is that this counter proposal would have the same basic disadvantage as the proposed monetary agreement itself in suggesting to other countries that Canada and Belgium were setting up bilateral currency arrangements which if adopted by other countries, for instance the United States, would seriously militate against the interests of both Canada and Belgium.

Furthermore, I doubt very much whether we have any statutory authority which would enable the Canadian Government to borrow under the proposed mutual credit plan and in view of the probability that Belgium will need to buy substantially more from Canada than she will be able to export to Canada, the unreality of a reciprocal credit would be so apparent that I doubt whether we could contemplate asking our Parliament for the requisite authority. On the other hand, it would seem that it should be clearly understandable to other countries with which Belgium has already negotiated mutual credit agreements, that Belgium's arrangements with Canada and with the United States might be of a different nature.

I understand that you will be coming to Ottawa shortly and we will be glad to discuss these questions with you at that time. I thought, however, that you would prefer to have some preliminary indication of the difficulties which the counter proposals of your Government would create for the Government of Canada.

NOTES OF MEETING

Were present:

For Canada: Dr. W. C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance; Mr. M. W. Mackenzie, Deputy Minister, Department of Trade and Commerce; Mr. R. B. Bryce, Financial Investigator; Mr. H. F. Angus, Department of External Affairs; Mr. S. D. Pierce, Economic Division, External Affairs; Mr. J. E. Coyne, Executive Assistant to the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

For Belgium : M. C. Gutt, former Minister of Finance of Belgium; M. M. Heyne, Belgian Chargé d'Affaires a.i.; M. L. Couvreur, First Secretary of the Belgian Embassy.

M. Gutt recapitulates the reasons why Canada is not willing to enter into a reciprocal credit agreement with Belgium as they were outlined in a long telegram from the Canadian Department of Finance. M. Gutt understands these reasons. On the other hand, Belgium started reciprocal credit agreements two years ago at a time when she did not know Bretton Woods proposals would come into existence. In the reciprocal credit agreements of Belgium with the Netherlands, Great Britain and France provision is made that if one of the signatory parties enters into a larger financial agreement, such as the Bretton Woods proposals for instance, the reciprocal credit agreements would have to be adjusted. On principle, Belgium is reluctant to consider a long term credit with any other country because she is negotiating with other countries on the basis of her reciprocal credit. Nevertheless, if Canada maintains her position, Belgium will not persevere in this direction.

Dr. Clark stated that reciprocal credit agreements even with safeguarding stipulations to adjust them in case of multilateral credit agreements have nevertheless a tendency to perpetuate and therefore wreck the chances of a multilateral agreement. Canada is so closely related to the United States in financial matters that she would not like to do anything against the principle of multilateral agreement as it is laid down in the Bretton Woods proposals. Canada has no statutory powers to enter into a reciprocal credit agreement with Belgium. The Canadian Parliament is not likely to endorse such a policy. The Canadian Government is however willing to help Belgium in granting her an export credit for the amount of Belgian purchases in Canada.

M. Gutt pointed out that Belgium would not like any publicity about the credit granted by Canada. He is in favour of a loan for a short period, for instance ten years. In this respect, M. Gutt mentioned a conversation he had with M. Steenberghe[88] who recently concluded a credit in Canada on behalf of the Netherlands for a period of ten years with reimbursement at the end of the sixth year, interest of 2¼%, cash payment of 20% to be made in proportion of the credit used. This last information was given by Dr. Clark upon request of M. Gutt. Dr. Clark said also that certain arrangements had been made to adjust the rate of interest according to the average length of the credit. If Belgium uses the entire credit in the first year, the reimbursement which only takes place at the sixth year will make it a credit of an average period of 7½ years. Therefore, the rate of interest would be 2½% instead of 2¼%. Notes have been exchanged on the subject between the Canadian and Netherlands Governments.[89] Canada is prepared to enter into a similar agreement with Belgium even for a long period provided that the rates of interest would be adjusted accordingly. The rate of interest is payable as soon as the money has been drawn for buying Canadian supplies.

M. Gutt asked Dr. Clark what he really meant in emphasizing in a previous meeting that Canada would not wish to be placed in the position of granting credit to Belgium if commodities purchased in other countries were paid for in cash. M. Gutt stated that in Argentina, commodities could only be paid for in United States dollars. Even in the United States purchases are paid in U.S. dollars. Dr. Clark replied that the 20% of cash asked for in proportion of the purchases made by Belgium in Canada would be quite sufficient.

M. Gutt asked if he could receive a copy of the credit agreement between Canada and the Netherlands. He could ask a copy from the Netherlands Government but in order to lose no time he availed himself of the opportunity of being here to make this request. Dr. Clark said that he was quite willing to give him a copy in spite of the fact that this credit agreement was not for publication.[90]

Dr. Clark wanted to know Belgium's reply with regard to the granting of a credit as soon as possible. It was agreed upon that M. Gutt would be able to give a definite answer in a fortnight. Dr. Clark insisted because Canada under the Export Credit Insurance Act can only grant One Hundred Million dollars ($100,000,000) credit. Several countries have asked credits and Canada had to refuse the amounts requested for because she had allocated Twenty Five Million Dollars ($25,000,000) to Belgium.

When Parliament meets again after the general election there is no doubt that the ceiling of One Hundred Million Dollars ($100,000,000) credit will be raised and that Belgium will be in a position to increase her credit in Canada. Dr. Clark mentioned that, at the present time, France pays in cash for her purchases in Canada. She will contract in the autumn a big loan and the purchases in cash she is now making will account for the proportion of cash requirements asked for by the Canadian Government in granting a long-term loan.

Le ministère des Finances à l'ancien ministre des Finances de Belgique Department of Finance to former Finance Minister of Belgium

Ottawa, May 11, 1945

Dear Mr. Gutt:—

I am sending you enclosed two copies of the credit agreement[91] which we have recently concluded with another country, as you know, and of the accompanying letter, which contained certain collateral understandings. As Dr. Clark told you, we have been asked to keep this agreement and this letter confidential until we are instructed otherwise, and therefore this information is passed to you on a strictly confidential basis.

You will note in the last paragraph of the letter that it is provided that the agreed amount of cash purchases will be postponed until the third year of the agreement, rather than being carried out during the first two years. This we regard as an exceptional provision to meet the special circumstances arising from the difficulties which the country in question has faced in securing the release of its dollar assets from custodian and other controls. In the other agreements which we are negotiating, we are proposing that the purchases financed by the sale to Canada of gold or foreign exchange convertible into gold shall be made at the same time as the credits are being drawn upon. I would therefore suggest that for your purposes you consider the last paragraph replaced by the following sentences:

"To implement this intention it is understood that the Government of will at the end of each quarter commencing on or after this date during which the credits referred to in this letter are drawn upon, acquire Canadian dollars by the sale to Canada of gold or foreign exchange convertible into gold in an amount not less than 20% of the amount of credit utilized during each such quarter year. It is also understood that the Canadian dollars so acquired will be used either to meet the current requirements of in Canada, or to make repayments of the credits, or to redeem the bonds provided for under the agreement dated today or the subsequent agreement referred to in this letter."

If there are any questions you have concerning this form of agreement and letter, we would be glad to give you such further information as we can about them through M. Heyne.

Yours truly,

R. B. BRYCE

L'ambassadeur de Belgique au sous-ministre des Finances
Ambassador of Belgium to Deputy Minister of Finance

No. 4255/CL:975 Ottawa, le 14 août 1945

Monsieur le Vice Ministre,

Comme suite à notre conversation téléphonique de ce matin, j'ai l'honneur de vous confirmer que d'après des instructions arrivées à l'instant de Bruxelles, le Gouvernement belge est en principe d'accord pour la conclusion de l'emprunt de $25,000,000 (vingt cinq millions de dollars canadiens) mentionné dans la lettre que M. Bryce a adressée en date du 11 mai à M. Gutt.

Le projet de contrat appelle cependant de la part du Gouvernement belge, les observations suivantes:

2. Il doit être entendu que le Trésor peut amortir conformément au tableau d'amortissement ou anticipativement à son option en faisant, à son choix, des paiements en or ou en dollars canadiens.[93]

Dès l'instant où le Trésor a le choix entre ces deux modes de payement la clause relative à la détermination du prix de l'or, telle qu'elle est insérée à l'article 9 du project de contrat peut être admise telle quelle.

Par contre il est important de préciser que le Trésor pourra affecter au remboursement de sa dette tous les dollars canadiens dont il se trouverait, ou dont la Banque Nationale se trouverait être propriétaire ou détenteur à un moment donné.

Ce sont notamment les dollars provenant des sources suivantes:

(a) dollars canadiens reçus à titre de remboursement des billets belges mis à la disposition des troupes canadiennes en Belgique;

O K

[93]Note marginale:/Marginal note:
probably O K

(b) dollars canadiens provenant des avoirs existants ou à venir belges, congolais ou luxembourgeois;

(c) dollars canadiens qui pourraient être acquis par le canal de l'"International Monetary Stabilisation Fund" ou de l'"International Bank for Development and Reconstruction";

(d) dollars canadiens provenant d'acquisitions de francs belges par des ressortissants canadiens (notamment pour des transferts de caractère financier).

Il conviendrait de plus d'obtenir l'assurance que les importateurs canadiens seront autorisés à régler leurs achats dans l'Union Economique Belgo-Luxembourgeoise et au Congo Belge en dollars U.S.A.

3. Il devrait être précisé également que pendant toute la durée du contrat et notamment au cas où expirerait "such period as foreign exchange regulations in Canada require that exports from Canada, to Belgium result in the sale of U.S.$," la Banque du Canada acceptera de vendre du $ canadien contre du $ U.S.A., au cours officiel en vigueur au jour de l'opération. Cette stipulation est essentielle pour que le Trésor puisse bénéficier de l'option prévue au premier paragraphe de l'article 9.

En effet si le prix que les autorités canadiennes fixeraient pour l'or était trop onéreux, le Trésor ne pourrait se libérer qu'en acquérant du dollar canadien contre dollars américains, qui peuvent toujours être acquis contre or au prix officiel à la Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

Ces diverses conditions pourraient être stipulées dans une lettre annexée à la convention, (analogue à la lettre datée d'Ottawa 1st May, 1945) qui accompagne le texte d'accord communiqué à M. Gutt.

4. L'Etat belge se réserve le droit de demander que le compte spécial prévu à l'article 2 soit ouvert à la Banque Nationale de Belgique au lieu d'être ouvert à son nom.

Veuillez agréer etc.

A. PATERNOTTE DE LA VAILLÉE

117. DEA/6993-D-40

Le sous-ministre par intérim des Finances à l'ambassadeur de Belgique

Acting Deputy Minister of Finance to Ambassador of Belgium

Ottawa, September 7, 1945

Dear Mr. Paternotte de la Vaillée,

I should have written before this thanking you for your letter of August 14th regarding a credit agreement between Belgium and Canada and a number of detailed points concerning the terms of the suggested agreement. Unfortunately we have been delayed in preparing a reply to your letter by the urgent matters arising from the end of hostilities and preparations for the session of Parliament which has just commenced.

As Dr. Clark informed M. Gutt, we have reserved $25,000,000 within the amount we are authorized to loan by Parliament so that we can lend this amount to you as soon as the details of the agreement are worked out. I think the Minister would also be willing to inform you of the Government's intention to increase the amount of the credit at a later date, when Parliament increases the amount which the Government may loan under our legislation.

I find it is not altogether clear from the correspondence and records of discussions on this matter just what length of loan your Government would wish to obtain from us. In Mr. Ilsley's message to M. Gutt of April 9th,[94] several lengths of loan were mentioned, with interest rates dependent upon the length chosen. Perhaps it would be desirable for us to discuss this matter further before proceeding with the drawing up of a draft agreement. If, on the other hand, your authorities have already decided on the term they would wish, I would be glad to learn of it from you. I believe you are familiar with the principle by which we determine the interest rate that we are prepared to offer for loans of various terms.

Proceeding now to deal with the specific inquiries in your letter to me, I should say first of all that we would be quite prepared to agree that the funds provided in the credit could be used to meet the needs of the Congo and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, as well as Belgium. We are also quite agreeable to the second point: that Belgium may pay off the debt before maturity if it so desires, paying either in gold or in Canadian dollars. I believe in fact that this point was covered explicitly in paragraph 10 of the draft agreement which Mr. Bryce gave to M. Gutt on May 11th.

In regard to your major point, stating that you would wish Belgium to be able to make repayment with any Canadian dollars coming into the hands of the Belgian Treasury or the National Bank of Belgium, there are more detailed points to be considered. We should be prepared to agree to repayment from any Canadian dollars accruing to Belgium from current account transactions between Belgium and Canada. This would include category (a) mentioned in your letter, i.e., dollars received in the purchase of Belgian currency for the use of Canadian troops, and also probably category (d), Canadian dollars obtained from the purchase by Canada of Belgian francs, particularly for financial transactions, though I think it would be desirable to settle more clearly what you have in mind in this category. We should also be quite prepared to have the loan repaid with Canadian dollars acquired from the International Monetary Fund or the International Bank for Development and Reconstruction. There is more difficulty, however, in regard to Canadian dollars derived from capital account sources, inasmuch as this may conflict with the principles of our exchange control. Normally under our exchange control, Canadian dollars obtained from the sale of assets in Canada by non-residents are not regarded as good payment for exports from Canada. The reason for this is, of course, to prevent such action being used to nullify our general control over capital movements. Consequently, we would need to qualify our agreement in regard to the repayment of the loan with Canadian dollars derived from the sale of Canadian securities held by residents of Belgium to restrict it to the use of Canadian dollars derived from the sale of Canadian assets held by residents of Belgium, as authorized from time to time during the period in question by the Foreign Exchange Control Board of Canada. I believe that the Board would be willing to give sympathetic consideration to requests that Canadian dollars derived from the sale of Canadian assets held by residents of Belgium prior to the commencement of Canadian exchange control in 1939 (or acquired subsequently with Canadian dollars owned by residents of Belgium as at September 16, 1939, or in exchange for assets originally owned) could be used for repayment of loans made to the Belgian Government. On the other hand, the Board would be less likely, I believe, to agree to the use for this purpose of the proceeds of sale of Canadian securities acquired by residents of Belgium outside of Canada since the commencement of exchange control. Furthermore, of course, we should not wish the loan to be repayable with Canadian dollars purchased in unofficial markets outside of Canada in which non-residents of Canada may sell Canadian dollars to one another.

In your paragraph 3 you ask that during the course of the agreement and particularly during "such period as foreign exchange regulations in Canada require that exports from Canada to Belgium result in the sale of U.S. dollars . . .," we assure you that the Bank of Canada will undertake to sell Canadian dollars for U.S. dollars at the official rate in effect on any day in which you may wish to purchase Canadian dollars, in order that your Treasury may benefit from the option provided to it in Article 9 of the draft agreement. We are quite prepared to agree to this, and it means that in effect the loan can be repaid at any time from Canadian dollars derived from the sale to the Canadian Foreign Exchange Control Board of U.S. dollars.

In regard to your last point, we are quite prepared to provide in the agreement that the moneys may be paid into an account in the name of the National Bank of Belgium. I presume you will make the necessary arrangements with the Bank of Canada in this respect and for the operation of the account. Our cheques will, of course, be payable to the Belgian Government, but I presume that the National Bank of Belgium is authorized to accept them on behalf of your Government.

When you have had a chance to consider this replay, I would suggest that officials of your Embassy might get together with officials of my Department, and perhaps of the Bank of Canada, and get the necessary documents prepared so that we may complete the arrangements and the transfer of the credits to your account without delay.[95]

Yours very truly,

W. A. MACKINTOSH

NORVÈGE/NORWAY

118. DF/Vol. 4321

L'adjoint exécutif du gouverneur de la Banque du Canada au sous-ministre des Finances

Executive Assistant to Governor of the Bank of Canada to Deputy Minister of Finance

San Francisco, April 25, 1945

Dear Dr. Clark,

I have just had a long conversation with Mr. Arnold Raestad, Governor of the Bank of Norway, who came to see me regarding methods of financing Norwegian purchases in Canada after liberation. In my conversations with Mr. Hallvar Hillestad a couple of weeks ago regarding the transfer of United States funds to Canada by the Norwegian Trade and Shipping Mission, it had been arranged that the matter should be further discussed with Mr. Raestad here in San Francisco, which explains why he came to see me.

He began by saying that the London Government had recently been giving general consideration to Norwegian post-war requirements and possible credit arrangements with Sweden, Switzerland, the United States and Canada. They were not prepared to go through with the deal which Hillestad discussed with me at the present time, except as part of a more general arrangement, which would include financing some part of their purchases through credit.

Their Canadian dollar requirements are now estimated at $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 to cover the first eighteen months, but this figure is regarded as rock bottom, as it is anticipated that when the Government gets back to Norway and the departments re-established, they will be reminded of many important items which they have overlooked. They would like to think in terms of about four years ahead and, on this basis, Mr. Raestad thought that their requirements would be at least $70,000,000. As to the character of the supplies they want, he was very indefinite; the only concrete information he had was that they would want to buy $10,000,000 worth of wheat in addition to the $4.8 million worth of wheat they already own in Canada. I made it clear to Mr. Raestad that the negotiations would have to be conducted with you. However, I outlined to him the general character of our legislation, and mentioned that, the appropriation being limited, we would want to make any credit initially granted of a magnitude which would see them through say the first eighteen months, but that there might be a simultaneous exchange of letters on the Dutch model[96] (I did not, of course, mention the Dutch negotiations to him). I tried to sound him out regarding the proportion of their total requirements which they would expect to pay for in United States funds. He would not commit himself on this, but my general impression is that they would probably not be averse to going through with the transfer of $10,000,000 United States, which Hillestad discussed with me if we were willing to give a credit of $20,000,000. However, I may be wrong about this.

As regards the period of repayment, they have in mind a very long-term credit, Raestad mentioning a term of fifty years. I said, of course, that this was much longer than we had ever contemplated, and I do not think they would be averse to a credit repayable after five years and extending to twenty years.

The first question which Raestad raised with me was whether we would be willing to accept payment, for at least certain exports, in sterling. I gave a definite answer on this point along the lines that you can imagine, which he fully understood. He said, however, that their sterling resources were so large (now approaching £100,000,000), that they would be obliged to raise this question formally with you. They evidently have an understanding with the British that their pre-war sterling balances, which consist of approximately £2,000,000, held by the Bank of Norway, and approximately £3,000,000 held by private individuals, are freely transferable outside the sterling area. He also argues that they are entitled to special consideration regarding the transferability of their sterling assets because so much of it has arisen as a result of the loss of capital assets in the form of insurance payments on ships which cannot be replaced in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Raestad wanted to arrange for Mr. Kolbjornssen, the Financial Counsellor of the Norwegian Embassy in Washington, and Mr. Hillestad, the New York representative of the Bank of Norway, to come to San Francisco to discuss the matter further with me. I said that I could see no point in this, as I had no administrative responsibility in these questions and discussions would ultimately have to take place in Ottawa. Mr. Raestad is planning to go to Ottawa after the Conference, but he is afraid that he may be called back to London suddenly, which would necessitate his altering these plans or spending a very short period of time in Ottawa. He does not want to be in the position when he starts his discussion with you of being confronted with a request for information which he would have to cable London for, thus involving delay.

It would facilitate matters if you could let me know of any particular information that you will want to obtain from the Norwegians when these discussions start in Ottawa so that he can arrange to get it before going there. Their United States dollar position is rather flush at the moment. They have $106,000,000 in United States dollar balances, a line of credit of $16,000,000 from New York banks, and a certain amount of gold with us — I believe $12,000,000 or $15,000,000. He said that the Norwegian Minister in Ottawa had tried unsuccessfully to get a copy of the Czech Credit Agreement.[97] I wonder whether you could send a copy of this down to me or a copy of the type of agreement that you would propose to the Norwegians, so that he can give thought to the questions it raises before going to Ottawa.

It would be helpful if you could reply to this letter by airmail via diplomatic pouch. Mr. Raestad will make no further moves until I get in touch with him again.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Towers.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

Le sous-ministre des Finances à l'adjoint exécutif du gouverneur de la Banque du Canada

Deputy Minister of Finance
to Executive Assistant to Governor of the Bank of Canada

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 1, 1945

Dear Mr. Rasminsky:

I have your letter of April 25th, reporting your conversation with Mr. Arnold Raestad, Governor of the Bank of Norway, about the possibilities of financing Norwegian purchases in Canada following the liberation of Norway. I very much appreciated your letting me have so fully and so promptly the information which he gave you and the inquiry which he made about any further information that we might want.

In general, the information we would like to have would be whatever they could tell us in regard to the amount, nature and timing of their requirements from Canada. In particular, and because of the current shortage in the amount of funds we have at our disposal before the next session of Parliament, I would like to know how much they would need during the next six or eight months. We should also like to have some general information regarding their external financial position, but you appear to have obtained the essential facts and given them to us in your letter, both in regard to their sterling resources and their dollar resources. There is no other information which I can think of at the moment that we should like to have and which he is unlikely to have with him. If anything else occurs to me I shall write you again.

I regret that we have not a copy of our agreement with Czechoslovakia on hand which I could send you, and there will not be time to have another copy typed before this letter must leave. However, I am sending you enclosed a copy of the agreement which we are tonight signing with the Netherlands, from which I have had removed the name of the Government and the rate of interest. As you will recall, the rate is somewhat misleading in this agreement because of its connection with the larger transaction. I should point out that the Netherlands authorities do not wish any announcement or information about this loan given out at the present time. For that reason I do not believe you should indicate to anyone there that we have concluded this agreement.

See Canada, Treaty Series, 1945, No. 25.

We shall be glad to see the Norwegians as soon as they can be here. I ought to point out to you, however, and perhaps you should point out to them, that the bulk of the funds available to us for direct loans under the Export Credits Insurance Act are already pretty well committed, and that if their requirements in the next six or eight months exceed a few million dollars, it may be necessary to consider guaranteed loans, at least on an interim basis. The details of this, however, are a matter we can discuss when they get here, but I think it desirable that you should not give them the impression that we can provide them with much in the way of direct credits in the next few months. For your own information I might say that we have, of course, committed $15 million to the Czechs, and now $25 million to the Dutch. We have offered $25 million to the Belgians, and the French have been in recently, hoping to get large amounts and rather disappointed to find that we could only give them $20 million or $30 million in the next few months. In addition, Crena de Iongh expects to be here in the next week or two to arrange a credit for the Netherlands Indies. Almost certainly all of these will want direct credits, and it is obvious that our present appropriation will not suffice to meet all these requests.

With kindest regards,

Yours very truly,

W. C. CLARK

120. DF/Vol. 4321

L'adjoint exécutif du gouverneur de la Banque du Canada au sous-ministre des Finances

Executive Assistant to Governor of the Bank of Canada to Deputy Minister of Finance

CONFIDENTIAL San Francisco, May 9, 1945

Dear Dr. Clark,

I conveyed to Mr. Arnold Raestad, Governor of the Bank of Norway, the gist of your letter of the 1st. I saw him today at his request and he expressed very deep disappointment at our difficulty in extending credits in substantial amounts until there is a fresh appropriation of funds. He said that he had since 1940 been an ardent propagandist in favour of extending trade relations between Norway and Canada and that it would therefore be particularly disappointing to him if financial considerations were to stand in the way. He recognized, however, that the Norwegian Government should have approached us earlier and referred to the necessarily disorganized nature of the activities of a government in exile which had prevented them from doing so as soon as they had knowledge of our export credits Insurance Act.

He said at first that the question of taking guaranteed credits would be a difficult one for Norway. The Government itself would not wish to borrow from any individual commercial bank and certainly not from a particular exporter. To borrow from an individual bank would place them in an invidious position. The Norwegian Trade and Shipping Mission which has, as I recall, a balance of some five or six million dollars in Canadian funds (arising out of shipping earnings which they have chosen not to convert into United States funds) is not authorized to borrow. The Bank of Norway is also debarred under its statutes from borrowing and a special decree was required to authorize it to contract the sixteen million dollar loan from the group of American banks which I referred to in my letter of April 25th. This loan, incidentally, is for two years on a 2% basis. The amount is somewhat larger than the Norwegians wanted and they had to extend it to allow a reasonable participation by practically all the New York banks. The funds raised by the Bank of Norway in this way are being loaned and not sold to Norwegian ship owners and exporters in order to preserve the so-called self-liquidating character of the transaction which is being handled through the Norwegian commercial banks and not directly by the Bank of Norway. The Bank of Norway is a private joint stock company with shares fairly widely distributed and actively traded in. The Governor and the Deputy Governor are appointed by the King in Council and the other three directors by the Norwegian Parliament to whom the Bank is directly responsible. This no doubt explains the conservative way in which its borrowing operations are handled.

I told Raestad that the whole question was one which should be discussed with you and suggested that he proceed to Ottawa as planned after the Conference. He said at first that the difficulties he saw in the way of guarantees, even if the guaranteed loans were to be repaid out of later direct credits to the Norwegian Government, were so great that he doubted whether it would be worth proceeding unless there was a reasonable hope that fairly substantial amounts might be available in direct credits.

I asked him what he estimated their Canadian dollar requirements to be during the next six or eight months. He refused to answer this question saying that their requirements were variable since the distribution of their purchases would depend in large part on financial considerations and they might be obliged to direct their purchases to certain countries where easier finance was available. He again mentioned the fact that credit negotiations were under discussion with Sweden, Switzerland and the United States. He also informed me (though he was not quite sure whether this information was official) that the Argentine Government has just made a gift of forty thousand tons of wheat to Norway and the Swedish Government has provided the use of three tankers to transport the wheat.

I pointed out to Raestad that the gap he was concerned with was not six or eight months' requirements of Canadian dollars but a substantially smaller amount since they already had large Canadian dollar holdings which they would presumably use and some portion of their purchases would be paid for in cash in the form of United States funds. In the end he agreed that this was the case and also that the difficulties of using a guarantee method might not be as great as he originally thought.

Our conversation ended inconclusively. I said merely that I would report the conversation to you and he said that he would think the matter over again.

If there is anything that you wish me to add to what I told Raestad I would be grateful if you would let me know, perhaps by telegram. One point which seems fairly clear is that the Norwegians will part reluctantly with United States dollars.

I am sending this letter to you in duplicate as I do not know whether Mr. Towers is still in Ottawa. If he is, I would be grateful if you would send a copy of it to him.

Yours very truly,

L. RASMINSKY

Ottawa, May 12, 1945

Dear Lou:

Thanks very much for your letter of May 9th in regard to your conversation with Mr. Arnold Raestad, Governor of the Bank of Norway. In fact, if it were not for your various letters and for Norman Smith,[98] we would know very little about what is happening at San Francisco.

I think that there is very little to add to what you yourself have said to Mr. Raestad. However, I think he was going too far when he intimated that financial considerations might stand in the way of extending trade relations between Norway and Canada. I assume you made clear to him the device we used in the case of the Netherlands, and again in the case of the Netherlands East Indies as a result of a visit which Dr. Crena de Iongh paid to us this week.[99] In other words, if the direct credit which it was possible for us to make under our present Parliamentary appropriation proved to be too limited for Norway's needs we could by a supplementary exchange of notes agree to enter into a further credit to cover the balance of their requirements over a reasonable period, the new credit to be entered into as soon as Parliament had given us the necessary increase in our appropriation. We will be very glad, of course, to sit down with some one representing Norway and consider a mutually satisfactory program for financing the total of their probable Canadian purchases over an agreed period. For your information, I may say that we had a very pleasant discussion with M. Guindey,[100] and reached, I think, a mutual understanding of our mutual positions. In view, however, of the small size of the credit which we could make available at the moment and in view of the French desire not to jeopardize a future credit deal with the United States, M. Guindey, after discussion with M. Pleven[101] in Washington, confirmed to me today that they would prefer to proceed with cash payments for the next few months and with the hope of entering into a large credit deal some time next fall when our increased appropriation should be available. The cash purchases made during the next few months will be allowed to count as meeting in part any provision for a proportion of cash payments which we may include in the agreement. This decision on the part of France, which is the one I expected, will release an additional $20 to $30 million of lending authority. It will enable me to meet de Iongh's immediate requirements of $15 to $20 million and make it possible for me probably to do a somewhat similar deal with Norway if Norway should require it. M. Gutt has also been here this week[102] and he is to give me his reply in about ten days' time after he has had an opportunity of discussing our proposals with his Government in person. Incidentally, I had again to express our reluctance about entering into monetary agreements or mutual credit arrangements and M. Gutt while not accepting our argument fully nevertheless stated that he personally understood our position and that it was what he expected.

I hope you will prevail upon Mr. Raestad to come to Ottawa in order that we may get down to brass tacks on his problem. I sent the copy of your letter to Mr. Towers, who expects to leave with his colleagues on Monday.[103]

Yours sincerely,

W. C. CLARK

L'adjoint exécutif du gouverneur de la Banque du Canada au sous-ministre des Finances

Executive Assistant to Governor of the Bank of Canada to Deputy Minister of Finance

San Francisco, May 22, 1945

Dear Dr. Clark,

As I telegraphed you yesterday† a group of Norwegians is planning to go to Ottawa next week to negotiate an export credit.

I had a visit yesterday from Colbjornsen [sic] and Hillestad who are going instead of Raestad for the reason mentioned in my telegram. The conversation was very general and revolved around two main questions: (a) the amount of their Canadian dollar requirements until the end of this year and (b) the question of partial payment in U.S. dollars or gold.

On the first question they were rather indefinite as they did not have recent estimates of their Ministry of Supply. They spoke, however, of total requirements of twenty million dollars. I said that on the basis of the information I had had from you this was probably higher than could be made available out of the present appropriation. By the time they get to Ottawa they will have the supply representative along with them and will no doubt have a more exact idea of how much they want to spend and what they want to spend it on.

On the question of partial payment in foreign exchange they put up quite a strenuous battle against any such provision. The line they took was that Norway did not want to borrow more than she needed to and would certainly pay as much as she could in cash so there is no necessity for any specific understanding regarding part payment in foreign exchange. Hillestad also produced the extraordinary argument that our asking for part payment in foreign exchange was based on a bilateralist approach which was contrary to our declared policies. I naturally replied to this that the opposite was true, that multilateralism in financial matters meant using the currency of third countries to settle international transactions and this is what we were proposing.

I stated very emphatically that the decision in these matters was in your hands but that I could not possibly advise you to undertake to finance the whole of the Norwegian deficit of Canadian dollars even for a limited period of time. I explained that we were the world's largest solvent debtor, that we had to have a certain inflow of United States funds to keep our economy going, that in the past our current account deficit with the United States had been covered by converting the surplus arising in transactions mainly with the United Kingdom and continental Europe and that we had to maintain our United States dollar income as high as we could. They knew that there was no provision for part payment in foreign exchange in the Czech agreement and I explained that this was because the Czechs had no foreign assets of any magnitude and that in all other agreements negotiated since that time there was such a provision.

We did not discuss, except obliquely, what the proportion of foreign exchange payment should be. In explaining the technique, however, I used an arithmetic example given by Colbjorsen, taking as the basis a United States dollar payment of 25% of the amount of credit extended. I think that they would agree to go at least this high and unless you feel that we should make these percentages uniform for all countries, I do not think that you should go any lower.

I imagine that they will go over all this ground with you again. Hillestad particularly is a tough negotiator but they have been softened up here. Incidentally, in explaining our need for United States funds I made no reference to the United States dollar content of our exports and I do not think that this is really a strong argument as it involves discussion of particular commodities. They have, as you know, already bought a good deal of wheat in Canada and are now planning to buy ten thousand tons of flour.

The Norwegian Trade and Shipping Mission has certain Canadian dollar deposits arising out of shipping earnings which they have chosen not to convert into United States funds. I asked what these deposits now amounted to and what they proposed to do with them. Hillestad said that they now amounted to 3.8 million dollars (you can check this through Turk)[104] and that they regarded this as a normal working balance. It is high for a normal working balance but I am inclined to think that you could let this ride and raise no objection to them retaining these balances or using these balances to pay for exports (which we have as a matter of fact already undertaken to permit) but relate the United States dollar payment to the amount of the credit.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Donald Gordon[105] and enclosing herewith copy of the letter I am writing him.†

Yours sincerely,

L. RASMINSKY

Mémorandum du ministère des Finances

MEMORANDUM RE CONVERSATIONS WITH NORWEGIANS THURSDAY, JUNE 14, 1945, CONCERNING CREDIT UNDER THE EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

These meetings had been arranged originally by Dr. Clark and Mr. Rasminsky, the latter having been in touch with the Norwegian representatives in San Francisco about the question, as indicated by the telegram† on file.

I spoke to Mr. Ilsley immediately before meeting the Norwegians, and he agreed that I might negotiate a loan with them for $12 m. or $13 m., being what we had available under the existing appropriation. He also agreed to the interest rate and other terms being in accordance with the general practice and principles we had already established.

At 10.30 in the morning we had a meeting in Room 123 at which were present: Mr. Arnold Raestad, Governor of the Bank of Norway, Mr. D. Steen, Norwegian Minister to Canada, Mr. Ole Colbjornsen [sic], Financial Counsellor to the Norwegian Embassy in Washington, Mr. H. Hillestad, representative of the Bank of Norway in New York, and Mr. Skaug, main representative in North America of the Norwegian Ministry of Reconstruction, representing Norway; Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. English of the Department of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Rasminsky and Mr. Coyne of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Pierce of External Affairs, and Mr. Tolmie and I from the Department of Finance.

At the opening of the meeting Mr. Raestad reviewed generally the Norwegian financial position and their need for imports. He stated that they would not be able to make use of a guaranteed loan at present, owing to legal difficulties on their side, and that they would like to obtain a direct loan. Mr. Skaug outlined the general nature of the goods Norway would like to obtain from Canada, which include notably about 8,000 trucks, worth, say, $10 m., over the next year, perhaps half of this coming in 1945, some $5 m. to $8 m. worth of wheat and flour during the remainder of 1945, perhaps $5 m. of radio equipment of various types, and $3 m. or $4 m. worth of farm machinery, although their program has not been definitely allocated in this item as yet. In addition, there would be various smaller items. They were interested in the possibility of getting as well some small wooden fishing vessels and semi-diesel engines for fishing vessels. They thought in general that they would be able to use a credit of $30 m. to make these various purchases in Canada during the next year or two.

Following this a short discussion ensued in regard to the Canadian request that Norway should obtain a portion of its requirements in Canada during this period by the sale to Canada of gold or U.S. dollars. No attempt was made to reach a decision on this matter at this meeting. In the conversation Mr. Rasminsky reviewed the present situation of Norwegian balances in this country, which include an official account convertible into U.S. dollars and a non-official account which is not.

In regard to the terms of the credit itself, the Norwegians have inquired what length of credit it would be possible for Canada to provide to them at 2¾% interest and at 3% interest. They would not wish to make any repayment of the credit for the first six years but would be willing to have it spread evenly over the remainder of the period.

It was agreed that Mr. Skaug would meet with officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce to discuss the purchase program in more detail, and that the Norwegians would meet at 4.30 p.m. with the representatives of the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance to discuss the foreign exchange aspects as well as the credit itself.

In the afternoon at 4.45 a meeting was held in the boardroom of the Bank of Canada, at which were present the five Norwegian representatives, Mr. Tolmie, Mr. Rasminsky, Mr. Coyne and Mr. Bryce. Mr. Tolmie and Mr. Bryce had prepared drafts for a credit agreement and for a letter to the Norwegian Minister from the Minister of Finance. These drafts were discussed at some length. In regard to the credit agreement there were no particular points of controversy or negotiation. Mr. Raestad had some worries about the wording of Clause 9, and it was agreed that a letter would be drawn up to explain what "a specified foreign currency" was intended to mean in this paragraph.

The principal discussion at this meeting concerned the percentage of the credit which Norway would agree to spend in Canada from the proceeds of gold or foreign exchange during the period in which the credit was used. The Norwegians argued that their foreign exchange position would not permit them to incur substantial liabilities of this nature. Mr. Rasminsky had suggested a figure of 25%, which they felt was high. The Norwegians argued also that account should be taken of advance payments which Norway had recently made in the U.S. for trucks and for flour. The payments for trucks had amounted to $1,129,000, and the payments for flour to approximately $650,000. Mr. Skaug pointed out that he had already written to the Canadian Mutual Aid Board about the possibility of covering the payments for trucks under the credit some weeks ago. Mr. Rasminsky pointed out that these earlier payments amounted to approximately the difference between a 25% and a 20% cash purchase ratio applied to the proposed $30 m. amount of the total credit. He suggested that rather than make the cash purchase arrangement retroactive, we might agree on a figure of 20%. The Norwegians finally thought that this might be acceptable to them, but said that they would have to consult Oslo about it.

In regard to the general terms of the credit, I offered the Norwegians the alternative of payment in 9 annual instalments at the end of the 6th to the end of the 14th year at 2¾%, or payments in 17 annual instalments at the end of the 6th to the end of the 22nd year at 3%. The Norwegian representatives did not criticize these terms at all, but said that they would like to ask Oslo which would be preferable. This course of action was agreed to by the Canadians.

The Norwegians wished to insert in the draft letter in the third last line on the first page, following the word "through", the words "one of its official agencies or through." This was agreed to.

The following day Mr. Colbjornsen, Mr. Skaug and Mr. Steen came in to see me. They had thought there might be some points to discuss but it developed there was nothing further except the arrangements regarding signature, which Mr. Steen had taken up with Mr. Tolmie, and the possibility that action by the Norwegian Government on this matter might be delayed, due to changes in the Norwegian Cabinet. The Norwegian representatives asked me whether it would be satisfactory if there was a delay beyond June 25th to have any cash payments made from that date forward included in the 20% cash payment under the agreement. I said I thought this would be satisfactory from our point of view. I confirmed this later with Mr. Rasminsky.

Mémorandum du ministère des Finances au ministre des Finances
Memorandum by Department of Finance to Minister of Finance

RE: CREDIT TO NORWAY

You will recall my speaking to you last Thursday about negotiating a credit with representatives of the Government of Norway, in accordance with arrangements originally made by Dr. Clark through Mr. Rasminsky in San Francisco. You agreed on Thursday morning to my proceeding to negotiate such credit on the general terms which Dr. Clark had arranged with other Western European countries and for an amount of $13,000,000 immediately, to be increased later in a manner similar to that arranged with the Netherlands.

The negotiations resulted in a draft agreement,† which we gave to the Norwegians on Thursday afternoon, which provides for a credit of $13,000,000. The form of this agreement is almost identical with that in the case of the Netherlands and I have therefore not attached a draft of it. We offered the Norwegians the choice of two periods and interest rates, either:

(i) repayment in 9 annual instalments, commencing at the end of the 6th year and running to the end of the 14th year, in which case interest would be at 2¾%; or

(ii) repayment in 17 annual instalments, commencing at the end of the 6th year and running to the end of the 22nd year, in which case interest would be at 3%.

The first period would average 10 years, and for a credit of this length the Dominion would now pay 2.62%. The second credit would average 14 years in length, and for this period the Dominion would pay 2.93%. Thus in each case we have left a margin such as Dr. Clark considered desirable. You will note the margin is less in the case of the longer term than in the case of the shorter term credit. That is in part an attempt to meet the Norwegian desire for a substantial period without exceeding the 3% which has normally been regarded as the top figure at which the Dominion is borrowing currently. In part also it is an endeavour to take into account the shape of the curve of interest rates and the fact that the average rate that would be appropriate to each of the 17 instalments would be not 2.93%, such as I mentioned above for 14 years, but considerably less than that at 2.77%. This difference between the appropriate rate for the average term and the average rate that would be appropriate to the various instalments, is one that becomes quite important as we get into these longer terms. The Norwegians asked to be permitted to consult Oslo as to which of these alternatives they would prefer, and we agreed.

The Norwegians also agreed, somewhat reluctantly after prolonged negotiation, to make purchases for U.S. dollars or their equivalent in Canada during the time that they were drawing on the credit, in amounts not less than 20% of the amount of the credit. This is the same percentage which the Netherlands agreed to and which we have asked the Belgians to agree to, if they obtain credit.

We have suggested in the draft letter† from you to the Minister for Norway in Canada that the amount of the credit would be increased to $30,000,000 when there was sufficient appropriation for this purpose. This is the same type of arrangement that was made by Dr. Clark with the Netherlands. The amount of $30,000,000 we felt was in accord with the magnitude of the proposed Norwegian purchasing program here and was not excessive in terms of Norway's general financial capacity.

We have not yet prepared any recommendation to Council for approval of this proposed agreement, and I think we should wait until we hear from Norway as, of course, we must know which of the alternative periods they prefer. In the meantime, however, I would appreciate it if you could confirm whether the arrangements along the lines suggested above are satisfactory to you.[106]

EXPORT CREDIT POLICY;
FRANCE; NORWAY; NETHERLANDS; U.S.S.R.

10. THE SECRETARY submitted a memorandum from the Department of Finance regarding export credits to certain European countries for purposes of reconstruction.

The French government desired to obtain Canadian imports during 1945-46 totalling some $475 millions, apart from military and naval supplies provided under Mutual Aid, and had asked for a credit of approximately $330 millions in this connection. French requirements were under detailed study by the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Reconstruction and the Department of Finance recommended that the amount of credit to be extended should be determined primarily by the size of the programme of exports which the Canadian government was prepared to permit, having in mind alternative export markets and Canadian domestic requirements.

The government of Norway had requested a credit of $30 millions to finance Canadian exports during the next two or three years. The Minister of Finance had recommended an immediate credit of $13 millions, to be followed by a subsequent credit of $17 millions, subject to the increase by Parliament of the lending authority of the government under the Export Credits Insurance Act. Repayment would be in nine annual instalments commencing at the end of the sixth year, with interest at the rate of 2¾%. It was also agreed that Norway would purchase in Canada with U.S. dollars an amount equal to 20% of the credit provided.

The government had already entered into agreement with the Netherlands government to provide a credit of $25 millions and the Netherlands had been informed that it was the intention of the Canadian government to provide additional credits of $60 millions during the next four years, subject to the granting by Parliament of additional lending authority. The Netherlands government had now requested an additional credit of $25 millions to finance an immediate programme.

The U.S.S.R. had opened negotiations for a substantial export credit and a number of alternative plans had been suggested by the Minister of Finance in accordance with the general policy of the government. Meanwhile, the U.S.S.R. had requested a credit of between $2 and $3 millions for the purchase of certain hydro-electric equipment, already ordered in this country and in part ready for delivery. This sum would be repaid either as part of a larger credit or, failing this, in accordance with one of the alternatives already suggested by the Canadian government.

This whole programme would require an increase in the lending authority under the Export Credits Insurance Act from $100 millions to approximately $700 millions.

11. THE CABINET, after discussion,

(a) deferred to the next meeting further consideration of the granting of credits to France and the Netherlands;[108]

(b) approved the granting of a credit of $30 millions to the government of Norway, on the basis above set out as recommended by the Minister of Finance; and

(c) approved the granting of a credit to the government of the U.S.S.R. of up to $3 millions, on the basis above set out as recommended by the Minister of Finance.

Following from L. S. St. Laurent for Honourable J. L. Ilsley and copy to Honourable C. D. Howe, Begins: I have had interesting conversation with Vice-Admiral Fenard, Chief of French Naval Mission at Washington. He is very anxious to place with us, at earliest possible moment, orders for tug boats. He says our specifications fully meet their requirements, whilst American specifications would require substantial changes. Tells me matter of contracting delayed because they are not clear as to what financial arrangements they can make under our export credit provisions. If these arrangements are expected to be concluded sometime and such orders accepted, it would be helpful to be able to make announcement within a couple of weeks and thus allay fear of unemployment in St. Lawrence River shipyards. Could you let me know what arrangements for exports credits for this purpose French can make with us if they want to go ahead at once. Ends.

TELEGRAM D-112 Ottawa, May 5th, 1945

IMMEDIATE. Following for Hon. L. S. St. Laurent from J. L. Ilsley:

Have read with interest your report on your conversation with Vice-Admiral Fenard re purchase of tug boats in Canada and the obtaining of export credits here. In respect of export credits we have had somewhat the same difficulties in dealing with the French as in the case of Mutual Aid, namely, their failure to send promptly some person or mission authorized to make an official approach to us, explain their needs and problems and discuss the whole matter fully and frankly with us. Over the last year we have had two or three approaches made by persons who said they were not authorized to speak officially and not able to explain French requirements here or the precise type of credit desired. The latest approach of this sort was made to my Deputy about two weeks ago by M. Bernière.[109] Clark endeavoured to explain the situation as best he could in vacuo and suggested that if the French Government would send someone who was authorized to negotiate with us, we would be very happy to sit down with him, consider their whole program of purchases in Canada and endeavour to work out a comprehensive plan (involving export credits and a certain proportion of cash payments) which would be mutually satisfactory to both parties. At the same time he had to explain that our limited appropriation for direct Government to Government credits was now nearly exhausted by commitments already made to other countries and that if France desired a large credit we could only make an agreement now for one of $20 to $30 million and by an exchange of notes agree to increase this credit to the higher amount desired when we had an additional appropriation from Parliament. Mr. Bernière said that he would discuss the matter with M. Monnet[110] in Washington but expressed the view that a credit of $30 million would hardly be considered sufficiently important to bring M. Monnet to Ottawa.

Clark has received no further word from M. Bernière but Mr. Rasminsky has had certain discussions with M. Guindey in San Francisco and Clark has now received advice that M. Guindey is coming to Ottawa and will be here for a couple of days around May 10th. M. Guindey is Director of Foreign Finance in the French Ministry of Finance and should be in a position to discuss and negotiate on matters of this character. Incidentally he advised Rasminsky that they had not raised the possibility of obtaining a credit here because they did not wish to prejudice their position vis-à-vis the United States.

We would of course be prepared to consider an export credit to France and the interest rate would depend on the term over which the credit was to be repaid. Our policy is to fix a rate at the cost at which the Dominion Government borrows in this market plus a small differential. As in other cases we would not be willing to grant a credit for the full amount of French purchases here but would require a reasonable proportion to be paid for in gold or U.S. dollars for reasons which will be clear to you in view of the U.S. dollar content of Canadian production and our heavy indebtedness in the U.S.

I hope we should be able to deal with the whole matter satisfactorily when M. Guindey arrives.

DESPATCH 437 Ottawa, May 29, 1945

Sir:

Discussions were held early this month between Mr. Guillaume Guindey, Associate Director of the Treasury of the French Finance Department, and officials of the Canadian Department of Finance on the subject of a Canadian export credit to France. No agreement was reached because the amount of credit which could be made available by Canada could not exceed $30,000,000 and the French requirement is very substantially in excess of this amount — probably something between $100,000,000 and $200,000,000 although no amount was mentioned.

We think that the French reluctance to conclude an agreement for $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 was due to their desire not to prejudice negotiations with the United States.

The French have indicated that they wish to resume negotiations later, at a time when it will be possible for us to seek the approval of the Canadian Parliament for an amount more commensurate with what the French consider to be their need. In the meantime, the French will purchase for cash in Canada through their Supplies Mission in Ottawa. It is expected that some arrangement can be made so that their cash purchases will be considered as part payment in cash under such credit agreement as may be reached.

Under the credit arrangements with Belgium and the Netherlands,[111] about 20 per cent of the purchases are to be in cash and 80 per cent financed by credit. A similar arrangement is contemplated with the French.

Dear M. Bernière:

I am writing in reference to the discussion which you and M. Paul-Boncour[112] had with Mr. Bryce about ten days ago concerning the means of financing the proposed program of French purchases in Canada, and particularly the possible negotiation of terms for a credit to be extended by Canada to France when the Canadian Parliament at its next session provides additional lending authority to the Government for export credits. I understand that M. Monnet would like an opportunity to discuss this matter with Mr. Ilsley and possibly other Ministers before he leaves for France in the next few weeks.

Mr. Ilsley has discussed this matter with the Ministers and officials primarily concerned with such questions, and has authorized me to inform you that he would be prepared to recommend to the Government a credit to France in an amount and on terms to be agreed upon following discussions with representatives of the French Government; and that, pending the approval of the necessary increased lending authority by Parliament, he would be willing to write a letter to your Ambassador confirming the Government's intention of providing the credit once the necessary Parliamentary authority has been granted.

I believe you are already familiar with the principle followed by the Government in determining the interest rates on which it is prepared to grant such credits — which is, broadly speaking, that the rate shall be slightly above the rate at which the Canadian Government can borrow for a corresponding period. I understand that your Government would prefer to have repayment of the loan commence only after an interval of some years during which French exports can recover to reasonable dimensions, and to have repayment spread over as long a period as possible in order to reduce the burden on the French balance of international payments in any one year. If, in order to accord with your desires in this respect, the loan were to be repayable in twenty annual instalments, commencing at the end of the fifth year, the interest rate, determined in accordance with the principle noted above, would be three per cent per annum.

I believe your authorities are also familiar with our practice of asking countries obtaining export credits to purchase at least an agreed portion of their Canadian requirements for gold or its equivalent. We must do this as Canada requires a continuing supply of United States dollars (over and above those which can be obtained in direct trade with the United States), in order to maintain her own economy and to continue the payments on her own very substantial obligations to the United States. It is only by obtaining some current payment in cash that a country as heavily indebted as Canada is to other countries can herself undertake to lend to others, even in this period of reconstruction in Europe.

We should like to discuss the amount of the proposed loan in relation to what Canada will be able to supply to France up to the end of 1946, and also, if the amount is to be large, in relation to the other foreign credits which France is proposing to obtain in the United States and elsewhere.

If you will let me know when it would be possible for M. Monnet and any other French representatives to discuss this subject, I would be glad to try to arrange the necessary meeting with Mr. Ilsley and others for this purpose.

Yours very truly,

W. A. MACKINTOSH

Mémorandum du ministère du Commerce
Memorandum by Department of Trade and Commerce

[SECRET] [c. August 8, 1945]

RE: PROPOSED EXPORT CREDIT TO FRANCE

The French request is for a loan of approximately $340,000,000. This amount is 70% of a proposed program amounting to more than $475,000,000. However, an examination of the "program of import" shows that it includes nearly $100,000,000 of goods which will not be physically available before the end of 1946. The remainder, totalling $387,00,000 may be divided into three main categories:

(1) Wheat, totalling $110,000,000.

(2) Items readily available, totalling $180,000,000.

(3) Harbour equipment and ships, totalling $97,000,000.

It may be possible to continue to supply considerable quantities of wheat to France, although most recent Wheat Board estimates place our prospective carry-over at a much lower figure than was originally thought likely. The main problem is one of transportation, especially during the winter months and it will probably be impossible to supply France on the scale contemplated in the "Program of Import" without materially cutting into our allotment to Great Britain. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, while unable to undertake any commitment at this date, recommends that the figure of possible French purchases of wheat in Canada be cut to $90,000,000.

A large number of items on the French "Program of Import" are in fairly easy supply and will assist France substantially in her own rehabilitation problem. The Minister of Trade and Commerce recommends that provision be made for the financing of $180,000,000 worth of these goods.

The third group of items, totalling $97,000,000 are items for the reconstruction of France's seaport and inland waterways, including $40,000,000 worth of ships. Full information as to the possible availability of these items is not yet at hand. In any case, these are items in which the Department of Trade and Commerce feels that it has small or no continuing interest. The Minister of Trade and Commerce recommends that these items be left in abeyance until fuller consultations may be had with the Minister of Reconstruction, but in any event, recommends that $97,000,000 be the maximum.

Thus, if the third group of items is to be provided, the aggregate purchases would be:

(1) Wheat	90,000,000.
(2) Available Items	180,000,000.
(3) Harbour Equipment and Ships	97,000,000.
	$367,000,000.
Deducting 30% cash payment, i.e.	$110,000,000.
the amount of loan necessary would be $257,000,000 —	say $250,000,000.

It is not possible to regard the loan as likely to contribute directly to "facilitating and developing trade or any branch of trade" between Canada and France. Indeed, its very size is such that the French problem of servicing and amortizing it out of current trade balances may well put them under pressure to attempt to limit imports artificially and drastically, once the basic materials for reconstruction have been provided and payments on the loan begin to fall due. Many of the items requested embody little hope of continuing trade, among them paper, carbon steel, and the large items for seaports and inland waterways and for ships.

However, a large part of the program is physically available and it is difficult to find any more advantageous outlet for these goods at the present time. The proposed loan will be of material assistance to France in feeding her people and rehabilitating her communications and industrial system. This may be regarded as a prerequisite to the recovery of economic well-being throughout Europe and consequently a contribution to the recovery of maximum international trade. If it is decided to provide France with aid on this scale, careful consideration should be given to the desirability of asking for an interchange of most-favoured-nation treatment as a concomitant of the loan. We already have m.f.n. treaties with all the other countries with whom we have signed loan agreements, though not with China and Russia where the question may be raised. It might be advisable, too, in view of the history of French commercial relations, to ask the French for some statement of policy or intent with respect to non-tariff trade discriminations, such as quotas, import levies, export subsidies and foreign exchange controls.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce recommends that these considerations might be raised with the French before the loan agreement is finally concluded.

RE: POLICY ON EXPORT CREDITS TO FRANCE

The Government of France has requested a credit from the Canadian Government, as and when the export Credits Insurance Act is amended to increase the amount which may be loaned, to finance 70% of the cost of a proposed program of French purchases in Canada during 1945 and 1946, which amount in all to approximately $475 million. Agreement has been reached with the French representatives on possible terms for such a credit, in accordance with the principles being followed by the Government; it is proposed the loan should bear interest at 3% and be repaid in 30 annual instalments commencing at the end of the first year and extending to the end of the 30th year. The amount of the loan requested is so substantial, however, being approximately $330 million, and the proposed purchases so large in relation to our total export program, that the French representatives have been told that the Government will have to consider the matter very carefully before giving an undertaking to provide credits to France on this scale. A review of the items requested by France indicates that it would probably be found impossible or inadvisable to provide more than a total of about $370 million in value, which would require a credit of about $260 million.

There are considerable financial risks in lending to France at this time. These arise both from the uncertainty as to the nature and policies of future French governments and from the difficulties which France may be expected to encounter in the future in obtaining sufficient foreign exchange, particularly dollar exchange, to meet her current requirements and also to repay loans of the magnitude she is now proposing to obtain from the United States and Canada. (France is hoping to get credits of nearly a billion dollars from the United States in this period, and possibly more later.) France does not have much foreign debt as yet, it is true, and has fairly substantial gold reserves (about $2,000,000,000) and some other foreign assets, the actual amount of which is not accurately known. On the other hand, the French Government is apparently intending to spend a substantial amount of its gold reserves in the next few years and appears to be prepared to incur debts on a large scale.

A credit to France of the general magnitude under consideration — say $250 million — is not disproportionate in size to the credits already granted or promised by the Government to other European countries. Czechoslovakia has been granted $19 million, Norway has been promised $30 million ($13 million now and $17 million later), and the Nethelands has been promised $85 million, of which $25 million has already been provided. France, of course, is much larger than any of these countries and of more importance in determining the future course of European affairs. (In addition, Belgium has been offered $25 million now and more later, and the Netherlands, Indies $15 million now and $50 million later. China and the U.S.S.R. have made general requests but nothing specific has been arranged except a small special credit for the U.S.S.R.)

The Minister of Finance, with the advice of his Department, is prepared to recommend that the risks of making a substantial loan to France be accepted, provided that the Government is prepared to recognize that Canada has a substantial interest in the prompt and successful reconstruction of France, and therefore that the loan is not made solely for commercial or financial reasons. It is therefore suggested that the amount of the loan should not be arbitrarily fixed on financial grounds, but should be determined as the amount required to finance those exports which the Government is prepared to help France obtain in Canada, having in mind the urgent need of France for them, on the one hand, and the alternative needs or markets for them on the other, as well as the resources of men and material which can be devoted to exports to France.

After consultation with the Department of Trade and Commerce, it is recommended that approval be given now in principle to a credit of $190 million to finance exports of $270 million within the program submitted by France, plus an additional amount to be determined later to finance the sale of ships, barges, scows and other port equipment which is still under consideration by the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Reconstruction. This additional credit for ships, etc., should not exceed $70 million.

A memorandum from the Department of External Affairs recommending the provision of credits to France for reconstruction purposes is attached hereto. It is understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce is also submitting a memorandum on this question.

CREDITS FOR FRANCE

The achievement and maintenance of social order in France and her economic well-being are of great political importance to Canada as a means of lessening the danger of war. In priority, the importance of stability in France ranks next to that in the United Kingdom, for Western Europe cannot prosper while there is distress and unrest in France.

Advices received from London and Washington make it clear that the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States are most seriously concerned with the probable political effects in Europe of economic want. The British view is that unless we all work very hard the situation in Europe will deteriorate rapidly and dangerously; that the future of France will largely depend on its success in dealing with economic problems and that the failure of France to get supplies from abroad may not only entail a collapse of the new French Government, but lasting ill-feeling between France and the United States and the United Kingdom.

The United States is well aware of the serious prospects of Europe next winter in the absence of a programme of very extensive assistance, and has adopted a generous lend-lease and credit policy toward France.

With so much at stake it would be politically wise to do our utmost to furnish supplies to France and to provide the necessary credits, which appear small in comparison with the sacrifices we have already made in the interests of world order.

EXPORT CREDITS; FRANCE

12. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE, referring to the discussion at the meeting of August 2nd,[113] reported that the French request was for a loan of approximately $340 millions, being seventy percent of a proposed programme amounting to more than $475 millions.

Examination by departments concerned had demonstrated that supplies were not available to meet the whole French programme. Accordingly, it was suggested that the amount of the loan be for, say, $250 millions, being some seventy percent of a programme which it was estimated Canada could supply, the remaining thirty percent to be paid in cash.

The proposed loan, while not likely to facilitate and develop continuing trade with France directly, would be of material assistance in French rehabilitation, which might be considered an essential prerequisite of European recovery and, in consequence, to the recovery of international trade.

It was suggested by Trade and Commerce that France be asked to accord "most favoured nation" treatment at the time of the loan and also that a statement of policy be requested in respect of trade discriminations in the future.

Approval in principle might be given to a credit of $190 millions to finance exports to a total of $270 millions within the programme submitted by France. This would cover supply of wheat and other available items, exclusive of harbour equipment and ships. An additional loan could be made later to finance provision of the last named items to the extent considered necessary by the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Reconstruction, but not to exceed $70 millions.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Trade and Commerce memorandum re proposed export credit to France and attached Finance and External Affairs memoranda — Cabinet Document No.21).†

13. THE CABINET, after considerable discussion, agreed that, subject to the approval of Parliament, a credit be made available to France to finance French purchases in Canada, the amount and conditions thereof to be determined after further consultation with the government's financial advisers.

Le ministre des Finances
au chef, la mission économique française aux États-Unis

Minister of Finance
to Head, French Economic Mission in United States

Ottawa, August 16, 1945

Dear M. Monnet:

The program of French purchases in Canada and the suggested credit arrangements to assist France in financing these requirements, which you discussed on July 23rd with Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Howe, Mr. MacKinnon and myself, have been considered by the Canadian Government. The Government has studied this program in the light of what you and others have told us of the urgency of France's needs and also in the light of Canada's ability to supply these items required, particularly at a time when other demands upon our production, labour and materials in several fields are still very heavy. We understand that this program includes the purchases which France has already made since April 25, 1945. We have come to the conclusion that we will be prepared to make available to France credits sufficient to finance 70% of the cost of that amount of your program which we feel Canada can supply, subject, of course to the Canadian Parliament at its forthcoming session approving an increase in the Government's lending powers adequate to cover this and other requirements. These credits would be furnished on the terms upon which tentative agreement was reached with you when you were here, that is, the loan would bear interest at 3% and would be repayable in 30 annual instalments, commencing some time in 1947. It is understood that the remaining 30% of the cost would be paid by France in cash, and that this agreed payment in cash would include the cash payments made by France for purchases since April 25th of this year. We would propose that the credit be available for use up to December 31, 1946.

The Department of Trade and Commerce has examined your proposed program in detail, apart from those items in Tables No. 34, 35(a), 35(b) and 36,[†] comprising mainly ships and boats of one type or another and harbour equipment. On the basis of this review, the Government is prepared, if and when the necessary authority has been obtained from Parliament, to provide you with credits of $190 million to finance 70% of the cost of purchases of approximately $270 million, which is the amount of purchases within your program, apart from the items noted above, which the Government believes Canada will be reasonably able to supply during this year and next year. When the appropriate Departments have studied the situation in so far as possibilities of supplying the ships and other items specified in Tables 34-36 are concerned, the Government will be prepared to consider this matter further and to agree to the provision of additional credits equal to 70% of the costs of the amount of these items which the Government considers Canada can properly supply in the circumstances of the next year.

I wish to make clear that in agreeing to provide credit to assist France in this purchasing program, the Canadian Government is not guaranteeing that France will in fact be able to obtain all the supplies in question. The Government will be prepared to facilitate these French purchases by assistance in procurement, but cannot undertake to force Canadian producers to meet these French requirements in preference to other demands.

At this time when Canada will be assisting France to increase substantially its imports from Canada for purposes of reconstruction, and when the Canadian Government hopes to see an increase in exports from France to Canada, it seems to me appropriate to suggest that Canada and France might agree to extend to one another Most Favoured Nation treatment in commercial policy. Such action would, I think, impress upon the people both of France and of Canada our intentions to develop future trade between the two countries on a mutually advantageous basis. I understand that the Department of External Affairs would welcome an opportunity to discuss the possibility of such action with representatives of your Government at an early convenient date.

I understand that the French Supply Council in Canada is discussing further with the Department of Reconstruction and the Department of Trade and Commerce the various types of ships, boats and seaport equipment on which we have not yet reached a decision, and I hope now that your Mission has more complete details of the items in which you are interested, we shall be able to come to an agreement shortly on this portion of the program.

Yours very truly,

J. L. ILSLEY

August 26, 1945

Dear Mr. Ilsley: —

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 16th instant giving an outline of the conditions under which the Canadian Government is willing to finance our requirements in Canada up to the end of 1946.

The conditions indicated by you are agreeable to us: namely, 70% of the amount agreed between you and us to be financed by loan of 30 years repayable in 30 annual instalments commencing in 1946 at a date suitable to you, the interest to be 3% per annum on the outstanding amount.

We note that you agree to finance our purchase up to 270 million dollars and also I understand you are willing to consider to increase it by about 100 million dollars for the purchase of ship and sea-port equipment. I shall be glad to know the decision of the Canadian Government on this matter.

As I informed you during our conversations, we would like to make the terms of this agreement as nearly similar as possible to the conditions we have obtained in the United States. In the latter case the ratio of cash payment is 20% and we would like to have the same proportion accepted by you in our agreement. The total cash payment by the French Government to Canada would be the same, but instead of making the agreement operative from April 25, 1945, we would set a later date so that the amount of cash payment involved in the agreement would amount to 20%.

We will place our orders before the end of 1946 and it is understood that these agreements cover all goods and materials included in the program which we have agreed with you, or with such modifications as might be mutually agreed upon.

These purchases are intended for France, North Africa and the French Empire.

As regards your suggestion concerning the most favoured nation clause, this is a question which in due course will be discussed between the representatives of our countries; but, in conformity with the general principles included in the lend lease master agreement which is well known to you and that France has signed, I can now assure you that the French Government will collaborate with the Canadian Government in a concerted action to eliminate all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce, and to the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers.

I wish to express to you the French Government appreciation for the cooperation you are giving us in this matter and for the contribution you are thus making to the French recovery.

Yours very truly,

JEAN MONNET

135. DEA/6993-A-40

Le ministre des Finances
au président, le Conseil français des approvisionnements

Minister of Finance
to President, French Supply Council

Ottawa, September 6, 1945

Dear Mr. Bernière,

You will recall that in my letter of August 16th to Mr. Monnet, in care of yourself, I informed him that the Canadian Government will be prepared to make available to France credits sufficient to finance 70% of an amount of purchases of $270,000,000 on your proposed program of purchases, apart from items in tables Nos. 34, 35 and 36,[†] and I stated that when the appropriate Departments had studied the possibility of supplying the ships and other floating equipment specified in these tables, the Government would consider the matter further and agree to the provision of additional credits equal to 70% of the costs of those items which the Government believes Canada can supply in the circumstances.

A review of the situation has now been made by the appropriate officials and by the Cabinet, and I have been authorized to inform you that we will be prepared to provide you with additional credits sufficient to finance 70% of an amount of expenditures equal to $75,000,000 on the types of items covered in your tables Nos. 34, 35 and 36, i.e., ships, barges, tugboats and floating harbour and seaport equipment. This would involve, of course, an additional amount of credit of $52,500,000 over and above the $190,000,000 mentioned in my first letter, making $242,500,000.

In his letter to me of August 26th, Mr. Monnet suggested that while your Government was prepared to make cash expenditures to the extent of 30% of the program to be financed on credits, i.e., cash expenditures of $103,500,000, you would prefer to have our agreement drawn up in such a way that the cash expenditures would be expressed as 20% of the amount of purchases after an agreed date, and would include only those cash expenditures made after that date.

We are, therefore, faced with the problem of determining a new date subsequent to April 25th in such a way that the expenditures between April 25th and that date would amount to 12½% of the total program, leaving 87½% of the program to be completed after that date, of which 17½% would be paid for in cash and 70% from the funds provided on credit. As the total program which we are able to agree to finance is $345,000,000, the immediate problem therefore appears to be to select a date by which time you have expended or will have expended $43,125,000 since April 25th. I would suggest that you or your office might get in touch with my Department about this matter and arrange with them the selection of this date, whatever it may be. When it has been determined, I would then propose to write a letter to your Ambassador, summing up the intentions of the Government as expressed in my letter of August 16th and this letter, and which would serve as the basis of our understanding until such time as Parliament provides us with the additional financial authority necessary to enter into the formal credit agreement itself.

Yours very truly,

J. L. ILSLEY

Dear Mr. Ilsley:

The fact that I was absent from Ottawa has prevented me from acknowledging sooner your letter of the 6th instant, giving us the outline of the proposal under which the Canadian Government is willing to finance our requirements ($345,000,000.00) up to the end of 1946, the amount of credit to be granted us by your Government being $242,000,000.00.

My office informs me that Mr. Bryce has consented that the agreement should become effective retroactively as of 20th July, 1945.

May I ask you if it would be possible to have now a letter consolidating briefly the correspondance exchanged between ourselves in this matter and which would then constitute, with our answer to it, the gentlemen's agreement between our two countries while awaiting the additional financial authority to be granted by your Parliament.

With a renewal of my sincere thanks for your kind cooperation during these financial negotiations, please believe me,

Faithfully yours,

Le chef, la mission économique française aux États-Unis, au ministre des Finances

Head, French Economic Mission in United States, to Minister of Finance

Washington, le 23 Septembre, 1945

Monsieur le Ministre,

J'ai l'honneur d'accuser réception de votre lettre du 13 septembre ainsi conçue:

"Dear Mr. Monnet,

I am writing to you to confirm and set forth the points of agreement regarding the Credit which it is the intention of the Canadian Government to provide to the Government of France, and about which we had several discussions in recent weeks.

I am able to tell you that it is the intention of the Canadian Government if and when the Canadian Parliament increases the authority of the Government, to make loans under Part 2 of the Export Credits Insurance Act, to enter into an agreement with the Government of France under which credits will be made available to France during the remainder of 1945 and in 1946 for purchasing Canadian goods within the programme of proposed purchases which your Supply Mission in Canada has submitted to us. The amount of the Credit which we are prepared to furnish under the agreement, is $242,500,000. This Credit will be furnished on the understanding that it will not exceed 80% of the value of the purchases made by the Government of France in Canada during the period from July 20th 1945 to December 31st 1946. In calculating such purchases, it is understood that those made pursuant to requisitions placed by the French Supply Council up to July 19th, 1945, will be excluded, with the exception of Requisition No. vi-12-324, placed on that date. Cash purchases made from July 20th forward, including those under Requisition No. vi-12-324 and prior to the conclusion of a definite credit agreement, will be included in the agreed amount of purchases for cash.

I would also like to record that it is our understanding that the credit to be provided by Canada under this agreement will bear interest at the rate of 3% per annum and will be repayable in 30 equal annual instalments commencing at a date in 1947 to be agreed, and concluding at the same date in 1976.

In order to be clear regarding the items to be included in the programme of purchases to be financed on the credit, I would suggest that we agree to include any items in your programme which are ordered subsequent to July 19th of this year, and delivered prior to January 1st, 1947, plus any items ordered during this period for later delivery, such as ships, if they are agreed to be included by your Supply Council and by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and also any other items ordered during this period but not on your programme if these are agreed by your Supply Council with the Departments of Trade and Commerce, and Finance.

I wish to make clear that in agreeing to provide credit to assist France in this purchasing programme, the Canadian Government does not guarantee that France will be able in fact to obtain all the supplies in question. The Government will be prepared to facilitate these French purchases by assistance in procurement, but cannot undertake to compel Canadian producers to meet these French requirements in preference to other demands.

I sincerely hope that this credit will assist France in the difficult task of reconstruction, and will also assist materially in establishing trade between Canada and France. I would also like to express the hope that France and Canada can collaborate in the reduction of tariffs and other barriers to trade. In particular it would be desirable if we could look forward at an early date to the exchange of Most Favoured Nation treatment in commercial policy between the two countries. Such action would, I think, impress on the people of France and Canada our intentions of developing permanent trade between the two countries on a mutually advantageous basis.

I should like to express on behalf of the Canadian Government our real interest in the progress of the reconstruction of France, and to say that we hope that such help as we are able to give in supplying this credit, will enable your country to re-establish its economy as speedily as possible. I think it would be worth while for us to discuss again, before the end of 1946, the prospects for the future trade between Canada and France, and the measures desirable on both sides to promote its sound and fruitful development.

Yours very truly,

J. L. ILSLEY"

Après avoir soumis le texte de cette lettre au Gouvernement Provisoire de la République Française, je suis heureux de pouvoir vous donner son accord sur

Décret en Conseil

P.C. 6490 Ottawa, 12 October, 1945

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 11th October, 1945, from the Minister of Finance, representing, —

That by Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act. No. 1, 1945, the Government of Canada may act as the agent of the Government of any British or foreign country allied with His Majesty, for any purpose which in the opinion of the Governor in Council will aid directly or indirectly in the prosecution of the war, and any obligations or costs incurred temporarily or assumed by the Government of Canada in the exercise of such powers may be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund;

That, following the termination of actual hostilities, supplies, including foodstuffs and other essential civilian requirements, will still be needed by the governments of countries allied with His Majesty, pending the termination of the war, for wartime purposes including the repatriation of their armed forces, the occupation of enemy territory, the disarming of enemy forces, and the military government of enemy peoples;

That it will aid in the prosecution of the war for the Government of Canada to act as agent of the aforesaid governments in the purchase of foodstuffs and other essential supplies in Canada;

That the Government of France, one of the aforesaid governments, has requested the Government of Canada to procure supplies, including foodstuffs and other essential civilian requirements, on its behalf, and has undertaken to reimburse the Government of Canada for expenditures made on its behalf;

That agreement has been reached between the Government of France and the Government of Canada on the terms and conditions on which credit would be extended to the Government of France by the Government of Canada under the Export Credits Insurance Act if and when the said Act is amended to increase the amount which the Government of Canada may lend to other governments thereunder; and

That, pending amendment of the aforesaid Export Credits Insurance Act and the provision of credits thereunder to the Government of France, it is considered desirable that the Government of Canada purchase supplies required by the Government of France as the agent of that Government, and incur temporarily the obligations and costs of such purchases, for which it will later be reimbursed by the Government of France.

The Committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, advise that the Government of Canada act as the agent of the Government of France in the purchase of foodstuffs and other essential supplies in Canada, and that the obligations or costs incurred temporarily or assumed on behalf of the Government of France while acting as agent as aforesaid, not exceeding, however, the sum of Twenty Million Dollars ($20,000,000), be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pursuant to subsection 1 of Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act No. 1, 1945.

P.C. 7188 Ottawa, 30 November 1945

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 23rd November, 1945, from the Minister of Finance, representing,

That by Order in Council P.C. 6490, of 12th October, 1945, made under the War Appropriation Act No. 1, 1945, the Government of Canada was authorized to act as an agent of the Government of France in the purchase of foodstuffs and other essential supplies in Canada;

That the aggregate amount of the obligations or costs incurred temporarily or assumed by the Government of Canada on behalf of the Government of France while acting as agent was limited to the sum of $20,000,000, payable out of unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund; and

That it is desirable to amend the said Order in Council to provide that the aggregate amount of obligations or costs incurred temporarily or assumed by the Government of Canada on behalf of the Government of France while acting as agent under the authority of the said Order in Council shall be increased from the sum of $20,000,000 to the sum of $40,000,000.

The Committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, advise that under and by virtue of the War Appropriation Act No. 1, 1945, the said Order in Council P.C. 6490, of 12th October, 1945, be hereby amended by deleting the words and figures "Twenty Million Dollars ($20,000,000)" where they appear in the last paragraph of the said Order in Council, and substituting therefor the words and figures "Forty Million Dollars ($40,000,000)."

Le sous-ministre des Finance

SECRET Ottawa, November 6, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson: —

I believe I have already mentioned to you, and I now wish to inform you officially, that His Excellency the Chinese Ambassador came in to see me in the latter half of October to request a loan to China under the Export Credits Insurance Act. He said his Government had instructed him to ask for a credit of $50,000,000 in order that they might proceed to purchase various types of capital equipment in Canada for export to China at the earliest possible opportunity.

I did not obtain many details from His Excellency, who did not seem to be in a position at the time to furnish them, and it appeared to me that they wished consideration at this stage to be given to the questions of principle and the total amount involved. I assured him that we would consider the matter in principle and that I would communicate further with him about it. He indicated some desire on the part of his Government to get an early answer.

We have been anticipating for some time a request from the Chinese for a loan or guarantee either under this legislation or otherwise, but I had hoped that it would not be necessary to make a decision on this difficult matter before land or sea transport to China had been opened up once more. It occurs to me that the Chinese Government may be making an application at this date because they fear that other countries may be applying and we may be committing the whole of the funds available to us under the Export Credits Insurance Act. I would hope that it would prove possible to convince the Chinese authorities that they cannot make use of any credits in Canada for some considerable period, because of transportation difficulties, and to assure them that we will give any requests they make most careful consideration at such time as transportation facilities will permit the export of other than military goods from Canada to China. In any event, however, we must at some stage make a decision as to whether or not we are prepared to extend a loan or guarantee a credit to the Chinese Government.

It is clearly much more difficult to reach a decision on a loan or guaranteed credit to China than it is to decide in regard to credits to almost any of the other Allied Governments. On the economic side, there is no question of the need and there is probably no question of the tremendous potentialities of Chinese development, but there is, as I see it, considerable room to question Chinese ability to develop in future an export trade that will enable her to pay the interest and amortization on a substantial credit. I would like to know more about the plan of national development into which such credit would fit, and what could be reasonably regarded as the sensible direction for this development to take.

It is on the political side, however, rather than the economic that it seems to me most of the arguments, both pro and con, must be considered. The political advantages of assisting China to become a strong and democratic nation are so great as to make it worth while taking some considerable risk. On the other hand, the dangers of a divided and unstable China appear to me at the present time so impressive that I find it very difficult to recommend the granting of credits to the present Government. The events of the past year in particular, while showing some seeds of promise in China, have also appeared to me to show very grave evidence of basic weakness.

In view of the above considerations, I am writing to ask you whether your Department would be able to prepare for us a careful appraisal of the Chinese situation, which could be used in reaching a decision as to whether or not we should grant a credit to the present Chinese Government. I realize that under the difficult circumstances of the present time this is a considerable assignment, but I feel that the question is a large enough one, both in terms of financial considerations and in terms of foreign policy, to justify both trouble and expense in securing a careful and fundamental review.

Yours very truly,

W. C. CLARK

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au sous-ministre des Finances

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Finance

Dear Dr. Clark:

I should like to reply to your letter of November 6 in which you ask for an appraisal of probable developments in China that might be used as a basis for discussion of a request from the Chinese Government for a loan of fifty million dollars under the Export Credit Insurance Act for the purchase of various types of capital equipment in Canada for export to China when satisfactory communication routes are reopened.

The first question that needs to be considered is the stability of the present Chinese Government. The ideal of central government in China is as old as Chinese history itself. The concept has been nourished by a sense of unity of race, written language, customs and beliefs, and a rich common national history and literature, a like degree of civilization and a sense of geographic distinctness from the rest of the world. Despite certain obvious setbacks, the Chinese people as a whole have achieved during this war more than ever before the sense of that national unity which it has been the aim of the nationalist revolution fathered by Dr. Sun Yat-sen to foster. However, the survival of a good deal of local autonomy, both in provincial and smaller units, must be expected to be a continuing feature of Chinese politics and the Chinese economy until the country has been more completely bound together by railways, highways and airways, and until the efficiency of large-scale machine production of consumers' goods has overcome the independence of local handicraft industries.

There have been two formidable challenges to the National Government's aim of achieving and asserting its control over the whole country. One has been the provincial separatist movements led by old-style war lords; the other is the so-called Communist movement. It is, I think, generally agreed that the Central Government, through a series of opportunistic manoeuvres, has managed to maintain essential control over the various war lords in the outlying provinces, and that they are a diminishing threat to its supreme authority, unless allied with some new and more dynamic force, such as the Communist movement. The Communists, however, have managed during the war period to extend very considerably the area of their control behind the Japanese lines so that, today, they claim that popular governments which they have organized administer large sections of north and central China, embracing a population of some eighty-five million people, with a regular army approaching a half million men, supported by a people's militia numbering over two million.

While there is as yet no indication that the Kuomintang-Communist differences will be resolved in the immediate future, there appears to be no necessary fundamental clash of interests between the two groups that cannot be resolved in time. We consider that while the Communists will continue for the present to support their local autonomous governments by maintaining a separate army, they do not aim at secession and the establishment of a separate Soviet-supported State in North China, but rather the inclusion of representatives of their party and other minority parties in a national coalition government which would continue to be presided over by Chiang Kai-shek, and which would embark on simultaneous policies of industrial development and agrarian reform. The Communists say they will be prepared to give up their army when they consider that civil liberties and the existence of their party is guaranteed by an operating constitution. There is no evidence to indicate that the Soviet Government wishes to see separate Communist-controlled states set up in North China and Manchuria. It seems more in part that they will wish to see China under a strong, unified and democratic government with broad popular support and receiving considerable assistance from the western democracies towards industrialization and a better living standard for her people.

The present Central Government of China, with which we are in diplomatic relations, enjoys the advantage of a virtual monopoly of experience and qualified technical personnel in such fields as foreign affairs, banking, large-scale industry, communications (railway, highway, river, and air), higher technical education and the more specialized branches of modern military science. However, this advantage cannot be fully exploited in China's present condition. Moreover, some observers argue that the Communists make up in morale what they lack in technical training. The probability exists, therefore, that unless the present difficulties between the Central Government and the Communists can be settled by arbitration, resort to force by either side would result in a long and inconclusive civil war. Such as prospect might seriously distrub international relations in the Pacific area and must be avoided if at all possible.

It might be argued that any loan granted the Chinese Government for unspecified purposes might be construed by some as releasing other funds of the Chinese Government for the purchase of munitions that might be used in civil war. This being the case there might be a good deal to be said for postponing a decision on the $50,000,000 loan until the internal situation in China is more settled. Meanwhile we might suggest that we would be prepared to consider credits or guarantees for the purchase in Canada of specified items of national use to China which could not be construed as aiding one side in any prospective civil war. Moreover, obligations for capital equipment of constructive national value would be more likely to be honoured if another government were to succeed the present government.

Something should be said here about the probable plan of development that will govern China's post-war modernization. Westerners in China observe that while China is a nation at war, the main interest in Chungking has not been in the war but in the post-war period of reconstruction and industrialization. Without large-scale assistance from the United Nations the Chinese see no early possibility of being able to drive out the Japanese. They are now confident, however, that Japan will be defeated in due course by the growing power of the United Nations, particularly the United States. It is too early to say whether the recent changes in the Chinese Government will make it possible for China to participate more fully in the defeat of Japan. Even if more attention is concentrated on the immediate war effort, much interest will continue to be taken in the post-war era, where Chinese aspire to see a strong and united nation — politically, economically, and culturally — exerting a beneficent leadership in world, and especially Far Eastern affairs.

The Chinese realize that the place of security and influence in the modern world which they covet can only be realized by a modern China. They are in dead earnest about their responsibility for leadership in the Far East, about filling the power vacuum that will be created in the area by the defeat of Japan, and about not making the blunders in their relations with other nations that have characterized Japan's brief career as a world power. There is no question whatever that the present Chinese way of doing things is inadequate for this role. In self-defence and in order to fulfil national aspirations China must industrialize, and do it rapidly. It may have to develop more light industry than heavy, but for its own salvation it must maintain certain essential forms of production and must build up transportation and communications.

To the end that China may canalize the greatest amount of energy possible towards rapid industrialization after the Japanese have been expelled from the country the Central Government, private organizations and individuals have devoted much time to the elaboration of plans for economic development. In a recent speech to Chungking Dr. Sun Fo, President of the Legislative Yuan, said that "since the adoption of the general resolution relating to economic matters by the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang in September 1943, the Government, through the Executive Yuan and a special committee of the Legislative Yuan, have made detailed studies to work out rational and practical solutions to the problems of our post-war economic structure. The aim was how to realize an ordered development of industry on an improved agrarian foundation. . . . A set of general principles was formulated and submitted to the Supreme National Defence Council for a final decision early this month (December 1944)." In his speech Dr. Sun gave an informal version of these general principles. They called for the co-ordination of all economic enterprises under a General Economic Plan, which has not yet been elaborated. The following are to be exclusive state enterprises: postal and tele-communications, important national railways, large hydro-electric power plants, arsenals and mints and such public works as harbours and irrigation and conservancy projects. The state may enter other industries (e.g., iron and steel, air lines, et cetera) in competition or co-operation with private enterprise. Private enterprise is expected to conform to the General Economic Plan. There is to be no restriction on the percentage of foreign capital in joint enterprises, but the Chairman of the Board of Directors of such enterprises must be a Chinese national. Foreigners may also operate their own enterprises in China, although these are subject to Chinese laws, must fit into the G.E.P., and in some cases require special authorization.

This statement of general principles seems to indicate a sensible attitude towards the post-war economic development of China. The General Economic Plan, which has yet to take final form, and the regulations that will be introduced to give it effect, will of course be most important. I do not think we can expect to know at this time what form they will take. There are still many factors which will shape the final form of this plan and the enabling legislation which cannot be foreseen yet by the Chinese planners themselves. Nevertheless,

I believe there is some reason to hope that the final form of this G.E.P. will be rational.

One of the principal factors that will have a bearing on the stability of the present Chinese Government and the shape of the G.E.P. it devises will be the attitude of the United States. It is hardly possible to overemphasize the extent to which China is pinning her hopes on United States technical and financial assistance in her post-war reconstruction. In two recent articles discussing "Foreign Capital for China's Post-War Reconstruction" which appeared in The China Monthly, Mr. C. Y. W. Meng, an expert in the Economic Research Department of the Central Bank of China, said "Frankly speaking, when our economists discuss the employment of foreign capital in China's post-war economic reconstruction, they simply mean American capital." After discussing the post-war economic position of the Great Powers he concludes that the United States will be "the only great creditor nation in the world," and adds, "so in planning for raising capital through foreign sources, our economists hope for — and count on — U.S. $10,000,000,000 from the United States, and U.S. $2,500,000,000 from Great Britain in the first four years, and another U.S. $2,500,000,000 from all other sources within ten years after the war." The Chinese recognize that American private capital is not likely to flow to China until there is political and currency stability unless the United States Government guarantees such investments. They are most anxious to work out at this time (a) a special Lend-Lease arrangement with the United States Government, and (b) loans from various foreign governments, which would be used for obtaining capital goods for reconstruction projects.

From his talks with members of the State Department and Foreign Economic Administration in Washington in early November, Dr. Keenleyside brought back the strong impression that the United States economic advisers concerned with relations with China were maintaining a highly critical attitude. Mr. Dean Acheson said that the so-called Chinese economic experts were living in a vague and shadowy land of make-believe, and that in his opinion the United States Government would not only not extend to China anything like the $10,000,000,000 credit that the Chinese are hoping to get, but that Washington would not even approve a very much smaller credit on any conditions such as those being proposed by China at present. These conditions in essence are that the money should be supplied by the United States but that its allocation to specific phases of industrialization and rehabilitation should be decided by the Chinese authorities. Mr. Acheson and Mr. John Carter Vincent (Chief of the Division of Chinese Affairs in the State Department) both reported that they have found difficulty in persuading the Chinese to discuss ordinary international trade, as distinct from the major financial transactions based on United States credit which are the focus of Chinese ambitions.

It is, I think, evident from the candid statements made to Dr. Keenleyside by Mr. Acheson and Mr. Vincent that extended exchanges of opinion will be necessary before a convergence of views will be brought about between the Chinese and Americans concerning their post-war economic relations. Mr.

Vincent said that he himself would favour a policy of limited credits for clearly defined and commercially legitimate purposes. Before such credits were advanced, or at least at the time that they were, he thought that it would not be unreasonable to expect the Chinese Government to pay in cash for some purchases from its very substantial holdings of United States dollars, which he said now amounted to over a billion dollars. Mr. Acheson agreed with Mr. Vincent in thinking that, while Dr. H. H. Kung,[114] Mr. T. V. Soong and some of the other major figures around Chiang Kai-shek had a pretty clear understanding of the difficulties that would face them in trying to obtain all that they desire from the United States, they would continue to push their programme in the hope that political, economic and sentimental considerations might lead the United States Government to over-ride its economic advisers. The Chinese bolster their hope with such arguments as that the United States will wish to build up their country as a military ally in the western Pacific, that the United States will have an enormous post-war surplus production to dispose of, and that the American people have a long tradition of friendship for and philanthropy towards the Chinese people.

By way of summary, I might state that while there appear to be no irreconcilable differences between the Chinese Central Government and the Communists that cannot be settled by arbitration, conversations between representatives of the two groups which have been going on intermittently for some time now, more recently with the good offices of the United States Ambassador, have failed as yet to produce a formula agreeable to both parties. Like the United States, we attach great importance to sound settlement of the Kuomintang — Communist differences, assuring post-war internal peace in China. Not only would a long and inconclusive civil war between these two factions postpone any prospects there may be for the development of the Chinese internal market, but it would raise issues that might gravely unsettle international peace in the Pacific area. For this reason, and because there is no indication that the United States is prepared at this stage to make a comparable loan, I think it might be wise to postpone taking a favourable decision on the Chinese request for a loan of $50,000,000 until the situation in China and in respect to the policies of other creditor countries becomes clearer.

As an alternative to this loan, I think we might tell the Chinese Ambassador that we would be prepared to consider limited credits for specified purposes, or guarantees on approved contracts. Such a procedure would give us a better opportunity to consider our own supply position with regard to the items requested, and would also enable us to pass on whether the goods ordered would be put to constructive use in China.

If the Chinese ask for military or quasi-military supplies under these credit or guarantee arrangements we could point out that a procedure has already

RE: PROPOSED LOAN TO MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL CO., CHUNGKING, CHINA

Roy Peers[115] called me this morning from Washington to say that Dr. T. V. Soong and he had had a meeting with Mr. Howe, Mr. Pearson and apparently others in Washington yesterday at lunch, and had discussed the proposed Canadian loan to the Ming Sung Industrial Company to purchase vessels in Canada. He said that Dr. Soong wanted to work out a master agreement under which the credits would be given to the Chinese Government, who would apparently use them in part to purchase the vessels from Canada which the Ming Sung Co. wishes to obtain, and then the Chinese Government would lease them to the Ming Sung Co. Dr. Soong said that he would be talking in San Francisco to the Prime Minister and would mention this to him. Peers said Mike Pearson had suggested that he might speak to Rasminsky as well in San Francisco about this. Mr. Howe, said Peers, had told T. V. Soong that Canada wished to deal directly with the Chinese companies requiring equipment from Canada, rather than give blanket credits to the Government. Peers himself said that he had told Soong that he felt the Canadian proposal was a better one than what Soong was suggesting. Peers asked me if I agreed with this point of view. I said I thought our letter† to Lu[116] made clear that that was our view.

Peers was calling me primarily to inform me what the situation is and also to confirm, if possible, what our current view is on the alternative put forward by T. V. Soong. I said that I felt San Francisco was not the appropriate place to discuss alternative arrangements, particularly as there would be no one there familiar with the previous negotiations. Peers said he agreed with this point of view, and that it was likely Soong was coming to Ottawa within the next month and could discuss it here.

I called Rasminsky and told him of the developments and suggested that he look up the documents already in the bank's possession on this matter. I told him that there were three major arguments in favour of credits to the Company rather than to the Government. These were:

[115]Conseiller, Commission des ressources nationales de Chine.
Adviser, Chinese National Resources Commission.
[116]Lu Tso-fu, président, Ming Sung Industrial Corporation Ltd.
Lu Tso-fu, President, Ming Sung Industrial Corporation Ltd.

(1) We want to know with whom we are dealing and make sure that all the credit is used for the purpose intended. In particular, we want to avoid any of the credit being dissipated or used in some way for personal advantage.

(2) We feel it is desirable to establish trade connections with Chinese businesses and industries, rather than with the Chinese Government.

(3) In view of the established position, the "know-how" and the real resources of the Ming Sung Industrial Co., the nature of the industry they are in, and the general reliability of Lu himself, we feel the credit of the company may be superior to that of the Government itself.

Consequently, we would prefer to be lending to the Company as well as having the guarantee of the Government. Moreover, we feel there is an advantage in having the credit an ordinary commercial-type obligation, as that may have certain advantages in case of exchange difficulties or social unrest.

I told Rasminsky that I thought it might be awkward to explain why we did not wish to deal directly with the Government and that would be a problem in diplomacy. I said I thought one could rest the case on the desire to establish direct trade connections. I said I would call him again after I had spoken to Dr. Clark.

When I spoke to Dr. Clark he said that he had already had several conversations with Dr. Sun in New York, who was acting for Mr. Lu, following conversations which Dr. Sun and Mr. Lu had had with T. V. Soong. Dr. Clark said that the only point they had raised had been regarding the cash payment. T. V. Soong had felt this was unnecessarily high and wondered if it could not be reduced or eliminated. It was apparently this point which Dr. Clark contemplated their discussing in San Francisco with T. V. Soong. He said that Lu had apparently raised some cash without recourse to the Chinese Government, but apparently would need to get some foreign exchange from the Government in addition, to meet the amount which we had asked for in cash.

Dr. Clark felt that probably Mr. Robertson rather than Mr. Rasminsky ought to discuss the matter with T. V. Soong in San Francisco, and said that he would call Mr. Robertson to explain the situation to him.

PERSONAL Ottawa, April 20, 1945

Dear Norman [Robertson],

This morning, Mr. Sun, who accompanied Mr. Lu of the Ming Sung Industrial Corporation to Ottawa and carried on practically all the negotiations with us, called me from New York to discuss certain angles of our proposed credit to Ming Sung. I am sending you herewith a note which I made in regard to the conversation in order that you may be fully informed if Dr. Soong raises the question in San Francisco. I think you will remember the announcement made by the Chinese Government some two or three months ago in respect of their economic organization after the war in which it was said that the Government would confine its industrial activities to large industries and certain public utilities, that private enterprise would be allowed to carry on in other fields (including shipping, I believe) and that in the area of private enterprise, foreign financial assistance would be welcome, perhaps under certain conditions. Mr. Sun also points out that the Chinese Government has already agreed to guarantee a credit made recently by the United States Export-Import Bank to a private company in China and that instead of our deal being a bad precedent there had already been created an exact precedent for it.

In your discussion with Dr. Soong you perhaps may avoid the dangers of reflecting on the credit of the Chinese Government by indicating our general preference for assisting private enterprises at least in fields where private enterprise seems competent to do the job required.

With kind regards and best wishes for success on your present mission, I am,

Yours very truly,

W. C. CLARK

PROPOSED EXPORT CREDIT TO MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL CORPORATION, CHINA

Mr. Sun of Mr. Lu's staff called me from New York today to ask whether I had heard of the recent change in attitude to the proposed credit assumed by Dr. T. V. Soong. Neither Mr. Lu nor any one of his advisers was present at the conference in Washington between Dr. Soong and Messrs. Howe and Pearson on Tuesday or Wednesday of this week but they had heard that Dr. Soong took the attitude that the credit should be made directly to the Government of China, which would purchase the ships and then lease them either to Ming Sung or to some other corporation, that the Chinese Government preferred export credits to be made directly to it and that if this loan to Ming Sung went through it would create a bad precedent. Mr. Lu was greatly surprised at this change of attitude on Dr. Soong's part and wished to assure me that in the conferences between himself and Mr. Peers with Dr. Soong the latter had expressed the view that our deal appeared to be a good deal, apart from the fact that the cash payment of 15 per cent seemed to be a bit high.

Mr. Lu was quite concerned with the new turn of events and he and Mr. Sun are flying back to Chungking (probably leaving next Wednesday) to see the Generalissimo and to find out whether by any chance there had really been a basic change in the policy of the Chinese Government which had been enunciated two or three months ago and which indicated that shipping was to be left in private hands. Mr. Lu felt there had been no such change and Mr. Sun said that he wished me to know that they would do nothing or say nothing that might possibly embarrass Canada. He would keep constantly in touch with General Odlum's office and keep in contact with us through that channel.

On the point that the credit to Ming Sung would constitute a bad precedent, Mr. Sun said that this was not true. About a month ago an agreement had been reached for an export credit of $16 million by the United States Export-Import Bank to Yung-li (?) Chemical Corporation (the largest chemical organization in China) and the official documents in respect of this loan had been exchanged between the Export-Import Bank and the Chinese Embassy. This loan carried the guarantee of the Chinese Government just as in our proposed deal with Ming Sung. Mr. Lu had confirmed this this morning with the representative of this chemical corporation who was staying in the same hotel in New York as Mr. Lu. Mr. Sun said that so far as the contribution made to China and its war effort was concerned, Ming Sung has done far more than the chemical corporation, and this was said without intending any disparagment to the latter corporation.

CREDITS FOR CHINA

7. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY reported that, during his recent visit, the Prime Minister of China had made a request for the granting of financial aid to the Chinese government by direct government loan and by export credits.

The sum of $100,000,000 had been suggested to meet a specified import programme from Canada. These goods considered necessary for the prosecution of the war and for the immediate period following the peace consisted principally of industrial requirements and included $25,000,000 for ordnance supplies already produced.

8. THE CABINET, after discussion, agreed that the amount and terms of any financial assistance to China be referred for consideration to the members of the Mutual Aid Board.

CREDITS TO CHINA

The official opinion is that the credit risk is bad and that the Canadian trade interest will be slight for many years. Any credit may well prove to have been a grant made in the form of a credit. There are nevertheless good reasons for using the credit form: it is needless to offer a grant to China when she requests a credit and undertakes to repay it; and it is unwise to forego the chance of repayment, since there is a possibility that China may repay us by borrowing from others.

There is justification for Canada in extending some credit.

It is in Canada's political and economic interest that China be strong and prosperous. Recent developments have greatly enhanced China's chances for a sound, if slow, economic development. The agreement reached with the Soviet Union and the support of the United States and the United Kingdom have markedly strengthened the Government. The Communists have shown a new disposition to be co-operative and conciliatory and there is now good prospect for political stability in China.

If advantage is to be obtained from this new access of strength to the Kuomintang, reconstruction supplies must begin to move into China. China cannot pay for them and will have to obtain them as gifts or by credits. Perhaps the facilities of the International Bank will ultimately substantially aid the development of the country but it may be two years before the Bank is in operation. While some major projects can wait that long, unless supplies are brought into the country immediately, the Government will lose support; its programme will lose way and the new-found enterprise of the country will wane.

While Canada's interest in the reconstruction of the development of China is not so great politically as that of the United States or the United Kingdom, we do share the long-run interest in the upbuilding of the country as a means of raising the general standard of living and of expanding world trade. The United States and the United Kingdom have both made substantial loans to China during the war, the former to the extent of some $550,000,000, the latter £50,000,000. Canada has made no loans to China. Provided the United States extends substantial credits to China, Canada might well recognize some obligation to assist in post-war development. While the amount of Canada's contribution can only be slight in comparison to the Chinese needs or to United States assistance, nevertheless a show of confidence and interest by us will encourage China in her efforts, aid her in her negotiations with other nations and improve the excellent relations that have been built up with Canada during the war.

It might be awkward to refuse extending any credit to China in the face of our commitments to Belgium, Czechoslovakia, France, the Netherlands, the Netherlands Indies, Norway and the U.S.S.R., which are in the neighbourhood of $470,000,000. The only grounds for refusing could be that China was a bad credit risk, since in terms of population and need China might expect to receive more than any other country. The war with Japan has resulted in the loss of her industrial centres for eight years, serious interference with her agricultural production, blockade of the flow of goods into China, limited scope for taxation and dangerous monetary inflation.

NOTE: It was suggested to Cabinet on September 5th that credits be granted to cover an ordnance programme of $25,000,000. This programme included pistols; Sten guns; Bren machine guns; Bofors; anti-tank rifles; 6-pdr. anti-tank guns; 3.7 anti-aircraft guns; 25-pdr. self-propelled mounts; 25-pdr. field equipment; range-finders; binoculars; ammunition in scale for the weapons; one 9-mm. ammunition plant; one .303 ammunition plant to be converted to 7.92 mm. and motor vehicles. All the above items have already been produced with the exception of some wireless trucks and of the September production of Bren guns.

The $75,000,000 reconstruction programme discussed included raw materials (aluminium, copper, zinc, etc.) to the extent of $20-25,000,000; engineering services, civilian trucks, machine tools, communication materials and small steam power plants.

The total Chinese request is in the neighbourhood of $250,000,000.[117] In addition to the two programmes mentioned above, there is a long list of specific projects which it is proposed should be examined individually by the Canadian authorities to determine their eligibility for financing under the guarantee provisions of the Export Credits Insurance Act. It is possible that many of them can await the establishment of the International Bank.

Dear Mr. Howe,

The outbreak in China of open fighting between the Communists and the forces of the Central Government has brought about a state of affairs in which it is even more than usually difficult to predict the course of events. The fighting has begun only after the failure of protracted negotiations in Chungking and it seems most unlikely that there will be an early end to it.

In these circumstances, I am doubtful whether it would be wise to make deliveries of munitions to the Chinese Government under the recent credit, at any rate until the question has been considered in the light of the changed conditions in China, perhaps after the return of the Prime Minister.

Mémorandum de la troisième direction politique au sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures

At the staff meeting this morning reference was made to the probability of political repercussions if Canada should extend further aid in the form of munitions to China. A consideration of much broader significance is the effect which the extension of such aid may have on the future relations of Canada with China and possibly also on relations among the three great powers.

The Communist movement in China is widespread and seems to have very solid grounds for support in the sympathies of large numbers of the Chinese people. Their controversy with the present government will no doubt be long continued. It is not likely that supplies of munitions alone would be a determining factor in the struggle. Probably only foreign intervention could settle the issue quickly and such settlement would be temporary.

The alternatives seem to be:

(1) Outright support of the Chinese Central Government, which would more or less openly set the United States and the United Kingdom in opposition to the U.S.S.R. (This has been advocated by the Ambassador in Chungking.)

(2) A policy of limited aid which would have the effect of needling the Soviet Union.

(3) A policy agreed upon by the three great powers which would leave the settling of China's internal problems to herself.

Under the third alternative some compromise would no doubt be worked out by the contending groups in China for the immediate future and some form of coalition for the longer future.

Canada's policy may have relatively little effect in view of the larger supplies under the control of the United States.

In these circumstances could an approach from Canada to the United States be considered which would indicate our hope that a common "hands off" policy might be adopted by the three great powers?[118]

SALE OF MUNITIONS TO CHINA

During the negotiations for the extension of export credits to China it was agreed that the Chinese Government would be given an export credit of $35,000,000 to assist in financing a $50,000,000 programme for the importation of reconstruction supplies from Canada and a further credit of $25,000,000 for the purchase of the munitions ordered for China under the Mutual Aid programme but not delivered when hostilities ended.

The munitions are already manufactured and could move forward on whatever shipping becomes available, as the Chinese know. They have begun negotiations to take up the credit. The outbreak of civil war in China, however, makes it necessary to consider the political implications of any shipment of munitions from Canada at this time.

The probability is that the controversy in China will be long continued. It is unlikely that $25,000,000 of Canadian munitions would prove to be a significant factor in settling the conflict. Even a considerable supply of munitions could hardly, in itself, be a determining factor in the struggle. A quick settlement would probably require foreign intervention and such settlement could only be temporary.

Hence we are justified in considering the effect which the furnishing of munitions would have on the political situation both in Canada and in China, and possibly also on relations among the three great powers. It seems likely that political controversy might arise in Canada and that the supplying of munitions might be interpreted abroad as a step towards intervention. The Chinese would no doubt appreciate our desire to avoid in Canada the type of controversy that has arisen in the United States — now intensified by the resignation of Ambassador Hurley — which would be harmful to Chinese and Canadian interests alike.

It may be that we can both satisfy the Chinese and avoid political difficulties for Canada by adopting the following course: Allow the Chinese a credit of the originally contemplated amount of $60,000,000 to cover a programme of $75,000,000 but stipulate that none of this amount be spent on munitions.

This would be renewed evidence of our desire to assist the Chinese in the work of peaceful reconstruction.

For practical reasons also the Chinese Government might welcome such an adjustment. They know that the munitions are of little value to us, but they have indicated that they did not take advantage of this to drive a hard bargain.

The transfer of the $25,000,000 to other projects might well enhance the value of the credit to them.

We could agree that if the disturbances should moderate before the full $60,000,000 is spent we would be prepared again to consider the shipment of munitions for which they could use any unspent balance of the credit.

MING SUNG SHIPBUILDING CONTRACT

I have received a communication from the Protocol Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, dated December 6th, in the following terms, Begins:

The Protocol Department of the Waichiaopu (Foreign Office) presents its compliments to the Canadian Embassy and begs to state that it has seen the memorandum of March 8th† concerning the borrowing of fifteen million Canadian dollars by Mr. Lu Tso Fu, General Manager of the Ming Sung Industrial Company, from the Canadian authorities concerned, for the purchase of eighteen ships.

The Chinese Government expresses its gratitude for this friendly gesture of help by the Canadian Government, and has given its sanction for this matter, and is willing to act as surety for the responsibilities of the Company.

We request the Canadian Government to act as surety also, so that under an atmosphere of faith the matter may be settled at the earliest possible moment. Ends.

REGARDING DEVELOPMENTS IN RESPECT OF CREDITS TO CHINA

On December 12th General Kiang[119] came in to see me in regard to the discussions we had had on credits for China. He said that they would like to be able to use the $75 million program already discussed with us for post-war purposes, and to have no amount earmarked for weapons. He said that his Government would like to receive credits of $75 m. and be required to make cash purchases of $15 m. in addition. He understood it might embarrass us to ship weapons to China at the present time, and he thought their authorities would be quite agreeable to an arrangement under which the weapons which we were proposing to sell them on credit would be held by the Department of Munitions and Supply, say at Longue Pointe Depot, subject to future discussions and possible future sale by Canada to China for cash. They would like, however, to be able to obtain in the near future the industrial plant which was included in the original D.M.S. program and which he understands is surplus to Canadian requirements. I understand this includes some equipment for the manufacture of ammunition of particular Chinese calibre. They would also like to obtain the military-type trucks which were included in the D.M.S. program and which were to be included in the items sold to them for $25 m. These trucks can be used, he said, for civilian as well as military purposes, and would be of great value to China in the immediate future. They would hope that they could have the cash requirement restricted to one-sixth of the total program, or one-fifth of the loan. He had read Mr. Ilsley's statement in the House of Commons[120] and had learned from that that in some cases we have confined our cash request to one-sixth rather than one-fifth of the program, and he felt that should apply in the case of China. He said his Government would also wish us to extend the repayments of the credit up to a time forty years from the date of the loan. He hoped that we could provide them with credits of this length at an interest rate of 3%. He would be interested, however, to learn what alternative period we could offer them at a 3% interest rate. He reported to me that they were making purchases now in the United States in anticipation of a credit from the U.S., placing their contracts on a contingent basis. He very much regretted the delay in being able to go forward on Canadian purchases. He said that already the delay had cost Canada the sale to China of the so-called China coasters, as his Government had now been able to buy from the U.S. ships of this general type but somewhat superior in detail, and in particular of a tonnage of 3,000 tons, which is better adapted to their requirements. He was afraid that further delay might mean that they bought their railway equipment in the U.S. rather than Canada.

I told him I would take these matters up as soon as I could with Mr. Ilsley, and possibly with Mr. Howe, as he was anxious to get them raised before Mr. Howe left. I saw Mr. Ilsley briefly that afternoon about the matter. He did not feel prepared to agree to an increase in the amount of the credit for post-war purposes beyond $85 m. because of the relation of this to the amount being provided by the U.S., which we still understand to be $560 m. He said that the Chinese agreement not to take the weapons at this time would not cause him to alter his views on this matter, as the weapons were very largely produced already at the cost of the Canadian Government, in any event. He said he would be prepared to see some amount added to the $35 m. to cover the trucks and industrial equipment, and saw no objection to the shipment of these and their inclusion in the immediate program.

I had an opportunity of speaking to Mr. Howe about this matter shortly afterwards in Mr. Ilsley's outer office. Mr. Howe in general agreed with the view which Mr. Ilsley had taken. He himself felt that it was not desirable to ship the weapons under present circumstances and that they could be held until later. He felt it would be all right to ship the industrial equipment in the ordnance program and the trucks which China had expected to take under the $25 m. payment. He thought it was just as well to restrict the post-war credit at the present time in the way Mr. Ilsley had suggested.

I told General Kiang I would try to let him know about this matter on Thursday, but was not able to do so. Mr. Pierce had agreed to get further information from Washington on the status of the credit arrangements there, and when this information is in, I will prepare a recommendation to Council asking for authority to make a specific offer of terms to the Chinese for $35 m. credits plus something additional to cover the trucks and industrial equipment, the terms of repayment to extend to the end of 30 years, and various interest rates depending on when repayment commences.

Mr. Ilsley and Mr. Howe both agreed that the amount of the required cash purchases could be related directly to the amount of credit that we will provide, and that we might amend our original offer in that respect.

Your telegram No. 486, December 6, 1945, Ming Sung Shipbuilding Contract.

Please advise Chinese authorities that to enable Canadian Government to provide guarantee under Export Credits Insurance Act, it is necessary for Chinese Government to inform Canadian Government that it has guaranteed the obligation of the Ming Sung Industrial Company to pay the cost of the eighteen ships being purchased from John Inglis Co. You might also suggest to Chinese authorities that it would be helpful if the above were transmitted through the Chinese Ambassador in Ottawa, and if he were at the same time authorized to execute on behalf of Chinese Government whatever documents might be necessary so that the guarantee arrangement may be concluded without unnecessary delay.

Dear General Kiang,

I am writing to you about the implementation of the offer which Mr. Howe extended some weeks ago on behalf of the Canadian Government to Dr. T. V. Soong, for your Government, in response to the request of your Government for credits. Mr. Bryce of my Department has informed me of his discussions with you on this matter, and of the various points which you raised and the requests which you made on behalf of your Government.

The offer which Mr. Howe made to Dr. Soong was that the Canadian Government would be prepared to lend $35,000,000 to the Government of China for the purchase of post-war requirements of the Government of China in Canada, and to lend $25,000,000 to the Government of China to pay for various types of supplies and equipment which it had been expected China would receive from Canada as Mutual Aid had the war continued. The provision of these credits was to be contingent on China agreeing to spend $15,000,000 of its own funds, derived from the sale to Canada of gold or United States dollars, on purchasing supplies in Canada during the period in which these credits were being utilized. No definite offer of terms of the two loans concerned was made at that time.

I understand that it is now expected and agreed that the weapons and munitions included in the original program of military supplies will not be purchased or shipped at the present time, and that therefore the items on this Mutual Aid program which you would wish to obtain immediately are the trucks and the used industrial equipment which your authorities had requested and would like to receive as soon as possible.

After taking up this matter with my colleagues in the Cabinet, I am now able to inform you that we are prepared to enter into a loan agreement with your Government as soon as is practicable, under which Canada would lend to the Government of China $35,000,000 for the purchase of post-war supplies, in accordance with a program to be agreed with the Department of Trade and Commerce. We are prepared as well to extend to you an additional credit of $25,000,000 to be used in purchasing the supplies originally requested as Mutual Aid, as and when the various categories of those supplies are shipped by mutual agreement. I understand that the trucks and industrial equipment on this program will be ready for shipment and can be shipped very shortly, and that the amount of credit required to make payment for them would be something approaching $15,000,000 out of the $25,000,000 noted above.

We will make this loan on condition that your Government uses for purchasing supplies in Canada for export to China an amount of Canadian dollars derived from the sale to Canada of gold and U.S. dollars equal to 20 per cent of the amount of the credits utilized. In these cash purchases we would be prepared to include purchases made by your Government or by Chinese importers through commercial channels, provided that satisfactory arrangements can be made for obtaining records of them.

In regard to the terms of the credits themselves, the Canadian Government is prepared to accept repayment in thirty annual instalments, commencing in 1948. This is approximately the same period as the credit we have provided to certain Western European countries. We do not believe that we can undertake to provide credits for repayment over a longer period than this. The interest rate we should request for a credit of this duration is 3 per cent per annum. We understand you would wish to use these credits during 1946 and 1947, which would be satisfactory to us.

Mr. Bryce has reported to me the strong desire of your Government to have us increase the amount of credit which we could make available to you. I have discussed this matter with my colleagues, and I must report that the Canadian Government is not prepared at this early stage to agree to a larger credit for general post-war purposes than the one I have outlined above. As you know, however, we have indicated our willingness to consider the provision of guarantees for credits obtained in Canada for the financing of specific industrial projects, and we remain prepared to consider any projects along this line that your Government wishes to put forward itself or permit Chinese nationals to put forward.

If your authorities are prepared to agree to the terms which I have outlined above, I think it would be possible to proceed quickly to have an agreement drawn up which could be submitted to the Canadian Government and presumably to your own Government for formal approval, and which could then be signed without delay. I would hope myself that completion of the agreement could be accomplished within another two weeks.

I regret that there has been some delay in dealing with this matter in recent weeks, but, as you know, there has been a great deal of urgent business to be dealt with because of the termination of our Parliamentary session.

I sincerely hope it will be possible for us to reach agreement quickly on a credit that will enable Canadian supplies and equipment to be of use to China in the enormous task of reconstruction which she faces.

Yours very truly,

J. L. ILSLEY

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures à l'ambassadeur en Grèce

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in Greece

TELEGRAM 33 [Ottawa,] November 29, 1945

SECRET. The Greek Ambassador has advised me that his Government wishes to obtain an export credit of $25 to $50 million. When the request was made we felt it would be difficult to justify to Cabinet a loan to Greece because of (a) the political instability of Greece; (b) the failure of successive Governments to deal effectively with increasingly chaotic economic and financial conditions; (c) the withdrawal by the United Kingdom of financial support for the Greek Army, which must affect either the security of the country or its budget or both; (d) the small volume of past and prospective trade between Canada and Greece; and (e) the failure of Greece to repay the loan made by Canada in 1919.

The advent of a stronger Greek Government which has accepted United Kingdom proposals for reconstruction and has undertaken to implement them in consultation with British experts may have changed the situation materially. We feel, however, that it might be wise to delay a decision until the stability of the new Government has been proved and its reconstruction measures are in effective operation.

We have learned from our Embassy in Washington that negotiations are proceeding satisfactorily for a loan of $25 million to be made to Greece by the Export-Import Bank. The Greeks submitted a detailed programme of proposed expenditures, consisting principally of materials required for road repair, railroad equipment, materials for irrigation of agricultural land, repairing and salvaging ships and for repairing ports, items necessary for re-equipping the Merchant Marine and equipment for repairs and improvements in the Athens water works. The loan will be for a thirty-year period and the rate will be the standard Export-Import Bank rate of three per cent per annum. The terms are in some respects more liberal than those offered by the Bank to other borrowers. The report circulated in Athens and reproduced in the newspapers here that the United States had promised a loan of $250 million to Greece was false. The United States authorities are not considering a loan of that magnitude to Greece at this stage.

In addition to the loan under negotiation, which we understand represents the limit to which the United States are prepared to go now in the way of financial assistance apart from UNRRA contributions, the United States authorities are expected to discuss with United Kingdom representatives a proposal to provide the Greek Government with a small United States-United Kingdom Technical Advisory Mission.

As the Greek request for a credit from Canada will doubtlessly be pressed with insistence, we would welcome your comments by telegraph.

Associated with the question of credit is that of concluding a trade agreement exchanging most-favoured-nation treatment. Your despatch No. 27 of October 9th† enclosed a summary of an article in Kathimerini† in which it was stated that Grew[121] "will fix the formal basis for the Canadian-Greek commercial and economic exchanges by a basic commercial agreement." This indicates our commitment to negotiate an agreement. Is the statement accurate? We favour in general concluding such agreements. We are willing to proceed if we are committed or if the Greek Government desires to do so, but if neither is the case we would prefer to defer negotiations until they could be conducted in relation to the world trade negotiations which we expect will take place in the spring or summer of 1946.

Your telegram No. 33 of November 29th, export credit for Greece, final paragraph

Canada is not, repeat is not, committed to negotiate loan or credit or trade agreement. Both George[122] and I were present when Grew replied, in most general terms, to a few questions. Misstatements by Greek newspapers are a daily occurrence, often reflecting wishful thinking, as widely circulated reports of 250 million United States loan show. The Grew misquotation has not since been mentioned to me and should be disregarded.

2. I have told Greek Government I hope no trade agreement placing Canada at disadvantage will be concluded with other countries, e.g., Scandinavia (see my despatch No. 37 of November 1st†). Sophianopoulos[123] this week promised to inform me of progress being made in Stockholm. Nothing more definite has been said. I favour a Greek-Canadian Trade Agreement and would now like authority to discuss relevant points with the Greek Government without committing you, and to ascertain views of United Kingdom, United States and U.N.R.R.A. advisers here.

3. Regarding export credit, I share apprehension of instability of Greece for reasons mentioned in your first paragraph and agree with wisdom of waiting for new Government to prove its capacity to stabilize economy. Several previous Governments have had good intentions and British support. This Government might prove stronger, but situation is as uncertain as ever. Net result of McNeil Mission[124] visible today is Left Centre is being given their opportunity. Extreme Left's jubilation already cooling into conditional support, while the Rightists and others blame the Government supporters and criticize United Kingdom Government authorities for dealing with Greek affairs with British rather than Greek public opinion in mind. This despite the United States Ambassador having deviated slightly from traditional non-intervention policy. Government's complexion, with the public believing it was brought in by the British, has caused new wave of fear of Soviet influence among majority, which is probably Royalist, because the people dread the Communistic alternative remembering last December. Despite the recent enactment of the death penalty for possession of gold, the drachma is again in 70 thousands, while open market commodity prices are soaring still faster. British economic experts' arrival expected within three weeks, but problem essentially one of public confidence and whether the Administration would enforce any new measures to be agreed upon. No reply from Washington yet received here on proposed United States participation.

4. If the present Government should fall before elections, Moderate Right would probably replace it; after that, the Communists, with or without bloodshed. Lack of Greek stability may, therefore, play into Communist hands. Though Canadian credit concluded now would help present Government, I am against a rapid conclusion of credit negotiations and recommend playing waiting game. I see grave danger of credit granted now being used more to support the Government than the country, as the tendency in utilizing U.N.R.R.A. supplies illustrates. However, if the Greek Government press for immediate credit or trade agreement, and if a credit now would be more useful to Canada's transitional economic policy, I recommend that the agreement be most carefully framed so as to ensure:

(a) Credit must not be spent within few months but used to supplement conclusion of U.N.R.R.A;

(b) Credit should not be available until after the elections;

(c) Goods selected should be from availability list approved by the Canadian Government;

(d) Greek Government should sell direct to consumer or at any rate strictly limit and control profit;

(e) Canadian goods and their retail prices should receive full publicity in Greece.

(f) Settlement of old loan to be part of any new credit, and

(g) Canada to receive most favoured treatment by trade agreement. Please inform me what Canadian goods might be approved under (c) above.

5. I expect that the British are strongly behind the Greek request, as they have already informally suggested loans of military and financial relief from Canada. My despatches No. 59 of November 16th† and No. 30 of October 30th† refer.

6. Greece is obviously very poor risk. Canadian help could only be given on basis of Greek suffering and sacrifices during the war and to keep a strategically located friend from being submerged. Western Europe is already in danger.

7. Granting of credit relief with strict conditions merits consideration now but to be effective at the appropriate time.

8. Anything said to the Greek authorities in Canada would probably soon be reflected in Athens newspapers edited to suit particular purposes.

L'ambassadeur de Grèce au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Sir:

With reference to my conversation with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs on the 22nd of November, 1945, I have the honour to inform you that I have been directed by the Greek Government to present to the Canadian Government a formal request for credits as provided by the Export Credits Act, for the amount of $50,000,000.

I think it will be unnecessary to restate what I had the opportunity of setting forth at length with Mr. Robertson relating to the financial conditions prevailing in Greece, which is well known by the Canadian Government.

The great difficulties facing Greece today, following the tremendous sacrifices she has undergone, thus paying the highest price for the common victory; the fact that Greece has not obtained any credits from the $100,000,000 originally appropriated for credits, cause me to look forward with confidence to the favourable consideration by the Canadian Government of the request of the Greek Government and that the whole amount will be obtained, which, anyway, will only cover a very small part of the Greek needs.

I am the more confident of this having in mind the particularly friendly feelings of the Canadian Government and the Canadian people towards my country who has already received, upon many occasions, concrete testimony. I do not doubt that the Canadian Government will show the same spirit in considering the aforesaid request of the Greek Government and will see that, in formulating the conditions under which the credits will be granted, proper consideration of the financial situation of Greece will not be omitted, especially in connection with the period and the conditions of repayment.

Accept etc.

SECRET Ottawa, December 7, 1945

Attention: Mr. Bryce

I attach telegram No. 50 of December 2nd from the Canadian Ambassador to Greece on the subject of export credits.

Please note the Ambassador's proposals in paragraph 4.

On (a) we should certainly check the Greek programme to ensure that there is no duplication with the UNRRA programme as did the U.S. (See teletype WA-5974 of November 28th).† Further, we may be able to check the programme with the U.K. Economic Advisory Commission, if the Greeks decide to receive the Commission.

On (b) our advice is that the elections will not likely be held before March 1946.

The suggestion in (c) conforms to our usual practice.

As to (d) I would think that we would lend only if we had confidence in the government and if we have it would not be necessary to impose such conditions, which are designed to prevent the government making an exorbitant profit and to prevent black market operations.

(f) I doubt if we should disinter the old loan unless the Greeks intended to settle other obligations of similar character. It is perhaps too much to ask the Greek Government to add to the heavy load they are carrying.

(g) We raised this question with France but felt then that we should not make granting of m.f.n. treatment a condition precedent to the granting of the loan.[125] I think we should raise it with the Greeks, who would probably agree.

With reference to a trade agreement, in paragraph 2 the Ambassador says he would like authority "to discuss relevant points" with the Greeks without committing us. The Department of Trade and Commerce might consider it worth while to send us for transmittal to him a prototype agreement.

I would appreciate your comments and I am asking the Department of Trade and Commerce for theirs.

Procès-verbal d'une réunion avec l'ambassadeur de Grèce

Minutes of Meeting with Ambassador of Greece

[Ottawa,] December 8, 1945

The Ambassador referred to his note of December 4th requesting an export credit of $50,000,000 and hoped that the request would be favourably received and acted on quickly.

I explained the requirement which had been laid down in all cases of export credits, namely, the presentation of a Canadian procurement programme, listing the supplies which it was hoped could be procured in Canada out of the proceeds of the credit. I said that we had received such a programme from all countries to whom loans had been made. When he had such a programme and not before, conversations could usefully begin between him and the Department of Finance.

I further explained that we would wish to relate the programme of Canadian procurement to UNRRA's programme for relief in Greece, to the economic assistance which the United Kingdom and the United States were likely to provide, and finally to the broad reconstruction programme of Greece. If, however, the Greeks drew up a programme of Canadian procurement, a beginning could be made and this programme could be examined for availability in Canada. He asked me whether we objected to supplying foodstuffs. I told him that we had made a substantial contribution to UNRRA and that, in so far as foodstuffs for relief were concerned, we would expect that UNRRA would meet the needs of Greece.

I told him that a loan of $50,000,000 would be difficult for us to justify by the extent of our interest, that it might be out of proportion to the assistance being granted by other countries and that it would certainly be hard to justify under a strict interpretation of the Export Credits Insurance Act, under which loans may be authorized "for the purpose of facilitating and developing trade or any branch of trade." Our trade with Greece has been very small, amounting to $300,000 in 1939. I told him that I thought it would be in the interests of Greece to present a programme considerably smaller than $50,000,000. I don't think, however, I made much impression. The Greeks will probably let the request stand even though they don't expect it to be granted in full. The Ambassador said that if we couldn't meet it in full they would be glad to receive a smaller amount.

The Ambassador proposes to communicate with his Government and ask for a programme at once without waiting for a reply to his note.

Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Ottawa, December 11, 1945

Attention Mr. S. D. Pierce

I have your letter of December 7 enclosing telegram No. 50 of December 2nd from the Canadian Ambassador to Greece on the subject of export credits together with his proposals in connection with that subject and a possible trade agreement with Greece.

We should be in favour of his discussing relevant points in connection with a possible Greek-Canadian trade agreement with the Greek government without at this stage committing us. It is hardly likely that we would be prepared to go further at present than an exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment, although this might be supplemented later, when the agreements with our major markets have been revised, by a further agreement giving particular attention to some specific commodities. As suggested in your letter, I am enclosing herewith copies of our existing agreement with Brazil[126] and draft agreement to be discussed with Mexico.† In connection with the latter, the comments regarding quantitative restrictions in my letter to you of December 10 might be helpful and a copy is enclosed.†

With regard to the Ambassador's request under Item 4(g) for a list of what Canadian goods might be approved as available for export to Greece under the terms of a loan, we are inclined to doubt the desirability of detailing specific commodities at this time. The supply position might alter appreciably before the loan became effective. Further the listing only of items which are in good supply at the moment, might give the erroneous impression that these are the only ones we wish to export. On the whole, we incline to the view that the Ambassador might indicate to the Greeks the things that Canada exports as listed in our trade statistics and leave it to them to indicate what they would like to obtain under a loan arrangement. Reservations on the ground of availability could be made subsequently if necessary, as was done in the case of the French loan.[127] In any case a loan to Greece would not likely be so large as to give rise to serious supply difficulties.

In view of the fact, recognized by the Ambassador in his paragraph 6, that Greece is not a first-class risk from the commercial point of view, Canadian help, if offered, would be mainly on the basis mentioned by the Ambassador. Neither our past experience with a Greek loan nor the future prospects of trade with that country — so far as we can see at present — would appear to offer any great prospect for the speedy retirement of any credit that might be granted. Relief in Greece would appear to be a particular responsibility of UNRRA. If, however, the government should decide, for the reasons mentioned by the Ambassador, to grant credits to Greece, I concur in the recommendations of the Ambassador and the comments in your letter.

I have your note of December 8th regarding your conversation on that date with the Greek Ambassador, and also a copy of the note which the Greek Ambassador has addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, asking Canada to provide credits to Greece in the amount of $50,000,000.

As you know from our conversation on this matter, there are very considerable financial risks in any substantial loan to Greece, and there has in the past been relatively little trade between the two countries. We are all acutely aware — and, I believe, sympathetically aware — of the serious financial difficulties which Greece is now experiencing, and of the magnitude of the losses she has suffered as a result of the war. However, it would seem to me that our assistance to Greece, if there is to be assistance, should mainly take the form it has in the past, that is, of gifts of food to tide it over, and the provision of supplies by UNRRA, to which, of course, we contribute on a fair and equitable basis. Presumably, from what the Greek Ambassador has stated, more will be needed than can be provided through these agencies and in this manner. Such additional amounts would apparently have to be provided on credits, and in our case, presumably under The Export Credits Insurance Act.

As you have pointed out, it will be difficult to justify a large loan in terms of our trade with Greece in the past and our prospective trade with Greece in the future. Therefore, it would seem to me that any credits beyond very small amounts would have to be justified by our general interest in the future of Greece and its place in Europe. I am, therefore, writing to ask whether the Department of External Affairs would be prepared to supply us with an appreciation of Canadian interests in the future of Greece and with any information on the share which Canada should reasonably be expected to assume of a program of assistance by way of credits that might be carried on by the U.K., the U.S., and other countries.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Canadian export credit for Greece.

Well informed Athenian papers today report that Greek Vice-Premier Tsouderos will consult Canadian authorities while in London for economic talks with United Kingdom authorities this weekend.

2. Considering Greek political instability and economic breakdown, I believe any credit made available to Greece immediately would do the country little good except by strengthening the present Government for a time. The twenty-five million dollar United States loan will serve this purpose if anything can. Unless Canada can afford to give two credits to Greece, one now and one later, I recommend continuing waiting game.

DESPATCH 193 Ottawa, February 21, 1944

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that consideration is being given in Canada to the maintenance of Canadian trade connections with countries which may constitute substantial post-war markets for Canadian goods, even though at the present time exports to them may not be of great importance to Canada.

2. One of the most important areas concerned is that dealt with at present by the Middle East Supply Centre in Cairo. The requests for imports in the territories under its jurisdiction are reviewed by it in the light of the supply situation and its recommendations are transmitted to the various supply authorities. It appears that the Middle East Supply Centre refers its recommendations to London and that United Kingdom companies are given the opportunity to supply any of the commodities which may be required. The remaining requests are then referred to Washington, and Canada is usually disregarded as a source of supply except for a very limited range of commodities for which Canada is the only possible source of supply. The United Kingdom and the United States are equally represented on the Executive Committee which controls the Middle East Supply Centre but Canada has no representation on this Committee.

3. In the case of Turkey, there is a Cabinet Committee in London which deals with supplies and any requirements which the United Kingdom cannot undertake are referred to Washington. Such knowledge as we receive comes to us through our Commercial Counsellor there as a result of his close liaison with the British Supply Council.

4. A somewhat similar situation exists in the case of the requirements of the British colonies. Orders for goods not available in the United Kingdom are referred to the British Colonies Supply Mission in Washington, with which also we maintain close liaison.

5. In view of these facts, I should appreciate it if you can explore with the United Kingdom authorities the question of recognition which Canada should receive as a supplying country and the desirability of establishing well-defined channels by which we may be informed of the requirements of such areas as the Middle East, Turkey, and North Africa. In these discussions it would be desirable to emphasize that our chief interest lies in forestalling a situation in which the countries concerned would normally look to the United Kingdom and the United States as their normal suppliers to the exclusion of Canada. In some instances it is a matter of retaining a foothold in our prewar markets and in others a matter of becoming known in new markets which have not in the past been exclusively those of the United Kingdom or the United States.

DESPATCH 456 London, April 6, 1944

Sir

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 193 of February 21st concerning the maintenance of Canadian trade connections with the Middle East, Turkey, North Africa and the British Colonies, even though at the present time exports to these countries may not be of great importance to Canada. Previous to the receipt of your despatch this question was very thoroughly gone into by officers in London of the Department of Trade and Commerce and discussions have since taken place with the Dominions Office and other Departments concerned, particularly with regard to Canada's interest in the areas which are the concern of the Middle East Supply Centre in Cairo.

2. In principle the method followed in handling requirements for the areas referred to is to divide the requirements into three classes:

(a) Individual import licences granted to the merchants to import certain essential commodities.

(b) Bulk indents submitted for certain commodities.

(c) Importation of cereals under a pooling system.

Under the bulk-indenting system the total number of commercial orders is added together, combined with any Government orders and put forward to the Missions established to deal with the needs of designated countries. In the pooling system, under which nearly all the principal foodstuffs and some vitally important materials are covered, the Governments' estimates of their requirements are bulked.

3. In both cases, the requirements are discussed and checked by the Missions concerned, and referred to London and Washington for further consideration. Orders, or purchases are then placed or made "guided by directives on the world supply and shipping position, which the Missions or their counter-parts in the United Kingdom or the United States receive from time to time from the British and United States Government". Both the United Kingdom and the United States Governments have established a "Commodity Index" which is revised from time to time and gives the loading areas for various commodities.

4. As your despatch under reference indicates, both the United Kingdom and the United States are equally represented on the various Missions which consider the requirements of the countries in which Canada is interested, but Canada has no representation on these bodies. The exploratory conversations which have taken place have not proved very satisfactory or productive from the point of view of the possibility of securing recognition of Canada as a supplying country and/or the appointment of a Canadian representative on the various Missions. I have therefore come to the conclusion that if it is desired to pursue the subject further it can only be dealt with by a representation being made at the highest level as various considerations of policy are involved.

5. Dominions Office telegram D.No.352 of March 7th† reporting the views of Mr. Landis, United States representative on the M.E.S.C. on post-war development in the Middle East, deals with a long-range aspect of the problem and a Canadian comment on this telegram could very well introduce the subject dealt with in this despatch, particularly as recent press reports have indicated that supplies to the Middle East, etc. are to be the subject of an early discussion between Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt.

6. From the discussions which have taken place it would appear that the following points should be emphasized in any representations made:

(a) Recognition of Canada as a supplying country on an equal footing with the United States and the United Kingdom.

(b) Establishment of well defined channels by which Canada could be informed of the requirements of such areas as the Middle East, Turkey, North Africa and the British Colonies.

(c) That Canada be designated in the Commodity Index as a source of supply.

(d) The advantage of a Canadian Representative being appointed to the various Missions.

7. In the light of your despatch under reference I did not feel warranted in going beyond an exploration of the situation and if it is decided that formal representations on the subject should be made it will be necessary to give an indication of the merchandise Canada is in a position to supply in quantity to the centres where the various Missions are operating.

DESPATCH 463 Ottawa, April 19, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 456 of April 6 concerning the maintenance of Canadian trade connections with the Middle East, Turkey, North Africa and British Colonies. I agree with your view that this subject must now be dealt with by a representation at the highest level. I also agree that emphasis should be placed on the points mentioned in paragraph six of your despatch, particularly points (d) and (c).

2. While it is hardly practical at the present time to give a list of the merchandise which Canada is in a position to supply in quantity to the Supply Centers where the various Missions are operating, our experience in supplying agricultural implements to the Middle East may serve as an illustration of the difficulties with which we have to contend. It is our understanding that the agricultural authorities of each country in the Middle East compile a statement of essential requirements which are sent to Middle East Supply Centre in Cairo. This body in turn submits the statement of total requirements to the Combined Planning Authorities in London. The authority in question as far as agricultural implements are concerned is probably the Food and Farm Machinery Committee. This Committee, it is understood, prepares Combined Planning Sheets setting out the requirements of British Empire Countries, Protectorates, and the Middle East, and designates the sources of supply. The Planning Sheets for agricultural implements then go to the Farm and Food Processing Machinery Committee of the Combined Production and Resources Board in Washington; if, however, Canada is not shown as a source of supply at this stage, nothing can be done to adjust the situation, as the Committee concerned deals with production facilities, raw materials, etc., but does not re-specify sources of supply, unless supplies are not available from the countries named in the Combined Planning Sheets. Thus it is obvious that Canadian interests must be protected when the combined planning is being done in London and it is there that Canadian representation is most urgently needed, although it would be desirable if Canada could be represented at the Middle East Supply Centre as well, and of course on similar bodies in other areas.

3. The Administrator of Farm Machinery reports that not a single agricultural implement was specified from Canadian industry for the Middle East in either 1943 or 1944. The Combined Planning Sheets for 1945 also disregard Canada entirely and unless very prompt action is taken, we will have no share in exports to that area, which may well result in the definite and permanent loss of those markets to the United Kingdom and the United States. Studies made respecting Canada's long term exports show that we provide about 27% of all farm implements (excluding tractors) exported from the North American Continent and this forms the basis of a strong argument for our participation in any market allocations which are made. An even more important consideration is that many types of agricultural implements specified for shipment to the Middle East are either entirely new to that area or were shipped previously in negligible quantities. If we do not protect Canadian trade interests now, it will be impossible to secure any share of the market in the post-war period, either for replacement parts or new units, as Canadian brands will be completely unknown. To stress the importance of our exports of agricultural implements and machinery, I would point out that a survey covering 25 years shows that about 45% of the value of our production goes to export markets.

4. It is also highly desirable that Canada should appear in the Commodity Index for Middle East countries. If we could have a representative with the Middle East Supply Centre or with some Committee working under that body he would be able to indicate to the authorities compiling the Index the items which Canada might reasonably be able to supply. He would, of course, be furnished with information as to Canada's productive capacity in items which might be in doubt, but even without any briefing, he would be able to inform the Middle East Supply Centre that Canada is a potential source of supply of newsprint, whereas the Commodity Index in its present form shows the United States as the only "loading area."

5. Canada should also be represented on the Committees responsible for compiling the Combined Planning Sheets in London. Before designating a representative we should have to be advised of the level of these Committees, but in any event the representative should have technical advisors who could, presumably, be secured in the United Kingdom from among the agents for Canadian exporters. In the case of agricultural implements, the Administrator recommends that either Mr. G. H. Thomas or Mr. Lionel Harper, (both of Massey-Harris Company, Manchester), be named as technical advisor.

6. The question of representation will have to be decided before specific appointments can be considered. It might, however, be of use to you to know that we have in mind Mr. Richard Grew, Canadian Trade Commissioner in Cairo, as liaison officer to the Middle East Supply Centre or as a member of one of its Committees. In French North Africa Mr. Lamontagne, who has recently been appointed as Economic Advisor would be available. Mr. Grew might be able to serve as liaison officer to the British American Co-ordinating Committee concerned with Turkey, as his territory includes that country.

DESPATCH A. 410 London, July 6, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 463 of April 19th, 1944 concerning the maintenance of Canadian trade connections with the Middle East, Turkey, North Africa and the British Colonies.

I have been informed by the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs that he hopes to make available a considered reply in the near future, as our official representations are now under active discussion.

In the meantime, I have been advised by the Turkish Sub-Committee in London that for some time past consideration has been given to a list of goods destined to Turkey which the Committee wish to control, both from the point of view of receiving recommendations from the Mission in Angora, and of allocating sources of supply. This list is not yet final but departments here have now suggested, tentatively, sources of supply for all the items on this list.

I am enclosing copies of the latest list which shows the proposed sources of supply.† I am informed by the Turkish Sub-Committee that these are purely tentative and are based mainly on the Middle East Commodity Index. On examining the enclosed list it will be found that Canada appears as the loading area for very few items accounted for by the fact that the Middle East Commodity Index does not, as yet, show Canada as a potential source of supply for a large number of commodities which are available. The list is not final and is being submitted to the United States Authorites for consideration and the Turkish Sub-Committee assumes that any additions which Canada wishes to make will be taken up with the United States Authorities in Washington. To this assumption I have pointed out that the drawback to such a course is that usually the Authorities in Washington do not re-specify sources of supply and accept the recommendations from London. I have suggested that final action should be deferred until the matter has been considered by the Canadian authorities, and I am informed of the commodities for which Canada may be considered as a loading area. It is, however, possible that you may wish to discuss this list with Washington and defer action from this end so I would appreciate being advised of the course which you wish to be pursued.

Sir,

In the matter of the Middle East Supply Centre, discussions were held here last week with Commander Jackson of the Centre the outcome of which is summarized in the attached copy of a letter dated July 24th, from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Under-Secretary.

We feel that the working arrangements outlined therein are satisfactory, and bring to a successful conclusion your efforts and ours to improve our relationship with the Centre.

We will be glad to have any comments from you.

Att'n. Syd. Pierce, Esq.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have purposely delayed acknowledging your letter of July 12,† with enclosed despatch No. A. 410 from the High Commissioner in the U.K. until we had had our meeting with Commander Jackson of the Middle East Supply Centre, Cairo.

As you know, Commander Jackson was in Ottawa on Friday, July 21, when we had a discussion with him regarding the supply of Canadian goods to the Middle East countries. Three principal facts developed from this meeting. The first and perhaps most important was that Cmdr. Jackson undertook to arrange for us to receive copies of the Middle East program of requirements as soon as they are made available to the U.K. and the U.S. These are to be forwarded to us through our Trade Commissioner in Cairo as well as through the Canadian Embassy in Washington.

Secondly, it was disclosed that inclusion on the Middle East Commodity Index can be readily arranged by notification by Canada to the Combined Boards in Washington and to the Middle East Supply Centre in Cairo, that Canada is a source of supply for specified commodities. Cmdr. Jackson further assured us that the act of providing a statement of goods which we can supply against the M.E.S.C. program will automatically have the effect of placing Canada on the Commodity Index for these items.

Finally, on the subject of Canadian representation on the M.E.S.C. Supplies Committee, Cmdr. Jackson explained that at present the Committee is composed of representatives of the U.K. and the U.S. and that if we pressed our claim to the point of gaining membership for Canada, it would mean the admission of the French and the Russians, as well as most other parts of the Empire. This would, in his opinion, make the Committee large and unwieldy and he hoped that his proposals to work in closer cooperation with our resident Trade Commissioner would now remove the difficulties of the past. We have accepted this on the assumption, of course, that we will receive copies of the M.E.S.C. requirement programs promptly.

As regards the Commodity Index for the Middle East and Turkey, I understand the Standing Committee of the External Trade Advisory Committee will be considering at its next meeting the commodities which should be recommended as being available from Canada. When this is completed, I shall see that it is transmitted to Washington and Cairo in accordance with Commander Jackson's suggestion contained in paragraph 3 above.

Yours faithfully,

MOST SECRET. Your telegram Circular D. 303 of February 28th,† control of United Nations shipping after termination of hostilities with Germany.

Canadian Government concurs in your view that in general interest of United Nations it would be desirable to maintain central direction of shipping for such time as may be necessary to complete the war and tasks arising from it and that some broader organization is necessary to give smaller nations a voice in shipping control. Canada's War and Immediate Postwar Position.

merchant navy consists of approximately 150 ocean-going vessels of 750,000 gross tons. In addition, the Canadian government holds title to more than 90 vessels, chiefly of the 10,000 ton class, which have been turned over under Mutual Aid to the United Kingdom. The shipbuilding programme in Canada is continuing and at the close of hostilities in Europe, the Canadian government will probably own about 300 ocean-going merchant vessels with a total tonnage of more than 2,000,000 tons gross register representing an overall investment of $500,000,000. If the shipbuilding programme is extended during the period of war against Japan, these figures will become even larger.

The U.K. and U.S. merchant fleets will be far greater than the Canadian. Nevertheless Canada will have achieved the position of the third merchant shipping nation in the world. The restoration of Norwegian, Dutch and Greek fleets may be expected but Canada will be in a position to remain one of the foremost shipping nations.

Postwar Control of Shipping; U.K. Proposals.

Control of merchant shipping during the war has been exercised by the U.K. and the U.S. through the Combined Shipping Adjustment Board. Time charter arrangements which made possible the control of the merchant navies of European nations will expire shortly after the end of the war in Europe and certain European governments have already shown a desire to play a part in the control hitherto exercised entirely by the U.S. and the U.K.

In view of these considerations, the U.K. has proposed to the U.S. (notifying the Commonwealth governments of this step) the establishment of an International Maritime Administration to plan the coordinated use of merchant shipping during the period following the termination of hostilities in Europe. The administration would consist of a council representing all the participating governments, and two small executive boards, one in Washington and one in London. Membership on the boards would be limited to those countries with a large amount of shipping to offer. The boards would be the real working agencies, would determine rates and with the consent of the country concerned, would allocate shipping services if such a scheme is adopted. Canada's position should be recognized by membership on one or both of the boards.

Comments on U.K. Proposals.

There are a number of points in the U.K. proposals which require clarification. The suggestion that U.K. ships be allocated to meet British Commonwealth requirements may imply treating the Commonwealth position more or less as a unit. A further corollary of this position, if the early history of the Combined Food Board is an example, may be that the proposed London board would be, among other things, a British Commonwealth board. This could scarcely be satisfactory to Canada which has been working very closely with and through the U.S. War Shipping Administration.

Canadian Postwar Policy.

There is a considerable body of informed opinion which believes that the Canadian war-built vessels should be operated under the Canadian flag after the war to serve the needs of the Canadian export trade which consists largely of bulk cargo well suited to these vessels. Particularly during the immediate postwar construction period demand for this shipping will be great. The retention of the Canadian merchant marine developed during the war might be in part at the expense of the British merchant marine. At the same time, considerations of security and of service to Canadian export interests would appear to justify its maintenance. Moreover, the prospects for increased postwar international trade are such that Canada should be able to maintain her merchant marine without seriously injuring the shipping position of other nations, including the U.K., particularly during the immediate postwar rehabiliation period and if the terms of the Atlantic Charter are carried out, subsequently as well.

Canadian costs of construction and operation are likely to be somewhat higher that those of the U.K. and European nations. This factor should prevent the Canadian merchant marine from ever reaching an excessive size which would injure the foreign exchange receipts gained by other countries from shipping services. At the same time, it is recognized that Canada would not be likely to come out well from an international subsidy race in the shipping field. There are signs that the U.S. may embark upon an extensive subsidy policy. U.K. shipping interests, however, appear to be strongly opposed to subsidies.

Problems.

The international problems in the merchant shipping field of particular interest to Canada are briefly:

1. Broadening of international machinery for supervision of shipping.

This should include adequate recognition of the size of the Canadian merchant marine.

2. Establishment of an effective system of long-term international cooperation in respect of merchant shipping.

This should cover control of rates, policy to be followed with regard to the disposal of the large war-built merchant fleets of the U.S., the U.K. and Canada, and the necessity for rehabilitation of the leading prewar European merchant navies.

3. The policy to be followed with regard to the disposal of merchant vessels which Canada has made available to the U.K. under Mutual Aid.

These may include almost one-third of the Canadian-owned merchant vessels. The Merchant Shipping Policy Committee proposes to recommend that as soon as circumstances permit, there be some readjustment with regard to the position of these vessels, and that they either be sold to the U.K. or that U.K. earnings on these vessels be made available to Canada.

Mémorandum du ministère des Transports au Commité de guerre du Cabinet
Memorandum by Department of Transport to Cabinet War Committee

SECRET [Ottawa, July 11, 1944]

U.K.-U.S. PROPOSALS FOR INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF MERCHANT SHIPPING AFTER CONCLUSION OF HOSTILITIES IN EUROPE

The Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy submits the following statement and recommendations with reference to proposals advanced by the U.K. and the U.S. for international control of merchant shipping after the conclusion of hostilities in Europe:

I. Wartime Control of Shipping.

Since the beginning of the war control over British merchant shipping has been exercised by the British Ministry of War Transport. The U.S., after entering the war, established a similar agency, the War Shipping Administration. Coordination between these two organizations has been achieved by setting up the Combined Shipping Adjustment Boards composed solely of U.K. and U.S. representatives in London and Washington. The Canadian Shipping Board, set up in December 1939, exercises similar control of Canadian registered vessels. It is entirely independent of the British Ministry of War Transport, the War Shipping Administration and the Combined Shipping Adjustment Boards but has closely cooperated with these three agencies since their inception.

II. Terms of U.K. Proposals.

The United Kingdom has informed Canada that it is proposed to hold an international conference in London to discuss the establishment of an International Maritime Administration to coordinate the use of merchant shipping during the period immediately following the termination of hostilities in Europe.

The United Kingdom plan provides that the supply of shipping for essential military and civilian requirements would be the common responsibility of the United Nations. Each nation would retain considerable control over its own shipping, directing tonnage to serve its own immediate needs, including shipping for coastal and short trades and for "the import requirements of territories for which its government has special shipping responsibilities." If there were insufficient tonnage for these needs, application would be made to the international body for more vessels; on the other hand, any excess tonnage would be placed at the disposal of the international body. Each nation would establish or maintain the controls needed to carry out the decisions of the international body.

The administrative agencies proposed would consist of a Council representing all the participating governments, and two small Executive Boards, one in Washington and one in London. Membership on the Boards would be limited to those countries with a large amount of shipping to offer. Neutral nations would be invited to undertake control of shipping in their territories by adopting measures on the lines of U.K. and U.S. Ship Warrant schemes. Enemy tonnage would be controlled through the authorities administering surrender terms.

The U.S. has requested and the U.K. has agreed that machinery of requisitioning as distinct from control of voyages by direction or license be employed and that the controls be effective until six months after the conclusion of the war with Japan. Agreement has also been reached upon a number of general principles to be proposed jointly by the U.K. and U.S. to other maritime nations.[129] (See Annex A† hereto).

III. The need for international controls.

After the conclusion of hostilities in Europe, control of shipping will still be essential to facilitate prosecution of the war against Japan, to supply forces of occupation, to repatriate demobilized troops, and meet relief and rehabilitation needs. Controls are also desirable to facilitate an equitable and orderly transition from wartime to peacetime conditions in the shipping industry.

It will not be practicable to meet these needs merely by extending existing controls in their present form. For example, six months after the end of hostilities with Germany the time charters of vessels of certain of the European maritime nations will expire and it is expected that the governments concerned will then demand a greater voice in international shipping control.

IV. Implications of the U.K. proposals.

Participation by Canada in the U.K.-U.S. scheme would terminate the voluntary cooperation which Canada has maintained with the British Ministry of War Transport and the War Shipping Administration and involve instead the formal acceptance of a number of obligations. Moreover, although only the broad principles of the plan have been outlined, the following features require careful consideration from a Canadian point of view.

(i) Effective Period of Controls.

The original U.K. provision that controls be effective for "such time as may be necessary to complete the war and the tasks arising from it" would be preferable to the U.S. stipulation that they be continued until six months after the end of the war with Japan. It would be advisable, since the U.K. has accepted this stipulation, to assent to it on condition that Canada's vital export and import shipping requirements are assured of consideration as favourable as that accorded to any other country.

(ii) Canadian representation upon the Council and Boards.

From the communications received from the U.K. it is not clear whether Canada would be given representation on one of the Executive Boards which it is proposed to establish. If these were to consist only of U.K. and U.S. representatives, Canada might easily find herself at a disadvantage. Accordingly, it is desirable that Canada request membership upon one of these Boards.

[129]Voir États-Unis,/See United States, Foreign Relations of the United States, 1944, Volume II. Washington, U.S. Government Printing Office, 1967, pp. 652-655.

V. Recommendations.

The shipping problems involved in the U.K.-U.S. plan come primarily within the purview of The Canadian Shipping Board which has made certain recommendations in all of which the Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy concurs, more particularly:

(i) That the U.K.-U.S. proposals for the establishment of an international maritime authority to exercise control of all shipping for a period of six months after the conclusion of hostilities in the Far East be approved in principle.

(ii) That the invitation to attend the conference be accepted.

(iii) (a) That in view of the fact the decisions which will be arrived at by the conference may be of considerable importance to Canadian Merchant Shipping, particularly to our Canadian Government owned fleet, and that the British Government has appointed Lord Leathers, British Minister of War Transport, to be head of their delegation, it is desirable that Canada be strongly represented at the conference, possibly with a Minister of the Crown as head of the delegation, and with the Chairman of the Shipping Board as one of the delegates.

(b) That the delegation be provided with qualified assistants competent to advise on the specialized questions which will arise.

(iv) That the U.K. Government be informed:

(a) That the Canadian government would be reluctant to impose general requisitioning but assumes that its present control will be recognized by the other governments concerned as being equivalent to or stronger than control by requisition because practically all Canadian tonnage is government-owned and the remainder is under the close direction and control of the Canadian Shipping Board.

(b) That the Canadian government would be prepared to accept the U.S. stipulation that controls be continued until six months after the end of the war with Japan if satisfactory agreements are reached elsewhere in the scheme whereby Canada's vital export and import shipping requirements are assured of consideration in all respects equal to that of other countries.[130]

Canadian Government has accepted invitation to be represented at a meeting to be held in London on July 19th with a view to reaching agreement upon measures for the control of merchant shipping after the termination of hostilities in Europe. Lord Leathers will be United Kingdom representative and I hope you will be able to represent the Canadian Government. Alternate Canadian delegate will be A. L. W. MacCallum, Chairman of the Canadian Shipping Board, with A. L. Lawes, Shipping Board Representative in Washington and B. A. Macdonald, Secretary of the Shipping Board as technical advisers. I hope Langley can act as Secretary of the Delegation.

As we received very inadequate notice of the date set for the meeting, it will not be possible to have the members of the Delegation who will be coming from Canada present for the opening session. They are however leaving by air on Thursday, July 20th, and should arrive in London on Friday. In the circumstances it will obviously not be possible to arrange for pre-conference consultations between the United Kingdom and Canadian Delegations which the United Kingdom Government suggested through their High Commissioner here.

1. Reference our telegram No. 1424 of July 15 regarding Allied Merchant Shipping Conference. We would be prepared to agree in general to the principles stated in paragraphs 1 to 6 inclusive, and paragraphs 8 and 9 of the memorandum of joint proposals from the U.K. and U.S. Governments dated May 31st, subject to our assumption that paragraph 2 does not require the Government of Canada to alter its existing method of control which, in effect, is equivalent to requisitioning, since most of the ships involved are owned by the Canadian Government.

2. With reference to paragraph 7, we anticipate no great difficulty in agreeing to the measures outlined but would prefer to make no commitment until more details are made known in the course of the Conference. With particular reference to the proposed Central Authority we would not favour representation on the Executive Board or Boards mentioned in Dominions Office telegram D. 303 of February 28th† being confined to the United Kingdom and the United States. As the result of wartime ship-building Canada has a substantial claim to membership, although we would not wish to press this to the point of claiming precedence over such countries as Norway.

TELEGRAM 1883 London, July 26, 1944

MOST IMMEDIATE. 1. Inter-Allied Conference on Shipping Control. Reference your telegrams No. 1437 of July 18th and No. 1478 of July 21st.† After its first meeting held at Foreign Office, Conference went into full Committee. In a series of meetings, and with the aid of a number of amendments not having great importance, the committee has now reached general acceptance of the Memorandum of Principles with the exception of clauses 2 and 7c on which we and the Netherlands, respectively, have reserved our acceptance.

2. The visiting Canadian delegation has had lengthy discussions regarding clause 2 with United Kingdom and United States delegations. As indicated in my telegram No. 1815 of July 20th,† the latter accept our contention that vessels owned by the Canadian Government need not be requisitioned under this clause, but they urge strongly that the few privately owned ocean-going Canadian vessels, which might form part of the United Nations shipping pool, be requisitioned, as otherwise a loophole would be left for other nations such as Poland and, furthermore, it would be difficult to include Sweden effectively later.

3. United States delegates especially are pressing that Canada agree to clause 2 as drafted, contending that unless we accept this proviso the success of the entire Agreement will be prejudiced. All other nations represented here have already accepted this clause as essential to effective control. MacCallum and technical advisers, whilst of opinion that Canada's participation in Agreement could be effective without actual requisition of the few privately owned Canadian vessels which will be involved, consider it would be unwise to imperil Agreement by continuing to stand out and recommend that clause 2 be accepted on the basis that the Canadian Government will effect technical requisition of such privately owned ocean-going vessels which may come within the scope of the Agreement. Such vessels would be very few in number. Please telegraph as early as possible if this modification of your original instructions is approved.

4. With regard to the Executive Board, it is now proposed that there shall be only one Board with two branches in London and Washington, respectively, the two branches to meet at fairly frequent intervals, say at least every three months with the Council meeting at least twice a year. The necessity of confining the Executive Board to very few members has been strongly reiterated. Decision as to membership of the Board is reserved to the next Conference meeting but, in informal discussions between MacCallum and United Kingdom and United States delegations, the two latter have indicated that Norway and the Netherlands will be included, making a Board membership of four.

5. As an offset to this restricted membership, the idea is emerging that the other countries personally represented here will be given associate membership with, in practice, the position of a full member whenever action affecting their ships is to be taken by the Board.

6. Whilst proposing to seize any favourable opportunity of pressing for full Board membership when the question rises formally at the next Conference meeting, the visiting delegation feel that the compromise proposal of associate membership will adequately protect Canadian shipping interests and recommend that, if necessary to ensure the success of the Conference as a whole, we be authorized to agree to it. As the next meeting of the Conference will probably be held within the next few days, we would appreciate receiving your views on this point as early as possible.

7. At the Committee meeting yesterday, both the United Kingdom and United States delegations stressed again the desirability of keeping the Council on Ministerial level.

Your telegram No. 1883 of July 26th. Shipping Control.

1. Canadian Government is prepared to undertake to requisition privately owned ocean-going Canadian vessels coming within scope of Agreement.

2. We should endeavour to obtain Canadian membership on the Executive Board but should not press our request to the point of prejudicing the success of the Conference.

3. In view of the progress of the war it seems to us not unlikely that Sweden and perhaps other neutral countries might welcome an opportunity of associating themselves with the proposed shipping arrangements. It would be appreciated if you could bring this suggestion to the attention of the Conference.

INTERNATIONAL MERCHANT SHIPPING;
LONDON MEETING

14. THE SECRETARY reported that agreement had been reached in London on principles to govern the continuance of co-ordinated control of merchant shipping and for the organization of a central authority for that purpose.

This agreement, which had been accepted by the Canadian representatives, was generally in accordance with the report of the Advisory Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy which the War Committee had approved on July the 12th.[131] Copies of the draft agreement† had been circulated.

Under the agreement, a central authority consisting of a council composed of all the United Nations and an executive board with two branches, one in London and one in Washington, would be established. The authority would operate from the suspension of hostilities with Germany, until six months after the end of hostilities in Europe or the Near East, whichever might be later. It was understood that the executive board would be composed of representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, Norway and the Netherlands. Certain other nations directly concerned, including Canada, would be granted associate membership with rights of consultation and attendance when matters of concern to them were under consideration. Decisions of the Board affecting the ships under the authority of any contracting government would be reached only with the consent of that government. Control of ships would be exercised by requisitioning for use or title.

15. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved the proposed agreement and authorized signature thereof by Canadian representatives on behalf of the government.

Rapport de la délégation canadienne à la conférence de Londres sur le contrôle de la marine marchande

Report of Canadian Delegation to London Conference on Shipping Control

CONFIDENTIAL [London, c. August 5, 1944]

Agreement on Principles having Reference to the Continuance of Co-ordinated Control of Merchant Shipping

1. We have the honour to submit herewith a copy of the "AGREEMENT ON PRINCIPLES HAVING REFERENCE TO THE CONTINUANCE OF CO-ORDINATED CONTROL OF MERCHANT SHIPPING," signed in London on Saturday, August 5th, 1944, by the duly authorized representatives of Belgium, Canada, Greece, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, United Kingdom, and United States.[132]

2. Governments Participating.

It will be noted that the countries which took part in the Conference were those of the United Nations which have contributed appreciable merchant ship tonnage to the war effort and which have been parties, in one way or another, to the existing arrangements for the provision of ships for the needs of the United Nations. Representatives of the French National Committee of Liberation participated throughout in the Conference, which opened on July 19th and concluded on August 5th, but they did not sign the final Agreement for reasons which are given in Paragraph 10 below.

3. Governments Informed.

Russia did not participate because one of the principal aims of the Conference was to ensure adequate shipping for the war against Japan. However, Russia, the other British Dominions, and Brazil have been informed of the Agreement. Sweden is to be invited at an early date to accede to the Agreement. The Free Danish Government in London was represented at the last meeting by an observer.

4. Period of the Agreement.

The Agreement is essentially a wartime agreement. It is to come into operation "upon the general suspension of hostilities with Germany" and is to terminate "six months after the general suspension of hostilities in Europe or the Far East," whichever may be the later "unless it is unanimously agreed among the governments represented on the duly authorized body of the central authority that any or all of the agreed principles may be terminated or modified earlier." In short, the Agreement is intended to cover roughly the last phase of the war between the defeat of Germany and the defeat of Japan.

See Canada, Treaty Series, 1944, No. 28.

It is clear, however, that the Agreement and the machinery created under it could provide a useful basis for post-war cooperation in the international merchant shipping field.

5. Purpose of the Agreement.

The broad purpose of the Agreement is set forth in its first clause:

"The contracting Governments declare that they accept as a common responsibility the provision of shipping for all military and other tasks necessary for, and arising out of, the completion of the war in Europe and the Far East, and for the supplying of all the liberated areas as well as of the United Nations generally and territories under their authority."

Behind this general statement lies:

(a) The desire of the United Kingdom Government, and more especially of the United States Government, to ensure that the merchant shipping of smaller allied countries (some of whom, like Norway, are not at war with Japan) should not be left free to turn to normal business whilst that of the two major powers continue to bear the burden of the war against Japan,

(b) A desire on the part of certain of the European allies, such as the Netherlands, Belgium and the French National Committee of Liberation that the shipping resources of the United Nations be available to carry the relief and rehabilitation supplies which they will need so badly for some time after their liberation and, moreover, that such shipping be available at freight rates which are subject to some control.

(c) A general desire to avoid the highly disturbed or even chaotic conditions which might arise in the shipping field if existing shipping controls were suddenly relaxed during the transition period when hostilities will have been suspended in Europe but will be continuing in the Far East.

6. The Central Authority: (a) The United Maritime Council. (b) The United Maritime Executive Board.

To implement the Agreement and more specifically "in order that the allocation of all ships under United Nations control may continue to be effectively determined to meet the requirements of the United Nations," a central authority is to be established. As noted in the Annex, this central authority is to consist of (a) the United Maritime Council, and (b) the United Maritime Executive Board.

Each contracting government is to be represented on the Council and "membership on the Council shall also be open to all other governments whether of the United Nations or of neutral countries which desire to accede and are prepared to accept the obligations of contracting governments."

The United Maritime Executive Board is to be established with two branches, one in London and one in Washington, under the chairmanship of the British Ministry of War Transport and the United States War Shipping Administration respectively. It is to exercise the executive functions of the Council. Its membership is to be restricted to representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom, United States, Netherlands, and Norway, although "it shall be open to the members of the Executive Board to recommend to contracting governments additions to the membership of the Executive Board as circumstances may require."

7. Position of Canada.

(a) In accordance with its terms of reference (as contained in Telegram No. 1437 from External to Dominions dated July 18th),[133] the Canadian delegation indicated readiness to accept in general the draft principles set forth initially subject to reservations regarding Clause 2 relating to requisitioning and Clause 7 relating to the central authority and its powers.

(b) Requisitioning. We had protracted informal discussions on this point with the United Kingdom and United States delegations. Both accepted our contention that vessels owned by the Canadian Government need not be requisitioned under Clause 2 but they strongly urged that any privately-owned ocean-going Canadian vessels which might form part of the United Nations shipping pool should be requisitioned as otherwise a loophole would be left which would make difficult the effective inclusion later of certain neutrals, more especially Sweden. The United States delegates especially pressed for Canada to agree to Clause 2 as drafted, contending that, unless we accepted it, the success of the entire Agreement would be prejudiced. As all other nations represented, including Poland and Norway, who had originally shared our objections, finally accepted the clause as essential to effective control, we agreed to accept it also on the understanding that the Canadian Government need effect technical requisition only of such privately-owned ocean-going vessels as may come directly within the scope of the Agreement. In effect, this means that only those privately-owned Canadian vessels which engage in deep sea operations need be requisitioned. As far as can be judged at present, the Canadian Shipping Board feels that nearly all privately-owned Canadian vessels can be effectively employed in Canadian coastal and near shore trades (e.g. to Newfoundland) and so remain outside the pool and therefore left unrequisitioned. In all probability only a few sea-going tankers will require to be dealt with by some form of technical requisition.

(c) Membership on the Maritime Executive Board.

It was agreed at an early stage in the proceedings that the membership of the Executive Board be left for decision by the full conference at a later stage. However, from informal conferences with the United Kingdom and United States delegations we learned that:

(i) it was contemplated (as we had expected) that the Executive Board should consist of the United Kingdom and United States because of the outstanding shipping tonnage they control and of Norway because of the relatively great tonnage contributed by her and the extremely vital importance of merchant shipping to her national economy, and that

(ii) it was also contemplated that the Netherlands should be a member, because of her relatively large tonnage contribution and because of her interests in the Far East where the last phase of the war is expected to centre, and that,

(iii) for Canada to press for membership would jeopardize the success of the Conference since it would create a suspicion in certain quarters of the United States that "the British" had two seats to one American and, moreover, would make it impossible to refuse a seat to France which, if granted, might lead to a demand from Greece and possibly from other countries for equal treatment.

In short, it was clear to us that nothing would be gained by pressing this point, providing Canada's interests were otherwise protected. Accordingly, when the question came up for decision and after obtaining approval from Ottawa, we supported the proposal (which was formally put forward by Belgium) that, in view of the necessity of confining the Executive Board to very few members, it be composed of the four countries named above.

By way of compensation, we urged that each contracting Government not permanently represented on the Executive Board should be represented by an associate member instead of by a liaison officer as originally proposed whenever matters affecting ships under the authority of that government or matters affecting the supply of ships for territories under the authority of that government were being considered. Our final acceptance was made conditional upon an addition to the wording of Clause 8 of the Annex to provide that associate members, when such matters were being considered, "be entitled to attend meetings of" the Executive Board. As originally worded, this clause provided merely that the liaison officers "be consulted by" the Executive Board.

8. Degree of Control.

Another major point to which we devoted particular attention was the definition of "essential" as used in the third line of Clause 3 and towards the end of Clause 7(b) of the Agreement, and the definition of "territories for which it has special shipping responsibilities" as used at the end of Clause 7(b). It was agreed that the words in question would be interpreted to mean that the central authority would consider all cargoes included in programmes approved by the appropriate national supply authorities to be essential. We feel that this interpretation leaves the Canadian Shipping Board in a position to protect adequately Canada's vital shipping interests.

9. Ship Warrant Schemes.

With regard to this point (Clause 5 of the Agreement), it was agreed that it would be unnecessary for each participating government to introduce a separate ship warrant scheme and, moreover, that it would be undesirable for a consolidated international ship warrant scheme to be attempted since this would involve the almost impossible task of producing a document which would comply with the Maritime law of every subscribing country. It was specifically agreed that Canada's Ships' Privilege License System would require no alteration.

10. Position of France.

As noted above, representatives of the French National Committee of Liberation participated in all the proceedings of the Conference and accepted the final Agreement on Principles with the exception of Clause 7 of the Annex. The French delegation were unable to obtain authority from Algiers to sign the final agreement unless France were given full membership on the Executive Board. The final signing of the Agreement was twice postponed to give the French delegates an opportunity of obtaining the necessary authority and the leader of the French delegation flew to Algiers in an effort to obtain authority but had to return without it. It will be open to France to join the Agreement later, although her joining will then be regarded as an entirely new accession.

11. Accession of Other Governments: Sweden and Brazil.

As stated in Clause 2 of the Annex, membership of the Council shall be "open to all other governments whether of the United Nations or of neutral countries which desire to accede and are prepared to accept the obligations of contracting governments." However, as implied in Clause 4 of the Agreement, it is countries "having under their control ships in excess of the tonnage required to carry their essential import requirements," which are in mind. Sweden is the only important such country. It is understood that Sweden and also Brazil will be approached by the United Kingdom and United States governments. Undoubtedly Russia would be welcomed whenever she feels in a position to join. There was no disposition to encourage the accession of "consumer" countries, although the wording of Clause 2 of the Annex would leave the door open to them.

12. Terms of Remuneration.

Considerable discussion, initiated chiefly by the Norwegian delegation, centred around Clause 7(f) of the Agreement. The Norwegian delegates tried unsuccessfully to have the words "commercial" and "taking into account increased costs" inserted in this clause. The French delegation, on the other hand, stressed the need of preventing rises in freight rates which would increase the landed cost of relief and rehabilitation supplies. It was finally agreed that all details on this point be left initially to the Planning Committee and thereafter to the Executive Board.

13. Currencies.

The Norwegian delegation also raised the question of currencies in which remuneration for ship use would be paid. Their chief delegate stated that his understanding was that remuneration would be fixed in relation to the prices which all governments would have to pay for their supplies and that it would be paid in currencies which governments could use to pay for such supplies. The Chairman (Lord Leathers) immediately stated that this was a matter for the Planning Committee but he wished to make it perfectly clear that the Conference could not give any assurance as to the currencies in which remuneration would be paid.

14. Relation to Relief and Rehabilitation Programmes.

The importance which all the European representatives attached to the relation of the shipping arrangements to those for relief and rehabilitation was very marked. They stressed the desperate plight in which their countries would be after the suspension of European hostilities and the prime responsibility of their governments to alleviate that plight. Certain representatives, notably the Belgian, French, and Norwegian, emphasized the desire of their governments for a voice in the programming of supplies for their countries.

The United Kingdom and United States delegations took the view, which we supported and which was finally accepted unanimously, that the United Maritime Council and Executive Board as a shipping agency should confine itself to shipping and could not concern itself directly with the formulation of supply programmes: these would have to come, on the military side, from the Allied military authorities, and on the civilian side, from the appropriate authorities such as the Combined Boards, U.N.R.R.A., etc.

15. The Planning Committee.

Clause 12 of the Annex provides that a Planning Committee shall be set up to begin work in London as soon as possible to work out the details of the machinery required to enable the Executive Board to discharge its functions.

Each delegation was asked to nominate one expert to this Committee. As the Canadian Shipping Board had no expert available who could be left in London, it was agreed that Mr. J. A. Langley, Canadian Government Trade Commissioner there, should represent Canada on the Committee. It is possible that part of the Committee's work may be carried on in Washington. If this proves to be the case, the Canadian Shipping Board's Washington representative, Mr. A. L. Lawes, will be available.

16. Nature of the Commitment.

At one stage of the proceedings the principal Norwegian delegate said that, whilst he understood that the Agreement would be valid as soon as signed, he must make a formal reservation that the Storting would have the right to affirm or denounce the Agreement. Both the United Kingdom and United States delegations took exception to this and emphasized their hope that no reservations would be attached to any signature to the Agreement. In the end, the principal Norwegian delegate signed the Agreement without reservation on the understanding that his point be formally recorded in the Minutes of the meetings. The Chairman said that, in this respect, Norway was in much the same position as other governments which would necessarily have to bring the Agreement to the notice of their legislatures in due course.

17. Publicity.

Attached hereto is a copy of the press statement† formally agreed upon by the Conference for release on Wednesday, August 9th.

It was decided by the Conference that the Agreement itself should not be made public and that no other statement concerning it should be issued publicly until an agreed later date but that, in the meantime, the Governments concerned might advise interested parties in their own countries in confidence of the details of the Agreement.

18. Representatives on the Council and the Executive Board.

It remains for each government to nominate its representative on the United Maritime Council which "shall meet when deemed necessary and at least twice each year at such places as may be convenient."

It also remains for each government to nominate its representative as member or as associate member of the Executive Board. It may be desirable for Canada to appoint alternate representatives to be available to attend, respectively, meetings of the London and Washington branches of the Executive Board.

19. Conclusion.

All representatives at the Conference expressed gratification at its success and concurred in the view expressed by one of the United Kingdom representatives that what had been done was right and proper. There was clearly a general feeling that the Conference marked another opportunity for international co-operation successfully seized. The failure of the French delegation to obtain authority was unanimously deplored but, as noted in the Press statement, "All French shipping is and remains at the disposal of the United Nations." This wording was approved by the French representatives. And the way remains open, of course, for France to accede to the Agreement at a later date.

20. As authorized in your telegram No. 1424 of July 15th to Dominion, the Canadian delegation as a whole to the Conference consisted of the following:

Representative: Right Hon. Vincent Massey, P.C., High Commissioner to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Representative Alternate: A. L. W. MacCallum, O.B.E., Chairman, Canadian Shipping Board.

Technical Adviser: A. L. Lawes, Esq., Representative of the Canadian Shipping Board in Washington.

Adviser: J. A. Langley, Esq., Canadian Government Trade Commissioner, London.

Technical Adviser and Secretary of the Delegation: B. A. Macdonald, Esq., Secretary, Canadian Shipping Board.

Respectfully submitted,

VINCENT MASSEY

INTERNATIONAL SHIPPING; LONDON MEETING; DELEGATION'S REPORT

9. THE SECRETARY, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 3rd, submitted a report of the Advisory Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy.

The report stated that the agreement reached in London made adequate provision for the coordinated control of merchant shipping in the period immediately following the conclusion of hostilities in Europe. The Committee concurred in the report of the Canadian delegates.

Some doubt had existed as to the position of ships built for other nations, and clarification on this point had been sought and received from the British Ministry of War Transport and the U.S. Maritime Commission. In general, it appeared that there could be no objection, provided that such shipbuilding did not interfere with the overall war effort and that ships constructed were employed in conformity with the purposes of the United Nations.

Copies of the Committee's report had been circulated.

10. MR. HEENEY pointed out that the new arrangements would require the appointment of a Canadian member to the United Maritime Council and an associate member to the United Maritime Executive, to be set up under the new "Agreement on Principles."

The Shipping Board suggested that Mr. A. L. W. MacCallum be appointed associate member of the Executive Board with Mr. A. L. Lawes as his technical adviser. The member of the Council would require to be at Ministerial level.

11. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted with approval the report of the Advisory Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy and approved the appointment of Mr. MacCallum and Mr. Lawes, deferring appointment of a representative to the Council pending receipt of a report,† now under preparation by the Advisory Committee, on administrative machinery in Canada.[134]

Dear Mr. Holmes,

I am referring to your letter of February 15th,† concerning the possibility of a proposal for France being accorded full membership of the Executive Board of the United Maritime Council coming before the meeting of the Board which is to be held in London on March 7th. If, as I assume, the admission of France to full membership would be contingent on the immediate accession of France to the Agreement on Principles, the Canadian Government would be willing to support the proposal. From the standpoint of large experience in shipping normally engaged in international trade, France is well qualified for membership and if France's qualification is weaker in respect of her contribution of ships for the common war purpose, the reason is that much of her shipping was seized by the enemy and some was requisitioned by the Allies and subsequently lost. In the view of the Canadian Government, it would be highly inexpedient to rebuff the claim which France is said to have advanced to be accorded full membership of the Executive Board.

Yours sincerely,

Le président, la Commission canadienne de la marine marchande, au sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures

Chairman, Canadian Shipping Board, to Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Montreal, May 11, 1945

You will recall that two weeks ago Mr. Angus and I discussed with you the question of Canadian concurrence in the Resolutions made at the last meeting of the United Maritime Executive Board regarding transfer of registry of merchant ships to countries not party to the inter-allied agreements for control of shipping. (A copy of these Resolutions is attached hereto as annex "A".)† These Resolutions were made at the meeting of the United Maritime Executive Board held in London on March 7th, 8th and 9th, 1945, and were then concurred in by all the contracting governments with the exception of Canada which reserved its position until the matter could be discussed here.

Our reservation was based upon the fact that, if adopted, the Resolutions would impose hardship upon several Canadian shipowners who own and desire to sell, with transfer to the flags of non-contracting governments, a few old coasting vessels and canalers. These ships can no longer be operated in the Canadian trades in which they have been employed without expensive reconditioning or repairs which would not be economically justified from the owners' standpoint. Neither the British Ministry of War Transport, the War Shipping Administration, Washington, nor any other Government signatory to the "Agreement" has signified any desire to acquire these old ships. The ships are, therefore, a liability to their owners unless they can be sold to purchasers in countries that have not yet acceded to the "Agreement on Principles." The Resolutions, however, would prohibit such sales without the concurrence of the United Maritime Executive Board, and United Maritime Executive Board may refuse concurrence on grounds that such transfers are contrary to the spirit of the Agreement on Principles.

Despite the effect which the adoption of the Resolutions would have upon Canadian shipowners, however, the Canadian Shipping Board felt that it would be undesirable from both a Canadian and international point of view to continue to withhold concurrence. The amount of Canadian tonnage affected is relatively small, and Canadian non-concurrence would invalidate the concurrence already given by all other contracting governments. Moreover it is felt that non-cooperation by Canada in this matter would affect adversely our position as an Associate Member of the United Maritime Executive Board.

Accordingly two recommendations to Council were prepared (copies are attached hereto as appendices "B" and "C" to this letter).† The first of these recommendations provided for Canadian concurrence in the Resolutions; the second for approval in principle of the requisitioning and scrapping by the Canadian Government of a limited number of the old surplus vessels affected by the Resolutions, and of the payment of suitable compensation to their owners. However, the Vice-Chairman of the Board, in a discussion with Dr. W. C. Clark, has found that the Department of Finance does not approve of the principle involved in payment of such compensation, and presumably this recommendation to Council may be considered unacceptable to the government.

In any event the Board feels strongly that the first recommendation providing for Canadian concurrence in the Resolutions should be submitted to the government, and proposes, if it is approved, to send to the Secretariat of the United Maritime Executive Board, a communication (as per attached draft, Appendix "D")† stating that Canada concurs in the Resolutions effective March 9th, 1945, the date upon which the Resolutions were submitted to a meeting of the United Maritime Executive Board.

I should be grateful, therefore, if you would submit the attached recommendation for Canadian concurrence in the Resolutions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for consideration. You will note that the recommendation already bears the concurring signature of the Honourable the Minister of Trade & Commerce, who is the Representative of Canada on the United Maritime Council.

Very truly yours,
A. L. W. MacCallum

Décret en Conseil
Order in Council

P.C. 3595 Ottawa, 17 May, 1945

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 14th May, 1945, from the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs,† stating:

That Canada was represented at the second meeting of the United Maritime Executive Board held in London on March 7th, 8th and 9th, 1945, by the Representative of the Canadian Shipping Board in Washington;

That Resolutions entitled "Resolutions Regarding Transfer of Registry of Merchant Ships to Countries not Party to the Inter-Allied Agreements for Control of Shipping" (attached hereto as "Annex A")† were presented at the meeting and, with the exception of Canada, which reserved its position, were concurred in by all the Governments which have acceded to the "AGREEMENT ON PRINCIPLES," under which the United Maritime Authority and United Maritime Executive Board were established;

That it is desirable that Canada concur in the Resolutions in order that they may be given the unanimous approval of the contracting governments which is required to make them effective; and

That it is also desirable to stipulate that Canadian concurrence in the Resolutions will not affect commitments incurred before the submission of the Resolutions to the meeting of the United Maritime Executive Board held on March 9th, 1945, for the construction or delivery by Canada of a small number of ships to countries which have not acceded to the "AGREEMENT ON PRINCIPLES"

The Committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, concurred in by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce advise that authority be given for the despatch of a communication to the Secretariat of the United Maritime Executive Board stating that Canada concurs in the Resolutions on the understanding that commitments incurred by Canada prior to the Submission of the Resolutions on March 9th, 1945, will not be prejudiced.

INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF POSTWAR SHIPPING

3. THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE submitted a memorandum, copies of which had been circulated.

Consideration was likely to be given at an early date by the United Maritime Council to revision or termination of the present international agreement for the pooling and control of merchant shipping. A substantial amount of cargo shipping would probably have to be withdrawn in order to avoid over-supply and destructive competition.

Consideration had been given to the attitude which Canada should adopt and it was recommended that, in any preliminary discussions, the Canadian representative on the United Maritime Executive Board be authorized to state that Canada would be prepared to make a contribution to an international scheme of rationalization, provided suitable and equitable basis of contribution by all could be worked out. In this connection, it was suggested that Canada might confine her postwar tonnage to the 1½ million tons (deadweight) now operated by Canadian owners and dispose of the remaining one million.

It was also recommended that early consideration be given to the recommendations prepared by the Interdepartmental Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy, at the direction of the Cabinet War Committee, with respect to the establishment of a single shipping authority in Canada (C.W.C. Documents 870 and 919, Sept. 27, 1944, Jan. 5, 1945).†

4. THE CABINET, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that the Canadian representative on the United Maritime Executive Board be authorized, in preliminary discussions, to take the position recommended by the Minister with respect to Canadian participation in any scheme for continued control of international shipping; and

(b) that the problem of establishing a single Canadian maritime shipping authority be referred for consideration and report to a special Cabinet committee composed of the Ministers directly concerned (Transport, Trade and Commerce, Reconstruction and National Defence for Naval Services).

Mémorandum du président, la Commission canadienne de la marine marchande, au ministre du Commerce

Memorandum by Chairman, Canadian Shipping Board, to Minister of Trade and Commerce

Montreal, November 18, 1945

With the recent cessation of hostilities in the Far East, a sudden change has taken place in the international shipping picture in so far as cargo-carrying merchant ships are concerned. Prior to October, 1945, all Canadian ocean vessels, largely "Park" ships, had no difficulty in loading full cargoes at Canadian ports for the United Kingdom, Australasia, South Africa, India and the Mediterranean Area, as all our available ocean-going vessel tonnage was integrated into the U.M.A. programme to these areas, merchant ships being still at a premium. The close of the war with Japan, however, resulted in a surplus of cargo ships for all purposes, and at the United Maritime Executive Board meetings, held in Washington on October 8th and 10th, the discussions of shipping problems stressed the fact that a change from an overall scarcity to an overall surplus in vessel tonnage had taken place.

At the U.M.E.B. meeting, as reported in my letter of October 13th to the Hon. the Minister of Trade & Commerce, Admiral Land, Administrator of the War Shipping Administration in Washington, announced that it was the intention of the United States Government to withdraw from international trade approximately 2,000 vessels, with a total deadweight tonnage of between 20 and 25 million tons. These vessels will probably be Standard "Liberty"-type ships built in the United States during the war.

Prior to the opening of the U.M.E.B. meetings in Washington in October, the Canadian Shipping Board received information from the Ministry of War Transport, London, that the British Treasury had instructed the Ministry to curtail its use of "dollar-cost" vessels in the movement of cargoes from North America into the United Kingdom, and into other sterling areas. At that time, the Ministry of War Transport in London stated they could only use about eight "Park" ships in October from the East Coast of Canada to the United Kingdom whereas the Board had allocated 18 "Park" ships for the purpose; subsequently, the Board was able to arrange to use some of the "Park" ships thus made surplus in October in the movement of cargoes to North Africa and the Mediterranean Area.

During our meetings in Washington, the Board's Representatives had discussions with Sir Cyril Hurcomb, Director-General, Ministry of War Transport, London, and with his assistants, on the continued use of "Park" vessels between Canada and sterling areas. These officials of the Ministry stated quite frankly that the United Kingdom had to use British ships, or other ships that would accept sterling freights, in the carriage of goods from Canada and the United States to Britain and to other countries, because the British Treasury could not afford to expend dollars on freights on Canadian vessels carrying Canadian materials to Europe, Australia, India, etc. The Ministry officials, indeed, suggested that Canada might well follow the example set by the United States by withdrawing a certain number of "Park" vessels from service, as these were gradually becoming surplus to world requirements. The attitude of the United Kingdom, and doubtless of other European maritime countries such as Norway, Netherlands, etc., appears to be that any reduction in world tonnage should be made by lay-up on the part of the countries that built war-time ships, such as U.S. "Libertys" and the Canadian "Parks," and that the European countries which were still deficient in shipping should employ their ships to the utmost in moving cargoes from North America.

Subsequent to the U.M.E.B. meetings in Washington, Sir Cyril Hurcomb and his assistants came to Ottawa to meet the Hon. Mr. Howe, Minister of Reconstruction, for the purpose of discussing the continued use, by the United Kingdom of 92 "Fort" vessels (Canadian-built) which the United Kingdom has had on Mutual Aid during the war, and at the same time discussing the extent to which the Ministry might continue to integrate "Park" vessels, on a dollar-cost basis in the movement of cargoes from Canada to the sterling area. After a meeting with Mr. Barker, General Manager of the Park Steamship, and myself, the Ministry officials agreed, as a minimum, to the following employment of "Park" ships into sterling areas; between now and the end of February 1946:

From East Coast Canada to the U.K.	— 8 ships per month
From East Coast Canada to India	— 1 ship per month
From East Coast Canada to South Africa	— 1 ship per month
From East Coast Canada to Australia/N.Z.	— 1/2 1 ship per month
From East Coast Canada to the Mediterranean Area	— 6 ships per month
From Pacific Coast to the U.K.	— 6 ships per month
From Pacific Coast to South Africa	— 1 ship per month
From Pacific Coast to Australia/	— 1 ship per month
From Pacific Coast to China	— 1 ship per month
	25½/26

It has been estimated by the Board and the Park Steamship Company that these monthly allocations of "Park" ships will require the use of 90 "Park" vessels during the period December to February, although strikes abroad and port delays may mean that it will take more than 90 vessels to perform this monthly programme. The total number of "Park" 10,000-tonners now operating is 110, so that between now and the end of the U.M.A. period (March 2nd next) there is a possibility that "Park" vessels will not find full employment in carrying materials from Canada to areas abroad unless this minimum quota per month is increased, or we can use spare vessels in moving goods to South America.

I should like to emphasize that the situation above outlined has developed because of the directive of the British Treasury in the matter of avoiding the use of dollar-freight vessels — American or Canadian — into so-called sterling areas.

In these circumstances, if the present size of the Park Canadian-flag fleet (110 dry-cargo ships of 10,000 tons deadweight each, 23 dry-cargo ships of 4,700 tons deadweight each, 12 converted tankers of approximately 10,000 tons deadweight each, 5 small tankers of 3,600 tons deadweight each) is to be maintained in full employment after the U.M.A. period, some way must be found to enable this fleet of Canadian-flag vessels to earn dollar freights in the carriage of cargoes from Canada into the so-called sterling area.

An early decision should therefore be reached as to the size of the Canadian-flag fleet of ocean-going vessels which the Canadian Government desires to operate in international trade in the post-war period, in order that steps be taken promptly to endeavour to protect such fleet in competitive international trade; alternatively, consideration should be given to the disposal, by sale, bareboat charter or lay-up of any ships deemed surplus.

The Board recommends that a Government decision on the following be reached:

(1) The size of the ocean-going merchant fleet which Canada desires to maintain after the U.M.A. period. The present fleet operating under the Canadian flag, consisting of all "Park" ships and a small amount of privately-owned vessel tonnage, is approximately 1,500,000 tons deadweight.

(2) If a fleet of the size mentioned in (1) is considered too large, having in view Canada's interest in selling its products abroad, an estimate of surplus ships should now be made, with a view to the possible disposal of such surplus by sale, bareboat charter, or lay-up.

(3) If a fleet of the size mentioned in (1) is considered reasonable as Canada's quota of vessel tonnage in post-war international trade, steps might be taken, at least as a temporary measure, to endeavour to effect some arrangement with countries that are securing credits from Canada whereby such countries will use a proportion of these credits in the payment of dollar freights to Canadian vessels engaged in transporting Canadian materials to the countries in question.

Procès-verbal d'une réunion du Comité interministériel concernant la marine marchande

Minutes of Meeting of Interdepartmental Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa,] December 24, 1945

The first meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy established by the Cabinet Committee on Reconstruction on December 13, 1945, was held in the office of the Acting Deputy Minister of Finance, December 21, 1945, at 2.30 p.m.

Present:

V. W. Scully, (Chairman), Deputy Minister of Reconstruction,
Dr. W. A. Mackintosh, Acting Deputy Minister of Finance,
M. W. Mackenzie, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce,
A. L. W. MacCallum, Chairman, Canadian Shipping Board,
Commander C. P. Edwards, Deputy Minister of Transport.
M. McClung, (Secretary), Privy Council Office,

Also Present:

Captain E. S. Brand, Director of Naval Intelligence & Trade,
M. W. Sharp, Department of Finance.

I. DISPOSITION OF PARK STEAMSHIPS

1. THE CHAIRMAN referred to the Secretary's Note and two memoranda attached thereto (copies of which had already been circulated) the first from the Chairman of the Canadian Shipping Board to the Minister of Trade and Commerce; and the second, a summary of decisions on merchant shipping policy taken by the previous Interdepartmental Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy.

(Secretary's Note, December 19, 1945;† Memorandum to the Minister of Trade and Commerce from the Chairman, Canadian Shipping Board, November 16, 1945, ICMSP Document No. 1; and Merchant Shipping Policy, December 19, 1945, ICMSP Document No. 2).†

2. MR. SCULLY stated that the terms of reference given to the Committee by the Cabinet Committee on Reconstruction appeared to cover two main problems:

(1) Employment of Park ships between now and the end of the United Maritime agreement next March 2nd.

(2) The size and composition of a permanent Canadian-flag Merchant Marine and desirability of establishing a Canadian Maritime Commission.

3. THE CHAIRMAN OF THE CANADIAN SHIPPING BOARD stated that the first of these problems arose when the United Kingdom government in October informed the Canadian Shipping Board that the United Kingdom would permit only about eight Park ships during that month to operate from the east coast of Canada to the United Kingdom as a part of the general United Kingdom policy of conserving sterling exchange. An agreement was reached whereby 25-26 Park ships would be allowed to operate monthly into sterling area between now and the end of the United Maritime agreement next March 2nd. This would give employment to about ninety Park vessels during the period December 1945 to the end of February 1946. It had, therefore, become necessary to find other employment for the surplus Park vessels, roughly twenty in number, to provide for their disposition by sale or charter to private operators, Canadian or foreign, or to tie them up.

4. MR. SCULLY felt that the government preferred to sell the vessels to private operators who would maintain them under the Canadian flag or alternatively to charter them on a bare boat basis. Government-ownership was to be considered as a last resource.

5. THE ACTING DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE felt a suitable formula for depreciation allowances could be worked out in consultation with the deputy Minister of National Revenue (Taxation), offering terms as favourable as those of the United Kingdom to its shipping operators.

As for the prospects of operating the vessels with reasonable earnings DR. MACKINTOSH felt that arrangements could be arrived at with the United Kingdom by which sterling earnings could be converted into dollars for a certain number of ships but that real difficulty might arise in finding cargoes for Canadian vessels to carry into the sterling area.

Since there seemed to be general agreement that the tonnage required for a Canadian merchant marine, however owned and operated, would fall far short of the present holdings of one and one-half million tons, sale of the vessels should be made to all comers, that is, Canadian buyers and foreign buyers alike, provided the terms of sale were acceptable to the government.

6. THE COMMITTEE after considerable discussion noted these suggestions and agreed that the Acting Deputy Minister of Finance and the Deputy Minister of National Revenue (Taxation), should have prepared a formula for depreciation allowances, bearing in mind the desirability of expediting sale of Park steamships to all buyers between now and March 2, 1946, and that thereafter the situation could again be reviewed.

II. LONG TERM POLICY; MARITIME COMMISSION

7. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE stated that while it was desirable to continue with disposal between now and March 2nd, it was necessary to arrive at some estimate of the size of a Canadian merchant marine which it was in the interests of the government to have under the Canadian flag.

From a trade promotion point of view it was important that the government should have at its disposal a certain number of ships of suitable type and size which it could either allocate or contract for operation along certain trade routes of particular importance to Canada. These routes included certain parts of the sterling area such as the Dominions and British West Indies, but for purposes of calculation at this time should exclude the United Kingdom.

8. MR. MACCALLUM stated that such a calculation could be made and submitted as an illustration, an estimate of the dollar earnings necessary to maintain 100 Park ships on existing routes which revealed that after making all payments necessary for operation within the sterling area they had to earn approximately $57,000,000 a year.

9. MR. SCULLY was of the opinion that, since the trade promotion problem required close coordination of both private operations and government services to the Canadian merchant marine, the successful operation of the merchant marine, whatever size might be decided upon, would require the establishment of a single controlling authority.

10. THE COMMITTEE after considerable further discussion agreed:

(i) that Mr. MacCallum undertake to have prepared a statement setting forth the minimum size of a Canadian merchant marine required in the national interest, which calculation would take account of such factors as the 300,000 tons deadweight now operated by private owners; the tonnage required for profitable operation in the western hemisphere and to the sister dominions, but exclusive of the United Kingdom trade, and a tonnage to be determined which would allow for emergency need and other contingencies;

(ii) that a Canadian maritime authority should be established and that its form and functions should be the subject of discussion at a subsequent meeting.

(iii) that the Director of Naval Intelligence and Trade should forward to the Secretary copies of a memorandum† setting forth some of the considerations which might be borne in mind in the establishment of such a commission, which would be circulated to those members of the Committee who had not previously seen it.

III. NEXT MEETING.

11. THE COMMITTEE after discussion agreed that the next meeting should be held as soon as possible after Mr. MacCallum had forwarded to the Secretary his estimate as outlined in paragraph 10 above.

The meeting adjourned at 4.30 p.m.

Rapport du Comité interministériel sur la politique du transport aérien au Comité de guerre du Cabinet

Report from Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy to Cabinet War Committee

1. The Commonwealth meeting on air transport policy held in London in October, 1943, approved of a report on an international convention and a report on security. The War Committee agreed that these reports provided a very useful basis for discussions with other nations.[1] On the basis of these two reports the interdepartmental Committee has prepared the attached draft of an international air transport convention establishing an International Air Transport authority, giving it a constitution and endowing it with powers. The draft convention is preceded by a three-page summary.

2. The Interdepartmental Committee wishes to draw particular attention to the provisions of Section 2 of Article II of the convention, under which each member state undertakes to give four "freedoms of the air" to the international air services operating under the provisions of the convention:

(1) The right of innocent passage,

(2) The right to land for non-traffic purposes (e.g. refuelling, repair, emergency),

(3) The right to discharge passengers, mails and freight embarked in the territory of the state or states whose nationality the aircraft possesses, and

(4) The right to take on passengers, mails and freight destined for the territory of the state or states whose nationality the aircraft possesses.

These are the four freedoms agreed to at the London meeting.

[1]Voir le volume 9, documents 644, 651, 654.
See Volume 9, Documents 644, 651, 654.

3. There are two possible additional freedoms which the Committee felt should not be granted under the international convention though states could grant them to each other's air carriers under bilateral reciprocal agreements:

(5) The right to convey passengers, mails and freight between the territory of two states neither being the state whose nationality the aircraft possesses.

(6) The right to convey passengers, mails and freight between two points in the territory of any one state not being the state whose nationality the aircraft possesses.

4. The representative of the Post Office on the Committee proposed that the references to mail in the third and fourth freedoms be deleted and a fifth freedom be added to the convention:

"The right to convey international mails between any regular points of call."

The Committee, however, was not convinced of the wisdom or the necessity of this proposal.

5. It is possible that the United States may favour the inclusion of only the first two freedoms. The Committee is of the opinion that the Canadian representatives in international discussions should make every effort to secure the inclusion of all four since the grant of only the first two would deprive Canada of the valuable bargaining strength which she at present possesses because of the importance of air transit rights over Canada without giving her comparable advantages in return.

6. So far as questions affecting world security are concerned the International Air Transport Authority is made subject to the international security organization which is to be set up by the United Nations. This is in accordance with the recommendation of the London meeting and with previous reports from the Interdepartmental Committee to the War Committee.[2]

7. From its studies over the past year and a half the Committee has become convinced of the importance of the decision which the United Nations must make during the next year or so on the postwar organization of air transport. The decision may be a key one. An enlightened settlement will constitute a model for the settlement of other difficult international problems. It will mean that the United Nations have gone a long way to establishing a lasting peace and a new world order of security. Failure to reach an enlighted settlement would prejudice the establishment of an effective world security organization and would thereby greatly increase the chances of another world war in the foreseeable future. The Committee believes that a settlement along the lines set forth in the attached convention meets the requirements laid down by the Prime Minister last April[3] in that it would "serve not only the immediate national interests of Canada but also our overriding interest in the establishment of an international order which will prevent the outbreak of another world war."

8. Because Canada is an important air power — important both in war and in peace — Canada is in a position to influence considerably the framing of the coming international settlement of air transport policy. Canada should, therefore, be prepared to play a leading role in efforts to achieve an enlightened settlement.

9. The Interdepartmental Committee recommends that the attached draft convention be approved as a tentative and provisional statement of Canadian policy. In the event that the War Committee accepts this recommendation the question will arise of the use to which the draft convention should be put. Clearly it should be given to the Canadian representatives in future international conferences for their guidance. The Canadian representatives at future conferences might be instructed to present it at the conference as either a tentative and provisional statement of the policy of the Canadian government or as tentative draft proposals of Canadian experts, the Canadian government not being committed to the principles or details of the scheme. If circumstances indicate the desirability of the step, the convention might also be circulated in advance of the forthcoming international discussions to the other governments principally concerned.

Draft Convention

SECRET

A TENTATIVE AND PRELIMINARY DRAFT OF AN INTERNATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT CONVENTION

OTTAWA January 8, 1944

CONTENTS

It is assumed that an overriding treaty of peace will determine the obligations and rights of the defeated powers under this convention.

DRAFT INTERNATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT CONVENTION

SUMMARY

1. The convention establishes an International Air Transport Authority, gives it a constitution and endows it with powers. The Authority has the normal structure of an international organization: an Assembly representing all the member states and a small executive committee which is called a Board of Directors. In each region a Regional Council is set up to deal with matters of regional concern.

2. The Authority is charged with the duty of planning and fostering the organization of international air services so as

(a) to make the most effective contribution to the establishment and maintenance of a permanent system of general security,

(b) to meet the needs of the peoples of the world for efficient and economical air transport, and

(c) to ensure that, so far as possible, international air routes and services are divided fairly and equitably between the various member states.

3. The convention is an agreement between states and is not concerned with such domestic questions as whether the international air services of the various member states should be government-owned or privately-owned or whether a state should have more than one government-owned or privately-owned airline company engaged in international air transport. These are matters of domestic policy which each individual member state decides for itself. They are, therefore, outside the scope of the international convention.

4. The number of votes which each member state can cast in the International Air Transport Assembly varies from one to six depending on its importance in international air transport. The Board of twelve members, which is elected by the Assembly, must include at least one national of each of the eight member states of chief importance in international air transport.

5. A company wishing to operate an international air service makes application first to its own government. The government, if it approves of the application, forwards it to the appropriate Regional Council. The Regional Council holds formal hearings on the application before deciding whether the applicant should receive a license and, if so, under what conditions.

6. The Regional Council has power to issue a license entitling a company not only to

(a) freedom of air transit over the airways of all the member states of the region but also to

(b) the right to land at airports in the region for refuelling, repairs and in emergency;

(c) the right to carry passengers, mails and cargo from the home state to any other member state, and;

(d) the right to bring back passengers, mails and cargo to the home state from any other member state.

7. A state which considers that a decision by a Regional Council is unfair has the right to appeal to the Board of Directors and the Board can set aside or modify the decision.

8. The application for a license from an airline which wishes to operate a service passing over territory under the jurisdiction of two or more Regional Councils does not go to all the Regional Councils concerned but goes to the Board.

9. The Authority, acting through either the Board or a Regional Council is given power to determine frequencies of service on each route, to allocate quotas between the various member states and to determine rates of carriage for passengers and cargo.

10. On questions affecting world security the International Air Transport Authority is made subject to the international security organization which is to be set up by the United Nations. That organization may, in the interests of world security, order the International Air Transport Board to withdraw, suspend or modify a license, take certain measures concerning technical services, operating facilities and bases or set up one or more operating organizations to operate the air services on certain routes or in certain regions.

11. Two or more member states may decide that the best way of operating all or some of the air services between them is not by rival companies each carrying a national flag but by a joint organization. The member states are not prevented from establishing such joint operating organizations. Indeed the Board or a Regional Council may recommend to the member states concerned that they pool the air services on certain routes or in certain regions or constitute joint operating organizations to perform certain air services. A state has the right to participate in a joint operating organization either through its government or through an airline company or companies designated by its government. The companies may, at the sole discretion of the state concerned, be state-owned or partly state-owned or privately-owned.

12. Services between two contiguous states, such as Canada and the United States, are excepted from the provisions of the convention and are left to be dealt with by agreements between the two states concerned. Contiguous states may, however, by mutual consent, give the International Air Transport Authority jurisdiction over the services between them.

13. Airlines between a state and its colonies, possessions, protectorates, mandates or territory abroad or between different colonies etcetera of the same state are subject to the provisions of the convention if the route passes through the air space of another state. This means that a state cannot reserve all its colonial services to its own airline companies.

14. In order that the air regulations throughout the world should be as uniform as possible, an agreed set of regulations will be drawn up by the International Air Transport Assembly and brought into force by each member state. These regulations will cover such matters as air safety, rules of the air, competency of air crew, ground signals, meteorological procedure, navigational aids, communications, airworthiness, national registration and identification of aircraft, carriage of dangerous goods and salvage.

15. The aircraft licensed by the Board or the Regional Councils will be assured wherever they go in the world of being able to use adequate airports and other ground facilities on payment of reasonable fees and charges. Member states may elect to bear all or a portion of the costs of constructing and maintaining the necessary facilities. If a member state does not so elect, the costs are advanced by the Board and borne by the Board or apportioned among states using the facilities. The Board may require, in return for advancement of costs, a reasonable share in the supervision of the construction work and in the control of the airports and other facilities. If a member state so requests the Board may itself provide, man and maintain any or all the airports and other facilities which it requires on the territory of that state and may impose reasonable fees and charges for their use.

16. The expenses of the International Air Transport Authority will be borne by the member states in proportion to the number of votes at their disposal in the Assembly, provided that those expenses of a Regional Air Transport Council which are properly chargeable to the states participating in that Council, will be borne by those states.

17. Some time will be required after the coming into force of the convention before the International Air Transport Authority is in full working order. The Assembly must meet, the Board must be elected, the Regional Councils constituted, their rules of procedure agreed upon. Certain temporary arrangements are therefore contemplated to cover the initial period of existence of the Authority. The convention does not terminate the rights of companies now engaged in international air transport. These companies are given two years to secure licenses from the Authority. Furthermore, airline companies designated in a schedule to the convention are deemed to possess licenses issued by the Authority to operate routes designated in the schedule and these licenses remain valid until modified or withdrawn by the Board or the competent Regional Council.

PREAMBLE

The governments signatory hereto agree to the establishment of an International Air Transport Authority.

ARTICLE I

THE AUTHORITY

Section 1

An authority is hereby established to be known as the International Air Transport Authority and to consist of an Assembly, a Board of Directors, Regional Air Transport Councils and such other units as may be created pursuant to the provisions of this convention.

Section 2

The Authority shall plan and foster the organization of international air services so as

(a) to make the most effective contribution to the establishment and maintenance of a permanent system of general security.

(b) to meet the needs of the peoples of the world for efficient and economical air transport, and

(c) to ensure that, so far as possible, international air routes and services are divided fairly and equitably between the various member states.

Section 3

The Authority shall have exclusive jurisdiction, pursuant to the provisions of this convention, over international air services other than services between two contiguous member states, provided that any two contiguous member states may agree that services between them shall come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Authority. When such an agreement has been notified by both states to the Board, and until such agreement has been terminated, the Authority shall have exclusive jurisdiction, pursuant to the provisions of this convention, over the services between the two states.

ARTICLE II

OBLIGATIONS OF MEMBER STATES

Section 1

Each member state recognizes that every state has complete exclusive sovereignty over the air space above its territory.

Section 2

Each member state undertakes to give the following freedoms of the air to the international air services operating under the provisions of this convention to the extent allowed by the license issued to the services:

(1) The right of innocent passage,

(2) The right to land for non-traffic purposes (e.g. refuelling, repair, emergency),

(3) The right to discharge passengers, mails and freight embarked in the territory of the state or states whose nationality the aircraft possesses, and

(4) The right to take on passengers, mails and freight destined for the territory of the state or states whose nationality the aircraft possesses.

Section 3

Each member state may

(a) designate the route to be followed within its territory by any international air service and the air ports which any international air service may use, and

provided that, upon complaint by an interested air carrier through the government or governments of which it is a national, the designation of routes and use of air ports, and the charges imposed for the use of air ports and other facilities shall be subject to review by the licensing authority.

Section 4

Each member state undertakes to make available such radio frequencies and to provide such meteorological services as may from time to time be required by the licensing authority for the safety, efficiency and regularity of the air services licensed by it.

Section 5

Each member state undertakes to perform the obligations imposed on it by this convention and to enact legislation necessary to carry out its terms including

(a) legislation to ensure that no air carrier may operate international air services unless that carrier is in possession of a valid license authorizing such services, issued under the provisions of Article VI of this convention, and

(b) legislation to bring its national laws into conformity with the regulations approved by the Assembly under the provisions of sub-section 5 of section 2 of Article III of this convention. This action shall be taken within the period of one year from the date of approval by the Assembly or, if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than eighteen months from the date of approval by the Assembly.

Section 6

Each member state undertakes to permit the operation within its territory of operating organizations constituted under the provisions of section 3 of Article IX of this convention, provided that permission to an operating organization to engage in domestic air transport within its territory shall be in the discretion of the state.

ARTICLE III

THE ASSEMBLY

Section 1

The International Air Transport Assembly shall be composed of representatives of the member states. Each state shall be entitled to the number of votes (one to six) in the Assembly provided in the Annex to this convention and may appoint as many representatives to the Assembly as it has votes and may replace them from time to time. Each state may cast all of the votes allotted to it regardless of the number of its representatives present at any meeting. Decisions of the Assembly shall be taken by a majority of the votes cast except where otherwise provided in this convention. There shall be deemed to be a quorum if the representatives present can cast one-half of the possible votes.

Section 2

The duties of the Assembly shall be:

(1) To elect the International Air Transport Board.

(2) To elect the President of the Board. The President shall hold office for a period of six years.

(3) To meet from time to time as occasion may require and at least once a year.

(4) To examine and approve the annual report of the Board, and to decide any matter referred to it by the Board.

(5) To draw up and maintain regulations governing such matters as air safety, rules of the air, competency of air crew, ground signals, meteorological procedure, navigational aids, communications, airworthiness, national registration and identification of aircraft, carriage of dangerous goods, salvage.

(6) To make regulations governing the preparation of budgets and financial statements by the Board and to approve the annual budget and the financial arrangements made by the Board.

Section 3

The Assembly shall have power:

(1) To determine its rules of procedure.

(2) To fix the salaries of the President and the other members of the Board.

(3) To refer to subsidiary commissions, the Board or any other appropriate agency any matter within the sphere of its jurisdiction.

(4) To deal with any matter within the sphere of action of the International Air Transport Authority not specifically assigned to the Board or the Regional Councils.

ARTICLE IV

THE BOARD

Section 1

The International Air Transport Board shall be elected by the International Air Transport Assembly. The Board shall be a permanent body responsible to the Assembly and composed of twelve members in additon to the President. They shall not be members of the Assembly. They shall hold office for a period of six years. Two members of the Board shall retire annually and in rotation but shall be eligible for re-election. The Assembly shall have the right to dismiss any member of the Board at any time. In the event of the dismissal or death of a Member of the Board, the Assembly shall elect a successor who shall hold office for the unexpired portion of his predecessor's term of office. The Board shall include at least one national of each of the eight member states of chief importance in international air transport.

Section 2

The duties of the Board shall be:

(1) To constitute, subject to the approval of the Assembly, the following Regional Air Transport Councils: for example, European, North Atlantic, North Pacific, Inter-American . . . In constituting a Regional Council the Board shall designate as participating states those member states which are principally concerned in the international airlines of the region. The Board shall also define the boundaries of the region or designate the routes over which the Regional Council shall have jurisdiction. The Board may from time to time revise the lists of participating states and alter the boundaries of the regions or change the designations of the routes.

(2) To decide, subject to the approval of the Assembly, the method of appointment, the salaries and conditions of service of its employees, including those members of the Regional Councils who are appointed by the Board.

(3) To establish the rules of procedure of subsidiary commissions and of Regional Councils.

(4) To administer, subject to the approval of the Assembly, the finances of the International Air Transport Authority.

(5) To grant licenses over routes coming within the jurisdiction of two or more Regional Councils or of no Regional Council; and in these cases to exercise the duties of a Regional Council.

(6) To conduct research into all aspects of air transport which are of international concern, to make the results of its research known to all the member states and to facilitate the exchange of information on air transport matters between the member states.

Section 3

The Board shall have power:

(1) To revoke or alter, after public notice or hearing, any decision of a Regional Air Transport Council including any decision to grant, withhold, alter, amend, modify, revoke or suspend a license and any decision determining frequencies of service, allocation of quotas, or rates of carriage.

(2) To carry out the provisions of Article VII of this convention (Airports and other ground facilities.)

(3) To establish, subject to the approval of the Assembly, subsidiary commissions responsible to it.

(4) To institute such training facilities for its employees as it may consider necessary.

Section 4

Decisions of the Board shall be taken by a majority of the votes cast. One-half the members of the Board shall form a quorum. The President shall have a casting vote. The Board shall determine its rules of procedure but the place of its permanent seat shall be decided by the Assembly.

ARTICLE V

REGIONAL COUNCILS

Section 1

A Regional Air Transport Council shall be composed of not less than six nor more than nine members. One-third of the members shall be appointed by the International Air Transport Board and hold office at the pleasure of the Board; they shall possess special knowledge of the problems of air transport and shall be nationals of states other than those which are designated by the Board as being principally concerned in the international airlines of the region. The other members shall be appointed by the designated states. The number of members to be appointed by each of the designated states shall be, from time to time, determined by the Board, having regard to the relative importance to each state of the international air transport services under the Regional Council's jurisdiction and to the relative importance of each state in air transport. The members appointed by designated states shall hold office at the pleasure of the government appointing them.

Section 2

Decisions of a Regional Council shall be taken by a majority of the votes cast. One-half the members of a Council shall form a quorum.

Section 3

Each Regional Council shall appoint a Managing Director who shall hold office for a period of four years.

Section 4

The duties of a Regional Council shall be:

(1) To grant licenses to operate international air services within the region; to withhold licenses; to attach to the exercise of the privileges granted by a license such reasonable terms, conditions and limitations as the public interest may require and as are consistent with the terms of this convention; to alter, amend, modify or suspend any license, in whole or in part, or revoke any license, in whole or in part, for deliberate failure to comply with any provision of this convention or of any order, rule or regulation issued under this convention or any term, condition or limitation of the license.

(2) To determine rates of carriage for passengers and cargo, having regard, among other things, to standards of speed and of accommodation, and to consult with the postal administrations regarding rates of carriage for mail.

(3) To collect and publish information and cost statistics relating to the operation of international air services within the region.

Section 5

If the airline companies of more than one state are operating on a route a Regional Council shall have power to determine frequencies of service on the route and to allocate quotas.[4]

ARTICLE VI

LICENSES

Section 1

(1) Applications for licenses can be submitted only by governments of member states. An application by a person or corporation shall be submitted through the intermediary of the govenment of the member state of which the person or corporation is a national.

(2) An application shall normally be made to the competent Regional Air Transport Council. If the application, however, is for a service which falls within the jurisdiction of two or more Regional Councils or of no Regional Council, the application shall be made to the International Air Transport Board which may refer it to one or more Regional Councils for their opinion.

Section 2

(1) The Board or a Regional Council shall not grant, renew, alter, amend, modify, suspend or revoke a license except after reasonable notice to all member states in the region or regions concerned and after a formal hearing at which all these member states shall have the right to be heard except in case of emergency or under the provisions of Article IX of this convention (Relationship to the International Security Organization).

(2) The Board or a Regional Council shall not grant a license unless it is satisfied:

(a) that the person or corporation applying for the license is able properly to provide the proposed air services, and to conform to the provisions of this convention and the rules, regulations and requirements of the International Air Transport Authority and the competent Regional Councils, and

(b) that the proposed services and their performance by the applicant would serve public convenience and necessity.

Section 3

(1) The holder of a license granted by the Board or a Regional Council shall have the right to operate to, within, over and away from the territory of any member state to the extent allowed by the license. The license may allow the holder to make stops in the territory of any member state for refuelling, repairs, taking on or discharging of passengers, cargo and mail and for any other purpose and member states shall allow such stops, provided that no license shall grant permission to a person or corporation possessing the nationality of one state to take on passengers, cargo or mail within the territory of any other state for discharge within contiguous territory of the latter or within the territory of a third state except with the consent of the member state or member states concerned.

(2) No license shall be granted for a period of more than . . . years but licenses may be renewed on application. Any license may be revoked, altered, amended, modified or suspended by the Board or by the Regional Council which granted the license.

ARTICLE VII

AIRPORTS AND OTHER GROUND FACILITIES

Section 1

If an air carrier licensed by the Board or a Regional Council is of the opinion that the airports or other ground facilities on the territory of a member state are not reasonably adequate for the safe, regular, efficient and economical operation of the air services which it is permitted by its license to perform, it may so inform the government or governments of which it is a national. Such government or governments may, if the complaint is considered to be valid, transmit it to the appropriate Regional Council, or if more than one Regional Council or no Regional Council is concerned, to the Board. After reasonable notice to all member states concerned and after one or more hearings at which these member states shall have the right to be heard, the Board or Regional Council may request the member state to expand its existing facilities or to construct new ones or to man and maintain its existing or new facilities in accordance with standards set by the Board or Regional Council. The Board shall, at the instance of an interested member state, review any request made by a Regional Council and after public notice or hearing may suspend, withdraw, alter, amend or modify its terms. Each member state undertakes, at the earliest practicable moment, to give effect to the requests of the Board or Regional Council.

Section 2

The expenses involved in carrying out any such request shall be apportioned as follows:

(a) The member state may elect to bear all or a portion of the costs,

(b) If the member state bears none of the costs or bears only a portion thereof, the costs (or the remaining portion of them, as the case may be) shall be advanced by the Board to the member state and shall be borne by the Board or be apportioned by the Board, over a reasonable period of time, between the states (including the member state constructing the facilities) whose air carriers or services use the facilities.

In cases where the Board advances costs it may require a reasonable share in the supervision of the construction work, in the control of the airports and other facilities, and in the revenues derived from charges levied.

Section 3

If a member state so requests the Board may provide, man, maintain and control any or all of the airports and other ground facilities which it requires in the territory of that member state for the safe, regular, efficient and economical operation of the air services which it or a Regional Council has licensed and may impose just and reasonable charges for the use of the facilities. The member state shall either provide the land itself or facilitate the acquisition of the necessary land by the Board on just and reasonable terms.

Section 4

A member state may at any time acquire and obtain complete control over facilities on its territory for which the Board has advanced costs under Section 2 of this Article, or which the Board has provided under Section 3 of this Article, by paying to the Board an amount which in the opinion of the Board is reasonable in the circumstances.

ARTICLE VIII

FINANCE

The expenses of the International Air Transport Authority shall be borne by the member states in proportion to the number of votes at their disposal in the Assembly, provided that those expenses of a Regional Air Transport Council which are, in the opinion of the Board, properly chargeable to the states participating in that Council shall be borne by those states in such proportions as the Board may determine.

ARTICLE IX

RELATIONSHIP TO THE INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ORGANIZATION

Section 1

The International Air Transport Authority shall be subject, so far as questions involving world security are concerned, to the general organization which may be established among the nations of the world for the maintenance of peace and international security.

Section 2

The Board, when informed by the International Security Organization that such action is required in the interest of world security, shall immediately and without formal hearing grant, withhold, alter, amend, modify, suspend or revoke any license in whole or in part and take the measures concerning technical services, operating facilities and bases which the International Security Organization has directed should be taken.

Section 3

The Board shall, when informed by the International Security Organization that such action is required in the interest of world security, constitute, supervise and control one or more operating organizations to operate air services on routes or in regions designated from time to time by the International Security Organization, provided that such operating organizations shall not engage in domestic air transport within any state without the permission of that state. The Board may place operating organizations under the supervision and control of the appropriate Regional Air Transport Council.

ARTICLE X

JOINT OPERATING ORGANIZATIONS AND POOLING

Section 1

Nothing in this convention shall prevent two or more states from constituting joint air transport operating organizations but such organizations shall be subject to all the provisions of this convention including those relating to licenses and to the registration of agreements with the Board.

Section 2

Nothing in this convention shall prevent two or more states from pooling their air services on certain routes or in certain regions but such pooled services shall be subject to all the provisions of this convention including those relating to licenses and to the registration of agreements with the Board.

Section 3

The Board, or a Regional Air Transport Council, may recommend to the member states concerned that they pool the air services on certain routes or in certain regions or that they constitute joint operating organizations to perform some or all the air services on certain routes or in certain regions.

Section 4

A state shall have the right to participate in joint operating organizations either through its government or through an airline company or companies designated by it. The companies may, at the sole discretion of the state concerned, be state-owned or partly state-owned or privately owned.

ARTICLE XI

OTHER AGREEMENTS AND ARRANGEMENTS

Section 1

This convention shall replace the International Aerial Navigation Convention signed at Paris in 1919, the Ibero-American Convention on Aerial Navigation signed at Madrid in 1926, the Pan-American Convention on Commercial Aviation signed at Habana in 1928, the Convention for the Unification of certain rules relating to International Transportation by Air signed at Warsaw in 1929, and the Convention relating to Sanitary Measures to be applied in International Air Navigation signed at The Hague in 1933.

Section 2

The member states severally agree that this convention is accepted as abrogating all obligations or understandings inter se which are inconsistent with its terms, and undertake not to enter into any engagements inconsistent with its terms. In case any member state shall, before becoming a member of the International Air Transport Authority, have undertaken any obligations toward a non-member state or a national of a member state or a non-member state inconsistent with the terms of this convention, it shall be the duty of such member state to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

Section 3

The right of any member state to enter into any convention or special agreement with any other member state or member states concerning international air transport is recognized, provided that the convention or agreement shall not impair any rights or obligations of any of the member states arising out of this convention. Every such convention or agreement shall be forthwith registered with the Board and shall as soon as possible be published by it. No such convention or agreement shall be binding until so registered.

Section 4

All agreements or working arrangements between operating companies regarding international air services shall be forthwith registered with the Board and shall not be binding until so registered.

ARTICLE XII

AMENDMENTS, RATIFICATION, ETC.

Amendments to this convention can be proposed by either the Assembly or the Board. An amendment shall be binding on the member states as soon as it is approved of by the Assembly by at least two-thirds of the total possible votes.

Section 2

In case of a disagreement between two or more member states or between one or more member states and the Board relating to the interpretation of this convention, the question in dispute shall, at the request of any one of the interested member states or of the Board, be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Section 3

This convention shall be ratified. Ratifications shall be deposited with . . . who shall notify the other signatory states.

Section 4

The convention shall come into force, in respect of ratifying states, when it has been ratified by . . . of the signatory states including . . . of the following: . . . . The date of coming into force shall be notified to all signatory states by . . . .

Section 5

This convention may not be denounced until it has been in force for five years. At the end of this period and at the end of each six year period thereafter any member state may denounce it. Denunciations shall be addressed to . . . and shall be effective one year after delivery.

Section 6

Any non-signatory state may adhere to this convention at any time after it has come into force. Adherence shall be notified to . . . who shall inform all signatory states.

ARTICLE XIII

DEFINITIONS

For the purposes of this convention the expression:

(a) "air service", means any air service performed by an airship, aircraft or towed glider for public use such as the transport of passengers, mails or cargo, including services under charter such as "air taxis";

(b) "international air service" means any air service which passes through the air space above the territory of two or more states including any such air service from a state to its colonies, possessions, protectorates, mandates or territory abroad, provided that an air service between two contiguous member states shall be deemed not to be an international air service unless the two states, pursuant to Section 3 of Article I of this convention, have agreed that the service come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Authority;

(c) "member states of chief importance in international air transport" means the eight member states which, under the provisions of the annex to this convention, are entitled to the largest number of votes in the Assembly;

(d) "nationality of aircraft" means the nationality of the state in which the aircraft is registered provided that the aircraft of an operating organization owned by two or more states or by the airline companies designated by two or more states is deemed for the purposes of this convention to possess the nationality of each of the participating states or companies;

(e) "territory" of a state means the territory of a state and its colonies, possessions, protectorates, mandates or territory abroad.

ARTICLE XIV

PROVISIONAL ARTICLE

Section 1

After this convention has come into force the member states shall observe the following rules governing the temporary continuation of existing international air transport:

(1) Such of their nationals as are engaged in international air transport shall discontinue their activities within two years unless they obtain licenses under the provisions of this convention.

(2) If a member state has previously granted to a national of a non-member state any rights of international air transport such rights shall be revoked within two years provided that, if revocation would involve breach of an agreement made with the non-member state, the period of two years may be extended by the Board.

Section 2

Until the International Air Transport Board shall decide otherwise the jurisdiction of the Regional Air Transport Councils shall extend as follows:

(1) European air transport council: Europe not including the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and Ireland.

(2) North Atlantic air transport council: all routes between any point in North America which is north of 40° north latitude and any point north of 40° north latitude in Europe including the United Kingdom, Ireland and the European portions of the U.S.S.R.

(3) . . . . . .

Section 3

Until the International Air Transport Board or the competent Regional Air Transport Council shall decide otherwise the aircraft companies designated in the attached schedule shall be deemed to possess licenses issued by the International Air Transport Authority to operate the routes designated in the schedule.

Schedule to Section 3

Part A. The North Atlantic.

(1) State A. A company or companies to be designated by State A to operate not more than . . . round trips a week between any point in State A and any point in the British Isles or Europe north of 40° north latitude . . . .

(2) State B. A company or companies to be designated by State B to operate not more than . . . round trips a week between any point in State B and any point in . . . .

(3) State C. A company . . .

Part B. The Middle Atlantic . . .

Part C. The South Atlantic . . .

Part D. The North Pacific . . .

Part E. Inter-American . . .

Part F. Europe . . .

Part G. The Middle East . . .

Section 4

(This section should provide for an equitable allocation of transport aircraft between the member states during the period of scarcity following the cessation of hostilities.)

Section 5

The first meeting of the Assembly shall be summoned by . . . as soon as the convention has come into force to meet at . . . two months after the date of coming into force of the convention.

Section 6

The following procedure shall govern the election of the International Air Transport Board at the first meeting of the International Air Transport Assembly. Each of the eight member states of chief importance in air transport shall, as soon as possible and not later than six weeks after the date of coming into force of the convention, nominate one of its nationals for membership on the Board and the eight persons so nominated shall be deemed to have been elected by the Assembly. Each national delegation may nominate one person to fill one of the remaining four seats on the Board. The chairman of the Assembly shall prepare a list in alphabetical order of all the persons thus nominated and shall submit this list to the Assembly which shall vote by secret ballot. Those four candidates who obtain the highest number of votes shall be considered as elected. At the first meeting of the Board lots shall be drawn to determine which two members shall serve for six years, which two for five years, which for four, which for three, which for two and which for one.

Section 7

Until the International Air Transport Assembly shall decide otherwise the regulations governing such matters as air safety, rules of the air, competency of air crew, ground signals, meteorological procedure, navigational aids, communications, airworthiness, national registration and identification of aircraft, carriage of dangerous goods and salvage which are set forth in the attached schedule shall be deemed to have received the approval of the Assembly under the provisions of subsection 5 of section 2 of Article III of this convention (The Assembly) and each member state undertakes to enact or modify its national laws to bring them into conformity with these regulations at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than twelve months from the date of the coming into force of this convention.[5]

ANNEX TO CONVENTION

Section 1

For the first three years after the coming into force of this convention, the member states shall be entitled to votes in the Assembly as follows:

(Then will follow a list of states with the number of votes to which each is entitled.)

Section 2

After the end of the period covered by Section 1 of this Annex the number of votes in the Assembly to which each member state shall be entitled shall be determined as follows:

(Then will follow a formula.)

It is suggested that the functional principle as outlined by the Prime Minister of Canada in the House of Commons on July 9, 1943 be followed in deciding the number of votes to which each state is entitled in the Assembly. The Prime Minister's statement of July 9 reads in part as follows:

"A number of new international institutions are likely to be set up as a result of the war. In the view of the Government, effective representation on these bodies should neither be restricted to the largest states nor necessarily extended to all states. Representation should be determined on a functional basis which will admit to full membership those countries, large or small, which have the greatest contribution to make to the particular object in question."

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AIR TRANSPORT POLICY

6. THE SECRETARY submitted a report of the Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy, including a draft international air transport convention prepared in accordance with principles approved at the Commonwealth air conversations in October, 1943, and recommending that the draft convention be approved as a tentative and provisional statement of Canadian policy. Copies of the report and draft convention had been circulated.

(Interdepartmental Committee's report, Jan. 14, 1944 and attached draft convention, Jan. 8, 1944 — C.W.C. document 693).

7. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY expressed the opinion that the draft convention submitted represented an acceptable basis for Canadian policy. At the proper time, as international discussions developed, it should be put forward to other governments as a Canadian proposal.

8. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved in principle the report and draft convention, as a tentative and provisional statement of Canadian policy, to be put forward at an appropriate opportunity.

Mémorandum du ministère des Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Department of External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] January 29, 1944

INTERNATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT POLICY

Our Embassy in Washington has received from the State Department an aide-mémoire dated January 26, initialled by Mr. Berle, which reads as follows:

"Aide-Mémoire

The Canadian Embassy is informed that the government of the United States has been approached recently by several other governments with a request for an exchange of views on the subject of postwar aviation, with particular reference to the development of international air transport.

The Department of State hopes that it will be possible in the first instance to discuss these matters with the Canadian and British governments and believes that such discussions would be facilitated if an early indication could be received of the views of the Canadian government on this general subject.

A similar communication is being addressed to the British Embassy."

You will recall that the War Committee on January 20 approved of the draft air convention as a tentative and provisional statement of the policy of the Canadian government and agreed that it should be put forward at an appropriate time for the consideration of other governments. The question, therefore, arises whether the request from the United States government for an early indication of our views provides us with an appropriate opportunity to transmit our air convention to them. We might transmit a document along the lines of the 3-page summary which is attached to and precedes the draft Convention. This would give a clear indication of our views but would reserve till a later date any attempt to go into details. On the other hand we might transmit the whole convention, and I think this would be preferable since it would give a fuller and clearer picture of our point of view. I also think that before doing this we should communicate the convention to the United Kingdom government and to the representatives in London of the other Commonwealth governments.

There is another important point in connection with the circulation of our proposals. Our legation in Moscow has repeatedly emphasized the desirability of placing our views before the Soviet government whenever possible simultaneously with our informing other governments. To inform the Soviet government on any subject only after other governments have been informed rather as an afterthought serves to intensify and strengthen the latent suspicion with which the Soviet government invariably regards the intentions of other governments. In the present case, since the Soviet Union will be one of the great air powers of the future, it is desirable to enlist their confidence and goodwill, if at all possible. If we were to give them our draft convention at the same time as the United States we would be doing everything we could to allay their suspicions about negotiations taking place behind their backs. Moreover it would be evidence that Canada has her own policies and view points quite independent of those of the United Kingdom, a point that continually requires emphasis in our relations with the Soviet authorities, who are inclined to be skeptical of our claim to be independent of the United Kingdom.

I would accordingly suggest that our draft convention be transmitted to other governments as follows:

1. To the government of the United Kingdom and the representatives in London of Commonwealth governments with a statement that we will give the convention to the governments of the United States and the U.S.S.R. shortly thereafter.
2. To the governments of the United States and the U.S.S.R.
3. To other interested governments in the light of developments.[6]

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AIR TRANSPORT POLICY

3. THE SECRETARY reported that the United States had now suggested discussions with the Canadian and British governments prior to an exchange of views with other governments and had requested an early indication of the views of the Canadian government.

4. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY expressed the opinion that the United States should be informed that the Canadian government were ready to participate in the proposed discussions, and that a document along the lines of the summary attached to the draft international air transport convention, approved by the War Committee on January 20th, should be transmitted to the U.S. and U.K. governments, as a general indication of the Canadian view.

TELETYPE EX-518 Ottawa, February 5, 1944

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Your despatch No. 212 of January 30† forwarding aide-mémoire from the State Department and my despatch No. 121 of January 28† transmitting draft air convention.

War Committee of Cabinet have agreed that a summary of our draft convention should be transmitted to the governments of the British Commonwealth and the Government of the United States as a tentative statement of the Canadian government's views with regard to the regulation of postwar international air transport.

You are therefore instructed to give the State Department an Aide-Mémoire along the following lines:

"With reference to its aide-mémoire of January 26 the Department of State is informed that the Canadian government has been giving consideration to the intricate problems of postwar international air transport and has tentatively reached the conclusion that the most helpful solution of these problems lies in the adoption of a multilateral air transport convention. There are attached copies of a memorandum outlining the matters which in the view of the Canadian government might fall within the scope of such a convention.

The Canadian government would be grateful in return to receive at an early date the preliminary views of the United States government on the general subject of postwar aviation.

Believing that a discussion of this subject with the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom would be mutually profitable the Canadian government is prepared to enter into such discussions whenever agreeable to the other two governments."

The memorandum[7] is given in my immediately following teletype.†

The High Commissioner in London has been instructed to communicate the same memorandum to the government of the United Kingdom and the representatives of the other Commonwealth governments which took part in the London conference in October. We are giving copies to the United States Ambassador and the United Kingdom High Commissioner here.

AIR TRANSPORT

Please give the United Kingdom government copies of our Air Transport convention, omitting the three-page summary. A slightly revised version of this summary† has been sent to you by airmail today. You should tell the United Kingdom government that in view of the forthcoming discussions in Washington between the United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada we propose to give the United States the text of the convention as soon as possible. We are, however, putting off doing this in order to give the United Kingdom government an opportunity to comment.

TELEGRAM 291 Ottawa, February 15, 1944

SECRET. My telegram No. 242 of February 7 stated that we would shortly give our draft convention on international air transport to the United States Government. I assume the United Kingdom authorities have no comments to make on this.

2. We have been considering whether it would not be wise to give a copy to the Soviet Government as well, preferably at the same time as we give it to the United States. As you know, our Ambassador in Moscow has repeatedly emphasized the desirability from the specifically Canadian as well as the general point of view of placing our views before the Soviet Government whenever possible simultaneously with our informing other foreign governments. It seems to us particularly desirable to do this in air transport in view of the necessity of securing the adherence of the Soviet Union to an enlightened international air transport convention and of our own special responsibilities because of our position athwart the main air routes between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R.

3. The circulation of our draft convention to the three chief air powers, the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R., would not involve our mentioning the forthcoming Washington talks to the Soviet Government unless they have already been informed of them by the United States or the United Kingdom.

4. Please discuss this matter informally and orally with the United Kingdom authorities and find out what their present views are on keeping the U.S.S.R. in touch with developments in the international air transport discussions. The United Kingdom's desire last summer to have the Soviet Union participate in the first international discussions, which it was then thought might take place in Ottawa, indicated the importance which the United Kingdom attaches to keeping the U.S.S.R. fully informed.

TELETYPE WA-899 Washington, February 15, 1944

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Berle asked to see me this morning about the forthcoming International Civil Aviation talks. He feels that they should be held toward the end of March and that they should be confined to questions of principle and policy. There has apparently been some suggestion that, instead of tripartite talks, there might be concurrent talks between the British and Americans and the Canadians and Americans, but the Americans do not favour this. Berle rather hinted that Beaverbrook would have preferred Anglo-American discussions in the first instance, with Canada being drawn in later. I said that, speaking purely personally, I felt that the Canadian Government would prefer tripartite talks rather than two sets of bilateral talks and that we would also definitely prefer to participate from the outset.

2. Berle then said that there had been some suggestion that the Russians, and possibly the Chinese, might be included. They were taking steps to find out if the Russians and the Chinese were anxious at this time for such inclusion. If so, they would have to consider whether they were to be invited. Berle himself was inclined to think that it might be more satisfactory at the beginning to restrict talks to the three Governments, but that, as the procedure would be informal and elastic, the Russians and the Chinese could be invited to participate later on if they so desired. I asked Berle if consideration was being given to a press statement, in view of the fact that so many leakages were occurring. He said that he would be issuing something later today, merely to the effect that the three Governments "and possibly others" would be commencing soon exploratory and informal talks on this subject. I pointed out to him that the inclusion of the phrase "and possibly others" would lead to enquiries from other Governments. He admitted that this might well be the case, especially with the Netherlands and Australia, but he thought that there again they could be included later on. (Mr. Berle's reference to a press announcement was, of course, surprising, as London had not yet accepted the invitation to the discussions in question and, in any event, an official announcement should be made simultaneously in each capital. We therefore made further enquiries of the Division of Current Information at the State Department through J. D. Walstrom (Acting Chief of the Aviation Division), neither of whom knew anything about any public announcement, though a story in somewhat general terms about civil aviation talks had appeared in this afternoon's Washington News. Later Walstrom phoned back to say that Mr. Berle had decided now not to issue any statement, but one might be issued in a week or so.)

3. It was hoped that, if the initial discussions went satisfactorily, a general United Nations Conference on this subject could be convened toward the end of this year. The United States Government would like to propose Ottawa as the site for such a conference and would be glad if the Canadian Government could act as hosts. Naturally, however, they would not make any formal approach on this matter until they had ascertained our wishes. I emphasized the desirability of this.

4. I asked Berle if he could give me any indication of United States Government views on International Civil Aviation and reminded him we had given them a statement of ours. He said — as he has already previously said — that he hoped to be in a position to do this shortly, but that United States views were still not finally crystallized.

5. Berle then handed me a copy of the proposed agenda for the forthcoming meetings, which is as follows: Begins:

PROPOSED AGENDA OF SUBJECTS RELATING TO INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION

I. AIR NAVIGATION AND AIR TRANSPORT:

1. The right of transit and technical stop (stop for non-traffic reasons) for civil aircraft, subject to needed regulation for security.
2. The right of commercial air entry.
3. Granting of international operating rights on a non-exclusive basis.
4. Application of cabotage to air traffic.
5. Control of rates and competitive practices.
6. Curtailment of subsidies and exchange of subsidy data.
7. Uniform operating and safety standards.
8. Standardization or coordination of air navigation aids and communications facilities.

II. AIRPORTS AND FACILITIES:

1. Designation of commercial airports of entry.
2. Use of airports and facilities on a non-discriminatory basis.
3. Airports and facilities in isolated areas.

III. INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION:

1. Establishment of an international civil aviation commission, and definition of its functions.
2. Preparations and agenda for a United Nations Conference. Ends.

MOST IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Your telegram No. 291 of February 15th, Draft Convention on International Air Transport.

1. I have discussed informally with the United Kingdom authorities the various points raised and they are anxious that a copy of the Draft Convention should not be given to the United States until they have commented upon it. They are at present studying the Convention and have promised to let me have these comments as soon as possible.

Regarding the notification of the forthcoming Washington talks to the Soviet Government, the United Kingdom has not informed the Soviet and say they would not do so in any case particularly as the invitation came from the United States. They are still anxious to keep the U.S.S.R. in touch with developments in the International Air Transport discussions but until they have had an opportunity of commenting on the Draft Convention they would prefer that a copy should not be given to the Soviet.

Dear Mr. Pearson,

We were very glad to receive your WA-899 of February 15 reporting Mr. Berle's views about the forthcoming talks on international aviation. We agree with most of the points which he put forward and we certainly agree with the opinions which you expressed about the general Canadian attitude.

Tripartite talks are undoubtedly to be preferred to two sets of bilateral talks which would provide too many opportunities for misunderstandings and working at cross purposes. With the State Department and ourselves taking this view there should be no great likelihood that Beaverbrook's preference for initial Anglo-American discussions will come to anything.

We have no objection to the inclusion of the Soviet and Chinese governments and, in fact, would be inclined to welcome their presence if they were disposed to come. There is a danger that these governments, and particularly the Soviet government, might feel annoyance at being excluded from the initial conversations no matter how good the reasons were. It will be interesting to find out the result of the soundings taken by the State Department in this connection.

I think we would be quite prepared to go to a general United Nations conference towards the end of the year. Whether it would be feasible to hold it in Ottawa is, of course, another question. A big conference here is relatively much more disturbing to other work than such a conference would be in Washington or London and the government might feel as they did over the question of the I.L.O. conference[8] that it would be too much to handle. I think we should wait until we know a little bit more about the size and nature of such a conference before we put any suggestions before the government.

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D.245 London, February 18, 1944

IMPORTANT. MOST SECRET. Addressed Australia, New Zealand, South Africa. Repeated to Canada and to His Majesty's United Kingdom Ambassador, Washington, for information.

My telegram January 18th, Circular D. 88,† Civil Aviation.

His Majesty's United Kingdom Ambassador, Washington, has reported receipt of aide-mémoire dated January 26th from State Department as in my first following telegram (not repeated to Canada).[9]

2. We were greatly surprised to receive an invitation to a conference on a tripartite basis and have carefully considered the resulting position. It is clearly embarrassing that the United States Government should have invited only Canada and not the other three Dominions who took part in the London discussions, though no doubt this may be accounted for by the special position of Canada in relation to civil aviation in North America and on the North Atlantic.

3. More recently we have received further indications which show that the United States Government contemplates that the Conference should discuss matters of high policy going beyond a preliminary informal exploration. There are moreover suggestions that they might consider extending invitations to Russia and China also. In the light of these developments we have felt that we should make it clear to the United States Government that we expect them to extend invitations to Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa. My fourth following telegram Circular D. 247† gives the text of the instructions which we are sending to Lord Halifax on this point.

4. We are sending to the United States authorities our draft agenda[10] as set out in my second following telegram Circular D. 246.† We have also received from them and are repeating to you their suggested outline agenda in my third following telegram (not repeated to Canada).[11]

IMPORTANT. MOST SECRET. My telegram of today Circular D. 245. Proposed discussions with the United States on civil aviation. We have received through Canadian High Commissioner your memorandum and Draft Convention.

2. As United States are now suggesting a preliminary discussion on a policy rather than on a technical plane, it seems to us that nothing more than a statement of principles of policy is required at this juncture.

3. Our suggestions for agenda are given in my accompanying telegram Circular D. 246.† This draft of principles is derived directly from the Commonwealth Conference and we should hope that you will feel able to accept it with such alterations as may be agreed. You will see from my telegram Circular D. 245 that we have transmitted this draft to Washington.

4. We should like to have a further opportunity to consider and discuss with you your Draft Convention before this is transmitted to United States. At first sight it appears that it may give rise to certain serious difficulties for us particularly in relation to the running of services between the United Kingdom and British Colonies and we earnestly hope therefore that you will not communicate with the United States on this until you have heard our views.

5. You will see from my telegram Circular D. 245 that we have felt it necessary to raise the question of extending participation in the proposed discussions to Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa. Ends.

Dear Mr. Robertson;

Thanks for sending me copy of teletype from the Canadian Ambassador to the Secretary of State for External Affairs No. WA-899 regarding forthcoming International Civil Aviation talks.[12]

I feel strongly that the talks should be tripartite between the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada, rather than two sets of bilateral talks.

I presume that it is a matter of indifference to us if others are included, although I think that more progress can be made if the talks are confined to the three countries.

I understand that the International Civil Aviation Commission proposal is not being well received in the United States, which may mean a new approach to the whole problem.

February 19, 1944

I attach for your approval a draft telegram[13] commenting critically on proposals put forward in a paper presented to the United Kingdom War Cabinet by the Post-Hostilities Planning Sub-committee entitled "Civil Air Transport and Security Problems."† Ritchie, who acts as our liaison with the Post-Hostilities Planning Sub-committee, sent this paper to Wrong recently saying that it had been circulated in London for the comments of the Government departments and they were also anxious to have the benefit of any suggestions which we might care to put forward. It will be discussed very shortly at a meeting of the Sub-committee which representatives of Dominion Governments have been invited to attend.

The paper has itself been revised after consideration by the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff and must be regarded, therefore, as representing a point of view which is at least strongly held in the United Kingdom Service Departments. I also attach a copy of it.† It is rather a surprising document to which objection can be taken on two main grounds. These are, first, that it deals throughout with "the United Kingdom and the Dominions" as a single unit for security purposes and, secondly, that its recommendations run directly counter to the establishment of an effective system of regulating international air transport and are based entirely on narrow grounds of national security.

For the telegram as sent see Document 204.

We are receiving a large number of papers originating in this Sub-committee in London which deal with many phases of the peace settlement ranging from particular boundary problems to the organization of world security as a whole. We usually receive these papers first as drafts before the Sub-committee, then as revised after consideration by the Chiefs of Staff and finally as approved by a ministerial committee of the War Cabinet. Sometimes they progress very rapidly through this procedure. When they have reached the final stage they become the basis of United Kingdom policy for presentation to other Governments perhaps through diplomatic channels, perhaps through the Combined Chiefs of Staff or perhaps through the European Advisory Commission. If they make proposals which are definitely unacceptable to us, we can, if we have time, register our objections at a fairly low level without definitely committing the Canadian Government to any policy by means of observations from the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems here. We have, however, made it clear throughout that our failure to register objections in no way implied our concurrence in the plans put forward.

This is a case in which it seems desirable that our objections should be registered promptly.[14] from our functional principle and might react to our disadvantage in the future.[17] There is, of course, a good deal to be said for Australia being present but I cannot see that the claims of New Zealand and South Africa are as great as those of countries like Brazil and the Netherlands[18] if they desire to participate. The United States reaction may be that it is apparently impossible to invite one Dominion without all four and therefore they had better in the future be careful about inviting any. Canada would suffer most from this attitude; not South Africa and New Zealand. I am not quite clear why the United Kingdom should be so embarrassed at the other three Dominions not being invited unless they feel that on political grounds it should be all or nothing in these matters. Is there anything I can do or should do to make the position clear here? Ends.

The State Department probably realizes that Canada has not been associated with the pressure to extend invitations to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, but in any case I see no reason for telling them so. We are agreeable either to conversations with the United States and the United Kingdom or to the inclusion of other British countries as proposed by the United Kingdom and of the Soviet Union and China as suggested by the United States.

The British proposed agenda covers all important subjects which should be discussed. We agree that no cut and dried plan should be submitted and our draft convention should not be so regarded; it is rather an attempt to present (as a basis for discussion) a considered statement of how certain principles could be embodied in a multilateral convention.

The British objection to our giving our draft convention to the United States appears to centre mainly in the definition in Article XIII of international air services which includes colonial lines. Please enquire informally whether these objections would be removed if we were to leave a blank after the word "means" in the first line of Article XIII(v)[b?] so as to offer no suggested definition of an international air service at the present time. If so, we would be prepared to do this before sending the draft convention to other governments. We believe it would be wise to give it to whatever governments it is finally decided will be represented at the conversations.

In conversation with the United States Ambassador this morning, he referred to the hitch that had occurred in the arrangements for tripartite talks on civil aviation questions between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. The United Kingdom was pressing very hard for similar invitations to be extended to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. Atherton said that he had urged his Government, very strongly, to invite Canada to take part in these talks at the same time and on the same footing as the United Kingdom because he felt that our interest in civil aviation questions was of primary importance. He hoped the State Department would stand by its guns and insist on talks between the three countries together, and not enlarge them to six countries, because this would turn them into a small conference and make the omission of other countries more obvious and more difficult. At the same time, he hoped they would not be driven back to substitute bilateral talks with the United Kingdom alone for the proposed three-cornered talks with Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom.

Dear Norman [Robertson],

I do not think that I made myself very clear in my teletype No. 1031 of February 21 regarding the British proposal that the other Dominions be invited to the forthcoming air talks. I agree, of course, with the point you make in your teletype No. 765 of February 23† that "it would be awkward if the suggestion could be made that Canada has objected in any way to the participation of other British countries."

All I had in mind was an informal approach to Berle or Hickerson to make sure that they understand that we are not pressing for such an invitation.[19] As you state, it may well be that the State Department realize that fact. Nevertheless, I think the British attitude on this matter has dangerous implications for the future. It certainly makes our functional idea of representation look rather silly and emphasizes the "unit" idea of British Commonwealth representation. If the United States agree to the British proposal for the inclusion of the other Dominions, they will probably have to insist that Brazil, the Netherlands, etc., also be invited. This is going to make them much more hesitant in the future about asking Canada to participate in any preliminary discussions. If the United States refuse the British suggestion, then the other Dominions are going to be much more annoyed than if the idea of representation at these talks had not been put in their minds by the United Kingdom.

I can see no reason for the United Kingdom attitude in this matter except their view that no one Dominion should be represented at talks of this kind. This seems to be an indefensible proposition. In this connection the Embassy here have already sent a third person note to the State Department, one paragraph of which reads:

"His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom feel that in view of the scope and level of the proposed discussions it would be appropriate that the Dominions other than Canada should also participate in them and assume that in the circumstances which have developed the United States Government will agree to extend an invitation to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa."

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM 359 Ottawa, February 24, 1944

MOST SECRET. Following for Ritchie from Wrong, Begins: Your letter January 27th,† P.H.P. paper on Civil Air Transport and Security Problems.† You will have noted that proposals in this paper are inconsistent with the recommendations made to Governments by the Commonwealth Civil Aviation Conference held in London in October last and with the Canadian proposals for an international air transport authority which were given to United Kingdom authorities by Canada House on February 8th.[20] Apart from this inconsistency we are also concerned by the assumptions on future Commonwealth defence which underlie this draft. It appears to presuppose a single defence policy for the entire Commonwealth with the United Kingdom and the other countries of the Commonwealth acting in effect as one Great Power.

2. Since this is a matter on which Canadian planning has reached the point of presenting tentative proposals to other Governments our representatives at the proposed meeting of the P.H.P. sub-committee are in a position to take a definite and critical line.

3. The Working Committee on post-hostilities problems has considered the draft and offers the following additional comments which you are at liberty to use as observations from the Working Committee here:

The effectiveness of an International Air Transport Authority, taking its directions on matters of security from an international security organization, would be largely nullified if important sections of the world's air routes were removed from its jurisdiction. It is essential to the working of such a system that it embrace most international air routes and most nations of importance in the air. The security organization should be able, both in time of peace and in time of war or threat of war, to control the use of certain routes or bases by particular nations. The forces at the disposal of the international security organization should have access in peace and in war to the main international air routes and air bases in accordance with decisions of the security organization.

Any such collective assurance of security would prove unworkable if participating nations reserved international routes for their own jurisdiction. For this reason, the Working Committee cannot agree that the trunk airlines of the Commonwealth and certain reserve strategic routes should be excluded from any system of international regulation. Insistence at this stage on such a provision would prejudice the chances of enlisting the support of other great air powers, particularly the United States, for an effective plan of international cooperation.

From the point of view of security, a system of genuine international control of international civil air transport offers more advantages than does any attempt on the part of nations individually to ensure their security by developing closed systems of air transport. In order to draw substantial benefits from a scheme of international control each nation must be prepared to make substantial contributions. One of those contributions is a willingness not to stipulate in advance any claims for the exclusive operation of particular air routes but to rely on the commonsense of the international body in recognizing reasonable claims. Ends.

Mr. Berle asked to see me this morning and discussed with me the situation created by the United Kingdom request to include the other Dominions in the forthcoming civil aviation discussions. He said that they had been unable to agree to this suggestion as they felt that if South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand were invited to participate, they would also have to invite other countries, such as Brazil, Mexico, The Netherlands, French National Committee, etc. They felt that the time had not yet come for general discussions of this kind. However, in an attempt to meet the British position, they had decided to withdraw the invitation for discussions between British, Canadians, and possibly the Russians and Chinese, and to have instead bilateral discussions. In the first instance, these would include U.S.-U.K., U.S.-Canada, U.S.-Soviet Russia (the Russians had not yet shown any inclination to participate in such discussions and the State Department were disinclined to press them), U.S.-China (China also had shown no eagerness to participate), and U.S.-Brazil (the invitation to Brazil would go off tomorrow). The results of these separate bilateral discussions would be communicated to the other participating Governments. Shortly after these discussions had concluded, the State Department would invite other countries to begin similar bilateral conversations, e.g., Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, The Netherlands, Mexico, and the French National Committee. The way would then be paved, they hoped, for a general United Nations conference later in the year, possibly, Mr. Berle added, in Ottawa.

2. Berle said that they had not yet received the reply of the British to their new invitation, but hoped to today or tomorrow. If London, in originally putting forward the claims of the other Dominions, desired to establish a commonwealth front on this subject, I should think they would be more unhappy about the new proposals than the earlier one. At the same time, I do not see how they can object to the United States issuing these invitations to bilateral talks. In any event the British invited this result, I think, by their earlier intervention.

3. Berle pointed out that if the British Commonwealth of Nations as such had wished to discuss aviation matters with the United States, such a meeting might have been possible, but only on the understanding that it was the British Commonwealth on the one hand and the United States on the other. He thought it would be quite impossible to have discussions with five separate British Commonwealth States without inviting other States.

4. I asked Berle when the bilateral talks would begin, and he thought in about a month. I also emphasized that we had received no indication of United States policy, and he again promised to send me something very shortly. In this connection I am sending you by separate teletype a memorandum from the State Department. This memorandum is not very helpful but I think that I shall be able to extract something better from them this week. Berle said that the British had told him that they had received a long document from Canada giving in detail Canadian policy. I replied that we had already given him a memorandum on this subject and would have nothing to add until we received something from them.

5. Afterwards I saw Hickerson, who showed me a message from their Ambassador in London reporting a conversation he had with "An official in Lord Beaverbrook's office," who had said bluntly that they had no intention of participating in aviation talks with the Americans to which Canada would be invited unless the other Dominions were also invited.

6. I mentioned to Hickerson that Berle had for the second time suggested Ottawa as a site for the eventual United Nations Conference, and I emphasized again that no such proposal should be made formally to us until we had had a chance to discuss it with them informally, as it was doubtful whether we would wish to have such a Conference at Ottawa and we did not wish to be confronted with an invitation which we would not be able to accept.

7. I also urged Hickerson to urge Berle to give us some information about United States policy; more particularly a copy of the Berle Committee report. Hickerson promised to do what he could about this and said he would try to get us the report this week, though he himself had not yet seen it. Ends.

War Committee yesterday considered your report of your most recent conversation with Berle on civil aviation. The Canadian position may be summed up as follows:

(a) We would have preferred exploratory discussions among a small number of countries as the most satisfactory method and we regard separate sets of bilateral talks as an unnecessarily complicated procedure capable of giving rise to misunderstandings. It is unfortunate that the United Kingdom's insistence on bringing in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa has brought the State Department to its present position, (of which, incidentally, Atherton has not yet been informed).

(b) However, since the State Department is committed to bilateral talks we believe it desirable to have the talks between Canada and the United States come first. If the United Kingdom-United States talks precede the Canadian-United States talks, there is some risk that the United Kingdom representatives might be tempted to try and speak for all the Commonwealth governments which took part in the London discussions.

You should therefore see Berle and, using your discretion as to how much of the foregoing it is necessary to give him, tell him that we are prepared to enter into discussions with the United States immediately. You should point out the special relationship that exists between Canada and the United States by virtue of the numerous international air routes connecting the two countries. More than in the case of most other countries these international routes are extensions of domestic routes and are closely linked with domestic systems of air transport. This community of interest makes it desirable that discussions should take place at an early date. You may also say that we have prepared a draft international convention and that in order to facilitate the early initiation of discussions we will be glad to give it to the United States as soon as we receive their preliminary views. Do not, however, give the draft to the State Department until you hear from us about an amendment that must be made.

We cannot, of course, insist on Canada-United States discussions coming first, but if you emphasize the importance of these discussions to both governments and the willingness of the Canadian government to enter into them as soon as possible this may have the desired result.

Reference previous correspondence on international aviation.

Please inform the United Kingdom of the following:

As the United Kingdom authorities know the United States has proposed a series of bilateral talks on aviation with Canada, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union and perhaps other governments. Although we would have preferred multilateral discussions we have agreed to the State Department's proposal and have indicated our willingness to begin bilateral talks at an early date.

The State Department have learned from London that we gave the United Kingdom a long document (the draft convention) representing our views and they have asked questions about it. In the circumstances we have felt that we could no longer withhold it. We have accordingly told the State Department that in order to facilitate the initiation of discussions we will give them our draft convention as soon as we receive their preliminary views. We will, however, delete the references to colonial air routes over which the United Kingdom authorities have expressed some concern.

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Your EX-894, March 2nd, civil aviation. I saw Berle this afternoon regarding forthcoming bilateral discussions and gave him the information contained in your teletype, with certain omissions.

Berle said that it was not possible to give me a specific assurance that the conversations with Canada would precede or be simultaneous with those with any other country, because they had not yet had any reply from London on the general principle of bilateral conversations. Therefore, it would seem premature at this time to go into details regarding the timing of such conversations.

He added, however, that he recognized the very special United States-Canadian relationship in this matter and could assure me that that would be taken into consideration in timing any talks that took place.

As it was difficult to draw him, I emphasized that we were anxious that the procedure for bilateral talks should be applied in such a way that there should be no wrong interpretation outside or misunderstanding inside any particular discussion as to the Canadian position. No one could speak for Canada in any bilateral discussion except representatives of the Canadian Government, and it would be unfortunate if United Kingdom-United States talks gave rise to any misunderstanding in this regard. Berle did not seem to think there was any danger of this happening.

Have London given you any indication of their views on these bilateral proposals? Is it not somewhat surprising that they have not sent you both the new United States proposals and their reaction to them? Ends.

MOST SECRET. Your telegram No. 349 of February 22nd, Air Transport Policy.

1. The various points have been discussed with the United Kingdom authorities and the following communication has now been received from the Dominions Office, Begins:

We have now had time to study the Canadian draft convention on civil air transport. If I may say so, it is a very valuable contribution to the study of the subject. We welcome the assurance that it is intended as a basis of discussion and not as a cut and dried plan. We appreciate the Canadian Government's offer to leave a blank after the word "means" in the first line of Article XIII(B), if the draft convention is sent to other Governments. Subject to this amendment, we do not wish to ask that the Canadian Government should further defer on our account the circulation of the draft convention to other Governments. We assume that, if it is so circulated, the Canadian Government will make it clear that it represents only their own views. There are some important points in which we fear that we could not agree with its provisions. We should be grateful if, in conveying the above to the Canadian authorities, you would ask them to inform us of their eventual decision, and if this is in favour of circulation, to let us have copies, as sent to other Governments. Ends.

2. The United Kingdom authorities were informed in the sense of your telegram No. 399 of March 2nd, and have no further comments except to make it clear that their exchanges with the State Department about the proposed talks have not dealt with our draft convention.

MOST SECRET London, March 11, 1944

Dear Mr. Wrong,

On receiving your telegram No. 359 of the 24th February containing the views of the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems on the P.H.P. Paper on Civil Air Transport and World Security Problems, I got in touch with Mr. Jebb and arranged for an informal meeting at which the views of our Working Committee could be discussed. Meanwhile, as the Post-Hostilities Planning Sub-Committee asked if they could have a preliminary summary of our comments before this meeting took place, I sent them a letter, of which I enclose a copy herewith,† and which was based on paragraph 3 of your telegram under reference.

2. I had an informal meeting with the Canadian Service representatives, Brigadier Booth of Canadian Military Headquarters, Lieut.-Commander Todd of the Canadian Navy Office, and Wing Commander Wright of the Royal Canadian Air Force Headquarters, to talk over our point of view before proceeding to the meeting of the Post-Hostilities Planning Sub-Committee. We found ourselves in agreement as to the terms in which our Working Committee's viewpoint might be expressed at the forthcoming meeting. This meeting took place on the 7th March.

3. I was invited by Major-General Grove-White, who was in the Chair, to give a general account of our Working Committee's views to supplement the letter which I had already written to Jebb. I pointed out that there were, it seemed to me, two fundamental differences between the assumptions on which the P.H.P. Paper had been written and the assumptions on which our own views were based. The P.H.P. Paper was based on the assumption that an International Security Organisation could not be expected, at any rate in the immediate post-war years, to work effectively. This was a negative approach. Our own view was based on the assumption that an International Security Organisation could and must be made to work. In the second place the P.H.P. Paper postulated a closed Imperial defence system whereas we were thinking in terms of an International Security Organisation.

4. I went on to expand the views expressed by our Working Committee along the lines of your telegram under reference, and pointed out that these views, although expressed in general terms, were not by any means academic, but were directly related to the security needs of Canada. I illustrated this point by describing our close relationship in defence matters with the United States.

5. Turning to the P.H.P. Paper itself, I pointed out the difficulty of reconciling paragraph 12 dealing with "contracting out" and paragraph 18, in particular Conclusions (c) and (g), with any workable scheme of international security. I said that we could not help feeling that any British delegation to an International Conference on Civil Aviation which was hampered by the rigid requirements of the P.H.P. Paper would not be able to make any proposals which would have much chance of appealing to the other great air powers.

6. I added that the views of the P.H.P. Paper were inconsistent with those contained in the Canadian proposals for an International Air Transport Authority which we had given to the United Kingdom authorities on February 8th, and that I also thought they would be found to be inconsistent with various declarations of United Kingdom policy. I drew the attention of the meeting to the brief report of the Law Committee which had considered the problem of internationalisation with particular reference to its bearing on Imperial security,and which met during the Civil Aviation conversations in London last October. I pointed out that that Committee (a report of whose conclusions, dated 12th October,† you have of course received) had taken a wider and more positive view of the role of an International Air Transport Authority responsible to a United Nations Security Organization.[24] I added finally that I had great difficulty in seeing how a World Security Organisation of the kind outlined in P.H.P. (43) 24a Final — The Military Aspect of any Post-War Security Organisation† — could be made to work if it was restricted by the Imperial security conditions laid down in this P.H.P. Paper. I concluded by saying that our Working Committee's views as I understood them were fully in favour of Commonwealth co-operation, but that that co-operation should be in the general framework of an International Security Organisation. At the conclusion of my remarks there was a general discussion, and I am enclosing a copy of a brief summary of the principal points emerging from this discussion which has been circulated by the Secretariat of the P.H.P. Sub-Committee.† The following are my own additional comments.

7. In the background of the discussion was the difference of conception between our Working Committee and the Post-Hostilities Sub-Committee as to the character of any International Security Organisation which might reasonably be expected to emerge after the war. It is a difference of view which I have encountered on several occasions in recent conversations with United Kingdom officials, and it was most clearly expressed on this occasion by Mr. le Rougetel, the Foreign Office representative, when he asked whether our conception of an International Security Organisation was a collective organization similar, with modifications, to the League of Nations, or a "pooling" of strength among the peace-loving nations to maintain security. He said, and other members of the Sub-Committee agreed, that their minds were working along the lines of a pooling of armed strength. They thought a collective organisation impracticable. Anything in the nature of an international force, for instance, seemed to them out of the question at present or in the near future. As General Grove-White expressed it, after the war it was likely that world security arrangements might be maintained by the victorious powers much in the same way as the war was being waged by them and without, I gathered, much additional international machinery. I said that I thought our view was in favour of a collective organisation in which all the United Nations would play a part and assume appropriate responsibilities. We fully saw the weakness of the old League of Nations and the necessity of building on more realistic foundations, but we did not contemplate being drawn along in the wake of an alliance between the great powers. The Sub-Committee said that their Paper P.H.P. (43) 24a Final was, so far as they knew, the first attempt to put the picture of a World Security Organisation on paper. They would very much like to have our views upon it and to examine any draft for such an organization drawn up by our Working Committee. They were also studying the closely-connected subject of "United Nations bases" and would like to have our views on this subject also.

8. Genuine misunderstanding has arisen owing to the very loose way in which the word "internationalisation" was used in the P.H.P. Paper. It now appears that they had employed the term as meaning "international operation" and not "control by an International Air Authority." This, of course, puts a somewhat different complexion on their paper. In particular I was assured that in Conclusion 18(c) of the P.H.P. Paper regarding the exclusion of Imperial trunk lines from any scheme of internationalisation the Sub-Committee had had in mind a scheme of international operation. They had no objection to international regulation of Imperial air lines. I said that I thought that we would agree that ownership and operation of such air lines by an international body would be impracticable, but that we felt that these main Imperial trunk lines should be subject to the jurisdiction and control of an International Air Authority.

9. Although the Sub-Committee explained that they did not wish to exclude Imperial air routes from "regulation" by an International Air Authority responsible to an International Security Organisation, it was apparent that they were somewhat dubious as to how such an arrangement would work out in practice, and behind their doubts it was not hard to discern a reluctance to entrust Imperial communications to the authority of any International Organisation.

10. General Grove-White and other members of the Committee raised the question as to what we meant precisely by "international control" of the main air routes, in the interests of world security.

11. Some general discussion followed as to the practicability of employing an International Air Authority as an instrument of an International Security Organisation outside the specific regions which would come under international operation. I explained our ideas on this subject along the lines of paragraph 10 of the Canadian memorandum on an International Air Transport Convention, and Article IX of our draft International Air Convention.[25]

See enclosure, Document 184 and Document 188.

12. The meeting has, I think, served a very useful purpose. A full discussion of this kind showed that the Sub-Committee themselves had certain doubts about their own Paper, and felt that they had erred on the side of "over insurance." They had, in drafting this Paper, evidently been thinking in terms of concrete Imperial defence problems, particularly in the Middle and Far East.

13. I think our discussion also clearly showed the need for the greatest possible precision of language in dealing with schemes for the future organisation of Civil Aviation in the interests of world security. Such terms as "internationalisation," "international control," "regulation," etc. need to be clearly defined and perhaps somewhat elaborated.

14. Meanwhile the P.H.P. Paper on Civil Air Transport and Security Problems in its final form (which you have now received) has, I understand, been approved by the Chiefs of Staff, but the Sub-Committee stated that as a result of our discussion they intended to communicate to the Chiefs of Staff a rider to the Paper which would take account of our Working Committee's views. They will send me a communication outlining the points included in this addendum, and it will then be possible to estimate more clearly what impression our views may have made upon the Sub-Committee.

15. Meanwhile the suggestions for facilitating the exchange of views between our Working Committee and the Sub-Committee here contained in your telegram No. 328 of the 19th February† have been communicated to Jebb, and I am informed that we may expect a reply in the near future.

Yours sincerely,

C. S. A. RITCHIE

FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION. MOST SECRET. My WA-1502, March 10th,† Civil Aviation Discussions.

Late this afternoon Berle sent for Wershof (in the absence of Pearson). Berle said that the British Embassy told him a few days ago that the United Kingdom Government would not (not) accept the proposal that the United States hold bilateral talks with a large number of countries as a preparation for a United Nations Conference. The British suggested as an alternative that a multilateral conference of 14 countries be held in North Africa or Morocco by way of preliminary to a full United Nations conference.

2. Berle said that he subsequently informed the British that the British proposal was not (not) acceptable. In the first place the United States did not like the idea of a 14-power multilateral meeting; such a gathering would create many difficulties. In any event, the United States felt that there must be preparatory talks on a small scale (i.e., bilateral talks) as a preparation for any kind of conference.

3. Berle continued that, after some discussion between himself and the British, it had been tentatively agreed that a very small United States delegation should go to London as soon as possible to hold bilateral conversations with the United Kingdom representatives. Before going to London,and en route to London, the United States representatives, if Canada agreed, would hold exploratory bilateral talks with Canadian Government representatives in Ottawa or in any other place that the Canadian Government thought suitable.

4. The United States delegation would probably consist of Berle and one man from the Civil Aeronautics Board. The State Department thought that the fact that such talks are being held in Canada and London should if possible be kept secret although, in view of recent events, Berle was not very hopeful that they would be kept completely secret.

5. Berle did not say whether it was the United States or the United Kingdom that first suggested that the United States delegation hold talks with Canada before going to London. He did say that the State Department felt that talks with Canada first would add to the value of the subsequent talks with the United Kingdom Government in London. Furthermore, in view of Canada's special position and the fact that Canada has for some time been ready for exploratory conversations, the State Department felt that there ought to be talks with Canada before the delegation went to London.

6. As for the proposed 14-power multilateral discussion, the United Kingdom would reserve the right to suggest it again and the State Department would at that time consider the suggestion on its merits, reserving the right to turn it down.

7. In reply to questions Berle said that, if this latest proposal for talks in Canada and London is definitely adopted, the State Department intended to tell the Soviet Union all about it and, if the Soviet so desired, bilateral talks would be arranged between the United States and them. A little later on (apparently after the London talks are finished) the State Department would contemplate arranging bilateral talks with other countries.

8. The United States representatives would be ready to leave in about 10 days.

9. Berle said that this latest proposal was not (not) what any of the three countries (United States, United Kingdom and Canada) had hoped to arrange but that the whole matter had got so mixed up that it seemed to be the best that it was now possible to arrange. The United States Government hoped very strongly that the Canadian Government would accept this latest proposal. He hoped also that we would give a reply very soon, in view of the desire to start the United States delegates on their way in ten days.

10. Berle was told that the proposal would be sent to Ottawa immediately and that a reply would be made as soon as possible, but that it was not (not) likely that a reply would be forthcoming tomorrow (Tuesday).

11. The British Embassy has not yet volunteered any information regarding the talks with Berle described above. We find one of Berle's statements puzzling, namely, his statement that the British have agreed to the latest proposal. There has been very little time for the numerous necessary telegrams to be exchanged between the British Embassy and the Foreign Office, as it was only last Thursday that the British Embassy first told Mr. Berle of the United Kingdom proposal for a 14-power conference. It is possible that what Berle really means is that the British Embassy has agreed to recommend to London acceptance of the latest scheme. If you think it wise, we could ask the British Embassy exactly what the position is in this regard.

IMMEDIATE. MOST SECRET. Your EX-1086, March 14th, aviation discussions. We asked the British Embassy if they could give us any information regarding developments since last Thursday afternoon (the position on Thursday last was reported in WA-1502 of March 10th).† British Embassy said that, at the end of last week, there was considerable discussion between the British Embassy and Berle regarding the proposals which had been made by the United Kingdom and the United States respectively. After some discussion, it was agreed that Berle should go to London to talk with United Kingdom representatives. He would hold exploratory discussions regarding international civil aviation and would also discuss the future procedure (i.e., what kind of conference should be held and when and where).

2. The basic proposal that Berle should go to London has been approved by the United Kingdom Government and by the President.

3. Berle would like to leave by air in about ten days but the question of the time of his visit is subject to approval from London.

4. The President is anxious to tell the Soviet Union immediately about the latest proposal but he will not do so until the U.K. Government have agreed to his doing so.

5. The British Embassy continued that Berle had suggested that he should talk with the Canadian Government about aviation en route to London. Berle vaguely said that, in order to help keep the whole thing quiet, he might suggest to the Canadian Government that these talks should be in New York rather than in Ottawa. Berle definitely did not (not) make any such suggestion when he spoke to us yesterday — see WA-1566 of March 13th. His proposal yesterday to us was that there should be talks with the Canadian Government in Ottawa or in any other place that the Canadian Government thought suitable. He said nothing to indicate that "the other place" might be outside of Canada.

6. The British Embassy added that the proposed Berle visit to London would be completely independent of the forthcoming visit to London of the Stettinius party.[26]

DESPATCH 78 Moscow, March 14, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your despatch No. 17 of January 28th, 1944,† enclosing for my confidential information two copies of a tentative and preliminary draft, dated January 8th, 1944, of an international air transport convention. In accordance with the instructions set forth in paragraph 3 of your despatch, I sent you telegram No. 70 of March 8th† acknowledging its receipt.

2. I have read over the proposed convention with great interest. It is exceedingly well drafted, the division into articles dealing with main headings

[26]Pour la visite de Stettinius et de son groupe, voir États-Unis,
On the visit of Stettinius and his party, see United States, Department of State Bulletin, Volume 10, April 29, 1944, p. 395.

sub-divided into sections could very well be taken as a model for future international conventions. It represents a constructive compromise between the complete internationalization of trans-frontier air traffic and the conditions which prevailed before the war. Section 1 of Article II definitely recognises that each state has complete exclusive sovereignty over the air space above its territory and the chief derogation of such sovereignty implied in the draft convention is the transfer to the International Air Transport Authority of the right to license air lines engaged in international traffic flying over the territory of a member state.

3. In view of this I believe that there is a greater chance of the Soviet Union agreeing to some such proposal than there was to the proposals for internationalization embodied in the secret report of September 28th, 1943, of the Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy.[27] In my letter to Mr. Robertson of January 27th, 1944,† I endeavoured to appraise the probable attitude of the Soviet Government to these proposals. I believe that the considerations set forth in that letter will influence the attitude of the Soviet Government to the proposals embodied in the latest draft convention approved by the Canadian authorities, but it will be more difficult for them to adopt a non-possumus attitude. They will be reluctant for strategic reasons to relinquish full control over the granting of rights to fly over their territory, but in the interests of international cooperation and of general security they may not wish to oppose the proposals too openly if they should receive the full support of the other principal states. They are more likely to insist upon the Soviet Union having voting strength equal or nearly equal to the United States in the Authority and in the regional councils concerned with flights to or across Soviet territory and if their wishes are not met in this respect, they may seek to escape from the obligations of the proposed convention on this ground. To a great extent the attitude of the Soviet Union will be influenced by the success attending efforts to promote international cooperation in other fields, particularly in the realm of general security, but there will probably be few subjects proposed for international cooperation which will so involve the relinquishment of pre-war sovereign rights as the international regulation of trans-frontier air traffic. On this account we may expect the Soviet Government to adopt a very reserved attitude and for the reasons set forth in my letter to Mr. Robertson of January 27th to be very zealous in safeguarding their rights of granting permission to foreign aircraft to fly over their territory and to make use of their airports.

4. Although it is desirable to make every effort to secure Soviet adherence to the proposed convention, if this proves to be impossible, it would still be worthwhile to proceed with the putting into effect of the convention without Soviet participation. The International Air Transport Authority or its North Pacific regional council could then negotiate with the Soviet Government for arrangements concerning flights over North-eastern Siberia as part of an air route from North America to Asia. Flights into Soviet territory from the West are likely to be confined to air services operating from countries contiguous to the Soviet Union, which would not be subject to the provisions of the proposed convention. It is very unlikely that there will be in the near future any demand for a trans-Atlantic air service with its terminus on Soviet territory. It is chiefly in respect of North-eastern Siberia, therefore, that the Soviet Union presents an interest for future international air routes. Canada much more than the Soviet Union is likely to be a future crossroads of the air.

SECRET Ottawa, March 18, 1944

Dear Mr. Wilgress,

It occurred to me that you might like to have a rather fuller account of the comings and goings with regard to international aviation than we have been able to send you by telegram.

In the meantime there has been a bad leak in the press in the United States which resulted in large parts of our draft convention being printed in American Aviation Daily, a trade paper. Although, of course, we have taken no official line on this, there is good reason to suppose that the leak occurred in the United Kingdom. The editor of the paper, Wayne Parrish, had just returned from a visit to the United Kingdom and was telling all his friends in the aviation business that Beaverbrook had taken him into his confidence. Since at the time of the leak we had given the text of the convention to the United Kingdom but not to the United States it is fairly clear that the blame cannot be laid on Washington's door step. Mr. Parrish also succeeded in embarrassing the British by printing their agenda for international discussions in extenso.

It was rather embarrassing to have our draft convention make its first public appearance in a United States publication and the only sensible course to follow was to make it a public document. Accordingly, Mr. Howe tabled it in the House and secured permission to have it printed in Hansard.[28] This puts us in the position of being the first country to announce a detailed plan for the postwar regulation of international aviation (the Australia-New Zealand agreement included their belief that international operation of the world's airways was the best solution but went into no detail). There are advantages and disadvantages to making our position public at the present time, the main disadvantage being that a particular plan is labelled Canadian which increases the difficulties of acceptance by other countries and may make it more difficult for the Canadian government to accept substantial revisions. However, it has been made clear that our proposal is tentative and preliminary and put forward as a basis of discussion so that I hope we can make it clear to the world that we have no cut and dried plans and are supporting the general objectives of our draft convention rather than the details.

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I am enclosing a copy of a letter† which I have received from Colonel le Mesurier of the Post-Hostilities Planning Sub-Committee.

Most of the points raised by Colonel le Mesurier were, I think, covered in my letter to you of the 11th March. Colonel le Mesurier touches, however, in the third paragraph of his letter, on one point which I did not mention. He refers to paragraph 17 of the P.H.P. Paper on "Civil Air Transport and Security Problems"† in which it is stated that "The operating agencies for any international zones that may be set up should be controlled by an international air transport authority. This in turn should be subordinated to the world security organisation envisaged in the Moscow Declaration."

I pointed out at the meeting on March 7th that this paragraph as it stood might be thought to imply that the control of the proposed world security organisation should be limited to the international operating agencies set up in specific zones. Colonel le Mesurier agrees that this paragraph was misleading and says that the Sub-Committee's view is that the world security organisation should have "certain powers" in relation to the international air transport organisation outside those zones as well as within them.

It is apparent from the last paragraph of Colonel le Mesurier's letter that the Post-Hostilities Sub-Committee are somewhat nervous about the effect that their paper on "Civil Air Transport and Security Problems" may have had in Ottawa. I am reassuring him that consideration of the Paper has been limited to our own Post-Hostilities Working Committee, but I should be grateful if you could authorise me to give Colonel le Mesurier the specific assurance for which he asks in the last paragraph of his letter.

I am sending you herewith a summary of the views of the technical group of the United States Government regarding post-war civil air transport. In giving this to me, Berle pointed out that, while he has no reason to believe that these views will not be approved on the highest political level, formal approval has not yet been given. The memorandum embodying these views is as follows. Memorandum Begins:

SUMMARY OF OBJECTIVES FAVORED BY THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA WITH RESPECT TO POST-WAR CIVIL AIR TRANSPORT

I. Air Navigation and Air Transport

1. Right of Transit and Non-Traffic Stop

Civil aircraft of one nation should be free to fly in transit across the territory of another nation, and to land for non-traffic reasons. Freedom of air transit should include the right of non-stop passage for scheduled airline services. Such rights would be subject to reasonable regulations, including those essential to national security, and would not affect the sovereignty of any nation.

2. Right of Commercial Air Entry

The establishment and operation of air carrier services including the right of commercial entry for transportation of passengers and property between points in two or more nations should be arranged by inter-Governmental agreement, except where a Government may permit its carriers to negotiate directly with a foreign Government.

Each nation obtaining rights of commercial air entry from another nation should be free to assign them to its air carriers without obtaining prior approval of the other nation. However, one nation obtaining rights of commercial air entry in another nation should assign them only to a company or companies which are and continue to be substantially owned and fully controlled by nationals of either or both of the two countries.

Specific points of entry and routes to be operated in connection with the rights of commercial air entry should be established by arrangements between the civil aeronautical authorities of the countries concerned.

3. Non Exclusivity of International Operating Rights

Each nation should agree not to grant exclusive commercial operating rights to air carriers of any single nation, or to seek such rights.

4. Application of Cabotage to Air Traffic

Each country reserves the right to limit the carriage of commercial air traffic between two points both of which are under its jurisdiction to aircraft of its own nationality.

5. Control of Rates and Competitive Practices

There should be an international arrangement under which aeronautical authorities of the countries concerned should consult with each other for the purpose of reaching mutual understandings with respect to problems or controversies arising in connection with rates and other competitive practices. For the time being, however, each country should preserve freedom of action.

Under the above procedure the countries concerned would also consult with each other regarding the frequency of operation over particular routes, with a view to avoiding wasteful competition. However, in principle every carrier authorized to serve a particular route should be permitted to operate as many schedules as may be justified to take care of existing traffic at economically sound tariff charges. If it is deemed necessary to limit frequencies, due consideration should also be given to the proportionate share of traffic originated by nationals of each country.

6. Curtailment of Subsidies and Exchange of Subsidy Data

For the purpose of making international aviation as self-supporting as possible, there should be a frank exchange of information between nations, on the basis of uniform reporting, as to the amounts of subsidies and other assistance extended by the respective Governments to their air carriers. The exchange of this information should be followed, wherever possible, by adjustment or regulation of rates, services, and competitive practices in an effort to develop efficient and non-subsidized operations. At the same time, it should be recognized that there will be certain routes where, for reasons of national policy, nations might be justified in subsidizing limited services.

7. Uniform Operating and Safety Standards

Steps should be taken by all nations to establish minimum and adequate standards for aircraft airworthiness, operation, and safety equipment. Air traffic rules, air traffic control procedures, and similar operating and safety regulations should be as uniform as possible, but each nation should be permitted to reserve the privilege of prescribing, on a non-discriminatory basis, special operating rules and procedures of local effect to be observed in the interest of safety by aircraft engaged in air transport operations in its territory.

8. Standardization or Coordination of Air Navigation Aids and Communications Facilities

Air navigation and communications procedures (applicable to both air and ground) should be standardized or coordinated as much as possible; this would not necessarily require complete standardization of the equipment used. This whole subject would be suitable for study and recommendation by any appropriate international body, but in the meantime the various international technical groups which have been discussing these matters should continue with their work in this field.

II. Airports and Facilities

1. Designation of Commercial Airports of Entry

Each country should designate such commercial airports of entry as may be necessary for the effective and efficient operation of international air services by such other countries as may have been granted rights of commercial entry or transit.

2. Use of Airports and Facilities on a Non-Discriminatory Basis

Each country should agree that the use of public airports, accessory facilities and technical assistance such as navigational aids, weather reporting and tele-communications are to be made available to civil aircraft of another country on the basis of national and most-favored-nation treatment.

Commercial aircraft of another country which have been granted rights of commercial air entry or transit should have equality of opportunity to obtain or provide necessary facilities for fueling, repair and maintenance.

3. Airports and Facilities in Isolated Areas

The interested countries should endeavour to conclude arrangements for the development and maintenance of necessary landing facilities in areas whose Governments are unwilling or unable to perform these functions.

III. International Collaboration

1. Establishment of an International Civil Aviation Commission and Definition of its Functions

There should be established an International Aviation Commission. The composition of this body, and the manner in which the various countries should be represented thereon, could be determined by an international conference or by an interim study committee. At the beginning, at least, the powers of this Commission might be limited to the following:

(a) The study of procedures, and practices relating to safety regulations, operating methods, airline accounting, dissemination of meteorological information, customs procedure, standardization of communications equipment and facilities and air navigation aids, use and availability of airports, etc.

(b) To collect complete information and make studies with respect to the operating statistics of all international air carriers, subsidies paid directly or indirectly by Governments to air carriers, rates charged by carriers, competitive practices, contracts and agreements entered into between carriers and between carriers and Governments, international regulations with respect to licensing of aircraft and aircraft operators, and in general all information of value or of interest to the various Governments concerned.

The results of the above-mentioned studies and information collected should be made freely and completely available to the Governments of all countries which are members of the International Body. The following additional powers might be delegated to this Commission if the consensus of opinion among the interested nations is in favor thereof:

(a) To recommend uniform simplified regulations where uniformity is practicable and unilateral action in other cases to correct abused or unsatisfactory conditions which have been disclosed to the Commission in the exercise of its functions as proposed above.

(b) To consider and decide questions affecting two or more nations when certified to the Commission by the parties concerned.

It is suggested that no further major powers be delegated to the Commission until after study and agreement by the nations primarily concerned.

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire
au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from First Secretary
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, March 25, 1944

Here are the long awaited United States views on post-war aviation in which you will find nothing new or startling. This is to say the least a conservatively drawn document.

The system favoured by the United States provides for freedom of innocent passage and freedom to land for non-traffic purposes. These will be general and universal and on the basis of these freedoms rights of commercial entry would be a matter of bilateral bargaining. Further, each nation would agree not to grant exclusive commercial operating rights to air carriers of any single nation, or to seek such rights.

The memorandum is vague as to what could or should be done under international arrangements. The following points are mentioned:

(a) There should be an international arrangement under which national aeronautical authorities should consult with each other on problems of rates and other competitive practices. Freedom of action, however, would be preserved by each country.

(b) The only approach to the question of limiting subsidies is a provision for exchanging information to be followed where possible by adjustment or regulation of rates, etc.

(c) Uniform traffic and safety standards are recognized as desirable, but each nation would be allowed to prescribe its own rules to a certain extent. The whole subject would be reserved for study "by any appropriate international body."

(d) An international civil aviation commission would have its initial powers limited to research. It might be allowed to make recommendations and to act as an appeal court dealing with questions certified to it by two or more nations.

The forthcoming talks will thus start off with comparatively little common ground. The best method of procedure might be for the Canadian representatives to begin by suggesting that the United States plan does not go very far in attempting to deal with the problems of international rivalries and cut-throat uneconomic competition, which we know from experience to be real dangers. We could then expound the advantages of international regulation and point out that an opportunity exists now to make a fresh start that may not occur again for a long time. At this stage of the discussions a number of specific problems would probably have emerged for consideration.

AIR TRANSPORT — U.S. STATEMENT OF VIEWS
(Teletype WA 1850 March 25th from Washington)

GENERAL COMMENT

1. The preliminary statement of U.S. views regarding air transport policy can scarcely be said to propose even a minimum of international regulation. Although a few loopholes are left open by which a measure of international regulation could be established, the general tenor of the document is in favor of air traffic completely unregulated in respect of services, frequencies, allocation of routes, rates, etc. Even in the field of technical and safety regulations, e.g., airworthiness, certification, the degree of international regulation that is proposed would not be great.

2. This policy would appear to be based upon the assumption that the U.S. because of its superior ability, greater strength (both actual and potential), and greater traffic offering, would be able to dominate the international air transport scene without any effective international regulation being required.

3. The Canadian position, on the other hand, has been that unbridled competition must result in international difficulties and that a cooperative system in which all nations great and small would be able to play a part equivalent to their ability and efficiency was preferable to a domination of the airways of the world by one or two great powers.

4. The main point which the U.S. wishes to have accepted internationally is the right of freedom of transit including the right to land for refuelling and servicing. This, of course, does not cover the right to take up or discharge passengers. It is, in fact, virtually the only major change from the prewar position which the U.S. is proposing. The powers which it is prepared to offer to an international air commission are limited only to the collection and exchange of information and even the marginal powers which are suggested at the end of the U.S. statement of policy would go no farther than allowing the international body to recommend uniformity in matters of procedure, e.g., safety regulations, accounting, customs practices, etc.

5. The universal acceptance of freedom of transit would involve the sacrifice by Canada of our strongest bargaining point. If we gave up control of the right of transit and, subsequently as is proposed in the U.S. memorandum, were compelled to rely on bilateral bargaining for the initiation of any international air services, we would have very little with which to bargain. Accordingly, the Canadian draft convention proposed that the right of transit should only be granted if in return certain equivalent benefits accompanied it. It is very likely that the U.S. will be the only nation pressing strongly for this right of transit and that most of the countries involved will be inclined to support the Canadian view that right of transit can be granted only if accompanied by certain equivalent concessions.

6. The Canadian proposals made the granting of freedom of transit contingent upon the following other steps:

1. The granting of certain freedoms of commercial outlet; that is, the right to carry traffic without having to bargain bilaterally with each government concerned;

2. The establishment of an international authority whose basic regulatory functions would be control, through licensing, of

(a) routes
(b) schedules
(c) frequencies
(d) rates.

7. It may not be possible to gain all these things. However, the future development of Canadian international air services would suffer if Canada gave the right of transit as suggested by the U.S. without getting any of the equivalent concessions referred to above. If the U.S. is not prepared to go beyond freedom of transit, then it is suggested that Canada would be in a better position without any of the freedoms since we would at least retain our control of transit and would have that as a bargaining point.

DETAILED COMMENT

Right of Transit

8. The U.S. memorandum proposes that freedom of transit would be subject to "reasonable regulations including those essential to national security" (paragraph 1). If it was left to each country to interpret "reasonable regulations" without any check whatsoever, each nation could apply regulations in a restrictive fashion as during the prewar period in Europe. This is a strong argument for the establishment of some regulatory body which could see that "reasonable regulations" were not excessive nor discriminatory.

9. In this connection, it is worth noting that the right of transit is the one point on which the U.S.S.R. is likely to be sticky. It is quite possible that freedom of transit would be more acceptable to the U.S.S.R. if an international regulatory body, in which it played a dominant part, were in existence than if no effective regulatory body existed.

Right of Commercial Air Entry

10. The second sentence, paragraph 2 of this section, is rather vaguely worded. Under it, the U.S. might assign rights in respect of a service granted to the U.S. government to a company owned in Canada; e.g., C.P.A. In theory, there is a possibility of a conflict here and the wording might be clarified.

Non-exclusivity

11. The U.S. proposal prevents discriminatory or preferential arrangements. This again is desirable but unless placed within a suitable international framework, would be of benefit chiefly to the U.S.

Application of Cabotage to Air Traffic

12. The U.S. proposals are in accord with the Canadian point of view.

Control of Rates and Competitive Practices

13. The U.S. proposals are vague. They suggest only consultation between countries concerned with respect to problems arising out of rates and competitive practices. There is no indication whether this is to be done by the establishment of regulatory machinery to be used only when difficulties arise or whether they would be willing to give the international commission, which they propose, any continuing responsibilities. Judging by the functions later allocated to the commission, the intention is merely to suggest procedure for consultation rather than to vest any continuing powers in the commission in this respect.

14. In the second paragraph of this section, the U.S. suggests that the number of schedules should be based upon traffic offering at economically sound rates but presumably would leave each nation to make its own decision according to these criteria. The Canadian proposal, on the other hand, would use the same criteria but would have them applied by a single authority. The last sentence of this section of the U.S. proposal opens a loophole for limitation of frequencies but does not indicate who would exercise the power of limitation.

Subsidies

15. The U.S. proposes merely an exchange of information regarding subsidies. In a vague fashion, it goes on to indicate that there should be some adjustment or regulation of rates and competitive practices but does not indicate how this regulation is to be worked out. On the basis of the machinery suggested in the U.S. document, it would apparently be left to each government to take such action as it saw fit in this connection.

Uniform Operating and Safety Standards

16. This is in accord with the Canadian proposal. The reservation entered in the last sentence, however, could be dangerous unless some international authority were established to see that they were not used to excess.

Standardization of Navigation Aids and Communications

17. This is generally in accordance with the Canadian scheme although again the U.S. would give the international body power only to study and make recommendations, but not to establish standards.

Designation of Airports of Entry

18. This is in accordance with the Canadian proposal.

Non-discriminatory Use of Airports

19. This is in general in accordance with the Canadian proposal although the first sentence in mentioning both national and most-favored-nation treatment opens up two possible methods of treatment. Completely equal rights of access would be preferable.

Airports and Facilities in Isolated Areas

20. This is in general in accordance with the Canadian proposal although our draft convention goes further in suggesting a specific procedure.

Establishment of an International Commission

21. The Commission would be limited to study of procedures and practices and collection and exchange of information. Within these limitations, it could cover the field of civil aviation broadly but it is doubtful whether it would be in any way effective as long as its functions were so proscribed.

22. The U.S. goes on to suggest that, if desirable, additional powers to recommend uniform simplified regulations be given to the commission in the exercise of its functions "as proposed above;" this would limit its recommendations since its functions as proposed above are to be limited to study of procedures and practices.

23. The U.S. proposal suggests a useful additional function which the Commission might perform; namely, that of arbitration where parties concerned agreed to such arbitration.

24. For broader comment on the proposed functions of this international Commission, see the first section of this memorandum.

TELETYPE WA-1894 Washington, March 27, 1944

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Your EX-1287, March 25,† civil aviation. Reid and Wershof offer the following comments on the U.S. document:

General.

1. The main interest of the discussions in Montreal will of course be the explanation of the United States representatives of their reasons for believing that their proposals will be effective in overcoming the two main evils of the pre-war system, uneconomic wasteful competition and international friction resulting from devious air diplomacy. The United States proposals will do away with the right which nations can now exercise in an anti-social fashion to prevent foreign aircraft from flying over their territory. They would do nothing to prevent the United States and other states from exercising in an anti-social fashion their right to prevent foreign aircraft from landing to take on and discharge passengers and cargo. Since the possible abuses of the second right are many and difficult to define, it would seem clear that consultation is not enough, but that an international authority would have to be set up with power to suspend the right of air transit to all aircraft of a state which, acting directly or through its airline companies, unreasonably exercises its rights or enters into a conspiracy in restraint of trade.

2. The Prime Minister and Mr. Howe have made it clear that Canada is willing to make a real contribution to world order in the field of international civil aviation.[29] It is difficult to see wherein the U.S. "summary of objectives" makes such a contribution. The U.S. would, in effect, preserve the existing system with the important change that transit rights should be granted multilaterally. As transit rights constitute the main thing Canada can give away (and are of comparatively small value to Canada when given by other countries) the U.S. scheme would be worse than the existing set-up so far as Canada is concerned, and it is hard to see that Canada would secure any counterbalancing advantages through strengthening of the world order.

3. The potential difficulties which face Canada under the pre-war system of the closed sky, if the relations between the U.S. and any of the major powers of Europe or Asia should become strained, are not lessened by the grant of freedom of air transit under a multilateral convention of the kind proposed by the U.S. If relations are strained between the U.S. and country X, the U.S.

may refuse commercial outlet to that country, which will then seek that right from Canada which will be under pressure from the U.S. to refuse in the interest of continental defence.

Section I, subsections 1 and 2.

4. As anticipated, the U.S. wants the right of commercial air transit granted multilaterally and unconditionally, leaving rights of commercial air outlet to bilateral negotiation or negotiation between small groups of nations. The subsections are badly worded and could mean something else but, in view of all the speeches made by U.S. officials, we think that the intent is as we have stated.

Section I, subsection 2.

5. The second paragraph of this subsection is ambiguous. It may mean that the government of country A, which has obtained an outlet in country B, may choose the airline to use it (subject to the nationality limitation). Or it may mean that the government of country A, once it has been granted an outlet in country B, should be able to assign it to more than one airline.

6. Also the second paragraph would enable the United States to grant rights to enter Canada to a United States airline company which was fully owned by the Canadian Pacific Railways or the Canadian Pacific Steamships Company.

7. What we think the United States means is that the United States should assign rights only to (a) United States companies substantially owned and fully controlled by United States nationals or (b) to a United States company substantially owned and fully controlled by United States or Canadian nationals subject in this latter case to the approval of the government of Canada. This would make it possible for T.C.A. and say North Western Airlines to establish a joint operating company to run from New York to Alaska.

Section I, subsection 3.

8. This non-exclusivity clause is badly framed. Under it a nation could, while adhering to the clause, grant exclusive rights to two other nations. France, for example, might grant exclusive rights to the United Kingdom and Iran. The United States might grant exclusive rights to the United Kingdom and France for commercial air entry into the United States for transatlantic operations and might thus freeze all other European countries out of the North Atlantic unless Canada were willing to grant them rights of commercial air entry. There is nothing in this clause which would prevent the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom and say France from entering into an agreement to monopolize the North Atlantic for their own services. This is evidence of the unrealistic character of the proposals made by the United States. We find it hard to believe that the European nations will consent to give up the bargaining strength which they now possess because of their right to refuse freedom of air transit, and get no adequate protection in return against discriminatory policies which might be practiced against them by illiberal governments in the countries which are the main source of international air traffic.

Section I, subsection 4.

9. It would be useful to discover the reasons which have led the United States to propose that Great Britain should be able to reserve lines to and between its colonies to United Kingdom aircraft.

Section I, subsection 5.

10. It would be useful to try to discover what the United States representatives consider would be the practical effect of this proposal on the assumption that the United States does not intend to freeze the smaller European countries out of the North Atlantic. It is suggesting that aeronautical authorities from the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, France, the Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland and Belgium would consult on rates and frequencies on the North Atlantic. All nations but one might agree on "sound tariff charges." One nation might stick out for a low uneconomic, highly subsidized rate structure and for operating luxurious, fast aircraft at frequent intervals in an effort to secure a virtual monopoly on the route and to drive the aircraft of other nations out of it. Should such an eventuality arise, how does the United States propose that the resulting bitter international controversies should be dealt with?

Section II, subsection 3.

11. This is a good example of the basic weakness of the U.S. plan, namely, the unwillingness to entrust an international body with real power. This subsection would mean that small groups of countries, probably big countries in most cases, would themselves arrange with a small or poor country to build air facilities in that country.

Dear Mr. Ritchie,

I have received your letter of March 23rd with which you enclosed a letter of March 3rd from Lieutenant Colonel Le Mesurier.[†] This further clarification of paragraph 17 of the P.H.P. paper on "Civil Air Transport and Security Problems" will be reported to the Working Committee. The paragraph was ambiguous and Colonel Le Mesurier's interpretation brings it more in line with our views on the subject.

As for the anxiety expressed by Colonel Le Mesurier in his last paragraph, you can assure him that the P.H.P. paper concerned has been considered only in the Working Committee. The Advisory Committee, which, as you know, includes the Chiefs of Staff, has not discussed the paper, although it is possible that the service members of the Working Committee may have brought the paper to the attention of their respective Chiefs of Staff. Our telegram No. 359 of February 24th was, as a matter of fact, approved by the Prime Minister. His approval, however, was sought not for the substance of the telegram but rather for the procedure, as we were anxious to secure his authority for establishing direct relations in this way between the Working Committee and the P.H.P. Sub-Committee. Unless there are special reasons for doing so, we would not submit further comments from the Working Committee to any higher authority for approval.

You might assure Colonel Le Mesurier that those persons in Ottawa who have seen the P.H.P. paper understand thoroughly the origin of the views it contains and do not attribute them to the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff or to the United Kingdom Government. We are, of course, conscious of this situation because of our own anxiety that the views we have expressed should be recognized as the views only of the Working Committee and not of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff or the Canadian Government. We consider the exchange of views on this lower level to be very useful, and we should be sorry to see the flow of papers from London interrupted by any fears of misinterpretation on our part.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Howe:

I thought last night a great deal over the meeting with our American friends.[30] The more I think of it, the more disturbed I am.

Without defending the Canadian plan, it is at least robust, courageous and fair, and they in their comments on it, after it had been in their hands for some time, in no way broke down a single principle, apart from one or two minor suggestions about certain drafting. They could not or did not advance a single basic objection and they paid at least lip service to it. Their objection was confined to one fact, "The temper of our Congress and people is not such as to permit us to go so far in committing power to an international Board." This means that in international matters of the greatest importance to the future peace of the world the United States is not prepared to submit the rights of the various nations on this subject to the arbitrament of an impartial tribunal, but must insist on themselves deciding on those rights and asking all others interested to rely on their fairness.

After thinking the matter over overnight and dictating certain observations, they proposed, as an attempted compliance with the principles of our plan, a trial period for eighteen months or two years with a temporary Authority which would collect information and make reports, but which would have no power. In the meantime, any nation, really only the United States, can put on all the frequencies on all the routes that it desires. Mr. Berle's halting and laboured explanations were certainly not convincing to me. I venture to suggest that if the services are put on and in existence at a time eighteen months or two years from six months from now, and the matter than comes up for decision, that it will be extremely unlikely that a solution which materially restricted their rights could be accomplished.

I am unable to visualize the stark realism of Mr. Stalin accepting a proposition that he should now give flying rights over and into his country in the hope that when the final conference took place two or two and a half years hence that the United States would then act in accordance with what it thought fair, but in the meantime filling his air with their planes. Canada may at that time have a difficult decision to make as to its going along with the United States or the Empire or Russia, and we lie between them. I am also wondering about Canadian reaction to our giving rights of transit and landing on an assumption of fair dealing two years hence. It may be true that we could then withdraw, but that would be much more difficult than now.

A perusal in this morning's paper of Mr. John MacCormac's article, previously prepared, rather indicates to me that our meeting of yesterday was, so far as they were concerned, rather cut and dried, as the article sets out what actually happened: "It is surmised that the tentative United States proposals now being discussed with Canada and Britain leave a little more leeway for agreement with those countries than Pogue's proposals, but the gap is still fairly wide." This is exactly what did happen, and the phrase "a little more leeway" seems exact.

What I am particularly disturbed about at the moment is what will be the implications of their report of our conversations. The phrases "saw no basic difficulty" and "would endeavour to meet their views" seem very inadequate and likely to cause misunderstanding.

Irrespective of what has happened, we prepared a plan entirely consistent with our London conversations and sent it to London. We still believe in that plan and are not varying from it. What we did say to the United States in effect was, that as they did not believe they could get our plan (which they referred to as excellent) adopted in their country, we would study their suggestions to see if a favourable rapprochement could be made.

If it can consistently be done, it seems to me that Mr. Massey should be told, for communication to the proper parties, what the exact position is.

I would further not like the idea to get around that this limp and anaemic suggestion is the product of a virile North American democracy, but that it is the product of the United States alone, and does not appeal in principle to Canada.

To me, the most regrettable feature is that it is symptomatic of a spirit which bodes ill for world peace.

Yours faithfully,

H. J. SYMINGTON

1. Many thanks for your letter of March 31† sending us a full report of the discussions in Montreal.[31] Max[32] and I will be glad to do a memorandum[33] for you indicating possible solutions to the problems listed in your letter.

2. Meanwhile there are two points I would like to make immediately:

(a) The Montreal discussions have, as you point out, emphasized the wisdom of our having put our views in the form of a detailed convention. In our own interests we want to try our utmost to have our convention continue to serve as the basis for international discussions. I think therefore that we should try, if possible, to put our reaction to the U.S. counterproposals in the form of amendments to our convention which we would be willing to consider accepting if the United States accepts the rest of it.[34] My guess is that this means that we should elaborate at some considerable length Sections 2 and 3 of Article XIV, the provisional article. We might go a very long way to meeting the U.S. views on the interim transitional period covered by this article, if this increased greatly the chance of the U.S. accepting the bulk of the rest of the convention.

(b) While it is essential to try as best we can to get the U.S. to agree to an enlightened convention, our aim, of course, is to get general international agreement to such a convention. Consequently we have to be careful in our drafting of amendments not to put them in such a way as to make it less likely that other nations will accept the general principles of the convention. It seems to me therefore that we should right away, if this has not already been done, try to get the reaction of the chief air powers to our convention — the U.S.S.R., France, the Netherlands, Brazil and China. Could we not ask our Ambassadors to those powers to discuss the convention with the Foreign Office concerned, and report by cable what they like most in the convention, and what they like least, and what changes in it would increase the likelihood of their accepting it.[35]

3. I hope that you will support the suggestion which I made to Macdonnell in my letter of April 1st,† that Mr. Howe issue a press statement this week[36] in an effort to remove misconceptions of our convention which appear to be current in this country. The more time the misconceptions have to spread, the more difficult it will be to catch up with them. Ends.

Rapport du secrétaire, la délégation aux conversations entre le Canada et les États-Unis sur le transport aérien

Report by Secretary, Delegation to the Canada-United States Air Conversations

SECRET Ottawa, April 4, 1944

1. An informal and exploratory exchange of views on international air transport policy took place between Canadian and U.S. representatives on March 29-30.

The U.S. representatives were Mr. A. A. Berle, Jr., U.S. Assistant Secretary of State, Dr. E. Warner of the Civil Aeronautics Board and Mr. Walstrom of the State Department. The Canadian representatives were the Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply, Mr. Norman Robertson, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. H. J. Symington, President, Trans-Canada Air Lines and Mr. J. R. Baldwin, Privy Council Office, Secretary.

2. The discussions demonstrated fully the usefulness of preparing and circulating a Canadian draft convention. The discussions centered around the objectives of the convention and the methods suggested for obtaining them with the result that the Canadian delegates found themselves in a stronger position than had been expected.

[35]Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I don't think we can keep the initiative as the scope of diplomatic discussions broadens without fouling our links with U.S. and U.K. The U.S. has initiated a programme of bilateral discussions beginning with us. I think we'd better wait until they get back from London and we learn where things stand before considering a second step. N. A. R[obertson].

[36]Aucune déclaration ne fut trouvée./No statement was located.

3. There was general agreement on a number of broad basic principles which may be summarized briefly as follows:

(a) A permanent international air authority should be established, which should be closely related with any general international security organization which may be set up but which should be able to stand alone if necessary. An attempt to work out the organization of this international air authority should be begun at once and its establishment need not wait upon plans for a general international security organization to take definite shape.

The leading air powers should play a predominant role in the authority but a place should be made for all nations wishing to participate.

(b) The authority should concern itself in the first instance with technical matters such as airworthiness, safety regulations, etc. (The U.S. representatives pointed out in this connection that special arrangements might have to be made in connection with radio communications in view of the present developments and consultations in respect of radar.) Before other regulatory functions over international air services were granted to the authority, the U.S. representatives thought agreement should be reached as to the general principles which would guide the authority in its exercise of these functions. (This was intended among other things to reassure U.S. opinion by defining clearly the criteria upon which the authority would act for example in respect of control of frequencies.)

(c) Any nation which wished to, should have the right to engage in international air transport. Negotiations for international air services should initially at least, take place between governments and each government should assume responsibility for its own air carriers.

(d) Discriminatory measures and preferential systems with regard to operation of air services or use of bases and ancillary facilities should not be permitted. Subsidies should be curtailed and, subject to certain exceptions made necessary by considerations of security, air services should be self-supporting.

(e) Any nation should be able to reserve carriage of its domestic traffic (cabotage) and the right to indicate international routes to be followed across its territory and airports of entry and departure to be used within its territory. Safeguards, however, would have to be added to prevent abuse.

(f) Nations should cooperate in the development of facilities required for air transit through remote and isolated areas. In general, where special assistance was required in the construction of bases and air facilities, financial responsibility should rest upon the governments of the users.

4. These principles were already covered in the Canadian draft convention. In explaining the convention, the Canadian representatives also clarified certain matters upon which the U.S. representatives had remained in doubt. The U.S.

representatives were informed that the freedoms described in Article II were to be universal and that it was not the intention to limit freedom of transit by the last phrase of the first sentence of Section 2 of that Article. It was also explained that in Article IV, Section 1, it was intended that the Assembly would select the governments to be represented on the Board and that each government selected would then designate its representative. It was also indicated that the control of frequencies and quotas suggested in the convention was to be based upon a regional allotment which would leave each country a measure of freedom in working out its routes within a region.

5. Differences of opinion arose with regard to the measure of control to be granted to the international authority. The U.S. suggested that a detailed scheme of international control was at this stage premature and that such control could scarcely be effectively exercised since there was not sufficient data available regarding international operations to make reasonable control feasible. Accordingly, the authority should in the initial stages be limited to the collection of information which might provide an effective basis for international control and regulation at a later stage if such control and regulation proved necessary. Meanwhile, the international authority might be limited to consultation with and recommendation to governments. The U.S. representatives laid considerable stress upon the political situation in the U.S. which might make it difficult to obtain approval there for an international body possessing a large degree of power. In particular, there would be a suspicion that any scheme would be based upon the desire of other countries to divide up the rich U.S. potential air traffic. It was for this reason that the U.S. representatives insisted that if any measure of control should be given to an authority, the criteria according to which the authority would exercise this control must be carefully defined in advance.

6. The U.S. representatives were not inclined to feel that chaos would result in the immediate postwar period should no restriction be placed upon the initiation of international air services. They pointed out that the necessity for economic operation would make undue expansion unlikely and that, for example, the U.S. authorities could be relied upon to supervise U.S. international air carriers effectively. Difficulties might arise from time to time but could be decided as they arose by consultation between the governments concerned.

7. They were also of the opinion that the framework adopted for international air services should allow room for competitive operations. With regard to the four freedoms they were, of course, anxious for a multilateral acceptance of freedoms 1 and 2. As regards commercial outlet, they were inclined to prefer bilateral agreements but felt that it might be possible to work towards acceptance of freedoms 3 and 4.

8. Concern was also expressed by U.S. representatives over the possibility lest, say, U.S. interests unable to get permission from their own authorities to establish certain international air services might set up carriers based in other countries for operation of those services.

9. The Canadian representatives pointed out the reasons which led the Canadian government to approve the draft convention. These need not be repeated here since they have already been covered in Mr. Howe's statement to Parliament on March 17th. It was emphasized, however, that serious difficulties would be likely to ensue if no control of international air services existed.

10. In setting up an international authority, it would not only be necessary to meet the requirements of the U.S. but to provide a system which would meet the legitimate needs of other United Nations. This would require that each should at least have the opportunity to operate or share in the operation of some international air services and that each should have some effective representation in any international control exercised.

11. Moreover, the attempt to work out a pattern for international air transport was important in terms of later efforts at international organization in other fields. The present time was more favorable for the establishment of an effective international authority than would be the case after the period of urgency has passed.

12. It was also pointed out that freedoms 1 and 2 which the U.S. was most anxious to obtain, would not be likely to be acceptable to a number of other nations unless linked with rights of commercial outlet and placed in a general framework of international cooperation and control.

13. After full discussion, the U.S. representatives put forward the following suggestions:

(1) Freedoms 1 and 2 should be accepted on a multilateral basis.

(2) A preliminary committee should be set up as soon as possible which would attempt to work out an initial allocation of routes and frequencies and outlets on a regional basis between the countries wishing to operate international air services. This preliminary allocation would take effect as soon as the military situation permitted the initiation of regular civil services. It was understood that the chief air powers would be on this preliminary committee. Countries would start on the basis of the initial allocation but would be free to increase or modify their frequencies at any time.

(3) This initial allocation would be brought to an air conference of the United Nations which would be asked to approve it for a transitional period, tentatively suggested as from 18 months to two years. (It was suggested that specific criteria for the initial allocation be agreed upon and that these might be based upon movement of passengers and mail by all forms of transportation to and from countries in the pre-war years, and by capacity for operation of services, as developed during the war, e.g., number of pilots, etc.)

(4) It would also be proposed to the air conference that an International Air Commission be set up, which during the same transitional period, would receive and collect reports, observe the operation of the provisional plan and report thereon at frequent intervals, and stimulate remedial action by the governments concerned in case of difficulties.

(5) This framework would be established by the adoption of a convention which would also include a statement of general principles covering such points as reservation of cabotage, curtailment of subsidies, the right of countries to pool operations or engage in joint operations, the right of equal access to airports and facilities (i.e. "exclusivity"), cooperation in the development of airports in isolated or backward areas, guarantees against discrimination, including the definition of prohibited areas and the development of customs regulations, etc.

(6) The conference would also assign to the Commission duties in respect of safety regulations, aids to navigation and other technical matters which appear to be of common interest.

(7) At the end of the transitional period, a further air conference would be held at which time the whole convention would come up for review along with the powers and duties of the Commission. On the basis of experience and data then at hand, the question of increasing the powers of the Commission would be reconsidered.

14. However, the reluctance of the U.S. representatives to grant effective regulatory power to an international body and their tendency to advance domestic political difficulties as a reason for refusing power to an international tribunal have very serious implications not merely for civil aviation but for the whole field of international organization.

15. The establishment of a general international security organization may make easier the achievement of working arrangements in specific fields. Nevertheless, the United States counter proposals, leaving as they do to each government the right to increase of its own accord its initial allocation of frequencies, would be likely to lead to undesirable results. The United States would probably be one of the few countries in a position to increase frequencies extensively and might embark upon a heavy programme of expansion. Once initiated, services are not likely to be dropped. Moreover, if it is not possible to grant power to an international authority now, it is much less likely this could be done at a later period.

16. There are a number of serious difficulties in the U.S. approach to the problem which must be examined, in particular to see if any effective measures of international control may be found which could apply to the proposed initial allocation of services and to any changes in frequencies during the transitional period.

227. DEA/72-MK-40

Mémorandum du bureau du Conseil privé
Memorandum by Privy Council Office

[Ottawa,] April 5, 1944

The basic problem involved is the acceptance by the United States of measures of control which would prevent unhealthy and chaotic conditions from developing during the transitional period.

Initial Allocation of Frequencies

Perhaps the easiest method of making an allocation would be by more or less arbitrary division without attempting to use any highly complicated system of measuring the number of frequencies to be given to each country. However, since the U.S. authorities are of the opinion that a detailed set of principles to govern allocation would be desirable, the following might be considered:

(a) In-going and out-coming passenger traffic in 1939;

(b) In-going and out-going mail in 1939;

(c) Number of miles flown by national commercial airlines, domestic and international, 1939;

(d) Number of nationals trained as air crew;

(e) Number of air bases of a standard suitable for designation as ports of entry of international trunk routes; (This may not be an acceptable standard to some of the lesser nations, particularly those in Europe, whose territory has been occupied.)

(f) Activities in the field of military air transport; (This would be of benefit chiefly to the U.S., the U.K. and possibly the U.S.S.R. Canada, however, would probably fare much better under it than the balance of the United Nations.)

Once information was available for each country concerned on the points listed above, the allocating committee would set routes and frequencies after consideration of the requests presented. It is open to question whether a weighted index should be drawn up on the basis of the information received, and applied rigidly in measuring each request; or whether because of the complications and inflexibilities in this procedure, the committee should act with a greater measure of freedom, it being understood that its decisions would be based in general upon the information supplied under the headings above and that in addition it would give reasonable consideration to security arguments which might be advanced by any government in connection with its requests.

The plan for an initial allocation might be more acceptable if it was understood that any country would have the right to operate at least one service on a basic minimum frequency (which might be set at either once weekly or once fortnightly) in any region defined by the exploratory committee and in which that country might be directly interested.

Control during the Transitional Period

The most important point of difference in the exploratory conversations was the desire of the U.S. representatives to avoid any measure of international control during the transitional period, and to allow each government to add its frequencies whenever it desired.

At the beginning of the transitional stage there should be a short period during which the initial allocations would be frozen. This period might run from four to six months. Otherwise certain countries would be likely from the very beginning of the period to increase their services and the initial allocation would be of little value. Following the period of freezing, certain general principles might be set down to cover any modification or extension of frequencies. Any nation wishing to initiate international services for the first time would be granted the basic minimum right to operate a service as mentioned above. Extensions of existing frequencies could be based upon either considerations of security or upon demonstration of traffic potential. If an addition to an existing frequency or the initiation of a completely new route should be proposed on security grounds, the proposals might be subject to the approval of the general international security organization.

If proposals were based on traffic reasons, there should be some criteria for measuring their desirability. If the addition of another frequency, (e.g. from 5 trips a week to 6 trips a week) on an existing route were intended, it might be understood that the new frequency would be initiated only if the existing service were running at an overall average of 60% to 70% capacity, (or whatever percentage might be accepted as a standard by the allocating committee). It should be noted that the adoption of any rules to govern increased frequencies would require as a corollary some agreement regarding rate structures since otherwise cut-throat competition would develop in order to win the traffic which would be the only means of obtaining increased frequencies.

The question of new services on new routes in any given region during the transitional period is more difficult. There would be little value in regulation of frequencies on existing routes unless there was also some measure of control over initiation of services on new routes. Otherwise expansionist elements could break down any working arrangements. It might be a partial solution to suggest that any new service should be based upon the traffic in the region concerned carried on the existing services of the country wishing to open the new service and a comparatively low standard might be set; e.g. operation at 50% of carrying capacity. On the other hand, this might not be satisfactory in instances where the criteria suggested would not be fair because the initiation of new services would tap new traffic. Under these conditions, it would appear that the country wishing to initiate a new route might be granted a frequency for a trial period which in no event would last after the end of the transitional period. It might be stipulated that the service would be withdrawn unless a given degree of economical operation was proven, again based on carrying capacity.

Commercial Outlets — Initial Allocation and Subsequent Changes

Presumably under the U.S. proposals, services operating under the initial allocation would have the advantages of the four freedoms and in addition, at the time of the allocations, intermediary countries on each route would declare whether they wished to grant full rights of commercial outlet. Thus the initial allocations would cover not only routes and frequencies but commercial outlet as well. Any subsequent changes involving additional commercial outlets could be made subject to the consent of the governments directly concerned, or to the consent of the international air authority, or to both. (The U.S. is likely to prefer only the consent of the governments concerned. This would not be contrary to the principles of the Canadian draft convention since at least freedoms three and four would be recognized.)

Changes in Routes

During the transitional period, changes in service on any route already established might be made subject either to the consent of the governments concerned, the international authority, or both. Here again, the U.S. is likely to prefer the first. Control or modification of routes is probably less important than control of new services and additional frequencies and if these latter points should be gained, then it might be feasible to allow modifications of route with the consent only of the governments concerned. For example, Canada might be operating a direct service to London with a frequency of five times weekly. The extension of the Canadian service to Paris might be made subject only to the consent of the Canadian and French governments as long as it was understood that this did not involve an additional number of Canadian frequencies within the North Atlantic region. It would, of course, be preferable if such extensions were subject to the approval of the authority.

Inter-regional Connections

One of the points raised by the U.S. representatives which requires clarification is the position under the Canadian plan of services entering or crossing more than one region. Under the Canadian convention, these would come directly under the jurisdiction of the International Board rather than Regional Councils. The U.S. in accordance with their general approach would apparently prefer to have the principles governing such services defined further in respect of frequency control.

A service entering or crossing more than one region might be considered as a service in each region in which it possessed any rights of commercial outlet. If, however, a regional service crossed the boundaries of that region and terminated in a port of entry within a second region, without travelling any distance into the second region, some special arrangements might be required. This could easily be covered under the Canadian convention by allowing the Council in the second region in question to pass on the right of entry.

The basic principle to be kept in mind, however, is that any service should be based in the country establishing it. Thus the U.S. might operate a service from New York to India; it should not be considered as a series of separate links but in applying the freedoms of the convention and the principles suggested above, it should always be considered as a New York to India service. Otherwise attempts might be made to apply these principles to, for example, a U.S. service operating between Paris and Turkey or between Turkey and India.

Use of General Principles during Transitional Period

Assuming that certain general principles are accepted which govern modifications of frequencies, routes and outlets during the transitional period, it remains to be decided who would apply these principles and supervise their relation to existing services. The U.S. would prefer that the international air authority should watch over the application of these principles but should merely have powers of recommendation to governments. The Canadian approach is that the authority should actually possess power to apply these principles and that governments should be compelled to act in accordance with the decisions of the authority. A half-way measure might be to leave the authority powers of recommendation only but have all governments bound under the convention to act in accordance with principles which would be spelled out in it.

Export Capital

U.S. representatives were somewhat concerned over the possibility of U.S. capital which had been unable to gain in the U.S. privileges for international air services moving to a foreign country and there establishing airlines which would seek the same international privileges. There could certainly be no objection to this as long as it was subject to the consent of the foreign government concerned and as long as the international air services set up did not operate back to the U.S. Or, taking a Canadian example, the Canadian government could scarcely prevent, under normal conditions, the C.P.A. from setting up an air carrier in Mexico as long as the Mexican government had approved such a step nor could it object if that air carrier sought international rights in other countries. Perhaps it should, however, be able to prevent that carrier from operating an international air service to Canada which if based in Canada would not have been approved by the Canadian government.

This problem might be met by allowing, in the Canadian convention, any government the right to refuse entry to an international air carrier controlled by domestic capital but based in another country.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION; PRELIMINARY DISCUSSIONS

11. THE SECRETARY submitted a report upon recent exploratory discussions in Montreal between Canadian and U.S. representatives. Copies of the report had been circulated.

(Privy Council Office memorandum, April 4, 1944 — C.W.C. document 748).

12. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS said that reports had been received from the U.K. government upon the subsequent conversations in London between U.K. and U.S. representatives, indicating that these discussions in London had followed somewhat similar lines and had been based, in part, upon the Canadian draft convention.

Soviet representatives were now going to Washington for bilateral conversations with the United States and, later, would probably go on to London for similar talks with the British. It might be desirable to invite them to visit Ottawa for an exchange of views on their way to Britain.

MOST SECRET Ottawa, April 17, 1944

Dear Mr. Ritchie,

Your letter of March 11th describing your discussions with the P.H.P. Sub-Committee on Civil Air Transport and Security Problems and your letter of March 23rd enclosing a memorandum of your conversation with Mr. Le Rougetel on this subject† have been reported to the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems — as you will have noted in the minutes of the meetings of March 16th† and March 30th.† On the whole the Working Committee felt considerably encouraged both by the consideration given to its views and by the interpretation offered of the meaning and purpose of the P.H.P. paper.

2. There are undoubtedly, however, substantial differences between the conception of the Sub-Committee and the Working Committee on the achievement of international security. We are anxious not to appear as irresponsible "amateurs" in advocating such proposals as the international control of intra-Commonwealth air lines, and we are by no means unaware of the real problems faced by the United Kingdom because of her responsibility for the security of the Colonial Empire. Our views are based, however, on the conviction that the Colonial Empire as well as ourselves can find security only within the framework of an international system. (This seems to us to be the lesson of the events of the past two years in South-East Asia.) Such an international system will be admittedly difficult to achieve, but there is no practicable alternative.

3. You have already received some indication of the Working Committee's views on the questions of international security to which you refer. In view of the statement by Mr. Le Rougetel that he did not think the United Kingdom was thinking in terms of a revived League of Nations, it may be asked what was meant by paragraph 2 of the notes given to Mr. Eden for his guidance at the Moscow Conference. In this paragraph, which you will find in Circular telegram D.770 of October 9th,† it is stated that the United Kingdom holds strongly "to a system of a League of Nations." Is it possible that Mr. Le Rougetel meant the League of Nations and not a League of Nations? Although the Working Committee has not considered international political organization it is assuming that there will be some form of World Council. As for the "pooling" of armed strength, the Working Committee's previous comments on the military organization are based on an acknowledgement of the fact that security must be maintained for some time at least by the "pooling" of strength among the "peace-loving nations" coupled with a desire to experiment with a "collective" or truly international force.

4. It would be desirable, as you suggest, that the term "internationalization" be defined carefully when it is applied to civil air transport. The Canadian Government as you know, has not proposed international operation of air lines, and we are pleased to learn that the P.H.P. Sub-Committee is not opposed to international regulation. It is the Canadian view, of course, that regulation implies a good deal more than agreement on safety devices.

You will no doubt be receiving further views from the Working Committee on these questions.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

Mémorandum du bureau du Conseil privé

SECRET Ottawa, April 18, 1944

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE, 1944
INTERNATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT[37]

Commonwealth Conversations, 1943

In May 1943, the U.K. suggested exploratory conversations in London among representatives of the members of the Commonwealth regarding international air transport policy. Canada, in return, proposed that the U.S. also be invited to participate. The U.K., however, held to its desire for preliminary Commonwealth conversations and after discussion during the Quebec Conference, Canadian representatives agreed to participate.

These conversations took place in London in October 1943. The paramount importance of security in any settlement of questions of international air transport policy was recognized at that time and a broad tentative outline of an international air transport authority was drawn up. A report on Commonwealth cooperation was also prepared. The Canadian representatives made it clear at that time that any measure of Commonwealth cooperation must be within the framework of a broader international organization, must be non-discriminatory and non-preferential, and should not be attempted until more definite plans for an international air authority had been laid.

It was understood, at that time, between U.K. and Canadian representatives that the next stage would be conversations between Lord Beaverbrook, Mr. Howe and U.S. representatives.

[37]Pour les discussions à la réunion des premiers ministres, voir le document 765.
For discussions at the Prime Ministers' meeting, see Document 765.

There was evident among some of the U.K. representatives, a strong desire for a Commonwealth system of air transport and a unified front. This became apparent in Lord Beaverbrook's idea that he and Mr. Howe would represent the London meeting in the proposed discussions with the U.S. The Canadian government subsequently made its position with regard to any closed system of Commonwealth cooperation quite clear again when it pointed out that Mr. Howe would in any such discussions represent only the Canadian government.

Canadian Draft Convention

The Canadian draft convention providing for the establishment of an international air transport authority was based directly upon the sub-committee report formulated during the London discussions. It was made public on March 17, 1944.

United States Position; Bilateral Talks

After the London meeting, further consultation took place with regard to the next step in international discussions. The U.S. came forward with a proposal for an exploratory meeting between representatives of Canada, the U.K. and the U.S., and possibly the U.S.S.R. and China. At this point, Australia found it necessary to claim that, if Canada was to be represented, Australia also should participate in the discussions. The U.K. supported the Australian proposals, suggesting to the U.S. that all the members of the Commonwealth be invited. This proposal was, of course, unacceptable since the U.S. had intended that the discussions be limited to the major air powers. A further U.K. suggestion that a United Nations conference of some 14 nations be held at once was greeted in Washington as premature.

As a result, the U.S. has embarked upon a series of bilateral exploratory conversations, a procedure less satisfactory from the Canadian point of view than the original idea of tripartite conversations. Those with Canada and the U.K. have already been completed; those with Russia are under way and it is likely that subsequent conversations with China, Brazil and possibly one or two others may follow. After this, if a sufficient basis of agreement appears to exist, a United Nations conference may be called. Mr. Berle has suggested that this might take place in the early autumn. Lord Beaverbrook has offered the opinion that it would be preferable to wait until after the U.S. presidential elections.

The U.S.S.R. aviation representatives now in Washington have been invited to visit both Ottawa and London for further bilateral conversations.

Canadian, U.S. Views

The chief difference of opinion between Canada and the U.S. is in respect of the extent of authority to be given to an international agency. The U.S. desires to obtain the right of transit; that is, the right to fly planes anywhere without requiring the specific permission of the governments concerned (Freedoms 1 and 2). Canada holds that this right should be granted only if sufficient regulatory powers were given to an international authority. This the U.S.

representatives were very reluctant to accept, frankly basing their objections in part upon political difficulties, and adding that if any control was given to an international body, specific criteria for its guidance should be set down.

U.K.-U.S. Talks

The U.K.-U.S. conversations followed a similar line with the U.K. representatives supporting the principles of the Canadian convention. The U.S. repeated its objections and eventually it was agreed that the sub-committee report upon which the Canadian convention was based, prepared during the Commonwealth conversations in October 1943, should be studied by the U.S. as a possible basis for the agenda for a United Nations conference.

This may be considered only moderately satisfactory progress. The U.S. have not lost their reluctance to grant any effective measure of control to an international authority. Apart from the question of the extent of Commonwealth cooperation in the air, which has not been raised recently, the Canadian and U.K. governments seem to be in general agreement upon the broad international approach which is desirable. There is no reason to believe that the other members of the Commonwealth are in disagreement with this approach although the joint Australia-New Zealand statement recommending the internationalization and international operation of main international air trunk routes[38] does go considerably beyond the Canadian approach. Canadian representatives are at present engaged upon an attempt to see if a set of general principles can be found to govern the exercise of control by an international authority which would be satisfactory to the U.S. government and would make an effective international authority more palatable to U.S. opinion.

Conclusion

1. The U.K. position with regard to Canadian and Australian representation in international discussions has serious implications. If the British attitude is to be that when one dominion is to be represented in international discussions the U.K. must support the claims of the others for like representation, this is bound to strengthen suspicions of a united Commonwealth front. This position is directly opposed to the Prime Minister's definition of the functional principle, and will certainly prove an impediment to full Canadian participation in international organizations.

2. There is always the likelihood that, at some stage, if the United Nations generally fail to achieve the necessary degree of cooperation and particularly if the U.K. are unable to bring about an adequate harmony between their own and U.S. policies in the broader sphere, the United Kingdom may well turn to the other members of the Commonwealth with strong propoasls for an Empire or Commonwealth system of air transport.

3. The U.K. and U.S. representatives have agreed that cabotage, that is domestic traffic, should be reserved to domestic airlines and that traffic between a parent country and its colonies shall be considered domestic traffic. This might have serious results for Canada if the U.K. should consider traffic between the U.K. and Newfoundland as cabotage traffic reserved only for U.K. airlines.

4. The Canadian and U.K. positions in respect of bases in Newfoundland are dealt with elsewhere but the inability to achieve satisfactory settlement with respect to Canadian rights (e.g. at Goose) may prejudice the strength of Canada's position in the whole field of international air transport.

Discussions between the United States and Chinese Governments on international aviation are taking place in Washington. The Chinese delegation is a small one and is headed by a Mr. Chang, who is an ex-minister of Communications in the Chinese Government. He has been in the United States for some time although not in an official position (he had been asked by the Generalissimo to make a study of postwar civil aviation problems) and it does not seem likely that he will be returning to China immediately his discussions with the United States Government are over.

I think it would be worth while to extend an invitation to the Chinese Embassy to have this delegation come to Ottawa when the Washington talks are finished. The views of China cannot command the same attention as those of the Soviet Union to whom we have already extended an invitation, but the Chinese position will be a factor of some importance in reaching an international agreement. An exploratory talk would therefore appear useful.

The Chinese Government have already expressed an interest in our draft convention through Roy Peers.[39] They requested and obtained copies of the draft convention and of Mr. Howe's speech of March 17, and the Chinese Embassy in Washington has told our Embassy that they would like to have an informal talk with a view to getting an oral explanation of some of the points.[40]

Dominions Office telegram Circular D. 973† contains various items of information about aviation, some of which we have already received from our own Embassy.

2. The most important of these is that the United States may be expected to approach the United Kingdom shortly for permission to operate airlines after the war in territory controlled by the United Kingdom. This is not surprising for when the Civil Aeronautics Board announced the routes which the United States would like to operate, it could be anticipated as probable that the State Department would want to open negotiations with other governments before long.

3. The Canadian Government will be faced with an important decision when approached by the United States Government. Our only hope of having anything like our draft convention accepted is to use transit rights across Canada as a bargaining card. Obviously if we grant permission for United States airlines to cross Canada on the way to Europe without reference to the general framework of postwar aviation, our bargaining position disappears. It is therefore essential that we should not consider representations from other governments for transit or landing rights except as part of a general settlement.

4. The United States Government can be expected to urge strongly that the difficulties of reaching a multilateral agreement will bring about a long delay and that United States airlines must not be subjected to such a delay when the whole thing could easily be fixed up in a friendly series of bilateral talks. Nevertheless, I think we should tell them if they approach us that the future of air transport is too important to be settled piecemeal in bilateral deals and that we are not prepared to enter into negotiations (except on purely Canada-United States and Canada-Alaska services) until the international conference is held.

5. We might inform the United Kingdom to this effect and ask whether they would be prepared to adopt the same position.[41]

Dear Dr. Liu:

We have observed with interest that discussions have been taking place in Washington between representatives of the Chinese and United States Governments on the subject of post-war international aviation. This, as you know, is a subject in which the Canadian Government is deeply interested, and on which an exchange of views between our two Governments might be mutually helpful. I have, therefore, been asked to enquire whether the Chinese Government would be agreeable to entering into informal and exploratory conversations with the Canadian Government at an early date.

It is possible that the Chinese delegation which has been participating in the discussions in Washington would be able to pay a visit to Ottawa at the conclusion of their discussions with the United States Government. It would give the Canadian Government great pleasure to receive the delegation, and I shall be glad to learn your Government's views on the subject.

Yours sincerely,

Chargé d'Affaires, Embassy in United States,

DESPATCH 1728 Washington, July 11, 1944

Sir:

In our teletype No. 4074, July 7,[†] we reported to you on what the Aviation Division of the State Department had told us about the progress of the bilateral talks which the United States is conducting on international air transport and on the probability that the Aviation Division now contemplates a continuation of the pre-war regime in the air under which transit and landing rights were secured by bilateral agreements. The Dominions Office has reported to you, (on information secured from Mr. Morgan, the chief of the Aviation Division), that in these talks a good deal of emphasis has been placed by the United States on their desire to secure transit and landing rights for United States airlines on the specific routes suggested by the Civil Aeronautics Board. The Dominions Office has also reported to you that the Aviation Division has indicated to the British Embassy that the United States may shortly approach the United Kingdom for permission for U.S. airlines to operate during the postwar period along these C.A.B. routes. Finally, we have reported to you the informal suggestion made by Mr. Pogue of the C.A.B. that Canada and the United States should make a bilateral air transport agreement without waiting for the conclusion of the international talks. Mr. Pogue did not suggest that such a bilateral agreement be confined to cross-border services between Canada and the United States.

2. It is too soon to say definitely what all this adds up to. It does, however, give me an uneasy feeling that the bilateral talks may be taking a turn which is not in the general interest.

3. It was to be expected that in the bilateral talks the United States would bring up its own programme for establishing United States airlines on international routes. This would help to make clear the kind of problem which an international air transport authority would have to deal with. It would also help the other countries to understand what the practical effect would be of the grant of certain freedoms of the air. It would be an entirely different thing, however, for the United States so to conduct the bilateral talks that they practically become preliminary conversations leading up to the conclusion of old-fashioned bilateral agreements on transit and landing rights. The line cannot be drawn precisely, but it does exist and it seems to me that the United States is in danger of overstepping it. I think that they will certainly overstep it if they should approach the United Kingdom government for permission for United States airlines to operate during the postwar period in United Kingdom controlled areas along the routes suggested by the Civil Aeronautics Board, or if they should approach the Canadian government to make an agreement which would cover not only cross-border services but also transit and landing rights for United States airlines crossing Canada en route to Europe or Asia.

4. The possibility thus exists that the practical result of the bilateral talks which the United States is conducting will not be to prepare the way for an enlightened multilateral convention to achieve the objectives set forth by Mr. Berle in London, but will be to prepare the way for the conclusion by the United States of bilateral agreements under which the United States will secure the transit and landing rights which it needs in order to establish United States airlines along the routes suggested by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

5. This would be a dangerous and an unforeseen outcome of our having acquiesced in the United States conducting these bilateral talks. Surely the assumption on which the nations of the Commonwealth have been proceeding is that, by a self-denying ordinance, no state would seek post-war air rights in other states until an international conference had been held to determine the kind of international regime in the air which would govern after the war. If the United States, prior to the holding of such a conference, acts on the assumption that the conference is going to fail and goes ahead with making preparations for concluding bilateral agreements then all the waters will be muddied. Every other nation with ambitions in international air transport will immediately start trying to get rights in as many foreign countries as possible. There may even be a scramble for preferential rights. A competitive struggle will break out between the chief air powers of the United Nations and, to borrow language which Dr. W. C. Clark has used in another connection, the driving force of national and commercial prestige, the instinct of self-preservation, the lack of any basis of confidence in the possibilities of organized international cooperation will more and more drive harassed and hard pressed governments to follow selfish, restrictive, unilateral or bilateral policies.

6. The tragedy of the situation will lie in the fact that this sort of development is not inevitable. It is, I think, possible to reconcile our general approach to the problem of international air transport with that of the United States. The main reason why the United States opposes an effective international air transport authority is that it is afraid that such an authority would make an inequitable allocation of frequencies on routes such as the North Atlantic and would then freeze that allocation. I think, however, that they could be persuaded that the initial allocation of frequencies is of minor importance and should not, therefore, constitute an insuperable obstacle to the conclusion of an effective international air transport convention provided that the convention contains a fair and equitable formula for increasing frequencies. The debate would then turn on the fairness and equity of the formula, and the United States Administration and Congress would have little or no reason to dispute the fairness and equity of the payload formula now being considered by our Air Transport Committee under which any state already operating on a given route should be allowed to increase its frequencies if operating with an average payload of more than 60 per cent of carrying capacity.

7. I, therefore, believe that an international air transport conference need not demonstrate a bankruptcy of statesmanship.

8. If this is so, the immediate problem is to try to prevent the waters from being muddied before that conference meets. I am not certain how that can best be done. The only suggestion which has so far occurred to me is that the powers of chief importance in air transport (i.e. those participating in the bilateral talks in Washington) should as soon as possible subscribe to a joint public declaration that they will not, prior to the holding of an international air transport conference, make any commitments to any other state on landing and transit rights or seek such commitments from any other state.

9. It should be easy to get a number of the states other than the United States to subscribe to this declaration, since, if the United States can get assurances before the international air transport conference meets that it will be able to get by bilateral agreements the transit and landing rights which it wants, it will be under no pressure at the conference to agree to the establishment of an effective international authority. It is, therefore, clearly in the interests of the nations which want an effective international authority to take whatever steps they can to preclude the possibility that the United States will come to the conference with bilateral agreements more or less sewn up.

10. There are two main difficulties in putting the proposal before the United States. The first is that they may interpret it as a reflection on their good faith. The second is that they may fear an adverse reaction in Congress where members may argue that the Administration has supinely agreed to refrain from doing anything to promote United States international airlines until foreign countries have given their consent. The first point might be met by saying that the long delay in the calling of the international conference makes the declaration necessary, the second by arguing that even without the declaration the United States cannot establish international air lines anywhere until foreign nations have given their consent.

11. Where Mr. Berle stands on all this I am not sure. Mr. Reid gained the impression from his last talk with him on June 19 (our despatch No. 1551 of June 20)[†] that Mr. Berle might almost welcome being forced by other countries into going at least half way to meeting our proposals. On the other hand, he would no doubt like to get the reputation of being able to persuade foreign countries to accede to the United States views.

12. The whole situation is, I am afraid, becoming confused and the confusion may well interfere with progress in this extremely important matter.

I have etc.

Memorandum from First Secretary
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] July 13, 1944

This despatch, No. 1728 of July 11, from Washington emphasizes at some length the danger which I mentioned in a memorandum several days ago[42] of the United States making bilateral deals with other countries on aviation. The remedy suggested in paragraph 8 is, I think, pretty effectively ruled out by the arguments in paragraph 9.

2. Because the main routes in which the Civil Aeronautics Board are interested require the consent of the United Kingdom or Canada or both, I think that those two Governments could put the international discussions back on the rails by quietly intimating to the State Department that they would not consider questions of landing and transit rights in advance of a general conference. I am therefore repeating my suggestion that we approach the United Kingdom and attempt to secure their concurrence in this approach to the problem in the interest of a workable general settlement.

3. Failing that, I think we could take advantage of our especially close relations with the United States and inform them frankly and confidentially that we would be disturbed if the approach to a settlement took the form of separate bilateral arrangements and that we felt that we must abstain from such discussions. By refusing to negotiate (on anything but cross-border services) we could do a good deal to slow up the proceedings though we might incur considerable criticism if we were the only holdouts. A combined approach with the United Kingdom and perhaps other governments would be better.

We have noted also the extent of United States plans for participation in international air services as shown by recent announcement of Civil Aeronautics Board regarding routes considered suitable for United States operators.

2. It seems to us that time has come when in pursuance of the preliminary discussions held during the Commonwealth meeting last October it would be profitable to make further progress with practical plans for air services connecting the various countries of the British Commonwealth. We suggest that this might most usefully be advanced by an informal Commonwealth meeting between experts on the official level to make definite recommendations for the consideration of the Governments. Topics which would require to be explored at such a meeting would be:

(1) Basis on which the members of the Commonwealth might participate in the organisation of such air services. In this connection we have seen with interest the provisional scheme drawn up by the Australian Director General of Civil Aviation and can ourselves put forward some tentative proposals.

(2) The routes to be followed.

(3) Matters subsidiary to the foregoing such as ground organisation, uniformity of equipment, etc.

3. We hope that you will feel able to agree in principle to this proposal and should be glad of earliest possible advice as to your views. Further consideration could then be given to place and time of meeting which we hope could take place in the near future. Ends.

Chargé d'Affaires, Embassy in United States, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Washington, July 28, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I attach a letter to you of today's date† reporting on a conversation which Reid had yesterday with Morgan, head of the Aviation Division of the State Department, on the general question of international air transport policy. In some respects this report is encouraging since it is clear that the Aviation Division realizes the danger of a competitive struggle taking place for transit and landing rights.

The State Department now seem to acknowledge that their bilateral talks were a mistake and that they have failed in these talks to find a common basis of agreement on international air transport policy. Since the United States has acknowledged its failure, it seems to me that it is now open to any other nation that so desires to try its hand at finding a general basis of agreement which would warrant the holding of a preliminary international conference. Moreover, the United States may mean by failure, failure to persuade other countries to agree to their proposals. I would think, therefore, that the way is now open to Canada to embark on bilateral discussions itself in an effort to discover what sort of amendments might be made in our draft convention in order to make it a satisfactory basis of discussion at a preliminary international conference of the eight powers or so principally concerned.

The Soviet representatives in Washington are now awaiting information from their government on Soviet policy on international air transport. It would be unfortunate if the Soviet Government were to commit itself on this after it has had discussions only with the United States. Would it not, therefore, be desirable to have Mr. Wilgress speak to the Soviet Government and to suggest to the United Kingdom that their Ambassador in Moscow should do likewise.

If, as a result of informal soundings of the nations principally concerned, we come to the conclusion that there is a reasonable chance of reaching agreement on the general principles which should govern international air transport after the war, then, in reply to the United States proposal that an eight-power meeting be held to discuss a tentative allocation of routes and frequencies, we could suggest that the meeting discuss not only this question, but also the question of the framing of an international air transport convention. It might at that time be useful to let the United States know the kind of amendments which our Air Transport Committee is thinking of making in our convention, and to find out how far they go to meet United States views.

Mr. Morgan did not list the eight powers which he considers to be those principally concerned in international air transport. I would think, however, that they would be the U.S.A., U.K., U.S.S.R., China, Canada, the Netherlands, France and Brazil. Another possibility would be Mexico.

Yours sincerely,

1. In my telegram of July 18th Circular D. 1036,† 1st paragraph, I mentioned possibility of discussion between Lord Beaverbrook and Mr. Berle at Washington. Lord Beaverbrook has now telegraphed that Mr. Berle has informed him that he would like to discuss:

(1) A bilateral agreement, and

(2) Proposed international authority and whether it should be given executive powers.

2. Lord Beaverbrook feels that it would be better for us not to discuss these controversial issues with the United States while Presidential election is pending. He proposes, therefore, to suggest to Mr. Berle that best course would be that the United States should invite all the United Nations to table plans for international air routes which each would wish to operate after the war. In this connection he would refer to the fact that the United States Civil Aeronautics Board have already published particulars of the routes in which the United States are interested. We assume that intention is that the Board would collate the plans when received in response to present proposal. Advantage of this suggestion would, in Lord Beaverbrook's opinion, be that preparation of such plans and the collation would avoid premature discussions while at the same time registering progress in preparations for the proposed international conference.

3. We will keep you informed of any developments at Washington but in the meantime should be grateful for your very early comments on the above. If this suggestion should materialise we should regard the conference on the official level suggested in my telegram Circular D. 1080 as in the nature of joint preparation between several Commonwealth Governments for the replies which they would make to the United States Government.

TELETYPE WA-4521 Washington, July 31, 1944

IMMEDIATE. International Civil Aviaton. We have received a note from the State Department dated July 29th reading as follows:

"The Secretary of State presents his compliments to the Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of Canada and refers to the Department's circular note of June 14th, 1944, transmitting a press statement of the Civil Aeronautics Board of this Government.[1] This statement listed the proposed international air routes which the Civil Aeronautics Board believes may be desirable for post-war operation by United States air carriers.

As mentioned previously, the establishment of these routes will be dependent on the consent of the various Governments through whose territory they would be operated. This will involve considerations of reciprocity in a number of cases, and in this connection the United States Government believes that a world pattern of routes can best be worked out if some of the interested countries will inform each other of their plans in this respect.

The United States Government, having already announced its own projected international air routes, would appreciate receiving any information which the Canadian Government can supply at this time concerning the latter's tentative plans (excluding services wholly between Canada-United States and Canada-Alaska) on this same subject. A similar inquiry is being addressed to certain other Governments which are also expected to operate international airlines on an important scale.

This Government hopes that such information can be made available promptly, and on a non-confidential basis with permission to transmit copies to the other Governments concerned. In this way a picture of the probable post-war international aviation network may take shape at an early date, thus permitting an intelligent discussion of the needs and requirements of each country and the rights which it can expect to receive from others."

INTERNATIONAL AVIATION — U.K. PROPOSALS
JULY, 1944

Circular D. 1082 of July 29th from the U.K. states that Mr. Berle would like to discuss with Lord Beaverbrook a bilateral U.K.-U.S. agreement and the position of the proposed international air authority in respect of executive powers. Lord Beaverbrook feels that discussion on these controversial matters should be held up pending the presidential election but suggests, as an alternative, that the U.S. invite all the United Nations to table plans for proposed international air routes.

In circular D. 1080 of July 28th the U.K. advanced a suggestion of a meeting at official level to make recommendatons for the consideration of Commonwealth governments regarding plans for air services within the Commonwealth.

The Canadian attitude, which would be conveyed to the U.K., should be generally as follows:

(1) While bilateral conversations may serve a useful purpose at present we are of the opinion that the conclusion of bilateral agreements at this stage would injure the chances of achieving a satisfactory multilateral agreement. The proposed United Nations conference on air transport matters should be proceeded with before nations embark upon a programme of bilateral bargaining. After an international conference it will be easier to see what should be left to bilateral arrangements, whereas if this order were reversed bilateral arrangements would probably injure the chances of achieving multilateral agreement.

(2) While there could be no particular objection to an invitation from the U.S. to other nations to table plans for postwar international air routes, this tabling should be with a view to consideration of the information by the international conference. The desirability of leaving collation of these plans to the U.S. Civil Aeronautics Board which the U.K. indicates in para. 2 of D. 1082, is questionable. This may not, however, be serious since presumably all plans will be made public and any nation will be free to embark upon its own collation.

(3) With regard to the U.K. proposals for discussion of Commonwealth services, if the intention is to prepare a closed Commonwealth scheme and reach definite agreement between the Commonwealth governments at once, I think the scheme is subject to the criticisms suggested above in respect of bilateral agreements.

The U.K. proposals are somewhat confusing in this respect. On the one hand they suggest preparation of a plan for Commonwealth air services and definite recommendations to be submitted to the Commonwealth governments concerned. On the other hand in circular D. 1082 they indicate that while the meeting would mark out routes, proposals would subsequently be advanced individually by the separate nations of the Commonwealth in response to the U.S. invitation for a tabling of proposed routes. This latter suggestion would seem to indicate that Commonwealth air services are to be broken up among members of the Commonwealth and that any plan for a single Commonwealth operating company has been dropped, for any proposal of such a single company would mean that each Commonwealth government when invited by the U.S. would come forward with the same scheme. Nothing would be more calculated to arouse suspicions of a closed Commonwealth front.

Canadian interests would best be served by, on the one hand, continuing to press for a satisfactory multilateral arrangement yet at the same time embarking upon bilateral discussions with the countries which are most likely to be directly concerned in Canadian international air services. In the discussions we would not only support a multilateral solution but would clear the way for any bilateral agreements which may become necessary. The nations concerned would be the U.K., U.S., U.S.S.R., China, Australia, New Zealand, Brazil and possiby France, Mexico and the Netherlands. The meeting proposed by the U.K. would provide an opportunity for exchange of views with the U.K., Australia and New Zealand. Subsequently discussions with other countries could be held.

There would be little point in completely refusing the U.K. invitation if, after a delay of some weeks or months, we are to accept it as happened in the case of the last U.K. invitation on this subject.[45] It would probably be better to agree now to participate but to stipulate definitely that the meeting would be informal and exploratory and that we will not commit ourselves at this stage to join a Commonwealth scheme since we feel that the exact role of Commonwealth air services may best be settled after a multilateral United Nations air conference or at least after the U.S. states her position. We might at the same time state that we propose to continue with a programme of bilateral discussion with other interested nations.

16. THE SECRETARY reported that the U.K. government had suggested that a meeting be held at the official level to make recommendatons for consideration by the various governments regarding plans for the establishment and operation of air services between nations of the Commonwealth.

The U.S. government had invited Canada, along with seven other governments principally concerned in air transport, to supply information regarding tentative plans for international air routes after the war. It was proposed that this information would provide the basis for an interim international conference to discuss a preliminary allocation of routes and frequencies.

The U.K. government might be asked to indicate more precisely the purposes of the proposed Commonwealth meeting and, at the same time, their attention might be drawn to the matter of the Goose Bay lease and the importance of settling it before initiating any further Commonwealth discussions.

18. THE WAR COMMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the U.S. government be informed that the Canadian government would forward to them and make public tentative plans for proposed international air routes as soon as such plans were ready;

(b) that the U.K. government be requested to indicate more specifically the purposes of the proposed Commonwealth meeting; and

First Secretary, Embassy in United States, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Washington, August 5, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson:

Mr. Berle asked me to call on him this morning in order to bring me up to date on the discussions on international air transport policy.

He said that when he had spoken to Mr. Howe last week, he had given too optimistic a forecast of what the Soviet attitude was likely to be, and he therefore wanted to correct it immediately. On August 1 he had received from the Soviet delegation to the international air talks a memorandum setting forth the views of the Soviet Government.[47] He regretted that he did not feel at liberty to give me a copy of this memorandum without securing the consent of the Soviet Government. He let me read it, however, and make notes on it.

The Soviet memorandum stated the views of the Soviet Government as follows:

(1) Transit carriage through the U.S.S.R. will be carried out by Soviet planes, and questions regarding the right of transit of goods and passengers will be regulated by special treaties and agreements between the U.S.S.R. and other interested countries.

(2) The Soviet delegation cannot yet give an answer to questions concerning the right of foreign aircraft to fly into the U.S.S.R. and to use aerodromes in the U.S.S.R.

(3) They consider that the main line between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. is the one from New York or Washington to Moscow, via the Azores, Algiers, Cairo and Teheran. They suggested that this might be operated either by a joint U.S.A.-U.S.S.R. company on a parity basis, or as a result of an agreement between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. on the coordination of the appropriate lines of each country. Under such an agreement United States aircraft and personnel would operate from New York or Washington to Cairo and return, and Soviet aircraft and personnel would operate from Moscow to Cairo and return. The necessary arrangements with intermediary states would be made as a result of bilateral agreements concluded by the U.S.A. with those intermediary states and by the U.S.S.R. with those intermediary states.

(4) The question of utilization of airports on a non-exclusive basis required further study by the U.S.S.R.

(5) They agreed to the reservation of the right of cabotage.

[47]Voir États-Unis:/See United States:
Foreign Relations of the United States, 1944, Volume II. Washington, U.S. Government Printing Office, 1967, pp. 518-9.

(6) The U.S.A would shortly receive, through diplomatic channels, a Soviet draft of a U.S.-U.S.S.R. agreement.

Mr. Berle said that unlike most Soviet documents, this memorandum has been badly drafted and is not entirely clear. From conversations with the Soviet representatives, since receiving the memorandum, he thought that the Soviet might not mean precisely what they had said in their first point. He thought that they might be willing to permit foreign aircraft to pass in transit over U.S.S.R. territory, though it looked as if they would insist on foreign aircraft taking on or discharging passengers only at points near the borders of the U.S.S.R.

Mr. Berle said that there were two statements which he wished to make about the Soviet proposals. The first was that the United States would not take these as the final word and would, in the course of their further discussions with the U.S.S.R. representatives, try to persuade the U.S.S.R. to be less unyielding. The second was that the United States did not consider that a refusal by the U.S.S.R. to agree to the operation of international airlines over their territory need prove an insuperable obstacle to other countries entering into an agreement. While it would be advantageous for international airlines to operate over the U.S.S.R., it was not essential that they should do so. Thus, United States airlines to the Far East could operate by way of the Aleutians and Japan.

Following this discussion of the Soviet memorandum, Mr. Berle outlined the procedure which the United States consider should now be followed in the international talks.

The United States had had discussions with the Netherlands on international air transport policy, and the Netherlands had informed them of the international routes they desire to operate. The United States will shortly be having discussions with the Belgians and with India. They felt that when these discussions had been held, no useful purpose would be served by having any further bilateral discussions since in any further discussions they would merely be going over old ground.

They hoped that the countries to which they had sent their note of July 29[48] would shortly be able to give them information on their tentative plans for establishment of international air routes. Such of those countries which replied, showing that they had more than a very limited interest in establishing international air routes would then be invited by the United States to take part in a very informal discussion in an effort to arrive at an informal agreement as to which countries were going to fly which routes. Though he had as yet no precise date in his mind, he thought it might be possible to have this discussion take place about the middle of September. It was then his hope than an international conference on international air transport would be held before the end of the year. He indicated that the date of the holding of this conference would be some time after the presidential election, perhaps at the beginning of December, and that it would be a conference of all the United and associated nations. This conference would discuss three problems. The first would be the general kind of international regime in the air which might be established. The second would be a discussion of routes and frequencies, and this discussion would be based on the informal agreement reached at the meeting in September. The third would be a discussion of technical problems.

I said that he must have considered whether it would not be wise, in order to avoid the danger of a competitive scramble for air rights, to postpone any negotiations for bilateral agreements on air rights until after the holding of the international conference, or if this was not possible, at least until after the holding of the September meeting. Mr. Berle said that he was worried about the possible bad effects of now entering into negotiations for bilateral agreements, but that he was more worried about the bad effects of the United States not entering into such negotiations immediately. He then spoke at some considerable length on the situation in the Mediterranean where B.O.A.C. was carrying fare-paying passengers and the United States Army Air Transport Command was not permitted to carry such passengers. He said that thousands of United States pilots, and other American citizens, knew about this, and that the whole story might blow up in the United States at any time. It was, therefore, necessary for the United States to adopt the course which was the lesser of two evils, and to go ahead right away with trying to secure air rights through the Mediterranean and to India. The only other rights which they were interested in securing as quickly as possible were rights to Stockholm. Any rights secured would, of course, be subject to whatever international air transport authority was set up. (This clearly, however, would not mean much if the authority set up has no effective powers.) I refrained from making any comments on Mr. Berle's exposition of the way in which the British were entrenching themselves on air routes in the Mediterranean. I said that, as he realized, our interest was merely in trying to ensure that the atmosphere in which the air transport discussions took place was as peaceful as possible. I knew that he must have considered a possible alternative to his proposals, namely, that by agreement between the states concerned, the air transport commands of the various countries should be permitted to carry fare-paying passengers, and thus provide necessary services in the period between the cessation of hostilities in Europe and the establishment of regular international air transport lines.

Mr. Berle said he had considered this possibility and that it was in many ways desirable. There would naturally, of course, be opposition from United States domestic airlines which would not like an extension of the activities of the semi-socialist United States Air Transport Command. (My feeling is that Mr. Berle himself would personally favour this alternative of permitting the Air Transport Commands to carry passengers, but that he feels that it has not as many domestic political advantages so far as the United States is concerned as an immediate attempt by the United States to secure air rights for its commercial airlines.)

Mr. Berle said that he had not given up hope of securing the general adherence of states other than the U.S.S.R. to an international air transport convention under which certain air rights would be accorded to all the signatory states. He described the position of the United States as intermediate between the Soviet and Canadian positions.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

TELEGRAM 134 Ottawa, August 10, 1944

1. In considering your suggestion of a Commonwealth meeting at the official level it would be helpful if we could have a more specific indication of what you think could be achieved additional to the discussions on Commonwealth routes which took place in October 1943. At that time the Minister of Munitions and Supply outlined in general terms the areas in which Canada contemplated operations.

2. We see disadvantages in attempting to work out at the present stage an integrated Commonwealth scheme for presentation to other nations. On the other hand, we agree that further conversations between the Commonwealth governments about the detailed working arrangements which will be required to operate particular routes will be needed regardless of whatever arrangements may be made for the control of international aviation. For example, Canada and the United Kingdom could profitably discuss the technical aspects of operations across the North Atlantic, and the outcome of these discussions would be useful whether international aviation is to be governed by a multilateral convention or by bilateral agreements.

3. However, we do not feel that discussions could lead to any conclusive results until the question of the Goose Bay lease has been settled satisfactorily. You will recall that we have not yet received a reply to our latest proposals which were given to your High Commissioner here over a month ago.[49]

4. In your telegram Circular D-1101 of August 4[†] you asked for our views on the latest United States proposal that our two governments as well as a number of others should make public the international air routes which they wish to fly. We see no objection to giving the United States our tentative plans for proposed international routes after we have had an opportunity to review them further and we intend to reply in this sense.

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from First Secretary to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa,] August 12, 1944

Here is a long letter from Washington[50] on aviation which covers a certain amount of ground already traversed in correspondence during the last month and puts forward a number of suggestions. The principal points are as follows:

1. We should not accept the Soviet memorandum as their last word. I agree, but unless the Soviet Government accepts our invitation to discuss the question we have no way of trying to persuade them to change their views. In any event, I am dubious whether they would pay a great deal of attention to any arguments advanced by Canada. They might listen more attentively to the United Kingdom.[51]

2. The Soviet Government might be willing to have Canada-U.S.S.R. lines via Alaska and via Iceland operated by joint Canadian-Soviet companies. Before taking any initiative along this line, we want to be a good deal more certain than we are at present of the advantages of operating Canadian lines over these expensive routes where traffic will be light.[52]

3. We might consider having three international conventions as follows:

(a) A limited convention with the U.S.S.R. to meet the narrow views of that country.

(b) A less limited convention with the United States to meet its somewhat less narrow views.

(c) A broad convention between the intelligent and progressive nations.

This strikes me as unworkable aside from the fact that a convention which did not include the United States would be a pretty worthless document apart from considerations of window dressing.

4. Six Canadian routes are proposed. As mentioned in 2 above, this requires more careful study than it has so far received.

5. We should propose that the State Department's contemplated September meeting (I shall be surprised if it is held before November at the earliest) consider not only routes, but also the general framework of postwar aviation. I agree with this and suggest that we take this step.

[50]Document 245.

[51]Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I agree.

[52]Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I agree.

6. We should propose to the United States:

(a) That the nations represented at the September meeting should refrain from making bilateral commitments before the December conference.[53]

(b) That the air transport companies[54] of the various nations (and presumably any other governmental services) should be permitted to carry passengers for hire. This, if accepted, should prevent some mix-ups and I think is worth trying.[55]

7. Our Chiefs of Mission should discuss our draft convention with the governments to which they are accredited and ask for suggested revisions. Mr. Reid suggests the omission of Argentina. I would also omit China (the talks will be in Ottawa), the Soviet Union (we can go no further than we have gone) and the United Kingdom (a special situation prevails there and in any event we have asked them for suggestions but have received no reply). Otherwise I see no drawbacks to the plan and it would serve to revive interest in our convention and perhaps attract some support.[56]

Summed up the proposals for action contained in this memorandum are as follows:

1. We should propose to the State Department that the September meeting consider a broader agenda than questions of routes and give preliminary consideration to the kind of system that should be constructed after the war.[57]

2. We should propose to the United States a self-denying ordinance on bilateral bargaining over routes coupled with permission for official government services to carry revenue loads.[58]

3. We should discuss our draft convention with certain other governments.

Would that prevent our proceeding with discussions with other Commonwealth Gov[ernmen]ts? If it would, I think we'd be precipitating a rather pointless row by pressing a point of view which other Commonwealth Gov[ernmen]ts would not accept for the sake of a possible 3 months deferment of bilateral negotiations.

TELEGRAM 119 London, August 21, 1944

Idea underlying our proposal for meeting of officials was not that they should try to work out an integrated Commonwealth scheme but rather to continue discussions of October, 1943, which outlined routes of major interest to British Commonwealth, and to reach some tentative conclusions between ourselves on practical operational arrangements. We are glad that you share our view that operations across north Atlantic could profitably be discussed between Canada and United Kingdom. We hope, however, that meeting of officials of all British Commonwealth countries might lead to recommendations for coordinating plans for different routes and for harmonising operations at points of contact. It was for those reasons that we suggested multilateral British Commonwealth discussions rather than a series of bilateral discussions, though proposed meeting should afford useful opportunity for discussions between individual delegations of matters which do not necessarily involve all members of British Commonwealth. Recommendations would, of course, be non-committal and subject to consideration by Governments. We hope that in light of these explanations you will feel able to agree to our proposal. New Zealand have agreed and South Africa has agreed in principle provided that a meeting with them, which had previously been envisaged for this autumn to discuss services within Africa, takes place as arranged.

2. We are not clear why agreement as to Goose Bay lease should, as suggested in your paragraph 3, be regarded as an essential preliminary to proposed meeting. We are sorry for delay which has occured in reply to proposals given to Mr. MacDonald on July 3rd, but consultation with a number of Departments has been necessary and conditions here, as you will appreciate, have been difficult. We hope, however, to be in a position to reply at an early date.

3. Your paragraph 4 noted. We should be interested to learn conclusions resulting from your further review.

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire[59]

Memorandum from First Secretary[59]
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa,] August 24, 1944

On August 3 Cabinet War Committee considered a suggestion of the United Kingdom Government that a conference of Commonwealth officials be held to make recommendations for consideration by their governments about air services between Commonwealth countries. War Committee agreed that the United Kingdom be requested to indicate more specifically the purposes of the proposed meeting and that they be informed at the same time that the Canadian Government would wish to have the Goose Bay lease settled at an early date before proceeding further in general discussions on air transport matters.

In reply the United Kingdom state that they do not aim at an integrated Commonwealth air scheme, but rather at continuing the discussions of October, 1943, which outlined the routes of major interest to the British Commonwealth and at reaching tentative conclusions on practical operational arrangements. In addition to an opportunity for bilateral discussions between members of the Commonwealth the United Kingdom hope that recommendations might be made for coordinating plans for different routes and for harmonizing operations at points of contact. All recommendations would be non-committal and subject to consideration by governments. New Zealand has agreed and South Africa has agreed in principle.

On the subject of Goose Bay the United Kingdom merely state that they are not clear why an agreement should be regarded as an essential preliminary to the proposed meeting.

A meeting to discuss operational arrangements and the harmonizing of operations at points of contact would prejudice no Canadian interest and might produce useful results. It has already been made clear to the United Kingdom that Canada sees disadvantages in working out an integrated Commonwealth scheme and this could perhaps be mentioned again if it is decided to accept the invitiation. On the question of Goose Bay it could be pointed out to the United Kingdom that a discussion of operational arrangements over the North Atlantic must inevitably be vague and inconclusive if the status of Goose Bay is undecided.

There is another current problem with respect to international aviation. The United States is anxious to conclude as rapidly as possible a series of bilateral agreements with other countries in order to obtain landing and transit rights. From the point of view of those who are hoping for a broad measure of agreement at an international convention this is a disturbing development. The staking out of claims by one or more nations and the conclusion of hard and fast agreements in advance of an international conference will prejudice the success of such a conference. Any hope of setting up an international authority with powers over routes, frequencies and rates would be seriously diminished if the conference had to take into account a series of bilateral commitments.

According to a telegram from the Dominions Office† the United Kingdom Government is inclined to share this view. In order to prepare for a conference which can discuss international aviation without being bound by intergovernmental agreements, the very thing that we are trying to avoid in the Canadian draft convention, it seems advisable to represent to the United States Government how prejudicial to the interests of international aviation a series of bilateral commitments could be. The suggestion could be made that until a conference is held all intergovernmental discussions should be on a tentative and exploratory basis and that no agreements be made. If at the same time we enlisted the support of the United Kingdom Government, which is very likely to be available, the chances of influencing the United States Government would be increased. In any event, if both the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments were to postpone the making of agreements on landing or transit rights until a conference had been held, it would limit the extent to which the United States could carry out its proposed policy.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION;
LONDON MEETING; U.S. POLICY

7. THE SECRETARY, referring to the decision taken at the meeting of August 3rd, reported that the U.K. government had explained that the proposed meeting was not intended to formulate an integrated Commonwealth agreement for international air services. It was intended rather to continue the discussions of October 1943, with a view to reaching tentative conclusions on practical operational arrangements for routes of major interest to the Commonwealth, and upon recommendations for co-ordinating plans for different routes and operations. The meeting would also afford an opportunity for discussion between individual delegates on matters of direct concern to them. U.K. officials did not consider agreement regarding the Goose Bay lease an essential preliminary to this meeting, but hoped to reply to Canadian proposals, in this matter, at an early date.

Further, the U.S. government had informed the U.K. government that it proposed to initiate bilateral negotiations with foreign countries immediately, to obtain landing and traffic rights for U.S. air lines, with a view to establishment of U.S. services as soon as facilities could be provided. These negotiations were to be on a non-exclusive basis, but would precede any international conference. The U.K. government were taking the position that such action should be deferred pending an international conference, which should take place at the earliest possible date.

Finally, the U.K. government had requested permission to initiate military air transport services from the United Kingdom across North America, by way of Montreal and San Francisco to the South Pacific, and also to the South Pacific by way of Montreal and the Caribbean area.

(Telegrams Nos. 119, Circ. D. 1224,† Circ. D. 1225† and 122[6?],† Dominions Office to External Affairs, August 21, 22 and 24, 1944).[60]

8. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS pointed out that the U.S. government's proposals to proceed with bilateral negotiations at this point would involve a virtual return to the pre-war situation, and would lessen the chances of achieving any satisfactory multilateral arrangement.

It might be possible to ease the situation by agreement that, as pressure of military traffic decreased, military transport services would be allowed to carry fare-paying passengers on a temporary basis.

9. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY felt that any proposal to allow U.K. and U.S. air transport services to carry fare-paying passengers extensively on military services would tend to make military transport an instrument of commercial air policy.

No objection should be raised to the U.K. request to operate military air transport services to the South Pacific, if the U.S. government granted similar permission and as long as no fare-paying traffic was carried.

Canada should accept the invitation to participate in Commonwealth conversations in London.

10. MR. ROBERTSON, referring to the U.K. comment on the Goose Bay lease, observed that this also had been discussed in the course of recent meetings with U.K. representatives regarding financial arrangements.[61]

11. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the U.S. government be informed of Canada's desire that a multilateral conference on air transport be held at the earliest possible date, before any of the nations concerned initiated bilateral negotiations;

(b) that the U.K. government's invitation to participate in Commonwealth conversations at the official level be accepted; and,

SECRET. Reference previous correspondence regarding the United States intention to make bilateral arrangements with other countries on transit and landing rights for civil airlines. You should approach the United States authorities on the following lines.[62]

2. We recognize the force of their arguments in favour of additional services in the immediate future and the necessity of improving civil air facilities as the war recedes and not delaying all action until hostilities have ceased.

3. Nevertheless, we feel strongly that to attempt to deal with this situation in the way proposed by the United States will seriously prejudice the chances of reaching a successful international settlement. There exists opportunity which may not soon recur of reaching a broad measure of international agreement on the future lines of development of international air transport. There is considerable support among governments for the view that an advance must be made beyond the restrictive type of air diplomacy which characterized the pre-war period.

4. It seems to us likely that a race to conclude bilateral agreements at the present stage would make it impossible for an international conference to play a constructive part. Individual rights, which might well be conflicting, would militate against the give and take which would be possible if governments came to a conference without commitments and in a sincere effort to reach a multilateral agreement in the interests of all. A return to the hard bargaining of the pre-war period with all its rivalries and animosities is not necessary. We are hopeful that the nations interested in air transport can deal with the subject on a more rational basis in the interests of improved communications and better international relations. We are confident that to fall back at this stage before any attempt at an international settlement has been made on a purely bilateral approach is to miss an opportunity to put international air transport on a new and sounder basis. We therefore favour the calling of an international

IMMEDIATE. Your EX-3663, September 1st, post-war civil aviation. I would like to point out that, so far as I can discover, the United States has not asked us to participate in any bilateral negotiations pending the group talks which they hope to hold in September and general United Nations Conference later. It is true that Berle seems to have asked the British, through Lord Beaverbrook, to discuss a bilateral agreement, but I cannot find any record of such a request to Canada. We did receive from the State Department on July 29th a specific request for any information which the Canadian Government could supply regarding post-war international air routes.[63] Your teletype referred to above does not mention this request, but emphasizes the undesirability of bilateral talks at this stage. When I see Berle tomorrow, he may well say that this point does not now arise, but what are we going to do about the information requested. Can I tell him that that information is coming shortly, and then

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in United States

TELETYPE EX-3745 Ottawa, September 7, 1944

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Your WA-5239 Civil Aviation. Our EX-3663 of September 1st was based upon Escott Reid's report of his conversation with Berle at beginning of August[64] and more particularly upon message forwarded to Lord Beaverbrook by Mr. Berle, text of which is as follows, Begins:

In many parts of the world it is now obvious that the war area is receding and civil needs are steadily reasserting themselves. The Pacific, of course, continues to be definitely an area of military operations, as does Europe with the exclusion of Portugal, Spain and most of Italy; but, in substance, war conditions no longer prevail in southern part of Western Hemisphere and civil needs are reasserting themselves in the western Mediterranean, North Africa and Middle East where civil life is becoming re-established as the war moves northward.

The highest considerations of humanity and common sense, as well as the inherent interest in re-establishing so far as possible normal commercial life, dictate extension of civil aviation to regions now open for such communications. The exclusion of Civil Aviation from those areas on war grounds becomes increasingly less justifiable, and on any other grounds wholly unjustifiable. The Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States alike hope for an International Conference to discuss all these matters; but it is realized that an International Conference, although completely successful and resulting in full agreement even on details, will not result in immediate creation of implementing machinery, so that a considerable time must elapse before result of such a Conference can be translated into actual air communications and service.

In view of this, the United States Government feels that an interim arrangement should be adopted immediately under and by which air lines can be established serving the principal centres of population, including Latin America. The securing of transit and landing rights by the United States and Great Britain for interim period, to and in centres to be served, is involved in this. The United States Government has already advised the British Government of routes and landing points which the former proposes to establish, and it is understood that the British Government will inform us of routes and landing points for which it is asking.

The Government of the United States likewise notes that, in substance, British Overseas Airways Corporation is doing this now, since it operates as a militarized service where convenient and as a commercial service whenever practicable, and is actually performing service of a fare-receiving common carrier in areas from which the war has actually receded, although on a priority basis. On the other hand, American air carrier service is an unconfirmed militarized service which neither divides fares nor performs any of the regular services of a common carrier. The disparity between these two arrangements is so great as to raise considerable difficulty here with real danger of considerable public reaction.

In handling interim arrangements, it is suggested that our two Governments keep each other fully informed as we have been doing heretofore; that diplomatic cooperation be maintained; and that no arrangements be made by which either party will try to effect exclusion of the other or foreclose the legitimate rights of any other country. The routes of transit and lading rights established for interim period would, of course, be subject to discussion at International Conference, perhaps separately from discussion of air navigation matters so that jurisdiction of that Conference shall not be foreclosed.

The rapid progress of the war in Europe, and especially the likelihood that there will be urgent necessity for air transport between North America and France before very long, makes the situation of immediate importance and calls for immediate action. Accordingly, it is hoped that Civil Air Transport Committee may see its way clear to agree with position of the United States Government in this matter.

We would appreciate a very speedy reply. Ends.

United Kingdom's Government's comment to us on this is as follows, Begins:

Both United Kingdom and United States are agreed that an International Conference should be held at earliest convenient date on basis agreed at talks held in London during April. If for domestic reasons United States find it difficult to hold a Conference in Washington at present, we shall understand their position and stand ready to call a Conference ourselves in London. Ends.

2. Canadian government had considered earlier the United States request for information regarding proposed Canadian international air routes and had agreed that this information would be forwarded and made public as soon as these plans, which are at present being prepared by Canadian officials, were ready.

3. The subsequent information regarding the United States intention to proceed with bilateral discussions, however, has changed the situation and authorities here are not clear regarding the advantages of supplying this information if the United States intends to pursue the course indicated in Mr. Berle's message to Lord Beaverbrook.

4. In these circumstances, you should, using your own discretion, discuss the whole matter informally with Mr. Berle, letting him know that we hold very strongly to the views expressed in the teletype EX-3663 of September 1st and pointing out that thus far we have only been authorized to supply information on proposed Canadian international air routes [upon] the assumption that the information would be intended for consideration at an international conference to be called at an early date and that no bilateral negotiations regarding international air services would be held in the meantime.

TELETYPE WA-5271 Washington, September 8, 1944

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. Your EX-3663, September 1st, civil aviation. I left with Berle this morning a memorandum† based on the above teletype. He told me that he thought he could at once remove some of our anxieties on this matter, because the various agencies of the United States Government concerned, including the State Department, had just agreed on a recommendation to the President that an International Aviation Conference should be convened at the earliest possible date; they hoped by the end of October. He could, of course, give me no assurance that the President would accept and implement this recommendation, but he was optimistic. They hoped to have a Presidential decision today or tomorrow. This Conference, to which invitations will be sent as soon as it is cleared with the President, would deal with three matters:

(1) The immediate and practical problem of establishing international air routes in those parts of the world where the war situation now made that possible. These arrangements would only be provisional and would have to be reviewed at a subsequent Conference. The important thing was to get airlines into operation now and by international agreement.

(2) Agreement on principles governing post-war international aviation.

(3) Agreement on technical questions. In answer to a question, Berle stated that if the general Conference could be held soon, there would probably be no necessity for the suggested preliminary discussions among the smaller group of Powers. This meeting, as you know, had been originally set for September.

It might be preferable, Mr. Berle thought, to have questions under (1) above referred at once to a Committee of the Conference which would in fact consist of those Powers which had plans already prepared for the immediate operation of international air routes and would have attended the September meeting. Such a Committee might in fact become a continuing Commission, reviewing developments, making recommendations, and preparing the way for a subsequent Conference, when the provisional arrangements of 1944 might be made more permanent. For the above reasons, it would be particularly useful if the 14 or 15 Powers who would have been invited to Washington in September, could formulate and, if possible, send to Washington the information already requested as to their plans for international air routes.

Berle stated that the proposed Conference would probably have to include neutrals, some of whom would be most important to its success. He was thinking particularly of Sweden, Portugal and Turkey, possibly also Switzerland. I asked whether they would also invite the Argentine, as it might be very difficult to include some neutrals and exclude others. He said that fortunately the Argentine was not important in these matters and, therefore, need not be invited. As far as aviation was concerned, she was merely "a dagger pointed at the heart of Antarctica."

Berle went on then to assure me that they had no desire, and never had had a desire, to precipitate a race for post-war advantages and would do nothing to prejudice the success of the forthcoming Conference. However, they had no intention of refraining from any bilateral conversations which they considered necessary and desirable. He was quite emphatic about this and added that, as far as he could ascertain, United Kingdom policy in this matter was based more on "cut and thrust" than on the "give and take" of our memorandum. He was very critical of the actions of B.O.A.C. and of the United Kingdom encouragement of those actions which enabled them, under the guise of wartime arrangements, to strengthen their future commercial position. He spoke about the British already instituting services to Rome and Marseilles. He said that it would be unpardonable if, in the circumstances, the Americans did not look after their own interests in these matters, when the American air contribution to the liberation of Europe was so tremendous. I made the obvious comment that if they were worried about the B.O.A.C. set-up, why didn't they counter with a U.S.A.C. No one could possibly object to them putting themselves in the same position as the British. He merely replied that they might have to come to this, and certainly Pan American were pressing them in that direction. There is no doubt that, whether justified or not, Berle feels that the United Kingdom Government are aggressively and intelligently exploiting the situation. He feels that while legally they may always be on safe ground, practically they are taking advantage of the situation to the detriment of the United States. There was some indication that he felt that once again the wily Britishers were tricking them. Berle also gave me the impression that he thought that our memorandum was merely an extension of arguments already put to them by the United Kingdom and probably prompted by the United Kingdom. I told him that our position in this matter had nothing to do with the position taken by any other country, but represented our own independent and sincere views. Berle concluded by telling me that I was the first outsider to have received any information concerning their proposal for an early Conference, and he pointed out again that naturally the carrying out of these plans depended on Presidential approval. He would let me know as soon as that approval had been received. At no time in our conversation did Berle mention the possibility of bilateral talks between the United States and Canada or his previous request for information on our post-war plans. I did not bring up either of these questions.

L'ambassadeur des États-Unis
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Ambassador of United States
to Secretary of State for External Affairs

No. 209 Ottawa, September 12, 1944

Sir:

I have the honor to inform you that the Government of the United States has concluded bilateral exploratory conversations with a number of other governments which have displayed a special interest on the subject of postwar civil aviation, with particular emphasis on the development of international air transport. These discussions have indicated a substantial measure of agreement on such topics as the right of transit and non-traffic stops, the non-exclusivity of international co-operating rights, the application of cabotage to air traffic, the control of rates and competitive practices, the gradual curtailment of subsidies, the need for uniform operating and safety standards and the standardization or coordination of air navigation aids and communications facilities, the use of airports and facilities on a nondiscriminatory basis, and the operation of airports and facilities in certain areas.

It was also generally conceded that international collaboration, probably by means of an international aeronautical body would be desirable in achieving and implementing the aforementioned objectives, although there was some diversity of opinion as to the extent of regulatory powers on economic matters which should be delegated to this international body. The approaching defeat of Germany and the consequent liberation of great parts of Europe and Africa from military interruption of traffic sets up the urgent need for establishing an international civil air service pattern on a provisional basis, at least so that all important trade and population areas of the world may obtain the benefits of air transportation as soon as possible, and so that the restorative processes of prompt communication may be available to assist in returning great areas to processes [sic] of peace.

The Government of the United States believes that an international civil aviation conference might profitably be convened within the near future for the purpose of agreeing on an increase in existing services, and on the early establishment of international air routes and services for operation in and to areas now freed from danger of military interruption, such arrangements to continue during a transitional period. This conference might also agree, so far as possible, upon the principles of a permanent international structure of civil aviation and air transport, and might set up appropriate interim committees to prepare definitive proposals. Definitive action on such proposals, based on practical experience gained during the interim period, might be taken either as a result of later conference or by direct approval of the governments without the necessity of conference.

The government of the United States suggests that the international conference proposed for the immediate future could have the following objectives:

I (A) The establishment of provisional world route arrangements by general agreement to be reached at the conference. These arrangements would form the basis for the prompt establishment for international air transport services by the appropriate countries.

(B) The countries participating in the conference would also be asked to agree to grant the landing and transit rights necessary for establishing the provisional route arrangements, and air services referred to above.

(It would be highly desirable if each delegation were sufficiently familiar with its country's plans for international air services to permit formulation of an international air transport pattern referred to in paragraphs (A) and (B) above.)

II. The establishment of an interim council to act as the clearing house and advisory agency during the transitional period. It would receive and consider recommendations from each of the working committees referred to in item III. It would report upon desirable revisions in routes and services during the interim period, subject to the approval of the countries served by these routes and services. It would maintain liaison with each of the participating countries. It would supervise studies and submit information to the interested governments concerning the development of air transport during the transitional period, and would make recommendations to be considered at any subsequent international conference.

III. Agreement upon the principles to be followed in setting up a permanent international aeronautical body and a multilateral aviation convention dealing with the fields of air transport, air navigation and aviation technical subjects, and for the purpose of developing the details and making proposals for carrying into effect the principles so agreed. The establishment of the following working committees which would be under the supervision of the interim council:

(A) A committee to follow developments relating to the establishment of the routes and services to be established under item I, to correlate traffic data, to study related problems, and to recommend desirable revisions in routes and services. This committee would also make studies and recommendations concerning the future pattern of these routes and services.

(B) A central technical committee with subordinate committees which would work closely with the committee described in subparagraph (C) below to consider the whole field of technical matters, including standards, procedures and minimum requirements, and to make recommendations for their application and adoption at the earliest practicable time.

(C) A committee to draft a proposal with respect to the constitution of a permanent international aeronautical body and a new multilateral aviation convention.

Having in mind the foregoing considerations as a basis for discussion, the Government of the United States extends a cordial invitation to the Canadian Government to participate in an international conference along the above lines to take place in the United States beginning November 1, 1944, and in view of the time element would appreciate receiving an early response as to whether the Canadian Government can arrange to have a delegation at such conference.

This invitation is being extended to the following governments and authorities:

(A) All members of the United Nations.

(B) Nations associated with the United Nations in this war.

(C) The European and Asiatic neutral nations, in view of their close relationship to the expansion of air transport which may be expected along with the liberation of Europe. The Danish Minister and Thai Minister in Washington will be invited to attend in their personal capacities.

Accept etc.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION; PROPOSED MEETINGS, LONDON AND WASHINGTON

22. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY, referring to the discussion at the meeting of August 31st, reported that Canada had been invited by the United States to participate in a conference of the United and Associated Nations on November 1st next.

This was a highly satisfactory step in the direction desired by the Canadian government, and the invitation should be accepted promptly.

It would still, however, be desirable to discuss specific routes with other members of the Commonwealth as the nations most directly interested in the air services which Canada might propose to operate.

23. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS suggested that an announcement of Commonwealth discussions on international civil aviation, at this stage, might create the impression that the members of the Commonwealth were seeking to agree upon a common policy, prior to participation in the broader international conference.

24. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that it be suggested to the United Kingdom that the proposed Commonwealth discussions take place at the same time as the international conference called by the United States

SECRET. My telegram 28th July, Circular D. 1080, and your reply,[65] Civil Aviation.

There is general agreement that proposed informal Commonwealth meeting between experts in official level to make recommendations for consideration of Governments would be valuable. We feel that latest trends in United States policy and intention of United States Government to summon an international conference at Washington at beginning of November make proposed Commonwealth meeting a matter of urgency. We should therefore like to suggest that it should open on Tuesday 3rd October, if this date is convenient to other British Commonwealth Governments. We suggest that London would be a convenient meeting place, though for our part we should be prepared to agree to any other centre generally preferred by other Governments. If 3rd October is too early, we would suggest Tuesday, October 10th.

2. We are urgently considering possibility of amplifying outline agenda in paragraph 2 of my telegram under reference, and shall hope to telegraph later as to this. If you have any suggestions we should appreciate them.

3. Should be glad of earliest possible expression of your view as to date and place, and for indication of names of your representatives.

Participation in Commonwealth discussions at time you suggest would seriously complicate from this standpoint adequate preparations for both meetings. To meet these difficulties which we feel may be common to other members of Commonwealth as well, we have been considering whether Commonwealth delegations to the International Conference could not come prepared to discuss with each other questions of intra-Commonwealth air arrangements which were to have been the subject of the London meeting of officials.

To prepare the way for such discussions we might arrange for full preliminary exchange of views by cable. This message has been repeated to Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and to our Ambassador in Washington.

Excellency:

I have the honour to refer to your note No. 209 of September 12th conveying an invitation to the Canadian Government to participate in an international conference dealing with civil aviation which the United States Government proposes convening in the United States beginning November 1st.

The Canadian Government agrees that it would be profitable to convene an international conference on this subject in the near future, and has noted with interest the objectives which the United States Government has suggested for the Conference. The Canadian Government agrees that these objectives could serve a useful purpose as a general basis for discussion.

Accordingly I have pleasure in informing you that the Canadian Government accepts the invitation of the United States Government, and will be prepared to send a delegation to the United States to participate in the International Conference which has been proposed.

We sympathise with your difficulties, which are also felt here, in making adequate preparations in such short time for proposed Commonwealth talks and International Conference. At same time we fear that suggestion for British Commonwealth talks concurrently with International Conference would not altogether meet what we have in mind. We should naturally wish our delegation to keep in closest touch with other British Commonwealth delegations at International Conference, but for our part we should not like to embark on the Conference without prior discussons with other members of British Commonwealth.

2. New Zealand Government have now suggested that proposed Commonwealth talks might more conveniently be held in Canada shortly before the end of October. If this were agreeable to Canadian Government and to other Governments concerned, we should be happy to arrange for our representatives to attend. We suggest that, in order to allow adequate time for the talks themselves and for consideration of their results before the Conference, opening date might be at least ten days before opening of Conference.

Civil aviation. You have seen our correspondence with the United Kingdom concerning the advisability of holding Commonwealth conversations before the International Conference, and you will have noted that, while we favoured postponement of the Commonwealth talks, the United Kingdom were anxious to have them in advance of the Conference. New Zealand has supported this view, and it is likely that other Commowealth Governments will take the same line. The suggestion was put forward by New Zealand and welcomed by the United Kingdom that Canada would be the most convenient meeting place, and the Canadian Government has agreed to this.

Please inform the State Department that exploratory conversations at the official level will take place in Canada in the latter part of October to consider operational and technical problems connected with possible air routes between members of the Commonwealth. It should be emphasized that these discussions were agreed upon, though not announced, some time ago before the United States Government issued its invitations to an International Conference, and that it is still felt by Commonwealth Governments that discussions between officials on a non-committal basis will be helpful.

1. The War Cabinet reconsidered yesterday the question of inviting Southern Ireland (Eire) to the Conference at Ottawa about civil aviation, in view of their having been invited without our being consulted by the United States to the later conference in United States of America. We have also considered carefully the various expressions of opinion from the Dominions Governments. We felt, however, after much heart searching, that it would be impossible for us to advocate an Empire Conference at which a Member State of the British Empire was present who actually at that moment would be maintaining in Dublin German and Japanese diplomatic representatives and Irish representatives at Berlin and Tokyo. The magnitude of the question of the future relations of Ireland with the British Empire and Commonwealth and with the United Kingdom is by no means to be overlooked, but it should not be settled on a side issue of this character, where our hand has been forced by the action of a foreign Power. Although Anglo-Irish relations are a matter of concern to the whole Empire, it will, I am sure, be admitted that the interest of the United Kingdom on account of our very close proximity, is one which must be considered paramount. We therefore hope that you will be willing to acquiesce in the line we take.

2. We do not consider that the geographical position of Ireland will be of very great importance in post-war aviation. The new field we are building at Slough for the reception of the enormous aircraft of the future will deprive Foynes of much, if not all, of its present significance. Ends.

We consider, however, that it would ease the situation all around if some reference to a review of wartime air services were included in the agenda and in the public announcement of the conference. This might, in any case, be a useful addition although it would not necessarily consume very much of the time of the conference. It would obviously be improper to invite a neutral country, even though a member of the Commonwealth, to participate in a conference the agenda of which included such an item.

SECRET. As you will have seen from the press announcement today, there will be a meeting of officials of Commonwealth and Empire Governments in Montreal on October 23rd to discuss operational and technical problems connected with the establishment of air routes between countries of the British Commonwealth. This meeting will precede the general international conference on post-war civil aviation questions which the United States has convoked for November 1st. Ireland has been invited to participate in the general international conference but is not being invited to the Commonwealth meeting in Montreal.

For your own most secret information I may say that we were disposed to invite Ireland to take part in the talks in Canada. The United Kingdom felt strongly that Ireland should not be included in such talks at this juncture and we have acquiesced in their view that the major question of Ireland's relationship with the other countries of the Commonwealth should not be settled on such a side issue as Irish participation in a technical meeting of officials. At the same time we felt that the settlement of this major question should not be compromised by the ostentatious exclusion of Ireland from such a meeting. In the circumstances it is important that no constitutional or political importance should be attached to the absence of Ireland from the meeting in Canada, and to this end it has been made clear that the Montreal talks will include a review of military air transport services operated during the war as well as a survey of possible extension of military air services during the remainder of the war. The inclusion of this item in the agenda and the stress put upon it in the public announcement of the meetings should give the Irish an easy explanation of their absence from these Commonwealth conversations.

When Hearne[68] asked me this morning if his Government was being invited to the meeting in Montreal I told him it would not be, pointed out that the agenda would include a discussion of wartime air operations in which his Government as a neutral could not take part, and explained that the meetings in Montreal although preparatory to the general international conference at which Ireland would be represented were also a continuation of the Commonwealth civil aviation meetings held in London in October last, in which Ireland did not take part.

PARTIE I/PART I

Instructions générales à la délégation canadienne à la conférence internationale aérienne

General Instructions for Canadian Delegation to International Air Conference

1. The Canadian draft convention for the establishment of an international air transport authority, made public in March 1944, has been revised, particularly in the light of discussions with the United States. A revised copy is attached hereto (Appendix I). Basically, the convention remains unchanged. In addition to a statement of broad general objectives there have been added specific principles or standards by which the authority must be guided in controlling routes, frequencies and rates. It is hoped that the addition of these principles may make the document more acceptable to the United States authorities, who had expressed opposition to the delegation of extensive powers to an authority without any definition of the rules to govern their use.

2. It is known that the members of the British Commonwealth, as well as certain of the other nations interested in air transport, such as the Netherlands, and Norway, are likely to support the approach suggested by Canada. On the other hand, the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. are not likely to favour this approach — the U.S.S.R. largely for security reasons, since it wishes to retain close supervision of any services which may enter or cross its territory, and the U.S. because of general reluctance to support the transfer of extensive powers to an international authority. Thus the Canadian approach can be expected to receive both support and opposition from different quarters.

3. It is recommended that the Canadian delegates should continue to support very strongly the principles of the Canadian draft convention and, if the occasion seems favourable, should put forward the revised version of the Canadian draft convention for discussion. The Canadian delegates should seek to obtain an international authority that has as broad powers as possible, and should be instructed to make a vigorous effort to achieve this goal. They should, however, meet any reasonable suggestions which would permit arrangements for the initiation, at an early date, of necessary services.

4. The Canadian convention provides for four freedoms under the supervision of an international authority. The basis of Canadian policy has been that, if the four freedoms are to be accepted multilaterally, there must also be an international authority with regulatory powers since otherwise the grant of the freedoms would be inequitable and would be of far greater value to some nations that to others. If it should prove impossible to obtain an effective international authority, the Canadian delegates should exercise great care in considering any suggestion for the multilateral granting of any of these freedoms, since the transit rights covered by freedoms one and two are Canada's chief bargaining points. It may be necessary to rely on those bargaining points to obtain concessions which Canada desires, and it is therefore obvious that they must not be given up except in return for something of value.

5. There is the possibility that a number of nations with common interests in air transport would be prepared to establish among themselves an authority with greater powers than would be acceptable to the United States (Appendix II).† The working out of such a scheme would be exceedingly difficult, however, and chances of its success rather scant. In particular, the formation of any such limited group would complicate the question of arrangements with the U.S. and U.S.S.R. which would not be members. Any such limited group should be open to membership by any nation wishing to join, and the Canadian delegation should only consider participation by Canada if the group could be established without disturbing the prospects for satisfactory relations with the U.S.

6. If it should become apparent that no effective international authority can be established either inclusive of the U.S. or exclusive of the U.S., Canadian delegates should, through such multilateral or bilateral arrangements as may be possible, seek to obtain the necessary landing and traffic rights for the international services which Canada will wish to operate immediately after the war. (Appendix III).† These services are:

(1) A service from Canada to the U.K. which would have equal rights with the U.K. service across the North Atlantic. While the possibility of extending this service to the European continent should not be discarded permanently, it might be used as a bargaining counter and, if desirable, given up in return for other advantages.

(2) Canadian service to the West Indies and Brazil. In the first instance, it might be sufficient for this service to operate to a base in the West Indies, presumably Trinidad, but no arrangement should be made which would prevent the extension of the service to Brazil as soon as the extension appears desirable.

(3) Canadian participation in a Pacific operation; if necessary, in the first instance a direct trans-oceanic service, but in this eventuality, leaving the door open for subsequent Canadian participation in a route to South Eastern Asia by way of Siberia and China. In the eventuality of the direct trans-Pacific route being adopted, Canadian operation should cover the segment from Canada to Honolulu.

(4) Other Services which Canada may wish to initiate subsequently; these need not be included in plans for allocation at this stage but no arrangements should be made which would prevent their initiation subsequently.

7. Should there be a failure to achieve a regulatory international authority, Canadian delegates should still agree to Canadian participation in whatever authority it might be possible to set up.

8. The position of the Canadian delegation in respect of services between members of the Commonwealth is dealt with in the second part of this report.

Nouveau projet de convention

Revised draft convention

PREAMBLE

The governments signatory hereto agree to the establishment of an International Air Transport Authority, the powers and duties of which shall be subject to review in accordance with Article XV hereof, at the end of . . . years from the date of the coming into force of this convention and shall be subject to the initial allocation of routes and frequencies and outlets as set forth in the provisions of Annex . . . to this convention.

ARTICLE I

THE AUTHORITY

Section 1

An authority is hereby established to be known as the International Air Transport Authority and to consist of an Assembly, a Board of Directors, Regional Air Transport Councils and such other units as may be created pursuant to the provisions of this convention.

Section 2

The Authority shall plan and foster the organization of international air services so as

(a) to avert the possibility of the misuse of civil aviation creating a threat to the security of nations, and to make the most effective contribution to the establishment and maintenance of a permanent system of general security,

(b) to avert conflicts capable of creating friction among governments or peoples,

(c) to avoid the development of economically wasteful competitive practices,

(d) to ensure that, so far as possible, international air routes and services are divided fairly and equitably between the various members states, and to ensure to every state the opportunity of participating in international airline operation in accordance with its needs for air transportation service and its industrial and scientific resources,

(e) to encourage continued development of the peaceful arts of aircraft design and operation,

(f) to reject and discourage discriminations in the following fields

(i) operations,

(ii) use of bases and aids to navigation,

(iii) definition of prohibited areas,

(iv) customs arrangements,

(g) to offer the potential users of air transportation safe, convenient and economical services, to offer free choice among alternative services, and generally to meet the needs of the peoples of the world for efficient and economical air transport.

Section 3

The Authority shall have exclusive jurisdiction, pursuant to the provisions of this convention, over international air services other than services between two contiguous member states, provided that any two contiguous member states may agree that services between them shall come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Authority. When such an agreement has been notified by both states to the Board, and until such agreement has been terminated, the Authority shall have exclusive jurisdiction, pursuant to the provisions of this convention, over the services between the two states.

ARTICLE II

OBLIGATIONS OF MEMBER STATES

Section 1

Each member state recognizes that every state has complete exclusive sovereignty over the air space above its territory.

Section 2

Each member state undertakes to give the following freedoms of the air to the international air services operating under the provisions of this convention:

(1) The right of innocent passage,

(2) The right to land for non-traffic purposes (e.g. refuelling, repair, emergency),

(3) The right to discharge passengers, mails and freight embarked in the territory of the state or states whose nationality the aircraft possesses, and

(4) The right to take on passengers, mails and freight destined for the territory of the state or states whose nationality the aircraft possesses.

Section 3

Each member state may

(a) designate the route to be followed within its territory by any international air service and the air ports which any international air service may use, and

(b) impose or permit to be imposed on any international air service just and reasonable charges for the use of the air ports and other facilities on its territory, which shall not be higher than would be paid by national aircraft engaged in comparable international services,

provided that, upon complaint by an interested air carrier through the government or governments of which it is a national, the designation of routes and use of air ports, and the charges imposed for the use of air ports and other facilities shall be subject to review by the licensing authority.

Section 4

Each member state undertakes to make available such radio frequencies and to provide such meteorological services as may from time to time be required by the licensing authority for the safety, efficiency and regularity of the air services licensed by it.

Section 5

Each member state undertakes to perform the obligations imposed on it by this convention and to enact legislation necessary to carry out its terms including

(a) legislation to ensure that no air carrier may operate international air services unless that carrier is in possession of a valid license authorizing such services, issued under the provisions of Article VI of this convention, and

(b) legislation to bring its national laws into conformity with the regulations approved by the Assembly under the provisions of sub-section 5 of section 2 of Article III of this convention. This action shall be taken within the period of one year from the date of approval by the Assembly or, if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than eighteen months from the date of approval by the Assembly.

Section 6

Each member state undertakes to permit the operation within its territory of operating organizations constituted under the provisions of section 3 of Article IX of this convention, provided that permission to an operating organization to engage in domestic air transport within its territory shall be in the discretion of the state.

ARTICLE III

THE ASSEMBLY

Section 1

The International Air Transport Assembly shall be composed of representatives of the member states. Each state shall be entitled to the number of votes (one to six) in the Assembly provided in the Annex to this convention and may appoint as many representatives to the Assembly as it has votes and may replace them from time to time. Each state may cast all of the votes allotted to it regardless of the number of its representatives present at any meeting. Decisions of the Assembly shall be taken by a majority of the votes cast except where otherwise provided in this convention. There shall be deemed to be a quorum if the representatives present can cast one-half of the possible votes.

Section 2

The duties of the Assembly shall be:

(1) To designate the countries which may appoint members on the International Air Transport Board.

(2) To elect the President of the Board. The President shall hold office for a period of . . . years.

(3) To meet from time to time as occasion may require and at least once a year.

(4) To examine and approve the annual report of the Board and to decide any matter referred to it by the Board.

(5) To draw up and maintain regulations governing such matters as air safety, rules of the air, competency of air crew, ground signals, meteorological procedure, navigational aids, communications, airworthiness, national registration and identification of aircraft, carriage of dangerous goods, salvage.

(6) To make regulations governing the preparation of budgets and financial statements by the Board and to approve the annual budget and the financial arrangements made by the Board.

Section 3

The Assembly shall have power:

(1) To determine its rules of procedure.

(2) To fix the salaries of the President and the other members of the Board.

(3) To refer to subsidiary commissions, the Board or any other appropriate agency any matter within the sphere of its jurisdiction.

(4) To deal with any matter within the sphere of action of the International Air Transport Authority not specifically assigned to the Board or the Regional Councils.

ARTICLE IV

THE BOARD

Section 1

The International Air Transport Board shall consist of a President, elected pursuant to the provisions of Article III of this convention, and twelve members. It shall include one national of each of the eight member states of chief importance in international air transport. It shall also include one national of each of four other states designated by the International Air Transport Assembly for . . . . year terms. The members shall in all cases be appointed by the governments concerned. The Board shall be a permanent body responsible to the Assembly. In the event of any member of the Board ceasing to act, the state which appointed him shall appoint a successor who shall hold office for the unexpired portion of his predecessor's term of office.

Section 2

The duties of the Board shall be:

(1) To constitute, subject to the approval of the Assembly, the following Regional Air Transport Councils; (For example, European, North Atlantic, North Pacific, Inter-American) . . . . In constituting a Regional Council the Board shall designated as participating states those member states which are principally concerned in the international airlines of the region. The Board shall also define the boundaries of the region or designate the routes over which the Regional Council shall have jurisdiction. The Board may from time to time revise the lists of participating states and alter the boundaries of the regions or change the designations of the routes.

(2) To decide, subject to the approval of the Assembly, the method of appointment, the salaries and conditions of service of its employees, including those members of the Regional Councils who are appointed by the Board.

(3) To establish the rules of procedure of subsidiary commissions and of Regional Councils.

(4) To administer, subject to the approval of the Assembly, the finances of the International Air Transport Authority.

(5) To grant certificates over routes coming within the jurisdiction of two or more Regional Councils, or of no Regional Council, and in such cases to perform the duties of a Regional Council; or, in its discretion in special cases, to enable one or more Regional Councils to act to the exclusion of any other Regional Council having a technical but not substantial jurisdictional interest.

(6) To conduct research into all aspects of air transport which are of international concern, to make the results of its research known to all the member states and to facilitate the exchange of information on air transport matters between the member states.

Section 3

The Board shall have power:

(1) To revoke or alter, after public notice or hearing, any decision of a Regional Air Transport Council including any decision to grant, withhold, alter, amend, modify, revoke or suspend a license and any decision determining frequencies of service, allocation of quotas, or rates of carriage.

(2) To carry out the provisions of Article VII of this convention (Airports and other ground facilities.)

(3) To establish, subject to the approval of the Assembly, subsidiary commissions responsible to it.

(4) To institute such training facilities for its employees as it may consider necessary.

Section 4

Decisions of the Board shall be taken by a majority of the votes cast. One-half the members of the Board shall form a quorum. The President shall have a casting vote. The Board shall determine its rules of procedure but the place of its permanent seat shall be decided by the Assembly.

ARTICLE V

REGIONAL COUNCILS

Section 1

A Regional Air Transport Council shall be composed of not less than six nor more than nine members. One-third of the members shall be appointed by the International Air Transport Board and hold office at the pleasure of the Board; they shall possess special knowledge of the problems of air transport and shall be nationals of states other than those which are designated by the Board as being principally concerned in the international airlines of the region. The other members shall be appointed by the designated states. The number of members to be appointed by each of the designated states shall be, from time to time, determined by the Board, having regard to the relative importance to each state of the international air transport services under the Regional Council's jurisdiction and to the relative importance of each state in air transport. The members appointed by designated states shall hold office at the pleasure of the government appointing them.

Section 2

Decisions of a Regional Council shall be taken by a majority of the votes cast. One-half the members of a Council shall form a quorum.

Section 3

Each Regional Council shall appoint a Managing Director who shall hold office for a period of . . . years.

Section 4

The duties of a Regional Council shall be:

(1) To grant certificates in respect of international air services within the region; to withhold certificates; to attach to certificates such reasonable terms, conditions and limitations as the public interest may require and as are consistent with the terms of this convention; to alter, amend, modify or suspend any certificate, in whole or in part, or revoke any certificate, in whole or in part, for deliberate failure to comply with any provision of this convention or of any order, rule or regulation issued under this convention or any term, condition or limitation of the certificate.

(2) To review and alter, if necessary, the rates of carriage for passengers and cargo, fixed in the first instance at conferences of air transport operators in that region; and to determine rates of carriage for passengers and cargo, in the event that the air transport operators, after a reasonable period of time, fail to reach agreement; and to consult with the postal administrations regarding rates of carriage for mail.

(3) To approve or determine rates, as the case may be, which will so far as possible:

(a) Permit the normal commercial revenues of the most economical operator to cover the full costs of operation and reasonable profit, and

(b) Provide that where two or more classes of services are offered as alternatives, and so differ in their characteristics, such as speed and accommodation, as to occasion substantial differences in operating costs, the rates charged should bear an appropriate relation to those differences.[70]

(4) To collect and publish information and cost statistics relating to the operation of international air services within the region.

Section 5

In the granting of certificates in respect of international air services, a Regional Council shall act in accordance with the allocation of routes, frequencies and outlets under the provisions of Annex . . . to this convention; but may make additional allocations in accordance with the following principles —

(1) Any State wishing to initiate an international service in a region should have the right to operate a minimum quota of a weekly service, unless its application justifies more;

(2) Any State already operating on a given route should be allowed to increase its frequencies on that route if its existing services are operating with an average payload of more than 60% of carrying capacity.[71]

(3) Any state wishing to initiate a new service over a new route should have its request judged on the following basis:

(a) Average payload carried on services of the applicant state in that region;

(b) Potential traffic to and from the region in which the service is to operate.[72]

(4) If a state wishes to initiate a service which will in part run over a route followed by a service already operated by that state and in part over a new route, the state should put forward its request for a service over the whole route on the same basis as an application for a completely new route. In that case, judgment of the number of frequencies to be allowed should be based upon traffic moving to and from the country of origin of the service to the new area opened up.

NOTE: The term "frequencies of service" means the number of trips on the route per day or per week.

CERTIFICATES

Section 1

(1) Applications for certificates may be submitted only through governments of member states. An application by a person or corporation shall be submitted through the intermediary of the government of the member state of which the person or corporation is a national.

(2) An application shall normally be made to the competent Regional Air Transport Council. If the application, however, is for a service which falls within the jurisdiction of two or more Regional Councils or of no Regional Council, the application shall be made to the International Air Transport Board which may refer it to one or more Regional Councils for their opinion.

(1) The Board or a Regional Council shall not grant, renew, alter, amend, modify, suspend or revoke a certificate except after a hearing, except in case of emergency or under the provisions of Article IX of this convention (Relationship to the International Security Organization).

(2) The Board or a Regional Council shall not grant a certificate unless it is satisfied that the person or corporation applying for the certificate is able properly to provide the proposed air services, and to conform to the provisions of this convention and the rules, regulations and requirements of the International Air Transport Authority and the competent Regional Council.

Section 3

(1) The holder of a certificate granted by the Board or a Regional Council, shall have the right to operate to, within, over and away from the territory of any member state to the extent allowed by the certificate and subject to allocation of routes, frequencies and outlets as provided for in Annex . . . to this convention and in Article V of this convention. The certificate may allow the holder to make stops in the territory of any member state for refuelling, repairs, taking on or discharging of passengers, cargo and mail, and for any other purpose; and member states shall allow such stops, provided that no certificate shall grant permission to a person or corporation possessing the nationality of one state to take on passengers, cargo or mail within the territory of any other state for discharge within territory of the latter or within the territory of a third state except with the consent of the member state or member states concerned.

(2) No certificate shall be granted for a period of more than . . . years but certificates may be renewed on application. Any certificate may be revoked, altered, amended, modified or suspended by the Board or by the Regional Council which granted the certificate.

ARTICLE VII

AIRPORTS AND OTHER GROUND FACILITIES

Section 1

If an air carrier furnished with a certificate by the Board or a Regional Council is of the opinion that the airports or other ground facilities on the territory of a member state are not reasonably adequate for the safe, regular, efficient and economical operation of the air service which it is permitted to perform, it may so inform the government or governments of which it is a national. Such government or governments may, if the complaint is considered to be valid, transmit it to the appropriate Regional Council, or if more than one Regional Council or no Regional Council is concerned, to the Board. After reasonable notice to all member states concerned and after one or more hearings at which these member states shall have the right to be heard, the Board or Regional Council may request the member state to expand its existing facilities or to construct new ones or to man and maintain its existing or new facilities in accordance with standards set by the Board or Regional Council. The Board shall, at the instance of an interested member state, review any request made by a Regional Council and after public notice or hearing may suspend, withdraw, alter, amend or modify its terms. Each member state undertakes, at the earliest practicable moment, to give effect to the requests of the Board or Regional Council.

Section 2

The expenses involved in carrying out any such request shall be apportioned as follows:

(a) The member state may elect to bear all or a portion of the costs,

(b) If the member state bears none of the costs or bears only a portion thereof, the costs (or the remaining portion of them, as the case may be) shall be advanced by the Board to the member state and shall be borne by the Board or be apportioned by the Board, over a reasonable period of time, between the states (including the member state constructing the facilities) whose air carriers or services use the facilities.

In cases where the Board advances costs it may require a reasonable share in the supervision of the construction work, in the control of the airports and other facilities, and in the revenues derived from charges levied.

Section 3

If a member state so requests the Board may provide, man, maintain and control any or all of the airports and other ground facilities which it requires in the territory of that member state for the safe, regular, efficient and economical operation of the air services which it or a Regional Council has licensed and may impose just and reasonable charges for the use of the facilities. The member state shall either provide the land itself or facilitate the acquisition of the necessary land by the Board on just and reasonable terms.

Section 4

A member state may at any time acquire and obtain complete control over facilities on its territory for which the Board has advanced costs under Section 2 of this Article, or which the Board has provided under Section 3 of this Article, by paying to the Board an amount which in the opinion of the Board is reasonable in the circumstances.

ARTICLE VIII

FINANCE

The expenses of the International Air Transport Authority shall be borne by the member states in proportion to the number of votes at their disposal in the Assembly, provided that those expenses of a Regional Air Transport Council which are, in the opinion of the Board, properly chargeable to the states participating in that Council shall be borne by those states in such proportions as the Board may determine.

ARTICLE IX

RELATIONSHIP TO THE INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ORGANIZATION

Section 1

The International Air Transport Authority shall be subject so far as questions involving world security are concerned, to the general organization which may be established among the nations of the world for the maintenance of peace and international security.

Section 2

The Board, when informed by the International Security Organization that such action is required in the interest of world security, shall immediately and without formal hearing grant, withhold, alter, amend, modify, suspend or revoke any certificate in whole or in part and take the measures concerning technical services, operating facilities and bases which the International Security Organization has directed should be taken.

Section 3

The Board shall, when informed by the International Security Organization that such action is required in the interest of world security, constitute, supervise and control one or more operating organizations to operate air services on routes or in regions designated from time to time by the International Security Organization, provided that such operating organizations shall not engage in domestic air transport within any state without the permission of that state. The Board may place operating organizations under the supervision and control of the appropriate Regional Air Transport Council.

ARTICLE X

JOINT OPERATING ORGANIZATIONS AND POOLING

Section 1

Nothing in this convention shall prevent two or more states from constituting joint air transport operating organizations but such organizations shall be subject to all the provisions of this convention including those relating to certificates and to the registration of agreements with the Board.

Section 2

Nothing in this convention shall prevent two or more states from pooling their air services on certain routes or in certain regions but such pooled services shall be subject to all the provisions of this convention including those relating to certificates and to the registration of agreements with the Board.

Section 3

The Board, or a Regional Air Transport Council may recommend to the member states concerned that they pool the air services on certain routes or in certain regions or that they constitute joint operating organizations to perform some or all the air services on certain routes or in certain regions.

Section 4

A state shall have the right to participate in joint operating organizations either through its government or through an airline company or companies designated by it. The companies may, at the sole discretion of the state concerned, be state-owned or partly state-owned or privately owned.

ARTICLE XI

OTHER AGREEMENTS AND ARRANGEMENTS

Section 1

This convention shall replace the International Aerial Navigation Convention signed at Paris in 1919, the Ibero-American Convention on Aerial Navigation signed at Madrid in 1926, the Pan-American Convention on Commercial Aviation signed at Habana in 1928, the Convention for the Unification of certain rules relating to International Transportation by Air signed at Warsaw in 1929, and the Convention relating to Sanitary Measures to be applied in International Air Navigation signed at The Hague in 1933.

Section 2

The member states severally agree that this convention is accepted as abrogating all obligations or understandings inter se which are inconsistent with its terms, and undertake not to enter into any engagements inconsistent with its terms. In case any member state shall, before becoming a member of the International Air Transport Authority, have undertaken any obligations toward a non-member state or a national of a member state or a non-member state inconsistent with the terms of this convention, it shall be the duty of such member state to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

Section 3

The right of any member state to enter into any convention or special agreement with any other member state or member states concerning international air transport is recognized, provided that the convention or agreement shall not impair any rights or obligations of any of the member states arising out of this convention. Every such convention or agreement shall be forthwith registered with the Board and shall as soon as possible be published by it. No such convention or agreement shall be binding until so registered.

Section 4

All agreements or working arrangements between operating companies regarding international air services shall be forthwith registered with the Board and shall not be binding until so registered.

ARTICLE XII

AMENDMENTS, RATIFICATION, ETC.

Section 1

Amendments to this convention can be proposed by either the Assembly or the Board. An amendment shall be binding on the member states as soon as it is approved of by the Assembly by at least two-thirds of the total possible votes.

Section 2

In case of a disagreement between two or more member states or between one or more member states and the Board relating to the interpretation of this convention, the question in dispute shall, at the request of any one of the interested member states or of the Board, be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Section 3

This convention shall be ratified. Ratifications shall be deposited with . . . who shall notify the other signatory states.

Section 4

This convention shall come into force, in respect of ratifying states, when it has been ratified by . . . of the signatory states including . . . of the following: . . . The date of coming into force shall be notified to all signatory states by . . . .

Section 5

Any non-signatory state may adhere to this convention at any time after it has come into force. Adherence shall be notified to . . . who shall inform all signatory states.

ARTICLE XIII

DEFINITIONS

For the purposes of this convention the expression:

(a) "air service" means any air service performed by an airship, aircraft or towed glider for public use such as the transport of passengers, mails or cargo, including services under charter such as "air taxis";

(b) "international air service" means (this definition should be reserved);

(c) "member states of chief importance in international air transport" means the eight member states which, under the provisions of the annex to this convention, are entitled to the largest number of votes in the Assembly;

(d) "nationality of aircraft" means the nationality of the state in which the aircraft is registered provided that the aircraft of an operating organization owned by two or more states or by the airline companies designated by two or more states is deemed for the purposes of this convention to possess the nationality of each of the participating states or companies;

(e) "territory" of a state means the territory of a state and its colonies, possessions, protectorates, mandates or territory abroad.

ARTICLE XIV

PROVISIONAL ARTICLE

Section 1

After this convention has come into force the member states shall observe the following rules governing the temporary continuation of existing international air transport:

(1) Such of their nationals as are engaged in international air transport shall discontinue their activities within . . . . years unless they are allocated routes, frequencies and outlets under the provisions of Annex . . . or are granted certificates under the provisions of this convention.

(2) If a member state has previously granted to a national of a non-member state any rights of international air transport such rights shall be revoked within two years provided that, if revocation would involve breach of an agreement made within the non-member state, the period of two years may be extended by the Board.

Section 2

Until the International Air Transport Board decides otherwise, the jurisdiction of the Regional Air Transport Councils shall extend as follows:

(1) European air transport council: Europe not including the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and Ireland.

(2) North Atlantic air transport council: all routes between any point in North America which is north of 40° north latitude and any point north of 40° north latitude in Europe including the United Kingdom, Ireland and the European portions of the U.S.S.R.

(3) .....

Section 3

Until the International Air Transport Board decides otherwise, the membership of the Regional Air Transport Councils shall be as follows:

.....

Section 4

Until the International Air Transport Board or the competent Regional Air Transport Councils shall decide otherwise the persons of countries to whom routes, frequencies and outlets have been allocated under the provisions of Annex . . . to this convention shall be deemed to possess certificates issued by the International Air Transport Authority to operate the routes designated in the schedule.

Section 5

The first meeting of the Assembly shall be summoned by . . . as soon as the convention has come into force to meet at . . . within two months after the date of coming into force of the convention.

Section 6

The following procedure shall govern the election of the International Air Transport Board at the first meeting of the International Air Transport Assembly. Each of the eight member states of chief importance in air transport shall, as soon as possible and not later than six weeks after the date of coming into force of the convention, nominate one of its nationals for membership on the Board and the eight persons so nominated shall be deemed to have been elected by the Assembly. Each national delegation may nominate one person to fill one of the remaining four seats on the Board. The chairman of the Assembly shall prepare a list in alphabetical order of all the persons thus nominated and shall submit this list to the Assembly which shall vote by secret ballot. Those four candidates who obtain the highest number of votes shall be considered as elected.

Section 7

Until the International Air Transport Assembly shall decide otherwise the regulations governing such matters as air safety, rules of the air, competency of air crew, ground signals, meteorological procedure, navigational aids, communications, airworthiness, national registration and identification of aircraft, carriage of dangerous goods and salvage which are set forth in the attached schedule shall be deemed to have received the approval of the Assembly under the provisions of subsection 5 of section 2 of Article III of this convention (The Assembly) and each member state undertakes to enact or modify its national laws to bring them into conformity with these regulations at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than twelve months from the date of the coming into force of this convention.[73]

ARTICLE XV

This convention shall remain in force for a period of . . . years, and not less than . . . months before the expiration of this period the powers and duties granted to the International Air Transport Authority shall be reconsidered at a conference of the member states hereto, and the convention reviewed in the light of the experience gained.

PARTIE II/PART II

Mémorandum sur les discussions du Commonwealth concernant le transport aérien

Memorandum on Commonwealth Discussions on Air Transport

Present Position

Canadian interests in the field of international air transport continue to lie in the development of satisfactory multilateral arrangements and, in accordance with these arrangements the provision of conditions which would enable Canada to operate certain international air services. Within this framework Canada is interested in a service from Canada to the U.K., a Canadian service to the West Indies and eventually to South America, and services connecting Canada with Australia, New Zealand and the South Pacific.

The Canadian government has strongly advocated a multilateral approach to the problems of international civil aviation, moving slowly in the matter of Commonwealth arrangements until the broader international picture should be clearer. The U.K. and the other Commonwealth members have given evidence of a sincere desire to support a multilateral approach to these problems. The U.S., however, has been the main impediment in this respect adopting an attitude that is nothing more nor less than a return to the unsatisfactory prewar position. Canada's interests lie in pressing for a international conference and a satisfactory multilateral settlement. This U.S. policy may force other countries to take similar steps either in bilateral negotiations or in limited international arrangements based upon common interests. The final Canadian attitude on Commonwealth cooperation must depend upon the general international arrangements which ultimately are made and this factor

[73]La note suivante était dans l'original:/The following footnote was in the original:
The schedule to Section 7 would set forth provisional regulations which would among other things embody some of the rules and regulations contained in the conventions listed in Section 1 of Article XI.

must, of course, be kept in mind by Canadian representatives participating in any Commonwealth conversations.

Commonwealth Cooperation

As a matter of general policy Canada has opposed any development creating even the semblance of an overall Commonwealth scheme or the establishment of single Commonwealth unit in the air transport field. On the other hand the routes mentioned would likely be of direct use to Canada after the war on routes which connect with other parts of the Commonwealth although they may serve other areas as well. The establishment of services on routes will be a large task involving extensive financial commitments as well as special arrangements with other countries concerned and every effort to ensure economic operation must be made. Moreover the necessity for prompt action in the establishment of international services after the war has been stressed in previous reports to the government. The U.S. is definitely bent upon operating its own extensive international air services and apparently upon developing its own connections abroad; in other words, it offers little possibility of cooperation. It will be easier to obtain prompt cooperation and assistance from other sections of the Commonwealth than by other means. In addition, these services will have little success unless, in the various areas served, they can make close arrangements with other airlines to provide traffic hookups and agreements both in respect of local and through passengers. Here again the members of the Commonwealth offer a ready form of immediate assistance.

Another point in favour of exploring the possibilities and nature of Commonwealth cooperation arises as a result of a suggestion made to the U.K. by the U.S. in giving notice of its desire to embark upon a bilateral policy; the U.S. implied readiness to make a bargain with the U.K. regardless of other countries. The U.K., if left with no other alternative, might be forced to accept this suggestion but is unlikely to do so unless it fails to find a cooperative attitude elsewhere. Any U.K.-U.S. deal would have unfavourable results for Canada since it would circumvent Canadian interests and weaken the Canadian position.

Other member nations of the Commonwealth have already displayed their willingness to cooperate with the U.K. in some sort of intra-Commonwealth arrangements and will undoubtedly proceed on this basis. Canada will in that event have a choice between standing out or participating and trying to make the pattern of Commonwealth cooperation satisfactory from the Canadian point of view, i.e. non-exclusive, and part of a broader international pattern under any international air transport agency which may be established.

Canadian Interests

The foregoing considerations lead to the conclusion that it would be in Canada's interest to explore the possibility of cooperative arrangements with the U.K., Australia, New Zealand, the West Indies and possibly India on a non-discriminatory basis which would avoid the creation of a single Commonwealth front in the field of air transport but would leave each member of the Commonwealth free to make arrangements regarding international air services within other countries outside the Commonwealth.

The objectives of the Canadian draft convention are as valid for Commonwealth cooperation as for the broader field. All the general principles underlying the convention might well be applied to any arrangements for Commonwealth services although not in a manner which would be considered discriminatory by other nations. The members of the Commonwealth, however, might agree in accordance with these principles that competition should be avoided or at least regulated, that the first four freedoms should apply as between Commonwealth members on Commonwealth services subject to the provision of suitable machinery for allocation of routes.

Beyond this Canadian policy should require the preservation of national identity of operations to the greatest extent possible since otherwise the impression of a unified Commonwealth would be created. Further, it is desirous that in any cooperative arrangements, the right to carry through traffic across Canada be reserved to T.C.A. so that no other Commonwealth operations across Canada need be required. This would be a concession of more value to Canada, India, Australia and South Africa than to the U.K., Ireland, New Zealand, Newfoundland or other parts of the Commonwealth and in view of this distinction it would be difficult to reduce terms of a general principle.

Possible Methods of Co-operation

The required degree of cooperation may be achieved by inter-company agreements, by a Commonwealth supervisory agency, by joint operating organizations in given areas, or by joint holding companies with operations being divided among various national units. Joint operations would scarcely be acceptable to Canada since they would raise serious problems in the way of standardization, on an Empire basis, of equipment and operating techniques. Canada has already worked out her own distinct technique of operation based upon high safety and technical standards. Moreover Canada is setting out to provide her own air transport equipment particularly planes based on U.S. designs. Accordingly Canadian participation in a joint operation would be difficult unless the operation were standardized throughout on the basis of Canadian type equipment and Canadian technique — a standardization which the U.K. would scarcely favour in any operation in which she participates and standardization which would be unlikely unless Canada held the controlling interest in the joint operation. Failing this cooperation should be based upon the principle that T.C.A. would maintain its own operations rather than becoming a participant in a joint operation.

With the possible exception of the North Atlantic run the international services in which Canada is interested will involve heavy financial investment at least during the first years of operation. An agreement between Canada, Australia and New Zealand under which T.C.A. provided a service connecting with services from Australia and New Zealand would, for example, be likely to result for one or other of the parties in an inequitable division of costs unless some additional financial adjustment were made since no appropriate meeting point would be likely to fit in with an even division of costs. This difficultly will exist in varying degrees on other routes and among other members of the Commonwealth. A joint holding company would have the advantage of providing for an equitable sharing of costs. For example, Canada, Australia and New Zealand and possibly the U.K. might become joint shareholders in a company assuming overall financial responsibility for a service from Vancouver to Australasia with individual segments of the service being allotted to each of the participating countries for operation. In short, the joint holding company would be a device to maintain international identity of operations while providing for supervision and coordination of a series of operations and for a fair sharing of costs. It need not be politically unacceptable so long as its activities are limited to specific routes rather than covering all, or even the majority, of Commonwealth services. (See Appendix B).†

A further possibility is the conclusion of inter-company agreements which would be supervised by a Commonwealth Council or regional Commonwealth Councils (See Appendix A).† A Council might be given either executive or advisory functions in respect of rates, schedules and division of financial responsibility. If a single Council were set up, for the whole Commonwealth yet limited to Commonwealth members, it would be desirable to restrict it to an advisory capacity again in order to forestall the development of the unitary Commonwealth. If, however, regional Councils were established, they might be given regulatory rather than advisory powers.

A joint holding company would have certain advantages over a Commonwealth Council. Its functions could be limited to specific regions whereas the tendency would be to set up an overall Commonwealth Council with general responsibilities, dealing with areas in which Canada was not directly interested. Thus, the holding company might be less likely to foster the development of any tendency to treat air transport within the Commonwealth as a single problem. Moreover the problem of financial responsibilities would probably be politically easier under limited holding companies than under an overall Commonwealth Council. It may, however, be difficult to avoid the creation of a Commonwealth advisory body unless an effective international agency to fill the same need is established.

In any event Canada should make certain that whatever policy is adopted none of the arrangements constituted a barrier to the establishment of an effective international air transport and all arrangements would be subject to any such authority which might be established; that the arrangements did not create discriminatory conditions which would hinder the activities of other countries in respect of air services; and that members of the Commonwealth should remain free to make arrangements regarding services to and from other countries.

One consideration which should not be lost sight of is the possibility of establishing an organization similar to that mapped out in the Canadian draft convention, among the members of the Commonwealth, making membership open to any other nation which wished to join. (See Part I, Appendix I). Any step in the direction of such an authority would be unwise if it were limited to the Commonwealth members in view of the position of States such as France, Belgium, the Netherlands who would then be caught between two fires, the U.S. and the Commonwealth. The fact that membership was open to other nations would prevent any charge of Imperial discrimination. There would be obvious disadvantages in setting up an organization of this sort if the U.S. were not a member although it could be argued that this disadvantage would be no greater than those which would follow from a return to the pre-war situation as a result of U.S. opposition to any more effective international arrangements.

U.K. Interests

In view of the fact that the U.K. already is aware of Canadian objections it is not likely to press strongly for a single Commonwealth company to operate the main Commonwealth air routes. It is more likely that it will propose limited joint holding or operating companies and possibly an advisory Commonwealth Council. In this connection there may be certain areas in which the U.K. for reasons of prestige, will wish to participate in operations which primarily fall within the sphere of other Commonwealth members. For example in the Pacific area a Canada-Australasia service would be of primary interest to Canada, Australia and New Zealand, yet the U.K. would be likely to wish some share in such a service. In this case the question must arise whether the U.K. might be allowed, for example, to participate in a holding company (it would scarcely be feasible to turn any segment of this service over to the U.K. for direct operation), or to participate in a Commonwealth regulatory or advisory agency established for that particular region.

Moreover while at first sight it would appear that the best solution would be a joint Canadian-Australian-New Zealand and possibly U.K. holding company for operations from Canada to Australasia, the U.K. may wish to extend this plan to cover a service from the U.K. to Australasia by way of Canada and possibly by way of the Caribbean as well and may suggest a joint holding company for this purpose.

In this Canada's interests would be served by maintaining the separate identity of Canadian operations, by holding to the "segment" principle as opposed to joint operations. Granted this point, Canada could then consider the desirability of a joint holding company. It would, however, be in Canada's interest to limit the activities of a holding company to the Pacific area rather than stretching it to cover all services between the U.K. and Australasia by way of North America.

North Atlantic

The pattern suggested in London in October 1943 offers a satisfactory starting point and other members of the Commonwealth could be informed that if Canada were allowed to participate effectively in the three areas of interest to Canada — the North Atlantic, the Caribbean and the Pacific, no attempt would be made for a given period of years, (e.g. five) to enter into competition with British or Commonwealth lines in the Mediterranean, Western Europe, Africa, Central and Southern Asia or Southern Latin America. This would, however, leave Canada free to make any arrangements that might appear desirable with the U.S.S.R. regarding a service by way of Alaska and Siberia — a service which might be acceptable to the U.S.S.R. in view of her reluctance to deal with the U.S. in this connection. On the North Atlantic where potential air traffic is relatively great Canada should insist upon maintaining a separate operation alongside any U.K. service which may be established. Parallel U.K. and Canadian services should have equal landing and traffic rights with schedules and rates subject to joint or international supervision. Canadian representatives might, in the first instance, keep the door open for the extension of Canadian service to Europe but could be prepared to give this up and to feed all traffic from the Canadian line into the U.K. services to Europe if, in return, any U.K. North Atlantic service fed its through traffic into the T.C.A. system in Canada. The U.K. might seek permission to carry local traffic between Canada and the U.S. but this right should be reduced since it would result in direct competition with local Canadian services to the U.S.

Caribbean Area

In the Caribbean area there should be an attempt to persuade the U.K. to leave operations from North America to the West Indies and possibly on to Brazil for operation by T.C.A. This would leave the U.K. an equally effective route to South America by way of North West Africa and the bulge of Brazil. This agreement might be based upon the mutual understanding that the T.C.A. would feed any traffic for Africa and for the time being, the Argentine or Western South America, into the U.K. service somewhere in Brazil or the northern part of South America and vice versa. Here the problem may be the connecting point and main choice may be between Trinidad and a Brazilian airport. In the long run Canada is likely to require a Brazilian terminal although in the initial stages Canadian service may operate only to Nassau or at the most Trinidad.

A further relevant point is the relation between T.C.A. and B.W.I.A. There would be obvious advantage in using B.W.I.A. as a feeder service through the West Indian Islands and it might even be desirable for Canada to undertake some financial responsibilities in connection with B.W.I.A. if this appeared the most satisfactory method of linking with it.

Pacific Area

In respect of the Pacific, Canadian interests lie in making arrangements for T.C.A. to operate a segment of the route rather than participate in a joint operation and in supporting the idea of a joint holding company for the route or alternatively of some agency with power to adjust rate schedules and financial responsibilities. If possible arrangements should be limited to the Pacific rather than extended to cover a wider area. The route to Australasia by way of the Asiatic mainland offers more possibilities for traffic than a direct trans-oceanic route but would take considerably longer to place in operation since negotiations with U.S.S.R., China, and other countries would be involved. This, of course, is a longer route as well in respect of flying time. This situation will probably lead Australia and New Zealand to press for early establishment of a direct oceanic route by way of Hawaii. In this event it would be in Canada's interests to limit the Canadian segment of operation to the route between Honolulu and the North American mainland at the same time keeping the door open for reconsideration of the route and eventual establishment of a service by way of China either in place of or in addition to the direct trans-oceanic service.

Conclusions

While much give and take would be necessary on specific details Canadian interests would, in general, be satisfied if other members of the Commonwealth accepted the following general principles:

(1) The primary objective of each member of the Commonwealth remains the securing of a multilateral international agreement along the lines of the plan prepared during the Commonwealth discussions in 1943 and subsequently expanded in the Canadian draft convention.

(2) The principle of Commonwealth cooperation would be subject to later review in the light of the results of the forthcoming international conference on air transport and any intra-Commonwealth arrangements should be subject to the powers which may be exercised by an international air transport authority.

(3) Intra-Commonwealth arrangements should be on a non-exclusive basis; they should not block the establishment of service by other nations or negotiations between individual members of the Commonwealth and other nations.

(4) Freedoms One to Four should apply between Commonwealth countries on agreed intra-Commonwealth services.

(5) As far as possible each Commonwealth member should provide the international services within its own area so that intra-Commonwealth routes would be established on the basis of nationally operated connecting segments rather than on the basis of joint operations.

(6) There should be no competing intra-Commonwealth services except on routes where the traffic offering is sufficient to justify the establishment of more than one service (e.g. North Atlantic).

(7) Where parallel services may be established between members of the Commonwealth their rates and schedules should be subject to joint agreement.

(8) While the advantages of any Commonwealth advisory council should not be overlooked at this stage, any final decision particularly in respect of powers and functions should be deferred until some indication is received of the powers which may be granted to an international air transport authority.

If the government approves these general conclusions the Canadian representatives might participate in Commonwealth conversations within this framework on the following basis:

(a) That Canada would be interested in playing some part in some operation across the North Atlantic, southward to the Caribbean and possibly Latin America and across the Pacific to Australasia.

(b) Canada would reserve the right to make arrangements for other international services which she might wish to operate but which did not fall directly within the pattern of intra-Commonwealth routes.

(c) Canada would be prepared to consider participation in some form of joint holding company for specific operations rather than in a Commonwealth Advisory Board.

(d) Canada would wish T.C.A. to be accepted as a medium of carriage for Commonwealth traffic across Canada.

Mémorandum du bureau du Conseil privé au secrétaire, le Comité de guerre du Cabinet

Memorandum from Privy Council Office to Secretary, Cabinet War Committee

SECRET Ottawa, October 30, 1944

MEMORANDUM FOR MR. A. D. P. HEENEY:

You have already received a set of the minutes of the Commonwealth Air Conversations held in Montreal last week.† These will perhaps be more intelligible if I outline in general terms the nature of the decisions that were taken.

I. INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF AIR ROUTES — MILITARY, ECONOMIC AND TECHNICAL

(a) International Ownership and Operation of all Civil Airlines. Australia and New Zealand favoured this as the highest form of international co-operation in the interests of peace and cheap transport for all. Other countries did not think "internationalization" possible of attainment. Australia and New Zealand will, however, promote their proposal at Chicago, with or without the support of the balance of the Commonwealth.

(b) The Canadian Draft Convention. It was the view of the United Kingdom, supported principally by India, that the Canadian Convention required amplification. In its present form it was limited in scope to the economic control of commercial air operations (the allocation of routes and the control of frequencies and rates). With the approval of all, the Canadian Convention was amended, into it being woven provisions from the Paris, Havana, and Warsaw Conventions[74] in respect of technical and air navigation matters.

The amended document to be sponsored by Canada,[75] was promised the support of all at Chicago.

(c) Operators Conferences. Failing acceptance of (b), the United Kingdom proposed, and ultimately secured full support of, a system of operators conferences under which corporations engaged in air transport would mutually determine the allocation of routes, frequencies and rates, to govern their commercial operations; these conferences in turn would be subordinate to the jurisdiction of some governmental authority. Thus the principle of the control of competition would, in essence, be achieved and made the responsibility of the operators themselves who would become advisors to their governments and formally subject to their will.

(d) Bilateral Agreements and Standard Clauses. Failing acceptance of (b) and (c), and supposing reversions to bilateralism, an attempt would be made to salvage the principle of controlled competition, by insertion in all bilateral agreements of standard clauses which would secure, inter alia, (1) the regulation of frequencies, quotas, and rates, (2) an undertaking to facilitate the establishment as soon as practicable of an effective international authority, (3) that bilateral agreements be coterminous with a given transitional period, should the latter be considered necessary.

II. COMMONWEALTH AIR ROUTES

Each country was asked to indicate routes of possible interest to it. These were marked on a map. They make a surprisingly comprehensive system with relatively little duplication, apart from the universality of the United Kingdom interest.

III. METHODS OF OPERATION

There were before the Conference two main propositions:

(1) Australia and New Zealand favoured a single operating commonwealth corporation (assuming failure to secure internationalization)

(2) the balance of the countries considered (1) impracticable and favoured a series of national companies, operating in co-operation, each over the lines with which the various countries were by nature identified. Joint operations would in some cases be favoured.

IV. COMMONWEALTH CO-OPERATION

Regardless of the outcome at Chicago, it was considered desirable to form a Commonwealth air transport council to act as an advisory and consultative body, to work out the details of Commonwealth co-operation and to secure the advantages of a single company operation whilst preserving the principle of independent national operations.

V. TRANSITIONAL PERIOD

The Conference agreed that during the transitional period (here identified with the period during the balance of hostilities) (1) existing military services should be retained on a military basis, (2) expansion of civil services should be restricted, (3) if necessary, in the interests of the Commonwealth, carriage of civilians in military transport should be arranged.

Meanwhile the R.A.F., R.C.A.F., R.A.A.F., R.N.Z.A.F. should co-operate in opening a trans-Pacific service from the U.K.-United States to Australia, the R.C.A.F. operating the link from Dorval to San Diego. Similarly a proposed southern route — United Kingdom, Azores, Jamaica, British Honduras, Clipperton Islands, Marquesas was considered of primary importance — the R.C.A.F. would link this route with the northern route by a Canada-Carribean service.

VI. TECHNICAL QUESTIONS

The Conference found ready agreement on the need for standard practices and co-operation on technical questions.

In respect of the designation of specific types of aircraft for operation over Commonwealth routes, the Conference split: the United Kingdom headed a group in favour of the use of similar types of aircraft throughout (presumably British types); Canada and South Africa disagreed and would have limited the definition to aircraft of similar overall characteristics.

VII. RATIFICATION

It was understood that the discussions at Montreal were on the official level and as a body the session had no power of decision beyond the submission of unanimous recommendations to the respective governments.

The foregoing would form the basis of each country's approach at Chicago.

Un conseiller, la délégation à la Conférence internationale sur l'aviation civile, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Adviser, Delegation to International Civil Aviation Conference to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Chicago, November 9, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I am very sorry that I have not before now sent you a report on what has been going on at this conference. As you will realize, however, we have been extremely rushed.

2. Committee I of the conference is dealing with a "Multilateral Aviation Convention and International Aeronautical Body." This is divided into three sub-committees; Subcommittee I on "International Organization" of which Viscount Alain du Parc (Belgium) is chairman; Subcommittee 2 on "Air Navigation Principles" of which Mr. L. Welch Pogue (United States) is chairman; and Subcommittee 3 on "Air Transportation Principles" of which Mr. Symington (Canada) is chairman.

3. Parts I and II of the Canadian Convention have been taken as the basis of discussion in Subcommittees 1 and 3. The relevant sections of the United States draft,[76] a copy of which I enclose, (Document 16)† has been taken as the basis of discussion in Subcommittee 2.

[76]Voir États-Unis:/See United States:
Proceedings of the International Civil Aviation Conference. Volume I, pp. 554-66.

4. In Subcommittees 1 and 3, the Canadian draft has been read through once, article by article, Mr. Symington giving an explanation of each article after it is read. A very limited amount of discussion has taken place, and the reading of the articles involves no commitment on the part of anyone.

5. The members of the conference have now been invited to submit amendments to the Canadian draft and we also, of course, are working on amendments in order to narrow the gap between our proposals and those of the United States and other countries.

6. It is clear, however, that most states are realizing that the main struggle at the conference is between the United States on one side, and the United Kingdom on the other, with Canada in between, and are reluctant to commit themselves to either side. They are waiting until they see how far the United Kingdom and the United States can resolve their differences; if they can resolve them, then they will be in the happy position of not having to take sides.

7. This is a not unnatural position for these states to take and we are, therefore, making no efforts to persuade them to commit themselves at this stage. Instead we are doing our best to draft revisions of our convention which will prove generally acceptable to both the United States and the United Kingdom. We are already meeting with some success in this and tomorrow representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada are going to get together to try to iron out their differences.

8. The sections in our convention which we are now concentrating on in our informal discussions with the British and the Americans are Section 1 and 2 of Article IV on the Board and Section 5 of Article V on the Regional Councils. I attach our latest draft of these sections.†

9. You will have noticed that the United States proposal on the constitution of the Interim Council was entirely unacceptable to us, since it provided for a fifteen-member Council of which "two members . . . shall be appointed by the Government of the United States; two by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; two by the Government of the British Commonwealth of Nations; and one each by Brazil, China and France." Fortunately, the Latin Americans took the lead in attacking this proposal and I think it is dead. State Department officials have told me that it did not originate in the State Department. My own feeling, when I first read of it, was that it might have originated in the White House, but I have no evidence of this.

10. Clearly we cannot get through this conference an Air Board consisting of eight members from the states of chief importance in international air transport, and four from the other states. We are, therefore, prepared to compromise on a 50-50 division — either 6-6 or 7-7. Mr. Symington's effectiveness in discussions at this conference is in large part due to his ability to talk not only as a business man, but as the head of an airline company. As such, he keeps insisting on the necessity of creating an effective organization which can act quickly. Consequently, he feels that it would probably be better for us to agree to a Board of twelve members, even if we run the danger that we may not be included as one of the six states of chief importance in air transport. I entirely agree with him on the necessity of keeping the Board small, and I think that our chances of being left off the Board, either as a permanent member or as one of the elected members, are so slight that we have little to worry about.

11. The Indians last night pushed hard for acceptance of the Dumbarton Oaks formula under which the five Great Powers would be permanent members of the Air Board and all the other members would be elected. They wanted the elected members chosen by regions. We took an uncompromising position on this and rejected it out of hand as being inconsistent with the functional principle of representation on international bodies. We will, of course, continue to maintain the functional principle in the discussions on the Air Board. The chances of the functional principle not being adopted for the permanent membership are, I think, very slight.

12. Mr. Howe's speech[77] and the revised Canadian convention have obviously weakened the whole United States position at this conference. The line which Mr. Berle took in his opening speech on the presentation of the United States view was that the United States could not agree to the setting up of an international authority which, in the absence of established law, rules, principles and criteria could act arbitrarily, and he threw out a challenge to states to bring forward precise formula. This, of course, we did in Mr. Howe's speech and in the revised convention, and we have made it clear that we are willing to go as far as the United States want to go in spelling out in the convention every last rule, principle, criteria and comma to cover every eventuality.

13. We realize, of course, that even if we can come to agreement with the United States on all these principles, etc., the United States still has a high hurdle to get over. What they are afraid of is that when the convention or treaty comes before the Senate or the House someone is going to get up and say — "You have agreed to a convention under which a foreign body can say to a United States airline — you cannot fly here, and you cannot fly there, or you can run only so many services a day or a week here or there." Mr Stokeley Morgan, the head of the Aviation Division in the State Department, frankly told me that this us the thing that worries him most. Their worries would, or course, be sensibly diminished if the United States airline companies could be sold on the convention but, as Mr. Morgan put it to me yesterday, none of them, except Pan American, have any knowledge of international air politics and law, and they don't realize that if we continue with the pre-war regime in the air, an American airline company cannot go into a foreign country, or increase its frequencies, until the State Department gets permission from all the foreign governments concerned.

[77] Ibid, pp. 67-74.

14. It is, I think, conceivable that if we come to an agreement on principles, etc., which should govern the various international organs, the Americans may state, as Berle implied yesterday at his press conference, that there is no necessity for establishing these organs on other than a purely advisory basis, that all that is necessary is that the various states sign a convention undertaking to abide by these principles.

15. We would find it most helpful to have your advice on how best to meet this argument. My guess is that our answer should be two-fold. We should say that numerous controversies would arise between the states signing the convention on whether the other states were, in fact, carrying out the convention, that this would result in a lot of diplomatic discussion, and if discussion through diplomatic channels did not result in satisfaction, appeals would be made to the Permanent Court of International Justice on the legal question of whether, in fact, the state concerned had violated the convention; the questions at issue would be so technical that the Court would have to set up a Board of Assessors on air matters to advise it and this Board would amount very much to our proposed World Air Board, without many of the advantages of the kind of Board which we propose.

16. The second part of the answer would, I suggest, be that there is a great advantage in setting up small bodies of members with long tenure, who get to know each other, who learn to work with each other, and who are, therefore, able to deal with controversies between states more easily than if no permanent body existed.

17. You will recall that at the Montreal meeting we agreed to revise Section 3 of Article I on the Reservation of Services between Contiguous Member States. Under the March 17 draft, services would be reserved from the jurisdiction of the international authority if one of the states concerned desired to reserve. Under the present draft, agreed to in Montreal, services are reserved only if both states want to reserve.

18. Mr. Symington is concerned about this amendment which we accepted. He is afraid that if the United States were to sign a convention along the lines of our present draft, they would not want to reserve services to Canada; the Canada-U.S. services would then come under a North American Regional Council, and we would not get as good a deal out of that Council as we would be likely to get as a result of a bilateral bargain with the United States.

19. While Mr. Symington has moved in this direction since Montreal, the British have moved in the opposite direction. They are afraid that under the section as at present drafted, the European states could establish a whole network of routes in Europe which would be outside the jurisdiction of the international authority. They would, therefore, like us to consent to the withdrawal of the whole proviso. Alternatively, they would want the proviso to cover services between adjacent or neighbouring countries so that they could make their own bilateral agreements with France, the Netherlands and Belgium.

20. If this United Kingdom proposal were to go before the conference they might well get the support of countries like Cuba, and Australia and New Zealand might do their utmost to get a proviso under which they would be regarded as adjacent countries.

21. Mr. Symington would like to get the proviso back in its March 17 form. The United Kingdom, however, will certainly oppose this. How the other powers would line up I don't know. Brazil would, I suppose, support us because it touches almost every country in Latin America. The European powers would probably support us. It would also, of course, be a sop to the Russians.

22. If it got to a vote we might, therefore, be able to carry it, but the United Kingdom would do its best to have the word "contiguous" changed to "adjacent" or "neighbouring." This, in my opinion, would open so large a loophole in the convention that there would be danger that the purposes of the convention would be frustrated.

23. A possible compromise formula has occurred to me which I shall put up to Mr. Symington. That is that Section 3 of Article I should read as follows:

"The Authority shall have exclusive jurisdiction pursuant to the provisions of this convention, over international air services other than services which are extensions of not more than . . . miles in length of a domestic service to the territory of a contiguous, adjacent or neighbouring state."[78]

24. Mr. Berle returned to the conference yesterday morning after having been away for a day or two. In the afternoon he gave a press conference which was somewhat disturbing. Though he is supposed, at his press conferences, to speak as chairman of the conference, he undoubtedly was speaking as head of the American delegation. He told the newspaper men that there was no chance of the conference agreeing on anything except an Authority with advisory powers. Fortunately, some of the more intelligent newspaper men, such as Russell Porter of the New York Times, knew enough about what is actually happening at the conference to refuse to send out Mr. Berle's remarks as being their opinion of the present state of the discussions. Mr. Berle's talk was doubly dangerous because it was all off the record and could not be attributed to him.

25. In private conversation Mr. Berle takes exactly the opposite line. Why he should have put on a public exhibition of this character I do not know, but one of the American newspaper men thought the results of the election had made him "drunk with power."

26. The Dominions Office representative here has told me in the strictest confidence that before the United Kingdom delegation left London, Lord Swinton secured from the Cabinet an instruction that he was not to include the Irish in any Commonwealth meeting; the United Kingdom delegation was, however, to maintain friendly relations with the members of the Irish delegation. The Dominions Office representative was entirely frank in telling me what is, no doubt, known to you, that this policy of excluding the Irish from the Commonwealth councils is a policy which Mr. Churchill has forced on the British Cabinet.

27. The attached letter, signed by Mr. Baldwin, will supplement the information given in this letter, and will deal with the work of the committees which he has been attending, and the technical committes.

28. We shall look forward to receiving your comments and advice on the various problems raised in this and in Mr. Baldwin's letter. The reason I have made this report so long is to enable us in our future communications with you to refer to the relevant paragraphs of these letters.

P.S.

I attach a marked copy of the article in the New York Times for November 9 by Russell Porter.† With the exception of the first four paragraphs the article is clearly a summary of what Mr. Berle said at his press conference on November 7. These statements of Mr. Berle's consititute the basis for the conclusion reached in paragraph 14 of this letter.

Mr. Symington's press conference yesterday went off extremely well, and I think we can be pleased with the account of it which appeared in today's New York Times.

Un conseiller,
la délégation à la Conférence internationale sur l'aviation civile
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Adviser, Delegation to International Civil Aviation Conference
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Chicago, November 9, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson:

Mr. Reid has asked me to supplement his exhaustive study of subcommittee one and three of Committee I.

2. Committee I has a further subcommittee (2) which is dealing with the principles of air navigation to be included in any permanent document. In view of the fact that the Canadian Convention had been accepted as the basis for consideration in subcommittees one and three, it was agreed that the American Convention to the extent that it dealt with air navigation as separate from air transport should be used in subcommittee two. This subcommittee is dealing merely with the general articles in the field of air navigation which would have to be included in a permanent document. These broadly speaking parallel the Part 2 of the revised Canadian Convention. No substantial problems are likely to arise in this subcommittee. One or two relevant articles in the American Convention overlapped into the field of air transportation principles, i.e. in particular, grant freedoms one and two multilaterally for commercial services. We have, with full support of sympathetic delegations, taken the position that while subcommittee 2 may discuss this it can only be decided finally in subcommittee three since it is fundamentally a part of the field of air transport.

3. Main Committee II of the Conference also deals with air navigation but is now broken up into a large number of subcommittees which are dealing with voluminous technical annexes covering the whole field of air navigation and submitted by the United States. These presumably would become annexes to any permanent convention. The work the United States has done in this field is extremely valuable. We, as you know, have a large quantity of technical advisers down for this job. At first the United Kingdom were inclined to avoid any action on these annexes on the ground that they did not have sufficient technical people here, but they have sent for a large supply of technical experts and I think it is intended to agree if possible substantially on all annexes. None of the other delegations are adequately supplied with technical advisers to do this work but it seems generally to be accepted that if the documents are satisfactory to Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom, they will be suitable to the others. As a matter of fact, the Ethopian delegate asked us if we could lend him a technical adviser. It is estimated that there is still ten days of relatively hard work to be done on these annexes. Canada as a result of the discussions in Montreal has proposed the addition of two or three new annexes covering such fields as form of documents, salvage, insurance and accident etc.

4. Main Committee III and IV of the Conference deal respectively with provisional arrangements for services during the transitional period and the establishment of an interim council for the same period. At the outset of the Conference it was quite evident that the United States intended to concentrate its efforts upon the activities of these committees rather than on permanent organization. Mr. Berle himself has taken the committee on provisional arrangements in hand.

5. This committee has established one working subcommittee while the committee on an interim council has established two working subcommittees, one on the nature of an interim council and the other on powers and duties.

6. We have taken the stand in both committees generally and have received sufficient support from other delegations to carry our point that in neither case can any official agreement be worked out until fundamental agreement has been reached upon principles for a permanent organization. The United States in main Committee III submitted a document which was in effect an interim convention complete with annexes of provisional routes to be operated during the transitional period. The document covered all the necessary rights for the operation of these services and would in effect have been a multilateral agreement providing a complete pattern of routes for the beginning of the transitional period. As a result of discussion the committee seems to be swinging to the position, however, that rather than attempt this (which might, of course, prejudice our work for a permanent body here) the goal should be the establishment of a standard type of agreement incorporating standard clauses which would be used in bilateral or multilateral dealings during the transitional period. The United States has also accepted the position in both this committee and Committee IV that to as great an extent as possible all arrangements covering the transitional period should include the principles agreed upon for a permanent authority. In consequence the discussion in the subcommittees of both committees centered largely upon a few points upon which there can be no possible objection and upon a few special points which have to be dealt with in the transitional period and which are not relevant to a permanent organization. All these subcommittees have virtually completed their work now as far as can be done at present and will not be able to go ahead until the main decisions in subcommittees one and three of Committee I have been taken. On the whole we feel that this is a satisfactory position.

7. The general remarks I have made in the foregoing paragraphs of the work of Committee III apply also to Committee IV and its subcommittees. The only additional feature here has been the vociferous opposition of a number of the nations, centered around the Latin American group, to the United States proposals for constitution of an interim council; these are roughly the same as their proposals for a permanent council, i.e. weighted voting with inadequate representation for any nations other than the great powers. Mr. Reid's comments on this in his letter apply equally to both the United States permanent and transitional proposals. The only addition to his remarks which I might offer is the fact that a Latin American bloc is understood to be planning to come forward with its own proposals for constitution of a council which would apply to both the interim and the permanent period and that these proposals also are likely to prove unsatisfactory in that they will go to the other extreme of inadequate functional representation.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. BALDWIN

Rapport d'un conseiller,
la délégation à la Conférence internationale sur l'aviation civile
au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Report from Adviser, Delegation to International Civil Aviation Conference
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Chicago, November 12, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson:

This afternoon at 4.30 we held the first meeting of the three great air powers. There were present:

From the United States
Mr. Berle,
Mr. Pogue, and
Mr. Burden.

From the United Kingdom
Lord Swinton,
Sir Arthur Street, and
Mr. Cribbett.

From Canada
Mr. Howe,
Mr. Symington, and myself.

The meeting lasted until 7:45 with a half-hour's intermission.

2. Mr. Berle, of course, was in the chair, and he began by stating that he thought it would be best to have the discussions take place under the following three heads:

(1) Rules of the game.

(2) What the international authority ought to be and do (including under this the discussion of ports of commercial entry).

(3) In the event of our being able to reach agreement, the tactics we should follow in presenting the conclusions to the full conference.

3. There was general agreement that this was the intelligent way of approaching the problem.

4. Mr. Berle then presented the enclosed document, which is dated November 11, and which is entitled — "Basic Policies with Respect to the Conduct of International Air Transportation During the Interim Period."†

5. It became clear from the discussion which ensued and from informal talks which I had during the short adjournment with the members of all three delegations that the presentation of this paper had precipitated a first-class crisis. Lord Swinton, who does not appear to have that mastery of understatement which is normally required of diplomatic negotiators, said that it was "quite impossible to do" anything at this conference about the designation of airports. He then complained, "I only wish I had had a chance of seeing this document earlier." Later in the discussion, commenting on some remark of Mr. Berle's he said, "I resent that".

6. Mr. Berle did not improve the situation when he referred, speaking he said "very bluntly", to the negotiations which were taking place between certain United Kingdom interests and certain Argentine interests by which United Kingdom airlines would be able to operate in South America under the guise of Latin American companies.

7. Before the discussion had gone on for more than perhaps thirty minutes, it became clear that we were headed in the direction of a full-dress debate between the United Kingdom and the United States on the general principle of whether there should be international control of frequencies. It also became clear that if this debate took place, Lord Swinton would have evinced remarkably little knowledge of what he was talking about.

8. Mr. Howe had arrived at the hotel just as the meeting began, and we had not, therefore, had a chance of any discussions with him in order to bring him up-to-date on the developments which had occurred since he left. We therefore pleaded this to Mr. Berle as an excuse for adjourning the meeting for a quarter of an hour so that Mr. Symington and I could have a chance to have a talk with Mr. Howe.

9. Mr. Howe and Mr. Symington agreed that I might try to persuade Mr. Berle and Lord Swinton not to resume the argument which had consumed an hour or hour and a half, but to discuss our latest draft of Section 5 of Article V, copies of which I enclose. (Edition of November 13, 1944 — one star.)†

10. I was able to get Mr. Berle by himself. He was in a raging temper with Lord Swinton. He accused the United Kingdom delegation of having misled the United States delegation completely about their position by some message which they had sent through Dr. Warner previous to the meeting this afternoon. He was obviously eager to cross swords with Lord Swinton and thought that the time had come to face the real issue before the conference. After some ten or fifteen minutes I managed, however, to persuade him to agree on the following procedure. On the resumption of the session, Canada would suggest that we try to get to grips with the problem of control of carrying capacity by discussing the revised Section 5 of Article V of our convention which, in Mr. Berle's words "adumbrated" the Canadian escalator clause. Mr. Berle said that this would be subject to a reservation on the part of the United States; that they were not committing themselves to any particular type of international machinery or, indeed, of any international machinery.

11. Lord Swinton, when I then called on him, was in a state of anger equal to Mr. Berle's. He accused the United States of having double-crossed the United Kingdom. He said that they had come to the meeting this afternoon on the assumption that they were going to discuss the principles of the permanent convention and Mr. Berle had suddenly presented them with a document which covered only the interim period and which would give the United States a completely free hand in that period. (Mr. Howe and Mr. Symington had previously told me that they felt very much the same about Mr. Berle's action.)

Lord Swinton, however, without much difficulty, was persuaded to concur in the agreement which I had reached with Mr. Berle.

12. When I returned to Mr. Berle's room where we had been meeting, I found that the United States delegation had returned and were discussing the problem with Mr. Howe and Mr. Symington, who had remained in the room. Mr. Berle said that the United States had never desired, and did not desire, the provision in our convention providing for an escalator which went down as well as up.

13. Mr. Berle made this reassuring announcement when the meeting was resumed and we proceeded to discussion of our draft. This discussion lasted from about 6.00 to 7.45, and was eminently satisfactory. So far as I could see, no insuperable differences emerged between the United States and the United Kingdom. A few drafting changes were suggested in our revision, but for the most part it was accepted in principle, and subject to all kinds of reservations, apart from paragraph 2 (of sub-section 1), Mr. Berle pointing out that the formula which we had advanced would mean that should an Argentine company be established to fly from Buenos Aires to New York, our formula would entitle that company to one-half of the carrying capacity on the route, and that this might well mean that the United States airline companies which had built up, at very great expense, traffic between New York and Buenos Aires would have to take services off the route as soon as the allocation under sub-section 1 of Section 5 went into effect. Mr. Berle, of course, realized that this possible diminution of United States services to Latin America would be only temporary in view of the provisions of sub-sections 2 and 3. He indicated pretty clearly, however, that what he was afraid of was the kind of unintelligent debate which might be precipitated in Congress and in the press of this country.

14. Mr. Berle felt that the formula would probably be fair if applied to the countries in Europe which had, in his words, been "ravaged" by the war, but that it would produce inequitable results elsewhere, and particularly in Latin America.

15. The meeting ended in an agreement on all sides that sub-section 1 of Section 5 needed some revision.

16. We are to meet again tomorrow morning at 10:00 a.m. Mr. Berle tells me that he wants to discuss rates, and that he will insist this time that the United States draft be taken as the basis of discussion. We shall, however, of course, have our own with us.

17. Mr. Berle said to me frankly when we were alone after the meeting this afternoon, that he intended later on in the discussions to press for as little international machinery as possible. He thought that many, if not most, of the rules of the game agreed on might be automatic in their application. I, of course, did not give any indication of our position on this. As I wrote you before, we had expected that the United States would take this line, and when they do I think we will not have any difficulty in meeting their arguments insofar as they have no substance. Certainly I am sure you would agree that wherever the rules and principles can be made automatic, it would be very much the better. However, we certainly cannot set up a very complicated system for controlling air traffic and at the same time establish no quasi-judicial or administrative bodies to interpret the rules.

18. As a result of today's discussions, I think we have got through the first crisis of the conference, and my guess is that there will be about two more major crises.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID
by R. M. M.

P.S. Just as I was about to leave the conference room where I stayed for a short talk with the United States delegates, Mr. Burden discovered a voluminous file of papers on the conference table, and asked me if they were mine. I glanced through them and found that most of the memoranda were undated, so I immediately replied that they must belong to the United Kingdom delegation. The file was open in the middle. When I closed it I found on the outside — "Mr. Cribbett: Secret." I returned the papers to Mr. Cribbett.

The Great Power meetings will end today. A new draft convention[79] has been worked out. It is satisfactory, but there has been compromise on all sides. The Canadian convention is being played down, but the new convention still retains many of the features of the draft taken to Chicago.

The main changes are:

1. Regional Councils have been dropped entirely, concentrating everything in the hands of the Board. This means regional operators' conferences.

2. Change in Board of clause which gave the Board mandatory powers, to make them permissive ("may" instead of "shall").

3. Instead of having Board grant licences in accordance with agreed principles, working of the principles being made automatic — the principles being written in. The Board will make statistical allocations in accordance therewith — then up to each government to comply. 4. Canadian delegation propose to dig in on clause re settlement of differences between member states. Prevision provision is for compulsory settlement — unless retained, they doubt the efficacy of the above provision.

5. Fifth freedom added — right to pick up and let down traffic at any point on route — U.S. insisted; U.K. have fought but will probably have to give in, with qualifying restrictions.

6. Next stage is to have agreed document, if any, put before other powers. France, China, and Brazil to be brought in first.

SECRET AND PERSONAL Chicago, November 21, 1944

Dear Mr. Howe,

The conference is at the worst point as regards an air transport convention that it has yet reached. There were no further three power meetings on Sunday after you left. The U.S. and U.K. technical people, however, have attempted to re-write Article XI (the capacity article) which is of course the most important article in the convention, but completely failed to reach agreement. Nevertheless, a further draft of the convention was circulated late Sunday night to the three powers which contained the U.S. version of Article XI and which also dropped any reservation on the fifth freedom.

On Monday morning we were asked by Mr. Berle to act as an intermediary between the U.S. and U.K. to make a last attempt to find a solution. We tried various variations of the proposed formula for initial allocation and for increase of frequencies and even suggested reliance on operators conference but without success. Lord Swinton had apparently received further word from London and could not modify his position in the least while, as time passed, there were signs that Mr. Berle was inclined to ask for more and more, including the dropping of the "birthright" article which was intended to protect the liberated areas. Mr. Symington and Sir Arthur Street managed to find a satisfactory formula which, however, Lord Swinton did not feel he could accept (which of course might have been completely unacceptable to the U.S. as well). A further three power meeting called for noon was postponed because Lord Swinton did not feel he was in a position to discuss the matter.

We finally met again at 3:30 yesterday afternoon. No attempt was made to discuss any draft article, the time was spent really stating clearly the opposing points of view so that the main outstanding differences would be fully understood on each side. Mr. Berle started by pointing out that, as he understood it, the only difficulties were the formula for initial allocation and the formula for the escalator clause.

The U.S. felt that the attempt to confine the formula to traffic embarked in the state of origin, not taking into account traffic picked up under the fifth freedom, would be unfair and lead to uneconomic operation, pointing out that the U.S. operators said that unless traffic picked up under the fifth freedom were considered in both the initial allocation and the escalator clause they would not be able to provide enough service. Lord Swinton then pointed out that the U.K. acceptance of the draft convention had been passed upon the Canadian draft which only had four freedoms and that his Government felt that if the fifth freedom was added, traffic picked up under the fifth could not be considered in the formula for initial allocation or for increase. He stressed again the necessity of protecting smaller countries which would suffer if the U.S. point of view were accepted. He gave the distinct impression that he felt there was very little use of discussing the matter further and that an agreement to disagree was all that could be hoped for. In short, he seemed to have given up all hope.

Mr. Berle, evidently annoyed by the reference to protection of small powers, spoke rather strongly about the lack of future for the European refugee governments. He, too, seemed to have little hope of reaching agreement and suggested that the alternative seemed to be a return to bilateral agreements covering everything. He did, however, display a readiness to keep the matter open for another day or so. He reported that he, too, had been in touch with Washington and had grave doubts regarding the possibility of mustering enough support there for the position taken by the U.S. in meeting the U.K. and Canada. He did, however, suggest one possibility which it was eventually agreed to consider overnight and discuss again this morning. This was that all through tickets should be considered as traffic embarked in the country of origin to the farthest point of destination on the through ticket regardless of stopovers. For example, a U.S. traveller to Cairo might buy a through ticket and might stop over in London or Paris for considerable periods; he would be considered as a U.S. passenger embarked for Cairo and would thus count as a U.S. passenger over the whole route both as regards initial allocation and the escalator clause. The U.K. of course had hitherto taken the position that such a passenger would only be considered as a U.S. embarked passenger up to the first major stopover and that after the stopover he would be considered as a passenger embarked in whatever country he had made the stopover. There is a slight hope that if the U.K. will accept this suggestion, which, incidentally, Mr. Symington supported as being sensible, Mr. Berle might withdraw his demand that all traffic embarked under the fifth freedom be considered in both the initial allocation and the escalator clause. I am not, however, unduly optimistic about this. Mr. Berle also pointed out that it would be impossible to keep the conference waiting any longer and accordingly the three power draft convention was last night made available to the full conference which is to discuss it tomorrow. The controversial points, i.e. the capacity article, the birthright article, and the section granting the fifth freedom, have, however, been omitted. The article on denunciation has also been omitted since there was an apparent disposition to thrash the life of any document unduly and Mr. Symington took strong exception to this.

If we should fail to reach agreement, as appears likely, Mr. Berle will undoubtedly propose that such material as has been agreed, be referred to an interim drafting committee on multilateral convention as was originally proposed by the U.S. This drafting committee would report to an interim council. In these conditions, we will have to consider what sort of interim council or document we would be prepared to accept. It is quite clear that the U.S. understood we would not be prepared to make any concessions to an interim organization without some agreement on the permanent, and is not likely therefore to press very hard for any freedoms in the interim period.

Since starting the dictation of this letter, further word has been received from Mr. Berle that it is apparent no agreement can be reached and that all hope of a permanent document with any teeth in it has been given up. In the circumstances, we will have to reconsider our position and will undoubtedly be getting in touch with you again regarding what little may be achieved here including our position on any provisional arrangements. Mr. Symington will be making some sort of a speech at the session tomorrow and at present our feeling is in the direction of a fairly strong statement which will protect our own position, make clear that we are in no way at fault for the breakdown and express our great disappointment.

Hindsight is never a particularly useful tool for immediate action, but it may be useful to have on the record some of the factors which have been important in leading to the breakdown. In the first instance, I think it was a great error to call a complete conference of the United Nations before the major powers had met and attempted to reach some common ground. As a result, the conference here has been inactive for ten days, while Canada, the U.S. and the U.K. have attempted to resolve their difficulties. This has not been entirely pleasing to the small nations, while France, the Netherlands, and one or two others which have some claim to be considered major air powers, have been displeased by being virtually left out. Moreover, because of the necessity of keeping the conference going, there has been inadequate time for the great powers to consider and thrash out their difficulties. A meeting of the major air powers would have had far more chance of success than the present meeting of all the United Nations.

We were from the beginning under a handicap as a result of the U.S. inability to recognize the great change in outlook of the U.K., European powers, and a large number of countries in other areas of the world; a change in outlook which involved a desire for some effective regulation of international affairs. This of course is an ill omen for future discussions on any subject of international importance.

Apart from this severe initial handicap, there has been a serious handicap imposed by the misfortune that the heads of the U.S. and U.K. delegations were far from sympathetic in temperament and a clash of personalities was added to the initial difficulties.

Personally, I think that the U.K. was far too much bound by instructions from London and the necessity for reference back on every point that arose. In consequence, discussions have been delayed all too frequently while apparently the instructions from London have made it difficult for the U.K. on some points to show as great a spirit of compromise as was required. The U.K. also seems to have given up the attempt to reach agreement sooner than either the U.S. or Canada. On the other hand, some justification for this position may be found in the U.S. tactics of raising a new demand every time Canada or the U.K. gave in on a previous demand. Finally, there were delays which I feel to some extent were unnecessary, as a result of turning over drafting of difficult points to people who were primarily technical experts and who produced language and formulae so involved that the issues at stake became upon occasion completely confused.

Under the circumstances, we will probably be back in Ottawa sooner than I had expected. Personally, I shall not be sorry to escape from this atmosphere. I am not unduly concerned over our ability to make satisfactory bilateral agreements in the future. I am greatly concerned by the indications that have been given here of the difficulties that may be expected in all future negotiations on almost every subject. Perhaps I am unduly pessimistic. I think Canada will have to be prepared to make its own arrangements and bargains in almost every field and to be as strong and independent in every field as we can.

I can only add that every delegation I have talked to realizes that we have led the way in trying to reach a satisfactory solution of divergent views, that we have played an entirely praiseworthy part throughout the negotiations and that no blame can be attached to us for any breakdown.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. BALDWIN

Adviser, International Civil Aviation Conference, to Secretary to the Cabinet

Chicago, November 23, 1944

Dear Mr. Heeney:

The conference has gone through some surprising changes since I wrote you two days ago.[80] At that time negotiations had completely broken down between the United Kingdom and the United States by mutual agreement. We, however, continued to work on a compromise formula for the traffic regulation article, and in the afternoon Mr. Symington addressed a formal letter to both Mr. Berle and Lord Swinton,† stating his strong view that a further attempt [80]Non trouvé mais probablement semblable au document précédent.

Not located but probably similar to preceding document.

towards settlement should be made, that failure at this stage would be merely destructive, and enclosing the suggested Canadian compromise article.

Such a formal communication in diplomatic procedure, of course, meant that Canada was virtually placing the blame on the U.K. and the U.S. for the breakdown. The letters apparently caused considerable flutterings in the dovecotes, but no great change of heart. The British came up and discussed it, but remained impervious to appeals.

Mr. Symington, Mr. Reid and myself had dinner with the chief American advisers representing the operators, namely, Mr. Damon, Mr. Russell of National Aviation, Colonel Harris, formerly of Pan Agra, and Colonel Gates of the C.A.A.[81] Mr. Symington left immediately after dinner to go to a Commonwealth meeting, but Reid and I stayed on for the balance of the evening and made a great deal of progress.

The operators themselves made some useful suggestions and showed a complete readiness to continue to seek a settlement, and believed that a satisfactory compromise could be found along the lines we proposed.

Meanwhile, Mr. Symington had a very difficult time at the Commonwealth meeting, where the U.K. was attempting to line up all the delegations for Wednesday's plenary session to support the U.K. position that the conference had been a success, even though it had not reached final agreement upon a permanent convention. Mr. Symington alone refused to take this position and came back from the Commonwealth meeting quite discouraged, feeling that the other Dominions were going to speak in support of the U.K.

Yesterday, (Wednesday) morning he had breakfast with Mr. Damon, and during the morning we had further consultations with both the U.S. and the British, pursuing this time a new line that had been opened up by Mr. Damon, who expressed a readiness to drop the fifth freedom, although he later told us he did not have a great deal of success putting this view over to his delegation.

Mr. Symington later in the morning had an equally difficult time in the Steering Committee where an attempt again was made to line all the countries up to support the position taken by Mr. Berle that we must now merely conclude an interim agreement and put the best face on matters possible.

By this time Mr. Symington was virtually in a state of nervous exhaustion, and I was very much afraid that he would collapse in the afternoon plenary session. His obvious exhaustion actually stood him in good stead, for it was apparent to the whole meeting, and it led him to make a speech which, because of its brevity, had great effect.

Mr. Berle led off by praising the achievements of the conference to date, and suggesting that we had not completed the work because it was too ambitious a dream. Lord Swinton took a somewhat similar point of view. Both received perfunctory applause. Mr. Symington then, in a speech of not more than 250 words, expressed his great disappointment, and the disappointment that must be felt by the world, by the failure to reach agreement on the really substantial points before the conference, and said frankly that Canada would continue as long as the conference lasted to seek to bring the U.K. and the U.S. together. He received a tremendous ovation, which took both the U.K. and the U.S. heads unawares.

Then an amazing procession of speeches began. China, as had been previously arranged, supported Mr. Berle's suggestion for only an interim agreement. The Latin Americans, who had obviously been expected to do the same, played into our hands by asking for a 24-hour delay for study. The delegate from Greece confused the issue completely, but helped us nevertheless by a muddled series of questions by which at least he made it apparent that Greece expected a full and complete document to be presented before we were through. The Netherlands expressed its agreement with the partial document already presented, but its disappointment that the important parts had not been completed and included. Australia, in an overly long but nevertheless clear speech, came in behind Mr. Symington. Mr. Sullivan of New Zealand made a short, but extremely telling speech, in which he gave whole-hearted support to Mr. Symington. India and South Africa, which we had expected to support the U.K., said nothing whatsoever.

Then Mayor LaGuardia arose and made a brilliant and effective "Latin" speech in which he too threw the gauntlet vigorously at the U.K. and the U.S. for their failure to compose their differences at a time when the world was waiting for leadership, and he too received a tremendous ovation.

With that the meeting broke up. Had it not been for Mayor LaGuardia the tenor of the discussion would have been a complete snub for both the U.K. and the U.S. As it was, the fact that a U.S. representative had spoken to this effect would improve their position, though his speech was taken by many as directed towards Mr. Berle as well as towards Lord Swinton.

For the moment, we are sitting quiet, feeling that Canada has, for the present, shot its bolt. Mr. Symington went to bed immediately after the meeting. We locked his doors, put "Do Not Disturb" signs out, and cancelled all his telephone calls. He is inclined himself to stay here for another forty-eight hours, feeling that if the deadlock cannot be broken by then, the situation is hopeless, but there is no doubt whatever that he should go away as soon as possible for a rest.

Meanwhile, both the U.S. and U.K. delegations have been meeting in closed session to review their positions again, and we are far more hopeful than we were twenty-four hours ago. We know that we can carry the American operators with us in what we think is satisfactory settlement, as well as practically all other members of the American delegation.

Mr. Berle himself remains difficult, and apparently is very much afraid of the reactions of his senatorial advisers.

As for the U.K., — they are in a terribly difficult situation and unless they show greater willingness to meet the U.S. half-way, I would guess that they would go out of the conference bearing, as far as the delegations here are concerned, most of the blame. We ourselves feel that it is the U.K. that has to take the first step now, since we have reason to believe that the U.S. is willing, at the first signs of a move from the U.K., to make a move to meet them.

Two things at least were accomplished by yesterday afternoon's plenary session. Canada was publicly recognized as the mediator which had been leading the way in trying to find a solution. Also, it will not be possible now to come out with less than a complete permanent document if failure is to be avoided, for no matter what may be achieved on a smaller scale, both the delegations and the press will interpret anything less than a complete solution as failure after yesterday's demonstration.

I am sending a similar letter to Mr. Howe.† I am also attaching an extra copy of this letter for Mr. Robertson.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. BALDWIN

SECRET Chicago, November 25, 1944

Dear Mr. Heeney:

The slight degree of optimism which I felt when I wrote two days ago seems to have been unfounded. Certain new developments since that time have definitely lessened the chances for an effective settlement here.

2. I will deal first with the situation as regards the United Kingdom-United States differences over regulation of capacity. On Thursday morning we took no initiative ourselves, feeling that this would be the wisest course after Mr. Symington's speech the previous day. Late in the morning, however, Mr. Berle sent for Mr. Symington and indicated that the United States would be quite happy if Mr. Symington could find a solution which would be considered acceptable by the American operators and by the United Kingdom delegation. We had prepared, as you know, a compromise based on the dropping of the fifth freedom and proceeded along these lines. Late in the afternoon Mr. Symington had an extended talk with Lord Swinton at a cocktail party, the results of which, however, were not hopeful. Nevertheless, that evening Mr. Symington, after further conversations with the United States operators, addressed a personal and informal letter to Lord Swinton (in longhand) enclosing a draft† of the section covering the two most controversial points, initial allocation and the escalator clause, and requesting Lord Swinton to have the United Kingdom operators study it and discuss it with the United States operators.

3. Meanwhile, the United Kingdom was determined to place its position before the conference and had prepared its version of the proposed traffic regulation article, together with a lengthy covering memorandum which it insisted should be circulated officially to the conference. In spite of advice that this might not be wise tactics they persisted, and it was natural in these circumstances for the United States to feel that it too had to circulate its suggestions for the same article. We circulated nothing.

4. These two documents were sent around yesterday morning but have not yet been considered officially by the conference. We had hoped that upon study the delegates here would realize how small was the margin of difference between the two. Even though this may be the case, however, the picture is not good, for discussions between the United Kingdom and United States operators have failed to reconcile them on the most important point, the escalator clause.

5. I attended a Commonwealth meeting late last night at which time Lord Swinton went over the United States suggestions. The main differences between the two plans are that the United Kingdom proposes that on the initial allocation capacity be scaled down after each stop so that after each stop the capacity is limited to fifty per cent of traffic embarked from the country of origin. The United States, however, on the grounds that this meant too frequent a scaling down and in consequence inefficiency of operation, had proposed that capacity be scaled down not at each stop but at given division points, i.e. major distribution centers, which might have several stops between them. This would enable them to maintain a higher average capacity throughout the whole division including several stops. They also insisted, of course, upon the through ticket principle, i.e. that the passenger must be considered as embarked for his farthest point of destination on a through ticket regardless of stop-overs. I think the United Kingdom while opposed to these suggestions would, however, be willing to meet them.

6. The main difficulty came in the difference over the escalator clause. There the United States insisted that traffic picked up under the fifth freedom should be considered a part of the payload in judging the sixty-five per cent necessary to get an increase in capacity. (Both the United Kingdom and the United States in their proposals incidentally had come out for the fifth freedom.) The United Kingdom flatly refused to accept this position and will only take an escalator clause based upon traffic picked up under the third freedom, i.e. embarked in country of origin. This would, of course, limit the value of the escalator clause.

7. Incidentally, we received in confidence and informally an interesting explanation of the United Kingdom position on this. It appears that when the escalator clause was first proposed the United Kingdom referred it to London where a special cabinet committee decided that the escalator principle could not be accepted and instructions were accordingly sent back on this basis. However, by mischance the word not was omitted in these United Kingdom instructions and the United Kingdom started out on the basis that an escalator clause was acceptable whereas in reality it had been turned down in London. When this difficulty was cleared up, Lord Swinton to his credit, stood by the escalator clause as far as he had gone up to that point, i.e. based on the third freedom, but, of course, insists now that he cannot go a step farther. Unless he does, I think there is little hope of agreement.

8. At the Commonwealth meeting last night the question of granting freedoms one and two also came up since it was apparent that even though no satisfactory authority is achieved here the United States will press for a multilateral grant of freedoms one and two. I took the position which had earlier been taken by Mr. Symington that we could not grant any freedoms without an effective permanent convention. India took the same line. The United Kingdom was at first prepared to grant freedom one without freedom two, a suggestion which appeared inconsistent to us since the two are inseparable, but without arguing the point Lord Swinton stated that he would be prepared to disregard the leeway given to him by his cabinet in this respect and refuse to grant any freedoms, i.e. the Canadian position.

9. Australia, New Zealand and South Africa felt less strongly on this point since they are all transit countries, but said they could see no point in granting freedoms one and two without an effective permanent authority and that they intended to take the position if the question arose.

10. We also learned last night that the Latin American bloc, spearheaded by one Dr. Machado of Cuba, is "agin the world" to the extent that it intends not only to prevent the establishment of any effective permanent authority here but also intends to oppose the granting of any freedoms whatsoever.

11. Meanwhile committees of the conference had been meeting to discuss the emasculated draft permanent convention which had been sent down to them at the beginning of the week. These meetings have got almost completely out of hand. On Thursday afternoon a meeting on an Interim Council took place which rivaled any burlesque show in Chicago. The Chairman, handicapped by lack of knowledge of English and inadequate experience in parliamentary procedure, got completely lost. As many as six motions were before the meeting at one time and no discretion was used in judging what motions should be voted on and what should be "hoisted" for the time being. The general temper of the Latin American nations and of certain of the smaller European countries was bad. A number of useless amendments were proposed and accepted despite divided votes, and there was a disposition to force as much through on the Interim Council as possible without waiting for any discussion on the permanent convention. I was the only Canadian representative present and after one or two attempts to do something early in the meeting I gave up completely in view of the confusion, feeling that the results could only be saved by concentrating our attention upon a later meeting when the permanent document would be considered. Vigorous attacks were made by Greece and Poland and supported by most of the Latin American nations on the great power principle and an attempt was made to give the main authority to the Assembly and to allow equal voting there to govern all important matters including free choice of a Council. There was obvious resentment based upon the fact that these smaller countries felt that the so called great powers and the Steering Committee of the conference were attempting to dictate procedure to them. This applied particularly to the proposal Mr. Berle had made earlier that the membership of the first Interim Council should be settled here on recommendation of the Steering Committee.

12. Yesterday two committee meetings were held to discuss the permanent convention articles submitted by the three great powers and to a lesser extent the events of the previous day were repeated. We kept very quiet, feeling that we should not inject ourselves into the situation again. Mr. Berle made only a half hearted attempt, I am afraid, to stem the tide and again the chairmanship did not work out very well with the result that motions were put forward and voted on when they should have been reserved for further discussion. The main change yesterday was enlargement of the proposed Board or Council to twenty-one members. Debate on the criteria for choice of the Board will continue today and there will be a strong attempt made I think to restrict the use of criteria and probably even to eliminate the functional principle entirely. Ireland, which is voting with the small powers, will bring forward a suggestion which it had put forward in the Interim Council meeting on Thursday and which was approved at that time; namely, that on all main committees and working groups of any organization set up each nation should have the right to be represented. This means that each main committee and working group may be composed of fifty or more members and you can easily foresee the result of such a situation.

13. I will not attempt at this time to analyze these developments. They may be a foretaste of what will come when a United Nations meeting on a world security organization is held. However, in all honesty, I must say that I feel that the situation need not have got out of hand if Mr. Berle and the United States delegation had displayed a greater generalship. The most charitable explanation is that inexperience and weariness has led Mr. Berle to this situation. The most uncharitable explanation is that the conference has been allowed to get out of hand deliberately with the knowledge that any attempt to set up a useful organization will be frustrated by this course.

Yours sincerely,

J. R. BALDWIN

Un conseiller, la Conférence internationale sur l'aviation civile, au ministre des Munitions et des Approvisionnements

Adviser, International Civil Aviation Conference, to Minister of Munitions and Supply

SECRET AND PERSONAL Chicago, November 28, 1944

Dear Mr. Howe,

This conference seems to have more ups and downs than a roller-coaster. The ups, interestingly enough, have all been caused by plenary sessions which have forced the U.K. and U.S. to reconsider their decisions.

When last I wrote to you the situation was far from bright; the U.K. and U.S., as you will recall, had both presented their proposals for the article on traffic regulations and there seemed little possibility that they could agree on the fundamental principle as to whether traffic picked up under the fifth freedom should be considered in the escalator clause.

Saturday they spent in consultation among themselves. On Sunday we tried another joint formula which was given to them separately and later discussed with them together. It did not carry the support of either the U.K. or U.S. although it had certain features which appealed to each. Briefly the Canadian proposal was:

1. Any route would be divided into divisions, the division points being the main distribution centres. If a division contained intermediate traffic stops, that division would be broken down into sectors in accordance with these stops.

2. The initial allocation would be based primarily, as in previous proposals, upon the right to carry 50% of traffic embarked from the state of origin for all the states en route, aggregated by divisions.

3. On the first division of a route, outward bound, services would be scaled down at sector points, if any, and at the end of the division as well. On all subsequent divisions scaling down would only take place at divisional points.

4. On all divisions after the first, each service would be entitled to put on extra capacity as part of its initial allocation, to carry potential fifth freedom traffic. The amount of this extra capacity would be 50% of the amount in a division to which a line was entitled under the embarkation rule (2) above.

5. As a compromise on U.K. and U.S. differences over through tickets, we proposed that passengers purchasing through tickets should be considered embarked to the furthest point of destination unless they were travelling on an airline not possessing the nationality of the state in which they embarked. (In such case, they would be considered as passengers embarked to the first stop-over).

6. Our escalator clause remained practically unchanged although we offered it on a division basis rather than a route or sector basis and also added that if a load factor rose above 65% on a sector of a division, the escalation granted would apply to the whole division.

7. Any state would have the right to contract out of the fifth freedom.

Yesterday was devoted to discussion in full committee of this problem. We, for obvious reasons, felt that we had to put the Canadian compromise proposal before the whole conference and accordingly it was circulated in the morning. The nations here obviously wanted to know our stand while the action had the added advantage that we would not have to support either the U.K. or U.S. proposals.

Due to the delay in putting our proposal forward, most of the debate centered around the U.K. and U.S. proposals. Mr. Berle had obviously whipped the Latin American nations into line and not only were they prepared to accept regulation but spoke very strongly in favour of the U.S. proposals. The U.K. had rather expected this but really received a body blow when the smaller European nations began to support the U.S. The Netherlands, Sweden and Denmark all came out for the U.S. position. Belgium and Greece hedged but certainly did not support the U.K. and clearly indicated that the conference must find some solution. France supported some features of the U.S. position and some of the British position. China suggested delaying discussion to study the Canadian plan which at first reading appealed to them. Of the Dominions, apart from Canada, only Australia and New Zealand spoke. Australia was confused by the whole situation while New Zealand refrained from committing itself but, in carefully veiled language, indicated indirectly that the U.K. under the circumstances might well reconsider its plan.

With the inability of the U.K. to get support for its line and the continuing insistence that some solution be found, there seems to be a general feeling abroad that the U.K. must modify its position. We have heard through secret channels that, as a result of pressure from Washington on London, new instructions are to be issued from London. I do not think that the U.S. would be disposed, as a result of its triumph yesterday in committee, to make the British position difficult and there is every likelihood that the Canadian compromise will offer a satisfactory meeting ground which will allow everyone's face to be saved.

While all this was going on, committees and drafting committees dealing with (1) an Interim Council, (2) standard clauses for bilateral agreements during the provisional period and (3) other features of the permanent convention were meeting. Without going into detail, it is sufficient to say that no substantial modifications took place and that considerable progress has been effected.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. BALDWIN

Dear Mr. Robertson,

Re — International Air Conference

Under date of November 23rd, I received letter with enclosure† from Lord Swinton, copy of which is enclosed herewith. I also enclose copy of my reply dated November 27th. I trust that my reply carries your judgment.

I think it would be bad tactics at this time to suggest to Lord Swinton that Canada would be willing to make a multilateral agreement between Empire countries, in the event that a wider multilateral agreement is impossible. I regret to say that the latter seems to be the probable outcome of the Conference.

Provided an international authority is not possible, I would recommend to the Government that no freedoms be allowed, either within or without the Empire, and that Canada pursue a course of bilateral agreements.

I suggest that our friends in the U.S. could very well take objection to Canada granting freedoms within the Empire that Canada would not grant to the U.S.

Yours truly,

C. D. HOWE

My dear Howe,

I understand that Mr. Sullivan[82] has sent you a copy of his letter to me of the 22nd November† about the possibility of a meeting between Ministers of British Commonwealth Governments to carry further, certain of the recommendations of the Commonwealth air conversations held at Montreal last month.

I enclose a copy of my reply,† in which I have expressed my willingness to help by convening such a meeting while we are still in Chicago, if that would be agreeable to you and the other Ministers concerned, or to take part in a meeting in Canada or in London if that should be preferred.

Ottawa, November 27, 1944

My dear Lord Swinton,

Thanks for your letter of 23rd November, enclosing copy of your reply to the letter written to you by Mr. Sullivan,† suggesting a further meeting between Ministers of British Commonwealth Governments to carry further certain recommendations of the conversations at Montreal.

I regret that difficulties in our Canadian Parliament have made it impossible for me to return to Chicago as I had intended. There is little possibility that I will be able to return before the end of this week, which will perhaps be too late for me to be of any use.

I am informed that there is little hope of a multilateral agreement as a result of the Chicago conference. If that information is correct, it would seem that aviation must be governed by bilateral agreements, in which event, I see little purpose of a Commonwealth meeting at this time. It seems to me that the individual units of the Commonwealth can bargain with each other, without the necessity of a general conference.

However, should the majority of the Commonwealth countries wish to hold a conference, I will be glad to take part, subject to the views of my Government after I have been able to consult my colleagues.

I am still hopeful that a multilateral convention will result from the Chicago conference.

Sincerely yours,

C. D. HOWE

SECRET AND PERSONAL Chicago, November 30, 1944

Dear Mr. Howe:—

We have been in travail for a month and have brought forth a mouse. The mouse is so insignificant that the conference is rapidly proceeding to a conclusion and will probably have come to an end by the time this reaches Ottawa.

An agreement establishing an Interim Organization has been approved and is ready to go before a plenary session. The same is true of an agreement establishing standard clauses to be used in bilateral negotiations henceforth. Both documents are unexceptionable; certainly they can do no harm and possibly they may do some good even though they do not contain any teeth.

Meanwhile, the optimistic tone of my last letter has proven unjustified. The U.K. and U.S. have failed to reach an agreement and the general opinion is that there is no further use in seeking a reconciliation at the moment. The U.S. were ready to accept the Canadian compromise in almost every respect, I believe. The U.K. were willing to accept it in every respect except one; that one point is the fundamental difference between the U.K. and U.S. approach that I have mentioned in earlier letters, namely, U.S. insistence that the fifth freedom must count in any escalator clause and the U.K. refusal to accept this position.

During the past few days, to be quite frank, we felt that the U.K. was the chief obstacle to a satisfactory settlement and that the U.S. were willing to accept a formula which would be satisfactory to Canada and most other nations. With, however, the apparent decision that no settlement can be effected here, the U.S. began to pursue a policy much less praiseworthy. First of all, Mr. Berle proposed that Article XI (the controversial article on capacity regulation) and Article XII providing a special and privileged position for devastated countries (this article was closely tied in with Article XI) both be dropped from the permanent document completely. This was not surprising but the U.S. went further and insisted that Article X on establishment of rates also be dropped completely from the permanent document even though this article had been accepted earlier by the U.K., U.S. and Canada. This step we considered unnecessary and unwise but we made no headway in persuading the U.S. to let it remain. The situation has been resolved although not in a satisfactory manner, by a motion in subcommittee that these three articles be referred to the Interim Organization for further study and report.

The U.S. went even further and, without any consultation with the U.K. and Canada, submitted a proposal that the five freedoms with a right of reservation on the fifth freedom be incorporated in a separate document to be attached as a protocol to both the permanent convention and the Interim Agreement and opened for signature to any nations wishing to adhere.

Quite apart from the tactics used, there were two serious difficulties in this proposal. The use of a protocol would tend to link the document with the permanent multilateral agreement; moreover, it forced the issue as regards the granting of the freedoms.

This proposal was discussed in subcommittee and this time it was the U.S. which suffered at least a partial snub. The Latin American nations did not line up in support of the U.S. although we understand that most of them might sign such an optional document. Mexico seconded the U.S. proposal without comment, and Brazil, while giving it a good measure of support, issued certain reservations. No other Latin American country spoke.

Most of the members of the British Commonwealth and several European countries spoke strongly against a protocol attached to a multilateral agreement, and a New Zealand amendment suggesting that any such document be made as a completely separate agreement was put forward. While this amendment was not voted on, it obviously had a great deal of support and, in consequence, the U.S. agreed to redraft its proposal as far as procedure was concerned. Implicit in the procedural criticism put forward by New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, Canada, U.K., France, Belgium, India, Poland and Greece was the suggestion that none of these countries really liked the idea of granting the freedoms without any equivalent regulation by an effective international authority. Mr. Symington pointed out that, since the U.S. proposed that the optional agreement be interpreted and supervised by the Interim Council (and subsequently by the permanent organization), it would mean that states signatory to the optional agreement would be allowing supervision and interpretation to be placed in the hands of a larger organization which would include nations which had not signed the optional agreement. India went even further and indicated the undesirability of an agreement which would probably compel a split on an issue which was tied in with other issues being referred to the Interim Council for study, i.e., rates and regulation of capacity.

There the matter stands for the moment. We cannot very well prevent the acceptance of the idea of an optional agreement to give away the freedoms but at least it is evident that there will be a number of nations who will not sign this agreement at present.

Chicago, Dec. 1, 1944.

There are a few further developments since I started this letter. Mr. Berle who is almost feminine in his trait of having "on" days and "off" days was in a very bad temper by the end of yesterday. He had already been very rude to the Belgian delegate in the morning when, angered by the protests of the European nations over the dropping of Article XII, he waved the U.S. mailed fist and spoke of U.S. generosity in the past and in the future and of Lend-Lease planes which had saved Europe. The Belgian came off with honours in the encounter since he made a very courteous response paying tribute to the U.S. generosity. Immediately after the meeting, however, he let the story spread rapidly that Belgium had paid cash for all planes from the U.S.

During the afternoon, the Executive Committee met and accepted three official languages — English, French and Spanish. There was also a proposal that Canada be made the seat of the organization but France entered a plea for Paris and the matter has been left open. Confusion over the election of the first Council, too, resulted in the agreement that each country should submit a slate for consideration.

Also during the afternoon, we learned that Mayor LaGuardia was dissatisfied with the situation and intended to make a strong speech urging satisfactory settlement. We also learned from the U.S. operators that they would be willing to talk business on the basis of the U.K. revised draft of the Canadian compromise proposal which we circulated on Monday. All this came as a great surprise and there was a ray of hope which may still exist. However, when the evening session convened, it was obvious that Mr. Berle was in a very bad temper; our guess is that he disliked the attempt of his advisors and Mayor LaGuardia to go on and seek a settlement and that he particularly disliked their approaching Mr. Symington without their speaking to him, Mr. Berle. We also understand that, upon learning of this situation, he stated that there was no possible hope of seeking a reconciliation since one could never be effected by the head of the U.K. delegation. Lord Swinton, when informed of the news, expressed equal distrust of Mr. Berle's intentions.

One minor complication arose when one of the French delegates came up to see me five minutes before the evening meeting in order to inform me that they had instructions to press for inclusion of the two freedoms in the Permanent Convention. They had not realised that there would be any serious opposition to this and were very upset to learn at the last moment that Canada was firmly opposed, as were the other members of the British Commonwealth. I explained our position and the French delegate went to explain their position to the head of their delegation who, in the meantime, had apparently received a stern lecture from Lord Swinton. The result was that they agreed not to present their proposal until further consideration had been given to the matter.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. BALDWIN

Un conseiller, la Conférence internationale sur l'aviation civile, au ministre des Munitions et des Approvisionnements

Adviser, International Civil Aviation Conference, to Minister of Munitions and Supply

SECRET AND PERSONAL Chicago, December 3, 1944

Dear Mr. Howe:—

We have reached a sufficiently advanced stage of the conference to be able to label most of the articles we started with as "killed, wounded or missing." Unless something quite unforeseen happens, there remain only lesser points of drafting to be completed and the plenary sessions for approval of final documents. Drafting should be completed by tomorrow night. There will have to be some slight delay to allow for presentation of the final documents and then, presumably, the usual formalities occupying a couple of days.

The undercurrents during the last two days have been interesting. On Friday morning, when last I wrote, Mr. Symington was busy with another last minute effort trying to find some means of reconciliation. Neither Mr. Berle nor Lord

Swinton, however, was movable. Neither was willing to give the impression of making a move and neither would authorize Mr. Symington to follow up any proposal, leaving it entirely to him to do as he saw fit. Actually, we understand that the instructions of the U.K. Prime Minister are to bring the conference to an end rapidly and return to explain the situation.

In the afternoon, a disgraceful meeting was held in which the head of the U.S. delegation, acting as chairman, manhandled procedure in a manner to assist the U.S. As I stated in my last letter, on motion of Lord Swinton seconded by Mr. Berle, it had been decided in subcommittee to refer the controversial articles to the Interim Council including, of course, the section on the five freedoms. In the afternoon in full committee when this motion came up, Mayor LaGuardia offered an amendment to the effect that they be referred instead to the Executive Committee of the conference for another attempt at reconciliation. His speech seemed to throw much of the onus upon the U.K. (he kept referring to his amendment as an amendment to a U.K. motion). He also emphasized the desirability of having some freedoms regardless of what happened. Lord Swinton made a very good speech in reply pointing out that the original motion had been seconded by Mr. Berle and stating that it would not have been presented if he and Mr. Berle had not been in complete agreement that no further attempt at reconciliation could succeed at this stage. Unfortunately, a passing reference by Lord Swinton to the freedoms, added to Mayor LaGuardia's speech, played into Mr. Berle's hands. Mr. Berle rose and stated that he would welcome a motion to insert the first two freedoms into the Permanent Convention. The Netherlands presented such a motion seconded by Syria and Mr. Berle then suggested that this motion be discussed and dealt with immediately and that the original motion and the LaGuardia amendment be passed over for the time being.

Mr. Symington protested against this procedure without avail but at least managed to get the meeting adjourned on the grounds that notice of such an important motion should have been given.

In the evening, we found that Lord Swinton had been instructed by the U.K. War Cabinet to accept the first two freedoms. None of the other Commonwealth countries were very happy about this. It was, however, decided to attempt at the next meeting to have the two freedoms set up in a separate document open for signature rather than included in the Permanent Convention. On Saturday morning when discussion was resumed, the only countries that expressed doubts regarding the two freedoms and regarding the procedure that had been followed were Canada, Australia, India and Portugal, as I recall. The U.K. supported the Canadian suggestion that they might be made the subject of a separate document on the grounds that their insertion in the Permanent Convention might make it impossible for some nations to sign the Permanent Convention. A similar separate document is to be attached to the document setting up the Interim Organization. Mr. Symington made it clear that if the conference decided that two freedoms were desirable, regardless of the ability to insert articles on traffic control and rates, Canada would be prepared to sign the document establishing the two freedoms.

There the matter rested. A minor dispute arose over the desire of some of the Latin Americans to allow any country where non-traffic stops (freedom 2) were made, to compel the air service making such stops to offer commercial service there as well. This may go in the document but, if it does, it will be put in a form that will not hamper the operators.

The afternoon session yesterday dealt only with final drafting changes in the complete Permanent Convention. No meetings are being held today although the draftsmen are continuing with their work.

Sir Arthur Street, following your letter to Lord Swinton about a further Commonwealth meeting,[83] sounded me out yesterday regarding this question and regarding the possibility of settling at least certain specific questions while the Commonwealth representatives were in North America. I think he had in mind the procedure to be followed in the establishment of a Commonwealth council and possibly also the nature of any trans-Pacific operations and the time and manner in which U.K. and Canadian Trans-Atlantic services could be converted to a semi-commercial or commercial basis. I passed what he had told me on to Mr. Symington who is this morning attending a meeting of heads of Commonwealth delegations presumably to deal with these topics and particularly to discuss if there is any need for a gathering after this conference is over.

Under the circumstances, it looks as though I will be back in Ottawa during the latter part of this week and this will probably be the last report that I will send to you from Chicago. The only other point of interest that occurs to me is that Mr. Symington has been asked to convene a meeting of operators' representatives here who wish to discuss the establishment of an international operators' association.

Earlier in the week, Mr. Aronstein, a Netherlands' delegate who is connected with the Netherlands Economic, Financial and Shipping Mission in the U.S., talked to me at some length about Canadian industry and trade expressing a particular interest in our aircraft and shipping industries. He was obviously desirous of seeking some expanded trade connections between Canada and the Netherlands East Indies after the war. I do not think that he was speaking in terms of Mutual Aid. He made it fairly clear, however, that he thought there was much to be said for inviting a Netherlands trade mission to visit Canada or else taking some equivalent steps for discussion between Canadian and Netherlands' representatives within the next few months in the U.S. This is a possibility that you may wish to consider.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. BALDWIN

Rapport du ministre des Munitions et des Approvisionnements
Report by Minister of Munitions and Supply

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] December 11, 1944

REPORT ON COMMONWEALTH AIR CONVERSATIONS IN MONTREAL OCTOBER 23-27, AND DECEMBER 9-10, AND ON INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION CONFERENCE, CHICAGO NOVEMBER 1-DECEMBER 7, 1944

I. INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE —

The International Conference held in Chicago lasted for thirty-nine days, at the close of which five documents were presented for signature. The complete documentation of the Conference has been deposited with all interested departments in Ottawa, as well as reports by members of the Canadian delegation on the Conference.

The United and Associated nations, neutral nations and representatives of Denmark and Thailand in their personal capacities attended the conference. Canada played the role of one of the three great powers at the conference. The main difficulties arose in attempting to reconcile the U.K. and U.S. views regarding regulation of traffic and of rates and here Canada acted as "honest broker". After lengthy negotiations between the three powers, general agreement was reached upon control of rates and upon most of the points regarding regulation of traffic.

While at the end minor differences existed between the U.K. and U.S. in regard to the initial allocation of services in any scheme for control of traffic and in regard to such matters as the definition of through traffic, it proved impossible to effect a reconciliation with regard to the method by which operators would be rewarded for efficiency. All parties agreed upon the Canadian proposal that the operator who demonstrated his efficiency by achieving an agreed high average payload on a service should be allowed to increase capacity on that service. The U.K. however took the position that this principle should be applied only to traffic embarked in the country of origin of the service, while the U.S. asserted that it should apply also to traffic picked up at intermediate points on the route, asserting that only thus could any service develop and expand reasonably.

It proved impossible to reach agreement on this point and in consequence all clauses on regulation of rates and traffic, as well as a special article designed to meet the needs of nations handicapped in the development of air transport as a result of war conditions, were dropped from the permanent convention and referred for consideration at the interim organization agreed upon at Chicago.

Both Canada and France were proposed as the seat of the permanent organization while Canada also was urged to provide the seat for the interim organization. The Canadian representatives suggested that the permanent and interim organizations should be located in the same place but did not urge Canada's claims to either. It was agreed by the conference that Canada should be the seat of the interim organization which should at its last meeting decide upon the seat of the permanent organization.

Both the interim organization and the permanent organization are to consist of an Assembly and a Council. The Council is to be composed of twenty-one member States chosen according to three categories:

(a) The chief operating countries,

(b) The chief providers of facilities,

(c) States chosen to provide representation for geographical areas not otherwise represented.

Canada was elected to membership on the Council as the most important state in Category (b). This result, together with the unduly large size of the Council can be attributed entirely to pressure from the Latin American states which insisted upon a large Council and which also indulged in electioneering practices as a solid bloc, which resulted in the Latin American slate for the Council being chosen, including Brazil, Mexico, and Belgium in the first category, along with the U.K., the U.S., France and the Netherlands.

The following are the documents prepared in Chicago:[84]

(1) Final Act

This document which is attached to the present report as Appendix 3† includes a series of resolutions covering such matters as disposition of technical annexes prepared during the conference, technical personnel, the metric system, transfer of title to aircraft, the position of the Home Convention of 1933, the development of private international air law, flight documents and publication of documentation. The most important of these resolutions sets forth certain standard clauses which signatories agree to incorporate in all bilateral agreements regarding international air services. The clauses are of a general nature, providing for mutual recognition of standards, imposition of reasonable charges, registration and similar matters. Countries accepting this resolution also undertake not to grant exclusive rights in bilateral agreements or make discriminatory arrangements.

(2) Interim Agreement on International Civil Aviation—(Appendix 4 hereto)†

The interim agreement establishes an interim organization which is to remain in existence until the permanent convention comes into force or another conference is called, but in no case to exceed three years. It establishes a provisional organization composed of an Assembly, an Interim Council of twenty-one members and under the Interim Council, a committee on Air Transport, a Committee on Air Navigation and a Committee on the International Convention.

See Canada, Treaty Series, 1944, No. 36.

The powers of these bodies are generally similar to those given to the equivalent bodies in the permanent convention. Member states undertake to file all agreements with the interim organization but retain the right to designate routes and airports on a non-discriminatory basis, for use by international air services. In general the activities of the interim organization will be limited to carrying forward the technical work of the Chicago Conference and to study and review in the field of air transport.

The interim organization will come into being when twenty-six governments of signatory states have indicated acceptance.

(3) Permanent Convention on International Civil Aviation — (Appendix 5 hereto)†

The permanent convention on international civil aviation contains many of the provisions of the original Canadian draft convention submitted to the Conference. It is composed of a part dealing with air navigation, a part establishing the permanent organization, a part dealing with air transport and a part containing final general provisions.

The permanent organization follows the same lines as the interim organization but has more extended powers. It contains principles similar to those proposed in the original Canadian draft convention regarding coordination with any international security organization, regarding provision of airports and air navigation facilities and other matters. While in general its function is to be advisory and consultative, one chapter of this convention provides for compulsory settlement of disagreements between nations over aviation matters. The Council is to be the primary instrument in settlement of disputes and unless it decides otherwise, its decision will remain in effect unless reversed on appeal to the permanent Court of International Justice or to an Arbitral Tribunal. The permanent convention will come into force when ratified by twenty-six governments.

(4 & 5) International Air Services Agreement and International Air Transport Agreement (Appendices 6 and 7)†

Failure to reach agreement regarding control of traffic and rates made it impossible to insert in the permanent convention any of the so-called "freedoms" of the air, i.e. freedom of transit, non-technical stop, and the various freedoms of commercial outlet. Accordingly the U.S. proposed that five freedoms be incorporated in a protocol to the convention to be open for signature by any state wishing to grant these five freedoms, which are:

(1) The privilege to fly across its territory without landing;

(2) The privilege to land for non-traffic purposes;

(3) The privilege to put down passengers, mail and cargo taken on in the territory of the State whose nationality the aircraft possesses;

(4) The privilege to take on passengers, mail and cargo destined for the territory of the state whose nationality the aircraft possesses;

(5) The privilege to take on passengers, mail and cargo destined for the territory of any other contracting State and the privilege to put down passengers, mail and cargo coming from any such territory.

It was eventually agreed that this document should be entirely separate from the convention and in no way tied to it.

Similarly the U.S. opened the way during the closing sessions of the conference for a proposal that all nations grant the first two of these five freedoms, i.e. transit and non-technical stop. In the face of opposition to insertion of these two freedoms in the permanent convention it was also agreed that a document granting the two freedoms be opened for signature by any nation wishing to grant them.

Of the above documents Canada signed the Final Act, the Interim Agreement and the Permanent Convention.

Canada also felt that it would be impossible to refuse the first two freedoms and indicated a willingness to adhere to the document establishing these two freedoms but did not sign it at Chicago. It is desirable that before Canada signs, satisfactory bilateral arrangements be concluded with the U.K. and U.S. since in signing Canada will give up important bargaining counters. It does not appear wise for Canada to adhere to the five freedom agreement at present. All documents are to remain open for signature in Washington.

II. COMMONWEALTH CONVERSATIONS —

Prior to the International Civil Aviation Conference in Chicago, conversations at the official level were held in Montreal between representatives of Canada, the U.K., Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Newfoundland and Southern Rhodesia, under the chairmanship of Mr. H. J. Symington of Canada. A complete report of these conversations has been filed with all the interested departments.[85]

(A) — Committees

Five Committees were established as follows:

(1) Committee on a multi-lateral international aviation convention

The work of this Committee had regard only to the negotiations that subsequently took place in Chicago.

(2) Committee on Routes

This Committee prepared a map of suggested routes covering various parts of the Commonwealth.

(3) Technical Committee

This Committee examined technical matters of air navigation as a preliminary to the Chicago Conference.

(4) Committee on Operations

This Committee discussed the actual methods of operation of various major trunk routes connecting countries of the Commonwealth. Canada took part only in discussions dealing with services from Canada to Australia and New Zealand. The Committee also recommended the establishment of a permanent Commonwealth Air Transport Council. Discussions in regard to this Council and in regard to trans-Pacific services were not concluded at the first Montreal meetings.

(5) Committee on operation of military routes

This Committee recommended:

(a) that in the present abnormal situation existing military services should be retained on a military basis as long as possible to meet essential demands,

(b) that any appreciable expansion of international civil air transport services which did not directly serve the war effort, would be undesirable,

(c) that if it should be decided that it would be in the British Commonwealth interest that the expansion of international commercial air services should meanwhile continue to be restrained, it would be desirable to effect some relaxation of the practice governing the carrying out of priority civilian passengers and goods in military transport aircraft. There were strong objections from the Service point of view to the principle of civilian passengers and freight being carried for hire in military aircraft, but it was felt that this objection was one primarily the concern of governments to resolve and it might be met in part by the governments undertaking to bear the cost. In the event of changes being made, it would be desirable for the governments operating such services to come to some arrangement as to priorities and scale of payments.

The Committee also considered the operation of military trans-Pacific services from the U.K. to Australia by way of United States and by way of Central America.

On the first route it was agreed that the R.A.F., the R.C.A.F., the R.A.A.F., and the R.N.Z.A.F., should cooperate in providing aircrews, base and maintenance facilities and ground personnel at air fields in the respective territories of their governments and that liaison officers as they might be required should be appointed at bases along the route.

The Canadian representative expressed the view that Canada should in the light of Canada's declared policy at this conference operate that portion of route in which Canada was mainly interested, viz: the link from Dorval to San Diego — as an R.C.A.F. undertaking. It was agreed that it would be possible for this section to be operated by R.C.A.F. without detriment to the general principle of a unified route.

On the second route it was agreed that from the point of view of strategic and military considerations this route was of primary importance and that efforts should be made to complete its survey and to initiate operations as soon as possible. This route might be developed in the postwar period as a commercial route but it would be primarily a military defence communications link, in which respect it could be regarded as a useful instrument for any world security organization which might eventually be established.

Following the international conference in Chicago, Commonwealth representatives met again in Montreal with representation at Ministerial level from Canada, the U.K., Australia and New Zealand. In these discussions further details with regard to the functions and procedure of a Commonwealth Air Transport Council were agreed for recommendation to the Commonwealth governments. These details are included in Appendix I[86] to this report.

(B) — Pacific Service

Further details were also considered with regard to the operation of trans-Pacific services and the conclusions reached are attached to this report as Appendix 2.[87] Briefly summarized they are, that if Australia and New Zealand can make satisfactory arrangements with the U.S. by which commercial outlet can be obtained in the U.S. for a trans-Pacific service between Canada and Australasia and by which Australia and New Zealand would be permitted to allocate to Canada certain of the traffic rights obtained by them from the U.S., then parallel non-competitive operations would be set up on the route by TCA on the one hand and by a joint Australia-New Zealand-U.K. company on the other hand. Failing this, Australia, New Zealand and the U.K. would seek to operate a joint service from Australia to San Francisco and Canada would operate from Vancouver to Honolulu, connecting there with the Australia-New Zealand-U.K. service.

(C) — Bilateral Agreements

During the second series of conversations in Montreal the U.K. representatives presented a series of standard clauses for incorporation in bilateral air agreements and suggested that all Commonwealth governments agree to incorporate these standard clauses in any aviation arrangements made with any country. The suggested standard clauses went much further than the standard clauses agreed upon during the Chicago conference and provided for traffic regulation along the lines advocated by the U.K. government in Chicago — lines which had not proved acceptable to the U.S.

The Canadian representatives took strong exception to this U.K. proposal on the grounds that it would result in the establishment of a Commonwealth bloc which would prejudice relations with other countries, and also on the grounds that the proposed clauses would not be applicable to the various agreements which Canada would be making.

Accordingly it was agreed that no action be taken in the U.K. proposals which remained merely an indication of the procedure which the U.K. government proposed to follow in its own bilateral negotiations.

Mémorandum du secrétaire, la délégation aux conversations du Commonwealth sur le transport aérien

Memorandum by Secretary,
Delegation to Commonwealth Air Conversations

TOP SECRET December 13, 1944

MEMORANDUM ON COMMONWEALTH AIR CONVERSATIONS
MONTREAL, DECEMBER 9 AND 10, 1944

1. These conversations picked up certain loose ends left from the Commonwealth conversations in Montreal in October and cleaned up certain problems which required Ministerial consideration. The October conversations had been held on the official level, while Ministers from Canada, the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand participated in the December conversations.

2. Mr. Howe raised privately with the United Kingdom the question of introducing commercial service on the North Atlantic and expressed readiness to do this in the near future. The U.K. representatives indicated a desire to consult with the U.K. government in regard to timing, since any decision taken must also include the United States. My own feeling is that the real difficulty lies in the fact that the United Kingdom is not yet completely ready, hoping to have certain new equipment early next year for this purpose and wishes to delay action until that time.

3. Mr. Howe also raised with the U.K. the question of a Canadian service to the West Indies on the basis agreed between Mr. Howe and Lord Beaverbrook in 1943, that is, that the service should be left, so far as the Commonwealth is concerned, to Canada. The United Kingdom had already filed, in October, in Montreal, a request on the part of British West Indies Airways to operate this route. It was pointed out to the U.K. representatives that there was not room for more than one operator to run with any reasonable hope of economic operation, and that it would be difficult for Canada to go into this service without some reasonable assurance of a chance to build up traffic without competition from other Commonwealth lines. The U.K. representatives wished to take this up in London also and suggested that the best solution might be joint discussions between Canada, the U.K. Colonial Office and West Indies representatives. They expressed sympathy with the point of view put forward by Canada, and suggested that the solution might be an agreement by which, for a set period of years, the development of this route was left to Canada.

4. In open session, the Commonwealth representatives discussed a Commonwealth Council, the trans-Pacific route and standard clauses for bilateral agreements.

5. On the first of these points, agreement was easily reached upon the establishment of an advisory council, without powers, but with broad terms of reference. The only point at issue here arose over the inclusion of Ireland. Mr. Howe raised the question of the inclusion of Ireland and none of the Commonwealth representatives other than the United Kingdom, expressed any strong opposition to this proposal. I feel that most of them would have accepted Ireland as a member immediately. The United Kingdom, however, obviously acting on instructions, stated that this was quite impossible at present, but indicated readiness to keep the matter open for the inclusion of Ireland after the conclusion of hostilities.

6. On the trans-Pacific route, further pressure was brought to persuade Canada to participate in a joint U.K.-Canada-Australia-New Zealand operating company. This proposal, however, was completely given up when Mr. Howe stated that it would not be possible. The Canadian suggestion for segment operations connecting at Honolulu did not meet with favour from the United Kingdom, Australia or New Zealand. Australia, supported by the United Kingdom, was obviously anxious to have her flag carried through to North America and urged very vigorously the desirability of having the Canadian flag carried to Australasia. Australia and New Zealand also indicated their willingness to make available to a Canadian line a share of any traffic rights obtained by them from the United States. Accordingly, it was tentatively agreed to consider the establishment of parallel operations from Vancouver to Australia via San Francisco, subject to satisfactory agreements with the United States, to be made by Australia and New Zealand. Trans-Canada Airlines would provide a through service and another service would be provided by a joint U.K.-Australia-New Zealand company. By inter-company agreement arrangements would be made for division of schedules and pooling of traffic. If this failed, it was understood that the joint company would then attempt to operate from Australia to San Francisco and that Canada would connect with this service by operating a route from Vancouver to Honolulu.

7. On the question of standard clauses in bilateral agreements, a serious division of opinion arose. The United Kingdom, without prior warning, produced a series of standard clauses which they suggested that each Commonwealth country should undertake to incorporate in any bilateral agreements with any countries. These clauses had obviously been discussed with the Commonwealth countries other than Canada and had received general support and approval. In effect they provided for rigid regulation of capacity along the lines which the United Kingdom had unsuccessfully proposed at the Chicago conference. The discussion on this point was quite vigorous, with Canada alone standing out against the proposal on the grounds:

(i) that any such action would be equivalent to establishing a closed Commonwealth bloc, and could not fail to produce unfortunate results;

(ii) that the proposed articles could not apply to all the various agreements which Canada would be making since they would be far from suitable in many cases;

(iii) that many countries which might find the type of regulation proposed satisfactory if included in an international convention would find it unacceptable as part of bilateral agreements, with the result that insistence on it by the Commonwealth countries would prejudice chances of success in future bilateral agreements with other countries.

8. Australia, New Zealand and India all supported the British position, but the document was eventually left as merely an indication of the policy which the U.K. government itself intended to follow. My own view is that if the proposals had been introduced on this basis in the first instance, it would have been much easier to discuss them.

9. The outstanding feature of all the Commonwealth conversations has been the readiness of the Commonwealth nations, other than Canada, to move in the direction of a united bloc. While Australia or South Africa might on a specific matter differ with a U.K. proposal, in general they all appeared ready to fall in with the idea of concerting policy in advance, agreeing upon a common front, participating in common schemes for operation or control, and seem to have no fear of presenting a common front in public. Canada alone opposed this consistently throughout the discussions.

10. The U.K. trend in this direction has obviously been strengthened by the discovery that most of the Dominions favour such a development as a means of protecting themselves in world affairs and that even when there is a difference of opinion, these Dominions do not press their point of view vigorously. I think that the tendency in this direction has been strengthened as a result of the Chicago conference. Most of the Dominions have come away feeling that their only protection in future world affairs lies in being part of a large and powerful bloc.

11. I fear also that the U.K. representatives in spite of the experience of the last twenty years, do not understand the Canadian position and consider us in some respects obstructive and extreme nationalists, bent upon preventing the establishment of a united Commonwealth front in world affairs. In consequence of this lack of understanding, discussion was, upon more than one occasion, lively with little recognition being given by the United Kingdom to the principles of Commonwealth relations which evolved during the 1920's and 1930's. Lip service is given to the right of any Dominion to freedom of action, but surprise and frequently a measure of annoyance is always evident when this right is exercised even in discussion.

Rapport d'un conseiller,
la Conférence internationale sur l'aviation civile

Report by Adviser, International Civil Aviation Conference

TOP SECRET December 13, 1944

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION CONFERENCE
NOVEMBER-DECEMBER, 1944

In spite of substantial achievements in certain fields, the conference cannot be considered a major success although the U.S. and most of the other participants will seek to put as good a face as possible upon the results. In my detailed letters from the conference I described difficulties which prevented agreement on the really substantial issues connected with control of capacity and rates; clash of temperaments between the heads of the U.K. and U.S. delegations; the unsatisfactory atmosphere caused by mistakes in organization and procedure and by the unfortunate choice of locale; the failure to hold a smaller preliminary conference; the uncompromising attitude taken by the U.K. War Cabinet in instructing its delegation; and the disagreement between the U.K. and U.S. over the treatment to be accorded to pick up traffic on any route and to control of capacity. President Roosevelt's announcement of the resignation of Mr. Berle from the State Department at a time when the conference was drawing to a conclusion, although connected with general reorganization of the State Department, was considered by some in view of the timing, as a criticism of Mr. Berle's handling of the conference.

In temperament the heads of the U.K. and U.S. delegations were completely incompatible. Mutual lack of trust was increased by belief on each side in the lack of ability in negotiation and the uncooperativeness of the other. Tempers ran high and at times there was virtually a complete refusal to meet or even to authorize an intermediary to act. Upon such occasions only Canadian independent action brought about further discussion between the two.

The atmosphere of the Stevens Hotel was not good. The hotel itself was crowded and noisy, while its food was not of the best. Rooms were small and tempers easily became frayed. While it was true that delegates could get out into the city for diversion, it was also true that the atmosphere was far from restful and fresh air was at a premium.

The failure to hold a preliminary conference greatly lengthened the Chicago meeting and added to general dissatisfaction; this was particularly true when the three powers, Canada, the U.S. and the U.K. began their two weeks of meetings to attempt reconciliation of views. The other nations had little to do during this period and became quite unhappy over the situation. This undoubtedly added to the spirit of rebelliousness displayed during the last two weeks of the conference, by some of the smaller nations and by the Latin American bloc. Lack of any preliminary agreement on basic issues also made it much easier for small nations with exaggerated ideas of the meaning of national sovereignty to press their views successfully during the last two weeks.

As far as organization itself was concerned there was faulty direction in other respects as well. An Executive Committee composed of all heads of delegations was established but proved unwieldy in size and somewhat lacking in harmony. The Executive Committee in turn established a small Steering Committee of some dozen odd members but the President of the Conference made practically no use of this Steering Committee. I believe it only met once or twice and then did little of significance.

The choice of Chairmen in main committees, subcommittees and drafting committees was far from fortunate. Sometimes the Chairmen were handicapped by lack of knowledge of English. Where this was not the case they were frequently inadequately equipped to control a meeting, with the result that some of the main sessions were confused and turbulent in their procedure while some of the drafting committees became towers of Babel. There were some exceptions to this situation.

At times the President of the Conference displayed the ability to employ a strong guiding hand; at other times this ability was far from evident. This may in part be due to the fact that the U.S. delegation was split on a number of issues and did not come into the conference with complete and clear ideas on the more important issues. During the early weeks of the conference the U.S. delegation held almost daily meetings in an effort to solve its difficulties. One of the best indications of lack of generalship were the facts that the Latin American nations supported by only two European countries, Luxembourg and Belgium managed to get the Council increased to an unwieldy twenty-one members, and that the U.S. made no serious attempt to forestall this or to correct it after the damage had been done.

A further difficulty was the order of approach to the subjects under discussion. The sensible approach in our opinion (shared by a number of countries) was to deal in the first instance with permanent arrangements and, having done this, then to deal with temporary arrangements, utilizing as much of the permanent agreements as feasible. It took almost two weeks to bring the U.S. to this point of view and at no time did it prove possible to call a halt to the committees dealing with temporary arrangements with the result that plans for an interim organization and for standard clauses in bilateral agreements were completed at a time when the discussion on the permanent organization was just nicely under way. In consequence the interim plans had later to be reviewed completely in an attempt to bring them into line with the permanent document. It also meant that Canada, having reserved its main arguments for the permanent document found that certain unsatisfactory clauses had been inserted in the temporary documents. The supporters of these clauses argued that since they had been adopted in the interim documents they should also be included in the permanent convention. The foregoing procedure also led to a number of the important questions being debated in several committees instead of being concentrated in a single committee.

France, while playing in many respects a useful and sensible role was obviously striving for recognition as one of the leading great powers. Its insistence that French be an official language provided some difficulties. While it did not succeed as regards the official language of the conference, French was accepted as one of the official languages for the final documents; Spanish and English being the other two. The Latin Americans made it quite clear that if French were adopted officially for any purpose, Spanish would have to be adopted as well. This proved to be the case. Yugoslavia made a strong plea for the use of a Slavic language, (presumably Russian).

The neutrals were on the whole careful about their participation in the conference. Spain said very little. Turkey said nothing. The Swiss representative spoke only once when he made a helpful attempt to keep the size of the Council down to reasonable proportions. Portugal had a little more to say. Ireland spoke quite frequently, both in committees and in drafting committees.

China did not play a leading role at any time and did not attempt to press forward. Poland was quite vocal but its contributions were not helpful. Greece was very vocal indeed.

Following the protestations of the U.K. and U.S. that all their endeavours were intended to protect the small nations, a number of these small nations suggested openly that they would prefer to protect themselves. In other words, the constant reference by the great powers to their protection of the interests of others found a welcome, but one heavily tinged with suspicion.

One of the most ominous signs of the conference was the activities of the Latin American bloc under the leadership of Cuba and Mexico. The Latin American representatives displayed little ability in negotiation but by sheer weight of numbers made themselves felt. They held frequent meetings and agreed upon concerted plans of action. They also met a number of times with the head of the U.S. delegation who displayed ability to bring them into line. The fact that some of their activities at the conference were definitely injurious leads to the conclusion that either the U.S. was not able always to influence them or that the U.S. upon occasion deliberately allowed them to have a free rein in a manner disturbing to other countries.

The constant theme of the Latin Americans was protection of national sovereignty and maintenance of juridical equality, a theme which was used on every possible occasion in watering down the permanent convention. Their practice of common action and of voting as a solid bloc had its strongest manifestation in the election of the Interim Council. There, a complete Latin American slate was prepared, including seven Latin American States on the Council of twenty-one. This became known and resulted in a bitter debate in the meeting of the Executive Committee which was supposed to agree on nominations for the Council. The U.K. and Yugoslavia in particular criticized the Latin American action strongly. The Executive Committee debate was so vigorous that the election was eventually referred to a plenary session, where the Latin American slate carried the election.

The Latin Americans had apparently approached a number of European countries asking for their support; in particular countries whose names they had included in their slate. They were turned down by some and in consequence struck those names off the slate, substituting others. By this device they obtained enough support from other countries, notably Irak, Greece, Egypt, and probably Turkey, Iran and Belgium, to give an assurance that between twenty-five and thirty countries would vote the Latin American slate. The voting of other countries was, of course, split according to the individual views of each country. Apparently Brazil alone was worried over this development and tried to hold it in check. Brazilian representatives frankly told Canada that they were in a difficult position. Being non-Spanish, and being the rising great power of Latin America they were an object of some suspicion on the part of the other Latin American countries. This was a short-sighted move on the part of Latin America since the great powers, having seen this gerrymandering, will be likely in future to concentrate control in their own hands in order to prevent this sort of chaotic situation while the intermediate and lesser powers who were angry over the situation will undoubtedly attempt some sort of retaliatory action at future conferences by forming a counter-bloc.

Irritation, particularly among European countries, was extreme. India which had a strong case for membership on the Council had been left off entirely. Just before the closing session of the Conference, Norway made known its intention of withdrawing voluntarily from the Council in order to provide a place for India. Sweden and Denmark had approved this step. Apparently at this point Mr. Berle made strong representations to the Cuban delegate pointing out that Latin America had badly overplayed its hand. Cuba attempted to persuade some other Latin American country to withdraw from the Council without success; having failed it then made the grand gesture in final session that Cuba itself withdraw rather than Norway in order to provide a seat for India. The gesture was accepted.

In view of the fact that Congressional ratification will have to be given it is interesting to note certain facts in regard to the composition of the first Council. Eight States from the Americas are represented, — six from Latin America together with the U.S. and Canada. Four British Commonwealth States are represented, namely the U.K., Canada, Australia and India, together with Egypt which the Americas consider to be equivalent to a part of the Commonwealth and Irak where Britain has a considerable influence.

A disturbing feature was the extreme bitterness of some of the invaded countries with regard to future admission of new members (presumably enemy States). This matter got completely out of hand with the result that while the United and Associated Nations and present neutrals may adhere to the documents, other countries will only be admitted subject to the consent of a four-fifths majority of the Assembly and to the specific consent in each case of any country attacked or invaded by the applicant during the present war, (which for this purpose was interpreted to include the Italo-Ethiopian campaign). Greece, Poland and Ethiopia led in this development with some support from Yugoslavia and France.

The Secretariat to the conference proved quite efficient in normal matters of organization such as production and circulation of documents and announcements. It did not, however, make any attempt to provide the little extra amenities which help to keep a conference happy. The Secretaries for Committees were efficient; a number of them came from the Bureau of the Budget. A few of them however were prone upon occasion to act as de facto Chairmen, regardless of officially appointed Chairmen, as well as Secretaries, a situation which at times annoyed committee members. This was most noticeable in drafting committees.[88]

Le ministre des Munitions et des Approvisionnements au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Minister of Munitions and Supply to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, December 19, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson:

Re: International Aviation

I have noted copy of confidential teletype WA-7021 from our Minister [sic] at Washington,† calling attention to the countries which have signed the various agreements which emerged from the Chicago Conference.

You will note that Canada has signed the Final Act, and that this Act has been signed by 53 countries (everybody except Liberia). Canada has also signed the Interim Agreement, and 37 countries have signed this Agreement to date.

Canada has signed the Convention, as have 35 countries in all.

Canada has not signed the Two Freedoms Agreement, although 28 countries have signed to date. The United Kingdom signed the Two Freedoms Agreement, but reserved Newfoundland from the terms of the Agreement, which is bringing in favourable [unfavourable?] editorial comment from the United States.

The United States is anxious to sit down with Canada to make a bilateral agreement covering aviation between the two countries, and January 22nd has been mentioned as a suitable date.[89] As the last meeting was held in Canada, it is proposed that the next meeting be held in New York City. It is understood that you will notify the U.S. Ambassador at least a week before the actual date of the Conference.

In my opinion, Canada should sign the Two Freedoms Agreement. It might be convenient to have the Agreement signed in Washington at the end of the U.S.-Canada conference. I understand that Newfoundland will withdraw its reservation when Canada signs, although this was only a suggestion made by the delegates from Newfoundland at the last Montreal Conference.

The United States and 16 other countries have signed the Five Freedoms Agreement. It seems to me that it is not worthwhile for Canada to do so, since none of the European countries except Sweden and Turkey have signed.

I shall appreciate the views of the Department of External Affairs in these matters.

Yours sincerely,

C. D. HOWE

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

Ottawa, December 30, 1944

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

The American Ambassador came to see me yesterday to enquire what action the Canadian Government proposed to take about the "Two Freedoms" Agreement drawn up at the Chicago Civil Aviation Conference. I told him that we were expecting to discuss with United States representatives the negotiation of a Canada-United States Convention at the end of January, and thought it unlikely that Canada would sign the general international convention conceding freedom of transit before the bilateral Canadian-American agreement was concluded.

Mr. Atherton said that he had gained the impression, from conversations with Mr. Howe, that Canada was ready to sign the Two Freedoms Convention at any time. I told him that there had been no decision reached as to the timing of the signing of this Convention at the last Cabinet meeting at which Mr. Howe had been present, and I thought it unlikely that further consideration would be given to the question before his return from the south. The Ambassador asked me for my private opinion as to whether or not it would be difficult for the Canadian Government to sign the Two Freedoms Convention prior to the opening of bilateral negotiations, if the United States very much wanted us to do so. I told him that I thought it would be better to conclude the bilateral agreement first, because otherwise the provisions of a bilateral Canadian-American civil aviation agreement might be criticized in Canada by persons who could contend that, in signing the general agreement first, Canada had conceded, in advance, what was commonly, though I thought wrongly, regarded as the strength of its international bargaining position.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au ministre des Munitions et des Approvisionnements

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister of Munitions and Supply

Ottawa, January 3, 1945

Dear Mr. Howe,

I am taking advantage of a bag Bill Bennett is sending you to reply to your letter of December 19th on outstanding aviation questions. I am glad to note that the United States wish to discuss the question of services between Canada and the United States since these will require a good deal of careful consideration and negotiation and the sooner we can start the better.

A date in the second half of January should be satisfactory, as would New York as a meeting place. We will, as you suggest, make the necessary arrangements with the United States Embassy for the meetings.

On the subject of the two freedoms I agree that Canada should sign the agreement, but think this should be done after or during the negotiation of our agreement with the United States. I am enclosing a copy of a note I have given the Prime Minister of a conversation I had with the American Ambassador on this subject last week.

As regards the five freedoms, I agree that Canada should not sign the agreement for the time being. It would it is true, be of advantage to us in flying through the United States either to the Caribbean or to Australia. However, it opens up such possibilities of overcrowding on the Atlantic that it might lead to serious difficulties in the absence of an effective international authority to keep capacity in some sort of relation to traffic offering.

Yours sincerely,

N. A. ROBERTSON

Rapport du président, Trans Canada Airlines

Report by President, Trans Canada Airlines

Montreal, December 29, 1944

The International Conference at Chicago lasted for thirty-nine days. It opened on November 1st and closed December 7th.

On the opening day, addresses were made by leading delegates, the principal ones being those of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. The address by the Canadian Chairman, the Hon. C. D. Howe, aroused great interest and printed copies were in brisk demand. The address gave evidence of careful preparation and was a reasoned discussion of an actual Convention. In this way Canada's introduction to the Conference was excellent.

When the proceedings were finally organized, Canada succeeded in having the Canadian draft convention selected as the basis for discussion and a Canadian delegate was appointed chairman of the sub-committee on International Air Transport principles. Several days were taken up with the explanation of and reasons for the various clauses in the draft convention. Good progress was made until the clauses dealing with allocation of frequencies, escalation and control were reached.[90]

It soon became clear that there were important differences between the United Kingdom and the United States on these subjects, and the Latin American countries gave strong support to the United States against the question of control of the Authority on the grounds of incompatibility with their sovereignty. As the situation developed, Canada naturally became the mediator between the two largest nations in [endeavouring] to reconcile their views, and spent many days and nights [in efforts] to find common ground.

Much progress had been made and was being [made when] the United States suddenly demanded the addition of the [fifth] Freedom. In connection with the Freedoms, Canada, after [long] consideration in the preparation of its convention, had [decided] that only four freedoms were feasible. This sudden move [by the] United States greatly accentuated the difficulties as it [introduced] the factor of pick-up traffic in various countries [passed] through on long trunk routes, and correspondingly accentuated the importance and difficulties of the clauses [previously agreed to] relative to the basis of initial allocations and the [subsequent] increase. It was upon this point that the Conference [finally?] broke down.

While the clauses dealing with freedoms, [?] and with protection of countries retarded in [commercial aviation] development by war were finally omitted from the [Convention which] had been virtually agreed upon conditional on [agreement on the] frequency clause which included the escalator [principle ?] not having been accomplished, the other clauses [?].

By numerous drafts and suggestions, the Canadian delegation gradually narrowed the differences, and when the last Canadian draft was submitted, the Chairman of the United States delegation said that he would support it in his delegation if the United Kingdom asked for it. The United Kingdom, however, amended the Canadian suggestion by proposing that in case of dispute over the original allocation or the escalator provisions that the disputed point be left for decision by the International Board, who should make their decision after consideration and application of four principles set out in the suggested amendment. By this move the United Kingdom delegation got itself on tenable grounds, viz., impartial decision on a disputed matter by an impartial board, and they clung to that position to the end. It was at this point that London and Washington came into the picture. The United Kingdom said they had specific instructions not to support the last Canadian proposal, and the United States said they could not accept the English amendment as it would not pass Congress. As a last resort, I asked the Chairman of the United States delegation to permit me to address his delegation, as I hoped to be able to convince them that the British amendment to the last Canadian proposal could well be accepted by the United States, but he refused saying that it was useless. The result was that these matters were referred to the interim board for study and report but, of course, unless a new Conference was called, any change would now be an amendment to the present Convention and would require the necessary two-thirds majorities in order to be adopted.

To substitute for these clauses, the United States delegation proposed two documents, one providing for two freedoms and one for five freedoms, to be attached as protocols to the Convention. The Canadian delegation opposed this vigorously and eventually persuaded the Chairman of the United States delegation to simply submit them as agreements between States who might desire to sign them apart from and in no way connected with the Convention. Therefore, these agreements stand as contracts between those who signed them unless and until the clauses left to the interim council for study are settled.

Meanwhile, the technical committees and sub-committees had been working very hard and doing excellent work. The Paris Convention and Havana Convention were reconciled with the result that a complete section on aerial navigation was incorporated in the Convention. Various annexes to the Convention covering all sorts of practical and intricate questions were completed.

With respect to the composition of the Council, the Canadian Convention proposed twelve members as a workable body, selected on the functional principle. The South American and Middle East States wanted a larger board with the idea of their securing representation thereon. Neither the United Kingdom nor the United States delegations at that time seemed to desire to oppose these countries and they weakly consented to the number being raised to twenty-one. In the result, the Council is unwieldy and will require to resort to an Executive Committee to be efficient and practical.

On the question of the seat of the Council, the United States had proposed Canada, and France had made an impassioned plea as to her claims. Canada took no part in any way. When it came to be decided, the Chairman called for a vote on the seat of the Interim Council and Canada secured a reasonable majority. When it came to the question of the location of the seat of the permanent council, the vote was a tie with two votes missing. The delegate for Paraguay had left the room and the delegate for Luxembourg had gone to Washington. The delegate for Paraguay returned and voted for Canada, and the Chairman was announcing the selection of Canada when the delegate for Holland asked that the matter be left over for the final plenary session in view of the close vote and the absence of the delegate for Luxembourg, and this was done. Subsequently, the acting Chairman for Canada, after a visit from the French delegation, suggested that the matter be settled at the final meeting of the Interim Council, and this was agreed to. The French delegation were extremely grateful and many countries congratulated Canada on the fairness of her stand. In any event, Canada did not want its selection to be the result of an American bloc which it in principle was strongly opposing.

Whether the Conference was a success or a failure cannot now be determined. A foundation has been laid which will permit of development, and familiarity with results may remove fear of what may happen and may bring about settlement of the disputed clause on frequencies and escalation.

The Canadian draft is the foundation of the Convention and the language of the transport sections is largely from that draft. By reason of being more thoroughly prepared, and by reason of having put forth a finished document, Canada took a most prominent position and won the commendation of all countries. The credit is entirely due to those responsible for that preparation. The acting Chairman of the Canadian delegation had access to confidential messages and the margin by which the last Canadian proposal failed of acceptance was so narrow as to be tragic.

The achievements of the Conference were as follows:

(1) Final Act — This document includes a series of resolutions, including a recommendation to study the disputed essential clauses and reporting thereon. Resolutions also cover such matters as disposition of technical annexes prepared during the conference, technical personnel, the metric system, transfer of title to aircraft, the position of the Rome Convention of 1933, the development of private international air law, flight documents and publication of documents. One of the most important of these resolutions sets forth certain standard clauses which signatories agree to incorporate in all bilateral agreements regarding international air services. The clauses are of a general nature, providing for mutual recognition of standards, imposition of reasonable charges, registration and similar matters. Countries accepting this resolution also undertake not to grant exclusive rights in bilateral agreements or make discriminatory arrangements.

(2) Interim Agreement on International Civil Aviation — The interim agreement establishes an interim organization which is to remain in existence until the permanent convention comes into force or another conference is called, but in no case to exceed three years. It establishes a provisional organization composed of an Assembly, an Interim Council of twenty-one members and under the Interim Council, a Committee on Air Transport, a Committee on Air Navigation and a Committee on the International Convention.

(3) Permanent Convention on International Civil Aviation — The permanent convention on international civil aviation contains many of the provisions of the original Canadian draft convention submitted to the Conference. It is composed of a part dealing with air navigation, a part establishing the permanent organization, a part dealing with air transport and a part containing final general provisions.

The permanent organization follows the same lines as the interim organization but has more extended powers. It contains principles similar to those proposed in the original Canadian draft convention regarding coordination with any international security organization, regarding provision of airports and air navigation facilities and other matters. While in general its function is to be advisory and consultative, one chapter of this convention provides for compulsory settlement of disagreements between nations over aviation matters.

(4 & 5) International Air Services Agreement and International Air Transport Agreement — As a failure to reach agreement regarding frequencies and escalation had caused the elimination from the Convention of the freedoms clause and the rates clause, an attempt was made by the United States to circumvent bilateral agreements through multilateral agreements dealing, one with two freedoms and one with five freedoms. These bind the parties to each agreement as between themselves and are in no way part of the Convention.

The Conference failed of complete achievement owing to several causes.

The United States and the United Kingdom viewpoints were at wide variance on many things, and it was most unfortunate that Lord Swinton and Mr. Berle got at cross purposes at their first meeting and that a mutual dislike of each other grew. It took days getting them into a frame of mind where progress was possible, and even then, there were outbursts from time to time which retarded progress. Whenever a suggested compromise caused either party too much difficulty in resisting, Lord Swinton's final reply was that it was contrary to the instructions of his Prime Minister, and Mr. Berle's final reply was that he could not get it through Congress.

One effect of the initial delay was that the other head delegates had nothing to do and became impatient and perhaps resentful. One unfortunate result was the formation of a South American-Middle Eastern bloc, which discovered their power and inflicted their will upon the matter of the size and composition of the Council.

The United States gave way on the principle of computation on the basis of embarkation in a country, and felt that this was a great concession. The United Kingdom and Canada gave way on the powers of the Authority and adopted Mr. Berle's new technique of enforcement by means of making each State refusing to compel her airlines to obey findings of the Authority guilty of a breach of an international obligation. This was an original and probably effective means of meeting a situation where there was deep rooted aversion to committing drastic enforcement powers to the proposed Authority. Mr. Berle was the father of this idea and deserves commendation for it.

The Five Freedoms clause was virtually agreed upon when Canada's suggestion of the right to reserve out of the fifth freedom was accepted by both sides. The rate clause was agreed upon and the devastated and retarded nations clause also, but these were dependent upon the settling of the frequency clause, and when this was put aside for further consideration, the others, although practically agreed upon in wording, went the same way.

The susceptibilities of the Latin American States to infringements of sovereignty were by patient drafting overcome.

The organizations, both interim and permanent, were set up with a fair chance that differences of opinion on the outstanding point will, in the process of time, not appear so formidable and that a proper regulatory authority may be set up along the lines of the original Canadian draft.

One important lesson to be learned from the Conference is that the leading nations should have a complete understanding of their objectives before a large Conference meets. Had this been done in this case, the Authority could probably have been set up in a relatively short time. People of international goodwill should if possible be the delegates. Mr. Berle unfortunately had an anti-Anglo prejudice which showed itself from time to time, and Lord Swinton was of the old imperialistic school not particularly alive to present day trends and resentful of some of Mr. Berle's actions. The delegates to the Conference should, as far as possible, be free to exercise their discretion on disputed points. A reference to a home government by telegraph or cable is unsatisfactory and depends to too large an extent upon the representations make by the delegate rather than in the face of the evidence.

The United Kingdom was plainly fighting to maintain her spheres of influence and there was evident a spirit of fear that the centre of influence was flowing to this hemisphere. The latter applied somewhat also to other European nations. It also seemed that England feared American superiority in the air.

The United States, on the other hand, was plainly desirous of securing a large measure of domination in the air and is not prepared to surrender her chances by leaving them in the hands of others to approve or deny what it wants.

The attitude of Holland, France and other European countries was to maintain United States goodwill, giving up a minimum in doing so, while the attitude of the United Kingdom was to preserve her position even though relations with the United States were put under some strain.

Canada should endeavour to add to her personnel, people capable of taking a leading part in conferences of this kind. Personal contacts and conversations with representatives of many countries could not be prosecuted effectively without a much larger delegation.

Mr. Escott Reid and Mr. John Baldwin did great work. As a resourceful draftsman, fertile ideas and quick of execution, Mr. Reid far outdid representatives of any of the other countries. Mr. Baldwin did his work on the drafting committees ably and well and commanded respect in all quarters. Mr. Wilson and his technical assistants more than held up their end.

The place which Canada occupied at this Air Conference calls for added responsibility. The selection of Canada as the headquarters for the Interim Council (and probably the Permanent Council) and as a member of it, calls for the selection of a place in Canada for such headquarters and the provision for office space and living quarters. The membership and staff will be numerous and will bring a large number of newcomers from all the world to this country. There is a twenty-one man council with sub-commissions, committees and staffs, many with families, whose welfare must be considered. Canada will require to decide on her nominee on the Council as well as provide various types of personnel, and these should be competent men.

In addition, an international association of operators from all the world is being formed, and it has been intimated that they also are seriously considering Canada as their headquarters.

Canada thus has the opportunity of becoming a very big factor in world aviation and it should not be neglected. Canada must endeavour to add to her personnel, people capable of taking a leading part in these organizations.

Canada must give consideration as to whether she will sign the Two Freedom agreement and the Five Freedom agreement prepared at the Conference. It would not seem wise to reach a decision until after bilateral agreements are made with the United States respecting both domestic and international lines, and probably also with the United Kingdom relative to international lines.

Under instructions from Canada, the Acting Chairman was prepared to agree to the Two Freedom agreement, but under the conditions as they developed, decided to intimate that Canada would at the proper time probably sign. Ultimately, unless a satisfactory convention can be obtained, Canada will probably feel it wise to sign the Two Freedom agreement.

Canada must also decide whether she will sign the Five Freedom agreement, but this introduces other considerations and must be thought out with great care.

Canada must decide whether she will further endeavour to bring the United Kingdom and the United States together so as to get a finished Convention substantially along the lines of the Canadian proposals. If she decides to try, then she would probably be in a stronger position if we do not now sign the Freedom agreements.

Under the interim and final conventions signed at Chicago, the signature and acceptance clause reads as follows:

"The undersigned delegates to the International Civil Aviation Conference, convened in Chicago on November 1, 1944, have affixed their signatures to this Agreement with the understanding that the Government of the United States of America shall be informed at the earliest possible date by each of the governments on whose behalf the Agreement has been signed whether signature on its behalf shall constitute an acceptance of the Agreement by that government and an obligation binding upon it."

Although the Canadian delegates signed under plenipotentiary powers, it seems that this clause would govern and it is, therefore, recommended that the Government should decide to ratify the signatures to the interim agreement and the permanent convention.[91]

The complete documentation of the Conference have been deposited with all interested departments in Ottawa.

CONFIDENTIAL. My WA-7254 of December 30th,† concerning international aviation.

1. We sent to the State Department on January 1st a note dated December 30th,† identical with that given in paragraph 1 of WA-7254. Canada is, I think, the first country to have accepted the Interim Agreement.

2. If you are going to make an announcement to the press in Canada on the acceptance, we would be grateful if you would give us a little prior warning.[92]

3. We have not yet received from the State Department a report on the question of whether the Administration is going to submit the Interim Agreement to Congress.

4. Mr. Parsons of the State Department reiterated yesterday in an informal talk with Mr. Reid on another matter, that the State Department has been under the impression that Mr. Symington stated at Chicago that Canada would sign the Two Freedoms Agreement. Mr. Reid stated that the formula which Mr. Symington has used in answering repeated enquiries from the press at Chicago had been — "We are not signing at the moment," and that he had refused, in spite of persistent questioning to say more than these seven words. At Mr. Parsons' request, Reid also looked up the Journal of the Conference for December 3rd, which gives a résumé of the meeting on December 2nd of the Joint Sub-Committee of Committees 1, 3 and 4, and informed Mr. Parsons that Mr. Symington's statement, as summarized in the Journal, was not open to the interpretation that he had pledged Canada's acceptance of the Two Freedoms Agreement. Mr. Parsons agreed with this conclusion. He phoned, however, this morning to state that he had been informed that Mr. Symington had told Mr. Berle that Canada would sign the Two Freedoms Agreement, but that Mr. Berle was out of town and he was not able to check this story with him. Mr. Parsons then mentioned the conversations which the United States Ambassador in Ottawa had had, and which are referred to in the second paragraph of the Under-Secretary's memorandum to the Prime Minister of December 30th, which was transmitted to us by the Under-Secretary in a letter to Mr. Mahoney of December 30th.†

5. Reid's recollection of what Mr. Symington said to him of his conversation with Mr. Berle was that Mr. Symington had reminded Mr. Berle of Mr. Berle's promise, made at the very beginning of the Conference, that if Canada were to agree to a grant of air freedoms, the United States Government would see to it that United States airlines landing in Canada did not deprive Trans-Canada Air Lines of any considerable amount of traffic. Mr. Symington had then gone on to say that, since Mr. Berle was now leaving the State Department and his statement, therefore, would not necessarily bind his successor, it would clearly be necessary for Canada to withhold its signature of the Freedoms Agreement until after the conclusion of bilateral talks with the United States. Mr. Berle concurred in the propriety of this course of action.

6. I am not happy at this effort by the State Department, through their Ambassador in Ottawa and through Mr. Parsons here, to attempt to restrict the freedom of action of the Canadian Government by implying, if not stating openly, that Canada would be acting in bad faith if it were to decide against signing the Two Freedoms Agreement at the present time.

7. Perhaps one trouble is that, with Mr. Berle out of the State Department and with Mr. Clayton having only recently taken over aviation matters, the control of United States international air transport policy is now lodged in the hands of Mr. Stokeley Morgan, the Chief of the Aviation Division. Of the dozen or so principal members of the United States delegation at Chicago, Mr. Morgan was, in Reid's opinion, along with Senator Brewster, the most rigid opponent of the Canadian views on the International Air Transport Convention. Apart from Senator Brewster and Mr. Morgan, the leading members of the United States delegation all gave us clear indications that they would have been happy to have agreed to a permanent International Convention which would have included the missing chapters, among them one very close to the Canadian compromise on Article XI. Mr. Morgan, however, instead of assisting in arriving at a reconciliation between the United States and United Kingdom positions, demonstrated on a number of occasions a desire to put obstacles in the way of reconciliation.

8. It would thus seem doubtful whether we can expect assistance from Mr. Morgan in our efforts to close the gaps in the present permanent Convention. Clearly, therefore, the important consideration which will need to be weighed by the Government in coming to a decision on whether or not to sign the Five Freedoms Agreement or the Two Freedoms Agreement, or both, will be whether such signature will increase or lessen the difficulties which will have to be surmounted in securing United States and United Kingdom acceptance of the inclusion in the Convention of the 3½ missing chapters.

PERSONAL AND SECRET [Washington,] January 9, 1945

Dear Norman [Robertson]:

I have marked this letter, which deals with Canadian policy on the Five and Two Freedoms Air Agreements, "personal and secret" to make it easier for me to put my ideas rather more directly than would perhaps be appropriate in an official letter for the Department's files.

2. I am concerned to learn from your letter of January 3 to Mr. Howe that you are in favour of Canada signing the Two Freedoms Agreement (International Air Services Transit Agreement). I have such respect for your judgment that it is with diffidence that I raise the question of the wisdom of your recommendation. You must have good reasons for making it, but I find it hard from this distance fully to comprehend the compelling nature of those reasons.

3. As I see it, the acceptance by Canada of the Two Freedoms Agreement is, of the four possible courses of action open to us, the one which would least serve either our direct and immediate national interests or our longer-run and overriding national interest in the establishment of an effective international civil aviation organization.

4. I would put the four possible courses of action in the following order of merit, the first being the best and the fourth the worst:

(1) Acceptance of neither the Two Freedoms Agreement nor the Five Freedoms Agreement (International Air Transport Agreement);

(2) Acceptance of the Five Freedoms Agreement;

(3) Acceptance of both the Five Freedoms Agreement and the Two Freedoms Agreement;

(4) Acceptance of the Two Freedoms Agreement.

5. I have already, in my letter to Mr. Symington of December 20,† a copy of which I sent you, set forth at some length the reasons which have led me to this conclusion. That letter contains a draft of a statement which might accompany an announcement by the Canadian Government of its decision not to accept either of the freedoms agreements at the present time. It is not necessary for me now, therefore, to repeat the arguments which I make in my letter of December 20. I shall merely summarize them.

6. A refusal to accept either of the two agreements because they are at best stopgaps, and unsatisfactory stopgaps, would be in line with the policy of the Canadian Government during the past year or two. We have contended that the only practicable solution to the problems of international air transport is the conclusion of a comprehensive international air transport convention. We have not yet succeeded in getting that convention, but if we continue during the next six or nine months to push for it as forcefully as possible, there is, I think, better than an even chance that we can get it. A comprehensive convention would include all the articles in the Five Freedoms Agreement. It would also include the missing chapters on allocation of capacity, tariffs, and special treatment for those United Nations which have been hardest hit by the war.

7. If I am right in my estimate that there is a better than even chance of getting a comprehensive convention within the next six or nine months, then there is no pressing need for the Five Freedoms Agreement during that period. The military set-backs which we have suffered have postponed the establishment of civilian air transport services on the main international air routes of the world. Any services which can and need be established over Canada during the year 1945 could be established as the result of temporary permits granted by the Canadian Government, valid for the year 1945.

8. That is the line of my argument in favour of Canada refusing at the present time to accept either of the freedoms agreements. My argument for not accepting the Two Freedoms Agreement, either with or without the Five Freedoms Agreement, is, in part, that we have consistently contended that it is not in the general interest to separate the first two freedoms from the third and fourth freedoms and, though it is true that the so-called Two Freedoms Agreement is, in reality, a two freedoms plus agreement, it still does not satisfactorily meet our point.

9. Another argument for not signing the Two Freedoms Agreement is set forth in the note which is attached to this letter. It is that we would give away much more than we would get.

10. That note also attempts to make the point that we would get more of the air rights we need in order to establish Canadian long-distance international services by signing the Five Freedoms Agreement than we would by signing the Two Freedoms Agreement. The strength of this argument will be increased if Brazil accepts the Five Freedoms Agreement.

11. I am, of course, showing this letter to Mr. Pearson and am telling him that I hope he will add his comments. I am not showing or sending the letter to anyone else but enclose two extra copies in case you should want to pass it on to anyone.

12. I have not developed the point which is of most concern to me and that is my strong feeling that our chances of getting the United States and the United Kingdom to agree this year on the missing chapters of the permanent convention will be greater if we sign neither of the freedoms agreements.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

Appendice à la lettre du premier secrétaire, l'ambassade aux États-Unis, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Appendix to Letter from First Secretary, Embassy in United States, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

January 9, 1945

1. On the assumption that our North Pacific line would, for some time to come, stop in China, and that our South American line would, for some time to come, stop in Brazil, Canada needs, in order to establish the airlines now contemplated, the first two air freedoms from:

Newfoundland,
Denmark (for Greenland),
Iceland,
U.S.A., including Alaska and Hawaii,
U.S.S.R.
British West Indies, and possibly French Guiana and Dutch Guiana, though the Guianas might be by-passed by the route from Trinidad to Brazil.

2. On the same assumption, Canada needs the third and fourth freedoms from the U.S.S.R., China, British West Indies and Brazil.

3. Of the countries which have been mentioned, the Two Freedoms Agreement has been signed by Denmark, the U.S., the U.K., France and the Netherlands. The Five Freedoms Agreement has been signed by Denmark, the U.S. and China.

4. Thus, by signing the Five Freedoms Agreement and not the Two Freedoms Agreement, we would get all the rights we need for our long-distance international air services in Greenland, the U.S.A. and China. By signing the Two Freedoms Agreement and not the Five, we would get the rights we need in Greenland, the U.S.A. and the European colonial possessions in this hemisphere. The question, therefore, is whether the possession of freedoms one, two, three and four in China is not worth more than the possession of the freedoms one and two in the European colonial possessions in this hemisphere.

5. Another consideration, of course, is the value to us of the grant which we would be making of the two or five freedoms to the other signatories of the agreements. If we sign the Two Freedoms Agreement, we would be giving to the U.K., France, the Netherlands and Sweden the very valuable privilege of using the first two freedoms in Canada en route to the United States, and we would get in return only the much less important privilege of using the first two freedoms in the British West Indies and the Guianas.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, January 18, 1945

Dear Escott [Reid]:

Aviation — Freedoms Agreements

I have gone over with interest your personal letter to Mr. Robertson on Canadian signature of the two freedoms and five freedoms agreements in which you suggest that Canada should not sign either but should upon request give temporary permits for the five freedoms.

I am in complete agreement, from the standpoint of purely selfish protection of our aviation interests, that we would theoretically be in a stronger position if we did not sign the two freedoms agreement. (Signature of the five freedoms is, of course, out of the question). Yet it would be most unwise for us to make a public statement that we would grant to other nations five freedoms, upon application, on a temporary basis. I think that until the permanent convention is complete, our bilateral agreements will have to be varied in each instance according to the nation we are dealing with and the problems involved and will have to contain, in some cases, two freedoms, in other cases, four freedoms and possibly even five freedoms.

This being the case, I think that we would hamper our own position and also our chances to complete the blanks in the permanent convention by refusal to sign the two freedoms after our bilateral talks with the U.S., if the U.S. is still anxious that we do so. For one thing, while we have not officially committed ourselves, we have certainly created the impression that we would be likely to sign if a satisfactory bilateral arrangement with Washington could be made first. In addition, multilateral granting of the two freedoms, even though it means the loss of important bargaining counters by a number of strategically located countries such as Canada, is generally and probably accurately accepted as a liberal and forward measure in the field of international air transport and it would, I think, be unwise for Canada to refuse to go along with it. Regardless of what reasons we might offer, I doubt if they would be understood or accepted and we might in consequence find greater difficulty in bilateral deals and later attempts to complete the permanent convention.

In short, I would not be inclined to take the initiative at this stage in signing the two freedoms agreement but if the U.S. continues to press us to do so, I think we would be ill-advised to refuse.

Canada-U.S. Joint Board

I also read with interest Mr. Pearson's letter to Mr. Robertson of January 11th[93] dealing with Mr. Pogue's suggestion that a Canada-U.S. Air Transport Board be established. This is not a new suggestion. I think if you check the documentation of the interdepartmental civil aviation committee, you will find in one of the reports on Canada-U.S. services some time ago that it was considered as a useful possibility. In fact, material prepared for the forthcoming conversations with the U.S. envisages something akin to this.

I am enclosing, for your information, a draft exchange of notes with the U.S.† which we have prepared. It has not, however, been cleared finally with Mr. Howe, Mr. Symington or Mr. Henry. You will see that it provides for an initial allocation together with a subsequent annual review by the aeronautical authorities of the two countries. It would not be difficult to give a formal name to this annual review by calling it a joint Canada-U.S. board.

The problem which troubles me most at the moment, however, is the idea of establishing criteria upon which the Board would act in its allocation of routes and services. There is something to be said, I think, for keeping the Canada-U.S. situation relatively fluid for the time being at least and not binding it to specific principles in view of the fact that we may want to make a considerable number of changes during the next few years in respect to Canada-U.S. air services. Moreover, if criteria are to be set up, I think they should follow the general lines of principles which may be incorporated in the permanent convention and it might be wiser to wait until the position is a little clearer in that respect before attempting to set up principles for a Canada-U.S. board.

As far as rates are concerned, the draft note does follow the Chicago pattern in leaving rates to the operators in the first instance. As far as services and frequencies are concerned, if you agree that it would be inadvisable to attempt to set down general principles for a board during the New York conversations, then the question becomes merely one of deciding whether there is any advantage in calling the proposed annual review a meeting of a joint Canada-U.S. board.

Yours sincerely,

J. R. BALDWIN

Dear Mr. Howe:

In view of the forthcoming conversations with the United States on Air Services,[95] I have attempted to set down some points which the Canadian Delegation might keep in mind.

In the first instance, it should be ascertained whether the United States would be prepared to accept a continuation of the present policy regarding Canada-United States air services, i.e. division of routes in every case. Our most important requirement in such a case will be full rights on the Toronto to Chicago run.

If, as may well prove to be the case, the United States is prepared to make arrangements for additional services only on the basis of parallel operations in the most important cases, then it seems to me that the Canadian approach should be to require parallel rights on all routes where traffic will be sufficient to justify operation by two companies.

It might be possible to set forth criteria by which decision could be reached whether a route justified parallel operations; e.g. where the traffic offering was sufficient to provide, using aircraft of average capacity (e.g. 21 passengers), enough total traffic for three round trips daily at an average pay load of 60%. However, differences in type of aircraft at present in use and excess of existing demand over space available lead to the conclusion that it would be easier at this time, without establishing such general criteria, to decide specifically on what routes there should be parallel operations. On all other routes the existing principle of division between the two countries without any paralleling of operations should be maintained.

[94]Voir le document 298./See Document 298.
[95]Voir le document 285./See Document 285.

If parallel operations are to be permitted on any routes the number of daily frequencies to be allotted to each operator should be established by consultation between the operators concerned and no increases in these frequencies should be permitted without the consent of both operators or both governments.

Coming to the specific trans-border routes in which Canada is interested, they would appear to be:

(a) Toronto to Chicago
(b) Montreal to New York (if parallel operations should be agreed upon)
(c) Vancouver to San Francisco
(d) Fairbanks to White Horse
(e) Winnipeg to Chicago

(This selection is based upon the assumption that Canada will also retain Toronto to New York).

In addition, if satisfactory arrangements can be made without requiring Canada to give up too much, it would seem desirable to clear up as part of the same overall bargain certain other points relating primarily to through international services. The points which occur to me in this connection are:

(a) Permission for T.C.A. to use the United States field at Stephenville, Nfld. as a regular stop.

(b) Rights across the United States for a Canadian service to the West Indies including commercial stop at New York.

(c) Possibly a commercial stop at San Francisco on a Trans-Pacific service.

(This would be dependent upon arrangements between the United States, Australia and New Zealand but at least the door might be kept open for Canada).

and

(d) traffic rights in Honolulu for a Vancouver and Honolulu route.

Yours very truly,

J. R. BALDWIN

CONFIDENTIAL Washington, January 11, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson:

Mr. Reid had lunch today with Mr. Welch Pogue, the Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board. The discussion for the most part turned on problems connected with the establishment of the provisional Civil Aviation Organization and on this we are reporting separately.† Mr. Pogue mentioned, however, in passing, the discussions which are shortly to take place between Canada and the United States on cross-border services.

He said that ever since the middle of last summer, he had been thinking over the possibility of Canada and the United States appointing a joint air transport board which would, on questions relating to the cross-border services, have powers similar to those exercised in the United States by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Thus, the joint Canada-U.S. air transport board would make rulings on rates, on the establishment of new services across the border, and on the increase of schedules on existing services.

Mr. Pogue is, I think, going to discuss this suggestion further with his colleagues.

Mr. Pogue agreed that it would no doubt be necessary for Canada and the United States in an agreement establishing such a board to set forth the criteria which the board should take into account in arriving at its decisions. It would also, he agreed, be desirable for the two governments to agree on an initial allocation of service between them. This would give the board a basis from which to start.

Mr. Pogue felt that Canada and the United States were perhaps the only two countries in the world in which it might be possible to establish a board of this character.

He had no hesitation in saying that an agreement constituting such a board would be approved of by the Senate without any difficulty.

It seems to me that the suggestion made by Mr. Pogue is one which is worthy of careful consideration by the Canadian government.[96]

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

SECRET Ottawa, January 20, 1945

Dear Mr. Symington:

Mr. Howe asked me yesterday afternoon to come down and see him about the conversations next week. The following notes are a record of the important points resulting from the conversation.

1. We did not deal with specific Canada-U.S. routes at any length, since that is to be taken up in New York with you next Wednesday.

2. As regards international through routes, Mr. Howe thought the only rights which Canada might ask for would be traffic rights in the Hawaiian Islands and the use of the U.S. field at Stephenville, Newfoundland. He did not feel, however, that we should be in any hurry to advance a request for either of these routes during the conversations, until we saw how much the United States was going to ask for, since we could get on without the one at the moment, and the other (Honolulu) could be taken up later after Australia had dealt with the United States.

3. He thought the annual review proposed in the draft Exchange of Notes which I prepared† might be called a meeting of a joint Canada-U.S. Air Transport Panel, but he did not think that any specific principles, such as we were discussing in Chicago, should be set down at this time for such a Panel; rather it should be merely given power to review and modify Canada-U.S. air services.

He did not feel that it was necessary to include any clauses dealing with rate control, since the powers at present vested in the C.A.B. and the Air Transport Board, the "competitive" phrase in the T.C.A. Act and the general competitive nature of operations would automatically take care of this matter.

As regards services in the event of competitive operations, he felt that any regulation should be on the basis of total capacity and that the approach should be the granting of equal rights in this respect to both parties.

4. In respect of the date of coming into force of the arrangements, he felt that, while delay might be to our advantage, the normal procedures that would have to be followed in both countries, and particularly by the C.A.B. in the United States, would be entirely sufficient delay in themselves and, accordingly, we need not worry about delaying unduly the coming into force of the new arrangements. I must confess that I am not quite sure about this myself.

5. Since annual review is proposed, he was of the general opinion that we should attempt to keep allocation of services to a minimum during the present conversations, only putting in those routes which we might reasonably hope to put into operation in the relatively near future. It would then be possible, in a year's time, to add any further routes that were desired. This would be a good argument to use in keeping U.S. requests down to the minimum in the time being as well.

He also indicated a desire to take up with the United States the question of fare-paying traffic on U.S. military services.

I have revised the draft Exchange of Notes and Annex as a result of this conversation and am enclosing a copy of my revision for your information.†

Sincerely yours,

J. R. BALDWIN

TELETYPE EX-243 [Ottawa,] January 22, 1945

FOR ESCOTT REID FROM J.R. BALDWIN. Begins: In conversation with Mr. Howe on Friday he indicated the following items for New York discussions:

1. Canada-U.S. services
2. Carriage of fare-paying passengers by U.S.-A.T.C.[97]
3. Any follow-ups on Chicago permanent convention.[98]

Canada-U.S. air services are in his opinion the most important item. He is inclined to limit any Canadian requests in this field, not adding any traffic rights for through international services which we may want from the U.S., unless U.S. asks for these from Canada as well in the first instance. He has no strong feelings regarding formal establishment of a joint board but if one should be established will take the view regarding its terms of reference which I suggested in my last letter to you.†

Our attitude regarding fare-paying passengers will depend upon State Department reply to our query[99] and also position of our proposed overall agreement regarding military services.[100] I assume you will be well briefed on this.

As regards Chicago permanent convention idea would be to see whether any useful consideration could be given informally to future strategy but not to spend time over specific matters of principles. Ends.

letter go over the whole field, but merely comment on some points which he may, perhaps, not stress in his report.

2. I am marking the letter personal and secret to indicate that it would, in my opinion, be unwise for the letter to be circulated outside the Department.

3. I enclose two copies of a memorandum of January 25† which sets forth the draft proposals which we put before the meeting on Friday morning, January 26.†

4. I also enclose two copies of the annex to the exchange of notes which is dated January 26.†

5. By comparing the two you will see that we failed to get the Winnipeg-Chicago run and, instead, took the Toronto-Cleveland run, and did not list among the United States routes the Minot-Regina and Spokane-Lethbridge runs.

6. The really important route which we got out of the New York conversations was the Toronto-Chicago route. The Port Arthur-Duluth route was put in our list to please Mr. Howe's constituents and it is not one which TCA wants to operate. The Victoria-Seattle route and the Whitehorse-Fairbanks route, which we secured, are not important at the moment but may, according to Mr. Symington, be important in the long run, since they can become part of the far western route from the United States to Alaska, and a route from the mid-west to Alaska.

7. Mr. Symington shares my disappointment that we did not secure from the United States the Winnipeg-Chicago run. This would have given us a route from Chicago to Alaska and ultimately to the Far East. It, along with the Chicago-Toronto run, would have given TCA an alternative trans-continential service by way of Chicago, with rights to pick up and put down traffic in Chicago.

8. There is, I think, little doubt that if we had been firm enough in our negotiations we could have got the Winnipeg-Chicago run by giving the United States the Toronto-Cleveland run and the Minot-Regina run. Had Mr. Howe not been in New York we could have pulled this off. He, however, for some reason, has never been keen on the Winnipeg-Chicago route and gave in to the United States on this without any demur.

9. We certainly ought to try to get it in the next conversations with the United States on the revision of the annex, and I would suggest that as soon as TCA is in a position to operate that route, we should propose to the United States the necessary revision of the annex.

10. There is one other change which, I think, should be made in the annex as soon as possible. It is now illegal for TCA to sell in Seattle a ticket to New York via TCA (Victoria, Toronto, New York). Similarly it is illegal for a United States airline company to sell in Vancouver a ticket to Montreal via a United States airline company (Seattle, New York, Montreal). Though this is illegal, it will, nevertheless, be done. TCA, for example, will have to have special tickets printed for sale in New York, one part of the ticket reading "New York-Toronto", and another part reading "Toronto-Seattle". It is in the interest of the consuming public that the sale of such tickets be legitimized. It is also in the interests of TCA and of the United States airline companies with which it competes, since it will keep them both up to scratch.

11. There would be some difficulty in drafting a clause to cover this, but the clause might read that while cabotage in general was prohibited, nevertheless a Canadian airline could carry passengers from one point in the United States to another point in the United States, provided that say 80 to 90 percent of the flight was over Canadian territory and vice versa.

12. Dr. Warner pressed hard in the discussions for some protection for the United States against a Canadian trans-atlantic airline draining traffic away from the United States middle west. Mr. Symington wisely pointed out that it was a peculiar reversal of the rules at Chicago to find the United States arguing against freedom and in favour of restriction, and that Lord Swinton would have been happy if he had been sitting in on the discussions. Dr. Warner himself was, I think, unhappy at having to put forward this argument and when we remained firm gave in quite easily. The only concession we made was that we would not run through planes from Cleveland or Chicago to points beyond the territorial limits of Canada. TCA will, however, be able to sell through tickets in Cleveland and Chicago to the United Kingdom via T.C.A., the passenger changing planes in Montreal.

13. Mr. Symington had some difficulty in persuading Mr. Howe to insist on our securing this right, but fortunately succeeded. Mr. Howe does not seem to be conscious of the fact that for 300 years we have tried to drain traffic by canoe, canal and train from the American middle west to Europe by way of the St. Lawrence.

14. The United States tried to get permission to take on in a United States airline in Montreal for Europe passengers who had come to Montreal on a United States airline, even though the United States trans-atlantic airline did not have the right to pick up and deposit passengers in Montreal. Mr. Symington, with some difficulty, was able to persuade Mr. Howe to resist this request.

Yours sincerely,

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION;
AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES

1. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY reported upon meetings held in New York on January 25th and 26th between Canadian and U.S. representatives regarding Canada-United States air services, and submitted and commented upon a draft exchange of notes between the two countries resulting from these meetings.

The draft, which was based upon standard clauses for bilateral agreements approved during the recent International Aviation Conference in Chicago, retained the principle of geographical division of routes between Canadian and U.S. lines.

Under the new arrangements, Canada would have the sole right to operate on the following routes into the United States:

Halifax to Boston,
Toronto to New York,
Toronto to Cleveland,
Toronto to Chicago,
Port Arthur to Duluth,
Victoria to Seattle, and Whitehorse to Fairbanks.

The United States would have the sole right to operate on the following routes into Canada:

Boston to Moncton,
Boston to Montreal,
New York or Boston to Quebec,
New York to Montreal-Ottawa,
Buffalo to Toronto (two airlines),
Fargo to Winnipeg,
Great Falls to Lethbridge,
Seattle to Vancouver,
Seattle to Whitehorse, and Fairbanks to Whitehorse.

In addition, both countries could provide air connections between Detroit and Windsor. Airlines of each country would be limited on any one flight to a single traffic stop in the territory of the other.

This ratio between U.S. and Canadian services which worked out at approximately two to one compared favourably with a previous ratio of about eight to one.

The agreement also provided for special consideration of border crossings between Canada and Alaska. In this connection, it was suggested that the Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in Northwest Canada be designated to examine the situation with a U.S. representative and submit recommendations.

Copies of the draft exchange of notes, together with an explanatory memorandum, had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum and attached draft exchange of notes, January 29, 1945 — C.W.C. document 930).†

2. THE ASSOCIATE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported that officials of the Department of National Revenue had suggested the desirability of broadening the provisions of the agreement in the matter of customs duties and charges on fuel oil, spare parts, etc.

3. MR. HOWE pointed out that these articles followed the form of standard clauses agreed upon at Chicago.

The U.S. government might be reluctant, for that reason, to make any change. In any event, completion of the agreement should not be delayed. Alteration in the matter of customs could be taken up later on.

4. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the draft exchange of notes be approved;

(b) that the modifications suggested by the Department of National Revenue in the matter of customs be included if immediately agreeable to the U.S. government; otherwise that these proposals be considered for inclusion in a supplementary agreement;[101]

(c) that the Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in Northwest Canada be authorized to act on behalf of the government of Canada in making joint recommendations from time to time on Canada-Alaska services as required under article X, clause (4).

Mémorandum du secrétaire adjoint du Cabinet au premier secrétaire, ministère des Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet to First Secretary, Department of External Affairs

SECRET Ottawa, December 28, 1944

Mr. Howe has indicated that he would like External Affairs to forward, through Dominions Office, a communication to the effect that Canada would like to enter into negotiations regarding a Canadian service to the West Indies, either directly with the West Indian governments concerned or through the Colonial Office or jointly.

The communication might, I think, refer to discussion of this route that took place first between Mr. Howe and Lord Beaverbrook in October, 1943,[102] and then to further discussion between Mr. Howe and Lord Swinton in Montreal this month.[103] My own feeling is that we should not attempt to argue the case for such a service in the communication to the U.K., but should reserve that for the later negotiations.

It was our understanding at the last meeting in Montreal that Lord Swinton was to take this up upon his return, so that when we made formal communication, it would be possible to give us a prompt reply, indicating what the next steps should be. I think the communication, however, should be so worded so that it would be impossible for the U.K. to come back with the suggestion that we wait for the first meeting of the Commonwealth Council next spring. Perhaps we might refer to our desire for prompt action and also to our desire to try out certain experimental flights during the winter. I suppose mention might also be made to the informal exploration we have already done in the area and to the equally informal approaches we have received from various West Indian representatives.

May I take it that you will prepare a draft communication?

TELEGRAM 250 Ottawa, December 30, 1944

The Canadian Government would like to enter into discussions looking to the establishment at an early date of a Canadian air service between Canada and the West Indies. You will recall that this subject was discussed by Mr. Howe and Lord Beaverbrook in October 1943 and that the latter indicated that the United Kingdom Government would be agreeable to the institution of such a service. Further discussions took place between Mr. Howe and Lord Swinton in Montreal recently.

As you are aware we have received a number of informal approaches from interests in the West Indies which would like to see the establishment of such a service and Trans-Canada Air Lines have for their part made informal surveys of the situation. We should like to have discussions take place as soon as possible so that certain experimental flights could be made during the winter.

We should be glad to have your views as to the form which these discussions should take. Presumably they could be with representatives of West Indian Governments or with representatives of the United Kingdom Government or with both. Any of these methods would be agreeable to us provided it was expeditious. An alternative which we have considered is to wait until the first meeting of the Commonwealth Air Transport Council but we are anxious to avoid the delay which this would involve.

CONFIDENTIAL. Your telegram No. 250 of December 30th, proposal for Canada-West Indies Air Service.

We suggest that discussions should be held between Canadian and United Kingdom officials, and for our part should be glad to have them in London.

2. If Canadian Government agree, we should also be glad to learn who would represent Canada and probable date of arrival. It would facilitate discussion if we could be informed beforehand of Canadian proposals. Reference to Colonial Governments concerned would be essential before an Agreement could be concluded, but it is not (repeat not) expected that this need involve undue delay, and it is not (repeat not) proposed, therefore, to invite West Indian representatives to attend.

TELEGRAM 13 Ottawa, January 20, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL

Your telegram No. 2 of January 6 regarding discussions for a proposed Canadian air service to the West Indies. In order to avoid if possible any further travel for the time being, which has in recent months consumed a great deal of the time of your and our aviation officials, we should like to suggest that in the initial stages at least this question be taken up through correspondence.

The Canadian proposal for an air service to the West Indies and the Caribbean area has developed naturally out of the policy laid down in the Commonwealth conversations held in London in October, 1943, and the Commonwealth discussions held in Montreal in October, 1944. It was agreed in London that each member of the Commonwealth, in establishing air services connecting various parts of the Commonwealth, should be responsible for those services directly adjacent to its own territory. During the same discussions, it was informally agreed between Lord Beaverbrook and Mr. Howe that the service from North America southward to the West Indies should be operated by Canada. Subsequently, during the Montreal discussions there was general acceptance of the principle that in the establishment of air services connecting various parts of the Commonwealth, parallel operations should be avoided except on those routes where traffic would be sufficiently heavy to justify the operation of more than one service.

An air service from Canada southward to the West Indies and the Caribbean area for a number of years is not likely to be heavily travelled. In fact, it probably would not pay its way for some years until traffic could be developed; certainly it could not be considered sufficiently active to justify parallel operations. The Canadian government, nevertheless, is prepared to undertake operation of this particular segment of the connecting services within the Commonwealth and hopes that the necessary permission may be granted for its establishment.

Final decision has not yet been taken on the exact route to be followed, on stopping places, or on such question as frequencies and rates. Tentative consideration has been given to a route from Eastern Canada to Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica and Trinidad; to begin with, it would operate to the Bahamas, being extended to further points as rapidly as circumstances and preparations would permit. Ultimate action on these matters, however, can only be taken after a number of experimental flights have been flown. Consideration has also been given to the advisability of extending this service from Trinidad to Brazil and we expect, in due course, to undertake negotiations with the Brazilian Government in this connection.

The Canadian government would be happy to have the operator of this service (Trans-Canada Air Lines or a subsidiary) enter into direct arrangements with any other British services which may touch, pass through, or operate within the West Indies or Caribbean area so that wherever possible traffic may be exchanged between the Canadian service and these other British services and other arrangements for cooperation may be made.

The Canadian government requests that permission be granted for a Canadian air service operating generally over the route suggested to set down and take up traffic at an airport in each of the following — Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica and Trinidad, this right to apply not only to traffic originating in and destined to Canada but also traffic between the West Indian Islands mentioned. We hope that this permission may be granted at an early date since we are anxious to proceed with the experimental flights which are a necessary preliminary to the inauguration of regular service.

We assume that permission would be granted through an exchange of notes which would incorporate the standard clauses agreed upon in Chicago.[104]

TELEGRAM 42 London, March 2, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL. Your telegram No. 13 of January 20th, proposed Canada-West Indies air service. Correct text, Begins:

We have carefully considered proposals put forward.

2. As Lord Swinton explained during second Montreal conversations, the discussion about the arrangements for operation of air services on route from Canada to West Indies, which took place in course of explanatory talks in London in October, 1943, was linked with other proposals for operation of Empire air routes which have not been put into effect in the form then contemplated. It was never in our minds that any company should have a monopoly and that would be out of keeping with policy which we have consistently advocated. Lord Beaverbrook confirms this view.

3. As pointed out in second paragraph of your telegram, United Kingdom delegation, in common with other Commonwealth delegations, expressed view during Montreal Conference that, in establishment of air services connecting various points of Commonwealth, parallel operations should be avoided except on routes where traffic would justify operation of more than one service. It was for this reason that we advocated establishment of joint organisations such as that favoured by Australia, New Zealand and ourselves for operation of air services across Pacific. We should, therefore, be very ready, if Canadian Government so wish, to explore with Canadian authorities possibility of establishing a joint organisation in which Canadian, United Kingdom, West Indian, Bahamian and Bermudian interests would participate for operation of air services on Canada-West Indies route.

See Canada, Treaty Series, 1944, No. 36.

4. We have noted proposals in paragraphs 4 and 5 of your telegram as to route which you have in mind for service to follow, and we appreciate your offer that proposed Canadian service should fit in with the British air services which may touch, pass through or operate within West Indian area. We suggest that detailed examination of these practical points should be taken up when agreement in principle has been reached on the organisation for operating the service.

5. Your paragraph 6. It is settled policy to develop local company as chosen instrument for operation of inter-island services between British Colonies in Caribbean area. Since traffic offering is not at present sufficient to allow even one operator to make ends meet, we are obliged to reserve to B.W.I.A.[105] all cabotage traffic between British islands which are at present served or will shortly be served by it. For the time being, however, and subject to the views of Colonial Governments concerned, we for our part should not wish, if a joint organisation were established on basis outlined above, to reserve cabotage traffic as between islands not at present served by local services, though question would have to be further considered when local service was in a position to carry such traffic. There would be no (repeat no) objection on our part to carriage of "Fifth Freedom" traffic.

6. We should of grateful for views of Canadian Government on suggestion in paragraph 3 above. Ends.

TELEGRAM 64 Ottawa, March 14, 1945

URGENT. Your telegram No. 42, March 2, proposed Canada-West Indies air service.

Your paragraph three. For reasons which we sought to make clear during the recent Montreal conversations and which relate directly to questions of techniques of operation, types of equipment and general responsibility, including adjustments of financial deficits, the Canadian government does not favour participation in joint operating organisations and the specific proposal that a Canadian, United Kingdom, West Indian, Bahamian and Bermudian joint organisation be established for operation of a Canadian-West Indies service is unacceptable to us. We remain of the opinion that as far as Canada is concerned separate operation coordinated through the Commonwealth Air Transport Council and through direct arrangements between operating companies offers the best method of development.

Your paragraph two. We have re-examined the report on "All-British Air Routes" which was signed by Lord Beaverbrook and Mr. Howe on October 14, 1943,† and which was accepted during the 1943 conversations. The provision for a Commonwealth coordinating committee has already been made effective; and our approach to the question of operation of Commonwealth routes and the proposals we advanced for a Canadian-West Indies service are directly based upon the policy outlined in paragraphs two and three of that report. We are therefore at a loss to understand the reference in your telegram to other considerations arising out of the Commonwealth conversations in 1943 which have not been put into effect in the form then contemplated, and we would welcome clarification. As the development of our policy and our plans for international air services particularly in respect of connections between different parts of the Commonwealth have been based upon the policy outlined in 1943 we should be glad to know whether the United Kingdom considers this report agreed during the Commonwealth conversations in 1943 no longer operative and effective. Rejection of that policy at this stage would compel us to reconsider the whole situation.

The Canadian proposals for an air service to the West Indies are also related to our general position vis-à-vis the West Indies in which the trade agreement with Canada[106] and the subsidized Canadian steamship service have been important elements. The re-establishment and further development of those relations necessarily involves joint air and ship connection. To the best of our knowledge local services in the territory appear ready to welcome the proposed Canadian service and are anxious to work out arrangements with it for interchange of traffic. We had not considered that the Canadian service would be detrimental to the interests of any local services which might develop but would rather provide more traffic for such services. We would expect that the operations could be integrated and satisfactory arrangements worked out which would avoid any danger of detrimental competition.

We see no grounds for your suggestion that we are seeking a monopoly. Pan-American Air Lines now serves the points mentioned as stopping places in our application, and transports by far the larger portion of inter-island traffic in this area. Also, the United Kingdom holds rights to the route from New York to Bermuda, and can if it wishes establish a route direct from the United Kingdom to Bermuda. We hope it would not be the intention of the United Kingdom, under these circumstances, to refuse a similar right to a Canadian service which would fit in with the general plans for the development of

[106]Voir Grande-Bretagne:/See Great Britain:

Commonwealth air services. The Canadian Government hopes that the United Kingdom government will not insist on withholding from Canada privileges which have been granted to other countries.

We feel, as was generally agreed in Montreal, that parallel competitive services on Commonwealth routes of doubtful economic potential would be destructive to the whole idea of a co-operative Commonwealth network. If the foregoing principles are agreed to, we see no difficulty however in working out details of specific integration with B.W.I.A. or any other local Commonwealth service, in order to avoid duplication and detrimental competition.

to High Commissioner in Great Britain

TELEGRAM 636 Ottawa, March 15, 1945

SECRET. May I draw your attention to my telegram No. 64 of March 14th to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs on the subject of a proposed Canada-West Indies Air Service?

I assume these messages will be seen by the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office as well as by the Civil Air Ministry since the issues they raise go beyond the field of civil aviation.

As you will see we attach a good deal of importance to the matter from the point of view of general Commonwealth policy and would be sorry to see it dealt with in the United Kingdom on a purely departmental basis.

TELEGRAM 814 London, March 19, 1945

Your telegram No. 636 of 15th March, Canada-West Indies air service.

I am assured messages referred to have been seen by Foreign Office and other interested offices and that the United Kingdom authorities appreciate the importance the Canadian authorities attach to this subject and their desire that it should not be dealt with purely departmentally.

TELEGRAM 69 London, March 29, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL. Your telegram of March 14th, No. 64, proposed Canada-West Indies air service.

Difficulty which we felt over your telegram of January 20th, No. 13, was that it appeared to us to suggest that you had in mind that Canadian service should have monopoly on the route, and we are glad to learn from your telegram that there is no foundation for this view. We share your hope that institution of a Canadian air link between Canada and West Indies would strengthen the ties developed before the war by the trade and shipping connection. But we think that the Colonial Governments concerned would not view with favour a suggestion that they should forego prospect of participation in an air service on the route and we should not like to press them on the point. It was for this reason that we put forward suggestion of joint operating organisation which we are sorry to find you do not favour. But failing establishment of a joint operating organisation, we should like to have opportunity of discussing in further detail rights which should be granted on each side and when and how they should be exercised. We agree that any British service which it might be decided to operate on the route should be co-ordinated with any Canadian service. Given cooperative approach to problem and with aid of machinery of the Commonwealth Air Transport Council, we should not expect difficulty in reaching arrangements satisfactory to the Governments concerned in practical application of the Montreal conclusions which amplified and developed the earlier exploratory discussions in London in 1943.

2. With reference to your penultimate paragraph, there is, of course, no question of withholding from Canada rights granted to United States, though naturally any grant of rights should be subject to mutual agreement and to provisions of existing contracts. Position regarding B.W.I.A. was explained in paragraph 5 of my telegram of March 2nd, No. 42. Present position with United States company is that one contract with it has already reached end of initial term and has been renewed on yearly basis for duration of war. Others are due to expire in 1946 or 1947. Pre-war arrangements with United States company should not, therefore, necessarily be taken as basis of future policy.

3. We also wish to make clear that use of Kindley Field in Bermuda, or of any other airfields in leased bases, would necessitate discussions with United States Government in accordance with Bases Agreement of March 27th, 1941. To open this question with them now would raise delicate issues which we should prefer to postpone. Any plans for a Canadian service through Bermuda or West Indian leased bases would, therefore, we think, be subject to decision to be reached as to handling of this aspect.

4. We feel that further progress would best be made in oral discussion and should, therefore, like to revert to our earlier suggestions for conversations in London. We think that these could usefully take place between officials, but we should like to have a fortnight's notice of the date which would be acceptable to you in order that we might consider further whether to arrange for representation of Colonial Governments concerned. We should also wish to await return of Minister for Civil Aviation from South Africa.

MÉMORANDUM

MEMORANDUM

Canadian Air Services to Latin America and the United Kingdom

The projected Canadian air services to the Caribbean and South America, and to the United Kingdom are the two major problems in the field of international air services with which Canada is now dealing; of these two the South American service may prove the more complicated.

The original plans for a Canadian service were based upon the Commonwealth conversations of 1943 when it was understood that a Canadian service from North America to that area would provide that particular Commonwealth link in the general chain of Commonwealth air services. The U.K. has however rejected this arrangement and has tried to press Canada into a joint operating company for the route or failing that, will seek rights for a parallel British service to run from the West Indies to Canada. Under these circumstances it is obviously desirable for Canada to consider and explore fully the possibility of developing alternative stopping places and sources of traffic in Latin America.

A tapping of the Brazilian market has always been contemplated and should prove fruitful. If no stop whatsoever in British West Indian territory were made, Canada would have to rely upon rights in Cuba and possibly San Domingo, Curacao, Venezuela or Surinam. A further alternative or supplement to arrangements with the British West Indies would be a close tie-up with the Central American Company, T.A.C.A.

While the tone of the last U.K. wire was somewhat more moderate, I do not see in it any fundamental change in their earlier position; it is likely that if Canada asks for any traffic rights in Bermuda or the British West Indies, the U.K. will insist upon reciprocal rights in Canada for a British company. There is a possibility that if Canada fought the point vigorously, at the same time modifying its plans so that we made only one or at the most two stops in British territory that the British might be prepared to drop the demand for a reciprocal service. In this event, Canada might limit traffic stops to the Bahamas and Port of Spain; however, while we might not lose much by dropping a Jamaica stop we would lose by omission of Bermuda.

If by any chance it should be decided to give the British reciprocal rights for a service from the West Indies to Canada, then the only condition upon which this should be done should be a complete grant to Canada of all the traffic stops we wanted in the British islands (presumably 4 or 5) including the right to carry inter-island traffic, which the U.K. at present reserves as cabotage. Anything less would be a poor bargain; even under such conditions it is questionable whether the bargain would work out to our advantage.

Any such reciprocal arrangement would strengthen our case for developing non-British traffic in the area since a second British carrier would be tapping the British island traffic pool. Canada in consequence would need supplementary Latin American traffic.

Another problem arises from the British insistence upon applying (to all future bilateral agreements) the formula which they proposed unsuccessfully at Chicago. Sir Stafford Cripps has already stated in the British Parliament that the U.K. authorities intend to pursue this course. In the West Indies it would complicate arrangements considerably and if applied rigidly might result in uneconomic variations in schedules and capacity offered between the various islands and in difficulties in respect of definition of home traffic from the islands.

A further problem in the event of reciprocal services is the fact that Canada has not proposed to tap the U.S. traffic market. It might well be that the U.K. plans to develop a British service which would enter the U.S. market. If we granted reciprocal rights to such a British service the situation would be far from reciprocity or equity.

These circumstances indicate the desirability, regardless of the course we may follow with the U.K., of developing as much as possible in the way of traffic rights and agreements with Latin American nations in the Caribbean and Central American area. They will be valuable no matter what route we follow and may be an important card in our negotiations with the U.K.

Mr. Symington's visit to the Caribbean should prove helpful in this connection; if prospects are favourable for Canadian agreements with Latin American countries and companies then it may be well to develop as far as possible a plan for Canadian service based on Latin American traffic without worrying for the time being about British West Indian traffic, rather than hinder our operation by letting a competitive U.K. service develop where there is neither the necessity nor the traffic for a competitive service.

Perhaps an effective immediate step would be to indicate to the U.K. our readiness to hold discussions at an early date in accordance with their suggestion. Discussions presumably should be deferred until after Mr. Symington's visit to Cuba; then if a senior representative can go to London so much the better; if not, a less satisfactory alternative might be to suggest to the U.K. that Sir Frederick Bowhill[107] bring out a party to negotiate on these matters.

If there are good prospects for agreements in Latin America, then Canada's tactics in the event of discussions with the U.K. might be to point out that we feel there should be one Commonwealth service from Canada to the Caribbean area but that two Commonwealth services running in competition would be uneconomic and unnecessary, in view of the keen competition that any in that area service must encounter from U.S., Netherlands and Latin American services. The U.K. could be informed that in these circumstances Canada proposed to operate a service to the Caribbean area and Brazil and had already undertaken arrangements with Latin American countries to make this possible; that Canada would be prepared to include a British West Indian stop or stops in this service but not upon terms which would seriously prejudice the economic operation of the Canadian line. This policy might bring results; certainly if the British West Indian islands were left without a connecting service to British North America in consequence of U.K. reluctance to accept the Canadian proposals then considerable pressure (from the islands) upon the U.K. might result.

It might be wise, when discussing the West Indian service, also to raise the question of a bilateral agreement with the U.K. covering North Atlantic services. Here again the starting point, which should be satisfactory from the Canadian point of view, would be a simple agreement based upon the standard clauses agreed in Chicago but providing also for rate control and for some equality of capacity. The rate control could easily be taken care of by extension of the arrangements now being worked out for fare-paying traffic on military services; in any case any modification of rates would probably have to come as a result of joint Canada-U.S.-U.K. consultation and action. The control of capacity could be accomplished by granting each the right to put on as many services as the other with some top ceiling for each, e.g., one round trip a day.

While this would be the simplest formula for agreement the U.K. may try to introduce her formula already mentioned and based upon 50% of home traffic. The difficulty here is that no satisfactory statistics exist which can be used since neither the prewar nor wartime travel offer satisfactory criteria. However it is unlikely that the U.K. formula would injure the Canadian position since there is probably more traffic originating in Canada for the U.K. than vice versa and we would benefit in the allotment of capacity.

This situation would be complicated however if the U.K. wished to extend its Canadian service to a U.S. terminal, adjusting its services to take into account U.K. traffic bound for the U.S. In such circumstances Canada should limit agreement with the U.K. to four freedoms in order to protect Canada-U.S. traffic (the fifth freedom from the U.K. would be of no use to us in any case until it is proposed to run the Canadian service from the U.K. on to Europe). Moreover, in any such situation, the U.K. would probably be running more services across the North Atlantic between the U.K. and the U.S. than home traffic between the U.K. and Canada justified and it would be necessary to place some limitation upon the number of U.K. traffic stops in Canada; this too would offer so many possibilities of confusion and complication that it would seem easier to adopt for at least an initial trial period a simpler formula by which a ceiling on services was placed, each country given equal rights under the ceiling and arrangements made for modification of the ceiling after consultation.

On the whole, there should be little reason, given equal availability of aircraft, and once economy and efficiency of operation have had a chance to take effect, to fear U.K. competition on the North Atlantic route. Accordingly, there may be something to be said for meeting the U.K. on as many points as possible with regard to the North Atlantic if in return the U.K. would be prepared to make concessions in respect of the Canadian service to the West Indies.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa,] April 28, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have your letter of March 31st† enclosing Dominions Office confidential cable No. 69,[108] in the matter of the proposed West Indies air service.

Malcolm MacDonald was good enough to communicate with me on the supplementary instructions which he received in this connection. I regret to say that the supplementary instructions were such as to make the proposals contained in the Dominions Office communication wholly unacceptable. It is quite evident that the U.K. will demand for B.O.A.C. reciprocal rights for any service that we undertake touching West Indies islands. Obviously, there is no basis in equity for such an arrangement.

Malcolm MacDonald has interested himself in the situation and I understand that Lord Cranborne has expressed the wish to discuss the matter, provided he is able to call at Ottawa on his return from San Francisco. Therefore, it would seem wise to take no action meanwhile.

Mr. Symington recently visited Cuba to attend a meeting of air transport operators, and while there, he explored the possibility of a reciprocal arrangement for an air transport service between Cuba and Canada. Obviously the Government of Cuba would welcome such an arrangement. I have no doubt that another Caribbean Government, possibly Dutch Guiana, will also be glad to make a similar arrangement. Thus it would be possible to work out our service to Brazil without touching the West Indies. I would be sorry to do this, but on the other hand, I cannot be a party to permitting the U.K. to compete with us on the Canada-Brazil service for the simple reason that we wish to serve the West Indies in passing. You will appreciate that the U.K. has no possible right to a route between Brazil and Canada.

I will be glad of your views, but in the meantime, I suggest that no answer be sent to Dominions Office cable No. 69.

Yours sincerely,

[C. D. HOWE]

RECORD OF FOURTH MEETING HELD IN BELMONT HOTEL, BERMUDA, ON THURSDAY, 20TH DECEMBER, 1945.

Present:—

U.K. Delegation	Canadian Delegation	Representatives of the Bermuda Government

MR. CRIBBETT introduced the representatives of the Bermuda Airport Board to the Canadian Delegation, and outlined to them shortly, the subjects discussed in the course of the past three days, with particular reference to the arrangements for the operation of trans-Atlantic services between Canada and the United Kingdom, some of which might, on occasion, pass through Bermuda, when they would be forced to use that route owing to weather conditions though they would not be regularly scheduled to do so. The main purpose of the present meeting was to discuss the proposed Canadian service from Canada via Bermuda to the Caribbean and Brazil, with particular reference to rights for the service in Bermuda.

[109]Pour les conversations aux Bermudes voir aussi Canada, Documents relatifs aux relations entre le Canada et Terre-Neuve, Volume 1, les documents 1078-9, 1083, 1085, 1086-8.

2. MR. HOWE outlined the Canadian proposals. He referred to the fact that Canada had historic connections with the Caribbean area and had spent large sums of money in building up a steamship service to those parts. The staging posts that would be used on the air service had now been finally settled, but the provisional intention was that the service should operate from Montreal via Bermuda to Nassau and thence probably via Jamaica to Trinidad, possibly British Guiana, Belem and Brazil. Bermuda and the islands in the Caribbean attracted a certain number of Canadian winter tourists but the traffic was very seasonal and the route was a thin one. T.C.A. proposed in due course to operate 40 seater aircraft on the route. Speaking from the operating point of view, MR. SYMINGTON said that a traffic study of the route indicated that if all the passengers leaving Canadian ports by ship for Bermuda and the West Indies prior to the War, were diverted to the air, not more than one trip a week would be justified with the type of equipment T.C.A. had it in mind to operate. No air line undertaking could hope to be economic at such a frequency, particularly in view of the heavy overhead that had to be carried. In these circumstances it was most desirable from the economic point of view, that the service should be allowed freedom to develop the route. The traffic on the route would have to be energetically built up if a heavy deficit was to be avoided. The United Kingdom was a long way away and the nearest British base for such a service was Canada. Continuing, he said that at the Montreal conversations it had been recognised that on thin traffic routes of this kind, it would not be good business to have competition with parallel air lines. Urgent requests had already been received from various quarters, e.g. Nassau and Trinidad, for a Canadian service to be started, and another request had very recently been received from Barbados.

3. Speaking on behalf of the Bermuda Delegation, MR. DILL said that they were glad to have the opportunity of discussing the whole question with the Canadian and United Kingdom Delegations. Bermuda had an overriding interest in the tourist trade and on these grounds they naturally welcomed the proposed service. They would wish to be satisfied, however, that any service provided was the kind of service they wanted to maintain tourist traffic with the island. Moreover, although it was extremely unlikely that they would themselves wish to operate or to arrange for the operation of a reciprocal service at any rate for some time, they felt that they must reserve the right to do so. The following is a summary of the main points made in the ensuing discussion:

(a) MR. CRIBBETT said that there was no difficulty about third and fourth freedom rights for the Canadian service in any of the British Colonies concerned. Moreover, the West Indian Colonies were perfectly prepared to concede fifth freedom rights, and he understood that this applied also in the case of Bermuda. The West Indian Colonies, however, did not feel able to grant cabotage rights as between the islands within the sphere of operations of B.W.I.A. B.W.I.A., which was the chosen instrument for the development of British air services in the Caribbean, was already operating at a deficit and any diversion of traffic would make its economic position still less satisfactory. It was most unlikely, however, that B.W.I.A. would operate, at any rate for some time, between Nassau and Bermuda, and accordingly there would be no objection so far as the United Kingdom was concerned, to the carriage of cabotage traffic on this sector of the route by the T.C.A. service. As regards the reference made by MR. SYMINGTON to the discussions at Montreal on the subject of parallel operations, the United Kingdom did not share the view he had espoused as to what had been agreed on that occasion. The opinion which the United Kingdom had expressed was that, while parallel operations were appropriate on routes where the traffic offering justified it, on routes where the traffic was thin the area for a joint operation became very strong. This was a very different solution, however, from the grant of a monopoly on the route to the operating company of one party. MR. TUCKER indicated that he, for his part, saw no objection to the carriage of cabotage traffic by T.C.A. between Bermuda and Nassau. In the past Bermuda had had little interest in connection with Nassau and the Caribbean, though her interest in these territories might develop if traffic expanded in tourists who spent some of their holidays in Jamaica and Nassau and the rest of their holidays in Bermuda.

(b) MR. TUCKER pointed out that it would be extremely difficult for the Bermuda Delegation to persuade the Legislative Assembly in Bermuda to forego Bermuda's right to operate reciprocally to Canada, even though it had no intention of exercising this right in the near future. Bermuda's connections with Canada were considerable. Apart from the tourist traffic, on the development of which the Bermuda Trade Development Board intended to spend a good deal of money, there were strong business connections with Canada. There were also social connections such as the education of children in Canada. It had also to be borne in mind that a company had already been incorporated in Bermuda, called Bermudian Airways. This company had not yet applied for any rights to operate and held no kind of a concession, but would certainly oppose any proposal that Bermuda should forego its reciprocal rights. Further, it would be very difficult to persuade the Bermudian Legislative Assembly that Bermuda should forego her rights (if and when she wished to operate reciprocally to Canada,) to place a management contract with some British air line to operate the service for her. If T.C.A. wished to have a monopoly it was essential that this should be for a limited period only, and that the period should be as short as possible. Three years would be very much preferable from Bermuda's point of view, to five. Further, it would be necessary for Bermuda to have some assurance that T.C.A. gave her a reasonable service and provided adequate capacity to meet the traffic offering.

(c) THE CANADIAN DELEGATION pointed out that the capital cost of getting the service going, would be very considerable, and that they must have reasonable protection for an adequate period in order to enable them to amortize at any rate part of the initial cost of the equipment if the service was to be an economic proposition at all. Moreover, the costs of building up the service and attracting traffic to it would be borne by Canada, and it was only fair that she should be reasonably protected while doing so. If it was not possible for her to come to appropriate arrangements for a service via Bermuda, the British islands in the West Indies, she would have no alternative but make other arrangements for the service. A further difficulty was that not only Bermuda, but all the British islands in the Caribbean might claim reciprocity, and the effect of this might be that there were five or six companies on the route competing for the very meagre traffic. This position would be quite absurd. In any case Canada would certainly not be likely to agree to the operation of a reciprocal service from Bermuda to Canada by a company substantially owned by American or Canadian nationals.

(d) MR. CRIBBETT suggested that there appeared to be two possible solutions. First a joint company might be formed in which, in addition to Canada, the Bermuda Government and the Governments of the British Caribbean Colonies could participate according to their interest in the service. The second possibility was that the Bermuda Government, while reserving their reciprocal rights, might give an undertaking that they would not exercise them for a definite period of, say, three years. As regards the first possibility, i.e. that a joint company would be formed, THE CANADIAN DELEGATION indicated that Canada's overseas services would be operated by self-contained corporations within the T.C.A. organisation. If the Bermudian or other British Colonial Governments concerned liked to take blocks of stock in the T.C.A. Corporation entrusted with the service from Canada to the West Indies, the Canadian authorities would welcome such participation. THE BERMUDIAN DELEGATION pointed out, however, that Bermuda had little or no interest, at any rate at present, in that part of the service which served territory South of Bermuda and that in these circumstances the offer to take stock in the T.C.A. Corporation was not one that would prove attractive to Bermuda. As regards the second possibility, i.e. that Bermuda would undertake not to exercise its reciprocal rights for a definite period of years, there was some discussion as to whether the period should be three years, four years, or five years. The Canadian Delegation pointed out that three years was altogether too short a period. The Bermudian Delegation, on the other hand, pointed out that they must bear in mind the effect on their forthcoming negotiations with the U.S.A. of any arrangement concluded now with the Canadians. If Bermuda undertook not to exercise its reciprocal rights in respect of Canada for a period of five years, they felt little doubt that the Americans would insist on obtaining a similar undertaking in respect of reciprocal rights in the U.S.A. After a further discussion it was agreed that Bermuda would undertake not to exercise its reciprocal rights for a period of four years from the date of commencement of the service which shall be not later than January 1st 1947, on the understanding that the Canadian Government would provide a service adequate to cater for the traffic offering and that if it did not do so, the Bermudian Government would in the first instance make representations to the Canadian Government and if satisfaction was not obtained, thereby would be free to exercise its reciprocal right. The Bermudian Delegation indicated that para. 5(j) of the Annex to the United Kingdom draft pro forma Agreement† with a suitable addition to cover the above points, would be satisfactory from their point of view.

(e) As regards the British Colonies in the Caribbean areas, MR. CRIBBETT said that no difficulty arose about the grant of cabotage right to T.C.A. in respect of services between Bermuda and Nassau, Bermuda and Trinidad and Bermuda and Jamaica. On the question of reciprocal rights he would enquire of the Colonial Office and Colonial Governments whether they would be prepared to accept a solution on the lines of that agreed in the case of Bermuda.

(f) MR. SYMINGTON indicated that stop-over rights on through booking would be necessary to the economic operation of the route. MR. CRIBBETT suggested that it would be embarrassing for the U.K. to grant lengthy stop-overs. The U.S. were pressing for a long stop-over and this would have serious fifth freedom implication on American services through the U.K. MAJOR MCCRINDLE confirmed this view and said that B.O.A.C. were thinking in terms of a stop-over limitation of 24 hours.

It was ultimately agreed that this question would be explored by the United Kingdom Delegation on their return, and if any concessions could be agreed with the Colonial Governments, the matter should be dealt with by exchange of letters giving effect to practical application of the provisions of this Agreement. This would be a matter of consequential machinery and would not form an integral part of the Agreement to be lodged at P.I.C.A.O.

(g) The question was discussed whether, if Bermuda secured, (as she intended to secure), reciprocal rights to operate from Bermuda to the U.S.A., she would like to assign these rights to T.C.A. for a period, to exercise on her behalf. It was agreed that Canada would look into this question from the operational aspect, and that it would be further considered by all concerned when the Canadian views had been obtained.

(h) Finally, it was agreed that while in all the circumstances a bilateral Agreement governing the grant of rights to the proposed T.C.A. service from Canada through Bermuda to the West Indies could not be concluded in final form during the present conversations, the general form and substance of the Agreement should be settled as far as possible before the Delegations dispersed.

Ottawa, December 26, 1945

CANADIAN AIR SERVICES TO THE WEST INDIAN AREA

I attach hereto original copy initialed by the Honourable C. D. Howe and Lord Winster,[110] of the summary of agreement reached at Bermuda on proposed Canadian air service to Bermuda and the West Indies. Uninitialed copies are in the possession of Mr. Howe, Mr. Symington, the Air Transport Board and the Department of Transport.

I do not believe that any further action need to be taken in Ottawa on this subject at the moment, since the next step now lies with the United Kingdom who presumably will consult with the various British Colonial territories involved and in due course forward us a draft agreement for our consideration along the lines agreed in the attached memorandum of understanding.

Résumé d'accord

Summary of Agreement

Ottawa, December 21, 1945

BERMUDA CIVIL AVIATION CONVERSATIONS
SUMMARY OF CONVERSATIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

(December 20th, 1945)

The Canadian and United Kingdom Delegations met the representatives of the Government of Bermuda, (Captain The Hon. Bayard Dill, the Hon. H. J. Tucker, and Mr. N. H. P. Vesey) on December 20th, in order to discuss various aspects of the proposed Canadian air service from Canada via Bermuda to the British Colonies in the West Indies and points beyond.

2. The meeting took note:-

(i) Of the view of the Canadian Delegation that the potential traffic on the route would be very thin at any rate until such time as a successful service had been established and goodwill secured. In these circumstances and in view of the very high initial cost of purchasing equipment and of creating the necessary ground organisation at the various staging posts, the Canadian Government felt that it was absolutely essential that the proposed Trans Canadian Airlines

[110]Ministre de l'Aviation civile de Grande-Bretagne.
Minister of Civil Aviation of Great Britain.

[sic] service should be safeguarded from competition, at any rate for a period, so as to allow for the amortisation of the capital equipment. If adequate safeguards were not provided, it was very doubtful if the service could be justified at all.

(ii) Of the view expressed by the representatives of Bermuda that it would be impossible to justify to the satisfaction of the Legislative Assembly the complete abandonment of reciprocal rights. This did not mean that Bermuda necessarily had any intention of exercising such rights in the near future. It was in fact extremely unlikely that she would. Air transport was, however, in a very fluid state of development, and if developments in the near future substantially reduced the cost of air transport, the whole position might be radically altered. Accordingly the most that the Legislative Assembly could reasonably be asked to consider was that Bermuda, while reserving its rights to operate reciprocally to Canada, would agree not to exercise them for a period.

(iii) Of a statement by the United Kingdom Delegation to the effect that there was no difficulty over the grant to Canada of third and fourth freedom privileges in the British Colonial territories to which the proposed Trans Canadian Airlines service would operate, nor any difficulty over the grant in these territories of fifth freedom rights. Further, it was understood (and the Bermudian Government for its part confirmed) that there would be no objection to the grant of traffic rights between Bermuda and Nassau, Bermuda and Jamaica and Bermuda and Trinidad. The West Indian Governments were not, however, able to agree that cabotage rights should be enjoyed by Canada between British Colonies in the Caribbean which come within the sphere of operations of British West Indian Airways.

(iv) The Canadian Government represented that the character of the tourist traffic throughout the territory makes it essential that liberal stop-over privileges be granted. The United Kingdom Government sympathised with the proposal but stated it would be necessary to consult with the Colonial Governments as to the length of stop-overs to be allowed.

3. After discussion, the meeting agreed to recommend:

(i) That the Canadian Government should be granted third and fourth freedom rights for the proposed service from Montreal via Bermuda to the West Indies and onward in the British Colonial territories concerned.

(ii) That the Canadian Government should also be granted fifth freedom rights in these territories.

(iii) That the Canadian Government should be granted traffic rights as between Bermuda on the one hand, and Nassau, Jamaica and Trinidad on the other, but not between the British West Indian Colonies which came within the sphere of operations of the British West Indian Airways.

(iv) That as regards reciprocal rights for Bermuda to operate a service to Canada, these rights would be secured to Bermuda in accordance with normal practice but that Bermuda would give an undertaking that in view of the special circumstances to which the Canadian Government had drawn attention, she would not seek to exercise these rights for a period of four years from the date of the commencement of the service or from January 1st 1947 whichever shall be the earlier. It is understood as a condition of this assurance that if the Berumda Government is not satisfied that the service is adequate to cater for the traffic offering, then it shall have the right to make representations to the Canadian Government, and if satisfaction is not obtained, to exercise its reciprocal rights.

(v) As regards the British Colonial territories in the Caribbean area, the United Kingdom Delegation have undertaken to enquire of the Colonial Office whether they would be prepared to reach a similar agreement with the Canadian Government on the lines of that set out in sub para. (iv) above. If they are, a bilateral agreement would be concluded between the Government of Canada on the one hand, and the Government of the United Kingdom on the other, covering the grant of privileges in the various British Colonies concerned.

(vi) That if Bermuda secured (as she intended to secure), reciprocal rights to operate from Bermuda to the United States of America, the question of her assigning these rights to Trans Canadian Airlines to exercise on her behalf, should be further considered. The Canadian Delegation undertook that this question would be examined by Canada from the operational point of view and her views communicated to the Government of Bermuda and the United Kingdom.

(vii) The United Kingdom Government have undertaken to consult with the Colonial Governments as to the length of stop-overs which shall be granted and to immediately communicate to the Canadian Government their views on the subject so as to reach an agreement. This matter should be dealt with by exchange of letters giving effect to the practical application of the provisions of the agreement.

WE AGREE THAT THE ABOVE SUMMARY RECORDS THE CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS REACHED AT OUR MEETING HELD ON DECEMBER 20TH, 1945.

TELEGRAM 3443 London, December 22, 1944

Reference air transport policy.

Arising out of the expected arrival in London of New Zealand, Australian and Indian representatives who participated in the discussions in Montreal,[111] a meeting took place today with Lord Swinton presiding. The Indian representative had not arrived. I had only 24 hours' notice of this meeting with no previous background and no instructions from you. The agenda indicated that most of the subjects of conversation were of special interest to the countries already referred to, but item 1 was as follows:

Commonwealth Air Transport Council.

(a) Designation of representatives of High Commissioners to assist Civil Aviation Department with secretarial duties.

(b) Approval of Governments to establishment, composition and functions of Council. Hudd attended this meeting in an observatory capacity.

2. With regard to the Commonwealth Air Transport Council proposal, Swinton explained that an announcement had already been made that the establishment of this body had been agreed to,[112] but added that it was desired to secure as soon as possible the formal agreement of Governments to the terms of reference set out in the various clauses of Document No. C.A.C. (D.E.C.) 5 Annex No. 11 dated December 9th, 1944,† as he proposes to make a statement in Parliament at an early date.[113] I should be grateful if you would instruct me on this point and also regarding the future activities in London of the Commonwealth Air Transport Council and the relation of this office thereto.

3. Please send me for reference as soon as possible documents covering the Montreal Commonwealth air conversations.[114]

TELEGRAM 2961 London, December 28, 1944

Your telegram No. 3443 of December 22. Air Transport.

You should now have received the documents of the Montreal air conversations† held in December.

The Canadian Government has approved the establishment of the Commonwealth Air Transport Council as described in Document 5, Annex 2. With regard to its activities we regard it as a forum for discussion and exchange of views and do not believe that meetings need be held as often as quarterly, which was proposed by the United Kingdom. For the present at least we see no need for a large secretariat. You will have noted that it was agreed at Montreal that for the time being the Civil Aviation department in London would act as a focal point for Council business and that there was approval of the United Kingdom suggestion that failing the designation of officers from Commonwealth countries to assist the secretariat High Commissioners' Offices might detail officers to maintain liaison with the Secretariat. We do not intend to designate a full-time officer and believe that liaison maintained by a member of your staff will be adequate and need not consume a great deal of the time of that officer.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR G. 70 London, June 2, 1945

IMMEDIATE. CONFIDENTIAL. My telegrams Circular G. 6 of January 30th† and Circular G. 47 of May 4th.† It has become necessary owing to general election in United Kingdom to reconsider the arrangements:

(a) For third Commonwealth and Empire Conference on radio for civil aviation, and

(b) First Commonwealth Air Transport Council meeting.

As it is desirable that dates for these Conferences should be conveniently related to Telecommunications Conference, which it is now proposed should commence on July 11th, it is suggested that Commonwealth Air Transport Council should meet on July 4th and that opening of C.E.R.C.A. Conference should be postponed until August 2nd.

2. Minister for Civil Aviation proposes to preside over initial meetings of both Conferences and he would also hope to attend any meetings at which Dominion Ministers are present.

3. We should be glad to know as soon as possible if above dates are convenient and who will represent your Government.

4. It is suggested that delegates to C.E.R.C.A. Conference should be available in this country on July 26th in order that week prior to opening of Conference could be devoted to visits to technical establishments where demonstrations of newly developed radio aids to civil aviation will be held and to informal study and discussion of the papers to be considered by Conference. It is felt that these preparatory visits and studies will facilitate and enhance value of work of Conference.

5. With regard to Commonwealth Air Transport Council meeting, the draft provisional agenda is contained in my immediately following telegram. Should be grateful for any suggested additions or amendments as soon as possible.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Dominions Office Circular telegram G. 70 of June 7.

My immediately preceding telegram† described our position re representation on the Commonwealth Telecommunications Conference.[117] The difficulties described there also prevent Mr. Howe's attending the Commonwealth Air Transport Council meeting on July 4. He expects to discuss situation with Lord Cranborne.

4. Will you therefore express to the Dominions Office our regret at Mr. Howe's inability to attend Council meeting?

3. Since high level representation has been requested, I would appreciate your acting as Canadian representative at the C.A.T.C. meeting and informing the Dominions Office to this effect.

4. Owing to the pressure of work in preparing for the first meeting of the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization in Montreal on August 15, for which Canada will shortly be issuing invitations, we regret it will not be possible to send any one to assist you at the C.A.T.C. meeting. We hope to forward you shortly specific instructions.

5. With reference to the CERCA Conference on August 2 please advise the Dominions Office that the Canadian representation will consist of W. A. Rush, Controller of Radio, Department of Transport, Head; and technical advisers, whose names we will furnish later. They expect to arrive in London in time to avail themselves of the invitation of the Dominions Office, contained in Circular G. 70, to visit technical establishments.

Le secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures au haut commissaire en Grande-Bretagne

Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in Great Britain

TELEGRAM 1483 London, June 27, 1945

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. My telegram No. 1430 of June 20, representation on first Commonwealth Air Transport Council meeting July 4th.

We appreciate that we have placed you in a difficult position because of our inability to supply you with technical advisers. We accordingly suggest that in so far as possible you hold a watching brief and consult us on any proposals of importance put forward. Subject to the above, our position on the items suggested for the agenda in Circular telegram G. 71 of June 2nd from the Dominions Office is as follows:

Item 1 — Proceedings of Southern Africa Air Transport Conference.

We were not directly interested in the Conference and it may well be that Item 1 will be nothing more than a report.

My immediately following telegram† contains the resolutions adopted at the Southern Africa Air Transport Conference. The following is our position on the 14 resolutions:

Resolution 1 — No comment;

Resolution 2 — While we see practical advantage for some Commonwealth countries in pooling representation on technical committees of the Interim Council, there is no advantage to Canada because the Council will operate here and we have technical men readily available;

Resolution 3 to 11, inclusive — No comment;

Resolution 12 — We cannot agree to a proposal that any suggestions which the Commonwealth governments represented on C.A.T.C. may wish to make relating to the draft technical annexes, adopted at Chicago, be transmitted in the first instance to the C.A.T.C. We cannot, of course, object to the agreement reached in South Africa but we would oppose any attempt to expand it on a broader Commonwealth basis. We wish to retain freedom of action for Canada to communicate directly with the International Organization and to avoid the establishment of the principle that any Commonwealth matter must be discussed by the C.A.T.C. before a Commonwealth country presents it to the International Organization;

Resolution 13 — See our comments under Item 6 of the agenda;

Resolution 14 — See our comments under Item 2 of the agenda;

Item 2 — Our main concern is that C.A.T.C. remain a consultative and advisory body for the convenience of and not the control of the Commonwealth countries. We would regret to see raised and could not subscribe to the principle of compulsory consultation.

We are keenly interested in co-operation in research and development and anxious to see the New Zealand proposals. However, proposals for research and development have already been put forward from many sources and an attempt should be made to avoid confusion and overlapping. The New Zealand proposals should be tied in with the existing proposals and with the plans already made.

Item 3 — We have no strong views on the composition and location of the C.A.T.C. secretariat and are prepared to agree to the decision reached. Please do not, however, make any commitments to supply personnel without consulting us as we expect that the Interim Council will make heavy demands on us.

Item 4(a) — We don't know whether this item will cover more than a review of the progress made. Our position remains as it was at the Montreal Conference; namely, we are prepared to establish services on the North Atlantic and West Indian area but this depends on reaching agreement with the United Kingdom. For your own information we have opened discussions with the U.K. authorities on both these questions but find it difficult to make progress. Mr. Howe expects to talk to Lord Cranborne within the week and if any advance is made we will advise you.

On the Pacific, we will hold to the Montreal decision; namely, that if Australia and New Zealand can make satisfactory arrangements with the United States whereby we can share U.S. traffic, we are ready to discuss the establishment of a through Canadian service to parallel any other service which Australia or New Zealand may wish to set up, or alternatively we are ready to have our service meet theirs at a satisfactory half-way point.

Item 4(b) — We would be pleased to receive any suggestions put forward regarding meteorological facilities. On questions relating to radio facilities, Mr. Rush and his advisers will be arriving later in the month for the C.E.R.C.A. Conference and it is probable that these matters will be dealt with then in detail.

Item 5 — We don't know what ground will be covered under the heading of "general developments in international civil aviation."

Item 6 — On the question of pro forma bilateral agreement, we have strong views and they will probably be at variance with the views of most of the Commonwealth countries. We have been following the Chicago standard formula in our bilateral agreements and in our plans for agreements up to the present and we intend to continue to do so.

Lord Swinton at the Montreal Conference brought forward a supplementary proposal that our Commonwealth countries should apply a much more rigid formula for any bilateral agreements with any nation, based upon the formula for allocation of quotas which the U.K. unsuccessfully proposed at Chicago. We continue to hold the view that while it is desirable to have the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization establish some such formula we feel it would be harmful for C.A.T.C. to do so. We ask you to direct your efforts to have this matter dealt with in P.I.C.A.O. and not in C.A.T.C.

Item 7 — See our comments on resolution 12 of the Southern Africa Conference.

Item 8 — No comment.

Item 9 — No comment. Would welcome receiving full information. Our own plans for the DC-4 program[118] are unchanged.

Items 10 and 11 — No comment.

Your telegram No. 1430 of June 20th, Commonwealth Air Transport Council meeting.

I have informed the United Kingdom authorities that you desire me to act as Canadian representative and I note that you will forward instructions. In the meantime, you will have been informed by Dominions Office telegram† of the postponement of the opening of this meeting until July 9th.

2. I am somewhat apprehensive regarding my qualifications as the Canadian representative without the presence of a technical adviser in view of my unfamiliarity with the December conversations in Montreal, as the result of which the C.A.T.C. was set up. In the circumstances, I regard it as a matter of urgency that you should reconsider sending someone to assist and advise me.

2. Suggestion that I should hold "watching brief" and consult you when necessary means that Canada's part in Conference will be essentially negative, except when necessity of cabled consultation with Ottawa might hold up proceedings. Conference was called in confident expectation that Canada would be full participant. Prospect now is that we shall fall far short of this and this I cannot think will be fair to ourselves or to other Governments concerned.

3. South Africa will be represented by a delegation of four, which includes the manager of the South African Airways and an experienced official recently appointed to deal with South African civil aviation matters in London. Australia will be represented by its Director General of Civil Aviation and two experts, one civil and one service.

4. As matters stand, our delegation will consist of myself with a member of my staff, who must be detached from heavy duties at Canada House for at least a fortnight, together with possibly an Air Force officer who also will know little, if anything, of the background of the Conference. Further perusal of the agenda confirms me in my view that it is of urgent importance that someone quite senior should be sent from Ottawa with the necessary technical knowledge and background information to give reality to our participation. Otherwise I feel sure that our part in the Conference will be most inadequate and will be embarrassing alike to Canadian Government and to individuals representing it.

IMMEDIATE. Your telegrams No. 1483 and 1484† of June 27th, Commonwealth Air Transport Council meeting.

Would appreciate further guidance on following matters which appear likely to arise from Conference documents† received.

(1) Pooling of representation on Technical Committees of the Interim Council. While it will not be necessary for Canada to share representations on Technical Committees, can we state whether we would be willing to represent other Commonwealth countries if they so desire.

2. Trans-Pacific route. This may be discussed under following headings:

(1) The division of frequencies on the Pacific route as between the joint United Kingdom-Australia-New Zealand Organization, T.C.A. and the American airlines.

(2) The date when suitable equipment is likely to be available.

(3) The precise route to be followed and the availability of the necessary facilities.

(4) The form of organization of the joint undertaking and its relationship to other Pacific air services, e.g. T.E.A.[120]

(5) Estimates of cost. Will attempt to find out in advance whether New Zealand and Australia have achieved anything in negotiations with United States. At Commonwealth air meeting on December 22nd, Lord Knollys[121] states it was unlikely that the Canadian-built DC-4Ms would be produced and tested for operating much before the end of 1946. Can completion date be confirmed please.

3. P.I.C.A.O. and draft Technical Annexes to Chicago Convention. Your comments on resolution (12) of South African Conference are noted. I shall, therefore, avoid discussion of Canadian comments on Technical Annexes, but would be grateful if you could forward immediately 12 additional copies for distribution to interested members of the Council. I have only one copy in my office and three have been sent to the Dominions Office.

We believe there is much to be said for the principle of encouragement of aeronautical research and development and free exchange of information as advanced by New Zealand. We do not feel competent, however, on short notice to express a considered opinion upon the proposal for the establishment of a special fund for these purposes and, moreover, we wish to have the New Zealand proposals considered carefully by the various agencies in Ottawa which are concerned with aeronautical research and development.

IMMEDIATE. Your No. 1896, July 6th, Commonwealth Air Transport Council meeting.

Your paragraph 1, Canada would be quite willing to represent other Commonwealth countries on technical committees if so requested.

Your paragraph 2, sub-paragraph (1), division of frequencies must be subject to discussion in the light of arrangements with the United States, although provisionally we had thought of a fifty-fifty division between American airlines and Commonwealth airlines on traffic moving to South Pacific from the U.S. together with equivalent arrangement between Canadian service and any other Commonwealth service which may carry this particular traffic. This problem, however, cannot be carried forward very far until we know something of the arrangements with the United States as mentioned in your sub-paragraph (5).

Sub-paragraph (2). Canadian DC-4M equipment is likely to be available in the summer of 1946 and we hope will be ready for operation in the autumn of that year.

Your sub-paragraph (3). This matter must be left for negotiation after other details have been settled.

Sub-paragraph (4). We have nothing further to say at present, other than we envisage proceeding on the basis agreed at Montreal last year.[122]

Your paragraph 3, available extra copies have already been forwarded to you. Ends.

TELEGRAM 1591 Ottawa, July 12, 1945

IMMEDIATE. Following from Mr. Howe: We are considerably surprised and somewhat embarrassed by newspaper reports emanating from London, yesterday, which attribute to Lord Swinton a statement that revenues, expenses and aircraft are to be pooled on parallel airlines operated by British and Dominion companies on Empire routes and discussions to this effect are going forward at the Air Transport Council meeting.

The press statements also make specific mention of the North Atlantic route to be operated by Trans-Canada Airlines and B.O.A.C. as being under discussion in this connection.

We realize that this type of arrangement may be suitable for certain Commonwealth routes but as you know we have never considered them in any way applicable to the North Atlantic and it has always been our view that there was adequate opportunity on this route for parallel Canadian and British operations which would remain completely separate in every respect. We assume that you have made and will make known these views, if the occasion requires, in the Commonwealth Air Transport Council discussions, since we would be reluctant to have any misunderstanding on these points arise. We had not understood that the North Atlantic route was to be brought into the agenda or we would have communicated with you sooner. At the same time we hope that it will be possible for you to forestall any further comment to the press which may produce misunderstanding and misconceptions such as have been created by yesterday's story from London. TELEGRAM 1959 London, July 13, 1945

Commonwealth Air Transport Council meeting. Discussion of trans-Pacific route.

1. Mr. McVey, Australia, stated that United States had initiated discussion, asking Australia and New Zealand to grant Five Freedom Rights to United States. Australia and New Zealand will refuse and will open negotiations for a bilateral agreement asking for equal rights proposed Commonwealth trans-Pacific partnership, and joint United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand organization. Negotiations will be carried out in closest collaboration with all partners. Mr. McVey emphasized that whatever rights were granted United States in Australia, similar rights will be asked for whole partnership in the United States.

2. Estimated figures of traffic were presented from which it appeared that out of 7,000 passengers from North America to Australia per annum, 2,300 originated in Canada. From these it was not unreasonable that United States should claim 50% of frequencies.

3. Points 1 to 7 of Montreal Document No. CAC (December) 6 Annex No. 2[†] were generally approved in course of discussion. On point No. 5, pooling of receipts, Mr. McVey conceded that if one organization proved more efficient, that organization would be entitled to consideration and readjustment. On point No. 6, deficit on operations, you may want to watch development of principle which has been affirmed during this Conference, that when on a Commonwealth service one partner is not able to take up all the frequencies allotted to it, and asks the other partner to run such frequencies as it cannot fill, the first partner shall undertake to meet deficits on services he temporarily relinquishes.

4. Frequencies discussed were four services a fortnight by the partnership, presumably two by T.C.A., two by joint organization. New Zealand ask to have one of these four services terminating in Auckland per fortnight. This was considered operationally possible. There was some discussion on the provision of repair facilities. New Zealand wanted to see major repair facilities in New Zealand, but this was opposed as uneconomic. Main southern repair base would have to be in Australia. It was decided that the operators should state what services would be needed for most economic operation.

5. Stopping points to be used will probably be Sydney and Auckland, Noumea, Fiji, Canton, Honolulu, San Francisco, Vancouver.

6. Fifth Freedom Rights. Brigadier Falla, New Zealand, was most alarmed to learn that Mr. Sullivan of his Government had suggested to United States at Chicago that New Zealand would be prepared to offer Fifth Freedom Rights to United States between New Zealand and Australia. The latter would be opposed to this as undermining the whole structure of T.E.A. It was assumed that T.C.A. would wish to carry traffic from Vancouver to San Francisco and that this would be essential to the scheme, but we could not very well ask for San Francisco to Honolulu traffic. Question of stopover privileges might arise here. On Australian-United Kingdom route, India has conceded 24 hour stopover or next through service to United Kingdom-Australian operators. You may want to consider position of person who wishes to break journey from Vancouver to Honolulu with 24 hour stopover in San Francisco. Passenger might then be considered to be traffic of American origin.

7. Pacific air mail. Mr. McVey stated that United States Military Air Transport had been carrying air mail to Australia from United States and were now offering to carry return mails. Australia is reluctant to accept this and hopes that R.A.F. Pacific Air Transport Service will carry Australian mail traffic. This is being discussed.

8. Committees are preparing reports today, Friday, and it is expected final plenary session will be held Saturday afternoon, although supplementary discussions may go on next week.

Your telegram No. 1591 of July 12th. Following for Mr. Howe, Begins: Regret misunderstanding arising from newspaper reports on C.A.T.C. discussions. Position with regard to North Atlantic is clearly understood here and there is no question of joint operation. Subject is not on agenda for C.A.T.C. meeting and has not been discussed apart from question of facilities required at probable stopping points on North Atlantic routes.

2. In reply to a question from a Canadian correspondent, Lord Swinton did remark that agreement with Canada was not so far advanced as that with other Commonwealth operators, although he anticipated no difficulty in obtaining a satisfactory arrangement, but perhaps he did not make it clear that a joint operation, as on all other Commonwealth routes, was not contemplated. I have asked him to make this clear at the next press conference to be held at the conclusion of the meeting. Ends.

Commonwealth A.T.C. meeting.

1. Meeting was concluded today with full plenary session. Following are main points of Committee reports adopted:

2. Committee No. 1. Research and Development.

(a) So far as aeronautical research is concerned, the functions of the Council as laid down in December meeting in Montreal are considered adequate. If Imperial Organization for Aeronautical Research is set up, as has been proposed to Commonwealth Governments, problems will be submitted by CATC to that body.

(b) Committee has also proposed setting up of a standing Committee for Air Navigation and Ground Organization (CANGO) to plan and integrate ground organization, airways systems, and navigation aids on Commonwealth routes. Committee will be similar to CERCA but with wider scope. It would not be executive, but would make recommendations to Government Departments of civil aviation concerned. It would be an interim organization for immediate Commonwealth problems and would probably be eventually superseded by PICAO Organization.

(c) CATC Secretariat. United Kingdom Ministry of Civil Aviation will continue to provide Secretariat but Dominion Governments are asked to consider seconding young officers to work in Council Secretariat, looking forward to creation of permanent Commonwealth body. Question of costs of permanent Secretariat will be discussed at later CATC meeting.

3. Committee No. 2. On Routes. Number of principles were recommended for operation of parallel services where these are agreed by Commonwealth Governments, similar to Southern African Conference principles. These will affect Canada only so far as trans-Pacific service is concerned. Full documents will be forwarded to you by next bag.† Trans-Pacific recommendations have already been outlined in my telegram No. 1959 of 13th July.

4. Committee No. 3 was a Technical Committee on provision of ground facilities. Main points covered were use of present military installations for civil air routes and co-ordination between sections along routes.

DESPATCH 1263 Ottawa, August 2, 1945

Sir,

I refer to my telegram No. 1574 of July 10 on the subject of the New Zealand submission on aeronautical research and development to the Commonwealth Air Transport Council in which I undertook to forward to you, for the continuing Secretariat, the Canadian views. Since the Council did not adopt the New Zealand proposal, you may not consider it necessary to take any action. The National Research Council, the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Air Transport Board all disagreed with the New Zealand suggestion. They did not hold it was a proper function of the Commonwealth Air Transport Council to bring research and development within the ambit of the Council's authority since research and development for aviation are held to cover a much wider field than would properly be the Council's concern.

I have, etc.

TELEGRAM 1793 Ottawa, August 3, 1945

Your telegram No. 1959,[123] Commonwealth Air Transport Council Meeting. Discussion of trans-Pacific route.

Your paragraph one appears quite satisfactory. In the proposed partnership Canada would require the right to fly from Vancouver to San Francisco picking up passengers for Australia at the latter point.

2. Your paragraph two, we agree that the United States appears entitled to fifty per cent of frequencies, but believe that this formula should apply only on basis of traffic moving between the United States and South Pacific. Reference to the amount of traffic originating in Canada for South Pacific as compared with United States traffic is not relevant to division of frequencies between

[123]Document 327.

United States and Commonwealth services since it relates only to position of Commonwealth services themselves.

3. Your paragraph three, Canada will not press for pooling of receipts although experience may demonstrate this to be the most practical method of dealing with traffic. We do not, however, favour the pooling of deficits since we would prefer to be responsible for our own deficits alone. This whole matter must eventually be dealt with through an operator's agreement.

4. Your paragraph four, the suggested four services a fortnight; two to be provided by T.C.A., and two by the other Commonwealth organization, appears satisfactory. Canada would be prepared to do its share in regard to arrangements to have one of the four fortnightly services terminate in Auckland. Provision of repair facilities should be left to the operating companies to work out.

5. Your paragraph five, stopping points mentioned seem to be generally satisfactory provided facilities can be made available, and subject to reconsideration in the light of operational experience.

6. Your paragraph six, while we would be glad to obtain the right to discharge passengers from Vancouver at San Francisco we feel that this right could only be arranged through separate negotiations between Canada and the United States as part of the general Canada-United States arrangements for trans-border crossings. Accordingly we do not feel that it should be made a part of the general negotiations with the United States regarding the Pacific route. In respect of stopover rights we are disposed to take a liberal view in respect of such privileges, and we believe the United States takes a similar view.

7. Your paragraph seven, we have no comment to offer.

8. Will you please make the foregoing views available not only to the United Kingdom but also to Australia and New Zealand.

DESPATCH A. 339 [London,] August 17, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my despatch No. A. 288 of the 19th July, concerning the conclusions and recommendations of the first meeting of the C.A.T.C. I would refer in particular to paragraph 4 of the despatch under reference which reported the setting up of a standing committee to be called a "Committee for Air Navigation and Ground Organisation."[124] The proposed

[124]Voir le document 329./See Document 329.

Terms of Reference of the committee were outlined in paragraphs 11 to 17 of the report of Committee No. 1, C.A.T.C. final papers, Conference document 29.†

2. I now enclose a copy of the minutes of a meeting held in London at the Ministry of Civil Aviation on July 26th,† which was in fact the first meeting of the new committee, C.A.N.G.O.† Opening the meeting Sir William Hildred outlined the reasons for CANGO's existence and its proposed functions which had been agreed by the C.A.T.C. meeting. Since I have not yet received any comment from you as to Canada's views in this matter, my representative at this meeting was unable to state whether in fact Canada had approved of the decision to set up such a committee.

3. I should be grateful, therefore, if you could inform me as to the view taken by the interested Canadian authorities of the proposed organisation. It was felt at the C.A.T.C. meeting that a Committee for Air Navigation and Ground Organisation would fulfil a very necessary function in the co-ordination of Commonwealth Civil Aviation services. The United Kingdom Civil Aviation authorities and the other Commonwealth members are naturally most anxious that Canada should take an active part in such a Commonwealth organisation.

4. If approval has been given, it will be necessary for several steps to be taken immediately to implement Canada's participation. It is proposed that each member of C.A.N.G.O. "should nominate a corresponding member who would normally be a senior officer of its Civil Aviation Department with experience of operational planning." The Secretariat of the C.A.T.C. should be informed as to the name of the corresponding member in Canada who would take an interest in the activities of C.A.N.G.O. It will also be necessary to appoint an officer in London to maintain contact with C.A.N.G.O. It would presumably be sufficient for the time being to appoint a member of the staff of this office to act as contact officer.

5. With reference to the attached minutes of the meeting of C.A.N.G.O., your comment is requested on the question raised in paragraphs 5 and 6. In forwarding the minutes for consideration the Secretary of the C.A.T.C. wrote as follows:

"These Minutes record in para. 6 the agreement of the meeting to a proposal that each member of the Commonwealth should prepare reports containing the information outlined in that and the preceding paragraph about facilities at the appropriate staging posts in their own territories and send these Reports to the Secretariat so that they can be integrated into a complete picture showing what facilities now exist, who controls them and what their future may be. The staging posts in question were those in Commonwealth and Empire countries shown in the list of routes prepared for the first C.A.T.C. Conference.† Those in Canadian territory include Vancouver and Montreal. May I suggest that October 1st be taken as the target date for the completion and despatch to the Secretariat of the relevant information.

Paragraph 10 of the Minutes records the discussion concerning future needs for Radio Communications along the Commonwealth routes. This was shown to be a complex problem involving inter alia the question how many channels would be required for all forms of aeronautical services including Meteorology and Air Traffic Control. It was agreed, that as an approach to a solution, and in order to plan the most efficient use of such channels as might become available, each member country who was in a position to do so should prepare an estimate of future requirements for communications for all aeronautical purposes, indicating potential radio traffic by type and volume, and the extent to which existing installations might meet future requirements when wartime conditions no longer prevail.

The estimates of future radio requirements may take longer to prepare than the information concerning existing radio and other facilities to be provided as part of the fact finding reports mentioned in para. 2 above. When sending in the latter it would therefore be helpful if you could say whether you expect to be able to provide the additional information about future radio requirements and if so, when it is likely to be ready."

I have, etc.

TELEGRAM 2352 London, August 18, 1945

Your telegram No. 1793 of August 3rd, discussion of trans-Pacific route in C.A.T.C. meeting.

1. Your comments on this discussion were passed to United Kingdom authorities through Director General of Civil Aviation. In reply, with reference to negotiations with United States, (paragraphs 1 and 6 of your telegram) Mr. Cribbett states "It is noted that the Government of Canada consider that it would be appropriate to negotiate their Third and Fourth Freedom rights at San Francisco independently of the general negotiations with the United States in respect of the Pacific route. It is not clear, however, whether the Canadian Government consider that such separate negotiation should also deal with Fifth Freedom rights at San Francisco, e.g. passengers conveyed by T.C.A. from San Francisco to Australia, or whether these rights should be dealt with in the general negotiations. If the Government of Canada agree, there would be definite advantages in dealing with Fifth Freedom privileges at San Francisco as part of the general negotiations since the Fifth Freedom will also be of concern to the other interested parties, as regards both the exercise of such rights by T.C.A. and also the reciprocal rights required by the joint organization in respect of the carriage of traffic between San Francisco and Vancouver."

2. From your telegram, our understanding is that you would agree to Fifth Freedom rights at San Francisco being dealt with in general negotiations, but would also like confirmation by cable before replying to Mr. Cribbett's letter.

3. Copy of letter including other comments† is being forwarded by airmail.

In replying to U.K. authorities you can advise them that we agree that the traffic to be carried by the Canadian line from San Francisco to Australia should be a subject for discussion in the general negotiations. You will note that we have avoided calling this Fifth Freedom rights since doing so would open the question of Australia's rights to carry local traffic from San Francisco to Canada, on which we would prefer to reserve judgment for the time being.

Since Mr. Cribbett definitely raised the question of "reciprocal rights required by the Joint Organization in respect of the carriage traffic between San Francisco and Vancouver," I feel that sense of the second sentence in your telegram should be conveyed to the United Kingdom authorities.

2. Would following phrasing in our reply be satisfactory: "The Canadian Government agrees that the traffic to be carried by the Canadian line from San Francisco to Australia should be made subject for discussion in the general negotiations.

They would, however, prefer to reserve judgment for the time being on the question of rights for all members of the Joint Organization in respect of the carriage of local traffic from San Francisco to Canada."

Your telegram No. 2385 of August 21st.

Our earlier suggestion with reference to the carriage of traffic between Vancouver and San Francisco on T.C.A. was made because of the difficulty in separating that traffic from other cross-border traffic which was dealt with as part of the general Agreement with the United States.[125] However, you can now advise the United Kingdom that we agree that Fifth Freedom rights at San Francisco be part of the general negotiations with the United States. We would hope to discuss with other Commonwealth nations concerned the manner of dealing with the carriage of traffic between San Francisco and Vancouver.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. A. 339 of August 17th, 1945, regarding the establishment of a standing committee to be called a "Committee for Air Navigation and Ground Organization" (CANGO).

Canadian interest in CANGO is not great. Routes in Canada of interest to the Commonwealth happen to coincide with routes of far wider international importance. For our purposes we consider PICAO therefore more useful to us and we are anxious to do all possible to strengthen it. However, we do recognize that CANGO may serve a useful purpose for the other Commonwealth nations because of the many Commonwealth routes with which they are primarily concerned. For this reason we cannot object to participating in CANGO and to furnishing them with all the information needed. We are anxious, however, to limit our own participation as much as possible in practice to observing.

Your suggestion that Canada should be represented on this Committee (CANGO) by an official from the staff of our High Commissioner in London and that a corresponding member should be appointed in Canada, has been agreed upon. The Controller of Civil Aviation, Department of Transport, (A. D. McLean) has been designated as our "corresponding member" mentioned in Para. 13 of the committee's report (CATC doc. 29).†

Regarding the collection of factual data by CANGO respecting route facilities, action has already been initiated, following an interdepartmental meeting, to designate international routes and airports which can be made available for international services in Canada for the information of PICAO. We propose to furnish a copy of this paper† to CANGO when it is completed. Details regarding three of the airports which it is anticipated will be designated for international flying are given in the attached documents.† Goose has been included because it was built by and has been leased to Canada for defence purposes. The civil status of the airport is still a subject for further negotiation. Vancouver has been included as being of some interest in the operation of a Central Pacific service. Gander Airport has not been mentioned because Canadian control of that site may terminate shortly. I might mention that negotiations are presently under way to extend the runways at Vancouver and Dorval.

CONFIDENTIAL. International Air transport. Relations between the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization and the International Commission for Air Navigation in Paris.

1. Dr. Warner of the Civil Aeronautics Board telephoned Reid to make some informal enquiries this morning concerning the position of the Canadian Government on the meetings which have been called to take place in Paris from February 28 to March 25 of the Technical Sub-Committees of I.C.A.N.

According to Dr. Warner, the purpose of these meetings is to examine the technical Annexes agreed to at Chicago[126] and to revise them.

2. Dr. Warner believes that the general interest would be served if the revision done at Paris were kept to the bare inescapable minimum of such changes as are indispensible in order that the necessary rules may be provided for reestablishing whatever civil air traffic in the liberated areas of Europe can be reestablished during the next few months before the Annexes have been revised by the Provisional International Civil Aviation organization. He expressed the personal hope that the Canadian Government would also take this attitude to the meetings in Paris.

3. Apparently the Paris meetings will consider all of the technical Annexes drawn up at Chicago, whereas, in Dr. Warner's opinion, the only ones which it is necessary for them to consider are those on meteorology, communications and air traffic control, with the possible addition of those on airways systems and customs. It would, in his opinion, be futile for the Paris meetings to consider, for example, the airworthiness code since it is not likely that they will be building aircraft in Europe within the next few months.

4. Monsieur Roper,[127] in a recent report on the Chicago Conference which Dr. Warner has received, referred to consultations which he had after the Chicago Conference with the delegations of Canada, India, Great Britain and France, concerning the revision of these technical Annexes under the auspices of I.C.A.N.

5. The United States has been asked to send an observer to the I.C.A.N. meetings and they hope to be represented by someone from their Embassy in Paris. They may also send a technical member.

6. Dr. Warner, however, thinks that it would be inadvisable for some 25 of the 50 nations represented at Chicago to get together now to make more than the bare inescapable minimum of revision of the Annexes, seeing that the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization will be established shortly and that the views of all the States represented at Chicago have been sought on the revision of the Annexes.

7. Dr. Warner asked if we had any objection to his writing a personal letter to Mr. McLean of the Department of Transport on this subject. He said that he would send us a copy. We said that we had no objection, and I assume that you will secure a copy of Dr. Warner's letter† from Mr. McLean.

8. We would appreciate an expression of your views for transmission to Dr. Warner.

CONFIDENTIAL. Your WA-885, February 17th. Relations between Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization and the International Commission for Air Navigation.

We have taken this matter up with the Air Transport Board and the Department of Transport who do not entirely agree with Dr. Warner.

According to the last paragraph of Roper's report of December 31, 1944,† it appears that the purpose of the Paris meetings is to harmonize the texts of I.C.A.N. with the technical annexes agreed to at Chicago rather than to change the latter. It is implied that some attempt may be made at "perfecting" the work done at Chicago which would indicate a possibility of recommendations as to wording rather than sense.

The Canadian Government is not in a position to send technical experts, but proposes to name an observer, probably from the staff of the Canadian Embassy at Paris.

The meetings have now been postponed until April.

DESPATCH 581 Washington, March 6, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL.

Sir,

Under cover of my despatch No. 511 of February 27,† I sent to you the charts and memoranda dated February 24† prepared by Mr. Marlin of the Bureau of the Budget on problems relating to the establishment of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization.

2. I now enclose three copies of a memorandum dated March 5 which Mr. Reid has prepared commenting on the United States memoranda of February 24 and related problems.

3. I do not myself feel that I know enough about the functions of the Aviation Organization to express an opinion on whether the members of the Council should give their full time to their work on the Council. What Mr. Reid envisages is that the states principally concerned in air transport would have full time members on the Council resident in Montreal, whereas the other members of the Council would not necessarily be full time. While a development of this kind would be desirable since it would tend to concentrate power in the hands of those members of the Council who had most to contribute to its discussions, it would also clearly raise a number of delicate problems and some thought would have to be given as to how these problems could most satisfactorily be met.

4. Regardless of whether the members of the Council, or some of them, are going to be full time, Mr. Reid tells me that it is generally agreed that the President of the Council should give full time to his post. This ought to diminish the danger of the Council being pushed off into a corner by the Secretariat since it will be in the President's own interests to share his responsibility with the Council as a whole.

5. I recognize the virtues of the simplicity of Mr. Marlin's approach to the relations between the Secretary-General and the President under which the authority would flow from the President through the Secretary-General to the members of the Secretariat. There are also obvious advantages in the scheme which Mr. Reid has put forward under which there should be a division of functions between the President and the Secretary-General, though the workability of any such scheme depends on the characteristics of the two men who are appointed to the posts. However, if there is to be a division of functions, as Mr. Reid suggests, I think that he has given about as wise a distribution as it is possible to give.

6. Various officers of the State Department and the Civil Aeronautics Board have expressed during the past few weeks their earnest hope that Mr. Symington will shortly find it possible to pay a visit to Washington and to discuss with them informally problems connected with the establishment of the Provisional Aviation Organization.

7. In order to save time, Mr. Reid is sending Mr. Symington direct a copy of the enclosed memorandum of March 5, together with a copy of this despatch.

L. B. PEARSON

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire

Memorandum by First Secretary

CONFIDENTIAL [Washington,] March 5, 1945

COMMENTS ON THE U.S. MEMORANDA
OF FEBRUARY 24, 1945, AND RELATED PROBLEMS

The U.S. memoranda raise three main questions: the role of the Council; the nature of the membership of the Council, whether or not it ought or is likely to be composed in whole or in part of full-time members; the respective duties of the President and the Secretary-General. Upon the answer to the third question depends the vital issue of who should be considered for the two posts.

I

The role of the Council

On the one hand the Council cannot be permitted to interfere with day-to-day administration. On the other hand it must be forced to bear responsibility for major decisions of policy. The Council represents national governments. The success or failure of the Aviation Organization depends on the policies to it and in it which are pursued by national governments. This must be made crystal clear to the public in the member states. If a Council is not consulted sufficiently by the Secretariat and if the Secretariat does not force the Council to take responsibility for major decisions, governments will talk as if the international organization had a policy of its own for which they are not responsible. This will make it easy for them to shuffle off onto the Organization responsibility for mistakes which it makes. A Secretariat which is convinced that it can make better decisions than the Council will play into the hands of such governments by not consulting the Council sufficiently. The jealousy and suspicion in Washington between the administrative departments and the Congress must not be transferred to the new international organizations. It is essential that the Council be an effective governing body. The rules and regulations of the Council and of the Secretariat should therefore be so framed that major decisions of policy are made the responsibility of the Council.

II

The nature of the membership of the Council — full-time members or part-time members

The U.S. memoranda appear to be based on the assumption that the Council will meet at infrequent intervals and will be composed of men who will give only part-time to the Council. The Council members, under this concept, might be diplomats in Ottawa or Washington or members of such bodies as the C.A.B. and the Canadian Air Transport Board.

It is contended that the advantage of this proposal is that it will make it easier to get on the Council first-rate men who could not be spared for a full-time job. Since these men will be senior officers in an agency of a national government dealing with civil aviation the task of coordinating the policy decided on by the Council with the policies of the various nations concerned will be facilitated.

One of the chief disadvantages of this proposal is that the members from the principal countries, just because they would be senior government officials, would be overburdened with their ordinary duties. They would not have time to give a sufficiently profound study to the major decisions of policy which the Council must make. Discussion at Council meetings would be hurried and would tend to be superficial. Of necessity, under such conditions, the views of the Secretariat would usually prevail and there would be danger that the Council would tend to become a rubber stamp.

Another disadvantage arises from the very fact that a part-time Council member might be a senior official from some national agency concerned with air transport. The Council will be discussing the whole range of problems of civil aviation. The member of the Council may come from an agency which is concerned with only one aspect of the problem. The other agencies will be jealous of his trenching on their fields and cooperation between the International Organization and those national agencies will be made more difficult. From this point of view it would be better if the Council member stood apart from the agencies and did not maintain a post on any one of them.

It would clearly not be wise or desireable to insist on full-time members from each country represented on the Council. It would, however, be useful if the states principally concerned in air transport had full-time members resident in Montreal. The rules of the Council might be drawn so as to encourage this. They might, for example, provide that the Council could meet on, say, three days' notice.

III

The respective duties of the President and the Secretary-General

The U.S. memoranda appear to be based on the assumption that it is almost impossible to divide functions between the President and the Secretary-General; instead the one is made subordinate to the other. There is clearly a great advantage in having one single line of authority. The advantages of a wise division of functions between the President and the Secretary-General are, however, very great.

In the first place if the two posts are virtually equivalent in prestige it will be easier to get two first-class men.

Secondly the posts require different types of ability and it would be very difficult to find in a single man the qualities needed for both posts.

Thirdly the presumption is, from business experience, that it is desirable to divide the top responsibilities of an organization between a President and a Secretary-General. In many businesses the two posts are called Chairman of the Board and General Manager respectively, or the one officer is called the President and the other the Vice-President and General Manager.

A division of functions between President and Secretary-General will have to be clearly spelled out or otherwise confusion will result. The following division of functions is suggested.

President

The President is the elder statesman and the chief diplomat of the Organization. His primary job is to get the Council to work together as a team; to smooth out difficulties which may arise between members of the Council and between the governments they represent as well as between members of the Council and the Secretariat; to remind the members of the Council unobtrusively and tactfully of the importance and extent of the task which they are called upon to perform as the governing body of the Aviation Organization — a task which calls for imagination, drive, and a quasi-judicial detachment. The President will be a "fixer", a pourer of oil on troubled waters. He should possess the good qualities of a successful ambassador and of a successful politician. Just as a good cabinet minister need not have, and probably ought not to have, detailed knowledge of the problems of his department, so a good President of the Aviation Council need not have detailed knowledge of the problems of international air transport.

The President, as the embodiment of the Council, can act as a buffer on political questions between individual members of the Council and individual members of the Secretariat and thus protect members of the Secretariat from undue national political pressure.

As the representative of the whole Council the main burden of representational duties (entertainment, public speeches) will fall on the President's shoulders. He will also, in his capacity as representative of the Council and as chief diplomat of the Organization, visit the governments of the member states from time to time to ease any political friction that may have developed over the work of the Organization.

The President will have a diplomatic adviser directly responsible to him. All the other officers, with the exception of the Legal Counsel, will be directly responsible to the Secretary-General and take their instructions from him. The Legal Counsel will be directly responsible to the Council as a whole.

Secretary-General

The duties of the Secretary-General are pretty clearly defined by the provisions of Article IV of the Interim Civil Aviation Agreement which reads as follows:

"The Secretary-General shall be the chief executive and administrative officer of the Organization. The Secretary-General shall be responsible to the Council as a whole and, following established policies of the Council, shall have full power and authority to carry out the duties assigned to him by the Council. The Secretary-General shall make periodic reports to the Council covering the progress of the Secretariat's activities. The Secretary-General shall appoint the staff of the Secretariat. He shall likewise appoint the secretariat and staff necessary to the functioning of the Assembly, of the Council, and of Committees or such working groups as are mentioned in the present Agreement or may be constituted pursuant thereto."

The Secretary-General's first job is to appoint a first-class staff. To do this he must be a good judge of men, he must know a great deal about the problems of international air transport and the men throughout the world who are expert in their particular fields, he must be able to resist pressure from the member states. After the initial appointments have been made, the main job of the Secretary-General will be to get the secretariat to work together as a team; to inspire them with enthusiasm for the work of the Organization; to create and maintain a high esprit de corps; to see that efficiency is rewarded and inefficiency penalized. The Secretary-General need not be a good administrator in the narrow sense of the word — the Deputy Secretary-General can be given the responsibility for seeing that the wheels of the Organization run smoothly. The Secretary-General should, however, be a good administrator in the broad sense of the term in that he must have "common sense, courage, integrity and tact." He must know "when to be dynamic, to take the initiative and to force an issue; when, at the other extreme, to be content as a purely administrative official; and when, on a middle course, to be a moderator impartially smoothing over difficulties, a catalytic agent in negotiation." (The quotations are from "The International Secretariat of the Future," R.I.I.A., 1944.) The Secretary-General's knowledge of and interest in air transport should not be too specialized; he should not, for example, be interested and experienced only in the problems of air navigation (the work which CINA[128] did), but should also be interested and experienced in the economic problems of regulating international air transport — routes, rates, subsidies, etc..

The Secretary-General will be ex officio secretary of the Council and of all its committees and commissions. He will, on all these bodies, be the principal expert present; he will have with him briefs prepared by the Secretariat; it will be his duty to see that the members of the Council are provided, in advance of Council meetings, with adequate agenda, documents, etc. As the chief expert present he will take part in all discussions.

The policy-making functions of the President and Secretary-General

The President, as the impartial chairman of the Council, will have to be discreet in intervening in the discussions. The Secretary-General as the head of the Secretariat will also have to be discreet. Nevertheless, because of their prestige and their knowledge, their views on policy will carry more weight than those of any other members of the Council.

Ottawa, March 9, 1945

Dear Escott [Reid],

I have gone over your note of March 5th in Mr. Pierce's letter of March 6th† dealing with the memoranda on the Rules of Procedure of the Interim Council and its Subcommittees.

I am in general agreement with the points made in your memoranda, but I am not sure that much is to be gained by an attempt to define carefully and in detail the distinctive functions of the President and Secretary-General. The general suggestions you make would cover the appropriate role of each, but to set this down in rules and regulations would be difficult. I feel the matter will largely have to work itself out in practice; this, as far as I know, is usually the case in business institutions where the President and General Manager do not have their respective functions defined in great detail but work according to a very broad pattern and out of experience evolve a satisfactory working arrangement. I see no serious difficulty in making the Secretary-General subordinate to the President; I do not see any objection to the general assignment to each of the roles which you have suggested in your memoranda, but surely the definition of spheres can best be accomplished through preliminary conferences between the countries particularly concerned and with the two officials themselves when appointed.

The question of the extent of time to be given to the Organization by Council Members is much more important. Your own suggestion of a number of full-time members and a number of part-time members would probably work out in practice though it could never be set down in rules. I myself think it is much better and much safer for us to proceed, for the moment, on the assumption that all members will give full-time to the work of the Organization and to insist upon this in our preliminary discussions with the other chief countries. We might thus hope to get at least some full-time members from the more important countries, and it would not matter so much if other members did not devote the same attention to the work.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN R. BALDWIN

Dear Mr. Robertson:

I enclose three copies of a memorandum by Mr. Reid on discussions on air transport matters which have taken place during Mr. Symington's visit here yesterday and today. This was not typed until after Mr. Baldwin had left so I would be grateful if you could pass a copy of the memorandum on to him.

The visit of Mr. Symington and Mr. Baldwin to Washington has, I think, been extremely useful.

You will note from the memorandum that one of the points discussed here was the possibility of prodding the states which have signed but have not yet accepted the Interim Aviation Agreement.[129] The United States is going to do something about this. It occurs to me that Canada might take upon itself to prod Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. If the British states accept the Interim Agreement we are in a somewhat better position when we ask the State Department to prod their Latin American friends.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

[Washington,] April 10, 1945

MR. SYMINGTON'S VISIT TO WASHINGTON

I. Establishment of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization in Montreal

1. Mr. Symington, Mr. Baldwin and I had a session yesterday afternoon with the members of the Civil Aeronautics Board and with Stokeley Morgan of the State Department, Marlin of the Bureau of the Budget, Burden, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, Koch of the C.A.A.,[130] and one or two others.

2. Mr. Morgan agreed that the State Department would once more prod the governments which have not yet accepted the Interim Agreement. They will say that Canada was anxious to know as soon as possible the approximate date on which the Organization would be established since Canada was trying to secure office and living accommodation in Montreal. In order to help the Canadian authorities secure living accommodation, it would be desirable for the governments which were represented on the Council to let us know as soon as possible what type of living accommodation they would need for their Council member. Mr. Morgan said that he might also include in the message some statement based on recent declarations by the President to Congress of the necessity of under-pinning the San Francisco treaty with international agreements on aviation, trade, agriculture, etc., and that it would be helpful if before the San Francisco Conference ended the Interim Aviation Organization could get established.

3. Mr. Symington said that he would do what he could at the Air Transport Operators Conference at Cuba to get the operators to bring pressure on the governments to accept the Interim Agreement.

4. Mr. Marlin was asked, in consultation with Mr. Reid, to redraft the rules and regulations of the provisional Organization on the assumption that the Council was going to be composed of full-time members, there being general agreement that such full-time membership was desirable at least at the beginning of the Interim Organization's activities.

5. In response to a request from Mr. Pogue,[131] Mr. Symington gave his own personal views on the way in which the seven senior posts in the Organization might be filled. His suggestions were:

President	— Warner, U.S.A.
Secretary-General	— Hildred, U.K.
Deputy Secretary-General	— (Unless it was necessary to give this post to a Mexican, it might be held open for a U.S.S.R. citizen.)
Assistant Secretary General in charge of the Air Transport Bureau	— An operator from the Netherlands.
Assistant Secretary General in charge of the Air Navigation Bureau	— Roper, France.
Legal Counsel	— Cooper, U.S.A.
Diplomatic Adviser	— da Silva, Brazil.

6. There seemed to be general agreement with the main lines of this proposal.

7. It was agreed that it would be desirable if the United Kingdom and the United States now had direct discussions on the problems connected with the establishment of the provisional Organization. Mr. Baldwin said that when he returned to Ottawa he would speak to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and suggest to him that he tell Mr. Malcolm MacDonald that we have been having discussions with United States officials on problems of personnel and organization and that we think it would be a good idea if the United Kingdom now had discussions with them and put forward its suggestions on how the six or seven senior posts might best be filled. When the United Kingdom then approached the United States, the United States would give them the revised editions of the chart and of the rules and regulations.

II. Filling in of the gap in the permanent Convention

8. Mr. Symington and I called on Mr. Clayton this morning at the State Department at 9:00 o'clock. Mr. Morgan was also present. The discussion lasted for about half an hour.

9. Mr. Symington urged that the United States and the United Kingdom should try to reach agreement on how to fill in the gaps in the permanent Convention; otherwise we would be in for a bad period of bilateral bargaining over "Freedoms Three, Four and Five." He said that it was a tragedy at Chicago that we were not able to close the very small gap between the United States and the United Kingdom. He suggested that the gap in the Convention should be filled by incorporating in the Convention the Five Freedoms Agreement, together with the chapters on tariffs and special treatment for certain United Nations, on which there was general agreement. There should also be included a chapter on traffic capacity. This was the chapter which had proved the stumbling block at Chicago. Mr. Symington suggested that this chapter be pretty much the final Canadian proposal made at Chicago[132] with one substantial change, namely, that if a state considered that the formula set forth in the annex to this chapter was working out inequitably so far as it was concerned, it would have the right to have this referred to a committee composed of three members of the Council, one appointed by each of the two parties to the dispute and the third either by these two members or by the chairman of the Council.

[131] L. Welch Pogue, président, Commission de l'aéronautique civile.

10. Mr. Symington said that he did not want to take up this suggestion with the United Kingdom unless there was some hope of it being agreeable to the United States. His feeling was that it would be generally satisfactory to most of the members of the American delegation at Chicago and to the American airline operators. He realized that the difficulty would be the Senate.

11. Mr. Clayton did not dismiss the suggestion as impossible and said he wanted to have a chance to think about it a little more and to talk to Stokeley Morgan. He would then like to discuss the matter further with Mr. Symington when Mr. Symington was returning from the Cuba Conference, and he suggested that Mr. Symington and I have lunch with him on Friday, April 20.

12. After the meeting Mr. Symington asked me to pass on to Mr. Morgan the latest draft of our suggested new chapters† for the aviation Convention, leaving out any reference to the possibility of including a provision under which a member state (i.e., the U.S.S.R.) could contract out of the grant of all Five Freedoms.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I reply to your letter of April 10th on the subject of acceptances of the Interim Aviation Agreement.

We have, as you suggested in your last paragraph, spoken to the Australian, New Zealand and South African authorities. Mr. Howe has also spoken to the United Kingdom High Commissioner.

We learned from the Australian High Commissioner's Office that they understand Cabinet has approved the acceptance of the Interim Agreement. Their information is on a personal level and no official word has yet come through. It is expected at any time.

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL San Francisco, May 2, 1945

Dear Sir:

In previous communications from the Canadian Embassy in Washington we have informed you of the informal discussions on international air transport problems which took place with the State Department during Mr. Symington's visit to Washington and we transmitted to you the draft of possible new chapters of the International Aviation Convention which we informally gave to Mr. Stokeley Morgan of the Aviation Division of the State Department.†

I received yesterday from Mr. Morgan the enclosed informal and confidential letter of April 26th.

Mr. Morgan reports that the interested departments and agencies of the United States Government in Washington doubt whether it would be possible to work out a complete and satisfactory agreement along the lines which Mr. Symington has in mind before the first meeting of the Interim Aviation Council. They therefore believe that we should not try to reach an agreement on these matters before the first meeting.

Mr. Morgan concludes by stating:

"I am not giving up hope of reaching some sort of an agreement, but I think it will have to be along different lines, either through bilateral agreements, which I have full faith can be worked out in time, or through the procedure originally contemplated, namely, that of an experimental period (which can only begin when operations have been resumed) and study and recommendations by the PICAO."

I assume that you will be letting Mr. Symington and Mr. Baldwin have copies of this correspondence.

Yours sincerely,

Mémorandum du chef, la direction de l'aviation, le département d'État des États-Unis

Memorandum by Chief, Aviation Division,
Department of State of United States

CONFIDENTIAL Washington, April 26, 1945

Dear Escott [Reid]:

Following the pattern of the very informal talks which we had with Mr. Symington and yourself, it seems to me best to communicate the result of our deliberations in the same informal manner to Mr. Symington through your good self.

We have discussed the subject brought up by Mr. Symington in his talk with Mr. Clayton with the various interested parties in the different departments and agencies, and the consensus of opinion seems to be that it would be inopportune at this time to reopen the subjects which we had to postpone at Chicago.

In the first place, as you know, in resolution No. 10 of the Chicago Conference the matters on which it was not possible to reach agreement were referred to the Interim Council with instructions to give these matters continuing study and submit a report. In our tentative planning for the PICAO we contemplate a special committee of the Council to study these problems.

There is some feeling among our people that we should not try to reach an agreement on these matters, so to speak, behind the back of the Council and just before its first meeting, which I am now confident will take place soon. To do so might create resentment and a feeling that we are trying to make the Council's decisions in advance. If we could see the prospect of a complete and satisfactory agreement along the lines Mr. Symington has in mind, we might feel that the advantages to be derived therefrom would outweigh any possible feeling of irritation that might be caused and that the Council would in fact be glad to be shown the way to a solution. We doubt that such an agreement can be worked out before the Council meets.

As you know, the basic difference at Chicago was the insistence of our friends upon leaving important matters to the decision of the Council and our insistence that we could not accept this type of control. It will not be an easy matter to find a compromise ground here. Mr. Symington's suggestion that instead of accepting control by the full Council we agree to accept the decision of a specially selected tribunal of three is doubtless more workable as a practical measure, but is in essence the same thing, namely, regulation by an international body.

I am not giving up hope of reaching some sort of an agreement, but I think it will have to be along different lines, either through bilateral agreements, which I have full faith can be worked out in time, or through the procedure originally contemplated, namely, that of an experimental period (which can only begin when operations have been resumed) and study and recommendations by the PICAO.

I trust you are enjoying the San Francisco Conference, and I am sure it must be most interesting. With kindest regards.

Sincerely yours,

STOKELEY W. MORGAN

TELEGRAM 1467 Ottawa, June 25, 1945

IMMEDIATE. Will you please convey the following invitation to the Government of the United Kingdom from the Canadian Government:

I have the honour to refer to the Interim Agreement on International Civil Aviation, concluded at the International Civil Aviation Conference in Chicago on December 7, 1944. Article I of this Agreement provides that the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization established by the signatory States shall consist of an Interim Assembly and an Interim Council, and shall have its seat in Canada. It was further agreed at the Conference that the Canadian Government would summon the first meeting of the Interim Council.

2. The Government of Canada has been advised by the Government of the United States of America that the twenty-six acceptances required to bring the Agreement into force in accordance with the provisions of Article XVII thereof, and four other acceptances, had been received by the Department of State on June 6, 1945.

3. The Canadian Government has the honour to inform the Government of the United Kingdom that the first meeting of the Council will be held in Montreal on August 15, 1945, and is similarly informing the governments of all other States elected at the Conference to membership of the First Interim Council.

4. It will be appreciated if your Government will advise the Government of Canada as soon as possible of the name of your representative on the Council and the number of the personnel expected to attend, together with the anticipated date of their arrival in Montreal, so that reservations for accommodation can be made by the Canadian Government.

5. It has been suggested by several Council members that it might be advantageous to open informal discussions on the selection of senior personnel and on questions of administration and procedure a few days in advance of August 15th. If your Government is interested in participating in these informal discussions, it would be appreciated if your Government would advise the Government of Canada of your intention and of the exact date of the arrival of your representative, so that accommodation may be reserved.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my despatch No. 801 of June 23rd† forwarding a number of documents relating to the work of I.C.A.N. and particularly to the meetings of the Juridical sub-Commission held in Paris from June 12th to June 17th.

2. I enclose herewith copies of the following communications dated June 28th which have been forwarded by the Secretary General of I.C.A.N. (1) Note No. 848 from M. Roper requesting that Canada be represented at the 28th Session of I.C.A.N. which is to take place in London between August 21st and 25th, and (2) copy of a communication of the same date from M. Roper to Mr. Rae of this Embassy† inviting him to take part in these meetings. A Note prepared by M. Roper on the choice of place and date of the opening of the 28th session of the Commission is attached.†

3. In view of the fact that Mr. Rae has been following the work of I.C.A.N. in Paris, I think it would be useful for him to attend this session in London; but before a reply is forwarded to M. Roper I should be glad to have your views.

4. I am taking this opportunity of forwarding copies in French and English of a document entitled "Bulletin of Information" covering the period August and September — December 1944.†

[Paris,] le 28 juin 1945

Monsieur l'Ambassadeur,

[133]Grande-Bretagne,/Great Britain,
Treaty Series, 1922, No. 2.

vous prier de bien vouloir envoyer un Représentant de votre Gouvernement à la Vingt-huitième Session de la Commission Internationale de Navigation Aérienne qui aura lieu à Londres.

La Session sera ouverte le mardi 21 août à 10 heures au Ministère de l'Aviation civile, Ariel House, Strand, et durera vraisemblablement jusqu'au samedi 25.

L'ORDRE DU JOUR-EXPOSÉ DES QUESTIONS de cette Session vous a été envoyé le 8 mai 1945.† Un Exposé détaillé des questions portées à cet ordre du jour est en préparation et sera distribué aussitôt que possible avant la Session.

Je me permets d'appeler votre attention sur le fait qu'un trop grand nombre d'abstentions pourrait empêcher la Commission de délibérer valablement par suite de l'impossibilité de réunir le quorum prévu pour certains votes par l'article 34 de la Convention: il suffirait en effet, que le tiers des Etats contractants omît de se faire représenter pour que le quorum exigé ne fût pas atteint.

La Commission serait alors amenée à se séparer sans délibérer et les Délégués présents auraient fait un déplacement inutile.

Or, l'obtention du quorum prévu est rendu cette année plus difficile par le fait qu'en raison de la situation internationale actuelle sept des trente-trois Etats représentés à la Commission ne pourront pas être touchés par ma convocation.

Un intérêt primordial s'attache donc à ce que votre Gouvernement soit représenté à cette Session.

Je vous prie d'agréer, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, l'assurance de ma haute considération.

Please inform the government to which you are accredited which is a member of the Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization, in the following sense:

Canadian authorities have prepared tentative agenda for Council meetings which will open on August 15. It will, of course, be for the Council to decide its own agenda when it meets but the suggestions contained in my immediately following telegram are put forward by the Canadian authorities in the hope that states members of the Council may find it helpful to have before them proposals of a fairly concrete nature.

It will be noted that Part I includes opening formalities, general discussion of the Organization's activities and election of officers while Part II deals with measures required to enable the Organization to function. Part III covers urgent technical questions which might then be considered and referred to sub-committees. It is anticipated that the discussions under Part III will be in general terms and will be concerned with initiating studies and planning the Council's work on these subjects. It can therefore be anticipated that full technical representation will not be required at the outset, and that states members of the Council will have ample opportunity to designate technical experts to the various sub-committees as the work of the Council takes shape.

TELEGRAM 382 Ottawa, August 4, 1945

Your despatch No. 873 of July 2. Canadian representation at session of International Commission for Air Navigation.

We agree that Rae should attend on behalf of Canada and Roper's invitation should be accepted. We do not wish to put forward any specific proposals and Rae's role will be mainly that of an observer. He should be guided, however, by the following general considerations and support whatever proposals seem most likely to attain our objectives.

It is the view of the Canadian Government and of other governments as well that the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization which is a much more comprehensive body than ICAN (particularly because of United States membership) should undertake primary responsibility for problems of international civil aviation. It is therefore desirable that means be found to merge ICAN with PICAO as soon as may be feasible and that in the meantime ICAN should be prepared to adopt whatever recommendations on technical problems may be adopted by PICAO. It would obviously be unfortunate if two bodies were to recommend differing technical standards to member states. If the Chicago Convention is ratified by sufficient states and comes into force ICAN will be superseded by the new body and will cease to exist. During the interim period therefore ICAN should work as closely as possible with PICAO.

Dear Mr. Robertson:

With reference to a letter of August 3rd from Mr. R. M. Macdonnell to the Chairman of the Air Transport Board,† it is my opinion that Canada should be represented in the strongest possible way on each of the Technical Committees to be appointed by P.I.C.A.O. to consider the Draft Technical Annexes evolved at Chicago. Canada, therefore, would not desire the senior technical advisers for the United Kingdom to act on behalf of the Canadian Government.

Canadian representation concerning Annex F — Log Book Requirements, and Annex H — Aircraft Registration and Identification Markings, will be at senior technical level, and Canada would be quite willing to act for the United Kingdom Government if it so wishes.

Yours sincerely,

Extract from Report of Temporary Chairman, Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization, to Special Assistant to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Montreal, August 23, 1945

Dear Syd [Pierce],

The opening of PICAO started off well on the 15th with a speech by Mr. Howe followed by polite replies from some half-dozen representatives. With the usual pre-arrangement, I was made temporary chairman and made a dull speech, of which, I sent a copy† to Norman Robertson. The next day I did a brief review of some of the objectives having to do with the broad workings of the Organization (also sent to Norman Robertson)† in order to promote a general discussion. The incoming President, Dr. Warner, wanted to be sure that there was general agreement on our set-up and objectives before he accepted the presidency — hence this two-day interval under my chairmanship.

A number of delegates had arrived thinking that the Council would not spend a great deal of time on the job and that they would merely appear from time to time. Dr. Warner, Sir Frederick Bowhill, McComb from Australia, Van Hasselt from the Netherlands and a few others came with every intention of staying more or less permanently and making this their full-time job and the others were quickly persuaded with the possible exception of Mr. Bouché from France, who is more inclined to leave the job to the secretariat. He, however, only differed in degree and not in principle when the discussion concluded.

The Rules of Procedure were then adopted with a number of changes but none making a great difference in principle. Warner was then elected President and after his taking the chair, Dr. Roper was made Secretary-General and has since cabled his acceptance. The next day, Saturday, three vice-presidents were elected, mainly, on a regional distribution, as these are not important posts, and went to the Netherlands, China and Colombia, in that order.

We then broke up into committees on Organization, Personnel and Finance, I being on the last, but it and Personnel were ordinary business and, while important, were straight work rather than matters of persuasion, which the committee on Organization promised to be. I kept in touch with the activities of the other two committees and it seemed that a situation was arising in Organization which warranted our having someone present (any State may send a member) so I phoned Ferrier[136] and McLean[137] and the latter came down yesterday.

The situation, on which I felt we should lend support, had to do with what I thought could be interpreted as a power-play by France to remove functions from the President and put them under the Secretary-General, thus, M. Bouché hoped to take the Legal Counsel from the President, create a legal committee of equal status with that on Air Navigation and Air Transport and create a bureau under the Secretary-General equal to the Air Transport and Air Navigation Bureaus, calling it "Legal and Political." I objected to the first on workability, feeling that a legal committee was cumbersome, and if it goes through, I will agree only if its terms of reference are such that it will not be used except on specific requests of the Council. The legal and political bureau, I objected to on principle in divesting the Council and President of policy-making power and giving it to the Secretary-General, who, I consider, should be as stated in the Act, "executive and administrative." McLean, in the Organization Committee, stated this view and if it comes up again it will be in Council where I will be present. I think it will work out alright.

Today we are doing committee work and tomorrow we start reconsideration of more technical matters having already heard a review by the U.S.A. of various States' comments on the twelve Annexes. I have asked Ferrier to be present tomorrow; McLean says that he may come too.

As soon as my time is not taken up by the Council and Committees, I will come to Ottawa and talk with those concerned on the whole subject, but this may not be until after next week.

Kindest regards and I am looking forward to seeing you soon.

Yours sincerely,

[ANSON MCKIM]

DESPATCH 1238 Paris, September 5, 1945

1. I have the honour to refer to your telegram No. 382 of August 4th and to report that Mr. S. F. Rae attended the Twenty-Eighth Session of the International Commission for Air Navigation held in London.

2. In view of the observations set forth in your telegram under reference, the technical character of the discussions in London, and the fact that M. Albert Roper left for Montreal immediately following the conclusion of the ICAN Conference, I do not think it necessary to send a detailed report of the proceedings at the present time. I am, however, enclosing copies in English and French of the statement issued to the Press at the conclusion of the Conference[138] which sets forth the main points under consideration.† The full text of the proceedings will be forwarded to you as soon as possible.†

3. On one of the points considered at the Twenty-eighth Session, the question of the amount of the contribution of the various Member States to the work of ICAN, a further communication, No. 1068 of August 31st, has been received from the Secretariat General in Paris.† I am enclosing a copy of this communication which points out that, following the decision taken at the conference in London, the contribution owing by the Canadian Government, to cover the period from 1940 the end of 1945, amounts to Two thousand three hundred and ten pounds sterling (£2,310.) payable in London. The question of the payment of the Canadian contribution has been taken up in previous correspondence with the Department.†

4. As Mr. Rae points out in paragraph 2 of his telegram sent from Canada House, as No. 3432 of August 25th,† general agreement was expressed, both publicly and privately by delegations of various States present at the Conference, that the organization of PICAO has superseded the ICAN and that the latter organization should continue to exist only until the new international organization, provisionally established at Montreal, begins to function. In this connection you will have noted both, the acceptance of the appointment of Secretary-General of PICAO for M. Roper, and the approval of a formula of denunciation intended to serve as a model for States when denouncing the ICAN Convention.

I have etc.

No. 789 Ottawa, October 10, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your airmail despatch No. 939 of July 10th† regarding the payment of the Canadian contributions to ICAN.

I should be grateful if you would inform Mr. Roper that it has been decided to authorize the payment of the Canadian subscription for 1940 to 1945 inclusive according to the scale suggested at the recent plenary session of ICAN.

The contribution owing for the year 1940, which according to this scale amounts to £450 (90,000 French francs), has been provided for in the present supplementary estimates and will be forwarded as soon as these estimates have received parliamentary approval. Payment of the later subscriptions will have to be held over until provision can be made for them in the next budget.

I have etc.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D-28 London, January 6, 1944

MOST SECRET. Addressed Canada, repeated Australia, New Zealand, South Africa. Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: Your telegram of December 19th, No. 199,[1] Moscow Declaration.[2] We are glad to learn that, as next step, you favour our proposal for preliminary exchange of views between parties to Moscow Declaration. Once progress has been made in this way it should be easier to see how best other United Nations could be brought into the picture. We shall, of course, welcome early exchange of views between Commonwealth Governments. Proposed meeting of Prime Ministers will provide opportunity for considering whole question including relation of any new scheme to League of Nations arrangements. In this connection we feel sure that you will share our views as to importance of United States participation in any new scheme. We think that in order to ensure this we should do everything we reasonably can to meet their views on procedure.

2. Since despatch of my telegram of December 14th, Circular D. 1102,[3] we have learnt that State Department communicated with Chinese Government in same sense as with Soviet Government and ourselves. We have not yet received State Departments' views on our proposal for exchange of views. Ends.

London, January 24, 1944

My dear Mr. Robertson,

A week or so ago I took occasion to speak to Lord Cranborne about Canada's relation to plans at present under consideration for Europe in the post-war period. I pointed out that although such arrangements are largely in the hands of the three great powers concerned, Canada had a unique position among the remaining members of the United Nations and that she should have appropriate relationship to such post-war plans and the machinery created to give them effect. Lord Cranborne appeared to be much interested and asked me to send him a personal letter on the subject which he might show to the Foreign Secretary. This I did and I am sending you a copy enclosed.

Yours sincerely,

Lettre au secrétaire aux Dominions

Letter to Dominions Secretary

PERSONAL London, January 18, 1944

I was glad to have the opportunity of talking to you the other day about Canada's relation to the plans for post-war Europe which are now under consideration by the European Advisory Commission. We are, as I said, much interested in these arrangements and will, no doubt, wish to participate appropriately in whatever machinery is to be set up when the time comes. In what I said, I tried to explain Canada's attitude to the problem of post-war Europe.

It is recognised, of course, that the main burden and the heaviest responsibility in connection with this difficult task will rest on the three great Powers. Their share in the war effort and in relation to post-war problems makes this obvious. You will, however, I know, agree that the other United Nations should participate fully according to their various interests and capacities in any post-war international organisation. There are, it might be said, three groups among the United Nations. One of these is the British Dominions. Of these, Australia and New Zealand have been primarily concerned with the South Pacific area. South Africa's participation in the war has largely been on a continental basis. Canada, alone of the Dominions, has made her principal, in fact almost her entire contribution in the war itself, either in the European theatre or in direct relation to it. The war effort of the Occupied Countries is, in the nature of things, limited, and that of the remaining members of the United Nations largely restricted to the provision of raw materials. Canada, therefore, has a unique place among the intermediate and smaller Powers engaged in the war. She comes fourth in the supply of raw materials and she will be a factor disproportionately large in relation to her population in the task of revictualling Europe. It can be said, I think, that Canada ranks next in importance after the three Great Powers in her contribution to the liberation and relief of Europe.

It is for these reasons, because of her function in a practical sense and with no thought at all of mere questions of status or prestige that it is to be hoped that full consideration will be given to Canada's position in the various plans for post-war international machinery which are now being evolved.

MOST SECRET Ottawa, March 6, 1944

Dear Mr. Ritchie,

You are already aware that the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities problems has been giving consideration to the paper produced by the Post-Hostilities Planning Sub-Committee in London on "The Military Aspect on any Post-War Security Organization."† I enclose a note prepared by the Working Committee making some comments on certain paragraphs of this paper. I leave to you the question whether this should be communicated to the Post-Hostilities Planning Sub-Committee as it stands. Their paper, I notice, has reached its final stage and has been printed for the War Cabinet.

There are several additional points concerning this paper which you might find an opportunity of employing. Our main criticisms are three-fold: first, the rejection of the possibility of establishing an international police force; secondly, the concentration on means of keeping Germany and Japan impotent in the military sense; and thirdly, the apparent assumption that if the three great powers — I omit China, as I feel that her inclusion in this paper is probably a matter of form — stick together, they can themselves ensure world security.

On the first point we are suggesting a modest scheme, to be worked in with the use of bases for world security purposes. It may be that such a scheme is not in fact contrary to the views of the London Sub-Committee. We have noted that in a later paper "European Allies — forces to be maintained in the Post-Hostilities Period" (P.H.P. (43) 17A),† the Sub-Committee has itself advocated a "United Nations Security Force" modelled on the multi-national units in the R.A.F.; they do not go into detail but it would seem that some members of the Committee at least are open to the sort of suggestion that we have made. We have also noted in the report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on Reparation and Economic Security dated August 31st, 1943,† that it is suggested (paras. 20, 37-40, 49-54, 136-142) that Germany, having been disarmed herself, should be required to contribute, as a form of reparations, to the cost of the armed forces of the Allies. If this plan were to be accepted it might provide, for a time at least, a convenient method of financing a small international police force such as we are proposing.

With regard to our second and third criticisms, the most serious test which could be put upon a new world security organization would be a drastic difference of opinion upon an important matter between two of the three largest powers. Such a test could only be met if it were possible to line up the secondary states, and even then it might well break the organization. I think that it may be put this way: the great powers must co-operate to create and work a world security organization, but unless they can carry with them at least most of the more important secondary states their efforts sooner or later will fail.

The appendix on Regional Security at the end of the paper is an interesting summary of the objections and advantages. I feel, however, that attention should tactfully be drawn to a phrase in Paragraph 1(c) "the foundations of British Commonwealth strategy." The use of this phrase seems to show that the Sub-Committee is thinking in terms of a fully integrated defence policy for the whole Commonwwealth, just as some of their proposals in the paper on security aspects of international civil aviation were based on a similar assumption. It is an assumption which may prove to be misleading.

I am enclosing enough copies of our note for you to transmit it to the representatives of the Navy, Army and Air Force who are associated with you in these matters.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

Mémorandum du comité de travail canadien sur les problèmes de l'après-guerre

Memorandum by Canadian Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems

SECRET [Ottawa,] March 6, 1944

NOTE BY THE CANADIAN WORKING COMMITTEE ON POST-HOSTILITIES PROBLEMS ON P.H.P. PAPER (43) 24A (UNITED KINGDOM) OF FEBRUARY 23RD, 1944 ENTITLED "MILITARY ASPECT OF ANY POST-WAR SECURITY ORGANIZATION"

The Working Committee has studied this report with great interest. In it a great deal of material has been compressed into a remarkably small space. Such compression must involve omission both of supporting arguments and of important details. The Working Committee considers that the following points should be taken into account, even in a summary outline:

A. PARAS 9 & 10.

1. In paragraphs 9 and 10 the idea of an International Police Force is summarily dismissed on the ground that its effective operation "implies the existence of a world state." It is true that one cannot foresee the development of international organisation to a point at which an International Police Force could assume full military responsibility for the preservation of peace; this would involve the abolition of national forces greater than required for internal policing. On the other hand, might not a small beginning be made towards the creation of an International Force? It is not very far-fetched to argue that the Air Forces of the British Commonwealth are a not unhopeful indication of what might be accomplished in merging into an efficient combatant force an amalgam of different nationalities. There are to be found in them not only nationals of all parts of the British Commonwealth but also citizens of many foreign countries — Americans, Poles, Frenchmen, Czechs, Norwegians. Furthermore, the methods worked out for the training of these Forces are a promising example of international cooperation in finance and control.

2. It is suggested that further consideration should be given to the possibility of setting up a small International Force, as part of the world security organization, which would be charged with the performance of specific duties. Such a force would not at first be a combatant force equipped to suppress or deter aggression. It might initially be used in the defence and maintenance of bases held available for the use of the combined military forces of the United Nations operating under a world security organization.

3. It is not possible to be explicit until the plans for bases are further developed — a subject to which the P.H.P. Committee in London is giving attention. In the North Atlantic area an International Police Force might be charged with the maintenance and defence of bases at certain strategic points. These might be situated: (a) in small countries such as Iceland, Greenland and possibly Norway; (b) in ex-enemy territory, such as the Kiel Canal, the joint occupation of which is suggested in paragraph 19 of the paper under consideration, and (c) at certain points now leased to the United States, such as Argentia and Bermuda. At first the detachment of the International Police Force stationed at these bases might be composed of troops and air formations equipped for local defence and reconnaissance duties.

4. Such a plan would be an experiment which would not, if it failed, threaten world security. If it succeeded, the International Force could be expanded as time went on and habits of cooperation and methods of control were developed. A great deal has been learnt during the war about the technique of exercising commenced [command?] through inter-allied combined staffs. It might prove feasible to transfer to such an International Police Force some or all of the military functions required in the later stages of the occupation of Germany — Stage 4 and perhaps part of stage 3 in the plan outlined in the United Kingdom Staff Report[1] on the Military Occupation of Germany.

B. PARAS 5 & 6.

1. Paragraph 5 would be improved by the addition of a further condition of success of the world organization, that this will also depend on the cooperation of France and important secondary states, such as the Netherlands, Canada, Australia, and Belgium.

2. In the same paragraph it is stated as a condition of success that the machinery should be of a kind to which Member States are already accustomed. This implies a tendency to reject experiments, even though these experiments have been tried successfully in war. We hope to develop some novel peacetime machinery of economic cooperation. Should we reject novel machinery of military cooperation?

3. In paragraph 6 the objects of the world organization are too narrowly defined. The whole plan is geared to machinery designed to keep Germany and Japan powerless. No one can tell from what direction will come the next threat to world peace. A world security organization should have as one of its objects the prevention or suppression of conflicts between smaller states.

4. Paragraph 5 (a) includes China as one of the powers whose wholehearted cooperation is necessary to ensure the success of the proposed world organization. While we must admit the political need for saving China's face, her inclusion is unrealistic in a paper dealing with the organization of power.

In view of the above opinions, the Working Committee considers that paragraphs 5 and 6 should be framed as follows:

5. The proposed world organization, whatever its form, is bound to fail unless: —

(a) The United Kingdom, the United States of America, and the U.S.S.R. continue to cooperate wholeheartedly in its support.

(b) The governments and peoples of those Powers at least retain the will to enforce peace.

(c) The organization secures and retains the cooperation of other states, especially France and the more important secondary states.

(d) The organization is simple and its objects are clear-cut.

6. The objects should be: —

(a) to disarm Germany and Japan and to keep them disarmed;

(b) to prevent them or any other aggressor from again upsetting the peace of the world;

(c) to prevent or suppress conflicts, arising from any cause, which threaten general security.

Mémorandum de l'adjoint, le ministère des Affaires extérieures, au sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Assistant, Department of External Affairs, to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa,] March 25, 1944

I have read with great interest Mr. Wilgress's despatch No. 50 of February 16th† in which he comments on the conflict between reliance on balance of power and collective security in Europe. He suggests that Canada could "do much by continuing that active leadership of the small nations she is already assuming but probably the best opening for her to render service to the cause of collective security is through behind-the-scenes prodding in Washington."

This whole despatch, it seems to me, should encourage the P.H.P. Committees to continue even more energetically to place their views in London. I do not know how influential we are in Washington, but there is evidence that we can get somewhere by encouraging the believers in collective security within the United Kingdom Government. As Mr. Wilgress has point out, the United Kingdom — no matter how small she may be — can lead the world into collective security. Her reversion to reliance on the juggling of power seems to arise out of the funk induced by the thinking of Smuts and Halifax. In this mood the P.H.P. authorities suggest reliance on all-red air defence and British occupation of Bulgaria lest their Soviet allies get too near the Straits.

Canadian intervention should be peculiarly influential because we could make it clear that, although we are not willing to commit ourselves to narrow schemes for imperial defence, the United Kingdom can count on us as the firmest of allies if they want to take the plunge into a real system of collective security.

[Ottawa,] March 29, 1944

We have received, during the last three months, a number of telegrams from the Dominions Office dealing with their plans for developing the form of the world security organization forecast in the Moscow Declaration. They have now proposed an exchange of papers with the United States Government (telegrams D.401 and 402 of March 20th),† and they have already exchanged with Washington lists of headings for further discussion.

We have made no comment on this extremely important matter since our telegram to London No. 199 of December 19th,[4] in which we protested successfully against a suggestion from Washington that other United Nations should be invited to adhere to paragraph 4 of the Moscow Declaration. In that telegram we said "we favour your proposal for a preliminary exchange of views between the parties to the Moscow Declaration. It is certainly desirable that other United Nations should soon be brought into the picture." In the reply from London (telegram D.28 of January 6th), they said they would welcome an early exchange of views between the Commonwealth Governments. The question is included among the topics for discussion at the meeting of Prime Ministers.

I attach a short telegram, for your approval, which is intended to show that our interest in the preliminary exchange of views is lively and which may result in our getting some information that would be helpful in preparing for the meeting of Prime Ministers.

On the suggestion of the Chairman, the meeting agreed to take the Memorandum of March 2nd† from the Working Committee as read. Mr. Robertson explained that, with regard to the proposed studies recommended in the Memorandum,[5] it was felt that some considerations of this kind should be prepared in advance of the Prime Ministers' Conference. The meeting agreed that it was desirable not to have to make hasty decisions on these subjects and it was advisable, therefore, to begin study as soon as possible, in view of the fact that problems connected with these subjects might arise at any time.

The meeting proceeded to consider the suggested topics on page two of the Memorandum. Mr. Wrong said that general conclusions, or at least a summary of arguments on topic (i) would be necessary as a first step. Although the Canadian Government would not make the final decisions, it was advisable to have some views prepared on the pros and cons. These views could be drafted in the Working Committee before the Prime Minister went to London. Canadian authorities could not try to construct a general security plan from the ground up, but they should know at least what proposals would not be acceptable.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures au premier secrétaire, le haut commissariat en Grande-Bretagne

Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to First Secretary, High Commission in Great Britain

MOST SECRET Ottawa, April 1, 1944

Dear Mr. Ritchie —

I have received your letter of March 22nd† concerning the Working Committee's comments[6] on the P.H.P. paper on "The Military Aspect of any Post-War Security Organisation"† and your letter of March 23rd† enclosing a letter from Lt.-Cmdr. Todd† on the same subject. The Working Committee, at its meeting on March 30th, considered your letter of March 22nd and the question which you raised concerning their views on an international security force.

What the Working Committee had in mind in section A of its Note of March 6th was the desirability of setting up a small international force as part of the world security organization which would be charged with the performance of such specific duties as defending and maintaining United Nations bases. They had in mind a force with a distinctive uniform which would be responsible to an international body. This force might conceivably be directed by the Military Staff Committee proposed in the P.H.P. paper. The Military Staff Committee, according to the P.H.P. paper, would be responsible to a World Council which it would advise on military matters. The ultimate responsibility of the international force would therefore be to the World Council. Its relation to the World Council would differ from that of the aggregate of the national forces of the member States. The latter would be at the disposal of the World Council but the units thereof would continue to be subject to the ultimate authority of their own national governments. The former, however, would be responsible only to the World Council (and would presumably be made up of denationalized persons).

The Working Committee do not wish to seem Utopian. They are not proposing an over-all international police force which could by itself resist aggression by any combination of powers. They do believe, however, that some experiments in the establishment of a truly international force should be undertaken in the hope that further developments might come from the experience. They consider that successful experiments along these lines during the War should not be allowed to lapse. In this connection they cited the Commonwealth air forces, simply as an illustration of the fact that military personnel of various nationalities can work closely together. Because of the fact that all the Commonwealth air forces are under the operational control of the Air Ministry, the Working Committee did not intend to suggest this as a model for the machinery of controlling an international force. This explanation should, I think, answer Ltd.-Cmdr. Todd's question.

We have now received the final version of the P.H.P. paper on "United Nations Bases"† which may lead to some further comment by the Working Committee. The Working Committee's views on this and other papers will, at any rate, be evident in the studies which have now been authorized by the Advisory Committee. As you will note from the minutes of the Working Committee meeting on March 30th,† we are setting out immediately to prepare papers on the advantages and disadvantages to Canada of organizing world security on a regional or on a universal basis and on postwar defence arrangements with the United States. These papers should help to keep you in touch with our thinking.

Yours sincerely,

Projet de mémorandum du comité sur les problèmes de l'après-guerre

Draft Memorandum by Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems

SECRET [Ottawa,] April 21, 1944

ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF THE REGIONAL ORGANIZATION OF SECURITY AND DEFENCE

1. The failure of the system attempted between the two wars of seeking to concentrate, in a universal League of Nations, responsibility for the maintenance of peace anywhere in the world, has caused discussion of the possibility of organizing security on a regional basis. This, of course, is not a new idea; attempts were made even within the League of Nations to establish a regional system of which Briand's proposals for European union were the most notable. The recent advocates of regionalism have not stated clearly their aims or methods, and consideration of its possibilities is marked by considerable confusion of thought.

2. It is necessary at the outset to distinguish sharply between regional organization of security and regional organization of defence. The regional organization of security must mean the establishment of a system whereby the states concerned with each region agree to prevent war, or serious threat of war, within the region. The regional organization of defence, on the other hand, involves for the most part international military arrangements for resisting attack from outside on territories within the region. This paper, therefore, will treat first with a general international organization, and will then consider the position affecting regional defence arrangements.

A. Regional Security Proposals.

3. It is generally admitted that world security cannot be attained without some central organization. In the Moscow Declaration the Governments of the United States, United Kingdom, Soviet Union and China have pledged themselves to establish a general international organization for the maintenance of peace and security. Thus the largest powers are already pledged to aim at a world security system. For these reasons it is assumed in this paper that there will be a central organization. If methods of regional devolution were adopted, there would be as well a series of regional Councils. These might take the form of a Council for Europe and a Council for Asia as suggested by Mr. Churchill in a speech made early in 1943. Whatever their size, these Councils would include initally the states among the United Nations with territories within the region. Regional Councils would have primary responsibility for the preservation of peace within their regions, acting either on their own initiative or at the request of the central organization. As there has been no attempt made so far to draft a constitution on such a quasi-federal basis, it is difficult to say how much authority, and what functions, might be devolved on the regional Councils.

4. The chief advantages and disadvantages from a Canadian point of view of a regional organization of world security, in which substantial powers would be vested in regional Councils, are set forth below. The arguments in nearly all cases are political rather than military. Since a basic Canadian interest is the preservation of world peace, nearly all these arguments are not peculiarly Canadian.

Advantages:

(1) The devolution on regional Councils of responsibility for settling disputes within regions might remove many problems and strains from an overburdened central Council.

(2) Countries are more apt to take seriously quarrels within their own regions, and hence it should be easier to secure public support for effective measures proposed by a regional Council. Thus, for example, it might be easier to secure support from elements in Canada suspicious of overseas commitments for obligation arising out of decisions of a regional Council.

(3) A regional system would permit smaller countries to play within their regions a greater part than would be possible in a world organization, in which the main responsibility must fall on the large powers.

(4) It might prove feasible to arrange to some extent within each region for the coordination of the equipment and training of the military forces of the countries within that region, and thus facilitate joint operations.

(5) If North America were to be regarded as a region in itself there would be no likelihood of serious conflict within the region. The danger would be somewhat increased if South America were included in the region.

Disadvantages:

(1) Any form of regional devolution would tend to lead people to regard the responsibilities of their countries as being limited to disputes within that region. This would encourage a false sense of security.

(2) In particular, the establishment of a security region including North America or the Western Hemisphere would encourage a revival of isolationist sentiment in the United States and Canada. This would endanger the essential cooperation of the United States in the maintenance of world security.

(3) A comprehensive system of regional Councils would involve arbitrary and artificial geographical divisions. Regional limits might have to be set at such artificial boundaries as the Suez Canal, the Urals or between Greenland and Iceland. Moreover, continental regions would be based on the false premise that the seas divide, thus ignoring one of the chief lessons of this war and the last. The creation of oceanic regions (e.g., a North Atlantic or an Indian Ocean region) would be equally arbitrary. Security regions inevitably overlap and Canada belongs to a North American, a North Atlantic, a North Pacific and an Arctic region.

(4) While, theoretically, a regional system might afford greater scope to the smaller countries, the regions would tend to become spheres of influence for the largest powers; thus the United States would dominate a North American region. Such a system might, therefore, serve in the long run to sharpen rivalries between great powers and thus endanger world security.

(5) If substantial powers were vested in regional Councils one result would be to weaken Commonwealth ties; the present system of close Commonwealth consultation can most readily be continued inside a world security system.

(6) All countries with colonial possessions outside their metropolitan region would probably have to participate in the Councils of any regions in which their colonies were situated. Thus, for instance, Portugal and the Netherlands — in addition to the great colonial powers — would have to belong to more than one regional council. Certain states would, therefore, concern themselves with the affairs of more than one council, though with varying degrees of interest. In this way, the object of concentrating the efforts of states in areas in which they were principally concerned, would not be achieved, and an overlapping would be created, that would also tend to defeat the chief purpose of regional councils.

Summary.

Serious dangers to general security, while their occasion may arise within a region, are certain to involve territories and issues outside the particular region. If specific commitments to preserve the peace were confined to the elimination of dangers arising within any particular region, there would be little hope of developing a sense of responsibility for the general maintenance of security. On the other hand, regional security councils might play a limited role in finding a local solution to purely local disputes, such as border disputes between small countries.

B. Regional defence arrangements.

5. Whatever form the organization of security may take — and still more if the efforts to establish a general security system are unsuccessful — it is likely that there will be further developments after the war in the establishment of regional defence schemes. In modern conditions of warfare, it is impossible to provide effectively for national defence against attack by a powerful aggressor through arrangements covering only the territory of a single country. The defence of Canada depends on the defence of Newfoundland and Alaska as well as of the continental United States within the inner perimeter, and within an outer perimeter on the defence of more distant territories such as Greenland, Bermuda and the Hawaiian Islands. The Australian-New Zealand Agreement[7] has proposed the establishment of a "regional zone of defence" within "the framework of a general system of world security." The purpose is to make an attack from Asia less likely to succeed, by creating an outer ring of defence in the islands to the north under the sovereignty of the United States, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Portugal.

6. The direct purposes of regional defence planning are to act as a deterrent against aggression and reduce the danger of attack. The existence of effective regional defence plans would tend to support general security, through decreasing the chances of success in the event of aggression from outside, and thereby discouraging aggression. Regional defence, fundamentally military in character, presents an entirely different set of problems to the regional organization of security.

7. Regions for defence purposes would not in many cases correspond to any regions which might be established for the maintenance of security. The historic form of establishing regional defence has been through defensive alliances, or simply staff consultations. In modern conditions regional defence schemes require, at least in most areas, further arrangements covering access to and maintenance of bases and possibly joint exercises by the forces of the countries concerned.

The permanent Joint Board on Defence is an example of an agency adopted to provide for the defence of the North American region, even though no formal contractual arrangements that are binding in international law exist between Canada and the United States.

8. The maintenance of regional defence arrangements for the North American continent and their adoption in other areas which might be subject to attack are in the interests of Canada, and accord with its strategic position. Such arrangements, indeed, appear to be essential to solve the Canadian defence problems in Newfoundland, Labrador, Alaska and probably Greenland.

9. Such arrangements can readily be adapted to play their part in a world security system, through the opening of bases for the use of forces operating in accordance with the decisions of the general security organization. The establishment and maintenace of suitable bases in Canadian territory, and perhaps in Newfoundland, could be a partial discharge of the obligations of Canada for the maintenance of international security.

British and Foreign State Papers, Volume 145, 1943-1945. London, Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1953, pp. 530-9.

10. There are dangers in the regional organization of defence, but these are for the most part inevitable in any system. The largest partner in a regional defence scheme may be tempted to treat the whole region as a sphere of influence and may be intolerant of the rights of the smaller partners. If there is a strong difference of opinion on the military establishments required, or, on the nature of the danger to be feared — if, for instance, the United States should insist on organizing North American defence against a possible attack from Russia — grave political problems might confront the other partners, amounting even to a threat to their independence. These possibilities, however, spring more from the preponderant strength of the large power than from the existence of regional defence plans.

Summary.

Some regional defence arrangements do, in fact, exist, and others are probable. For instance, the U.S.S.R. already has a mutual defence pact with Czechoslovakia, and it is likely that a system of interlocking mutual defence pacts will be established on its borders. In the Pacific, there is the further example of the Australia-New Zealand Agreement, with its proposals for a regional scheme for defence. The employment of similar regional defence arrangements in the North American continent is to the advantage of Canada in the solution of its defence problems.

The characteristic of all such arrangements is that they are built around a particular strategic need. Regional defence arrangements, therefore, are practical and useful to meet certain strategic problems, defined in relation to dangers which might threaten a particular area. They differ fundamentally in function from regional security proposals. Though subject, like any other form of alliance, to abuse, they are capable of supplementing the general protection against aggression afforded by a world security organization.

REPRESENTATION OF SMALLER COUNTRIES ON WORLD SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. Churchill is quite likely to discuss with the other Prime Ministers the composition of the body intended to succeed the League Council. Those concerned with the planning of the world organization, whether in London, or in Moscow, or in Washington, seem to be contemplating an Assembly on which all states will be represented and a Council made up partly of permanent members and partly of non-permanent members with rotating membership.

There are a few points in this connection which often seem to be missed by representatives of large powers. It is not possible for one sovereign state to "represent" other sovereign states on an international body except in rare instances by special arrangement. It is unrealistic and undesirable that all states without permanent seats should have the same chance of selection for a non-permanent seat no matter what their size or importance may be; it may prove desirable to relate frequency of service on the Council to the size of contribution which would be based on capacity to pay and thus reflect the general importance of each state. It might be feasible to group states in categories of importance rather than by geographical areas although obviously distribution of non-permanent states must be related to geography.

Ad memoriam, the following information on the composition of the League Council in 1939 is relevant to this question. In January, 1939, there were 14 seats, with the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R. and France as permanent members. By the convention which had grown up as the result of years of diplomatic bargaining the non-permanent seats were divided as follows: three went to Latin-America, which then contained 11 Member States, two went to Asia with 6 Member States, one went to the "ex neutrals" of the last war with 6 Member States, one was held by the Little Entente with three Member States, three were divided among the 14 ungrouped members and one went to the six Member States from the British Commonwealth outside the United Kingdom. This was a most unsatisfactory system, especially from the point of view of British Commonwealth countries, each of which could only hope for a seat for one term every 18 years although all were fairly substantial and regular contributors to the budget.

If, therefore, suggestions should come up for the creation of a new Council, I should think it desirable for the Prime Minister to urge that some fairer system of distributing non-permanent seats than that followed in the League Council must be developed.

THE POST-WAR SETTLEMENT

MR. EDEN explained that the papers circulated under P.M.M. (44) 4[†] on a Future World Organisation had been prepared in the Foreign Office to facilitate discussion. No decisions had been taken on them by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, and they had not in fact yet been taken in the Cabinet, although they had been examined by a Committee of Ministers.

The United States Government had suggested that informal discussions of an exploratory and non-committal character, on the official level, should take place in Washington next month between representatives of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, the United States Government and the Soviet Government. No documents had yet been exchanged, but we were anxious to let the United States Government have, before these discussions took place, the papers now circulated, subject to such modifications as might result from discussion with the Dominion Prime Ministers, and we understood that the United States Government were likely to reciprocate with papers of their own on the same subjects. We were not yet aware of the intentions of the Russian Government.

During Mr. Stettinius's recent visit there had been discussions in general terms which had left the impression that the mind of the United States Government was moving very much on the lines of the papers now circulated by the Foreign Office. We did not, as yet, know what line the Soviet Government were likely to take, or, indeed, their attitude towards the proposed conversations, except that M. Molotov had indicated at an earlier stage that he thought the idea of conversations a good one. It was relevant that the original suggestion at Moscow for carrying the Four-Power Declaration further had come from the Russian side. He (Mr. Eden) had then supported it. Mr. Cordell Hull had been a little reluctant to commit himself to it at that stage, as he was not then certain of the attitude of Congress; but the latest information both from our Ambassador in Washington and from Mr. Stettinius was that Mr. Hull now felt that if agreement could be reached on general ideas about post-war organisation, and if, in the course of the late autumn, an announcement of a provisional character could in consequence be made, there was little chance of the Republicans going back on any such declaration, and that there would be a better chance of getting United States opinion behind it. It would be seen that the scheme set out in these papers embodied the best features of the old League organisation. We had aimed at laying down principles rather than elaborating rules or definitions. The fundamental conceptions which we believed were shared by the United States Government were a fully representative world Assembly and a small World Council the composition of which would have to be discussed, but the bases of which would be the three Great Powers (with, perhaps, China) who would have to carry out military decisions at the request of the World Council.

There were two points to which his League experience led him to attach considerable importance. In the first place, the proposed World Council, if it worked, was, he thought, a conception of great significance and importance. The Council of the League had worked very well — better indeed than any other organisation of the body. He had never regarded it as being unrepresentative. It was satisfactory from the Dominions point of view since it secured representation for them. It was easy to overdo the criticism based on South American representation on the Council, for, while South American members might not have made any positive contribution, at any rate they did no harm, and their presence there was not a handicap. It would be observed that Mr. Churchill, in his paper P.M.M. (44) 5† was in complete agreement with the idea that there should be such a Council, although in connection with it he had developed the idea of regional committees.

His second point was that if these arrangements for the future world organisation were to work, they must have the necessary force behind them. If that force was lacking, they could not work. The big failures of the League of Nations were due to the lack of force — possibly to some extent to the lack of the will to use force. The absence of the United States was, of course, also a very relevant factor. The co-ordination of military forces to be placed at the disposal of the World Council was an important point which would have to be carefully worked out.

The scheme ensured that the burden of supplying forces to give effect to or provide backing for the decisions of the World Council would be widely distributed. Any organisation of this nature, if it was to live, must have the confidence of the small Powers, and he thought it would have that confidence in proportion as the small Powers contributed to the working of the organisation.

The functional Committees proposed in the scheme contained in P.M.M. (44) 4 were also important. They would play their part in conjunction with the political organisation.

The only other point on which he wished again to touch, since it was not perhaps sufficiently clearly brought out in the papers, was that we were still at a stage in which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom had reached no final decision about the details of the organisation suggested, although they were entirely settled in their minds that they wanted a world organisation. As he had already explained, what they had in view was conversations between officials in Washington in June. Our representatives would be headed by an official of very high standing, probably Sir Alexander Cadogan. Discussions would be non-committal, but if they were successful and the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States and Russia were able, as a result of them, to come close enough to agreement, then something might be put out as a scheme in the late summer, before the American Elections.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had not yet had time to study these important papers, which had only just reached him, but that on such consideration as he had been able to give them, the approach embodied in them seemed to be excellent. He wished to express appreciation of the care with which the Foreign Office paper had been prepared, and also of the tentative manner in which some of the proposals embodied in them had been put forward. Speaking generally, this document gave a sound basis on which to work. He would not like to be regarded as committed to any special features, for he had had insufficient time to consider the papers. He thought, however, that the main features would be generally satisfactory to Canadian opinion, and would be accepted by it pretty fully. He agreed that there would be advantage in further exploratory discussions at Washington next month.

In reply to a question by MR. EDEN as to whether, on the matter of tactics, he agreed with Lord Halifax and Mr. Stettinius that there would be advantage in some announcement before the American elections, MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he thought this would depend on how far the Republicans agreed to make the matter one of common policy. In the last Election the President had been fortunate in having agreement on foreign policy with Mr. Willkie. If a similar agreement could now be reached with the Republican candidates, there was everything to be said for it, but it was very difficult to say what the attitude of the Republicans would be. Mr. Willkie had earned great praise and considerable support as the result of supporting the President on foreign policy in the last Election campaign; and failure on the part of the Republican Party to take a similar line now might be turned to their disadvantage.

MR. CURTIN asked Mr. Churchill what was the nature of the Regional Council for Asia which he had in view, and whether its limits would be continental, or would be the boundaries of the Pacific world. The Dominions inevitably took a more active interest in certain regions of particular geographical and strategical concern to them than in the world at large. It would be presumptuous, he felt, for them to expect to have a decisive voice in the handling by the United Kingdom Government of the problems of Europe. On the other hand, there were practical problems in the Pacific on which, because of Australian familiarity with that area, he felt that the Commonwealth might be better able to advise than the advisers immediately available to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom.

MR. CHURCHILL said that he had an entirely open mind as to whether the body which he had tentatively suggested as a Council of Asia should be called the Council of Asia or the Council of the Pacific. Russia and India were both great nations in Asia. In his conception all the Dominions which had an interest in the area, and also the United Kingdom because of her interests in Asia, would be represented in the Council, and a substantial bloc would thus result. The Dutch and the French must be associated with it. As regards the Pacific islands, the United States, after their lavish expenditure of money in connection with the war, would expect their strategic position and security in the Pacific to be adequately safeguarded. He felt, himself, that if they captured individual islands which hitherto had been in the possession of the Japanese, there was no reason why, by arrangement, they should not hoist their own flag over them. It might well be that we should see a position in which a number of islands would be under a world body with varying classes of trusteeships, assigned to different States. The principle of bases going under the safeguard of the United Nations and thereafter held by a particular nation under one flag or another with a variety of arrangements for local dispositions was an important one.

MR. MACKENZIE KING drew attention to the importance of the part played by geography in finally deciding what should be done and how best it could be done. Canada was next door to the United States, and the result was that during the present war, when a common peril faced them, defence arrangements had become very closely interlocked. The Canadian Government had in fact, established a permanent Joint War and Defence Board with the United States. The use of the word "permanent" was significant in relation to the discussion that was now taking place. He felt little doubt himself, that this Board would remain in existence after the war. Certainly Canada was anxious in present circumstances that it should do so. The two nations did their share in preventing the enemy from crossing each other's territories. For that reason, it might perhaps be possible to work out a stronger combination if we were careful not to make anything exclusive. Canada was able to bring the United States into co-operation with us as part of the British Commonwealth. The United States, on the other hand, were happy to have the British Commonwealth playing its part in the Pacific. It would be unwise in our ideas for a world organisation to over-emphasize the idea of a bloc and it might be wiser to concentrate on how the most effective co-operation could be worked out.

MR. CHURCHILL said that the first difficulty which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom had to face was that they were under continual pressure in Parliament for their answer to the world problem, and that it was not possible to postpone an answer indefinitely, though he recognised the force of the point that had been taken as regards consultation by the Dominion Prime Ministers with their Governments. Secondly, we could not take our stand entirely on generalities or expressions of goodwill — something more positive would be demanded here as well as for the forthcoming conversations in Washington. He had hoped himself that before this most important meeting, on which the eyes of the world were fixed, broke up we might be able to reach some general degree of tentative agreement among ourselves.

As regards the position of Europe, this was the storm centre, the place where the weather came from. It was essential, therefore, to take the greatest pains to make satisfactory arrangements for handling its problems, and, in particular, to give some life to the area west of a line running south from the Curzon Line to the Black Sea. If no provision was made for Europe we run tremendous risks. He wished in that connection to touch on the interesting and important suggestion which Field-Marshal Smuts had made at an earlier meeting, that Holland, Belgium and perhaps the Scandinavian Powers might be more closely associated with the United Kingdom. He had thought about that, but in the outcome he did not see how we could undertake such a responsibility. The fact that we were an island had saved us in the past; if we had to maintain a continental foothold, we would need a great standing army, which the people of this country would not be willing to maintain. He felt little doubt that the Dominion Prime Ministers would find themselves confronted with a similar reaction if there were in their country to be a demand for maintaining a substantial standing army for general security purposes. He could not ignore the probability that the United States Government would be under strong and continuous pressure from America to withdraw troops from Europe, and that after one Presidential election we might find there were no United States troops left in that continent. It was in those circumstances that he felt that one of our endeavours must be to build some entity in Europe and to give a sense of self-preservation to the countries of that continent. It must be remembered that at Tehran both Russia and the United States had been strongly in favour of the dismemberment of Germany.

Continuing, MR. CHURCHILL said that he attached the greatest importance to the three Great Armed Powers acting as a Peace Executive or Steering Committee. That was the essential difference between the scheme of the League of Nations and the present scheme, and the establishment of this Committee was the real remedy for the weakness that had proved fatal to the otherwise well thought-out scheme of the League. Regional arrangements were of relatively secondary importance as compared with it, though he did attach great importance to regional arrangements. As for the division of responsibilities between the European Regional Council and the World Council, he thought some subjects would have to go before both. In a particular case he could conceive that the European Council, where it felt that there was a threat to peace which had come to its notice in Europe, would proceed to lay the case before the Supreme Peace Executive of the World Council. By the World Council, facts would be established, action taken and warning issued. If that warning was disregarded orders would be given to the States of the world to call up the forces which they were under obligation to provide against the offender. Once that great machine was set in motion, with the power at its disposal, he felt that there was little danger that a larger State would persist in action likely to lead to the breaking of the peace.

He had already make it clear that, under the World Peace Executive or World Council, he contemplated a World Assembly of which all States, other than the guilty States who had been responsible for and defeated in the war, would be members. That Assembly might perhaps establish sub-committees for the studying of the interests of particular regions.

What derogation from national sovereignty would be involved? In his scheme the only derogation was for the prevention of war. The scheme entrusted responsibility for preventing war to the three Great Powers at the top. But there was no question of the World Council, which those Powers composed, interfering with the internal affairs of any countries in the world or with their relations with one another, save only to such extent as those relations might threaten world peace. There would be no need, for instance, for treaties between countries, subject always to that reservation, to come before the World Council, and it was only if the World Council had reason to believe that a particular treaty or a particular action had in view, or was likely to constitute, a threat to world peace that there would be any question of its moving.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the more he thought of the Regional Councils and the World Council the more he thought that very careful further consideration of this concept would be called for. He quite accepted the special position of Europe as Mr. Churchill had defined it. But the emphasis, if there was to be a Regional Council as well as a World Council, ought to be very strongly on the World Council, and anything done on the Regional Council ought beyond question to emanate from the larger World Council. If we began to build on the foundations of the Regional Council there was a real risk, that we should develop a regional feeling. Elements of public opinion in the United States and Canada would welcome a Regional Council for the Americas and Regional Councils for the other parts of the world, since they would construe such an arrangement as meaning that the Americas were safe and that they were rid of Europe and Asia and their problems. Nevertheless, he still felt that Regional Councils would serve a very good purpose, but the emphasis must be on the world organisation.

MR. FRASER thought that Mr. Churchill's suggestion for regional sub-committees of the World Assembly for studies of the interests of particular regions might well be the solution.

MR. BEVIN suggested the taking of power to establish regional bodies which would have responsibility delegated to them, and the letting of these regional bodies grow by experience. They might well grow into something of value, but the main constructive power should remain with the central organisation.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS thought that the real point was, as Mr. Churchill had said, the Steering Committee of the three Great Allied Powers, and that the regional aspect was secondary.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he assumed that by the three Great Allied Powers Mr. Churchill had in view the three Great Powers established during the war. During the war they in the Dominions had all accepted the leadership of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and of President Roosevelt. Would the World Council be composed of those countries or of something wider? Would the United Kingdom or the British Commonwealth be the member? That raised a very big question.

On the matters that had been under discussion at this meeting, he felt himself that what was needed was the view of Dominion Cabinets rather than of Dominion Prime Ministers. To-day's discussion had brought out very well the issues involved. He thought that the wise course would be to take them up as soon as might be for consideration by Dominion Cabinets, and that the timetable for the Washington talks would enable this to be done.

MR. FRASER felt that if His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom were pressed in Parliament they could give the tentative opinion which United Kingdom Ministers had formed on the world organisation.

MR. CHURCHILL said that on the point taken by Mr. Mackenzie King, it would be a very serious thing if we could not be united when it came to the point. We must take some part in the arrangements designed to prevent the recurrence of wars, and he hoped that we would be able to agree on that. That was why he had been so concerned to keep the World Council a small body with the simplest possible composition. He suggested that in any event before the meeting of Dominion Prime Ministers concluded its deliberations, it would be desirable that the terms of some parting statement to cover the work that had been done should be considered. Immense attention was centred on these discussions; the meeting of Prime Ministers from so many parts of the world was the subject of the admiration and the watchful attention of the nations. A document should, he felt, issue which, while guarded and in general terms, should contain something of leadership.

MR. MACKENZIE KING entirely agreed and suggested that drafts should at once be prepared which could be considered by the Conference before it broke up. He was anxious that as long a time as possible should be given to the Dominion Prime Ministers to consider the draft in advance.

MR. CURTIN said he too agreed, and suggested that there might be formulated a consensus view of the observations previously made during the session. So far as the world organisation was concerned he still felt that we should be careful not to take a line that might lead to misunderstanding on the part of Russia. The wise course would be to formulate a statement of principles which could be adopted by this Conference, leaving the machinery of the world organisation to be worked out separately.

P.M.M. (44) 12th Meeting [London,] May 11, 1944

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX

THE POST-WAR SETTLEMENT

A preliminary discussion took place on the position in regard to the forthcoming discussions at Washington on world organisation. MR. EDEN explained that the invitation to take part in those discussions had come from the United States, and that we were committed to an exchange of memoranda with them on the five main topics enumerated in paragraph 3 of the covering note to P.M.M. (44)4.†

Those discussions would be entirely informal and non-committal. The papers appended to P.M.M. (44)4 would, subject to the views of the Dominion Prime Ministers, be used as background and, in effect, the discussions would represent a preliminary study by experts from the United States, which we knew was anxious to proceed on these lines, from the United Kingdom, and from Russia. While the Russian attitude towards the discussions had not yet been fully ascertained, they had sent a friendly reply to the suggestion that they should take place. If, as the outcome of those discussions, it proved that there was a sufficient basis on which it looked as though progress could be made, subject to the views of the Governments concerned and, in our case, of the Dominion Governments, there might then be advantage in publishing the provisional outline of a preliminary plan in the early autumn. The argument for such publication in advance of the American presidential elections was that the Republican Party might accept the scheme or at any rate let it pass without critical comment. In either event, they would be unlikely to repudiate or oppose it at a later date. They might well in any case be reluctant publically to oppose a scheme for which, in principle, there was so much support in public opinion in the United States. On the information available to us there should be a good chance in such circumstances of support from United States opinion generally. It was, he agreed, arguable that at a time when military operations of first-class importance impended and the future of the world was still in doubt, it would be better to postpone examination of these matters. On the other hand, public interest in them was great and the counter-balancing arguments for these preliminary and exploratory studies was a very strong one.

MR. CHURCHILL said that, while conscious of the arguments that could be used against the proposed discussion at the present stage, he saw no objection, himself, to exploratory and non-committal discussions at the expert level such as were in view.

MR. FRASER reminded the Meeting that he had suggested that it would be of assistance to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, in considering the instructions to be given to the United Kingdom delegation to the proposed discussions in Washington if the Dominion Prime Ministers recorded in writing, for the benefit of the Meeting, their views on the documents that had been circulated, and suggested that the papers that had been prepared by the Prime Minister of Canada and by himself might be communicated to the Meeting. This was agreed.

MR. MACKENZIE KING then read to the Meeting the paper which is appended to these minutes as Appendix I, in the course of which he made it clear that he was not in a position to express the views of the Canadian Government on proposals so important as those contained in the Foreign Office memoranda on Future World Organisation (P.M.M. (44)4) without consultation with his Government, but regarded that paper as a very useful and practical preparation for the proposed Washington discussions.

The problem of world security must be met boldly, and we must have some form of World Council and Assembly such as was proposed in these memoranda. Canada as a Power of middle size fully recognised the necessity of ensuring that power and responsibility should correspond. The United Kingdom, the United States, the Soviet, and for special reasons that the Foreign Secretary had mentioned, China, had a right and duty to a special and permanent place in the World Council.

On the other hand, he did not think that representation on the World Peace Council for the "British Commonwealth and Empire" as such, was feasible or really desirable. United Kingdom representation, on the other hand, was indispensable. He was not impressed by the arguments against confining such representation to the United Kingdom, and agreed that her strength had always been in her "alliance potential," which she was able to command when her policy was such that her interests were those of her allies. Her most faithful allies in the past two wars had been the other nations of the Commonwealth. Nor need it be feared that Great Britain would fail to give due consideration to the interests of other nations of the Commonwealth, for she would want their continuing support. The method of procedure for establishing a world organisation outlined in Memorandum attached to P.M.M. (44)4 seemed to him to indicate the right method of approach. While he could not commit the Canadian Government in any way to approval of proposals to which they would wish to give most careful study, he could say that it was the belief of the Canadian Government that a strong world organisation must be established. These proposals provided a splendid basis in the formulation of plans for such an organisation. He trusted that, as in the case of the Moscow Declaration, the Canadian Government would be able to make some constructive contribution to the more important Declaration which was now to be drawn up.

MR. CHURCHILL paid a tribute to the very valuable statement which had been made by Mr. Mackenzie King, which he would like to study at greater leisure. He suggested that it should at once be made available to all those present at the Meeting. He attached the greatest importance first to the establishment of a world organisation composed of the Three Great Powers, possibly with the addition of China; and second, to the functions of that organisation being strictly limited to the prevention of war. That was where power joined with responsibility, in the telling phrase that had just been used by Mr. Mackenzie King, would be achieved. It was in the World Council, composed of the Three Great Powers, and in the world organisation, that this supreme objective of preventing for the second time the sowing of the seeds of war all over the world would be achieved. The Council would be an executive body. It would not derogate in any respect from the national sovereignty of the countries of the world, save to the extent that was inherent in the prevention of war, or of such functional arrangements as might be the subject of agreement between various countries.

He had not attempted to solve the problem of how the British Empire should be represented on the top body of the World Council. Of course, the United Kingdom must be represented there. He did not know how much authority the Dominions would be prepared to entrust the United Kingdom to represent their views on that body. It went without saying that the closest consultation at all times would be essential with the Dominions on the matters likely to come before it. But he felt sure that the case for keeping the size of the supreme body, the World Council, as small as possible was a decisive one. If all the nations of the Commonwealth were separately represented on it, claims from other nationalities and, in particular, from the sixteen States of the U.S.S.R., would multiply and would be pressed. It followed thus that the United Kingdom, though in touch always with the Dominions or operating on some token system which would enable her to speak for the British Commonwealth and Empire, would have to take her place in the Council alone.

We should remember, however, that the United Kingdom, solely in her own right and as a single unit, would carry nothing like the same weight as the British Commonwealth and Empire as a whole. Moreover, the United Kingdom in the post-war period would be much poorer than the United States, and much weaker than Russia. For those reasons there would be obvious advantages if the United Kingdom were to be in a position to speak on the World Council for all the Dominions, of course, after the closest consultation with them.

Action at the highest level, and so in the World Council, would be action on the very greatest issues, and could only be taken after the fullest consultation with the Dominions. Moreover, war did not come without warning. Its imminence could be foreseen many years ahead. Before any decisive action was taken, it would be possible for the United Kingdom and the nations of the Commonwealth to communicate by telegraph and see if the Dominions were agreeable to the Three Great Powers in the World Council taking a particular line.

He recognised that on occasion there might be one, or even more than one, member of the Commonwealth who might not wish to be associated with what was taking place. That difficulty, if it arose, could be announced quite frankly. Might it not be better that we should on occasion announce that there were certain nations in the Commonwealth who wished to stand aside, rather than that we should forgo for ever the advantage of our composite strength?

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that there were many parallels between what was now being considered in this Meeting on world organisation and the arrangements under which in practice the war was conducted within the Commonwealth. The British Commonwealth recognised that Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt were in effect directing the war, in association with Marshal Stalin and in certain circumstances with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. There was never any question of any step taken by them not being fully accepted by the Dominions. The Dominions had not felt left out in any way throughout the war. On the other hand, each Dominion Government had to face its own Parliament. Each Dominion Government was pressed to assert the right of that Dominion to direct the war, to take a decisive part in its strategy and the like. The difficulties of doing so were, of course, only too present to those in the Dominions on whom responsibility rested. The Dominions had come together at the present Meeting to prevent and not to make difficulties. Throughout the war they had been in full consultation day by day with His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and they were entirely satisfied with the working arrangements.

He wished, however, to add that there were two important considerations. The first was the matter of personalities. Mr. Churchill, if he might be allowed to say so, and President Roosevelt, were two very exceptional persons. We were now engaged in building an organisation for the future, and the question of the personalities at the head of the Government of the United Kingdom and of the United States was a very material one, which could not be left out of account. Secondly, we should be wise to take extreme care to ensure that whatever was done should not appear to the world as an effort to make three or four Great Powers the controllers of the world's destinies. It was so easy for misunderstanding to arise on that point. Appearances were often worse than realities and if other nations (he was not speaking of the Dominions, who appreciated the position) construed action that was being taken as the taking away of their rights or of their sovereignty, the danger would be great.

MR. CHURCHILL said that he entirely agreed as to the importance of this point. Our object, of course, was to establish an organisation which would prevent war and not one that would control the world. The League of Nations had tried to found world peace on the basis of disarmament. The result was that the wicked had armed and the good had disarmed or let their armaments rust, so that when the crisis was reached there was no force behind the League of Nations. Under the arrangements which he had in view, the World Council, if it did not fail in its duty, would be in a position at a very early stage to intercept and check any threat to the peace of the world. It was because of possible misunderstandings that he was, in particular, anxious to limit the functions of Excalibur (for the world organisation must have a sword to be used if action made that necessary) strictly to what was necessary for the prevention of war or of any threat to peace.

MR. EDEN suggested that the reasons for the failure of the League of Nations in 1935 and 1936 to take action against Germany had lain not so much in any inherent weakness in the League organisation as in the lack of unity of policy and determination of purpose on the part of the Great Powers towards Germany.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that the point raised by Mr. Mackenzie King was of very great importance. It was, as he understood it, that Great Britain should be a member of the World Council in her capacity as Great Britain, and not as the representative of the Commonwealth. Undoubtedly, an arrangement of that character would ease the position constitutionally, so far as the nations of the Commonwealth were concerned. It met the parliamentary difficulties that otherwise arose at once in connexion with any Conference or discussion, as to the attitude towards it of the Dominion Government in question. Those were difficulties that could not be prevented, given the fact that the Governments and Parliaments of the Dominions were independent bodies. Surely the present plan was the better one? Great Britain would be a member of the Central Council in its capacity as Great Britain, but in alliance — so to speak — with a number of smaller Commonwealth Powers; the United Kingdom would be responsible for putting forward views that would in fact always be consonant with the views of those Allies, unhampered by having at each step to secure their formal adherence, but able to go forward on particular issues with a greater feeling of confidence because she was speaking in her own capacity and not as the mouthpiece of the nations of the Commonwealth.

There was a close resemblance in practice between that situation and the practical situation which already existed over the fighting of the war. The Dominions had not been formally consulted before Great Britain declared war on Germany. But they had been kept in the closest touch all through the preliminary period and so were in a position to reach their own decisions without the least delay, once Britain had made up her mind. The whole diplomacy, he thought, would be much easier under the arrangement suggested by Mr. Mackenzie King, on the understanding of course, that the United Kingdom Government played the game, consulted the Dominions in advance, and kept them in step.

MR. MACKENZIE KING remarked that he agreed that the practical question was whether the United Kingdom knew the attitude of the Dominion Governments. If it did it saved unnecessary discussion, while it might be taken for granted that no Dominion would take exception to the decision the United Kingdom might feel bound to take in a particular case.

MR. CURTIN said that anything he might say would represent his personal view and not the view of his Government which he had not, of course, been able to consult. While he was impressed by Mr. Mackenzie King's argument, he felt that the other side to it should not be overlooked. Great Britain, if she sat in the World Council in her own capacity, would have the lowest status of the Three Great Powers in that Council. Surely that was just what we wanted to avoid?

At the moment, he greatly admired the documents that had been circulated by Mr. Eden in P.M.M. (44)4, and the spirit in which they had been circulated as the outline of what could most easily form a suitable approach for the British representatives in the Conference at Washington with Russia and the United States which might lead up to a statement in the autumn to the general public as to world organisation.

The major issue which the meeting was now discussing was however not the use to be made of those papers but the question whether His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom should speak on its own behalf or on behalf of the British Commonwealth in the proposed World Council. That was a separate issue which might perhaps admit of being dealt with separately.

MR. FRASER thought that there was much to be said for making no change. Could we, in fact, better the existing arrangements in practice? The United Kingdom, thanks to its close liaison with the Dominions, was in a position to interpret their minds, and to use its own judgment with that knowledge as a background. Could that be improved upon? He agreed that if separate representation was claimed for the Dominions, a similar claim would be put forward by the component States of the U.S.S.R. Surely the matter was really one of adjustment among ourselves and not one that could wisely be embodied in a new constitution or formula?

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS referred to the question of what instructions should be given by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to their representatives in the proposed informal talks in Washington. He would himself approve the papers that had been circulated by Mr. Eden in P.M.M. (44)4, adjusted to carry the emphasis which had been brought out by Mr. Churchill in the paper which he had circulated as P.M.M. (44)5. He thought the directive prepared by officials which had been circulated to the Meeting under P.M.M. (44)7† was a good summary of the situation, and he would be prepared to support it as it stood. He assumed that the four points taken in it would be the instructions to the United Kingdom delegates at the forthcoming discussions.

Terms of Draft Directive circulated under P.M.M. (44)7†

The Meeting then briefly discussed the terms of the draft directive for the United Kingdom representatives at the Washington discussions which had been circulated under P.M.M. (44)7. On (2) of that directive MR. CURTIN suggested that the words " possess and be prepared to use"[9] were perhaps open to misconstruction. How was the central organisation to "possess" this power? Was it to have an international force? If so, was that force to be the result of certain allocations by individual nations to the central organisation; and was that organisation to have the power to use the force so allocated without reference to the constituent elements? So far as Australia was concerned it would not be possible to use forces made available by her anywhere without the approval of the Australian Government. He could not support paragraph 2 of the directive without knowing a good deal more about it. MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had taken the content of paragraph 2 as a statement of principle, the working out of that principle being left over for subsequent consideration.

After discussion it was agreed that for the words "should possess and be prepared to use" there should be substituted the words "should have at its disposal."

[9]Le paragraphe 2 de la directive se lisait comme suit:
Paragraph 2 of the directive was as follows:

> "It is essential that the central organization should possess and be prepared to use adequate force for this purpose [the maintenance of peace and security on the basis of the continued collaboration of the United States, the U.S.S.R. (and possibly China) with the British Commonwealth]".

On (3) of the directive[10] MR. FRASER suggested that the world organisation would have power to allocate special duties to regional bodies where there is an obvious advantage in the "limitation of the sphere of action" (P.M.M. (44)4: page 6). The right of appeal of a member of the world organisation should at all times remain intact.

MR. CURTIN thought that we should not go so far as the regional organisation, but agreed after discussion to accept this paragraph subject to the omission of the word "political" where it occurred and to Mr. Mackenzie King's suggestion that "could" should be substituted for "should."

In general, Mr. Curtin said that he preferred the full document prepared by the Foreign Office and circulated as P.M.M. (44)4 to the directive contained in P.M.M. (44)7.

MR. EDEN suggested that instead of using the directive the full Foreign Office document should be adopted as the basis of the instructions to the United Kingdom representatives in the Washington conversations, subject to the emphasis brought out by Mr. Churchill in the paper which he had circulated to the Meeting as P.M.M. (44) 5.

MR. CURTIN said that he agreed personally in regarding the basis outlined by Mr. Eden in P.M.M. (44)4 as a satisfactory approach to the forthcoming discussions so far as Australia was concerned. But the Australian Government had not seen the document. There was ample time for it to be made available to them either in paraphrase or by air mail so that they could give their considered views on it. He could not be certain that there would be unanimity. He supported the Foreign Office paper, subject to the reservations stated in it, and noted that it contemplated that if a measure of agreement was reached at Washington which could find expression in a draft declaration, the draft of that declaration and the progress of the Washington talks would be the subject of further consultation between British Commonwealth Governments before any such declaration was published.

MR. FRASER said that on the 16th July, 1936, the Government of New Zealand had informed the League that she was prepared "to agree to the institution of an international force under the control of the League or to the allocation to the League of a definite proportion of the armed forces of its members to the extent, if desired, of the whole of those forces — land, sea, and air." To that view his Government adhered. They felt certain that without force behind it, no international organisation could achieve its purpose. He had embodied his general views on the future world organisation in a note which he trusted would be of assistance to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom in formulating instructions to their representatives.

[10]Le paragraphe 3 de la directive se lisait comme suit:
Paragraph 3 of the directive was as follows:

"Regional political organisations should be constituted under the aegis of a world political organisation. Their exact functions might differ as between region and region."

MR. FRASER then read to the Meeting the note which is appended to these minutes as Appendix II† from which it appeared that, on a first reading, he considered that the papers produced by the Foreign Office and circulated under P.M.M. (44)4 constituted a valuable contribution to discussion, and agreed with many of its basic conceptions, but reserved the right to send in further comments. On the proposals that had separately been mentioned to the Conference by Mr. Churchill he had also a number of comments to make. He was doubtful, in particular, of the wisdom of basing representation of the smaller Powers on the World Council on the division of the world into Regions; he was anxious that the reservation concerning the nationality of States eligible for representation on a World Council should not exclude the British Dominions; he felt that the placing, as had been suggested, of a much greater degree of responsibility for preserving peace on the Regional Council rather than the World Council could be harmful, and was of opinion that objections would be found to a division into Regions being made the basis of collective action for the preservation of peace and the settlement of international disputes. He cordially endorsed Mr. Churchill's suggestion for a union of a world-wide brotherhood of the British peoples and for fraternal association with the United States. As regards the suggestion for a United States of Europe, he regarded this as a special problem which could better be approached, as opportunity offered, over a long period of time, and as a broad issue. If we raised it now, it might stimulate fundamental objections towards the acceptance of a world organisation on the broadest basis.

He was not, however, against a United States of Europe. If it was feasible and could be brought about it would probably go further than anything to establish world peace, and he felt that an arrangement of this nature would be very much better than asking the European countries to join the British Commonwealth.

MR. CHURCHILL said that he agreed that the United States of Europe was an ideal that could only be achieved after years of patient study. We had to bear in mind that in the post-war period there would be a vastly powerful Russian State in the East of Europe and in the West of Europe the United Kingdom, and between them there would be a litter of broken States, disarmed and smarting from their wounds. It was most important that we should restore the self-respect of those States and enable them to build a structure which would associate them with one another and would help them to efface past discords. The obvious advantages of such association were great. On the other hand, if we did nothing in that way for the peoples of Europe, and they continued to tear each other to pieces in devastating struggles, the United Kingdom, anxious as it might be to stand outside such struggles, would, beyond question, find herself involved in them, and that would be equally true of the Dominions. He agreed entirely that however strong might be our admiration and our liking for the Dutch and other nations, we could not become responsible for defending large areas of the Continent, as we should have to, were they to be taken inside our British system. To do so would be to condemn our people to the maintenance of a vast standing army which they would never be prepared to contemplate.

MR. CHURCHILL proceeded that he had learnt an immense amount from the discussion that had taken place, which had, he thought, been most useful. In the light of it he would prefer to withdraw the Paper which he had circulated as P.M.M. (44) 5, for he felt that the suggestions which had been put in that Paper had now served their purpose of stimulating and focussing a discussion. His views remained unchanged in essentials. But they could, he felt, be stated in a more mature form in the light of the discussion that had taken place.

Equally the Foreign Office papers circulated under P.M.M. (44)4 might be re-examined from the point of view of emphasis. There were some points on which obviously no decision could be reached in the present meeting, and on which some difference of view existed. The Foreign Office papers might be re-cast so as to show the alternative solutions to particular problems, and be drawn in more non-committal terms. That would enable each individual Dominion Parliament to consider them in complete freedom. They would, in their new form, be merely a statement of the case, but with a statement of the difficulties which would confront us at every stage and the alternative solutions to them. That document, after it had been seen by Dominion Governments, to whom it could be despatched by air, could be taken to the International Conference at Washington and used as a guide for our representatives in the discussion there. As a guide, not as a rule, and of course on the understanding that those discussions and the outcome of them were ad referendum.

MR. CHURCHILL referred again to some of the governing ideas which had influenced his thought on this whole range of questions. The combination of the three Powers strongest in arms at the end of the war; trustees for the peace (at any rate until the end of the transitional period, and the worst of the horrors of war had been left behind); vested with ample power; knit together for all purposes other than war; all this appealed to him profoundly. In building up our re-constituted Europe we could not overlook the possibility that, at a very early date, perhaps less than 5 years from the end of the war, whatever Germany resulted from the Treaty of Peace would come to play her part in it. He was perturbed at the thought of a chaos of ruined States lying between the United Kingdom and Russia. He wanted something more human and natural than a sledgehammer to guide them on the right lines and to rebuild that Europe, united in policy and outlook, which had contributed so immensely at one time or other to the fate of the world and to its progress. But with this reconstruction Russia must be associated. At the last Peace Conference he had urged that the Russian problem had not been faced. If we took no pains to take Russia and her position into account now, we should be laying the foundations of another world war in a generation's time.

MR. EDEN said that as regards the suggestion of a United States of Europe, surely the first step would be to talk to the Russians about it and make sure that there was no feeling in their minds that it might be directed against them? MR. CHURCHILL said that he entirely agreed.

MR. CHURCHILL, in conclusion, said that he trusted that the Meeting of Dominion Prime Ministers, before it finally broke up, would feel able to issue a public statement, and offered to suggest a draft for their consideration. It was important to reaffirm our belief in world order, our desire to co-operate with and serve other nations; our joy in being joined in fighting side by side with our great Allies, the United States and Russia; our hope for a continuation of our Association with them; our sympathy for the shattered countries; our firm resolve to prosecute the war to a victorious conclusion. We might possibly touch lightly on one or two of the more important topics that had been under discussion. If consideration of this proposed statement could be concluded on Monday night, arrangements could be made to issue the Declaration immediately after the final session of the meeting at noon on Tuesday.[11]

The meeting expressed complete agreement with the course suggested by Mr. Churchill and agreed that he should prepare a draft of a Declaration. The point was taken that if any reference were included to specific topics it should be in the most general terms and carefully safeguarded, in the interests of avoiding interpellations in Dominion Parliaments as to what had passed in confidential sessions.

APPENDIX I

STATEMENT MADE BY THE RIGHT HON. W. MACKENZIE KING, PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA, TO THE MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS HELD AT 10 DOWNING STREET, S.W. 1, ON 11TH MAY, 1944.

THE Canadian Government in company with the other Commonwealth Governments has endorsed the Moscow Declaration. We welcomed the suggestion of the United Kingdom Government for an exchange of views on the implementation of the principles in paragraph 4 of the Declaration because we believed that it was of urgent importance to secure early agreement among both large and small Powers on the fundamental nature of a world security system. At the same time, we pointed out that the majority of the United Nations were still members of the League of Nations and would, therefore, have to relate their position under any new security organisation to the League Covenant. Now that we are seriously considering a new world security organisation, I think that an exchange of views among the Commonwealth Governments on the steps to be taken in winding up the organisation of the old League and transferring its continuing functions to the new body would be in order.

The memoranda on Future World Organisation (P.M.M. (44)4) submitted by the United Kingdom Government is, [sic] I believe, a very useful and practical preparation for the discussions which will shortly take place in Washington. They will, I know, be examined with great interest and sympathy by the Canadian Government which has been devoting a good deal of attention to these problems.

[11]Voir aussi le document 765./See also Document 765.

I need not say that I cannot give you the views of the Canadian Government on proposals of such importance until after I have had an opportunity of considering them with the care they deserve, in consultation with my colleagues. This I shall do at the first opportunity.

For the purposes of this meeting, however, I take it you would like to have our own preliminary observations on the proposals which have been put before us. The paper circulated by the United Kingdom Government strikes me as a forward-looking document. The problem of world security must be met boldly. We must have some form of World Council and Assembly such as is proposed in this document. Canada, as a Power of middle size, fully recognises the necessity of ensuring that power and responsibility should correspond. We recognise the right and the duty of the United Kingdom, the United States, the Soviet Union, and (for the special reasons Mr. Eden has mentioned) China to a special and permanent place in the World Council because upon them there will fall the major responsibility for world security. The United Kingdom has a particular right to such a role of leadership and responsibility because of her long experience, her world-wide interests, her moral leadership and her military power.

At the same time, I am glad to note that these memoranda recognise the necessity of securing the loyal and active co-operation of other and lesser States. Unless they have the voice to which they are entitled by the contributions they can make to world security and prosperity, they cannot be expected to discharge their appropriate responsibilities. They must be assured that they can bring their cases before the World Assembly or World Council and not feel that settlements by the Great Powers will be made arbitrarily at their expense. The question of representation on the organs of the World Security organisation is, as the memoranda note, a difficult one.

We agree with the view, expressed in paragraph 28 of Memorandum A attached to P.M.M. (44)4, that any system of representation must recognise the very great differences between States other than the four Powers.

Just as we are prepared to recognise the great difference in power and responsibility between Canada and the Soviet Union, for example, we should expect some recognition of the considerable difference between Canada and Panama. Although the special responsibility of the four Great Powers for maintaining political security must be recognised, nevertheless an effort should be made to give the smaller Powers a larger share in the direction of the many functional organisations which will be set up, possibly under the direction of the World Council. Norway, for example, would not expect to assume an important position in the security organisation, but she would certainly be entitled to a special voice on any body dealing with shipping. By recognition of this functional principle of representation, we can retain 4-Power leadership in achieving security, but avoid a too rigid adherence to the 4-Power principle, which might not be in the best interests of a co-operative world order.

The question of regionalism is one that must be approached with caution. This war has made it clear that countries can secure their own immediate defences only in co-operation with friendly neighbours. This principle is the basis of the Permanent Joint Defence Board, which was established in 1940 between Canada and the United States, and it is, I believe, the basis of the very fruitful proposals recently made in the agreement between Australia and New Zealand. Another interesting example of the possibilities of international regional co-operation is the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission, whose work was described by the Colonial Secretary the other day. We should not forget, however, that a major lesson of this war is the truth that the seas do not divide and that the peace and prosperity of the world are indivisible. It would not be wise to encourage the peoples of the world to return to their illusions about their ability to live in continental isolation. I am glad to see, therefore, the view expressed in these papers that the World Organisation should be established first, and that regional associations for special purposes might develop out of the particular necessities of particular areas, and should be fitted into the overall framework of world security.

In this connection I should like to make one or two observations, on the brief but very impressive note[12] which Mr. Churchill has circulated on the memoranda presented for our consideration. Mr. Churchill has suggest that the "British Empire and Commonwealth" should be one of the members of the World Peace Council. I think that we should consider the questions of representation which this would raise. The United States, the Soviet Union, and China are unitary States, but the "Commonwealth and Empire" is a complex of governments, each directly responsible to its own parliament and people. Our present discussions have confirmed our confidence that the policies of our governments will be in substantial agreement on the major issues of war and peace. We are in very close agreement on the objects and purposes which our foreign policies should pursue, but we must remember that the World Peace Council will be an executive body. It must be capable of prompt and single-minded action. In a sense it will represent the international community, and the States members of the Council will be the trustees of the world interest in peace and security. I do not think they could discharge this duty properly if a representative on the Peace Council was trying to act simultaneously on instructions from the half dozen Governments which make up the Commonwealth.

Frankly I do not think representation on the World Peace Council for the "British Commonwealth and Empire" as such is feasible or really desirable. Representation of the United Kingdom, on the other hand, is indispensable. The United Kingdom is indisputably a Great Power in its own right with its influence in world councils enhanced by its special relationship with the countries of the Commonwealth. The foreign policy of the United Kingdom should be firm and decisive. Can it be firm and decisive if every issue must be decided on the majority vote of countries, some of which are not directly in touch with the affairs of all parts of the world at once?

[12]La note suivante était dans l'original:/The following note was in the original:
Circulated as P.M.M. (44)5, and withdrawn on the conclusion of the discussion.

At the 1926 Imperial Conference, the idea of the British Commonwealth as a single contracting unit was ruled out as tending to obscure the separate international status of the component parts. I do not see how foreign countries can be expected to accept an arrangement under which countries of the Commonwealth are at the same time formally parts of one of the major Powers, and also, separately, individual members of the general community of nations. In practice the position of Canada, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand, should be fully safeguarded by the existing system of consultation which provides for preliminary consultation between the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth Governments on matters to be discussed by the major Powers.

The prestige of the British Commonwealth was never higher than it is to-day, and that is particularly true in the United States, despite friction and jealousies that sometimes obscure their fundamental friendliness. This prestige is based upon a belief that in the British Commonwealth there has been evolved a unique alliance of a peculiarly tough and enduring kind whose members act together, unlike so many allies bound by explicit treaties, not because they are compelled to act together, but because they have the will to act together. What is more, our friends have discovered the primary objects for which the members of the Commonwealth act together are objects which can be shared by other countries of goodwill. They have realised that the Commonwealth is not a Power bloc exploiting its own selfish interests, but a group of like-minded nations whose close association has in the past and may in the future form the most reliable element within the framework of the world order. We must be very cautious, therefore, about moving in directions which might rouse old suspicions. What is more important, we must take no steps which would set one group of nations apart from another, or lose sight of the great contribution we can make to the world by proving to it that free peoples of mingled races can work together and stand together in a good cause.

It has been suggested that Great Britain is not properly a Great Power unless she always speaks with the united voice of a great Empire. But Great Britain's strength has always been in her "alliance potential" — as Mr. Eden has said. This alliance potential she is able to command when her policy is such that her interests are those of her allies. Her most faithful allies in the past two wars have been the other nations of the Commonwealth, and no nation who wishes to attack Great Britain can dare to ignore the lessons of 1914 and 1939. Nor need we fear that Great Britain will fail to give due consideration to the interests of other nations of the Commonwealth, for she will want our continuing support. But this is true not only of Great Britain. It is true for all of us. None of us can defend ourselves by ourselves, and we shall all seek so to co-ordinate our policies that we can count on support in times of crisis. Are we stronger and more impressive in the eyes of the world this way, or bound together in such a way that our differences may be magnified and our disputes advertised?

In Memorandum E attached to P.M.M. (44)4 there is outlined a method and procedure for establishing a world organisation. This seems to me to indicate the right line of approach. If the memoranda prepared by the other countries are as well considered as those before us this morning, the subsequent discussions should be able to grapple immediately with the major problems. I agree with the expressions of urgency in the paper and concur in the view as to the good results to be expected from agreement at an early date on the major outlines of the new world organisation. I should express the hope that the fullest consideration will be given to the views of all the United Nations, and that every care will be taken to avoid any appearance of presenting to them a fait accompli to which they can do little more than sign their names. For this reason it may not be advisable to publish the proposed Declaration immediately it is given to the other nations, lest they interpret publication as a scheme to force their hands.

We have been asked whether we agree that these papers are on the right lines as a basis for preliminary and informal discussions. While I should not wish to commit the Canadian Government in any way to approval of proposals to which they will wish to give most careful study, I can say it is the belief of the Canadian Government that a strong world organisation must be established. In the formulation of plans for such an organisation, these proposals provide a splendid basis. We were happy to have the opportunity to express our views on the terms of the Moscow Declaration before they were framed, and we appreciated in those discussions the consideration given to our views by the United Kingdom Government. We hope that in the same way we shall be able to make some constructive contribution to the more important Declaration which is now to be drawn up.

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire,
le haut commissariat en Grande-Bretagne

Memorandum by First Secretary,
High Commission in Great Britain

SECRET [London, c. May 17, 1944]

FUTURE WORLD ORGANIZATION

A meeting took place at the Foreign Office on May 17th at 3:30 p.m. to discuss certain suggested insertions and re-drafts in the Foreign Office paper† prepared for the meeting of Prime Ministers on the subject of future world organisation. The suggested changes were in (a) the Covering Note to the Foreign Office paper and (b) the memoranda A and B to be exchanged with the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Those present were:

Sir Alexander Cadogan	(in the Chair)
Mr. Norman Robertson	Canada
Mr. C. S. A. Ritchie	Canada
Mr. Holmes	Canada
Mr. A. Stirling	Australia

Mr. A. D. McIntosh	New Zealand
Mr. J. V. Wilson	New Zealand
Mr. D. D. Forsyth	South Africa
Mr. Jones	South Africa
Mr. G. Boyd Shannon	Dominions Office
Mr. Jebb	Foreign Office
Professor Webster	Foreign Office
Mr. Greenway	Foreign Office

Sir Alexander Cadogan opened by explaining that the re-drafts and insertions in the original paper on future world organisation, copies of which were circulated to the meeting, had been drafted in the Foreign Office on instructions from the Prime Minister. When at the close of the discussions on future world organisation at the Prime Ministers' meeting Mr. Churchill withdrew his paper outlining his ideas on the regional organisation of the world, he instructed that the Foreign Office should prepare a balanced survey, in non-committal language, of alternative suggestions to those outlined in their original paper. Mr. Churchill had added that while he withdrew his paper his own views on regional organisation were unchanged in essentials. The present insertion and re-drafts had been approved by Mr. Eden but had not yet gone up to the Prime Minister for his approval.

The discussion which followed was concerned in the first place with the proposed insertion in the Foreign Office Covering Note to their memorandum on future world organisation. Sir Alexander Cadogan pointed out that this Covering Note would not, of course, be given to the United States and Soviet Governments for their consideration. It was merely background for the information of Commonwealth Governments and the United Kingdom representatives at the forthcoming Washington talks, and should not be considered as instructions to United Kingdom representatives. The memoranda on the other hand would be given to the United States and Russian Governments and would be put forward by the United Kingdom representatives at the forthcoming talks between the United Kingdom and United States Governments.

Mr. Robertson opened the discussion on the proposed insertion in the Covering Note. He said that he was somewhat surprised to see that this insertion seemed to be a repetition in all its essentials of the Prime Minister's own paper which he had withdrawn at the end of the discussion in the Prime Ministers' meeting. From the Canadian point of view it was open to the same objections as had applied to the Prime Minister's original paper. These objections had already been set forth in a paper circulated to the Prime Ministers' meeting, the two essential points of which were:

(a) that in the Canadian view the British Commonwealth could not be regarded as a single unified great Power, and hence the Dominions could not be represented by the United Kingdom on the World Peace Council, and

(b) that Canada was not in favour of the division of the world into regional Power groups.

Mr. Robertson said that he had been under the impression that the Prime Minister had acknowledged the force of the Canadian view as to (a), while retaining in some degree his original view regarding the merits of regional organisation. Mr. Robertson pointed out that both these concepts were to be found again in the suggested insertion in the Foreign Office Covering Note, and the Canadian objections to them still held good.

As to (a), Canada had not envisaged that the Commonwealth would be represented as a unitary Power on the World Peace Council, but rather that the United Kingdom and the Colonial Empire would be represented as a unit, although her position would no doubt be fortified by the fact that she would have had prior consultations with the Dominions and secured their agreement on the main lines of policy to be followed.

As to (b), the Canadian objections to the proposed regional organisation had already been explained. He added, however, that the American objections would probably be equally strong.

Sir Alexander Cadogan agreed that in all probability the United States would be opposed to the regional scheme. He pointed out that the American objections were mentioned in paragraph 13 of the proposed insertion and that it was stated in that paragraph that it would be impracticable to approach the United States Government along these lines. Sir Alexander seemed to imply that the regional scheme put forward as an alternative in the opening paragraphs of the proposed insertion was dismissed as impracticable in paragraph 13 on the grounds of probable American opposition. His explanation, however, was not free from ambiguity, particularly as Article 13 still proposed that "we (i.e. the United Kingdom Government) must therefore seek to secure these objectives (i.e. the regional organisation previously outlined) by indirect means so far as possible inside a world organisation."

Mr. Robertson, who was supported in his contentions by Mr. McIntosh, went on to point out that the regional scheme would encourage isolationism in the United States. Canada's interests would not fit into a regional form of organisation, nor would Canada be willing to represent the Commonwealth in that region. It was also pointed out as a reason for not excluding the non-European countries from European affairs that on only two occasions during the history of the League Council had states outside Europe prevented the achievement of any European objective clearly desired by the European states.

Mr. McIntosh supported the view put forward by Mr. Robertson, and said that the proposed insertion would, he felt sure, be unacceptable to his Government. He objected to paragraph 11 of the insertion with its references to Asia and the Pacific, and to paragraph 8 which suggested that the regional organisation would enable the smaller states to combine together with their neighbours to form compact blocs of power. This, he said, was quite opposed to the New Zealand conception of a world organisation. He supposed it was directed against Russia.

Mr. Forsyth said that he did not see any great objection to the proposed insertion as far as his Government were concerned.

Sir Alexander Cadogan said that speaking personally he felt that Mr. Hull's conception of a world organisation was the right one, and that he was in sympathy with it.

With regard to paragraph 5 of the proposed insertion which deals with the proposed United States of Europe, Mr. Robertson said that he felt it was important that the conception of some form of European organisation should not be jeopardised by linking it with a general plan for the organisation of the world on continental lines. Indeed some such European organisation was probably desirable. He reminded Sir Alexander Cadogan that it had been suggested that the Dominions should participate in the United Nations Commission for Europe which was intended to be the supreme European authority in the interim period before a world security organisation could be set up. He added that in the case of Europe there remained the question as to whether the European continent was really the best unit for such an international organisation. The European countries on the Atlantic seabord were much nearer, both in culture and in industrial and social development, to the countries of the Western Hemisphere than they were to the countries of South Eastern Europe.

After some further discussion the meeting turned to consideration of the suggested re-drafts of certain paragraphs of memoranda A and B. The following were the more important suggestions for alterations in the re-draft;

1. Mr. Robertson suggested that a misapprehension might arise from the omission in the re-draft of paragraph 15 of memorandum A of the sentence: "The same principle applies to all other States." The re-draft now read: "They (i.e. the four Powers) must be given, therefore, a special position in the organisation in order effectively to maintain peace and security. In general, the more power and responsibility can be made to correspond, the more likely is it that the machinery will be able to fulfil its functions." Mr. Robertson felt that the latter of these two sentences might be read as a gloss upon the former, whereas the inclusion of a reference to other States would make it clear that corresponding obligations applied to them. Professor Webster, who appears to have drafted that paragraph, said that this had not been the intention, and that in the last sentence of paragraph 15 after the words "in general" should be inserted "as regards all States."

In discussing this point Mr. Robertson mentioned the question of associating the Dominions with the World Peace Council. It might be that if Canada were not a member of the Council consideration would have to be given to accrediting a diplomatic mission to the Council in the same way that a Canadian representative had been accredited to the League of Nations. Consideration would also, no doubt, have to be given to the possibility of other methods of associating the Dominions with the Council.

2. The Foreign Office representatives agreed that in line 2 of paragraph 18 of memorandum A the word "could" should replace the word "should." It was agreed that in the penultimate sentence of paragraph 18, which read: "Such regional associations might also come into existence for electing representatives to a World Council," the words "for electing representatives to a World Council" should be deleted.[13]

3. It was pointed out by Mr. Robertson that in paragraph 26 of memorandum A the sentence: "The principle has been generally accepted that where the interests of any State are specially affected it should have the right of representation on the Council," which had stood in the original Foreign Office memorandum had been altered in the re-draft to read: "The principle had been generaly accepted that where the interests of any State are specially affected it should have the right to lay its case before the Council." Mr. Robertson pointed out that the phrase "right of representation" had been omitted. He felt that in view of the intention to keep the Council as small as possible it was all the more essential that States should have representation on it when their interests were affected. Professor Webster said that he did not think that in practice this change in the drafting would make any difference, as it was not contemplated that States which were parties to a dispute should vote at the meetings of the Council.

It was pointed out that two separate considerations were involved:

(a) representation on the Council for States whose interests were affected in policies which the Council might be pursuing, and

(b) representation on the Council for States who were parties to an actual dispute.

The question of the election of non-permanent members of the Council was raised. It was considered that in all probability they would have to be elected by the Assembly, and that in that case the Assembly could hardly avoid taking into account the need for maintaining a regional balance.

In considering the re-drafts of memorandum B there was a brief discussion on the proposal that the decisions of the Council, even on questions of principle, might be taken by a two-thirds majority rather than by unanimity. Professor Webster said that many authorities on both sides of the Atlantic experienced in legal procedure were in favour of this change, which was designed to add to the strength and effectiveness of the Council. In any event the proposal was merely put forward as worthy of consideration.

At the close of the consideration of the suggested insertion and re-drafts there was some discussion initiated by Mr. Robertson on the methods to be

[13]À l'origine, le paragraphe se lisait comme suit:

The paragraph orginally read:

"18. Just as there are special functional organisations, so there should be regional associations when there is obvious advantage to be obtained by limitation of the sphere of action. For instance, it is possible that out of some 'United Nations Commission for Europe' as proposed in Mr. Eden's memorandum of July 1st, 1943, there might grow a European organism which, under the guidance of the three major allies, might foster peaceful tendencies, heal the wounds of Europe, and at the same time prevent Germany from again dominating the Continent. Such regional associations might also come into existence for electing representatives to a World Council, for economic co-operation, for the promotion of welfare in colonial territories, etc. It is, however, essential that they should not conflict with the world-wide organisation but rather assist it to carry out its purposes".

adopted for "winding up" the League of Nations. The Canadian view was that this should be done in as orderly a fashion as possible, and he enquired whether the United Kingdom authorities had given any consideration to the questions involved.

Sir Alexander Cadogan said that they had not so far had an opportunity of doing so. There were likely to be some thorny legal points involved and it might be that neutral and enemy States had certain residual rights connected with the League organisation. Sir Alexander deprecated the fact that every association with the League of Nations was under a cloud. This had been partly due to American and Russian dislike of the League, but he thought that in his recent talks with Dr. Bowman of the United States State Department, that he had detected a slight change of attitude.

There was some discussion of the place of meeting of the future world organisation. Sir Alexander Cadogan said that the Foreign Office felt that this was a question which should be left to the very last. It was the kind of thing which always raised controversy and difficulties. He would not be entirely surprised himself if Geneva should prove the eventual choice.

The discussion was concluded by Sir Alexander Cadogan asking for the views of the Dominion Prime Ministers on the suggested insertion and re-drafts at the earliest possible date, if possible before the departure of the Prime Ministers from London. Sir Alexander said that insofar as this meant a repetition of work which had been done already at the Prime Ministers' meeting he regretted that it should be necessary, but the Foreign Office had received their instructions to put forward these alternatives, and would be grateful to have, in written form, the views of the Dominion Prime Ministers. If there were objections, as he gathered that there would be, he hoped that they would be set forth in the written comments of the Dominion Prime Ministers.

TELEGRAM 96 Ottawa, May 29, 1944

SECRET. Following for Mr. Eden from the Prime Minister, Begins:

1. When I left London it was understood that I should let you have as soon as possible my comments on the changes suggested by the Foreign Office, following the discussion of the subject by the Prime Ministers' Meeting, in the paper "Future World Organization" (P.M.M. (44)4).†

2. Mr. Fraser kindly sent me a copy of his letter to you of May 18th† on this question, in which he took objection to the elaboration of the idea of regionalism proposed for inclusion in the Covering Note. I am in general agreement with his views, and should prefer, as he does, that this expansion of the original paper should be limited to references to the special case of Europe.

3. At several points in the revision of the Covering Note (paragraphs 5, 11 and 12) reference is made to the British Commonwealth as one of the three or four Great Powers. My understanding of the sense of our discussions in London is that the United Kingdom rather than the British Commonwealth should consistently be mentioned in this connection, as is done in paragraph 15 of Memorandum A.

4. With regard to the redraft of certain paragraphs of Memoranda A and B, certain changes with which I am in accord were proposed at the meeting of officials held in the Foreign Office on May 17th. I suggest that in the first sentence of the revised paragraph 27 of Memorandum A less weight should be given to the desirability of restricting membership of the World Council to the great powers, since the political feasibility of this is admitted to be most questionable. There appears to me to be some inconsistency between this sentence and the discussion which immediately follows of the principles governing the choice of other members of the World Council.

5. Apart from these observations I am in general accord with the line of approach taken in the five Memoranda, which provide in my view a satisfactory basis for initiating discussions with the United States and the Soviet Governments.

Le chargé d'affaires, l'ambassade aux États-Unis, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Chargé d'Affaires, Embassy in United States, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Washington, July 18, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson:

I have read with great interest Foreign Office P.M.M. (44)4 of May 8th entitled "Future World Organization,"† forwarded with Mr. Wrong's letter of June 26th,† as well as the suggested redraft of certain paragraphs of this document forwarded with Mr. Ritchie's letter to you of June 12th.†

The Foreign Office Print, as amended, should serve as a useful basis for the discussions on post-war organization when the United States, United Kingdom, Russian and Chinese delegates meet to consider this matter. The Print's covering note and the four memoranda attached to it, touch, among other things, on two of the most important features of the whole problem.

(1) The powers and responsibilities to be given to the small executive body, the World Council.

(2) The position and obligations of the intermediate and small powers in the World Organization.

The first question is the vital one. If it is solved satisfactorily, everything else becomes comparatively easy.

In this connection the analogy that comes to mind, almost automatically, is that of the League of Nations and the Covenant. Incidentally, the Foreign Office document does not suggest any procedure for dissolving the League and its associated agencies.

The Print says that the organization proposed has much in common with the League Convenant but is "more flexible". The new plan "is based on the acceptance of certain essential principles." The means by which these principles shall be carried out are "to be adapted to the varying circumstances of human intercourse which cannot be foreseen."

This approach may be unavoidable but it is, I think, idle to conclude that it necessarily represents progress.

Furthermore, the statement of the problem in the Foreign Office Print, with its emphasis on "flexibility," is incomplete. Unless the Organization is given a broad grant of powers it may discover that it is incompetent, without a constitutional amendment, to adopt the methods which experience shows to be desirable. Flexibility of means is essential, but there must also be legal capacity to adopt the desired means.

The only possible chance of success, it seems, for an international organization of the kind proposed lies in the desire and ability of the three Great Powers to work together within the framework of that organization. Presumably flexibility is emphasized to make that co-operation easier and to provide room for development. Flexibility, however, can also make it easier to retreat as well as to advance.

The development, the nature, and the success of the British Commonwealth of Nations is used as an argument to support this cautious, elastic approach. It is, I think, an unfortunate one. The Commonwealth does not need to be organized, even as a defensive alliance, because the interests and traditions and sentiments which make for co-operation and collective action are so deeply ingrained. The Commonwealth consists of separate States which have grown out of a unitary Empire. The development of the world organization is presumably from the separate and competing towards the collective and co-operative. There is little or nothing of tradition or sentiment binding its members together. In short, principles and policies which might be safe and even essential for the British Commonwealth — where the strength of the whole lies in the freedom of the parts — are a misleading and dangerous guide to any world organization.

It might be argued that not freedom and sovereignty, but collective action and interdependence should be emphasized in our post-war plans. Political realities make it necessary, of course, to remove the fear that anything like a super-State is even thought of. For that reason — and for others — the Print makes clear, using the language of the Moscow declaration, that the world must be based on the "sovereign equality" of all states.

Though this may be unavoidable in present circumstances, nevertheless the phrase itself and its two concepts of "sovereignty" and "equality" may well create illusions which have no basis in fact. Corbett and Kirk in the latest Yale University study "The Outlook for a Security Organization" put this danger succinctly and well in the following paragraphs:

"At the present time it is apparent that the peoples of the United Nations are being led to believe that they can have their cake of sovereignty and that they can eat it in complete security.

This is not only untrue; it is dangerous. The matter is too important to be handled in such a cavalier fashion. Now, when basic decisions are being made, no possible harm could come from a clear statement setting forth the price which must be paid by all nations if permanent international security is to be achieved. It should be made clear that, if sovereignty is to be retained in its traditional form, the postwar security organization will be essentially and only a consultative agency whereby the 'peace-loving' states will have an opportunity to concert together in face of a threat to world peace and to determine upon common or joint measures. Sovereignty implies the right of a State to refuse, in any individual case, to participate in joint efforts to coerce an aggressor. A sovereign state undoubtedly will exercise that right when it is convinced that participation in the measures proposed would jeopardize its vital interests."

It seems to me that the F.O. Print makes one thing pretty clear, that the world organization, in so far as the subordination of national sovereignty and national interests to any international authority is concerned, will have, at the very most, no greater power than the old League. It will, however, have, we hope, the participation of the U.S.A. and Russia in its work from the outset. That seems to be its only essential advantage over 1919 which drives home the point that everything depends on the desire and ability of the three Powers to work together for peace.

Nowhere in the Print is there a clear statement that one of the principal objects of the Organization must be to diminish the number and intensity of disputes between the states and especially between the three biggest states. Nowhere is there recognition of the fact that the successful working of the various functional organizations, such as an international air transport authority, will increase world security, and that without their successful functioning it is improbable that a world security organization will work.

Peace and security can be established only as the result of a very high degree of cooperation between the states, and especially between the three biggest states. The more friction there is between the states the smaller will be the chance of securing the necessarily high degree of cooperation in the world security organization. Effective international institutions must therefore be established to diminish the chances of friction between the states and especially between the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R. over such matters as commerce, finance, air transport, shipping, communications. Nations are not likely to go to war over these things, but they are not likely to cooperate to keep the peace if they are continually squabbling over them.

The above point, if made in the Print would involve changes of the following character in Memorandum A:

(1) A new paragraph after paragraph 5 or paragraph 6.

(2) A second "object" in paragraph 12 after (i) which might read somewhat as follows — "To lessen the number and intensity of disputes between states by the setting up of effective institutions for international cooperation in specific fields such as commerce, finance and communications."

(3) The addition to paragraph 17 of a clause — "just as reasonable security would be increased in a world in which these functional organizations are effective."

Another weakness in the Print is that it contains no recognition of the fact that the best way of ensuring that states honour their obligations in the Organization is to ensure that the advantages of membership outweigh the disadvantages, that the value of the privileges flowing from membership is greater than the weight of the obligations resulting from membership. The growth of effective functional organizations should make this possible.

It would, of course, be desirable if no member state were permitted to resign from the World Organization. Even if, for domestic political reasons, this is impossible, provision need not be made for the expulsion of members for dishonouring their obligations. Such members should be suspended from the privileges of membership in the World Organization, or the functional organizations, or both, at the discretion of the Council or Assembly. If the functional organizations are effective this would, in itself, be a powerful sanction.

To meet this point a paragraph on suspension of membership might be added after paragraph 21 of memorandum A.

In some respects, the Foreign Office proposals seem to be an improvement on the old League covenant. In others, however, they appear to be retrogressive. This seems particularly true in the place given in the Organization to the intermediate and small powers. This place is lower, on the whole, than it was in the old League. The weakening of the powers and prestige of the Assembly as opposed to the Council, is both a cause and a result of this tendency.

It is, of course, clear that there should be a real relationship between power and responsibility in the new world organization. It doesn't make international organization either more effective or more democratic if it is made as easy for Iran as for the U.S.A. to obstruct salutary action.

At the same time the history of the League proves that not small powers but big powers cause most of the trouble and prevent most of the solutions. It also shows that smaller powers — when not the pawns of larger — can do good and constructive international work. Would it not, therefore, be wise to give those smaller powers as much prestige and authority in the Organization as possible, without giving them power to block moves agreed on in the Council? Otherwise, the moral and world position of the Organization will be greatly reduced and it may become a sort of Holy Alliance with a great number of indifferent or resentful states outside the alliance. Even on the lowest terms, it is surely essential to construct an impressive, dignified, universal organization within which the Big Powers can co-operate, and which will add its moral authority to the effective executive action of the smaller group of Great Powers.

The Assembly is that section of the world organization which will attract the most public attention and it will be the main outlet in the world organization for the views on international problems of the vast majority of states. It is, therefore, important from the point of view of the prestige of the Organization as a whole that the Assembly should be something more than a futile debating society.

If the proposals set forth in the Foreign Office Print were adopted I think there would be a danger of the Assembly being squeezed between the Council on the one hand and the functional organizations on the other. Some of the smaller states would soon become disillusioned, their Governments would be criticised for making comparatively large financial contributions to the organization, and they might withdraw. Many small states feel already that they are completely at the mercy of the great powers, a condition which would not seem to them to be very greatly changed by their membership in a world organization dominated by the great powers which did not even guarantee their political independence and territorial integrity.

For the above reasons, I think that the proposals made in the Print on the powers of the World Assembly should be widened and made more precise.

Specifically, the following powers might be given the Assembly:

(1) The Assembly (excluding the states with permanent seats on the Council) should choose the states to fill the non-permanent seats on the Council, and the non-permanent seats on the Military Staff Committee.

(2) The Assembly should elect:

(a) the Head of the Secretariat, who should hold office for, say, six years unless dismissed by the Assembly by a two-thirds vote, and

(b) the members of the World Court.

(3) The Assembly should meet not only once a year, but "from time to time as occasion may require," possibly at the call of the President of the Council.

(4) The Assembly should be the body competent to admit new members to the World Organization.

(5) The Assembly should make regulations governing the preparation of budgets and financial statements by the Council and, possibly, by the functional organizations. The Assembly also should approve the annual budget of and financial arrangements made by the Council.

(6) The Assembly should examine and approve the annual reports of the Council and of the Head of the Secretariat.

(7) The Assembly should have power to decide any matter referred to it by the Council.

(8)The Assembly should have power to determine its rules of procedure.

(9) The Assembly should have power to refer to subsidiary commissions, functional organizations, or any other appropriate agency, any matter within the sphere of its jurisdiction.

(10) The Assembly should have power to deal with any matter within the sphere of action of the World Organization not specifically assigned to some other authority.

I think also that the emphasis on membership of the Council might be altered somewhat. The approach to this problem should be to make membership on the Council as wide as possible, consistent with the necessity for speedy and effective action. The approach seems to be almost that membership should be on as narrow a basis as possible consistent with the unfortunate necessity of adding a few outside members to the Big Three or Four.

Furthermore, paragraph 13 of the covering note states that, while the Great Powers on the Council act only according to their own unanimous decision, other members of the Organization would be "bound to follow the decisions of the Council." In the light of this — and other provisions — para. 15 of Memo A, where it says "the status of all members is equal and all will enjoy the same rights," becomes meaningless. All members do not enjoy the same rights under the proposed scheme nor should they. But it is not necessary to violate this principle of theoretical equality so flagrantly as is done in the words of para. 13 of the covering note, which have been quoted above. This becomes worse in view of the proposed change to paragraph 26 of memorandum A. This paragraph originally provided that "where the interests of any state are specially affected, it should have the right of representation on the Council." This now reads "should have the right to lay its case before the Council." This is an important change, both of tone and substance, and not at all, I should think, a mere drafting alteration, as suggested by Professor Webster. We should do our best, as Mr. Ritchie points out, to return to the earlier wording.

I do not see how the intermediate or smaller powers could ever wholeheartedly, or even half-heartedly, support any World Council if, when their specific interests are being discussed by such a Council, or when specific obligations are being imposed on them, all they can do is lay their case before the Council. It may not be either necessary or desirable to go so far as to give other states rights of voting membership in any circumstances, but it should be possible to lay down the right of "participation" by non-members in a discussion before the Council, when their interests are immediately and specifically affected by such discussion.

My own view is that any decision of the Council by, say, a ⅔ vote (including the Big Three but not necessarily China) should be binding on the Council only. It should be binding on the members of the Assembly, not represented on the Council, only when accepted by those members under the same ⅔ majority rule. Once that majority is obtained, however, the minority must accept. There should be no veto by anyone in the Assembly. If the three Great Powers were willing to give up their individual right to veto a decision of the Council, the other powers might be willing to agree to abide by a decision of that body. But if each of the big powers keeps a liberum veto, the other powers can scarcely be expected to do more than agree to abide by a decision of ⅔ of their peers.

The covering note, para. 7, makes a somewhat ambiguous reference to the "British Commonwealth" as a member of the Organization. In spite of later and less ambiguous references to the contrary, it might seem that by "Organization" in para. 7 is meant "Council" in view of the fact that only three other States, the United States, U.S.S.R. and France are mentioned. There should be no possible doubt on this score. The Great Powers include the United Kingdom, but not the British Commonwealth. We don't want double representation in the Organization.

There also appears to be some doubt in the minds of the authors of the Print as to whether there are Three or Four Big Powers. "China," for instance, is not mentioned in para. 7 of the covering note as one of the Big Powers, but is included in para. 11. Similarly para. 15 of memo A mentions "Four Powers" as enjoying a special position and accepting a special responsibility; also para. 13 of memo B and paras. 3 and 12 of memo C. On the other hand, para. 18 of memo A talks about the "Three Major Allies" while para. 27 mentions "Three or Four Powers."

Personally I do not find it easy to accept the idea that China should be one of the small inner group of Great Powers on whom any proposed world organization must principally rest; or that the Government of China will be able adequately to discharge the important responsibilities of such a position. It would, for example, be absurd to permit China to veto a decision of the Council on which the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R., the United States and the representatives of the other powers were all agreed.

Would it not be better — if it were politically possible — to leave the matter open and merely refer to the "Great Powers," without any number, as is done in para. 4 of memorandum B.

The above comments cover questions of general import which appear in more than one of the Documents that make up the Print.

There are, in addition, one or two comments of detail on specific parts of the Print that I would like to make.

(1) Memorandum A.

(a) Para. 18 has been enlarged to provide, in Mr. Ritchie's words "a decent interment to plans for world organization on regional lines." Mr. Ritchie adds that the revised paragraph omits the reference to "regional associations coming into existence for electing representatives to a World Council." I would point out, however, that this idea, though it may be omitted from paragraph 18, is stated in paragraph 30 of the same memorandum.

(b) Para. 20. Should not the Associated as well as the United Nations be invited to become members?

(c) Para. 22. Surely members of the Organization should have wider rights than those of information and criticism. If rights need to be specified at all, should there not be added to those mentioned "advice and recommendation."

(d) Para. 24. I think it would be a great mistake if the World Assembly were given no control over finance and the admission of new members, or the suspension of members, especially in view of the proposed concentration of other powers in the hands of the Council.

(e) Para. 26. Is it not a mistake to include the word "always" before "be represented on it." Even if it is necessary to include China with the other Three Powers among the "Great" it is surely unwise and unnecessary to make that inclusion perpetual.

(f) Para. 34. I doubt very much whether the World Council, as proposed, is the proper body to give common direction to the functional bodies. The Council will be concerned primarily with political and security questions. Its members may be neither interested in nor competent to give direction to the work of the functional bodies. Such direction might be given by a separate Economic and Social council, also responsible to the World Assembly, and consisting of representatives of those countries playing the most important part in the work of the functional bodies. I do not think that it should be linked up with the "Big Four" political security council in any way. The directing work of this second council might be supplemented, on the administrative level, by a committee consisting of the Director Generals of the various functional organizations. Indeed, it might not be necessary to have any Council between this Economic and Social Committee and the World Assembly.

Memorandum D deals briefly with this particular subject. It visualizes an economic and social secretariat attached to the world council. This economic and social secretariat might be the administrative Committee mentioned above, responsible to the world Economic and Social Council, and ultimately to the World Assembly.

My idea is that the World Council is itself, in a sense, a functional body, though dealing with the most important function of all — Peace and Security; as such, therefore, it should have no greater control over the other functional bodies than they have over each other.

(2) Memorandum B.

(a) Para. 9. Why should it not be compulsory to refer all justiciable disputes to the Permanent Court and why would this make it necessary to allow States to make certain reservations?

(b) Para. 13. I can see no reason, as previously stated, why China should be given a veto power over every decision of the Council.

(c) Para. 14. The first sentence reads "States are not likely to bind themselves to accept the decision of the Council." What force, then, would such decisions have? This contradicts para. 13 of the covering note. Which prevails? This is too important a point to be uncertain about.

(d) Paras. 17 & 20. I think the proposal to omit any guarantee of territorial integrity is a good one as it would make "peaceful change" easier. It is true that article 19 of the Covenant was of no great value. That, however, might not have been the case if there had been no article 10.

(e) Para. 32. I think we ought to omit all references to the World Council acting on behalf of the other members of the organization. It will merely give rise to needless irritation and suspicion and doesn't really mean anything.

(3) Memorandum C.

(i) This memorandum is not entirely consistent with the previous memoranda, e.g., the objects of the Organization are stated intelligently in para. 12 of Memorandum A. and far less intelligently in para. 3 of Memorandum C.

(ii) The comments of the Canadian P.H.P. Committee on the February 3, 1944, draft† of Memorandum C. are applicable to this latest draft.[14]

(iii) (a) Para. 3. I question the desirability of giving such unnecessarily strong emphasis to the fact that the permanent and main object of any World Organization is the disarmament of Germany and Japan. I think, therefore, the order of the objects in paragraph 4 should be altered as follows: (c), (a), (b). Surely (c) is by far the most important object and should be first.

(b) Para. 7. I do not agree with the statement that an International Police Force implies the existence of a world state. No argument is made here against such a Force. The idea is merely dismissed. It is quite clear that there can be no general international police force at this time. Surely it is arguable, however, that a nucleus of such a force might be attached to the World Council to be used for special, if limited, jobs in specific places.

(c) Para. 12. I wonder whether it is wise to lay down so categorically now that the four permanent members of the Military Staff Committee should come from the Four Powers, with only a vague and shadowy association with that committee granted to other powers. Here again the position of China is not such as to justify her inclusion, or the exclusion of others, in international police action; especially as such action will likely be far more naval and aerial than military. China can now make practically no contribution to such form of police action. Canada and France could make an important contribution.

(d) Para. 15. No country not represented on the Council or on the Military Staff Committee is likely to allow these bodies to decide, without its own approval, the size and composition of its quota of force to deal with an emergency, so long as the permanent members of the Council are subject to no such limitation on their freedom of action. The psychological effect of constant cooperation between quota forces is as important as stated in this paragraph. It is almost as important, in fact, as the psychological effect of constant cooperation within the Military Staff Committee. That Committee should not, therefore, be restricted to four nations.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

Le chargé d'affaires, l'ambassade aux États-Unis, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Chargé d'Affaires, Embassy in United States, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET Washington, July 27, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson:

I have been giving some thought to the proposals made in the United States paper of July 18th on the establishment of a general international organization[15] and have the following comments to make:

A. Character of the Organization.

The United Kingdom statement of objects, amplified as suggested in my letter of July 16th, seems to me more satisfactory than the brief United States statement of purposes. The United States statement of methods is good as far as it goes but is incomplete. It should include some such clauses as "facilitate the establishment and maintenance of effective institutions and agencies for international cooperation in such matters as commerce, finance and communications in order to lessen the number and intensity of disputes between states, by promoting solutions of international economic and social problems," "provide for the regulation and limitation of national armaments and armed forces and for the control of the manufacture of arms and the international traffic in arms."

Paragraph A4 of Section 1 of the United States paper on regional organizations is probably preferable to paragraph 18 of United Kingdom memorandum A,[16] though there is not much to choose between them. I am glad the United States paper does not follow the United Kingdom paper (memorandum A, paragraph 30) in giving a blessing, even though qualified, to the idea of representation of regions on the Council.

Paragraph D2 of Section 1 of the United States paper is good. It will be interesting to see how the United States develops its ideas on territorial trusteeship responsibilities. They have so far left their Section IX on this point a blank. You will recall that the United Kingdom, as they pointed out in paragraph 14 of their covering memorandum,† deliberately did not mention the colonial question but preferred to leave it to the United States government to raise the question if they so desire. It is, I think, good that they have done so.

B. Assembly.

The United States proposals on the powers of the Assembly appear to be satisfactory, subject to the qualifications mentioned elsewhere in this letter.

---

[15]Voir États-Unis,/See United States, Foreign Relations of the United States, 1944, Volume I. Washington, U.S. Government Printing Office, 1966, pp. 653-69.

[16]Voir le document 367, note 13./See Document 367, footnote 13.

They certainly seem more satisfactory than the proposals in the United Kingdom paper. The proposal that in voting on financial questions the voting power of each state should be proportionate to its contribution to the expenses appears desirable. It ought to curb some of the Latin American states. It does, however, run counter to the "sovereign equality" idea, which makes it all the more necessary to be careful how these words and others like them, e.g. "equal rights" are used.

C. Council.

1. Subject to the qualifications made elsewhere in this letter, the provisions in the United States paper on the Council appear satisfactory, except that the Council surely cannot, as both the United States and the United Kingdom suggest, be given a blanket grant of power to "act on behalf of all members" of the Organization. I am also not certain of the wisdom of rotating annually all the non-permanent seats on the Council. As the United Kingdom memorandum points out (memorandum A, paragraph 28) the principle of rotation deprives the Council of experienced statesmen. It is to be hoped that the Council should be empowered by a simple majority vote (not necessarily including the concurring vote of all permanent members) to assume on its own initiative or on reference to it of jurisdiction over disputes. The permanent members ought to be satisfied with their veto power over (1) the terms of settlement of disputes, (2) negotiations for a general agreement on the regulation of armaments and armed forces, (3) determination of threats to the peace, and (4) the institution and application of measures of enforcement.

2. The proposal that France should as soon as possible become a permanent member of the Council is to be welcomed. The naming of France, as well as China, to be permanent members of the Council might make it possible to restrict the veto power to the United States, United Kingdom and U.S.S.R. This would mean that there would be three groups of states in the Council:

(1) United States, United Kingdom, U.S.S.R.: permanent members, each with a veto over the four points listed above;

(2) China and France: permanent members, but without a veto;

(3) Six non-permanent members.

China and France would thus be labelled as marginal great powers. They would not like that but it is the only way which occurs to me by which we could remove from China the right of veto.

3. The United States proposes that the Council should make decisions on the imposition of sanctions, etc., by a majority vote including the concurring vote of all permanent members. Since the Council's membership is 11, this means that the five permanent members, if agreed, need secure the support of only one of the six non-permanent members in order to get a binding majority decision. The United Kingdom proposes a two-thirds majority of the Council, which, in a Council of 11, would mean the five permanent members plus three out of the six non-permanent members. So long as each of the permanent members of the Council, or even three of them, preserves a veto, it would seem to be reasonable that two-thirds (4 out of 6) of the non-permanent members should also be able to exercise a veto. Consequently, the United Kingdom proposal for a two-thirds majority of the Council on questions such as the imposition of sanctions would seem preferable to the U.S. proposal for a simple majority. The United States proposal for a simple majority (not necessarily including the concurring votes of all permanent members) on all questions other than the five (or preferably four) specifically listed, seems sound.

4. The useful United Kingdom suggestion (memorandum A, paragraph 38, and memorandum B,† paragraph 32) that the Head of the Secretariat should have the right to bring before the Council any matter which, in his opinion, threatens the peace of the world, is not included in the United States paper. A small change in paragraph 5 of Section V of the United States paper would remedy this.

5. The United States paper proposes that "any state not having a seat on the Executive Council should be entitled to attend and to be heard on matters specially affecting that member." This is better than the corresponding United Kingdom proposal (memorandum A, paragraph 26) that "where the interests of any state are specially affected it should have the right to lay its case before the Council." I would prefer, however, a provision to the effect that any member state not represented on the Council should be entitled to participate, without a vote, at Council meetings during the consideration of any matter specially affecting its interests.

6. Provision should also be made that, with the approval of a majority (or perhaps a two-thirds majority) of the Assembly, the Council may by a two-thirds majority (including the concurring votes of the United States, the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R.) fix the number of members of the Council and the conditions of their membership.

D. Obligations of member states arising out of decisions of the Council to impose economic and armed sanctions

1. A decision of the Council should be binding on all members of the Council. (This may have the fortunate result of deterring states from seeking non-permanent seats on the Council). The United States and the United Kingdom propose that the Council decisions should also bind all member states.

2. Under the United States proposals, however, the new covenant does not, of itself, create an obligation to assist in applying armed sanctions. That obligation will arise out of the general security agreement which the Council is to formulate and put before member states, and no member state will incur any obligations under this security agreement unless it signs and ratifies the security agreement.

3. The United Kingdom proposal seems to be that the Council, on the advice of its Military Staff Committee, can order the members of the Assembly to assist in applying armed sanctions.

4. The weakness in the United States proposal is that it sidesteps the problem of how to organize armed sanctions. If the experience of the League repeats itself, we shall be debating fifteen years from now the merits of the latest draft of a general security agreement — the discussions up to then having been abortive. It would, therefore, be better if the instrument creating the World Organization gave rise of itself to some obligation on the part of all the member states to assist in applying armed sanctions.

5. Perhaps a solution might lie in some such proposal as the following. All the members of the Council shall be bound by a two-thirds vote of the Council to apply economic, commercial, financial or armed sanctions. All the members of the Organization shall, if so requested by the Council by a two-third's vote,

(a) cooperate with the Council in obtaining the information necessary for action and in appropriate measures of publicity;

(b) take part in concerted diplomatic measures;

(c) refrain from giving assistance to any state contrary to preventive or enforcement action decided on by the Council.

All the members of the Organization shall, if the Assembly ratifies a recommendation of the Council by a two-thirds vote, impose the necessary economic, commercial, financial and armed sanctions. If the two-thirds vote cannot be secured, the Council's recommendation should bind only the members of the Organization who vote in favour of ratifying the Council's recommendation.

6. The possibility should be explored of imposing some deprivation of privileges of membership on those states who, by voting against ratification of the Council's recommendation, make it impossible to get a two-third's majority. Perhaps this deprivation might apply if there were a simple majority in favour of ratifying the Council's recommendation but not a two-third's majority.

7. The delay involved in convening the Assembly need not be great. Provision could be made that the Assembly could be convened in extraordinary session on five days' notice. Representatives of all nations ought to be able to reach the meeting place in two or three days by air.

E. Arrangements for Economic and Social Cooperation

The section on this in the United States paper is good. An Economic and Social Council responsible to the Assembly would be a far better supervisory and coordinating agency for the specialized bodies that the World Security Council. I am not sure, however, that 24 states need be represented on this Council. I should think 15 to 18 would be enough. Otherwise the Economic and Social Council would become unwieldy since it will also have present at its sessions non-voting participants from eight or so specialized organizations. In addition to the Economic and Social Council there should, I think, be an Advisory Council consisting of the Directors-General of the specialized bodies meeting under the Chairmanship of the Director-General of the World Organization.

F. Procedure of Establishment and Inauguration

It would be absurd if the failure of China to ratify the new covenant should prevent it from coming into force. The covenant should come into force when ratified by fifteen states including the United States, United Kingdom, and U.S.S.R. — but not including China, as the United States paper proposes.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

TELEGRAM 64 Ottawa, August 2, 1944

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Future World Organization.

1. On May 29th we informed the United Kingdom Government that their five preliminary memoranda on "Future World Organization"† provided, in our view, a satisfactory basis for initiating discussions with the United States and Soviet Governments. Since then further consideration has been given to these memoranda, and some attention has been devoted to the outline of the United States document contained in your telegram D.1061 of July 25th.† As a result we feel that it may be useful to express some further views of a general character before the discussions in Washington with the U.S. and Soviet representatives begin on August 14th.[18] We have not yet, of course, had an opportunity of studying the full text of the United States proposals or of weighing carefully the outline of them which we have received.

2. We are glad to note that there is much common ground between the United Kingdom and United States suggestions both as to the form of the World Organization and as to the authority which it should exercise for the maintenance of peace.

3. Both plans recognize that the essential foundation of a working security system is the continued collaboration of the three greatest military powers. We fully agree that it is necessary to maintain within the international organization an effective alliance of these powers directed to the preservation of peace by agreed methods. On the other hand both plans recognize "the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace loving states" which was incorporated in the Moscow Declaration, although it is not altogether clear in fact in either scheme what the practical application of this principle means. We have been particularly concerned over the methods whereby these two major objectives can be reconciled.

[17]La note suivante était écrite sur cette copie du télégramme:
The following note was written on this copy of the telegram:
Mr. Acland says P[rime] M[inister] has approved. M. McK[enzie]

[18]En réalité, elles ont commencé le 21 août.
They in fact began on August 21.

4. Naturally we are bound to pay special attention to the position proposed for secondary states in the new organization. We feel that this should receive careful and anxious attention in the Washington talks, and that the special place accorded to the Great Powers should not be extended beyond functions in which their active collaboration is indispensable. If they are given too large an authority and too extensive a right of individual veto the result may be that membership will not be sufficiently responsible to secure the participation of important secondary states whose full collaboration would be of the greatest value.

5. The reason why the largest powers are given in both schemes "permanent membership" or "continuing tenure" on the Council and special rights of veto inside the Council is because of the great weight they exercise in international relations through their military and economic power. A simple division of states between Great Powers and the rest, however, is completely unrealistic; in our view the same selective principle which warrants a special position for the Great Powers should be applied as far as possible to all members of the organization in such matters as frequency of election to the Council, membership of functional bodies, control of finance and so on. It would be absurd to treat all states other than the Great Powers on a basis of equality in these matters; this, of course, is recognized in paragraphs 28 and 29 of Memorandum A of your proposals.

6. Therefore, if power and responsibility are to be made to correspond, the differences in function which should be incorporated in the structure of the organization must in our view extend well beyond the giving of a special place to the Great Powers. While some attention must doubtless be paid to the proper representation of regions in any methods adopted for reducing to a workable executive group the whole number of member states, we feel that other considerations are equally or more important. In the case of the Council a major consideration should be the relative military power of the member states; the actual contribution towards the defeat of Germany and Japan provides one convenient and very relevant criterion for assessing this.

7. We feel in general that the purposes of the organization should be broadly defined and should include reference to international co-operation in matters such as trade, communications, finance, health and social welfare, as well as to the preservation of security and control of armaments. The statement of purposes might well directly relate to the central problem of security the importance of collaboration in these fields.

8. We are concerned over the very extensive powers proposed for the Council in both the United Kingdom and the United States plans, and we feel that the requirement of unanimity among the permanent members should be narrowly defined. While it may prove essential to give the Soviet Government, for instance, a right of veto on action by the Council of certain kinds, it would not be essential to give the same treatment to China. Might China be given continuing membership without the other special rights of the Great Powers?

9. The greater the authority of the Council the more important is it that states not represented on it should have the right of effective participation when matters closely touching their interests are under discussion. We feel that the mere right of access to the Council in such circumstances is not enough, and that right of participation or temporary membership should be provided.

10. We doubt whether many states without permanent Council seats would be ready to join an organization in which the Council's decisions on grave issues, involving action on their part, would be binding on them. It may be necessary to make such decisions binding only on states represented on the Council, at least until they have been also approved by the Assembly.

11. It follows as a general conclusion that we feel that the importance of the Assembly should be enhanced and we are attracted by the United States proposals on this point. We doubt that an assembly possessing little more than the right of information and criticism would be an institution of value. Our hope would be that, through the Assembly and the functional international bodies, general support for all the activities of the World Organization would be generated and extended. The Assembly should, therefore, be given as wide powers as is consistent with the retention for the Council of its essential function of initiating action to guard world peace.

12. We favour the general supervision by the Assembly of international economic and social activities, and possibly also the creation of an economic and social council on the lines of the United States proposal. We should prefer to see these matters separated from the scope of the World Council except insofar as they relate directly to security. The Council might be regarded as being itself the most important of the functional bodies, charged with the supreme duty of maintaining peace.

13. There are many other important questions on which we have not felt it necessary to comment in advance of the Washington meetings. The views put forward in this telegram are intended rather to be in amplification of the United Kingdom proposals, with special reference to the situation of secondary states, than in criticism of them.

TELEGRAM 120 London, August 21, 1944

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET. My telegram August 8th, No. 115.† Future World Organisation.

We have now had time to study your telegram of August 2nd, No. 130. Copy has been given to our Delegation in Washington and they will bear your views in mind in the discussions now about to open. You explained that your views are intended to be in amplification of our proposals with special reference to situation of "secondary" States. We trust that it will be recognised that our memoranda† were essentially preliminary, and on a number of points we deliberately confined ourselves to alluding to the problems to be solved without committing ourselves to any particular way of solving them. We still have an open mind on many of them and should prefer not to crystallize our own views before the talks are held. Following comments on your telegram should, therefore, be regarded as preliminary and non-committal. Copy is being sent to our Delegation.

2. We are, of course, in general agreement with you on your main thesis that the organisation must not be so dominated by Great Powers as to deny to other countries share of responsibility commensurate with their standing in the world and run risk of failing to attract their interest and collaboration. We agree that in deciding which States, other than Great Powers, should be elected to Council, weight should be given to difference in power and status and functional importance, as well as to need for representation of different regions of world. But we feel that any system which attempted to classify secondary Powers in different categories might arouse antagonism to the organisation at the outset. Moreover, with reference to your paragraph 6, it is questionable whether any special weight should be given to military power as a qualification for election. It is by no means certain that it would operate to advantage of British Commonwealth countries. As regards suggestion that part played in present war by candidates for Council should be a relevant criterion, this will no doubt be the case to some extent in the early post-war years, but it will be impossible to ignore claim of European countries whose cooperation will be essential, though their contribution to victory may have been limited because, owing to their geographical situation, they have been overrun by the enemy. A feature common to both our own and United States papers† was that non-permanent members of Council should be elected by Assembly. As stated in paragraph 1 of my telegram Circular D. 1112 of August 8th,† our Delegation are to aim at a Council of 9 to 12 members and we infer that this would accord with your views. Beyond this, it may well be best to leave qualifications of various members for sharing in responsibility for dealing with different subjects to be recognised in practice by their selection for Committees, Chairmanships, etc.

3. Your paragraph 7. We agree that due place must be given to economic and social aims in any declaration of objects of Organisation. They were included in paragraph 12 of our Memorandum A.

4. Your paragraph 8. We had previously considered point you make about China and had concluded that on one hand a suggestion for differential treatment of China would meet with United States objections, and on other hand, for a long time to come, China is likely to depend so much on the other three Great Powers that she is unlikely to pursue an independent policy in matters affecting international peace and security on which the other three are in agreement.

5. Your paragraph 9. We agree that States not represented on Council must not feel that their interests are being affected by decisions taken over their heads. It should be possible to guard against this in setting up the machinery of the Organisation and we feel sure that our delegate will have this point in mind.

6. Your paragraph 10. It will have been seen that paragraph 14 of our Memorandum B does not go nearly as far as section VI of United States proposals. Your suggestion, however, that States which are not members of Council should be dispensed from observing Council decisions until endorsed by Assembly would seem open to objection that delay involved would endanger speed and consequent effectiveness of action to prevent aggression.

7. Your paragraph 11. It was not intention of paragraph 22 of Memorandum A that Assembly should be limited to right of information and criticism. We think it should be a forum for general ventilation of views and a focussing point for interest of public opinion in all countries. It may well prove desirable that it should have more extensive functions.

8. Your paragraph 12. We agree that Assembly should be in touch with economic and social activities. On other hand, when these are assigned to special functional bodies with their own constitutions and machinery for reaching decisions, there might be some risk, if Assembly were also given powers in these matters, of dissatisfied countries trying to use it to reopen matters already decided elsewhere. There is some advantage in specialised organisations being reasonably self-contained. Some coordination with each other will be needed, but while Assembly might well take an interest in their proceedings and policies, it might not be the best coordinating body.

9. Generally we would recall that proposals emerging from the Washington talks will be subject to further consideration among members of British Commonwealth and to discussion by all the United Nations.

2. World Security Organization.

Mr. Wrong stated that the Government was receiving a great deal of information on the proceedings at Dumbarton Oaks. On each day on which sessions were held, the United Kingdom delegate held meetings with the representatives of Commonwealth governments in Washington and outlined what had taken place. At present there was little which could be done except to study the proceedings in Washington. The general views of the Canadian Government had already been sent to London and there was not much which could be added to them just now.

Mr. wrong thought that if the experts of the Four Powers agreed upon proposals, even though their governments were not committed to them, these proposals would be published. It was the intention to submit the proposals to the other United Nations and it was felt certain that they could not be kept secret after they were given such wide circulation. He suspected that there would be some outcry from the other countries and that possibly some of them would refuse to take part in the organization as proposed by the Great Powers. The Dominion governments were in a special position in that they were the only governments aside from the great powers to know what was going on. All of them had taken a strong line concerning the rights of smaller countries. As in the case of the draft instrument of surrender,[19] the Canadian Government was putting forth views which might be expected from other lesser powers.

Mr. Wrong thought that at the next meeting of the Working Committee some concrete proposals might be ready for study. Urgent consideration might be necessary of such matters as the proposed form which sanctions might take. He felt more certain now than he had several weeks previously that there would be agreement between the Great Powers but not that this agreement would be palatable to the other countries. Canada had two points of view to consider. We did not want to throw a monkey-wrench into the harmony among the Great Powers but, on the other hand, we wanted to protect the Canadian position as well as that of other small countries. Canada had expressed her views firmly and he was inclined now to let some of the other countries carry on the argument for a while.

In answer to a question from Lt. Col. Collinson concerning the Soviet proposal for an International Air Force, Mr. Wrong said that although this proposal was somewhat obscure as it appeared in the text of the Soviet plan, it had been learned that in the Washington discussions the Soviet representatives had made it clear that they were interested in a really international Air Force.

It was agreed that additional documents on this subject would not be circulated to members until the terms of some agreed plan came from Washington.

give some fu rther statement of views on certain questions arising from the discussions on world organization. On the points which you have raised I can only give you my own opinions which are, I think, shared by some others in the Department. They are as follows:

1. I think it would be preferable for the document resulting from the Washington discussions to be submitted to other United Nations before it has been approved by the Governments of the U.S., U.K. and U.S.S.R. This would confront the other Governments with less of a fait accompli and make subsequent modification easier. The United States Government may in any case insist on this course with their eye on the Senate.

2. As to publication of the document, unless it is made public soon after the conversations end, its contents will almost certainly leak to the press. On the other hand there is something to be said for its communication to other Governments before publication. What might be done is to communicate it to other Governments as soon as possible after the meetings and to announce that it would be released on a definite date. Early publication has the advantage that public discussion and education on the proposals would be useful before Governments are committed.

3. You have asked more than once whether we could give guidance on the extent of the right of veto for the Great Powers in the Council which in our view could be accepted. I find it hard to make up my own mind on this. The issue may be more formal than real since on matters of the first importance it is not likely that any proposal would be put to the Council which any of the Great Powers was unwilling to accept. I have some sympathy with Smuts views on this matter[20] but I think the right of veto will have to be admitted in some degree in order to secure both U.S. and Soviet membership. It seems certainly undesirable that it should apply to the assumption of jurisdiction over disputes by the Council. I note that Section III C., paragraph 5, of the U.S. proposals recognizes that some separate voting procedure is needed for dealing with disputes in which one or more permanent members of the Council are directly involved. I gather that consideration of this problem has not yet taken place at the meetings.

4. With regard to the selection of non-permanent members of the Council, you will have noted from paragraph 2 of Dominions Office telegram No. 120 of August 21st that while they agree with our thesis they seem to consider it impracticable to attempt to give effect to it. I wonder whether this may not be a matter which is best left open for later consideration, especially in the light of the obligations assumed by Member States to furnish forces under the agreement contemplated in Section VI D., paragraph 2, of the U.S. memorandum.† This paragraph has been accepted in principle at Dumbarton Oaks. The main agreement might set the size of the Council and provide for election by the Assembly but specify that eligibility, etc., would be determined in a later agreement in the light of the military obligations assumed by Member States,

FUTURE WORLD ORGANIZATION.

A meeting was held in Room 123 on Tuesday, August 29th, to consider the reports which had been received of the conversations on world security taking place at Dumbarton Oaks. The following present: N. A. Robertson, A. D. P. Heeney, H. H. Wrong, J. E. Read, H. L. Keenleyside, P. E. Renaud, G. de T. Glazebrook, F. H. Soward, J. W. Holmes.

Mr. Wrong reviewed in detail the views which had been expressed on the documents submitted by the United Kingdom, United States, and Soviet Governments.[21]. In the course of the discussion the following ideas were put forth:

1. Those present agreed with the United Kingdom and United States view that functional bodies to deal with economic and social questions should be linked to the security organization. The possibility was suggested that there might be a single Assembly but that the Council as envisaged in current proposals should be limited in its function to responsibility for security. While primary responsibility for control of the economic and social organizations would rest with the Assembly, a separate executive council for economic and social purposes would be established. Representation on the latter Council would be based on economic rather than military importance.

2. With regard to the selection of non-permanent members of the Council it was suggested that no attempt be made in the present instrument to establish criteria for membership and that the first election to the Council should be ad hoc. A separate agreement would be made in which it would be provided that eligibility for membership would be based on the tangible contribution which the state was prepared to make to the forces needed for maintaining security and the financial contribution it was prepared to make to the world organization. In general it was hoped that ways might be found to emphasize the responsibilities and obligations rather than the prestige which should be associated with membership on the Council.

3. The possibility was considered of adopting the reverse lend-lease principle to govern the contributions which might be required from states which could not or would not contribute armed forces. It was suggested that pecuniary contributions might be more realistic than the offers of armed forces of dubious value.

4. Consideration was given to a proposal that the Canadian Government should seek to place in the hands of all the United Nations with which it had diplomatic relations a statement of Canadian views on the organization of security, with emphasis on the point of view of the lesser powers. It was thought that it might be advisable to begin in advance to proselytize other governments in the view that distinctions should be broken down so far as possible between the Great Powers and the other states. The question was raised as to whether this expression should come before the draft prepared by the Great Powers was submitted to the other states or whether it should come as a comment on this draft after it had been circulated.

5. The recommendation was made that the draft agreed upon at Dumbarton Oaks should be submitted to the other governments before it had been ratified by the Four Governments concerned in its preparation. The danger that the draft would not remain secret after it had been distributed was recognized, and it was suggested that publication be postponed until a definite date shortly after it had been distributed.

FUTURE WORLD ORGANIZATION;
PROGRESS OF FOUR POWER DISCUSSIONS

19. THE ASSISTANT UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported on the progress of current discussions between the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R.

These discussions were to be followed by similar discussions between the United Kingdom, the United States and China, and subsequently it was anticipated that an agreed document would be submitted to the United Nations as a preliminary to an international conference.

Reports† of the Washington meetings from the Canadian Embassy and from the U.K. government had been very full. In general, the plans under consideration involved the setting up of an organization to be composed of an "Assembly" and a "Council," although the exact powers of each had not yet been very clearly defined. The Council would have more extensive powers than those of the Council of the League of Nations, and it would be in a position to take jurisdiction over disputes, recommend settlements, impose sanctions, and call for military action. Its decisions would be binding on all members. The Assembly would be more in the nature of a forum for open discussion and its recommendations were not likely to be binding on the Council.

Decisions of the Assembly would, on important questions, probably be by two-thirds majority, but in the Council it was likely that the concurrence of all of the Great Powers would be required.

The Council would be composed of permanent members (the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and China, and, at a later date, France) and probably six non-permanent members. There would also be a Secretary General and a new or revised World Court. A special agreement was contemplated by which member nations would allocate certain quotas of their national forces and other facilities to be at the disposal of the Council if the Council decided that military action was required to deal with a dispute.

Points of particular concern to Canada were: the danger in allowing a permanent member of the Council to vote in a dispute to which it was a party, thus granting it a virtual right of veto; the extent to which the Assembly should have general responsibility for the supervision of functional organizations in the social and economic field; and the method by which non-permanent members would be selected for the Council. It might be desirable, in this connection, to suggest to the U.K. government that in the rules governing selection consideration should be given to the size of national forces to be made available to the international security organization and the financial appropriations made to this and other international organizations.

Some functional criteria of this character would help to protect the position of Canada and other intermediate nations.

20. THE PRIME MINISTER drew attention to the vulnerability of Canada in any future world war and to the importance to Canada of the function that a powerful and effective world organization might perform in such an event; Canada would be in a much more difficult position if no such world security organization were established. For this reason alone it would merit Canadian support.

21. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, noted the report submitted, agreeing that a communication to the U.K. government be prepared for approval of the Prime Minister, covering points of particular interest to Canada along the lines indicated in the discussion.

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. Post-War World Organization.

At Cadogan's meeting last evening he told us that considerable progress had been made in the Organization Sub-Committee on the functions of the Assembly and procedure for dealing with threats to and breaches of the peace. Several important points, however, have been reserved for further discussion today, so I will not send you details of what has happened until these points are cleared up.

2. Personally, I am somewhat encouraged by the developments of the last two or three days. Whereas the Russian draft, which is the least favourable to the intermediate and smaller States' position, was accepted as the basis of discussion at the Conference, they now seem to have got pretty well away from that draft, and the United States draft is really the one that is being used. This is, I think, the best of the three drafts from many points of view.

3. A Sub-Committee on Nomenclature is recommending that the Organization be called merely "The United Nations," the basic instrument to be known as "The Charter," and that the general body be called "The General Assembly" and the smaller body "The Security Council." The Chairman of these bodies will be known as Presidents, and the Chief Executive Officer as the Secretary-General.

4. The Legal Sub-Committee has recommended that the Permanent Court should be attached to the Organization and its statute become a part of the Charter. The Russians, somewhat surprisingly, advocate that the statute should not be considered at the Dumbarton Oaks meeting, but should be reserved for the general United Nations Conference.

5. I had a long talk with Hickerson yesterday about Dumbarton Oaks developments and he gave me the impression, after I had discussed with him our preoccupation that the role of the intermediate and smaller States was being somewhat neglected in the proposed Organization, that the Americans were very alive to this, more so than the British, and that if we had any ideas on the subject they would be glad to get them. Do you not think it might be wise if I discussed with him personally and, of course, non-commitally, in greater detail than I have already done, our views on this subject? Ends.

TELEGRAM 157 Ottawa, September 4, 1944

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET. Your telegram No. 120 of August 21st. Future World Organization. We are very grateful for the information on the course of the talks at Dumbarton Oaks given in your Circular telegrams† and conveyed by Sir Alexander Cadogan to the Canadian Minister in Washington. Since the prospects are bright that the discussions will soon end in agreement, we think it timely to supplement our previous comments as follows.

2. We continue to attach importance to the procedure governing the selection of non-permanent members of the Council, and we feel that it would be unfortunate if the statement approved at Dumbarton Oaks were only to provide that there should be probably six members elected by the Assembly for a term of perhaps two years. The course of events at the last International Labour Conference and at the Bretton Woods meeting showed how powerful and at times distorting can be the influence of blocs of states such as the Latin American group. At Bretton Woods 19 of the 44 delegations represented Latin American countries. If the new world organization includes as original members the same countries, the Latin American group would make up half the states (19 out of 39) available for selection for non-permanent Council seats. Unless rules governing eligibility are developed, a claim for three of the six elective seats is almost certain. The suggestion of the United States delegation that Brazil should have a permanent seat naturally increases our concern and we have been glad to learn that this has been strongly opposed by the British representatives.

3. Since the prevention of war is the main function of the Council and since under the scheme its final sanction will be to employ the forces placed at its disposal by Member States in the contemplated special military agreement, we continue to think that non-permanent membership should in some way be related to a dispassionate appraisal of the probable effective contribution of states to the maintenance of security. You will, I am sure, appreciate how difficult it would be for Canada, after enlisting nearly one million persons in her armed forces and trebling her national debt in order to assist in restoring peace, to accept a situation of parity in this respect with the Dominican Republic or Salvador.

4. If it is not possible to work out during the Washington talks an agreement embodying this principle (which was further developed in paras. 4-6 of our telegram No. 130 of August 2nd) we suggest that in the agreed document recognition should be given to the validity of the principle, and provision made that eligibility for election to the Council should be the subject of a later agreement embodying such criteria as the responsibilities accepted by Member States in the proposed special military agreement whereby countries will place forces and facilities at the Council's disposal, and also the financial contribution of Member States to the expenses of the organization.

5. With regard to voting in the Council, we welcome the conversion of the United States delegation to the United Kingdom view that parties to a dispute, whether permanent or elected members, should not vote. It is not clear to us whether any further restriction is contemplated on the requirement of unanimity among the Great Powers. We consider that this requirement should at least not be imposed for decisions concerning the assumption of jurisdiction over disputes by the Council, and that it should, if possible, be limited to decisions on measures for the enforcement of settlements. It is in fact very unlikely that any important question would be put to the Council over the opposition of the Soviet, United States, or United Kingdom representative, and still more unlikely that if such a question were put two-thirds of the members would support it. Moreover the more elaborately the special position of the Great Powers is defined, the harder will it be to convince public opinion in secondary states that they have a responsible role in the new organization.

6. We have been glad to note your concurrence in the views expressed in paragraphs 9 and 10 of our telegram No. 130 to the effect that states not represented on the Council should have the right of effective participation when matters closely touching their interests are before the Council and that some provision should be made for associating them in decisions of the Council which call for action on their part in grave issues. We hope that the United Kingdom delegation will succeed in securing satisfactory provisions under this head.

7. This telegram is being repeated to the Canadian Minister in Washington with instructions to inform Sir Alexander Cadogan of its contents.

FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. World Organization. Cadogan made a further report to us last night on the Dumbarton discussions. The Steering Committee and the Formulation Committee worked on drafts over the week-end of the Chapters of the "Charter" dealing with the Council, arrangements for the maintenance of peace and security, the International Court, and the Military Commission. These drafts, however, could not include an agreed text on several very important points owing to the inability of the Soviet delegation to make any concessions. They have therefore not yet been telegraphed to London and therefore copies were not given to us. Not having heard from Moscow, the Soviet delegates are standing firm on their original insistence of unrestricted and unlimited veto power and on the exclusion of economic and social questions from the Charter of the Organization. Cadogan seemed rather more despondent last night than previously about the Soviet attitude, which, if maintained, would, of course, make agreement here impossible. He hinted that action on a high level might have to be considered.

2. Provision is made in the draft dealing with the composition of the Council for France becoming a permanent member "in due course." The functions of the Council seem to be based largely on the United States draft, but Cadogan is trying to secure the omission, at my request, of the provision that the Council "would represent and act on behalf of all members of the Organization," etc. The United States and Soviet have at least agreed to consider this. There is, however, a provision that all member States are obligated to accept the decisions of the Council. In this connection, I pointed out that the attitude to such a provision of the secondary States, including Canada, would be greatly influenced by what was done to ensure that non-member States should somehow be associated with such decisions if they were specifically and importantly affected by them. In this connection, the Steering Committee is considering a general provision to the effect that non-member States will be invited to attend Council meetings whenever they are parties to a dispute being considered or whenever the Council considers the interests of a non-member State are especially affected by the matter under consideration. In this connection, when I read your teletype EX-3685 of September 4th[22] to the meeting, I emphasized the importance you attached to paragraph 6. Holmes of the Dominions Office pointed out that your interpretation of paragraphs 5 and 6 of Dominions Office telegram No. 120 of August 21st goes somewhat further than he would have thought justified by their language. Cadogan also asked whether we could produce a specific form of words which would satisfy the views expressed in paragraph 6 of your September 4th teletype. What exactly do we mean by "association" in contrast with "consultation"? Would we be satisfied with a general provision for prior "consultation" or "association," or would we also expect specific provisions in the clauses of the Charter dealing with measures not involving the use of armed force and measures involving the use of armed force (see United States draft 6, C and D)?†

3. Cadogan thought we were protected in regard to measures involving the use of armed force by the agreements which would have to be reached with each separate State to provide quotas. I pointed out, however, that this agreement had nothing to do with the decisions of the Council as to when the quotas so provided should be used. Furthermore, whereas the United States draft had provided that economic, financial, and commercial assistance necessary to support action involving the use of force, would be afforded only after the terms had been determined in consultation between the Executive Council and the member States, this provision seems to have been left out in the paragraphs on this subject now being considered by the Steering Committee.

4. If you could produce a text or texts on these points which would satisfy us and which would ensure "consultation" or "association," or both, it would be helpful for me here. I shall myself try to work something out and, if successful, will teletype it to you.

5. In paragraph 12 of my teletype WA-5156 of September 2nd† I stated that the United Kingdom were opposed to the representation of Council members only on the Military Commission. It would appear now, however, that the Steering Committee have at least tentatively agreed that this Commission should consist of the permanent members of the Council only, with others being called in when required; something along the lines of the present Combined Chiefs of Staff Committee. Ends.

FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: World Organization.

The position of non-member States in respect of action taken by the Council to maintain or restore peace might be safeguarded as follows:

(a) Measures Not Involving The Use of Armed Force.

The obligation on all States to take part in collective economic, commercial, and financial measures decided on by the Council might be qualified by the following provision:

"The terms under which the above obligation comes into force shall be decided in consultation between (or, alternatively, by agreement between) the Executive Council and the member State concerned."

(b) Measures Involving The Use Of Force.

The provision in the United States draft, D (2), should be qualified by the following: "The terms under which an undertaking under (2) above should come into force shall be decided after consultation between (or, alternatively, by agreement between) the Executive Council and the member State concerned."

(c) The provision in the United States draft D (5) (a) should be retained.

It might be possible to secure the adoption now of the above provisions, though I am not too optimistic about this, if we use "consultation" instead of "agreement." If we prefer "agreement," I think the only possibility of securing support here would be by the addition to the above paragraphs, after the words "member State concerned," of something like the following:

"If the co-operation of that State is necessary for the success of the measures being taken by the Council." Ends.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for Pearson from Robertson and Wrong, Begins: Your WA-5192 of September 5th. I think that you took the right line in your comments to Cadogan. With reference to your paragraph 3 I suppose that they realize that, unless states not represented on the Council can participate in decisions involving the use of the forces and facilities which they have undertaken to provide under the military agreement, the difficulty of negotiating a satisfactory military agreement will be much increased; it seems quite likely that states not permanent members of the Council would in such circumstances be very reluctant to undertake to furnish a proportionate quota of their forces and it might turn out that only the great powers would be prepared to provide any quotas.

2. I think, therefore, that there is a strong practical case either for states contributing armed forces to participate in decisions of the Council to impose military sanctions, or for requiring such decisions to be binding only on Council members unless and until they have been ratified by the Assembly. The difficulties surrounding economic sanctions are similar. In their case the countries most affected (apart from states bordering on the subject of the sanctions) would be the large trading countries. The principle enumerated in paragraph 15 of U.K. Memorandum A that power and responsibility should be made to coincide as far as possible appears to indicate that the concurrence of important trading countries should be given in decisions involving the application of economic sanctions. In this regard, of course, Canada far outranks both the Soviet Union and China on the basis of prewar trade.

3. It is difficult to see how the Canadian Government could secure the support of Parliament and the public for the surrender to the Council of full responsibility for, in the extreme case, sending into action a substantial quota of the Canadian armed forces without themselves being a party to the decision. This would be too serious a denial of responsible Government to be swallowed in the present state of international political organization. Much the same argument applies also to the imposition of economic sanctions involving a real disturbance in the Canadian economy.

4. If the great powers maintain a complete veto right for themselves (except possibly in case of disputes in which they are involved) their surrender of sovereignty scarcely exceeds what they all formally renounced in the Kellogg-Briand Pact. They commit themselves to a procedure but retain liberty to block the employment of the procedure. They propose, however, that other states should not only be bound by the procedure but should (unless they happen to be elected to the Council) be bound to do their share in executing decisions in the framing of which they have had no part. This might not matter much in the case of a considerable number of little countries whose collaboration in carrying out Council decisions would be unimportant. The serious difficulties concern the position of the chief secondary states, the cooperation of some at least of which would probably always be essential in the effective application of either military or economic sanctions.

5. The result to be aimed at is fairly clear although it is difficult to suggest an exact formula: Any Government required to participate in the execution of a decision which involves substantial action on its part should be placed in a position in which it can satisfy its legislature and people that it has had a responsible share in the taking of the decision.

6. Our arguments in favour of differentiating between states on the basis of their relative importance have previously been concerned mainly with the election of members of the Council. The same considerations, however, apply to the association of certain states not on the Council with its decisions. There are disturbing signs that the United States will have difficulty in persuading Congress to agree that the allotted quota of their forces should be used by the Council without authority of Congress in each case. This seems to be straining at a gnat when the chief secondary states may be asked to swallow a camel.

7. The formula which you propose in your message WA-5210 may, I think, be safely passed on as a useful suggestion for dealing with a central problem. You might try out the various alternatives you incorporate starting with a provision requiring "agreement" under both (a) and (b). The suggested qualification at the end of your message might be improved so as to read "if the cooperation of that state is important towards the success of the measures being taken by the Council." Certainly the adoption of your suggestions would make it a good deal easier to explain and defend full Canadian adhesion to the new organization.

TELETYPE WA-5269 Washington, September 8, 1944

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. World Organization.

We had a long discussion with Cadogan yesterday, at which Angus was present. Cadogan read us various new drafts which had been tentatively agreed on, though there are still Soviet reservations to many of the important provisions. The maintenance by the Soviet of these reservations will certainly alter the timetable, and the Three-Power discussions will not now be finished before the middle of next week at the earliest. The points on which the Soviet remain unmoved are:

(1) The abandonment of the right of veto, when party to a dispute (Cadogan said the United Kingdom has no intention of giving in on this point).

(2) The exclusion of all reference to economic and social questions.

(3) Whether decisions of the Council should be by a simple majority or two-thirds vote. The Soviet still strongly favour a simple majority. Cadogan thinks that the Soviet may be trying to work up to a bargain by which they will agree to the inclusion of economic and social questions, in return for the unqualified recognition of the right of veto. Cadogan said that there was no possibility of any such bargain being accepted. He also added that it may well be that some of the Russian difficulties are due to the apparent inability of Gromyko,[23] to understand the meaning or importance of some of the United States and United Kingdom proposals. Personally, I would be somewhat surprised if this were true. Cadogan insists however that Gromyko is often very obtuse.

I made the following comments on certain of the provisions tentatively agreed on and which Cadogan had read.

(1) I called attention to the fact that no provision had been made for ineligibility of election to the Council in certain circumstances, e.g., financial default or refusal to make quota agreements. Cadogan said that he would bring this up today.

(2) I expressed disappointment that the words, "the Council should in all cases act on behalf of all members of the Organization," remained in the section on functions and powers of the Council. Cadogan said that he would try again to get them deleted.

(3) There has been some discussion whether the right of veto could, as suggested by us, be defined, and exclude, at least, procedural questions. The United Kingdom were supporting this, and I emphasized again the desirability of definition and limitation.

(4) As the result, I think, of our previous representations, Cadogan had now succeeded in getting agreement on the following sentence: "Any State, member of the Organization, not having a seat on the Council, should be invited by the Council to attend and participate in (the United States and the U.S.S.R. wished this to be changed to 'to be heard during,' but the United Kingdom persuaded them to accept 'participate') the consideration of any dispute to which it is a party, or whenever the Council considers the interests of such a State are specially affected."

If these last lines are broadly interpreted, they might go a considerable distance to ensure that Canada and other States would not be asked to supply forces or impose economic sanctions without prior consultation.

[23]L'ambassadeur de l'Union soviétique aux États-Unis.
Ambassador of Soviet Union in United States.

This paragraph is, I think, important, and I doubt whether it would have been included if we had not pressed for it.

Cadogan said that they had now been instructed by London to modify their opposition to the Soviet proposal for an International Air Force. They are authorized at least to support inclusion in the Charter of a recommendation that this question be given further study. Cadogan thinks that the United States is also more favourable to the idea than formerly. I said that I felt sure this change of attitude would be welcomed by us; that on many grounds it was undesirable to reject outright the Soviet proposal; that even a token International Air Force would have great symbolic value; that it would be much easier for States to accept automatic jurisdiction of the Council over their contributions to an International Force than over national quotas or the imposition of economic sanctions.

Sir Owen Dixon[24] read the Australian statement which has been telegraphed to you† and put forward the view that Australia might have some claim to membership on the Council as representing the southwestern Pacific area. Berendsen[25] made a rather emphatic statement along the lines of those he had previously made at these meetings. Dr. Gie[26] hoped that serious consideration was being given to General Smuts' Regional Council ideas. Cadogan said that political Regional Councils would not be supported by the United Kingdom, but Regional Security Councils for implementing the action decided on by the Organization might not be open to the same objection. These were being considered.

I called attention to the Canadian views on regionalism as already expressed.

Cadogan said that the United States were very anxious to press ahead with the discussions so as to make possible a United Nations meeting in October. Personally, I do not see how this can be done but there seems no doubt that the Americans will try to bring it about. I am afraid that this hurry on their part may result in two things:

(1) Less time for consideration of the plan by the other United Nations before the general Conference, and

(2) The early appearance of the plan, either authorized or unauthorized in the press.

This would certainly mean some kind of Congressional discussion. Cadogan also was definite yesterday that it would be practically impossible to avoid a discussion in the House of Commons in London before the United Nations Conference. I think he has heard again from London on this. The United Kingdom would not expect any decision to be taken by Parliament, but would undoubtedly have to yield to the demand that members be given a chance to express their views.

Toward the end of the meeting, I read a memorandum† based on your teletype EX-3733 of September 6th, which, if I may say so, was a very good statement indeed and made, I think, an impression on the meeting. I pointed out our difficulty in putting forward specific and practical proposals embodying our views because we did not have an agreed text before us to which we could suggest amendments. However, I then said that our point of view on the position of non-member States in relation to Council decisions would probably be met if the following paragraph could be inserted after that section of the report dealing with measures not involving the use of armed force:

"The terms under which the above application comes into force shall be determined by agreement between the Executive Council and a non-member State, if the co-operation of that State is important toward the success of the measures being taken by the Council."

A similar provision (with a few consequential verbal changes) would be inserted after the section dealing with measures involving the use of armed force.

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. World Organization. Cadogan reported to us this afternoon on a meeting with Stettinius and Gromyko this morning at which considerable progress was made in reaching agreement on disputed points. The situation now is that the Russians still reserve their position regarding an unqualified veto for all the permanent members, but have agreed to the inclusion of economic and social questions in the functions of the Organization and, for that purpose, to accept as a basis the United States Draft dealing with this matter. This is an important advance. In return, the Council decisions will probably be by a simple rather than a two-thirds majority, the Americans supporting the Russians on this point. Cadogan's instructions permit him to accept a simple majority if this is the only point standing in the way of complete agreement all along the line. Therefore, he will give way here if the Russians do not insist on the unqualified veto. Cadogan still insists, and of course rightly so, that there can be no compromise here. Also, provisions for suspension and expulsion, and not merely suspension only, have been accepted, and this will be considered a concession by the Russians.

2. Efforts are also being made to deal with the International Air Force proposal. The Americans may now propose as a substitute some provision to the effect that the members of the Organization will earmark certain forces "immediately available for combined action" if required. I do not myself see much distinction between this and the original provisions for quota forces, but there may be some value in it.

3. On the question of eligibility of members for election to the Council, Cadogan thinks that they might now be able to insert a clause to the following effect: "Due regard being given to their contribution to the maintenance of peace and security." I told Cadogan that this was undoubtedly an improvement but did not go, of course, very far. I also told Cadogan that the acceptance of a simple, rather than a two-thirds majority, for decisions of the Council, would add to our difficulties in accepting such decisions without prior agreement or consultation when they involved positive obligations.

4. The United Kingdom and United States are trying to persuade the Russians to allow the Chinese conversations to begin before the Three-Power conversations end. They have not received much encouragement as yet, but if this can be done it might enable the original timetable to be carried out and the work to be finished at the end of next week.

5. Tonight the Russians are taking the British to a baseball game. This represents concessions on both sides. Ends.

FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION

TOP SECRET. Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Your WA-5269 of September 8th. World Organization.

1. We have received from London the draft paragraphs submitted by Formulation Committee.[†] I assume these texts are available to you in Washington. They contain some drafting defects but there may be some advantage in not seeking to eliminate these since if they are included in the final document this might make its later amendment easier. The texts have been received with request to observe "greatest possible security precautions." Here are some comments on points which might be useful to you at your meetings with Cadogan.

2. Paragraph V.B. 1 of draft would prohibit the Assembly from making recommendations on its own initiative on matters relating to peace and security which are under consideration by the Council. There are some good arguments for such a provision, provided that the words "under consideration by the Council" are not interpreted restrictively. It would, for instance, be going much too far if this was interpreted as inhibiting the Assembly from making proposals on a question which might have been placed on the Agenda of the Council by one member without any action having been taken on it. I think that items at times appeared on the agenda of the League Council for meeting after meeting without consideration being given to them.

3. By paragraph V.B. 2 the Council must recommend new members for admission by the Assembly. If the participation of the Council is required at all, I think that it would be better to substitute "with the concurrence of the Council" for "upon a recommendation of the Council."

4. By the next paragraph of the draft the power of suspension can only be exercised in the case of states against which "final preventive or enforcement action shall have been taken by the Council." I am doubtful about the word "final"; finality is always hard to determine but in this context it would seem to imply the application of military sanctions. The power of suspension at an earlier stage might in certain circumstances be useful.

5. In paragraph V.C. "Voting," the U.S. suggestion that voting strength on budgetary matters should be weighted in accordance with the contributions of Member States has been dropped. I had hoped that at least this modest recognition of making some constitutional allowance for the differing responsibilities of Member States might be retained. Incidentally, if an International Air Force were to be set up, budgetary questions (which always consumed a lot of time at the League) would take on a new importance.

6. The provisions for election of non-permanent members of the Council contained in V.B. 4 and VI.A impose no restriction at all on eligibility for non-permanent seats. Have you any indication that the views which we put forward in our telegrams to the Dominions Office of August 2nd and September 4th have been discussed at all during the meetings? The United Kingdom in Memorandum A recognized "that this subject will need careful examination." We have not received a reply to our last telegram to Dominions Office. I am inclined to think that if nothing is done at Dumbarton Oaks on this point there will be great difficulty in dealing with it satisfactorily at a general conference of United Nations.

7. I note that you have already drawn Cadogan's attention to the language of VI.B. 3 stating that the Council should in all cases act on behalf of all members. I quite agree with your objection. It is curious that the U.S. support the inclusion of this provision after stoutly resisting the inclusion of similar language in the Draft Instrument of Surrender for Germany[27] on the ground that the use of the phrase "on behalf of" implies prior consultation with and agreement of all concerned.

8. I am glad to hear that in paragraph VI.D. 4 the word "participate" has now been substituted for "to be heard." If they can add your draft additional paragraph this will make the whole scheme more easily acceptable by a number of important secondary states. On a point of language your draft addition should, I think, be changed by substituting for "a non-Member state" the words "a Member State not represented on the Council."

[27]Voir le volume 10, document 677./See Volume 10, Document 677.

9. I fully agree with the views which you expressed against the outright rejection of the Soviet suggestion for an International Air Force and I think that this position would be supported by the Government. We have received from the Dominions Office the following draft provision which Cadogan has been authorized to support; I think that they might go further than this by requiring the Council rather than Member States to examine the practicability of the proposal.

"In order to increase the speed with which urgent military measures could be taken, member states should undertake to examine the practicability of organising contingents from National Air Forces into an International Air Force, the composition of which would be determined by the Council with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee."

10. As for the possibility of holding a general conference in October, I assume that the U.S. are anxious to bring this about so that the conference may be proceeding during the last stages of the election campaign and may assist in keeping the issues out of political controversy. I think that a conference held so soon would inevitably be poorly organized and would probably be of very long duration. We are, however, better prepared to participate in it than the other Allied Governments, except for the Great Powers, and I think that we can leave it to others to make the inevitable objections. Ends.

TOP SECRET. Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: My immediately preceding message was written before I received your WA-5284 of September 8th which I am glad to notice reports some important progress on the Soviet side. Cadogan's suggestion mentioned in your paragraph 3 regarding eligibility for election to the Council is a small sop to us on a point which we have particularly emphasized. I would much prefer a separate paragraph laying down the general principle even if its application will have to be left for later agreement.

2. One could, of course, comment on the drafts which have emerged almost indefinitely but in my preceding message I have tried only to pick out some points on which a further word from you might influence the result. We shall probably be joined by some less restrained critics when other Governments receive the draft charter. Ends.

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] September 10, 1944

This note is inspired by a telephone conversation with Pearson this morning.

1. He is discouraged over possibility of making progress with our point of view on security questions. U.K. have put it forward without getting anywhere with U.S. or U.S.S.R. Dunn[29] will not even consider Cadogan's sop to us — a proviso that due regard should be paid to military contribution in selecting temporary members for the Council. Pearson spent until after midnight last night with the British going over the ground.

2. He has emphasized that the plan in present form will be strenuously opposed by other countries and that we are trying, not to secure a special position for Canada, but to propose changes which will make the plan more acceptable at a general conference. The primary concern in Washington is to get agreement among the three powers, especially with the U.S.S.R.

3. The only major point of difference still outstanding between them is the Russian refusal to forego the right of veto in consideration of disputes to which they are a party. Malkin[30] surprised him by saying that in his view this point had narrowed to the question whether a great power voted on the assumption of jurisdiction over such a dispute, and that a great power might still vote (with right of veto) over recommendations or sanctions once jurisdiction had been taken — the U.S. and U.K. would accept this. While such a provision would look bad, he agreed that in practice it would make little difference as sanctions against a great power were most unlikely. Jebb thinks Malkin may be mistaken, and Pearson will check this with Cadogan. He wanted to be sure of the interpretation to be placed on para 5. of our telegram to London of September 4th on this point. I told him that we believed that no country involved in a dispute should vote in the Council, whether it was a permanent member or not. This is what he had understood.

4. He is going to talk to some of the Americans. Dunn and Pasvolsky are inaccessible. He suggested that we might talk to Atherton.

5. They are set on a general conference in October. Pearson says this will undoubtedly be discussed at Quebec. He agrees that the difficulties over this ought to be made by other countries, not by us.

6. I am disturbed by the serious possibility that the plan now being framed will not be accepted by a considerable number of states. Even if it were accepted, I doubt that states other than Great Powers would go on to consent to place quotas of their forces and military facilities at the disposal of the Council. This would pretty well reduce the whole organization to an alliance between great powers, with frills attached to give it the appearance of general participation. One frill would be the right of the five permanent Council members plus one other to the active cooperation of all member states in the execution of decisions on which they might reach agreement between themselves.

7. The "sovereign equality" of states becomes, in practice, the sovereign equality of Great Powers. Canada would probably be less directly affected by such a plan than any of the smaller countries in Europe or Asia. The smaller countries in those continents, or at any rate those most exposed from the point of view of security, would probably be compelled to become clients of a Great Power — in Europe either of the U.K. or of the U.S.S.R. — thus creating new spheres of influence and a new balance of power. This would greatly complicate intra-Commonwealth relations; and its long-term effect might well be disastrous. It is also important for the prestige of the Council that its elected members should not be clients of one or other Great Power, always supporting its position.

8. Dewey has already raised the issue of the place of smaller countries. It looks as though the answers given by the President and Hull would be shown to be specious as soon as the plan is made public. Thus we may find ourselves in the position of having the issue injected into the U.S. election, with our sympathies with Dewey and not with the President. I do not like the prospect of Canada having, in her own vital interest, to adopt publicly a position supported by the opposition candidate and resisted by the Administration. We might have no other choice if the conference takes place before the election.

9. I am inclined to believe that it would be better if the agreement at Dumbarton Oaks left open some of these questions for later settlement, perhaps by including alternative drafts, or else by specifically referring certain unresolved issues to the general conference for decision. It is also to be hoped that the agreement will be in form an agreement between experts, not formally approved by the three governments.

10. If these matters are raised at Quebec, the sooner the better. It is preferable that the Washington discussions should be prolonged by new instructions to the delegations than that their result should be abortive.

TELEGRAM 144 London, September 12, 1944

TOP SECRET. Addressed Canada No. 144, repeated by Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to United Kingdom Embassy, Washington, for Sir A. Cadogan. Your telegram September 4th, No. 157. World Organization.

We are glad to have this further expression of your views.

2. In regard to eligibility for Council, we fully sympathise with your feelings about geographical blocs and secondary States.

3. As to former, however, we think it inevitable and indeed desirable that whatever the principles of election, non-permanent members should in practice reflect interests of different regions of world. We think that there is bound to be some Latin-American representation on Council, though it seems unlikely that Assembly would agree to elect as many as three Latin-American countries, if only because remaining three seats would probably be considered insufficient representation for other parts of world.

4. We are still reluctant to attempt to deal with position of minor States by writing into Charter of Organization a formal differentiation between secondary States. To provide, even by implication, that some States are ineligible for Council would render Organization unattractive to them from start and might be regarded as infringing principle of Sovereign equality on which Organization is to be based. We alluded in paragraph 29 of Memorandum A to difficulty of finding a principle corresponding to that regulating election of Governing Body of I.L.O. which would be applicable to a political organization. Military strength alone would not be qualification for dealing with economic and social matters, inclusion of which we understand you to favour like ourselves. We feel, however, with you that something might well be gained by adding words which would militate against election of States which by any criterion are unimportant. United Kingdom delegation have therefore been authorized to propose insertion after words "non-permanent seats" in paragraph VI.A of draft text in my telegram of September 12th, Circular D.1338† of following words; "due regard being paid to their contribution towards maintenance of peace and security and towards the other purposes of the Organization." Delegation are doubtful whether they will succeed in securing this amendment but will continue to do their best to obtain some wording of this kind.

5. Your paragraph 5, voting in Council. After consultation with United Kingdom delegation we understand that you have in mind here disputes to which a Great Power is not (repeat not) a party. United Kingdom delegation expressed opinion, which we share, that if Soviet Delegation come round to our and United States view we should see great difficulty in securing any further departure from requirement of Great Power unanimity to which Soviet delegation attach great importance.

6. Your paragraph 6. In regard to first part, United Kingdom delegation have secured inclusion in section VI.D(4) and (5) of draft text of words "and to participate in discussion." See also last sentence of section VIII B.9 as regards association with proposed Military Committee.

7. In regard to second part of your paragraph 6 we had not contemplated that it would be possible to devise automatic machinery under which in all cases States not on Council could be associated with decisions of Council. Ends.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] September 16, 1944

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

We had a discussion with Cadogan yesterday on the position reached at Dumbarton Oaks. There is, at the moment, a deadlock with the Russians on an important point, but if this is resolved the United Kingdom and U.S.S.R. will not oppose pressure from the United States to convene a United Nations conference on world organization, with the tentative date set for October 25th.

As to the deadlock, this comes from a firm Soviet refusal to agree that parties to a dispute should not vote in the Council when that dispute was under consideration. They wish to preserve their own absolute right of veto in a form which would even prevent the Council from considering any complaint made against them by any other state. Under the Covenant, parties to a dispute could not vote and thus, so far as the Great Powers are concerned, the Russians are pressing for a requirement of unanimity more stringent than that imposed in the League. There is talk of a compromise, depriving parties to a dispute of the right to vote except at the final stage involving the imposition of sanctions, but Cadogan said that neither Mr. Churchill nor Mr. Eden was ready to agree.

That is the immediate issue. If it is resolved, the proposed procedure of holding a conference in about six weeks, on the basis of the present scheme, seems to present some very awkward political problems, perhaps more awkward in the case of Canada than of any other country. The plan is wide open to attack in Canada by three sections of opinion, the attacks all centering round one of its central features — a Council possessing great authority to enforce settlements of disputes and to require all member states to assist in enforcement, while giving inside the Council a very special position to the Great Powers.

From the point of view of Canadian nationalists, especially in French Canada, this scheme can be represented as depriving Canada of control of its own policies and resources and subjecting Canada to the direction of a body in which Russia may have a preponderant influence. The charge could be made that its acceptance would constitute a surrender of responsible government.

From the point of view of the imperialists, they could readily revive the demand for a common Commonwealth front and a single Commonwealth voice as being the only way in which Canada could exert her proper influence in the world organization. They could say that it is clear from the scheme that the world of tomorrow will be dominated by Great Powers, and could charge the Government with having thrown away a golden opportunity to participate directly in the controlling group.

From the point of view of the internationalists, the criticisms to be made are fairly obvious. The plan incorporates, as one of its principles, the doctrine of the sovereign equality of states, but in fact what it provides is for the sovereign equality of Great Powers. All the other states of the world are, it is true, treated on a basis of equality, but it is an equality of inferiority of status.

These are the three main lines of attack corresponding to sections of Canadian opinion which seem certain to be made when the plan becomes public. The issues will be injected into the Canadian election. If the present timetable is followed, the issues are also likely to be injected into the American election, with the criticisms which we would presumably be bound to advance at an international conference snapped up by the Republicans for use in the campaign. Mr. Dewey has already depicted himself as the opponent of Great Power dictatorship and the champion of a truer internationalism giving due weight to smaller states.

I think that those concerned with the Three Power talks in Washington are so vitally interested in securing agreement between themselves that they have not really weighed the proposals from the point of view of countries outside the inner circle. It is likely that they will be greatly surprised by the criticisms from nearly all quarters which will greet publication of the plan. I doubt whether many states would agree to join the international organization if it is pushed through in the form now proposed.

1. Mahoney and Reid are today attending meeting at British Embassy at 6 p.m. which might provide an opportunity, if you so desire, to make suggestions on revision of communiqué which it is proposed to issue some time after about September 27th. The text of this communiqué is given in paragraph 5 of our WA-5453 and does not seem entirely satisfactory from our point of view:

(a) It appears that the text of the proposals on which agreement has been reached is to be published before communication to the other United Nations.

(b) The draft statement does not explicitly state that the proposals as published are the views of experts and do not necessarily commit the four Governments.

(c) The communiqué makes no reference to immediate consultations with the Governments of the other United Nations. Their views apparently are not to be sought until after the four Governments have given further study to the proposals.

(d) Paragraph 3 of the communiqué might give the impression that the four Great Powers are going to present to the full United Nations Conference a document which has been accepted by all four Governments.

2. If you have any instructions perhaps you could telephone them to us if a teletype would not reach us in time.

TOP SECRET. Following from Wrong, Begins: Your WA-5470 of September 20th. I have no opportunity of consulting others but the following points may be useful at this afternoon's meeting:

1. Your point (a). Since full agreement has not been reached I doubt that we should press for prior communication to other United Nations before publication of the proposals.

2. Your point (b). I think you might suggest some change in language. If no settlement can be reached of the major issue now unresolved, it may even prove necessary to consider an organization of a different structure. Hence an indication of the tentative nature of these proposals would be useful.

3. Your point (c). You might enquire whether there has been any discussion on consultation with other Governments. I can see difficulties in the great powers agreeing to submit to other Governments incomplete proposals.

4. Your point (d). This is really covered by my comments on your (b) above.

You would be safe in assuming that the postponement of the projected international conference is far from unwelcome to the Canadian Government.

3. THE ASSISTANT UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS[31] reported that a deadlock had been reached between the United Kingdom and the United States on the one hand, and the U.S.S.R. on the other, on the issue of voting by a Great Power who was party to a dispute before the Council for consideration.

The Russians refused to recede from the position that permanent members of the Council should be entitled to vote on all questions basing themselves on the principle of unanimity of the Great Powers. The Dumbarton Oaks meetings with the Soviet Union were to be concluded forthwith. Brief discussions with China would then take place and a public announcement would be made in general terms. Subsequently, the text of the document emerging from the Washington meetings would be published omitting any conclusions upon the points where agreement had not been reached. In any event it had been decided that no general international conference on the subject could now be held in early November as had been contemplated by the United States.

[Ottawa,] September 26, 1944

I attach the text of draft agreement reached at Dumbarton Oaks in the form which it had assumed up to September 20th.† It seems unlikely that there will be any further changes of importance before the discussions there end. The amendments notified in telegrams from the Dominions Office† are all incorporated in the enclosure.

The present intention is that this text should be made public shortly after the end of discussions with the Chinese. The discussions with the Russians may conclude today and they hope to get the Chinese meetings over by the end of the week. This document, therefore, may be revealed within a week.

There is only one point in the document in which it is spelled out that agreement has not been reached. This is Section C of Chapter VI on page 8 relating to voting in the Council which has been left blank, the issue, of course, being the Soviet refusal to accept the view of the U.S. and U.K. delegations that great powers should not be allowed to vote in the consideration of disputes in which they are involved. There are, however, certain other points which are still unsettled and it is possible that these may be listed in a covering statement. The more important of these points are as follows:

1. The method of amendment of the charter.

2. The initial membership of the Organization and admission of new members (Chapter III on page 3).

3. A proposed provision in Chapter VIII, Section A, which would in terms exclude questions of domestic jurisdiction from the scope of the Council's authority to settle disputes.

4. The inclusion in the statement of principles in Chapter II of a statement that each state is responsible for respecting "the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all its people."

On one point which we have particularly stressed there has not been included a U.K. proposal that the Assembly in electing non-permanent members of the Council should pay "due regard to the contribution of members of the Organization towards the maintenance of international peace and security and towards the other purposes of the Organization." The U.S. particularly resisted this and was supported by the Soviet representatives.

I think that it may be desirable for you to issue a statement very shortly after the publication of this document indicating in general terms the attitude of the Government towards the proposals while avoiding the adoption of a position which would tend to tie the hands of the Canadian representatives at an international conference. It is not easy for anyone unfamiliar with the background and course of the Washington negotiations to pick out the essential features of the plan and without some guidance public comment may be uninformed and unhelpful. If you think this a good idea I shall have a draft statement prepared for your consideration.

TELEGRAM 160 London, September 26, 1944

IMMEDIATE. PERSONAL AND TOP SECRET. Following from the Prime Minister for Mr. Mackenzie King, Begins: Personal and Top Secret. You will wish to read the following telegram I have received from Smuts, Begins:

I feel deeply perturbed over deadlock with Russia in World Organization talks. This crisis in any case comes at most unfortunate moment before the final end of the war. I fear we are being rushed at breakneck pace into momentous decisions, and not in this case only. International aviation, telecommunications, etc., all tell the same tale. Here, however, the consequences may be particularly disastrous. I may therefore be pardoned for sending a warning note about this impasse.

At first I thought the Russian attitude absurd and their contention one not to be conceded by other Great Powers, and one likely to be turned down by smaller Powers also. But second thoughts have tended the other way. I assume that Russian attitude is sincerely stated by Molotov and correctly interpreted by Clark Kerr[32] and Cadogan as one involving honour and standing of Russia among her allies. She asks whether she is trusted and treated as an equal or is still the outlaw and Pariah. A misunderstanding here is more than a mere difference. It touches Russian amour propre and produces an inferiority complex and may poison European relations with far reaching results. Russia, conscious of her power, may become more grasping than ever. Her making no attempt to find a solution shows her reaction and sense of power. What will be her future relations with Germany and Japan, even France, not to mention lesser countries? If a World Organization is formed with Russia out of it, she will become the power centre in another group and we shall be heading for World War III. If no such Organization is formed by the United Nations, they will stand stultified before history. The dilemma is a very grave one and the position into which we may be drifting should be avoided at all costs.

In view of these dangers, the smaller Powers should be prepared to make a concession to Russia's amour propre and should not on this matter insist on theoretical equality of status. Such insistence may have most devastating results for smaller Powers themselves. Where questions of power and security are concerned, it would be most unwise to raise theoretical issues of sovereign equality, and the United Kingdom and the United States of America should use their influence in favour of common sense and safety first rather than status for smaller countries.

[32]Sir Archibald Clark Kerr, ambassadeur de Grande-Bretagne en Union soviétique.
Sir Archibald Clark Kerr, Ambassador of Great Britain in Soviet Union.

On merits there is much to be said for unanimity among Great Powers, at least for the years immediately following on this war. If in practice the principle proves unworkable, the situation could be reviewed later when mutual confidence has been established and a more workable basis laid down. At the present stage, a clash should be avoided at all costs. If unanimity for Powers is adopted, even including their voting on questions directly concerning their interests, the result would be that the United Kingdom and the United States of America will have to exert all their influence on Russia to be moderate and sensible and not to flout world opinion. And in this they are likely to be largely successful. If Russia proves impossible, the World Organization may have to act, but blame will be hers. At worst the principle of unanimity will only have effect of a veto vote of preventing action where it may be wise or even necessary. It will be negative and slow down action. But it will also make it impossible for Russia to embark on crises[33] disapproved of by the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

Where people are drunk with new-won power it may not be so bad a thing to have a brake like unanimity. I do not defend it, I dislike it, but I do not think it at present so bad that future of world peace and security should be sacrificed on this issue.

The talks have so far been on an official advisory level, although no doubt there may have been intervention on a higher level. I think before definite decisions are reached on highest level the whole situation should be most carefully reconsidered in all its far reaching implications and some modus vivendi, even if only of a temporary character, should be explored among the Great Powers, which would prevent a catastrophe of first magnitude. We simply must agree and cannot afford to differ where so much is at stake for the future. Ends.

telegram No. 160 of September 26th the message sent to you by Smuts. Like him I am concerned over the deadlock reached at Dumbarton Oaks and I too am not inclined to doubt the sincerity of Molotov's explanation of the Russian position. It is certainly of the greatest importance that the Soviet Government should fully participate in the new security arrangements and I agree with Smuts that the whole situation ought to be most carefully reconsidered before final decisions are reached.

2. I question whether the publication of the plan in its present form, with the section on voting in the Council left blank, will help ultimate agreement. Its publication will appear to narrow the issues to the single problem of the right of great powers to vote in the Council in disputes in which they are involved, while fixing in other respects the structure and authority of the new international organs. Is it not possible that a way around the difficulty might be found even though this would involve changes of substance in other parts of the plan? Should there not be an attempt to see whether a different pattern could meet the Russian position in some manner more acceptable than yielding to them on the single important point now at issue?

3. In actual practice it seems to me that this matter of individual veto is likely to be more formal than real. It is unlikely that important questions directly interesting the Soviet Government would be pressed to a vote in the Council over Soviet opposition. If they were so pressed, it is still more unlikely that they would secure the requisite support from other Council members. If the Soviet Government were fully conscious of the respect which other nations have for their strength, they would realize that, even without being assured a right of veto, their own power is a safeguard against the adoption of decisions which they are unwilling to accept.

4. I mentioned to you and the President on the last day of the Quebec Conference my doubts whether, quite apart from this particular issue, the scheme framed in Washington would secure the requisite public support, especially in the more important secondary countries. While Soviet participation in the Organization is vital for its success, it is also most important that public opinion throughout the United Nations should warmly support the plan not only now but for many years to come. If the Organization is intended to be mainly an alliance between the United States, United Kingdom and Soviet Governments (which is, of course, one of its purposes) it would be logical now to accept the Russian view on the question of veto. It would, however, be more realistic and probably more acceptable to other countries if such alliance were represented as a necessary transitional stage in the organization of world security, and not as part of a general and permanent system based on "the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states."

5. From the point of view of countries without permanent seats on the Council, especially those which are expected to make a substantial contribution to the maintenance of security, the problem is not fundamentally one of status but of the degree to which their people will accept a permanent delegation of control over their own policies and actions to a Council on which they may not be represented. I am referring to such sections of the plan as Chapter II, paragraph 5, Chapter VI B, paragraphs 1 and 4, and Chapter VIII B, paragraphs 3, 5, 7 and 10. These proposals raise more than theoretical issues of sovereignty.

6. I hope and believe that general agreements may be secured on the abolition in both Assembly and Council of the League rule of unanimity. In that event all members of the Organization would be bound by decisions of the Assembly, even if they had voted against them; and all members of the Council (apart from whatever special position may be accorded in it to the great powers in addition to permanent membership) would likewise be bound by decisions of the majority of the Council. This would be a significant and important development. I doubt whether it is possible to go very far beyond this by seeking to include in the Charter pledges from all members to join in the execution of Council decisions in the framing of which they have had no part. I am conscious of the potential political difficulties in Canada if such pledges were sought, and it seems to me that these difficulties will present themselves more acutely in European secondary states. When the execution of a Council decision requires the active participation of a country not on the Council, the Charter might provide that such a country should be required to take positive action only if (a) the decision had been endorsed by the Assembly or (b) the country concerned either had participated in the Council's discussions or had separately agreed with the Council to join in task of enforcement.

7. Thus, in addition to the Russian deadlock, there are strong reasons for reconsidering the whole situation. Furthermore, under the plan the effective participation of the United States in the scheme will depend very largely on whether the United States will ratify a special agreement, as contemplated in Chapter VIII B, paragraph 5, placing adequate forces and facilities at the disposal of the Council. There are signs that there will be intense opposition to what would be considered under their constitution an abrogation of the rights of Congress. If the United States were to ratify the Charter but failed to enter into a special military agreement the whole structure would be undermined.

8. I believe that in the United States and in nearly all the other Allied countries public opinion would accept far-reaching obligations designed to prevent a further outbreak from Germany and Japan. This would be regarded in quite a different light from the assumption of permanent and indefinite obligations to assist in all circumstances in the enforcement of settlements prescribed by the Council. By developing this line of thought it might be possible to discover a generally acceptable way around the Russian difficulty, at any rate as a transitional measure.

9. It will take time to explore alternative courses, and it is important to keep the situation as fluid as possible. Hence I repeat my suggestion that the official publication of the plan should be deferred.

10. I should have no objection to your passing on this message to Smuts, Curtin and Fraser.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] October 2, 1944

You will have noticed that Mr. Churchill referred at considerable length in his speech in the House of Commons on September 28th to the results of the discussions on world security at Dumbarton Oaks. His speech was delivered before he received your telegram of that day but it reads as though he had been influenced by Smuts' arguments in favour of going slow in reaching final decisions. He emphasized that the conversations "do not in any way bind the Governments represented" and that "we ought not to be hurried into decisions on the important outstanding questions." "It would not be prudent to press in a hurry for momentous decisions governing the whole future of the world."

He continued by pointing out that the great powers could not "do more in the first instance than act as trustees for other states, great or small, during the period of transition" and went on to say that whatever was settled in the near future would be only preliminary to the actual establishment of the future world organization in its final form.

Finally — and this is perhaps the point of immediate importance — he declared that he did not think that a satisfactory agreement would be reached until there had been a further meeting between Roosevelt, Stalin and himself which he earnestly hoped might take place before the end of the year. After emphasizing the necessity of cordial relations between the U.S., the Soviet Union and the British Empire he declared "great decisions cannot be taken, even for the transition period, without far closer, calmer and more searching discussions than can be held amid the clash of arms."

The language which Mr. Churchill used seems to indicate that part at least of our last telegram will be received by him sympathetically. His public assertion that a further meeting between the Big 3 is necessary in the near future should help to end the pressure from the United States for a general international conference on world organization before the end of this year. His emphasis on the inevitably transitional character of present decisions might indicate that he will advocate some special arrangement between the great powers not built into the general international organization. In any case there is nothing in this part of his speech which runs counter to the position which we have taken.

to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM 179 London, October 7, 1944

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from the Prime Minister for the Prime Minister, Begins: Your telegram of September 28th, No. 188, about the Dumbarton Oaks recommendations. We must carefully consider not only what is the best course to take over the Russian attitude to voting in the Council, but also what attitude we should adopt to the recommendations in general. In doing so we shall give fullest weight to your views.

2. Meanwhile, the Americans have been pressing us hard to agree to publication on October 9th. We should have greatly preferred, for many reasons, to have time to digest the recommendations of the officials before they were published, and I agree that immediate publication may be attended by the risks and disadvantages which you apprehend. On the other hand, acceptance by public opinion in the United States of present proposals, imperfect though they may be, would be an immense gain to all of us. The Administration think that best way of securing this acceptance is by publishing almost at once. Of course the results may not be what they expect and hope, but I do not feel able to contest their view on this.

3. Besides these wider considerations, there is the fact that much of the document has already leaked into the American press, and if official publication is delayed the rest is sure to leak too. It is embarrassing for us if this happens and we do not give the authorized version to Parliament and press here. For these reasons we may have to agree to publication on October 9th, though we are still in communication with the Russians about text of communiqué.[34] I am sure you will understand.

4. It is, of course, understood that no Government or Ministerial commitments are involved. Ends.

Le ministre, l'ambassade aux États-Unis,
au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Minister, Embassy in United States,
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Washington, October 12, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson:

Now that the State Department has formally presented us with a copy of the draft United Nations Charter, the question arises whether we should not seek to have discussion on the Charter with the United States on an official level. So far, the United States has not received, at least from us here, any direct indication of the Canadian Government's views on the future world organization. I have had some informal conversations with Mr. Hickerson, but I was careful to point out that I was expressing only my own opinions, and not necessarily those of the Canadian Government. Thus the State Department has received indications of the Canadian Government's views only indirectly and at second hand through the United Kingdom delegates to the Dumbarton Oaks meeting; without in fact knowing that they were Canadian views.

2. We have, on the other hand, discussed these questions at length and in some detail with the United Kingdom, both in London, during the Prime Ministers' meeting, and here during the Dumbarton Oaks discussions. We have also given the United Kingdom Government statements of our views in a number of telegrams.

3. In view of our close relations with the United States, might it not be desirable, before the Canadian Government makes up its mind on the line which the Canadian Delegation should take at the forthcoming United Nations conference, to have a frank and full discussion of the problems with the State Department?

4. If we are to have such discussions, they should, I think be held as soon as possible. For one thing, it is just possible that the United States may succeed in its efforts to hold the United Nations conference in the very near future. If the results of current discussions with the Soviet Union are satisfactory, it is conceivable that a United Nations conference might meet early in December. I have a strong feeling that, for domestic political reasons, the Administration would like to announce, before the date of the presidential election, that a conference has at least been convened for the near future.

5. That is one reason for trying to have discussions with the United States as soon as possible. Another is that the sooner they are held, the greater is the chance of our being able to influence American views. The Administration has emphasized the tentative nature of the present proposals, and its willingness to see them modified in the light of comments from powers other than those represented at Dumbarton Oaks. The closer, however, we get to the United Nations conference, the more fixed the views of the United States are likely to become. We have met with a measure of success in our efforts to persuade the United Kingdom Government to modify certain of their original views. We might also meet with some success in discussions with the United States.

6. I, therefore, suggest that, after a provisional formulation of our own views, we might discuss with the State Department the nature of any revisions we might like to see made to the Charter.

7. Since the draft Charter is the outcome of meetings between four great powers, I should think that it would be appropriate if, at the same time, we put our provisional views before the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R. and China. So far as the United Kingdom is concerned, there will, of course, be no difficulty, since they will be seeking our views, and those of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India, in the hope that the nations of the Commonwealth will present a substantially united front at the United Nations conference. The only question to be determined is how our views might best be put to London. There is a good deal to be said for doing this both by memorandum and orally.

8. It has occurred to me that, in addition to consulting with the great powers and with the nations of the Commonwealth, it might be useful if, before the holding of the United Nations conference, we discussed the problem informally with France and with the principal middle powers, such as Brazil and the Netherlands, and perhaps Czechoslovakia, Norway, Belgium and Mexico.

9. The French will be happy that they are to secure in due course a permanent seat on the council, but it is likely that they will be far from satisfied with other provisions of the draft Charter. Since they are the only great power which has not participated in the drafting of the Charter, they may, for prestige reasons, be tempted to propose numerous amendments. But considerations more important than prestige will enter into their calculations. They will, I think, want to see created a more powerful international organization than that envisaged in the Charter. They may push hard, for example, for the proposal which has already received Soviet and Chinese support, that there be established an international air police force. They may also propose inclusion in the Charter of provisions which would, by themselves, give rise to obligations on the part of member states to assist in imposing military sanctions. It would only be with great reluctance, I think, that they would concur in a Charter which, like the present draft, entirely shelves this problem, and leaves it to be met by subsequent security agreements, some of the more important of which may never be concluded or, if concluded, ratified.

10. I realize, of course, that before discussions of any kind can begin, we have to formulate, at least provisionally, our own views. In the consideration that is no doubt being given to this matter in Ottawa, may I make one suggestion? Any proposals of ours for revision of the Charter will emphasize, I take it, the necessity of narrowing the gap between the rights and obligations of the great and the lesser powers. I suggest that we make clear also that a solution of this problem is associated in our minds with changes for strengthening the Charter so as to make it a more effective instrument for the maintenance of peace and for peaceful change. My own view is that Canada's national interest would be served by such changes, some of which, as I have pointed out above, are likely to be put forward by the French. Certainly the international interest would be served by them. But equally certainly it would be more difficult to support them if the "great-powers"-"other-powers" gap is not narrowed.

11. In this connection, a comparison of the Draft Charter with the document, "The International Law of the Future," published on January 1, 1944, by a number of Americans and Canadians interested in international law and organization, indicates certain gaps in the former document. Thus the Charter is at present weak, or at least vague, in its provisions for peaceful change, there being no explicit provisions in the Charter corresponding to proposals 20, 21 and 22 of "The International Law of the Future." There is also no provision corresponding to proposal 7 on the modification of general rules of international law. Principles similar to the useful principles 1, 2 and 10 of "The International Law of the Future" do not appear in the Charter. They were omitted, I believe, deliberately but not necessarily wisely.

12. I realize that these matters are primarily the responsibility of Ottawa and that, indeed, you may have already considered them. The Embassy is, however, especially interested in the problem through its association with the Dumbarton Oaks talks. It may also be used as one of the channels for discussion in case the suggestions made above prove practicable and acceptable. That is why I venture to bring them to your attention.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister[35]

[Ottawa], December 13, 1944

I enclose a copy of a despatch from Dupuy† reporting a discussion with M. Spaak on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. Spaak, I think, reveals a balanced judgment on the merits and defects. He told Dupuy that he and Dr. van Kleffens[36] had discussed whether the Dutch and Belgian views should be made known to the great powers and that while no decision had been reached by the Belgian Government they were in agreement that they might be faced with a fait accompli unless they took some such action.[37]

[37]Note marginale:/Marginal note:
I agree.

We have been giving a good deal of thought to this in the Department and I am inclined to recommend that we should make some communication to the great powers at any rate before the projected meeting between Messrs. Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin takes place.[38] In such a communication I think that we should not propose any fundamental changes but should follow the line that we have already taken with the British Government in suggesting that the selection of non-permanent members of the Council should not be left in the Charter as a free-for-all between all states other than great powers and that some changes and additions should be made so that countries not represented on the Council would not be required to take serious action to enforce a decision of the Council without some opportunity to participate in or agree to the decision. This should, I think, be put forward as a method of strengthening the authority of the organization by improving the machinery for organizing force behind the Security Council.

The activities of the Latin-American bloc at the Civil Aviation Conference at Chicago seemed to me to emphasize the desirability of getting some changes made in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals before they are officially submitted as the basis for a United Nations conference. At such a conference the Latin-American states would have about half the votes and they might even be able to arrange matters so that they would secure half the elected seats on the Security Council and considerable over representation on the Social and Economic Council. The United States Government has already been conferring with all Latin-American countries except Argentina on the proposals and it is still uncertain whether a conference of foreign Ministers of the American Republics will meet soon to discuss them. We may be confronted with a solid block of Latin-America plus the United States.

In the first instance perhaps we might make known our views to the great powers only or even only in Moscow and Washington as well as London. Later we might make a further communication to all members of the United Nations with which we have diplomatic relations. It seems as though the Big 3 might meet in January[39] and if we are to make a communication we should, therefore, do so before the end of this month. If you agree[40] to this course I shall submit a draft to you for consideration.[41]

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 1827 London, December 18, 1944

TOP SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: President Roosevelt has sent to Marshal Stalin personal message regarding voting procedure in Security Council under Dumbarton Oaks proposals. He has suggested following draft provisions for Section C of Chapter 6 (Security Council), Begins:

Voting.

(1) One vote should be held by each member of the Security Council.

(2) Procedural matters should be decided by the Security Council on an affirmative vote of seven members.

(3) An affirmative vote of seven members, including concurring votes of the permanent members, should be required for decisions of the Security Council on all other matters, provided that the parties to a dispute should not vote in decisions under Chapter 8, Section A, and under paragraph 1 of Chapter 8, Section C. Ends.

2. President in his message to Marshal Stalin has emphasized that in accordance with this draft, unanimity of permanent members of the Council will be required for all Council decisions relating to determination of threat to peace, action for removal of such threat or suppression of aggression or other branches [breaches?] of peace. President agrees that there is need for this requirement and states his willingness to accept Soviet Government's views in matter as expressed in memorandum presented by them at Dumbarton Oaks (my telegram Circular D. 1163).† He makes it clear that this proposal implies that each permanent member of Council would always have a vote in decisions of foregoing character.

3. President then goes on to refer to provisions of Chapter VIII B, Section A, of Dumbarton Oaks proposals regarding pacific settlement of disputes. He records his belief that procedures proposed under this section will be effective if recommendations of Security Council made thereunder are concurred in by permanent members, but that it will at the same time be necessary for Great Powers to accept common obligation to abstain from voting in their own cause. President expresses his conviction that Great Powers will thereby strengthen their own position as principal guardians of future peace without jeopardizing their vital interests or deviating from principle that they must act unanimously in all decisions of Security Council affecting their vital interests.

4. President has asked whether Marshal Stalin would agree to holding, as soon as possible, of meeting of representatives designated by him, by President and Mr. Churchill to reach final agreement on this voting question and, on supposition that agreement is reached on voting, to discuss arrangements for early convocation of general conference. Intention would be that proposed meeting should be small and informal and should be held at place (possibly London) yet to be decided. United States Ambassador in Moscow, through whom foregoing message was to be conveyed to Marshal Stalin, has been instructed not in the meantime, to seek any yes-or-no answer to President's proposal, since importance is attached by United States Government to avoiding any premature crystallisation of the Soviet Government's attitude.

6.[sic] State Department have indicated that in their view it would be most desirable for World Organisation Charter to go before United States Senate as Treaty not later than early or middle summer of 1945 if advantage is to be taken of present favourable political atmosphere in United States.

7. We shall no doubt before long receive some indication of Soviet attitude. In meantime, we should be grateful if we could be informed how Dominion Governments view the President's proposal. Ends.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], December 20, 1944

Dominions Office telegram Circular D. 1827 of December 18th contains a proposal made by the President to Stalin for filling in the most important gap in the Dumbarton Oaks document and requires some comment from us.

The proposals to govern voting in the Council need some study to make them clear. In the first place, Roosevelt suggests that seven affirmative votes should be required for Council decisions instead of six (a simple majority). This means that at least two elected members of the Council would have to vote with the permanent members before action could be taken. That is a minor point but perhaps an improvement.

Secondly, on the central difficulty over the veto power of the permanent members, Roosevelt proposes an ingenious compromise. The suggestion is that on all but procedural matters an affirmative vote, including the votes of the permanent members, should be required, except that parties to a dispute should not vote on decisions relating to the pacific settlement of disputes or on decisions to refer a dispute to a regional agency for settlement. This would seem to mean in practice that a great power involved in a dispute could not prevent the Security Council from taking cognizance of the dispute and could not vote against any recommendations which the Council might make for its settlement short of the application of some sort of sanctions. If it came to the application of sanctions (which only would arise after the Council has decided that the dispute "constitutes a threat to the maintenance of international peace and security") voting power on the Council of those involved would be restored.

This is an improvement on giving the permanent members a veto power in all circumstances but it does not remove the central objection that it places them above the law imposed on other members. One danger in adopting the plan might be that a permanent member might be tempted, in order to maintain its right of veto, to press its differences with another state to the point at which the issue constituted a threat to peace from the beginning, thus placing itself in a position to prevent the Council from initiating the procedure for pacific settlement.

We are asked to let London have our views on this. I think that we cannot say that the proposed arrangement is satisfactory but that we should not say that it is unsatisfactory. We can go so far as to recognize that this may be the best arrangement on which agreement can be secured in Moscow.

The telegram also raises another important point. At the end of the Dumbarton Oaks meeting it was stated in both Washington and London that the points still in dispute would be discussed at a meeting between the heads of the Governments of the three powers. The President now proposes dropping this plan and suggests that a meeting should be held as soon as possible of representatives designated by heads of Governments to reach agreement on the question of voting in the Council and to discuss arrangements for a general conference. One must sympathize, I think, with the desire in Washington to have the Charter ready for submission to the Senate in June or July.

You have already accepted my suggestion that we might present a statement of our views on the steps necessary to strengthen the position of leading secondary states. This is a tricky document to prepare but I hope to have a draft to submit to you within a few days. This telegram makes me think that we should have it ready for presentation in Washington, Moscow and London immediately after the New Year.

TELEGRAM 245 Ottawa, December 22, 1944

TOP SECRET. Addressed Dominions Office No. 245, repeated to Canberra, No. 29, Wellington No. 29, Pretoria No. 28.

Your telegram Circular D. 1827 of December 18th. General International Organization.

1. We recognize that a compromise along lines proposed by President Roosevelt may be the best attainable solution of the problem of voting procedure in the Security Council. It would, however, still leave the great powers above the law proposed for all other states in relation to the central function of the Council of dealing with threats to peace. Furthermore, it could conceivably encourage a permanent member to turn a difference with another state at once into a threat to the peace under Chapter VIII B, in order to prevent its consideration by the Security Council under Chapter VIII A. At this stage we do not feel called upon either to approve or to disapprove the suggestion.

2. We recognize the importance of seeking to meet the views of the State Department on timing set forth in paragraph 6 of your telegram.

3. We feel, however, that before the draft proposals are formally submitted as a basis for a general conference a further effort should be made to meet the difficulties which we have already brought to your notice in connection with the position of the more important secondary states. These difficulties centre around (a) the selection of non-permanent members of the Council and (b) the authority of the Council to demand positive and perhaps drastic action from Member States not represented on it in order to enforce its decisions. The activities of the Latin-American group at the Chicago Aviation Conference increase our concern that it may prove impossible to amend the proposals in the desired direction at a general conference. We consider that there is a greater chance of securing approval if the amendments are included in the draft at this stage of discussion between the great powers and before its presentation to other governments. We consider that such amendments would increase the authority of the Security Council and thereby improve its effectiveness. We, therefore, hope that this matter will be pressed if the early meeting proposed by the President between representatives of the United Kingdom, United States and Soviet Governments takes place.

4. We have received information that General de Gaulle informed the Soviet authorities while in Moscow that he thought it was vital for the security of France and for the operation of the general organization that the "middle powers" should be effectively associated with the enforcement of peace. The Russians are said to have indicated that they did not dissent.

5. We intend shortly to submit a statement of our views on these points to the United States and Soviet Governments and perhaps to some others. While other parts of the proposals seem to us to require expansion or amendment before they can be incorporated in the Charter, most of these further questions can probably be considered satisfactorily at a general conference and need not be raised at this stage.

6. In my telegram No. 188 of September 28th to Mr. Churchill I suggested that it would be difficult to secure acceptance at this time of permanent and indefinite obligations to assist in all circumstances in the enforcement of settlements prescribed by the Council. Mr. Churchill in his speech in the House of Commons on the same day indicated that he thought that temporary arrangements to bridge the transition period were essential. The public reception accorded to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals in many countries strengthens our belief that this approach has much to commend it. We should be glad to learn whether you intend to put forward proposals to this end at the projected tripartite meeting.[42]

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa], December 30, 1944

I attach a draft of the memorandum† which the War Committee decided last week should be presented to the powers that took part in the Dumbarton Oaks meetings. In preparing this draft we have had in mind that it would probably be published eventually and that it was desirable, while making our suggestions as specific as possible, to put them forward in such a way that if our points were not met the Government would be free to ratify the Charter without laying itself open to a charge of gross inconsistency. I think that the memorandum should be presented personally by the Ambassadors in Washington, Moscow, Chungking and Paris and by Massey in London with a verbal explanation which could include certain things that it is not expedient to say in a written document at this time. They might be instructed to refer to the activities of the Latin-American bloc at recent conferences and notably at Chicago and they might be asked to develop the last paragraph of the memorandum which proposes that standards should be established for eligibility for election to the Council. We considered putting in some specific proposals but decided that it was better to leave this difficult matter open at present. There are various devices, none of them satisfactory in itself, which would go some distance towards meeting our views. These include such schemes as a system of weighted voting for elections with a number of votes to be cast by each state reflecting its order of international importance, restriction of choice to countries which have made satisfactory agreements to give military assistance and also to countries which have discharged their financial obligations and possibly the development of some means of controlling nominations so as to reduce the pressure from blocs of states.

I think that the instructions should go out before the end of next week. The War Committee has approved their despatch and the memorandum contains no new statement of policy.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa], January 4, 1945

The American Ambassador came to see me this afternoon to tell me that he had just been informed by the State Department that he would be furnished with full information about the agenda of the Conference of Foreign Ministers in Mexico City[43] and would be kept currently informed of the proceedings. He said that he had asked the State Department that this should be done in view of the importance which he attached to the position adopted by the Canadian Government. He added that the conference was expected to open about February 15th and that the central subject of discussion would be the Dumbarton Oaks proposals.

Mr. Atherton commented that Canada had had an opportunity already of making known its views through the United Kingdom Government and that the Latin-American countries had had no such opportunity. I said that while this was true I personally felt that it was very important for the administration in Washington to give weight to our views. I pointed out that criticism in Canada of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals would be picked up by the isolationists in the United States and might become — especially if injected into the Canadian election — a factor of some account in the consideration by the Senate of the Charter of the new organization.

Mr. Atherton said that he agreed most cordially with this and went on to speak rather obscurely of some new development in the making whereby he expected that the United States Government would consult with us on issues of foreign policy. I told him that it was likely that within the next few days we would present in Washington and in the other capitals of the great powers a very brief statement of the special difficulties which we were encountering in considering the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. He said that he was sure that this would be given every consideration. I explained that this statement was not directed towards the conference in Mexico City but towards the projected discussions between the great powers for the completion of the proposals.

The general tenor of his remarks was that it was intended at Mexico City to give the Latin-American countries a chance of feeling that they were participants in the international consultations. I took the opportunity of saying that I thought it would be most unfortunate if the meeting concluded in a programme agreed between the nineteen Governments to be represented at Mexico City which would not meet our special difficulties. He replied that he would be able to furnish current information on the discussions there and would pass on at once any comments which we might care to make.

I felt in the course of this conversation that there was come consciousness on Mr. Atherton's part that his Government had not been doing all it should to consider the Canadian point of view. I emphasized to him that we were being very careful to say nothing which would make it harder to secure the acceptance in the United States of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals and that this had led us to refrain from giving publicity to the very serious difficulties which they caused for Canada. Unless steps were taken to meet these difficulties, however, it could not be expected that public discussion sooner or later could be avoided.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ORGANIZATION

5. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS, referring to the discussions at the meeting of December 22nd, submitted and read a draft memorandum setting out certain suggestions for revision of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals for a general international organization. The memorandum was intended for communication to the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R., China, and probably France, prior to the calling of a general international conference.

After stating that the government welcomed the proposals published by the Great Powers, the memorandum went on to point out that in certain respects they created special difficulties for Canada and probably for other intermediate states not permanently represented on the Council.

It was, therefore, suggested that, since recognition had been given to the primary responsibilities of the Great Powers for the maintenance of peace by according them permanent membership on the Council, some corresponding recognition be given to the differing degrees of responsibility which other United Nations would be asked to assume. The potential contribution of Canada and a number of similarly situated states would be substantial. It was questionable whether such countries would be willing to accept the proposed obligations or be able to ensure effective collaboration, unless some means were devised of associating them more effectively with the work of the Council. This might be done by adjusting the powers conferred on the Council and by ensuring that elected members were chosen in relation to their contribution to the maintenance of security.

In order to accomplish this purpose, decisions of the Council concerning the determination of threats to security and consequent action should be made binding initially only on states which were members of the Council and a state not represented should be required to take positive action only upon decisions endorsed by a two-thirds majority of the Assembly, or when such state had participated in the Council's proceedings, or had agreed to join in a particular task of enforcement.

It was felt that the acceptance of these suggestions would contribute to the effectiveness of the organization and assist in meeting the difficulty of obtaining the support of states in a position similar to that of Canada.

(External Affairs memorandum, Jan. 3, 1945).[44]

6. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed general agreement with the draft memorandum submitted, but felt that the reference to participation in Council deliberations should be clarified to convey a sense of participation as a member of the Council.

7. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after considerable discussion, agreed that the memorandum, revised in the particular mentioned by the Prime Minister, be referred to the Cabinet for consideration at the earliest opportunity.

If approved, it was intended that this memorandum form the basis of communications to the governments of the U.K., U.S., the U.S.S.R., China and probably France.

The War Committee were satisfied that the views expressed in the memorandum as to possible amendment of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals would make the international organization more acceptable to Canada and other States in a similar position, thus providing for more general support in the organization of security.

It was felt that these views should be made available to the Great Powers in advance of the forthcoming meeting between Mr. Churchill, President

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 44 London, January 10, 1945

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET. My telegram of August 31st, 1944, Circular D. 1237.† World Organisation and Soviet Constituent Republics.

When Soviet representative at Dumbarton Oaks proposed that 16 Soviet Constituent Republics should be Founder-Members of World Organisation, he agreed, at instance of United States representative, not to pursue it at the time. Although Soviet representative did not at first raise objection to recommending inclusion of "Associated Nations" (i.e., Chile, Ecuador, Egypt, Iceland, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela), he did so later. No definite conclusion was reached on this point and eventual recommendation was (Chapter 3) that "membership of the Organisation should be open to all peace-loving States."

2. We are now considering what attitude we should adopt on the question of membership in any further international discussions.

3. Soviet Constituent Republics. In this connection, we have referred to views expressed by other British Commonwealth Governments in July, 1944, in reply to my telegram June 29th, 1944, Circular D. 947†. It seems to us that, if the Soviet claim is accepted in case of World Organisation, it would have to be accepted in all other cases and recognition of Constituent Republics as independent sovereign States and exchange of diplomatic representatives would follow as a matter of course. If, however, Soviet Government could be persuaded to withdraw their claim in this case, other cases should be dealt with separately later. In any event we feel that, whatever the exact constitutional position of Constituent Republics, issue will have to be dealt with as a political and not as a constitutional question.

4. From point of view of purely British interests, it would clearly be better that World Organisation machinery should include only one Soviet vote and not sixteen (or seventeen, if Soviet Union had a vote as well as sixteen Republics). If, as would probably be the case, U.S.S.R. could rely on support both of Constituent Republics and certain neighbouring States, it might command a bloc of twenty-two or twenty-four votes which might represent more than one-third of total votes in Assembly, at any rate in early years.[46] If it were the rule that a two-thirds majority would be needed for important decisions, Soviet voting strength would not suffice to carry the day without support of a large number of other States, but it could block decisions of which Soviet Government disapproved.

[45]La Conférence de Yalta, du 4 au 11 février 1945.
The Yalta Conference, February 4-11, 1945.

5. Immediate practical consideration, which carries much weight with us, is that it could be argued that on paper Constituent Republics have more autonomy in foreign affairs than India, e.g., their own Foreign Ministers, their own armed forces, right to enter into agreements with other countries and right to exchange diplomatic and Consular representatives, even though Soviet Government retains "representation of Union in international relations, conclusion and ratification of treaties and establishment of general character of relations between Union Republics and 'foreign States'." Whatever facts may be, it would be invidious for us to enter into detailed argument with Soviet Government as to precise practical significance of theoretical constitutional position.

6. Nevertheless, we feel that inclusion of 16 Republics with votes might, in practice, so undermine authority of World Organisation as to render it unworkable. Soviet Union would, in effect, be in a position to cast nearly one-third of total votes in elections for non-permanent members of Security Council, members of Economic and Social Council, and judges of Permanent Court of International Justice. We have not overlooked Latin-American bloc of some twenty votes. But these are not under absolute control of a single Government in same way as Soviet votes would almost certainly be. We feel grave doubts whether other countries would accept Soviet claim and some, such as China, France and Brazil, might claim additional votes for parts of their territory. In particular it seems highly unlikely that the United States Government would accept membership in a World Organisation in which they had only one vote and the Soviet government controlled sixteen or seventeen, and United States membership is a fundamental assumption.

7. We consider that our aim should be:

(a) To make World Organisation work effectively, and only by taking in ex-enemy states: Finland, Bulgaria, Roumania and Hungary, wh[ich] will not be initial members.

(b) To avoid friction with either Soviet Government or United States Government.

As their views are so far apart, the following courses seem open to us:

(1) To agree to Soviet claim. This would put us in an embarrassing position vis-à-vis United States Government and might easily wreck whole Organisation.

(2) To adopt attitude of flat opposition. The constitutional position of India makes this difficult and Soviet Government might attribute opposition to purely political grounds.

(3) To let the United States Government take the initiative in opposing the views of the Soviet Government. It would then be open to us to accept some compromise acceptable to both Soviet and United States Governments provided that it would not exclude India. If deadlock were reached, we could declare our support for United States Government.

8. Associated Nations. We consider that we should support inclusion as initial members of countries named in paragraph 1 above, plus Turkey.

9. We should be glad of views of other British Commonwealth Governments.

TELEGRAM 89 Ottawa, January 12, 1945

IMPORTANT. SECRET. My immediate following telegram contains memorandum for communication to the Governments represented at the Dumbarton Oaks meetings and to the French Government. You should personally present it at earliest opportunity to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. You should inform Lord Cranborne that we are carrying out the intention notified in paragraph 5 of our telegram No. 245 of December 22nd, and that while the United Kingdom Government is already aware of our views, we wish to let them know the exact form of the written and oral representations which we are addressing to the other Governments concerned. We are communicating the memorandum to the Governments of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa through our High Commissoners.[48]

2. You should supplement the memorandum verbally along the lines of paragraphs 3, 4, 5 and 6 of this message.

Similar instructions were sent the same day to the Ambassadors in France, the Soviet Union and the United States and to the Chargé d'Affaires in China.

[48]Le mémorandum fut communiqué aussi aux ministres des Affaires étrangères de Belgique et des Pays-Bas.
The memorandum was also communicated to the Foreign Ministers of Belgium and The Netherlands.

3. The Canadian Government is deeply convinced of the necessity of establishing an effective general security organization in which it would wish to play its due part. The suggestions in the memorandum are put forward in the belief that their adoption would both strengthen the organization and facilitate completion at a United Nations conference of a Charter based on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. The expansion in other respects of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals can in our view be considered satisfactorily at the proposed general conference.

4. Our reasons for feeling that these changes should be made now are indicated in the memorandum. You should point out in addition that in recent large conferences groups of states have exercised a disproportionate influence on decisions by adopting a common line of action. For example at the Chicago Aviation Conference the Latin-American States (which would cast nearly half the votes at a conference of the United Nations) were able to secure the election of an agreed slate of countries to the interim aviation body. We feel that similar tactics might be employed at a general international conference to resist amendments designed to protect the position of countries of roughly the order of international importance of Canada.

5. The memorandum deliberately avoids proposing specific amendments because there are alternative means of meeting most of the points. With regard to the suggestion in paragraphs 7 and 8 that some standard of eligibility should be adopted to regulate election to the Council, we realize that there is no single satisfactory method of achieving this. In the proposals the difficulties of defining what constitutes a great power have been avoided by naming the powers with permanent Council membership. The difficulties of defining a so-called "middle power" are still greater. It might be necessary to fall back on some special method of nomination to restrict the choice of the Assembly. Another possibility would be the introduction of weighted voting at council elections, each state being entitled to cast a number of votes related to its financial or military contribution. Certain general disqualifications could in any event be included, such as rules debarring states which have not made satisfactory military agreements and states in default on their financial obligations to the organization.

6. You should specially emphasize the importance which we attach to paragraph 6 of the memorandum. The suggestions made therein (or other changes with equivalent effect) seem to us essential if wide membership of the organization is to be attained.[49]

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut commissaire en Grande-Bretagne[50]

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in Great Britain[50]

TELEGRAM 90 Ottawa, January 12, 1945

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Reference my immediately preceding telegram. Following is memorandum for presentation, Begins:

"1. The Canadian Government has welcomed the proposals for the establishment of a general international organization published by the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union and China. Certain parts of the proposals, however, create special difficulties for Canada and probably for other states as well. The difficulties relate to the means whereby the cooperation of these states in fulfilling the obligations placed upon the Security Council can best be assured, and the authority of the Security Council thereby increased. Because of the high importance of enlisting the greatest possible measure of support, the Canadian Government believes that the proposals should be expanded or otherwise amended to reduce these difficulties, and is of the opinion that the desired changes can most effectively be introduced before the proposals are formally submitted as the basis for an international conference.

2. The proposals recognize the primary responsibilities of the great powers for the maintenance of peace by according them permanent membership in the Security Council. It is also generally understood that, when the proposals are completed, the individual concurrence of the great powers will be required in certain important classes of decisions. There is, however, no corresponding recognition in the proposals that the responsibilities which other members of the United Nations are asked to assume differ greatly, despite the fact that their power and their capacity to use it for the maintenance of peace range from almost zero upwards to a point not very far behind the great powers.

3. Under the proposals a country which would be called upon to make a substantial contribution to world security has no better assurance of election to the Security Council than the smallest and weakest state. Furthermore, such a country, when not holding an elected seat on the Security Council, would be required to obligate itself to accept and carry out the decisions of the Council, — decisions which might entail drastic action on its part under the provisions of paragraphs 3, 4, 5 and 6 of Chapter VIII B. Such action might even be required by the Council without any consultation with the government of the country in question. In contrast, a great power is ensured of participating fully in all the deliberations of the Security Council and is likely also to be assured of exercising a right of individual veto on many of its decisions.

Also sent to the Ambassadors in France, the Soviet Union and the United States and to the Chargé d'Affaires in China.

4. It is open to question whether a country such as Canada could undertake to accept such an obligation or could, if the obligation were to be initially accepted, ensure effective collaboration in the indefinite future. Canada certainly makes no claim to be regarded as a great power. The Canadian record in two great wars, however, has revealed both readiness to join in concerted action against aggression and the possession of substantial military and industrial capacity. There are a number of other states the potential contribution of which to the maintenance of future security is of the same order of magnitude. The support of these states is important to the maintenance of peace, and the active collaboration of some at least of them would probably be required for the execution of major decisions of the Security Council under Chapter VIII B of the proposals.

5. The question therefore arises whether it is possible, within the framework of the general scheme, to devise means of associating more effectively with the work of the Security Council states of the order of international importance of Canada. This might be achieved by making some changes in the powers conferred on the Council, and by ensuring that such states were chosen to fill elected seats on the Council more frequently (or possibly for longer periods) than states with less to contribute to the maintenance of security.

6. It is suggested that decisions of the Security Council under Chapter VIII B should be made binding in the first instance only on states which are members of the Council. States not represented on the Council should be required to take positive action only when the decision has been endorsed by a two-thirds majority of the Assembly (when it would become binding on all members), or when the country or countries concerned have by special invitation participated on the same footing as elected members in the Council's proceedings, or when they have individually agreed with the Council to join in a particular task of enforcement. The adoption of these suggestions would make it far easier for states other than the great powers to enter into agreements making available to the organization substantial military forces, facilities and assistance, and would thus increase the effective power at the disposal of the Council. Their adoption would also help to secure the requisite public support in countries not permanently represented on the Council.

7. By the acceptance of these suggestions a special responsibility would be placed upon all members of the Security Council which would not be imposed on other members of the organization. Thus the changes proposed in the authority of the Council must be considered in conjunction with the suggestion for increasing the effectiveness of the elected section, since they would increase the need for ensuring that the elected section of the Council was made up of states capable of contributing to the discharge of the Council's obligations. A serious effort should, therefore, be made to devise a system of election which would provide that due regard must be paid to the international significance of the countries chosen. If Chapter VI A of the proposals was to be submitted in its present form to a general conference of the United Nations, there would be small chance of securing its amplification in this respect, and it is therefore urged that the question should be faced now.

8. In devising methods of achieving this end it will be generally agreed that it is important to discourage election to the Council being sought for reasons of prestige, and also to avoid the development of electoral understandings, such as those which controlled the election to the Council of the League of Nations. While it is difficult to put forward a satisfactory formula, it is believed that, given the initiative and support of the great powers, the problem can be solved."Ends.

DESPATCH 100 Washington, January 15, 1945

Sir,

Confirming my teletype WA-264 of today's date on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, I have the honour to inform you that I left the attached memorandum[51] with the Under-Secretary of State this afternoon. I had requested an appointment with the Secretary of State, but Mr. Stettinius is out of Washington for a few days, so I saw Mr. Grew[52] instead. I also made certain additional oral observations on the memorandum along the lines indicated in your teletype EX-132 of January 12th.[53] I informed Mr. Grew that a similar memorandum was being delivered by the Canadian representatives in London, Moscow, Chungking and Paris to the Governments to which they were accredited.

Mr. Grew expressed interest in our point of view, but some doubts as to whether it would be easy to implement it. He even went so far as to mention that the doctrine of the equality of states would make it difficult to distinguish between members of the Organization in respect of election to the Security Council. It did not seem to occur to him that this distinction had already been made.

Mr. Grew said that our memorandum, and my additional observations, would be given careful consideration. He thought that I might wish to discuss the matter with Mr. Pasvolsky. I said that I hoped to do this, but I had already been requested to discuss it with Mr. Achilles and Mr. Sandifer of Mr. Pasvolsky's office.

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa], January 16, 1945

The attached draft telegram[54] is in reply to Dominions Office telegram, Circular D. 47 of January 10th.† During the last phase of the Dumbarton Oaks meetings between the United States, United Kingdom and Chinese delegations the Chinese agreed to subscribe to the Anglo-American-Soviet recommendations but pressed that the following three points should be considered for inclusion in the document to be presented by the great powers as the basis for a general conference:

(a) The Charter should provide specifically that adjustment of settlement of international disputes should be achieved with due regard for principles of justice and international law.

(b) The Assembly should be responsible for initiating studies and making recommendations with regard to development and revision of the rules and principles of international law.

(c) The Economic and Social Council should specifically provide for the promotion of educational and other forms of cultural cooperation.

The United Kingdom Government have now informed us that they have reached the preliminary conclusion that they should support the addition of these points to the proposals. The first of them would certainly be useful in dealing with criticisms of the Charter and so also would the second point to a lesser degree. It does not seem to matter very much whether or not the third point is in the Charter itself but I think that there is no objection to its inclusion.

DESPATCH A. 26

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that I have communicated to the United Kingdom Government, through Lord Cranborne, the statement on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals for world organisation contained in your telegram No. 90 of January 12th. I have also explained this statement to Lord Cranborne in the sense of your telegram No. 89 of the same date.

Lord Cranborne has asked me to assure you that this statement will receive the fullest consideration by the United Kingdom Government, and that they will, in due course, communicate their own views on the questions concerned.[58] Such communication is, however, unlikely to be before the impending meeting between Mr. Churchill, Mr. Roosevelt and Marshal Stalin. Lord Cranborne has asked if the Canadian Government would keep the United Kingdom Government informed of any comments received from the other governments to whom the statement has been communicated.

In the meantime Mr. Holmes of my staff has discussed this statement informally with Mr. Gladwyn Jebb of the Foreign Office. I am enclosing a report of this discussion which will give some tentative indications of views held in the Foreign Office on the Canadian suggestions.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire, le haut commissariat en Grande-Bretagne

Memorandum by First Secretary, High Commission in Great Britain

[London,] January 25, 1945

This morning I had a conversation with Mr. Gladwyn Jebb of the Economic and Reconstruction Department of the Foreign Office concerning recent developments with regard to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals with particular reference to the Canadian memorandum recently presented.

[58]Non trouvé./Not located.

Mr. Jebb said that he had read the Canadian memorandum with much interest and considered that it contained a number of useful suggestions. I explained that we realized that the points of view raised in the memorandum would not be new to the United Kingdom as they were in line with those we had previously expressed. We realised also that they had received sympathetic consideration and support by the United Kingdom officials. We felt, however, that at this time it might be useful to express them directly to other governments particularly concerned. Mr. Jebb agreed strongly as to the usefulness of our doing so. He emphasised the efforts which the United Kingdom delegation had made at Dumbarton Oaks and subsequently to secure some concessions along these lines.

I asked him frankly what chances he considered there would be for some modifications in line with our wishes, and explained that there would be more likelihood of success if some decisions on these matters could be reached among the Great Powers and recommended by them to the General United Nations Conference. Mr. Jebb was not at all hopeful about the possibility of placing this subject on the agenda of the forthcoming meeting of the leaders of the Great Powers. He thought they would do well if they brought the great men to consideration of the main issues, by which I presume he meant voting in the Security Council and the future of Poland. He thought that our views might be left to consideration at the general Conference. He was inclined to think that we would have the support of such countries as the Netherlands and Belgium. When I told him that we had good reason to believe that the French and Soviet governments would be sympathetic he considered this fact encouraging. He apparently had not seen, or had forgotten, our reference to French and Soviet views in paragraph 4 of our telegram No. 245 of December 22nd to the Dominions Office.

He appreciated our fears concerning the opposition of the Latin-American bloc at the General Conference, and said that his Government was equally concerned about recent manifestations in Chicago and elsewhere. In answer to my enquiry he said that he did not think the United States would necessarily oppose our viewpoint because of their concern for Latin-American wishes.

On the question of the right of the Lesser Powers to decide whether or not they would take part in enforcement actions, Mr. Jebb was less sympathetic. He appreciated our problems and realised the difficulties we faced, but he was frankly worried about any provisions which would cause delay in the enforcement of sanctions. He seemed to think that we might be satisfied on this score if the Anglo-American thesis on the voting in the Security Council were accepted by the Russians. I attempted to point out that these two matters were not necessarily inter-related so far as we were concerned. I pointed out that the Great Powers in the Security council wielded such overwhelming force that they could take action without the support of other countries. He agreed, but said that if the Great Powers took action immediately upon a decision being reached in the Council it would be necessary to consider the possibility of this decision being reversed if it were voted on in the Assembly. Such an event would create a very difficult situation.

On the subject of the proper representation of the Middle Powers, Mr. Jebb was in complete sympathy. He agreed that this was more than a question of the rights of the Middle Powers, and that their proper representation would actually strengthen the Security Organisation. I explained that we had been attempting to devise satisfactory formulae and we recognised that there were objections to all of them, but we hoped that some satisfactory arrangement might be achieved. I put forward as a purely hypothetical suggestion the idea that the Assembly might be asked to choose non-permanent members of the Council from a slate drawn up by the permanent members. He was interested in this idea. He recognized the difficulties — chiefly the fact that the smaller countries might object to a further restriction of the rights of the Assembly. He recognised that the Great Powers would probably propose their special friends or satellites, but he was inclined to think that even if they did the resulting slate would provide for fairly satisfactory representation.

In particular, however, he was inclined to agree with our alternative proposal to associate insofar as possible responsibilities with membership in the Council. We discussed ways and means of committing a country to a certain specified contribution to the enforcement of security before it became eligible for membership in the Council, but our efforts to reach a formula did not go very far. Mr. Jebb agreed when I suggested that it might be necessary to require countries to contribute a certain proportion of their resources rather than to stipulate the size of the contribution requested, so that there would be room on the Council, at least at infrequent intervals, for smaller countries like New Zealand or Norway which, although small in population and resources, could be expected to take a responsible attitude towards their obligations.

In conclusion I enquired how negotiations were developing concerning President Roosevelt's proposals on voting in the Security Council. Mr. Jebb stated that there was no indication at all that the Russians would agree. The State Department had been sanguine at the beginning, and he himself had thought there was some possibility of Soviet concurrence after a talk he had had with Mr. Sobolev, the Soviet Minister in London.

Mr. Jebb stated that he was very anxious to be kept in touch with Canadian views, and hoped that I would maintain contact with him on the subject.

TELEGRAM 22 Ottawa, January 28, 1945

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET.. Addressed Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, No. 22, repeated Canberra No. 4, Wellington No. 3, and Capetown, No. 3.

Your telegram D. 44 of January 10th. World Organization and Soviet Republics. Apart from other considerations set forth in your telegram, we feel that inclusion of Constituent Republics as separate members would probably prevent establishment of World Organization by so increasing opposition in United States and a number of other countries as to make ratification of Charter impossible. We are not sure, however, how seriously Soviet suggestion should be taken and hope that when they understand the probable consequences they will withdraw it.

2. We feel it best that United States Government should take the initiative in opposing the Soviet views and we have been considering what compromise might be found. At Dumbarton Oaks meeting the Soviet representative connected his proposal with the suggestion that the Associated Nations should become founder members. If it were agreed that original membership should be limited to countries which have signed or adhered to the Declaration by United Nations, the position of India would be protected and thirteen Latin-American states would still be initially included.[60] The basis of the Organization would not be seriously narrowed and possible Soviet apprehensions of encountering a strong American bloc under United States leadership would be reduced.

3. A more drastic solution would be the development of a system of weighted voting in the Assembly whereby the votes cast on behalf of each member would be adjusted in accordance with their contribution to the purposes of the Organization. While the difficulties in the way of developing an acceptable scheme of this sort are obvious, they may prove less formidable than the difficulties inherent in the admission of the Soviet Republics to membership.

SECRET. Your telegram No. 202 of January 20th.

Whether a meeting of Commonwealth countries to consider World Organization will prove possible depends on the programme agreed between the great powers. United States Government seem anxious that International Conference should take place as soon as possible. If question of Canadian participation in a Commonwealth meeting is raised with you you should take line that Canadian Government would not be opposed to such a meeting if the programme permits and other Commonwealth countries are agreeable. We should consider it undesirable, however, for tactical reasons that a meeting of this sort should take place in Canada just before an international conference in the United States and would prefer South African suggestion of a meeting in London, probably on official level.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa,] February 15, 1945

The discussions on the World Security proposals in which I participated in Washington over the last weekend cast new light on a number of points of considerable interest to us. My talks covered a very wide range, but in this note I shall try to set forth briefly the chief matters of importance which arose.

The State Department had arranged a luncheon on February 10th at Blair House followed by a talk with the group of officials largely responsible for formulating recommendations on policy towards the World Security Organization. These included Pasvolsky, a Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, who is in direct charge of these matters, J. C. Dunn, the Assistant Secretary of State in charge of political affairs, except those relating to Latin America, Hackworth, the Legal Adviser, Wilson, Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs, Hickerson, now Deputy Director of the Office of European Affairs, and two juniors. Pearson, Heeney, Dunton[61] and Reid attended the luncheon with me. As this discussion ended without an opportunity for me to raise a number of points, we had a further talk with Pasvolsky on February 12th. In the interval Heeney and I had some discussion with Lord Halifax on the subject and we also had a talk with Walter Lippmann.

A. D. Dunton, General Manager, Wartime Information Board.

The most important outcome of the talks was the repeated assertion by the State Department representatives that they contemplated machinery for the enforcement of the peace treaties against Germany and Japan which would be separate from the general Security Organization and would, therefore, give effect to the so called Vandenberg proposals, amounting to a military alliance for a period of years between the great powers and perhaps some others to supervise and apply the terms imposed on the two chief enemy states. U.S. policy on this point has hitherto been far from clear, and while Pasvolsky asserted that this had been their intention for a long time, we had a feeling that the public response to Vandenberg's speeches had at least assisted in bringing about a general conversion to this view. Up to the present it has only been clear that the major allies would assume joint responsibility during the period of full military control of Germany, and it had seemed to us that the emphasis placed in the U.S. on the authority of the Security Council and the need for its rapid establishment had implied an intention that it should assume general responsibility for security when the disarmament of Germany and Japan had been completed. It is true that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals contain as their final paragraph a statement that "no provision of the Charter should preclude action taken or authorized in relation to enemy states as a result of the present war by the Governments having responsibility for such action." No elaboration of this statement, however, has as yet been offered by any of the major powers.

I pointed out at once that it seemed very important that the plans for the separate peace enforcement machinery should be developed and made known to other Governments before the International Conference was called. If all questions of security with respect to Germany and Japan were removed from the scope of the World Organization for at least a decade and perhaps twenty years after the war, the functions of the Security Council during that period would be comparatively unimportant. (It was generally agreed that the Security Council could never handle a serious dispute between two great powers which had reached the danger point). The establishment of independent peace enforcement machinery would reduce the emphasis at the conference on the Security Council and enhance the importance of the Assembly and the social and economic aspects of the Organization. The effect would be to set up transitional arrangements which would be likely to remain in operation until agreement could be reached on the readmission of Germany and Japan to the comity of nations.

I think that we made some impression by our arguments on the necessity for developing the longer range aspects of peace enforcement. In spite of Pasvolsky's assertion that U.S. policy had not recently been changed in this respect, I found that Halifax was surprised at the line which he had taken. I pointed out in passing that the separation of peace enforcement against Germany and Japan from questions of general security would set up new problems for other countries over the composition of the controlling bodies charged with the execution of the peace treaties, but we did not go into this side. It may be that some general decisions on it were reached at the Yalta Conference.

We discussed at considerable length the points made in our recent representations to the great powers. I was left with the impression that our memorandum had not been very seriously considered in the State Department but that some at least of our purposes might win their support. Our central objection relates to the powers of the Security Council to require states not represented on it to take serious action for the enforcement of its decisions. Pasvolsky indicated that he thought that the Council should be able to demand facilities (i.e., especially transit rights for military forces) from all members of the Organization but that the provision of armed forces might only be required with the consent of the country concerned. He seemed to think, however, that the Council ought to be able to require all members of the Organization to join in economic sanctions and to take such political steps as the severance of diplomatic relations. He would, therefore, probably oppose our suggestion that the Council's decisions under Chapter VIII B ought to be binding only on Council members in the first instance, and would prefer to make particular exceptions relating to the provision of armed forces.

With respect to our alternative proposals of various means of associating member states with Council decisions, the American officials seemed inclined to resist the suggestion that certain decisions of the Council might be generalized through approval by the Assembly. We discussed at considerable length our proposal for enlarging the Council ad hoc by adding to it as temporary members states whose interests were directly involved in a dispute. They were not sympathetic to this proposal (which incidentally appears in the League Covenant) but the most explicit reason they gave was that its adoption would upset the voting rules in the Council. We pointed out that this objection was easily met by requiring say a two-third majority instead of a set number of votes, but I think that we shall have difficulty in getting much improvement in the present text.

I was not able to make progress with our suggestion that criteria should be established to ensure the election of the leading secondary states to the Council more frequently than the election of small and unimportant states. The Americans produced the obvious and formidable objections to any effort to classify all the states of the world in accordance with their international significance. I think, however, that they would not oppose a minor addition to the Charter stating that in electing the non-permanent members of the Council the Assembly should pay due regard to the contribution to the purposes of the Organization of the states chosen. This would be some improvement. They would also probably support a specific disqualification of states which failed to fulfill their obligations under the Charter.

I brought up the question of the absence of any provision in the proposals which would permit states to withdraw from the Organization. Pasvolsky stated that all the great powers were opposed to the inclusion of a right of withdrawal such as that which appeared in the Covenant. I suggested as an alternative that there should be added a clause providing for the general review of the Charter after a fixed term of years which would give states dissatisfied with its operation or with the amendments then made in it an opportunity to drop out. I suggested that such a review might coincide with the termination of the separate arrangements to enforce the peace treaties against Germany and Japan. Pasvolsky said that consideration should certainly be given to this idea and seemed sympathetically disposed while implying that no decision had been reached in the State Department.

I was not able to get much clarification of the rather obscure provisions of Chapter VIII B of the Charter relating to the military agreements which all members would be expected to conclude. These agreements would place forces, facilities and assistance at the disposal of the Council. It was indicated that in the first place such agreements should be concluded between the great powers and that then other states should be brought in jointly or separately with an eye to the strategic considerations in each region. Pasvolsky readily agreed that it would be impossible for Canada to determine what obligations she might properly assume until agreements had been negotiated by the United States and United Kingdom.

A number of smaller countries have been pressing for the inclusion of a territorial guarantee on the lines of Article X of the Covenant. I gathered that this will be resisted by all the great powers on the grounds that adequate protection against arbitrary action is given by the statement of principles in paragraphs 1, 3, and 4 of Chapter II. They feel that a guarantee of territorial integrity would be next to no real defence in modern warfare and might serve only to warn an aggressor of what he should avoid doing. They considered that the related problem of "peaceful change" is adequately covered by the powers of both Assembly and Council to make recommendations on matters affecting the peace of the world.

We did not discuss at any length the problem of voting in the Council except to point out in various connections that the compromise agreed to by the Big Three at Yalta[62] would give the great powers a privileged position over all other states which would be hard to defend in smaller countries and would, therefore, increase the difficulties of ratification.

We also had a long discussion of the planning of the economic and social activities of the Organization into which I need not go here. The information acquired will be of great assistance in our own preparations for the San Francisco conference. Their intention is to keep the provisions of the Charter on this side as flexible as possible and I think that there is a great deal to be said for this.

As for the seat of the Organization no decision had been reached or ever attempted. The Russians were strongly opposed to Geneva but were not committed to Vienna or any other site. The Americans thought that the Assembly, the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council and some of the other bodies might meet in different countries although they would have to have a permanent base. I think that they underrate the confusion and waste of time arising from improvising arrangements for large international gatherings in places without special facilities. They are opposed to concentrating at one point the seats of the various specialized organizations, such as the I.L.O. and the Organization of Food and Agriculture.

In general I found that there was very little disposition to consider amendments to the Charter although there was recognition that its expansion at some points was required. The Conference of the American Republics at Mexico City may prove enlightening as I should judge that they underrate in Washington the opposition to some of the proposals. As for the general conference they did not learn that San Francisco had been selected for it until just after my discussions at the State Department ended. They will have considerable difficulty with the physical arrangements since San Francisco, I am told, is greatly overcrowded already.

World Organization.

Now that it has been decided to issue invitations to all United Nations to participate in Conference at San Francisco on World Organisation on 25th April, we feel that time has come to reach definite decisions with regard to preliminary gathering of British Commonwealth representatives referred to in my telegram of January 17th, Circular D. 89.†

2. In view of the immense importance of this issue for each and all of the members of the Commonwealth, we think it most desirable in advance of the San Francisco meeting to ensure fullest discussion and mutual understanding of our respective points of view. We feel strongly, therefore, that a preliminary meeting ought to be arranged as suggested. We are most grateful for the views on the Dumbarton Oaks scheme which we have received from Dominion Governments and these have been and are receiving the most careful consideration here, and we shall be quite ready to discuss them at a meeting.

3. As regards place, we should suggest a meeting in London. It would clearly be helpful if the Foreign Secretary who was himself at the Crimea meeting could be available for consultation, and it would be difficult for him to undertake another absence from this country in the near future before the San Francisco meeting.

4. As regards the time, there would we assume be advantage in so arranging the meetings as to afford an opportunity for the results of the discussions to be considered by the Governments before final instructions are sent to the delegates who will be attending the San Francisco Conference. From this point of view we suggest that the preliminary meeting should open on or about the 15th March so that discussions could finish by Easter and leave three weeks available before the San Francisco meeting opens.

5. The magnitude of the issues raised would naturally seem to indicate discussion at the Ministerial level, but, if any Government found it impracticable to be represented by a Minister, we should welcome representation by appropriate officials. It is suggested that I, as Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, should preside at the meeting.

6. Opportunity could conveniently be taken at proposed meeting to discuss also question of territorial trusteeship which is likely to be raised in connection with the San Francisco Conference.

7. We greatly hope above suggestions regarding proposed meeting will be acceptable. We should be grateful for earliest possible reply and an indication as to who would be your representatives at the meeting. We should be delighted that delegates should be our guests while in England.

As it will be quite out of the question for me to attend the meeting myself I am taking up the suggestion made in that telegram that we should be represented at the discussions by an appropriate official and am therefore sending Mr. Hume Wrong. He has been in direct charge of our preparatory studies in this field and is thoroughly familiar with our general views on most of the questions which are likely to come up for consideration. In the circumstances I am expecting him to handle the specialized discussions which I assume will be the main object of the meetings. I think however it would be appreciated if you could arrange to be present at least at the opening sessions at which I imagine Mr. Eden will also be present. Would you convey to Lord Cranborne my regret that imperative nature of engagements here prevents my participating. As Wrong will not be taking anyone with him from Canada it would, I think, be very helpful, both to him and to your Office, to have Holmes' services made available for the duration of the meetings. IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. In view of public announcement from Canberra this morning on Australian participation in Commonwealth discussions on international security plans, it would, I think, be desirable for your Government to issue explanatory statement as soon as possible.

It would be helpful, from our point of view, if this statement could explain that meeting of Commonwealth representatives is intended to continue the exchange of views on world organization which has been proceeding through various channels over the last year. In view of the nature of the issues which will arise at the San Francisco Conference, it seems to me most desirable that your announcement should make it clear that the preliminary Commonwealth discussions will naturally not commit the Governments to any particular policies to be followed jointly at the International Conference.

I should also appreciate it if you could make it clear that, in suggesting this meeting of Commonwealth representatives at rather short notice, you had recognized that it would not, in all cases, be practicable for the Ministers who will be attending the San Francisco Conference to be present themselves at the meeting in London and had proposed, in these circumstances, that countries should be represented by appropriate officials.[63]

Memorandum by Department of State

Washington, February 26, 1945

The Department of State welcomes the comments and suggestions of the Canadian Government concerning the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals which the Canadian Ambassador handed to the Under-Secretary of State on January 15, 1945.[64] The Department feels that reaction of the Canadian Government to the Proposals should be discussed fully and with the entire frankness which characterizes Canadian-American relations. It is only through such friendly exchanges of views among governments and through public debate and discussion of the Proposals that the proposed Charter of the International Organization can be developed into a practical working instrument.

The Department is weighing the significant and helpful suggestions of the Canadian Government with the greatest care. It feels sure that the Canadian Government will agree that nothing should be done which might impair the efficacy of the proposed instrument for maintaining security or throw out of balance the character of the national contributions which will be required for this purpose.

It is the feeling of the Department that great progress was made in the direction of mutual understanding of the Proposals through the informal conversations held during Mr. Wrong's recent visit to Washington.[65] The Department would be happy at any time to explore further through informal consultation any question relative to the Proposals of interest or concern to the Canadian Government.

1. At Red Army Day reception, Litvinof told me he had been greatly interested in our memorandum submitted to Molotov January 16th. I wrote and asked him if he would discuss the matter with me informally. He replied that he would be glad to see me, but was not authorized to endorse the matter officially. I called on him March 1st and at both the beginning and end of the interview he emphasized that he was speaking purely personally.

2. Litvinof said many countries had proposed amendments to proposals, some of which conflicted with the basis agreed upon by the four Powers. His idea had been that there should be another meeting of the Powers to consider such amendments before holding general Conference but evidently this was not the intention, and amendments proposed by other countries had not been discussed in Crimea. I gathered the impression he considered this a mistake.

3. On the subject of our proposals, he was very non-commital. He indicated that, if there were to be special qualifications for election to the Council, they would have to be based on military potential. He added that this would have to take account of ability to conscript for service overseas. I replied that it should be left to each country to decide how obligations would be carried out, but it would be easier for countries such as Canada to assume obligations if they knew they would participate in arriving at decisions.

4. Regarding what he described as our point two, Litvinof said that other countries had also proposed action subject to confirmation by the Assembly, but in his opinion this would destroy basis of proposal which placed in the Council full power for deciding on measures to avert aggression. He referred me to the article by Malinin, sent you with my despatch No. 277, August 26th,† in which it was argued that chief responsibility for combating aggression should rest with the Great Powers. He made it plain that he shared this view, but added that in the case of moral and economic sanctions all members of the Organization should be obliged to participate.

SECRET [Ottawa,] March 7, 1945

In your discussions with the President[66] some attention will doubtless be paid to the San Francisco Conference and related questions. In this note there is suggested a number of points which you might wish to take up with Mr. Roosevelt. I have sought to put them as concisely as possible.

1. We feel that under the proposals the gap is too wide between the great powers and secondary states which have wide international interests and have done their duty well during the war. The position of the great powers is carefully hedged about so as to involve no infringement on their sovereignty beyond requiring them to accept obligations to follow certain procedures and rules of conduct. All other members are placed under more stringent obligations. They have no assurance of membership in the Council beyond the chances of periodic election. When in the Council they possess no right of veto. When not in the Council — and this is perhaps our central point — they would, nevertheless, be obligated to take possibly very serious action to enforce the Council's decisions under Chapter VIII B, involving the possible application of political, economic and, finally, military sanctions by them against an offender.

[66]Le Premier ministre était à Washington les 9, 10 et 13 mars.
The Prime Minister was in Washington on March 9 and 10 and March 13.

This requirement raises very serious problems about securing acceptance of the Charter. The political difficulties are probably greater than the practical difficulties of operation, since the Council would in practice almost certainly need to secure the consent of any Government before asking it to take serious action of this sort. If that is true, why should not the proposals be changed to conform to the practice likely to be followed? This could be done by providing that enforcement decisions of the Council (but not action taken for the pacific settlement of disputes) would bind only members of the Council and other states which were associated with these decisions in some manner. Such association could come from temporary membership in the Council or from agreement between the Council and the state concerned or from approval by the Assembly of the decision in question. There may be other means also of meeting the point.

Connected with this is the fact that the proposals establish no standard of eligiblity whatsoever for elected members of the Council. Liberia and Salvador are as eligible under it as Brazil, Canada and the Netherlands. We doubt that the Assembly would in fact always elect responsible members of the international community who could make a serious contribution to the work of the Council. While it is very difficult to suggest an effective means of ensuring that the more important smaller states are more frequently elected, we hope that something may be worked out. We realize that attention must be paid also to regional distribution of seats.

2. It would be useful to find out what is in the President's mind about special arrangements to enforce the peace terms against Germany and Japan. If long-term engagements separate from the World Organization are envisaged (as has been suggested in the State Department as well as by Senator Vandenberg) the functions of the Security Council will be severely limited for a considerable period and the concentration of attention on it will be misplaced. It seems desirable that something more should be said by the great powers on this point before San Francisco as otherwise the delegations there will be working in the dark on an important side of the problem. If the Security Council is not called upon to act against dangers arising either from Germany and Japan or from serious disputes between the Allied great powers, the sanctions aspect of its authority will not be of great importance until the time comes for admitting Germany and Japan to the Organization.

3. Related with this is a question arising from the lack of any provision in the Charter for withdrawal or general amendment. Under the proposals a country once in cannot get out and the Charter could be changed only after amendments adopted by two-thirds of the Assembly have been ratified by a majority including the five powers with permanent Council seats. Thus each great power would possess a veto on amendment.

There is a good deal to be said for omitting provisions for withdrawals in view of the use of the provisions in the League Covenant. I think we might advocate instead the insertion of a provision requiring the general revision of the whole charter after a stated period of not more than twenty years and probably not less than ten years. As Roosevelt said in his speech the other day frequent amendments will prove necessary, and it seems to me there is a great deal to be said for calling a constituent assembly in due course to reform the whole structure. Dissatisfied members would then have an opportunity of dropping out. Such a revision might appropriately coincide with the end of any special regime imposed on Germany and Japan.

RE THE POSITION OF SMALL NATIONS IN THE WORLD ORGANIZATION:[70]

Under the proposals, the gap is too wide between the Great Powers and secondary states which have wide international interests and have done their duty well during the war.

The position of the Great Powers is carefully hedged about so as to involve no infringement on their sovereignty beyond requiring to accept obligations to follow certain procedures and rules of conduct. All other members are placed under more stringent obligations. They have no assurance of membership in the Council beyond the chances of periodic election. When in the Council, they possess no right of veto. This requirement raises very serious problem about securing acceptance of the Charter.

The political difficulties are probably greater than the practical difficulties of operation since the Council would, in practice, almost certainly need to secure the consent of any government before asking it to take serious action of this sort. Germany and Japan before San Francisco, as otherwise delegates there would be working in the dark on an important side of the problem. If long term engagements separate from the world organization are envisaged, the functions of the Security Council would be severely limited for a considerable period, and a concentration of attention on it would be misplaced.

If the Security Council is not called upon to act against dangers arising either from Germany and Japan or from serious disputes between the allied Great Powers, the sanctions aspect of its authority will not be of great importance until the time comes, to admitting Germany and Japan in the organization.

Under the proposals, a country once in the international organization cannot get out, and the Charter could be changed only after amendments adopted by ⅔ of the Assembly have been ratified by a majority including the Five Powers with permanent Council seats. Thus each Great Power would possess a veto on amendment.

There is a good deal to be said for omitting provisions of withdrawal in view of the provisions of the League Covenant. Organization even contemplating the imposition of sanctions against a Great Power. I can recognize that certain immediate political considerations in certain countries may make it necessary to take this line, but I see no reasons why we should encourage it in Canada; especially as it is a completely defeatist line and represents a considerable retrogression from the League Covenant. Notwithstanding, the State Department here goes merrily along trying to convince the people that the Dumbarton Charter is much better than the old League Covenant because it has teeth in it. What is the use of having teeth if you cannot use them? What the Dumbarton Oaks Charter needs in fact is a little dentistry.

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire, l'ambassade aux États-Unis

Memorandum by First Secretary, Embassy in United States

SECRET [Washington,] March 14, 1945

COMMENTS ON MEMORANDUM OF MARCH 6 TO THE PRIME MINISTER[†] OUTLINING MATERIAL WHICH MIGHT BE INCLUDED IN HIS SPEECH MOVING THE RESOLUTION ON INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

1. The statement is made that a permanent member of the Council could not block the consideration of a complaint against it by another state and an effort to solve the problem by pacific means. This is one possible interpretation of the proposals, but there is another possible interpretation, as I have pointed out in my memorandum of March 13, and which Kelsen points out in his article in the American Journal of International Law.

2. The statement is made that a great power can block punitive action, but in that event the Organization would be in danger of dissolution since it could not hope to be strong enough to coerce a great power. It can be argued that this is a half-truth. The Organization, through the use of the quota forces put at its disposal, would, presumably, not be in a position to coerce a great power even if the constitutional bar to the imposition of sanctions against a great power did not exist. However, if all the members of the Organization, other than the aggressor great power, were willing to pool all their forces in a total war against that great power, they would probably be strong enough to coerce it. Surely, indeed, the lesson to be drawn from the history of the thirties is that if a great power should, in future, act in such a way as to convince the other great powers that it is determined to dominate the world by force, the only way to prevent a world war from breaking out will be for the other great powers to form immediately an alliance against it and to declare that the moment it commences aggression they will in combination wage total war against it until it surrenders unconditionally. Such a threat might conceivably bring the state which is planning aggression to its senses and so prevent the war from breaking out. In spite of the constitutional bar against the imposition of sanctions against a great power, the provisions and machinery of the Charter will facilitate the formation of such an ad hoc temporary alliance since the discussions in the Council of a complaint against a great power will provide an opportunity for the other great powers to determine whether or not that great power is a menace to world peace. Before they pronounce sentence of guilt against it they will, if they are sensible, have forged an alliance against the guilty state.

3. It is stated that the provisions in the proposals for peaceful settlement should normally be sufficient to deal with disputes of all sorts. For the reasons given in paragraph 1 above, it is arguable that this statement goes too far. It also fails to take into account the weakening of the system of peaceful settlement by the reservation of matters of domestic jurisdiction which are very often, if not most often, the occasions for the really serious disputes between nations.

4. It is stated that the Security Council could never be strong enough to coerce a great military power even if the veto were removed. For the reasons given in paragraph 2 above, it can be contended that this statement is a half-truth.

5. It is stated that the Security Council cannot deal with really dangerous disputes involving a great power as a party. The words "deal with" are ambiguous. If the Security Council is given power to make recommendations, which have no binding force, on the settlement of disputes even if they involve great powers it will be "dealing with" the dispute. It is to be hoped that one thing which the Canadian Government will push hard for at San Francisco will be the limitation of the individual veto of a great power to the one question of the imposition of sanctions.

6. The list of functional inter-governmental bodies which have been or are likely to be set up is incomplete. The Universal Postal Union, as well as the I.L.O., is already in existence. Among the organizations which have already been conceived are the International Civil Aviation Organization and the Organization for Cultural and Educational Reconstruction. Proposals have been made for the establishment of international organizations dealing with telecommunications and shipping.

7. It can be contended that it would be unwise to include this paragraph in the Prime Minister's statement. The next paragraph would be sufficient to indicate that the Canadian delegation is not going to make any vain attempt to alter the whole structure contemplated in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. There would seem to be no necessity for us to announce publicly before the Conference opens that we are going to accept a treaty resulting from the San Francisco Conference even if none of the obscurities and deficiencies of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals are remedied. Moreover, this would be a promise which the Canadian Government might not be able to fulfil. Another criticism which could be made of this paragraph is that it is only a half-truth to say that it is absolutely essential that the treaty adopted in San Francisco should be acceptable to the great powers. It is equally essential that it be acceptable to a very considerable number of the middle powers and the small powers.

8. It is stated that we hope that some procedure will be devised whereby states not sitting on the Council would not have to undertake serious enforcement action without participating in the Council's proceedings or separately agreeing in some manner to join in executing its decisions. This would not cover the possibility that we would be prepared to be bound by a two-thirds vote of the Assembly ratifying the Security Council's decision, even if we voted in the negative.

9. It is stated that it is very difficult to make any acceptable scheme of arranging all states in order of international importance for the purpose of election to the Security Council. Compared with other problems of drafting the treaty, surely this is not one of the most difficult problems. The middle powers can be defined as those which bind themselves to make the largest contributions of forces and facilities under the special military agreements. Though there would be difficulty in finding a common denominator for forces and facilities, these difficulties might well prove not to be so great as to warrant the statement that they would be "very difficult". Moreover, other states at San Francisco are going to emphasize the difficulties of defining the middle states and it would not seem to be necessary for the Prime Minister of Canada to draw particular attention to these difficulties.

Draft resolution of March 6.

10. It is suggested that the resolution proper might read as follows:

"Therefore be it resolved that this House

(1) Endorses the action taken by the Government of Canada in agreeing to send representatives to the conference to participate in discussions based on the proposals made public by the four inviting governments;

(2) Recognizes the vital importance to Canada of the establishment as soon as possible of the most effective international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security which can be established under present conditions, an organization of which Canada should be a founder member;

(3) Approves of the Canadian delegation to the San Francisco Conference using its utmost efforts to secure the establishment of such an organization."

Memorandum by Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] March 15, 1945

QUESTIONS ARISING FROM DUMBARTON OAKS CONFERENCE ON WHICH FURTHER GUIDANCE SEEMS NECESSARY BEFORE THE COMMONWEALTH DISCUSSIONS IN LONDON

The Commonwealth meeting in London beginning on April 4th will be concerned with all aspects of the draft proposals. Hitherto we have paid attention chiefly to those aspects which created special difficulties for Canada. There are a number of other important matters on which the Canadian delegation will have to take a position at San Francisco. It would be very helpful for the Canadian representatives at the London talks if some preliminary consideration could now be given to some of these points. They are stated briefly below, together with the line which might be adopted by the Canadian representatives. It is not necessary to reach firm decisions at this stage but rather to learn whether the general line suggested is acceptable.

1. Additions to the purposes and principles of the Organization.

(a) Several governments, including New Zealand, maintain that a guarantee of the territorial integrity and political independence of members should be added on the lines of Article 10 of the League Covenant. Strong objection was taken by Sir Robert Borden to the inclusion of this article at the Paris Conference and its interpretation was later whittled down, partly on the initiative of the Canadian delegations at Assemblies. A non-committal attitude might be adopted at present, since the importance of such a guarantee depends on the methods proposed for its enforcement. Several countries may wish its inclusion because of their fears of Soviet aggression and their memories of the Munich Agreement.

(b) Under one of the principles all members would undertake to refrain from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the Organization. The voting procedure in the Security Council, however, could be used by any great power to block the application of sanctions and by any great power not party to the dispute to block even any consideration of a dispute. It seems necessary, therefore, in some way or other to cover the contingency that a serious dispute has arisen on which the Security Council cannot act because the veto power of a permanent member has prevented a decision. This will present very difficult problems and at the London talks the Canadian representatives might confine themselves to drawing attention to the difficulties without putting forward suggestions for solution. A partial solution might be to provide that in such a contingency the Assembly could recommend a solution, without being able to employ the Council's powers to impose sanctions.

2. Membership of the Organization.

It is intended that the founder members should be the United Nations invited to the San Francisco Conference. The question of the prompt admission of some or all neutral states will certainly arise and also of the early admission of certain ex-enemy States, including in particular Italy. It is suggested that Canada should support the view that membership should be made as comprehensive as possible, except that the special cases of Germany and Japan should be left aside for consideration after a period of years. The early admission of Ireland might be specially urged, as the exclusion of Ireland might prejudice the question of Irish membership in the Commonwealth.

At the Yalta Conference Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill agreed to support the separate membership of the Ukrainian and White Russian constituent republics. This difficult issue will arise at San Francisco and will doubtless also be discussed at length in London. If it be the price of Russian adhesion, it may be necessary to pay it. It may also be the price of Russian consent for the admission of India. It may, however, be difficult for the Canadian delegation at San Francisco to go publicly on record in support. At the London talks action should probably be confined to discussing the pros and cons without taking a definite line.

3. Composition of the Security Council.

We are committed to the view that states with important international interests which are not great powers should be preferred in some manner for election to the Security Council. This point was made in our representations to the great powers in January. Available information indicates that the United Kingdom and French Governments will favour an attempt to insert standards of eligibility in the Charter. The Soviet and U.S. Governments have not defined their position but seem likely to be hostile. In London the line previously taken should be pursued.

4. Powers of the Security Council.

Our chief concern, hitherto, has arisen from the possibility that the proposals would obligate Canada to take serious action to enforce decisions of the Security Council, in reaching which the Canadian Government had played no part. As the proposals stand all members would be obligated to join in "diplomatic, economic or other measures not involving the use of armed force" to give effect to the Council's decisions. Their obligations to provide military forces, facilities and assistance would be determined by special agreements separately ratified by each member; but apparently, once consent had been given, the Security Council could call upon the members to act within the limits of their special agreements. We have suggested that in the first instance only members of the Security Council should be obligated to execute its decisions, but that provision should be made for joining other members in active enforcement through one of three methods, all of which might be written into the Charter:

(a) by securing the approval of the Assembly for decisions;

(b) by giving temporary membership on the Council to states whose cooperation was needed; and

(c) by agreement between the Council and the member concerned to take particular action.

It is suggested that at the London meetings continued emphasis should be placed on the importance of finding some method of meeting the difficulty.

5. Voting Procedure in the Security Council.

Under the Yalta compromise decisions on procedural matters would be taken by seven votes out of eleven. On other matters a total of seven votes would also be required, but these must include the votes of all the permanent members except when methods for the pacific settlement of disputes under Chapter VIII A are under consideration. In such cases a permanent member would not vote if his country were a party to the dispute. The permanent members thus would be given an individual veto on all important decisions of the Council when a dispute had reached the stage of being a threat to peace. Before that stage was reached the permanent members would retain their veto unless they were parties to the dispute in question.

This may be the best arrangement on which agreement can be secured. It reveals clearly the fact that the Organization would be impotent to deal with a threat to the peace from one of the permanent members of the Council. It is, however, open to question whether the prerogatives of a permanent member should extend to the right of veto in the case of disputes coming up for discussion under Chapter VIII A "Pacific Settlement of Disputes" when they are not parties to the dispute. Under the Yalta formula, for instance, the U.S.S.R. could veto consideration of a dispute between Greece and Turkey or between Paraguay and Bolivia. The case might be argued in London for restricting the veto of the permanent members to decisions on disputes involving threats to peace.

In this connection reference has already been made under the first point in this memorandum to the necessity for making some provision for dealing with disputes with which the Council is impotent to deal because of the exercise of the veto power. The French Government will press for some general escape clause recognizing the legality of action being taken in such cases under alliances and regional agreements notified to the Security Council.

It should be noted that the veto rights of the great powers would under the proposals extend to decisions on a number of matters not directly concerned with the consideration of international disputes. Thus it would cover: admission of new members to the Organization (Chapter V.B.2); suspension of membership of an offending state and also expulsion (Chapter V.B.3); election of the Secretary General (Chapter V.B.4); the approval of agreements placing forces at the disposal of the Security Council (Chapter VIII.B.5); the consideration of a local dispute by a regional agency (Chapter VIII.C.2); and the coming into force of amendments to the Charter (Chapter XI). Each permanent member of the Council would have to take affirmative action on all these matters. Desirable changes in the process of amendment are mentioned below. At the London meetings the possibilities might be examined of removing the veto power over the admission of new members.

6. Special Engagements against Germany and Japan.

The importance to be attached to the matters raised under points 4 and 5 and a great deal else beside will depend in part on the nature and duration of the arrangements made to ensure the execution by Germany and Japan of the terms of surrender and treaties of peace. If long-term alliances with "automatic" commitments are entered into between the principal Allies for this purpose (on the general lines of the Franco-Soviet Alliance), it would seem that the Security Council would be by-passed in dealing with questions arising out of the peace settlement. We know at present that agreement was reached at Yalta on the general machinery of military government to be imposed on Germany for a period of perhaps two or three years, but it seems that plans covering a longer period were not discussed. Obviously, the debates at San Francisco will be unrealistic unless the delegations have some idea of the plans of the great powers to give effect to Chapter XII 2 of the proposals, which lays down that the Charter shall not preclude action taken or authorized in relation to enemy states as a result of the war by the Governments having responsibility for such action.

The nature of these arrangements will almost inevitably be determined by the great powers and not much influence could be exercised by Canada on the decision. At London we might support the general desirability of giving to the Security Council as soon as possible a large measure of responsibility, without taking a definite stand for or against independent long-term methods of keeping Germany and Japan from becoming a danger to security. Much will depend on the Soviet attitude, which is obscure, and on the U.S. attitude, which under the recent favourable reception of Senator Vanderberg's proposals may favour an outright alliance to enforce the peace.

7. Special Military Agreements.

The forces, facilities and assistance which member states are expected to make available to the Security Council on its call are to be determined by "special agreement or agreements concluded among themselves." The procedure contemplated is obscure and should be clarified, if possible, in the course of the London talks. Some of the points requiring clarification are: How are the agreements to be negotiated "among themselves" by member states? Do the facilities to be covered include transit rights for forces acting under instructions of the Security Council or would all members be obligated to permit such transit? What sort of engagement does the United Kingdom Government anticipate making?

It is suggested that the general line at London should be that the Canadian Government could not enter into any obligation to send forces overseas without its express consent, and that if Canada entered into such an agreement, this limitation would probably have to be incorporated in it. As the question of transit rights would in our case be likely to be confined to undertaking to permit the U.S. contingent called out by the Security Council to use Canadian air fields, ports, railroads and roads, we might be ready to agree in advance that we would extend these facilities when requested by the Security Council. It should also be made clear that the size of any Canadian commitment to furnish forces, facilities and assistance can only be determined when commitments have been entered into by the great powers.

8. Regional Agreements.

The proposals (Ch. VIII C) would maintain the supremacy of the Security Council by requiring that no enforcement action against an offending state involved in a local dispute should be undertaken under regional arrangements without its approval. This seems a desirable provision; it was strongly defended at Mexico City by the United States representatives in opposition to proposals to exclude entirely from the scope of the world organization disputes between countries of the western hemisphere. There are likely to be regional agreements in Western Europe involving France, Belgium, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, and perhaps other states, with the object of preventing German resurgence. Any such agreements may possibly be treated as part of the special arrangements to enforce the peace referred to under point 6 above. It is to be hoped that some clarification of the views held in London may be secured at the Commonwealth meetings.

9. International Court of Justice.

Two important questions concerning the Court may be brought up in the London talks: Should the Security Council have authority to require member-states to submit to the Court for decision disputes of a "justiciable" nature, if they fail to settle them by other means or voluntarily submit them to the Court? If a dispute has been adjudicated by the Court and one or more parties to it fail to accept the Court's decision, should the Security Council be empowered to apply the sanctions clauses to enforce compliance? Until more is known of the attitude of the great powers, it is suggested that no decision should be reached on Canadian policy on these questions.

10. Social and Economic Arrangements.

The sections of the proposals dealing with international economic and social cooperation seem in general to be acceptable apart from drafting changes. Undoubtedly central coordination of the various functional agencies will be required, and the proposals contemplate a flexible system which could be adapted to cover such varied forms of desirable activity as those of the I.L.O., the various narcotics bodies and the proposed International Monetary Fund.

The scheme would not give the Assembly or the Economic and Social Council power to command, but would place them in a strong position to regulate by recommendation and persuasion. The line at London might, therefore, be of general support. The question might be raised of the possibility of associating non-member states (including ex-enemy states) in this side of the Organization's activities.

11. Amendment and Revision of the Charter.

Under the proposals no member could voluntarily withdraw from the Organization. The Charter could be altered by amendment adopted by a two-thirds majority in the Assembly and ratified by the states with permanent Council seats and a majority of the other members. Mr. Roosevelt in his recent speech to Congress stated that frequent amendment of the Charter would prove necessary and Mr. Churchill has more than once taken the view that arrangements made now should be subject to easy alteration. The questions arise, therefore, whether the amendment provisions are satisfactory, whether a right of voluntary withdrawal should be included, and whether a complete revision of the Charter after a trial period should be envisaged.

On the first point, the proposals for amendment are likely to make amendment very difficult for two reasons — first, that ratification by all the great powers and a majority of the rest would be required following Assembly approval, and, secondly, that the great powers would possess an individual veto on changes. This might make it impossible to alter such important and contentious provisions as the number of permanent members and the voting procedure in the Council. If provision were made that amendments would only be submitted for adoption by the Assembly after they had been proposed to the previous Assembly, it might be feasible to omit the requirement of later ratification, as the interval would give plenty of time to secure Parliamentary approval by resolution in countries where this was desired. The veto of the great powers on amendments might either be omitted altogether or reduced so as to require the concurrence of perhaps three of them instead of all those with permanent Council seats. The possibilities might be explored in London.

There are good arguments to support the omission of the right of voluntary withdrawal, which under the Covenant gave trouble-making states an easy escape from their obligations. On the other hand, it would not be easy to ask the Canadian people to accept permanent membership in an admittedly imperfect organization. It is suggested, therefore, that at London the possibility should be put forward of including in the Charter a clause requiring its general revision after a term of years — in short, making the Charter an interim constitution only. At the end of this term, which might be from ten to twenty years, the whole Charter should be reviewed and any new agreement submitted once more to ratification. If we are to have separate peace enforcement machinery to keep Germany and Japan down, the revision of the Charter might take place towards the end of these transitional arrangements. This general line might well be argued strongly at the Commonwealth discussions.

12. Colonial Trusteeship and Mandates.

The published proposals include nothing on this subject, but it was agreed at Yalta that the three great powers should discuss before San Francisco what provision should be made in the Charter and should invite China and France to join them. There seems to be a wide difference of opinion on this subject between the United Kingdom on the one hand and Australia and New Zealand on the other, with South Africa probably supporting the U.K. position. Canada does not seem called upon to take a positive line and our previous comments on the matter have been based on the effect in the United States of the policies proposed from London which seem destined to arouse strong opposition in the United States. Mr. Churchill appears to have told Mr. Roosevelt at Yalta that British policy would be revised. In London the Canadian representatives may need to do no more than take note of the discussion.

13. The Seat of the World Organization.

No decision has been reached on the headquarters of the World Organization and discussion of the problem between the great powers seems to have been avoided. The Russians are said to object strongly to Geneva, and Mr. Roosevelt is said to favour a peripatetic assembly. If the suggestion is made that the headquarters should be in Canada — which is a conceivable but unlikely compromise, — it would be useful to know whether this should be definitely discouraged. Some decision will have to be reached at San Francisco.

14. The Winding up of the League of Nations.

A large number of complicated constitutional and political problems will arise in connection with the winding up of the League. These have been under study in London and by the League Secretariat. There will have to be an overlapping period in all probability during which the nominal existence of the League will continue. The question is likely to be discussed at London and the Canadian representatives might support any practical methods which would decently enter the Covenant while permitting the continuation of the useful technical functions of the League and the orderly disposition of its property and records.

15. The Questions of Commonwealth Relations.

During the London meetings questions are certain to be raised about the relationship of the British Commonwealth to the World Organization. The general Canadian policy is clear enough. Presumably the correct line to take is that decisions cannot be reached until the Charter has been completed on matters such as co-operation inside the Commonwealth on questions of defence (e.g. in the framing and execution of military agreements under the Charter), and the position of Canada with respect to special defence arrangements, like those proposed for Western Europe and also by Australia and New Zealand for the South Western Pacific. When the World Organization is established we shall be able to assess any resulting problems of Commonwealth relations in the light of its constitution; priority of consideration must at this stage be given to the World Organization, and not to possible alterations in the scope and methods of the Commonwealth system, which is working smoothly as it is.

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in Soviet Union

TELEGRAM 57 Ottawa, March 15, 1945

TOP SECRET. Your telegram No. 51 of March 3rd. World Organization. If you have another opportunity of discussing our position with Soviet Foreign Office, you might emphasize again our belief that some method should be found of associating with decisions of Security Council countries whose active participation in their enforcement is required. Great powers are reserving individual right of veto for all enforcement action, whereas states not elected to Council might as proposals stand be required by Council to take drastic action without any preliminary consultation. In practice consultation would probably be necessary as a condition of effective cooperation and we feel Charter would be strengthened by amendment to conform with probable practice. This view is likely to be widely supported at San Francisco. It can be met in several ways, of which approval by Assembly of some Council decisions would be only one.

2. Insertion of provisions establishing qualifications for election to the Council would be a desirable application of principle that power and responsibility should coincide which is recognized in preferred position of great powers. Its adoption would not, however, meet difficulty described in paragraph 1. We gather United Kingdom and France may support insertion of standards of eligibility for Council membership, together with some secondary countries with important international interests.

3. Information so far received indicates that following amendments among others will be proposed at San Francisco:

(a) Decisions to be based on principles of international law and justice;

(b) Guarantee of territorial integrity of members to be inserted;

(c) Reservation of right to act under existing alliances in event of emergency (France and Belgium will support);

(d) Reservation of right of independent action in event Council cannot reach a decision;

(e) Various proposals to limit authority of Security Council in favour of Assembly and to reduce prerogatives of great powers;

(f) Insertion of declaration of rights of individuals in Charter.

4. It seems clear that effective responsibility of Security Council for maintenance of peace will depend for some time on arrangements made for ensuring German and Japanese execution of peace settlement. If separate engagements against enemy states on lines of Franco-Soviet Alliance are excluded from direction of Security Council, it may have only minor part to play for a considerable period. Any light you can throw on Soviet intentions would be welcomed.

5. You doubtless know that at Yalta United Kingdom and United States Government agreed to support inclusion as original members of Ukrainian and White Russian Republics. Soviet representatives seem to have brought up position of India and this may be price of securing Indian membership. We have not yet decided what our attitude will be at the conference.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D.445 London, March 15, 1945

TOP SECRET. London meeting.

Scope of forthcoming discussions is, we think, generally agreed. Main discussions would seem to fall naturally under heads:

(1) Dumbarton Oaks proposals, with special reference to comments by British Commonwealth Governments.

(2) Territorial trusteeship (my telegram of March 12th Circular D. 429).†
