TELEGRAM 66 Ottawa, March 18, 1945

TOP SECRET. Addressed London No. 66. Repeated Canberra No. 10, Wellington No. 10, Capetown No. 9.

Your telegram D. 445 of March 15. London meeting.

We agree to the main heads of discussions as suggested by you with the following comments.

(1) It is desirable that under the first head there should be exchange of information and views on the arrangements contemplated for the enforcement of peace terms against Germany and Japan. We find it impossible to form a clear idea of the responsibility and authority of the Security Council (and therefore to assess the importance of some of the chief questions which will arise at San Francisco) without more information on this. If long term engagements are made between the principal Allies to deal with any threat from Germany, such as the Franco-Soviet Treaty, and if the Security Council has no control over the operation of these engagements, it would seem that the Council would have a minor role to play during the currency of these engagements. This aspect could of course be covered during discussion of chapter 12 (2) of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals.

(2) Should the special conference proposed by the United States to consider the Statute of the Permanent Court[72] take place we assume that discussion in London might be limited to general consideration of the role of the Court in the world organisation.

DESPATCH 145 Moscow, March 22, 1945

TOP SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to paragraph 5 of your top secret telegram No. 57 of March 15th, in which you mention that the United Kingdom and United States Governments agreed at the Crimea Conference to support at San Francisco the inclusion of the Ukrainian and Belorussian republics as original members of the World Security Organization. Since the receipt of your telegram I have discussed this subject with both the United Kingdom and United States Ambassadors.

2. Sir Archibald Clark Kerr had only a hazy recollection of what transpired at the Crimea Conference regarding this particular question since his attention there had been concentrated so largely on Polish matters. He told me that at an early stage the Soviet delegation made an impassioned plea for the inclusion of two or three of the constituent republics as original members of the World Security Organization. When they were asked which republics they mentioned the Ukraine, Belorussia and Lithuania and dwelt at length on how these three republics had suffered from German aggression. At a subsequent meeting the United Kingdom and United States delegations expressed their readiness to support the inclusion of two republics and when asked which two each delegation replied by naming the Ukraine and Belorussia. Sir Archibald Clark Kerr said he derived the impression that both delegations had feared the request for inclusion of all sixteen republics and were greatly relieved when only three were mentioned. They were further greatly relieved when the Soviet delegation were content with only two and this enabled them to escape the embarrassment of having to discuss the delicate question of the incorporation within the Soviet Union of the formerly independent Baltic States.

3. I asked Sir Archibald Clark Kerr if the question of the inclusion of the constituent republics arose over a discussion of the position of India. He said he had no recollection of this but would look up the minutes of the Conference and let me know. Later that day I met Sir Archibald by chance and he handed me a note of one of his secretaries which read as follows:

"There is no specific mention of India in our records of the Crimea Conference. But the records of one or two meetings are not there and have not yet come in from London."

4. Mr. Harriman had a much clearer recollection of what transpired at the Crimea Conference regarding the inclusion of the Ukraine and Belorussia in the World Security Organization. He had no hesitation in indicating to me his concern over what had developed. He said the discussion had arisen over the membership of India, and that this had placed the United Kingdom delegation in a weak position to resist the claims of the Soviet delegation for the inclusion of two or three of the constituent republics. He implied that his own delegation should have shown more resistance to the Soviet demands. He is fearful of the effect that the inclusion of the two republics will have on United States public opinion. Isolationists, he said, have frequently been referring to the six votes of the British Commonwealth in international organizations. Now they will talk about the three Soviet votes. It will not be possible to say in reply that this is a matter of little importance owing to the unimportant role assigned to the Assembly of the proposed World Security Organization because to do this would offend the small countries.

5. The United States Ambassador said that Soviet tactics in regard to this matter were superb and he remarked that the other two countries represented at the Crimea Conference were children in comparison. When everyone was fearful of a request for the inclusion of all the sixteen republics they modestly asked that two or three be included and they linked this up with an appeal for sympathy for and understanding of all that the western republics had suffered from German aggression. They then mentioned that the Ukraine, Belorussia and Lithuania were the three republics most deserving of consideration. Mr. Harriman also thought some reference was made to the Moldavian republic but not very seriously. In any event the other two delegations were left with the impression that they had to choose between selecting two republics from the Ukraine, Belorussia and Lithuania or resisting the Soviet demand for the inclusion of any of the republics.

6. According to Mr. Harriman the Soviet delegation let the matter rest until the Conference was going well and all were imbued with enthusiasm and goodwill. It was then that they broached the question again and asked if they could count on the support of the other two powers for the inclusion at San Francisco of two or three of the republics among the original members of the World Security Organization. They were told that they might count on support for the inclusion of two republics. Mr. Harriman said it was then amusing to see them solemnly ask which two and to feign surprise when Lithuania was not included in the two republics selected. It had been quite obvious to Mr. Harriman that all along Lithuania had been used as a convenient red herring to facilitate acceptance of the other two republics.

7. I can understand that the Canadian Government have not yet been able to decide what attitude our delegation to the San Francisco Conference should adopt on the question of the inclusion of these two Soviet republics as original members of the World Security Organization. The problem confronting us is a most delicate one. The Soviet pressure to secure international recognition of the autonomy of their constituent republics is a challenge to the position in world affairs we have so laboriously built up for ourselves since the turn of the century. The question has implications for us beyond the participation of the Soviet republics in the work of the Assembly of the proposed World Security Organization. But unlike the two great Anglo-Saxon powers we cannot be indifferent to the effect that the inclusion of the republics among the members of the Assembly may have on the standing and authority of that body. As one of the medium powers uncertain of our chances of election to the Security Council we are desirous of seeing more authority and influence vested in the Assembly. We certainly do not wish to see it divested of respect by reason of the inclusion of members incapable of expressing a free opinion diverging to the slightest degree from the position adopted by one of the principal permanent members of the Security Council.

8. On the other hand at this early stage in the evolution of the new world order we do not wish to strike a discordant note or to take any step which will prejudice the whole-hearted cooperation of the Soviet Union in the maintenance of peace and security. Our own position is so delicate and our international status is so directly affected by any controversy that may arise over the question of the inclusion of the two republics that it might be expedient to let some other country take the lead in opposing their inclusion.

9. In thinking over the pros and cons and weighing the possible consequences of Canada taking a definite stand on this question, I keep coming back to the conviction that the only honourable and morally supportable course for us to adopt is to state the case frankly without fear or favour. I am afraid that to act otherwise would be equivalent to abdicating from that position of influence which we feel we are entitled to by reason of our political and economic importance.

10. If we decide to take a position in opposition to the inclusion of the two republics we are then faced with the very difficult problem of how we should act in a manner that will assure the support of the majority of the other delegations not already committed to a stand and that will cause the minimum of resentment on the part of the Soviet Union. For once we shall have to be taking a position that is in opposition to both the United Kingdom and the United States. The Soviet Government are so suspicious of the motives of any government that comes out in opposition to a stand taken by them that we would have to be extremely careful to disabuse them that we are actuated by any motives that imply mistrust of the Soviet Union or disbelief in the wholehearted intention of that country to maintain peace and security. Experience also has shown that the Soviet Government are most adroit in countering arguments that may be advanced to show the non-independent character of their republics. They are capable of investing words with other meanings than their usual connotation. They can readily raise an argument based on legal technicalities to a higher moral plane. It is futile to base an argument on some particular aspect of the Soviet Constitution when that constitution can be amended so easily. Finally we are hamstrung by the anomaly of a dependent country such as India having enjoyed full rights of participation in international organisations for many years.

11. The most effective argument against the participation of the constituent republics in the World Security Organization is probably one based on the federal character of the Soviet Union. A citizen of the Ukraine elects delegates to the Supreme Soviet of the Ukraine and also to the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. Representation in the Assembly of both the Ukraine and the Soviet Union would mean that a citizen of the former would be represented twice in the Assembly in a manner not enjoyed by the citizen of any other state (here we must not lose sight of possible counter- arguments based on the anomalous position of India).

12. Another possible approach is a reference to the practical impossibility of either of the two republics declaring war, remaining neutral or taking action to suppress aggression independently of the Soviet Union. Here again the position of India comes in and I can foresee a counter-argument based on the injustice of denying rights to two sovereign republics who enjoy a large measure of autonomy and who have suffered more from German aggression than any other states when these rights are accorded without opposition to the people of India who are kept in a state of dependency on another country and who have not suffered from fascist aggression.

13. It would be useless to refer to the fact that citizens of the Ukraine and Belorussia have Soviet citizenship, because the Constitution could easily be amended to provide for republican citizenship and Mr. Gousev[73] in October, 1943, in his reply to the Foreign Office memorandum on the participation of the western constituent republics in the United Nations War Crimes

F. Gousev, Ambassador of Soviet Union in Great Britain.

Commission stated that the republics had their own republican citizenship.[74] It may be well to repeat here the relevant paragraph in Mr. Gousev's note since it sums up the whole Soviet case for the inclusion of the constituent republics in international organizations:

"Possessing the right independently, without anyone's confirmation, to establish their own constitution, possessing their own territory, having their own citizenship, and possessing the right of free withdrawal from the Union of S.S.R., the Soviet constituent republics are sovereign states to no lesser a degree than the British dominions. The institution of the method for exercising their sovereignty depends exclusively upon agreement between the constituent republics and the Union of S.S.R."

14. It can be seen from the above that it is not going to be easy to frame a convincing case against the participation of the two republics in the World Security Organization. At every turn we run up against the embarrassing precedent of India. It is desirable to avoid arguments that savour at all of what the Russians regard as British hypocrisy. Ever since the emergence of Russian literature it has been their favourite intellectual pursuit to dispel the fog engendered by this hypocrisy with a few well-directed shafts of light. We are only giving them the weapons in which they delight if we extol the superior virtues of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

15. It is much better to base our case solely on the imperative need of starting off the World Security Organization properly by strict adherence to the principles that meet with universal acceptance. One and the most important of these principles is that enunciated in paragraph 4 of the Moscow Declaration of October 30th, 1943[75] — the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, large and small. This principle will be impaired if any of the large states are represented in the Assembly not only by themselves but also in addition by one or more of their constituent parts which are not completely self-governing. Exceptions can and should be made (this to forestall arguments based on the position of India) in the case of countries well on the road to self-government and concerning which public declarations have already been made of the intention to accord them in the very near future that degree of self-government which Canada has enjoyed for seventy eight years. But we should not make exceptions in favour of the constituent parts of a federal union, no matter how large these parts may be and what degree of autonomy they have enjoyed in all that does not directly concern the maintenance of peace or the waging of war. The citizens of these constituent parts have the same opportunity of having their views represented in the Assembly as the citizens of any other peace-loving state. This they can do through the exercise of their constitutional right to elect representatives to the supreme legislative body of the federal union and these representatives can make known the views of their constituents to the delegates who will be representing the federal union in the Assembly of the World Security Organization.

16. At the outset we should express our fullest sympathy for the sufferings the Ukrainians and Belorussians have undergone at the hands of the fascist aggressors. We can readily understand their determination to avoid a repetition of these evils. But we believe that the best way in which they can be spared from such a repetition is by strict adherence to the principles on which international law and justice have been founded. One of these principles is the sovereign equality of all states, large and small, and it would not, in our opinion, be in accordance with this principle for the Ukrainians and Belorussians to express their views through more than one delegation to the Assembly of the World Security Organization.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa,] March 26, 1945

Both the Prime Minister and Mr. St. Laurent have read my memorandum[76] concerning a number of points arising from the Dumbarton Oaks proposals which are likely to be discussed at the London meetings. Both of them have let me know that the suggestions made in this memorandum (which were pretty non-committal) were acceptable to them. The Prime Minister indicated that he thought it important to press for some arrangement permitting the general revision of the Charter after a term of years. I discussed this matter with Mr. St. Laurent. He says that he thinks we should avoid putting forward a proposal which would require a fresh ratification of the whole Charter by states desiring to continue their membership and he proposes that in place of this, a provision should be made for permitting states dissatisfied with the amendments made in the Charter to withdraw from the Organization. Thus the whole Charter would have to be resubmitted to the U.S. Senate only if the administration had come to the point of recommending the withdrawal of the United States. This seems to me to be a very useful approach and I think that we should develop the idea to the point of preparing draft amendments to this chapter of the Charter before the delegation arrives in San Francisco.[77]

Mr. St. Laurent also said that he thought it unnecessary to include in the Charter the present provision requiring approval of amendments by a two-thirds majority of the Assembly and subsequent ratification by the great powers and the majority of the rest of the members. He felt that approval by the Assembly was all that was necessary without later ratification and he fell in with my suggestion that there might be developed something like a two-reading process whereby amendments would be conditionally approved by one Assembly and finally voted at the next Assembly, thus permitting Governments to refer them to legislatures if they felt this to be essential. A yet more flexible alternative would be simply to require that no amendment should be voted on by the Assembly which had not been formally proposed at least six or eight months in advance.

I am sending copies of this note to Mr. Read, with whom I have discussed the matter, and also to Mr. Ritchie.

Redfern,[78] in describing the talks with the President during the Governor General's visit to Washington last week said that the President had referred to the Soviet demand for the admission to the World Organization of the Ukrainian and White Russian Republics. The President went on to say that if the Russians wanted three votes he would demand three votes for the United States and commented that after all the British Empire had six votes. When Redfern answered that the six votes would represent six governments and would not always be cast on the same side, the President referred to the Commonwealth discussions in London shortly before the Conference as indicating that a united front was being arranged.

This is a dangerous as well as an inaccurate interpretation of the meetings. It seems to me that something pretty definite should come out from Ottawa before the meetings begin and also that, if possible, the High Commissioner and myself should seek to have the right sort of interpretation telegraphed from London before the meeting begins. There have been two recent despatches from the AP Bureau in London which have been most misleading and doubtless they have appeared in a large number of U.S. newspapers. One of them related directly to the Commonwealth talks before the San Francisco Conference and the other dealt with the question of a united Commonwealth economic bloc.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

[Ottawa,] March 30, 1945

In conversation this afternoon the French Ambassador referred to the President's announcement that the United States would seek three votes in the Assembly of the United Nations Organization. I told him that the Canadian Press despatch from Ottawa in this morning's paper was incorrect in its implication that the Canadian Government had known about this proposal in advance. The reasons why the United States Government might wish to secure such an amendment of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals were quite understandable. It was, however, unfortunate that American Congressional and press comment should link the American desire for three votes in the Assembly with the argument that the "British Empire" was going to have six votes there. This was a resurrection of the old argument which the isolationist Senators had used in 1920 to block American participation in the League of Nations, and which had been proved quite without foundation by the practical experience of the last 25 years.

M. de Hautecloque said he had not received any comment from his Government on the President's proposal, but he thought it quite possible that in due course a restored France would seek some sort of multiple representation in the World Organization for its great colonial possessions which were in process of acquiring a constitutional position not unlike that of the members of the British Commonwealth.

Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: We had no prior notification of the President's statements regarding multiple votes for the United States in the Assembly of World Organization either from United Kingdom or Unites States sources. TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 540 London, April 3, 1945

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET. Following from the Prime Minister for (Canada and Australia) Prime Minister, (New Zealand and Union) Acting Prime Minister, Begins:

1. You have no doubt seen announcement issued from White House on March 29th to effect that United Kingdom and Soviet representatives at Crimea Conference agreed that United States and its possessions should, if it so desired, have 3 votes on Assembly to be set up in World Organization if Conference agreed to Soviet Republic having 3 votes.

2. We were not consulted by United States Government beforehand on the terms or occasion of this announcement.

3. As to Russia, see my telegram of February 10th, Circular D. 263,† paragraph 5 (b), regarding White Russia and Ukraine.

4. As to United States, the position is that, when United Kingdom and United States delegations at Crimea agreed to support Soviet request for admission of White Russia and Ukraine as founder members, United States President pointed out to Prime Minister and Mr. Stalin that, if he were to ensure wholehearted acceptance by Congress and people of United States of United States participation in World Organization, it might be necessary to ask for additional votes in the Assembly for the United States in order to secure parity. The United States delegation were not at that time able to define the form which this request would take. They asked for time and secrecy. We complied. It was, therefore, understood that it was left "that the United States should propose the form in which their undisputed equality with every other member State should be expressed."

5. This was as far as we could get at Yalta and no definite proposal has yet been put before us. We were not certain whether the United States would think it worthwhile to press their claim or not. If they should, the only alternatives evidently were either that they should nominate three members to represent the United States vicariously or that they should assign two of the members to some of the small places under their control. Of the two choices, the former apparently adopted by the United States seems preferable.

6. It cannot be overlooked that Russia demanded 17 seats (16 Republics as well as the Union) which her population and variety of races and newly adopted form of federalism justified in her eyes. It was very difficult to deny to Russia the greatly reduced demand she put in for only 3 instead of 17. These two, White Russia and the Ukraine, are mighty countries with over 50 million people and they have suffered terrible losses, probably several millions, during the war. Refusal to consider their claims in any way, though so greatly reduced, would have drawn upon us a very severe examination of the position of the British Commonwealth.

7. It must be remembered upon this subject that the fact that in two fearful wars the whole of the British Empire all over the world has declared war on the same impulse and in the same cause, and fought through to the end without wavering or flinching, conveys to foreigners a sense of underlying unity which is undoubtedly true in spite of the most extreme interpretation of Dominion status under the Statute of Westminster. The Dominions were subject to no pressure from His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom. They came in of their own free will for the sake of ideas dearer to them than life. We have also to consider the way others look at our affairs, as well as the way we look at them ourselves. India, for instance, has a representative who is not chosen by India but only by the Viceroy, who is the servant of Crown and Parliament. Our two Allies of enormous concentrated power see our Commonwealth with 6 seats in the Assembly of the new World Organization and their pride or public opinion demands some comparable representation. We, therefore, thought it better to endorse the reduced Russian demand and from that it followed that the United States should have the liberty referred to above.

8. We had, of course, assumed that if the President decided to put forward a proposal he would consult with us before doing so, when it was our intention to discuss it with the other British Commonwealth Governments. We must think of his difficulties, as well as our own. I, therefore, consider we did the best we could and ask that our work should be endorsed. Ends.

Full text, or excerpts, are to be released tomorrow for publication Friday morning, otherwise no publicity is contemplated until end of meetings. Mr. Eden will review Foreign Affairs Friday morning and Mr. Churchill will attend. Until then meetings will be concerned with Colonial Trusteeship.

L'ambassadeur aux États-Unis
au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Ambassador in United States
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL Washington, April 4, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson:

I called on Senator Connally, Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, this afternoon. As it happened, the Senator was at the moment busily engaged on the floor of the Senate, where a debate had arisen over the Mexican Waterways Treaty. I therefore had to wait for him for some little time and was able once again to contrast the atmosphere of the legislators' outer offices with that of the Embassy anterooms. There were a number of persons of various conditions and interests lounging in Senator Connally's office, who rather looked as if they had been there for hours and were willing to remain for other hours.

I had fifteen minutes or so with the Senator after he was able to leave the Senate Chamber. He expressed the usual friendly sentiments toward Canada in general and the Canadian Embassy in particular. I mentioned the subject of the forthcoming San Francisco Conference and expressed the hope that some of the difficulties which seem to have arisen lately would soon be dispelled. He professed himself to be optimistic and felt that the atmosphere was even now better. He was sure that the San Francisco Conference would be a success because it had to be a success. At the same time, he admitted that this success meant merely a successful beginning and that it was folly to expect everything to be accomplished at San Francisco. This seems to be a line that is now generally being followed in Washington. He realized that the Powers that had not been at Dumbarton Oaks would feel obliged to bring forward amendments at San Francisco and that these would have to be discussed. He professed, however, to hold the view that many of these amendments would be produced with an eye on public opinion at home and with no great hope of acceptance. I suggested that there might well be greater obstacles to overcome than those of the amendments of the smaller Powers; that, if the Great Powers themselves could work together at San Francisco, other difficulties would be less important. He interpreted this remark as applying to Russia and made some sympathetic observations about that country. He believed, for instance, that Stalin would not have asked for the three Russian votes if he had felt sufficient confidence in the friendly feelings of other States toward Russia. Senator Connally was of the opinion that most of the difficulties with Russia were caused by the fears and suspicions held by that country, many of which had a basis of reason in the treatment given Russia over the years. This attitude on the part of the Senator was rather surprising to me, as congressional opinion is not normally as sympathetic and understanding of the U.S.S.R.

Senator Connally's mention of the three Russian votes gave me an opportunity to remark that it was most unfortunate that, in the discussion of this matter, reference should be made so often to the six "British Empire" votes. I added that, as he would appreciate, there was a great difference between the position of the Ukraine Soviet Republic and that of Canada. If we, for instance, had wished to stay out of this war, we could have done so; even if we wished to get out of it now, the United Kingdom Government would not intervene. I hesitated to think, however, what would have happened to an official in the Ukrainian or White Russian Republic if he had argued against participation in the war in 1941 or for withdrawal from the war in 1945. Senator Connally said that, of course, he appreciated the position of the British Dominions in this matter. I hope he does, as there have been, once or twice in the past, suggestions to the contrary.

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM 87 Ottawa, April 5, 1945

MOST IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from Prime Minister to Prime Minister, Begins: Your telegram D. 540 of April 3rd. In view of the withdrawal by the United States of their proposal that they should have three votes in the Assembly, this question appears at least for the present to be narrowed down again to the admission of White Russia and the Ukraine. We feel with you that this proposal should be considered in the light of the contribution which these Republics have made to the common cause, and of the constitutional developments under which they have been given formal responsibility for the conduct of their international relations. This latter seems to us the criterion on which emphasis should be laid in justifying their admission. It is true that their admission on these grounds implies the ultimate admissibility of other Soviet Republics. But in all the circumstances the arrangement you agreed on at Yalta seems to us to be entirely defensible and will, I am sure, be supported by our delegates at San Francisco.

2. In voting for the admission of these two Republics as separate members of the Assembly, we should hope that the emphasis could be kept on their individual qualifications for membership without underscoring the argument that the U.S.S.R. is entitled to multiple representation.

3. We share your concern at the apparent assumption by the U.S.S.R. and in certain quarters in the United States that "the British Empire has six votes." If this misconception cannot finally be dispelled, it is likely to lead to further claims for plural voting and in any case it has an unfortunate influence in perpetuating misunderstandings about the actual character of relations between the individual nations of the Commonwealth, particularly in the United States.

4. Doubtless some elements of deliberate mischief-making enter into the repetition by unfriendly critics of these mis-statements about Commonwealth relations, but I agree with your view that genuine misunderstanding exists. This is no doubt increased by the real difficulties created by the constitutional position of India, and by the policy of neutrality pursued by the Irish Government while remaining a member of the Commonwealth.

5. When I expected to have to make some statement in Parliament about the United States request for three votes in the Assembly I had in mind saying something along the following lines about the Congressional argument that the United States should have three votes "because the British Empire will have six votes":

The implication behind this argument is that the "Empire" is a political unit that decides with one mind and speaks with one voice — but a voice that has the weight of six. Nothing could be more misleading. The Commonwealth has no votes — not six but none. It is the nations that make it up that have votes, and those votes are freely directed as each thinks right. The record of discussions in the League of Nations and its subsidiary agencies shows many cases where the members of the Commonwealth have not been able to agree and have voted on opposite sides of a question. This situation has been demonstrated beyond the possibility of question by the recognition by the countries of the Commonwealth that each must make its own decision on the question of peace and war. Unhappily unanimity was not reached on this question. On some of the Combined Boards that have so successfully coordinated the work of supply, production and shipping in this war, the members are Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States. Would anyone suggest for a moment that this means two votes for the Commonwealth to one vote for the United States? It would be absurd to suggest such a thing. On these Boards the Canadian representative represents the Canadian government and no one else.

The peculiar character of the Commonwealth of Nations lies in the fact that it is in truth made up of nations — nations in every sense of the word. Those nations have a community of outlook and tradition — a common love of peace and liberty — a common hatred of tyranny and aggression. But they are not the only nations that have a community of interest. Where could such community and understanding be greater than between ourselves and the United States? But because there is much in common would anyone suggest that Canada and the United States are really one? Where there is a community of interest and outlook, nations will co-operate and work together. Cooperation could not be closer than it is between Canada and the other nations of the Commonwealth and between Canada and the United States. The Pan American Union brings together nations that occupy the same hemisphere and have a community of interest. But no one would suggest that that means the Pan American Union is an entity with 21 votes in world organizations. And yet this statement would be no more misleading than the statement that the British Commonwealth of Nations has six votes.

There is cooperation between the nations of the Commonwealth — a cooperation that will continue and flourish. But it is not the cooperation of an exclusive circle or bloc. It is that free cooperation that can and, I hope, will become characteristic of the relations between all nations.

DUMBARTON OAKS PROPOSALS

NOTE BY THE SECRETARY

I circulate a Statement of Questions arising from the Dumbarton Oaks proposals put forward for discussion by the Canadian Delegation.

QUESTIONS ARISING FROM THE DUMBARTON OAKS PROPOSALS PUT FORWARD FOR DISCUSSION BY THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

The general attitude of the Canadian Government towards the proposals for world organization has already been communicated to other Commonwealth Governments.[81] It is therefore unnecessary to elaborate on the main points made in previous communications, especially as the chief Canadian comments are printed on pages 11-17 of Document B.C.M. (45) 4.† It may be useful, however, to set forth briefly in general terms the more important questions already raised, and to mention some further matters which might usefully be discussed here.

In the first place the Canadian Government favours the establishment of a new organization on the basis of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals with suitable additions and amendments. We accept fully the general approach, even though we may not like some of the individual proposals. Mr. Mackenzie King recently outlined in the House of Commons a number of difficulties and objections. In the lengthy debate which ensued[82] there was general support both for the establishment of a world organization on the projected lines, and for the incorporation, if possible, of the Prime Minister's suggestions. No Government can pledge itself in advance to accept any Charter which might be produced at San Francisco, but it is certain that we in Canada should not lightly reject whatever treaty may emerge from the Conference.

It should be said, as a preliminary observation, that we have found ourselves faced with considerable difficulty in determining the proper perspective in which to regard the security proposals without further information on the methods which may be devised for enforcement of the peace terms against Germany and Japan and for relating such methods to the work of the Security Council. Paragraph 2 of Chapter XII of the proposals appears to be a general reservation of the right of the principal Allied Governments to exclude any action against enemy States from the scope of the Charter. The first stage of the control of Germany by a Military Control Commission will, of course, be in many respects the final stage of military operations against that enemy. Full military occupation and government is expected, however, to give way before very long to other methods of supervision. If the Security Council is not associated with this long-term supervision, its importance may, in fact, be small during the years when it is most desirable for it to acquire prestige and respect of all nations. If any renewal of danger from Germany and Japan is to be dealt with by special arrangements outside the direction of the Security Council, and if, furthermore, the proposed voting procedure in the Security Council is admitted to preclude the taking of action against a Great Power, the emphasis heretofore placed on the rôle of the Security Council would appear to have been considerably exaggerated. At any rate it will be very difficult to negotiate the military agreements mentioned in Chapter VIII B 5 until more is known of the plans for dealing with our present enemies. We suggest, therefore, that this general question might be considered at an early stage of these discussions.

From the Canadian point of view the principal difficulties arising from the draft proposals are three in number:

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1945, First Session, pp. 20-60, 63-106, 110-47, 151-89, 199-240, 243-84 and 294-313.

1. Procedure for Application of Sanctions by Members not on Security Council.

The power of the Security Council to "call upon" all members to undertake serious enforcement action, both military and economic, without necessarily any prior consultation, seems to us to require serious consideration. The Canadian people, we believe, are prepared to make commitments, and thus to accept limitations on their sovereignty, to the same extent as other nations. It is very doubtful, however, whether they would be ready to give to a Council on which they were not represented the unqualified right to order them to send Canadian forces into action, or to take measures which would seriously derange their export trade, when each of the Great Powers could veto individually any such action of the Council. It is true that the Security Council could only demand forces within the limits prescribed in a special military agreement. Would countries without permanent Council seats be willing in such circumstances to promise a substantial military contribution? Certainly secondary countries could be expected to support the Council's actions more consistently, and probably to pledge larger forces, if they were assured of consultation before they would be called upon to take serious action. We feel that the addition of suitable provisions for consultation would not only not take the teeth out of the organization but would strengthen its efficiency. In practice, if the enforcement of sanctions required active aid from a country not represented on the Council, its consent would probably have to be sought in one way or another. If that would be the normal practice, might it not well be made the formal rule?

2. Selection of Members of Security Council.

The principle that in the new world organization power and responsibility should be related is one that we gladly accept, and for that reason we approve of a special position for the Great Powers. In the proposals, however, this principle is applied only to the Great Powers. The new organization would be more likely to acquire the requisite authority if some distinction were made in its constitution between countries which were willing and able to expend lives and resources on a considerable scale towards achieving its purposes, and countries which, because of small resources, backward political development, or inertia, could not or would not make a sizeable contribution. This is not a question of status or prestige; it is a question of making sure that the direction of the world organization is in the hands of those who can do most to ensure its success. This need may best be met by ensuring that among the States which are elected as members of the Security Council there should always be several countries able to make a valuable contribution to the maintenance of security. In this way the Council could be made a more powerful and efficient body.

3. Amendment of Charter and Question of Withdrawal.

The proposals which may be expected to emerge at San Francisco will represent a compromise. There will be many imperfections, some of them doubtless hard to explain and defend to public opinion. It should be made not too difficult to improve the Charter. As the proposals stand, the procedure for amendment is rigid, involving approval by two-thirds of the Assembly, followed by ratification by the Great Powers and at least half the other members of the organization. In the first place the extension to each Great Power of a right of veto on all changes would tend to make impossible any amendment touching on such contentious points as the voting procedure in the Security Council and the list of permanent members. We think it worthwhile, therefore, to raise the question whether the veto of the Great Powers on amendments might be either omitted altogether or reduced so as to require the concurrence of perhaps three of them instead of all with permanent Council seats. Secondly (or alternatively) we feel that the requirement of later ratification of amendments might be dropped altogether if provision were made that amendments would only be submitted for adoption by the Assembly after they had been proposed to the previous Assembly. The interval thus ensured would give plenty of time to secure parliamentary approval by resolution in countries where this was desired.

There are good arguments to support the omission of the right of voluntary withdrawal, which under the Covenant gave trouble-making States an easy escape from their obligations. It is suggested, however, that a clause might be included in the Charter requiring its general revision after a term of years — in short, making the Charter an interim constitution only. But it would be desirable to avoid the necessity of a fresh ratification of the whole Charter by member States desiring to continue their membership. To meet this difficulty those States which were dissatisfied with the Charter as amended might be given the right to withdraw from the organization at the end of the interim period. This conception of the organization in its initial stage as a transitional arrangement is, we think, realistic in view of the impossibility of long-range planning during the final stages of the war before the peace terms are agreed upon. Furthermore, the knowledge that a member would have an opportunity of reviewing the question of membership after a term of years would help to make palatable the initial acceptance of a Charter which will doubtless incorporate a number of provisions open to valid and serious criticism. The Canadian Government attach considerable importance to this suggestion.

There are some further matters, in addition to the various points which have already been raised by other Commonwealth Governments, which might usefully be considered at these meetings.

4. Veto Rights of Great Powers.

The Canadian Government is prepared to accept the veto of each Great Power on the actual application of sanctions. Mr. MacKenzie King recently said in the House of Commons with reference to these arrangements:

"There can be no question that they are open to theoretical objection. To what degree they are open to practical objection depends upon how far objection can be taken to a recognition of the fact of 'power' in this imperfect world."

It seems probable that the chief difficulty over the Yalta formula would arise at the initial stage of securing public support for ratification rather than in the actual operation of the Organization. Indeed, each Great Power would in reality possess a veto on sanctions, just because it was a Great Power, even if formally decisions were taken by majority vote. In some respects we believe, however, that the right of veto by the Great Powers might be restricted. It is not clear, for instance, why a Great Power which is not a party to a dispute should retain the right to block its consideration by the Council under the procedure for pacific settlement. Under the Yalta formula, China could not prevent consideration of a dispute between China and India under Chapter VIII A, but could prevent consideration of any dispute to which China was not a party. It would allay anxiety, and therefore simplify public acceptance, if action under Chapter VIII A could be taken by, say, a two-thirds majority of Council members. As the proposals stand at present, furthermore, the veto right of the Great Powers extends to decisions on a number of matters not directly concerned with the consideration of international disputes, including the admission of members, the election of the Secretary-General, the approval of agreements placing forces at the disposal of the Security Council, the approval of plans for the regulation of armaments, the coming into force of amendments to the Charter, and a number of other questions, the length of the list depending in part on the definition of "decisions on procedural matters" not requiring the concurring votes of permanent Council members. We think that the possibility of reducing somewhat the scope of this veto power should be considered.

5. Is there a serious gap in the Charter?

Even when the importance of voting procedures is placed in proper proportion, there still remains the possibility that the Security Council might be unable to consider a dispute which threatened the maintenance of peace. What then would happen is a matter which is causing serious concern to the French Government, among others. The Assembly would not seem to have power to deal with it, as it would be required under Chapter V B I to refer any such question on which action was necessay to the Security Council. This raises difficult issues which might never occur in the actual operation of the Organization, but will certainly be discussed at San Francisco.

6. Can the Security Council make recommendations for pacific settlement of disputes?

The language of paragraph 5 of Chapter VIII A has been variously interpreted; it gives the Security Council power to recommend appropriate "procedures or methods of adjustment" for the pacific settlement of a dispute. Does the phrase "methods of adjustment" cover an investigation of the merits and a proposal for solution (an interpretation given to it in the official Commentary of the United Kingdom Government) or does it only apply to action such as proposing reference to the Permanent Court of International Justice (an interpretation which has been placed upon it in the Department of State)? We feel that the Security Council should be able to propose terms of settlement at a stage before a dispute has been found to be a threat to peace under Section B of this Chapter.

7. Special Military Agreements. (Chapter VIII B 5)

The methods are far from clear whereby the "special agreement or agreements concluded among themselves," by which all members would be expected to make forces, facilities, and assistance available to the Security Council, could be negotiated. A good deal of attention was paid to this paragraph during the recent debate in the Canadian House of Commons. It seems certain that there will be much discussion of it at San Francisco. We think, therefore, that we should discuss here both the procedure which might be adopted to give effect to the paragraph, and the character and extent of the obligations which member States might be expected to assume.

TELEGRAM 95 London, April 6, 1945

TOP SECRET. Following from Wrong, Begins: This morning Eden gave brief review of foreign situation especially emphasising improved relations with the United States during recent months and gravity of current difficulties with Soviet Government, especially over Poland. Mr. Churchill followed with some account of Yalta Conference. They are clearly greatly concerned over recent actions of Soviet Government, although Soviet denunciation of treaty with Japan has alleviated their anxiety somewhat.

2. Mr. Churchill said he would have to inform parliament, within next fortnight, that the Yalta Agreement for establishing new Polish Government was ineffective. He saw no chance of Poland being represented at San Francisco. Eden considers it probable that Soviet delegation will attend, although for a time they thought there might be refusal to participate unless representation of Lublin Poles was agreed.

3. With regard to treatment of Germany, the Prime Minister confirmed that there was no real discussion at Yalta of what "dismemberment" meant in practice. He favours separation of Prussia from rest of Germany and said President still had some idea of establishing five German States.

4. At Prime Minister's request, Massey read first paragraph of your telegram No. 87 of April 5th on admission of Soviet Republics and there was general approval of views therein expressed.

5. This afternoon there was general discussion of Dumbarton Oaks proposals. The United Kingdom, New Zealand and ourselves had circulated papers containing chief comments and Evatt, Fraser and Mudaliar[83] did most of the talking. Australia, New Zealand and India all expressed general agreement with our suggestions. These will be considered in detail next week. Smuts urged that as few amendments as possible should be proposed at San Francisco and only suggested himself addition of a preamble and opening chapter headed "The New Faith", expressed in admirable language. Ends.

TOP SECRET. Following from Wrong, Begins: Following are some general impressions so far derived from meetings here.

1. If a Charter is produced at San Francisco it will have to be Dumbarton Oaks proposals as little amended as possible. Expansion into a full Constitution will have to be done by later agreements.

2. While pessimism over results is much less here than in Paris, there is no confidence of outcome. Some apprehension is felt that Soviet Government may cancel participation or withdraw delegation from Conference if Lublin Poles are not admitted. In that event United Kingdom Government favours going on without them.

3. Other Dominions and India support special grouping of "Security Powers" (Evatt's phrase) which have fought and suffered in war for purpose of representation on Council. United Kingdom has not taken a stand on this. Smuts has only indicated sympathy for our views.

4. Australia and New Zealand support changes to make amendment easier and to provide for general revision of Charter. They also favour changes to meet our central point concerning authority of Council to require all members to join in sanctions.

5. We start tomorrow with discussion of particular questions raised by each delegation with hope of ending Friday. Ends.

SECRET. Following from Wrong, Begins: Chief feature of first meeting today was discussion arising from our proposals for limiting power of Security Council to require all members to undertake enforcement action. Discussion revealed wide difference of view. Evatt and Mudaliar joined United Kingdom Ministers in defending proposals as they stood, Australian and Indian representatives maintaining that universal obligation to enforce sanctions on call of Security Council was an essential principle. United Kingdom Ministers argued against our suggestions, mainly on operational grounds, to general effect that Council must know in advance that all members would apply sanctions without delay. We contended that this was not necessary since force behind Council would be so great that Council members could themselves carry out almost any decision and could easily fill important gaps by bringing in particular States whose assistance might be needed in a special case.

2. I said I foresaw great difficulties in securing full public and Parliamentary support if text was not changed, emphasizing that consultation with States required to take serious action will almost certainly occur and that this might just as well be included in Charter, as prospects of ratification might be endangered in several countries if it were omitted.

3. The New Zealand representatives went further than we did and took line that all enforcement decisions of the Council should be confirmed by the Assembly by simple majority, except in cases of extreme urgency when Council might act, reporting later to Assembly. Smuts supported us to extent that he considered it absolutely impossible to expect States to send any forces overseas without prior consultation. He did not enter into other aspects but said this problem was the most important of all and critical to the establishment of the new Organization. All other speakers agreed on importance of issue.

4. United Kingdom representatives seemed not to have grasped the difficulties fully and discussion in which we took active part may have cleared their minds somewhat. Eden unfortunately had to leave before it really got under way. Since there seemed no prospect of reaching meeting of minds by further discussion here, Cranborne suggested at conclusion that we should consider this matter between ourselves at San Francisco. Ends.

TELEGRAM 1020 London, April 10, 1945

SECRET. Following from Wrong, Begins: We discussed on Monday voting in the Security Council and selection of non-permanent members.

2. On voting, we said Canadian Government would accept veto by permanent members on application of sanctions, but wished possibility of restricting veto power in other respects to be considered. Smuts and Evatt accepted Great Power veto on sanctions as inevitable. Fraser criticized it strongly and indicated New Zealand might vote against it at San Francisco. All these delegations were critical of veto of Great Powers on amendments to the Charter — this will be discussed later.

3. Eden said United Kingdom Government was bound to support this particular provision regarding application of sanctions but was free to express opinions as to how far veto power should extend in other respects. It seems, therefore, that matters such as removal of Great Power veto on consideration of disputes to which they are not party can be examined at San Francisco.

4. Consideration followed of selection of non-permanent members of Council and there was general agreement on all sides that some method should be found which would provide more effectively for representations of States able and willing to assume substantial responsibilities. Evatt, Fraser and Mudaliar all strongly favoured some such provision but Smuts, though recognizing importance of question, thought it might be dealt with by later amendment of Charter. After discussion of various methods an Expert Committee was appointed, which met last night.

5. This morning the Committee's report was accepted as basis for consideration at San Francisco without, of course, obligating Governments concerned. It proposes that Charter should be amended by inclusion of provision that Assembly, in electing non-permanent members, "should pay due regard to the contribution of the members of the Organization towards the maintenance of international peace and security and towards the other purposes of the Organization." It suggests that the first Security Council should be nominated by the San Francisco Conference and that a resolution should be passed there establishing a Committee to recommend to the first Assembly a priority list of all members to be used as the basis for future elections. This is, in fact, as good a proposal as I expected we could get. Ends.

SECRET. Following from Wrong, Begins: Following are chief points of interest at Commonwealth meetings since April 10th.

1. There was general agreement that Assembly should possess as wide authority as possible except that Security Council should have primary jurisdiction in consideration of disputes. I raised question of procedure if Council were deadlocked under its voting procedure and could take no action in a dangerous dispute. United Kingdom representatives said this would require further consideration as position was not covered properly in the proposals.

2. All Delegations agreed that provision should be made for general review of Charter after 5 or 10 years, Smuts pressing for a short trial period. Other Delegations did not support my suggestion that opportunity for withdrawal might be afforded at this review. No one favoured inclusion of Right of Withdrawal as in Covenant.

3. The amendment provisions were widely criticized as too rigid and especially the Great Power veto on amendments. United Kingdom were agreeable to some change in this respect.

4. All agreed that Council should be able to recommend solutions of disputes under Chapter VIII A. United Kingdom considered this already covered, but recognize language requires clarification.

5. Discussion threw little light on questions raised by us respecting military agreements and relationship of peace enforcement machinery to the World Organization. The discussion of economic and social aspects was also not illuminating.

6. All agreed that a preamble setting forth the high purposes of the Charter should be added.

As Smuts remarked, the question of the veto hung over everything, and we are certain to hear much more of it at the Conference. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL London, April 23, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson,

As you will already have received both written and oral reports from Mr. Wrong on the British Commonwealth Meetings to discuss World Organization, I do not propose to send a formal summary of the talks which have just been concluded. You may wish to have, however, some comment from me on certain general aspects of the meeting.

2. To begin with, I think it can be said with confidence that the meeting accomplished a number of useful purposes. As Lord Cranborne said in the House of Lords, it acted as a sort of dress rehearsal for San Francisco. The United Kingdom delegates to San Francisco, most of whom attended at least some of the meetings, have stated that they now have a clearer understanding of the issues involved, as well as of the views of other parts of the Commonwealth. A substantial measure of agreement was disclosed or achieved, and the exposure of differences — for example on the question of territorial trusteeship — was equally valuable.

3. The question of a "single voice" was irrelevant. It is unfortunate that advocates of such a policy could not see the Commonwealth consulting together in this way, so that they might realize the impracticability of the single voice in real situations and the advantages — for the United Kingdom, as well as the Dominions — of present methods of consultation. If the delegations had cast votes on each issue, the United Kingdom would have found itself out-voted on several matters in which she had at least tacit commitments to the Soviet Union and the United States. It is, of course, quite unreal even to speculate about the results of voting at such a Commonwwealth meeting, when one is concerned for the most part with shades of opinion and questions of emphasis, rather than with clear-cut issues on which votes might be cast. From the point of view of Commonwealth relations, the meeting was well timed. The flurry caused by the White House statement on multiple voting in the Assembly made it desirable that the position of the Commonwealth should be stated sharply and clearly. Spokesmen of all delegations made statements on the subject which could not be misunderstood. It is satisfactory that the lead was taken by Lord Cranborne and Dr. Evatt so that there was no encouragement to the view that this is a peculiar Canadian heresy. What is possibly more important is that the meeting provided a useful example of Commonwealth machinery functioning for mutual advantage. It was a desire of the United Kingdom Government, and certainly of ourselves, that no particular attention should be attracted to what was described as a perfectly normal process. It is my feeling that the more such discussions become accepted as routine, the less misunderstandings there will be. It was satisfying also to attend a Commonwealth meeting at which practically no time was given up to introspective examination of the nature of the Commonwealth and there was, therefore, full time for the real purposes of consultation.

4. The United Kingdom delegation included, besides Lord Cranborne and Mr. Attlee, who attended regularly, the other members of the delegation to San Francisco, Miss Wilkinson, Miss Horsbrugh, Mr. Tomlinson, Mr. Foot and Mr. Mabane. The "other members" attended as observers and did not make any contribution to the discussion. Mr. Eden attended several meetings and Sir Alexander Cadogan was present at all the meetings. Mr. Bevin took part in one meeting and Mr. Amery in several meetings, although he did not speak. Colonel Stanley introduced the question of territorial trusteeship, but he was promptly afflicted with mumps and his place was taken by the Duke of Devonshire. Lord Cranborne was an excellent Chairman, who combined most successfully the role of principal spokesman for the United Kingdom with that of an objective Chairman. The United Kingdom delegation gave careful consideration to our own views and those of other delegations. On the question of mandates their policy was definitely modified as a result of the strong difference of opinion on the part of the Australian and New Zealand delegations. In other respects, I think it might be expected that the United Kingdom policy will be modified at least in emphasis. They did, I understand, appreciate particularly the careful study which had been given to the subject by the Canadian Government and the responsible nature of the criticism and suggestions which came from the Canadian delegation.

5. The outstanding figure at the meeting, although by no means the most voluble, was Field Marshal Smuts, who played the role rather of a member-at-large than a representative of South Africa. Particularly in his impromptu opening statement, he showed a masterly, philosophic approach to the problems of world organization. It was obvious, however, that he had not given very careful attention to the details of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, and in some cases seemed to be reasoning out their implications for the first time. As a man intimately associated with the League of Nations, he displayed a flexibility of outlook and a willingness to accept the new approach which is not characteristic of elder statesmen who have been attached to lost causes. He paid very careful attention to the Canadian views expressed and frequently referred to the importance of Canada in the new world organization and the difficult position in which Canada might be placed by the present proposals. He supported our views on the position of the important secondary powers. He also supported our view on the obligations of non-members of the Council in the enforcement of sanctions. He argued quite forcefully that it would be impossible to expect non-members of the Council to cooperate loyally in the enforcement of decisions in which they had had no share. Although he did not base this argument on the attitude of his own country, he must have been aware of the view that would probably be taken by most Afrikaners of such a commitment. For the most part, his views were close to those of the United Kingdom. On the subject of mandates, he was inclined to be even more rigid than Colonel Stanley. He admitted his dislike of the Yalta voting formula but constantly emphasized that the cooperation of the Soviet Union and the United States was worth a very considerable price. His chief contribution was a preamble to the Charter, stating the principles which would govern the World Organization. This was accepted with some enthusiasm by the meeting, although some changes were made. Its simplicity of language and high moral tone added to the Charter something of the inspirational quality which was lacking in the official language of the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals.

6. The Australian delegation was dominated by Dr. Evatt. Mr. Forde was obviously unacquainted with the details of the subject and spoke very little. Dr. Evatt's forthrightness at times became bluntness, but it was, I think, recognized that for the most part he showed intelligence and a considerable grasp of the subject. His former prejudices against Canada seem to have largely dissolved, and he frequently associated himself emphatically with what he considered to be the general Canadian attitude on World Organization. Particularly on the subject of the position of secondary States he was in sympathy with us. He was even more emphatic than we on the need for amendment of the Charter without the right of veto on the part of permanent members. Constantly, when faced with such unpleasant features of the scheme as the Yalta voting formula, he emphasized that Australia could accept this situation provided it could be amended later on. On the subject of territorial trusteeship, he aligned himself with Mr. Fraser in a vigorous attack on United Kingdom policy. The eventual decision of the United Kingdom to accept the continuation of the mandates in a reformed state and the principle that other dependent territories might be voluntarily placed under some form of international trusteeship did not satisfy Dr. Evatt — especially as Lord Cranborne indicated that the United Kingdom would not place any of her colonies under international trusteeship. As might be expected, he placed a great deal of emphasis on the social and economic aspects, insisting particularly that the Social and Economic Council should be recognized as one of the principal organs. There was some uncertainty about the Australian view on the powers of the Social and Economic Council. At the request of the Australian delegation a question was placed on the agenda asking whether the Social and Economic Council should be given powers of decision as contrasted with powers of recommendation, in order to coordinate more effectively the work of specialized organizations, to take appropriate action in an economic emergency, and to initiate conventions. However, Dr. Evatt did not go nearly so far in his statement on this subject. I have reason to believe that there was some difference of opinion within the Australian delegation on this subject. It is Mr. Holmes' impression, from his association with the Australian advisers, that Dr. Burton expected Dr. Evatt to insist that the Social and Economic Council should have a comparable authority with the Security Council, but he was apparently persuaded otherwise by Mr. Bailey, who understood too much about the legal problems involved, as well as by other more moderate members of the delegation.

7. The relations between the Australian and New Zealand delegations were close and showed the mutual understanding which has resulted from frequent consultation. There was nothing exclusive, however, about their relations, and the two Southern Dominions did not on their own part form a bloc. On one occasion at least, Dr. Evatt indicated that he was speaking for Australia and New Zealand, but Mr. Berendsen, who spoke later, took a quite different position on the subject under discussion. This subject, the obligations of non-members of the council to enforce sanctions, was the only principal matter on which there was an important difference of opinion between the Australian and Canadian delegations. Dr. Evatt, along with Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar, supported the United Kingdom view on this subject, both being convinced that nothing should be done which might seem to weaken the striking power of the new Organization.

8. The New Zealand delegation was on the whole farthest away from the United Kingdom point of view. At this meeting, the Canadian view was for the most part possibly closest to that of the United Kingdom, and the New Zealand view most irreconcilable. The difference between the Canadian and New Zealand approach was due, I think, to the fact that the Canadian view was based on a full appreciation of the political factors involved, whereas Mr. Fraser, who could be described as the only Wilsonian present, was inclined to be guided almost entirely by his conception of abstract justice. Although Mr. Fraser's comments seemed sometimes irrelevant and impractical, it was useful to be reminded from time to time of what was ultimately desirable. Mr. Fraser stated frankly that the New Zealand Government could not accept the Yalta voting formula. He could not promise that they would vote for it at San Francisco, although they would not act without the most careful consideration. On the question of mandates, the New Zealanders were even more emphatic than Dr. Evatt in their opposition to United Kingdom policy. They supported our view on secondary powers but, as might be expected of a very small state, tended to emphasize willingness rather than capacity as a qualification for membership on the Security Council. Mr. Fraser was particularly bitter about the Yalta agreement to admit to San Francisco "the band-wagon states" who had made death-bed repentances by March 31st. His sentiments on this subject were widely shared. Indeed, a considerable amount of discussion was due to a general fear of the damage which could be done to the World Organization by the combined action of irresponsible states, particularly some of those from Latin America. There were constant references to the behaviour of the Latin American bloc at Chicago and a desire to prevent such activities from frustrating the purposes of the new Organization. The New Zealand delegation placed particular emphasis on the need to expand the powers of the Assembly. This was their cure for difficulties over voting in the Security Council and over the question of the obligations of non-members of the Council to enforce sanctions. They were also very anxious to establish in the Charter the principles of justice according to which decisions of the Organization would be made. Mr. Fraser was also the leader in the effort to secure in the Charter a guarantee of the territorial integrity and political independence of members.

9. The outlook of New Zealand differed in certain interesting respects from that of Canada, Australia or India, in that New Zealand frankly admitted that it was a small Power, whereas the other three countries considered themselves to be in a special category. Field Marshal Smuts was equally frank in admitting that South Africa was a small Power, but it can scarcely be said that he acted in the role of a spokesman for the smaller powers in the way in which Mr. Fraser did.

10. The Indians played a helpful and responsible role in the meetings. Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar has a direct and logical mind which was very valuable in the discussions. In his introductory remarks Sir Firoz Khan Noon insisted that the Indian delegation was the free representative of the Indian Government and not responsible to Whitehall. Certainly their opinions as expressed seemed to be quite as free as those of the other delegations. Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar associated the Indians very strongly with the Canadian view on secondary powers. At frequent intervals, we were reminded by the Indians that they considered India to be every bit as capable of contributing to the new World Organization as China, and they would consider it quite intolerable if their position vis-à-vis China was in accordance with present plans. For the most part their views were similar to ours, except that they supported the United Kingdom and Australia on the question of sanctions. Possibly Sir Ramaswami's most impressive contribution was in connection with the debate on territorial trusteeship on which question the Indians associated themselves in general with the Australians and New Zealanders. Whereas other delegations had been pleading with the United Kingdom to take a stand which would not offend American public opinion, Sir Ramaswami pointed out the importance of not offending Asiatic public opinion by seeming to stand in the way of what they would regard as a forward step in the treatment of dependent peoples.

11. From the Canadian point of view there is good reason to feel satisfied with much of the discussion. We secured general support for our views on the secondary powers and on the related questions of amendment of the Charter and the right of withdrawal. The results were not quite so satisfactory in certain other respects. Although we secured the support of Field Marshal Smuts, and to some extent of Mr. Fraser, in our attitude on the obligations of non-member States to enforce sanctions, we met with strong opposition from the United Kingdom, Australia and India. Lord Cranborne himself feels strongly on this subject, as was evident both at the meeting and in his address to the House of Lords on the occasion of the debate on the San Francisco Conference. We did succeed, however, in making the United Kingdom aware more fully of our problems in this regard, and we know exactly where we stand as far as they are concerned. Another somewhat unsatisfactory feature was our failure to get very far on the question of the functions of the Military Staff Committee, the nature of the military agreements to be concluded by member states, and the relation of the Security Council to the enforcement of peace treaties against ex-enemy States. The reason for our failure in this regard was undoubtedly the fact that the United Kingdom, or the United Kingdom and the other sponsor States, have not themselves thought out these problems to any very great extent. Our emphasis on these problems may have served to indicate to one of the Great Powers at least that it is essential to have some clearer understanding of these aspects of the new Organization.

12. I am enclosing a copy of a summary of the treatment of the Meeting in the United Kingdom press.†

Yours sincerely,

VINCENT MASSEY

Procès-verbal d'une réunion de la délégation canadienne, la Conférence des Nations Unies sur l'Organisation internationale

Minutes of Meeting of Canadian Delegation, United Nations Conference on International Organization

SECRET San Francisco, April 27, 1945

1. At 5 o'clock on April 24th a meeting was held in the Prime Minister's rooms at which the following persons were present:

The Prime Minister,
Mr. St. Laurent,
Senator King,
Senator Moraud,
Mr. Graydon,
Mr. Coldwell,
Mrs. Casselman,
Mr. Robertson,
Mr. Wrong.
Mr. Désy,
Mr. Wilgress,
General Pope,
Mr. Renaud,
Mr. Rasminsky,
Mr. Ritchie,
Mr. Pickersgill,
Mr. R. G. Robertson

During the course of the meeting it was joined by the following:

Mr. Pearson,
Mr. Chipman,
Mr. Reid,
Mr. Dunton.

2. The Prime Minister opened the meeting by stating that he thought that the Canadian delegation would be best advised to withhold suggestions for amendment and positive comment for the time being until there was an opportunity to see how the conference developed and to ascertain what measures would be necessary. In connection with the organization of the conference he asked Mr. Wrong to outline information that had thus far been received.

3. Mr. Wrong stated briefly the information that was available with regard to the plans for the opening session at 4:30 on April 25th and for the meeting of the Steering Committee at 10:30 on April 26th. In connection with the work of commissions and committees, he submitted a tentative list of Canadian delegation personnel for the proposed four main commissions. The Prime Minister emphasized that this was a purely tentative list and instructed that copies of it be made available to the delegates and advisers for consideration and suggestion.

4. In connection with relations with the press the Prime Minister pointed out the possibility of embarrassment through casual statements that might receive publication. He suggested, and it was agreed, that no statements with reference to the work of the conference should be given to the press by members of the delegation except through Mr. Dunton. As a first statement, it was agreed that Mr. Dunton should tell the press that the Canadian delegation was of one mind in its desire to do everything possible to assist the work of the conference and ensure its success. It was also to be stated that the fact that the Canadian delegation was not bringing forward specific amendments to the proposals immediately did not mean that the delegation did not have definite views as to measures of improvement that should be taken. Suggestions for revision and views in general would be put forward as seem desirable after careful consideration of the circumstances. The primary aim of the Canadian delegation was to ensure that world organization would be brought into being in as large a way as might be possible.

5. In connection with the probability that the Soviet delegation would bring forward a proposal for separate membership for the Ukraine and for White Russia, the Prime Minister said that he assumed that the delegation was in agreement that the action taken by Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt at Yalta in support of this proposal was wise. He thought that emphasis should be placed on separate membership rather than on the multiple vote aspect. Mr. Coldwell said that he felt that we could not oppose separate membership in view of the position of India.

Arising out of this matter Mr. Pearson said that he thought there was no possibility that the United States would bring up the question of multiple votes for themselves. It involved a departure in principle and they did not wish to start the extensive debate that would immediately arise.

6. The Prime Minister closed the meeting with the observation that there were a great many difficulties to be surmounted at the conference and that the problems were going to be greater than most people had foreseen or even yet foresaw.

TELEGRAM H-73 San Francisco, May 2, 1945

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Read from Robertson, Begins: We are considering submitting the following as provisions to be added to Chapter X of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals concerning the Secretariat:

"4. The Secretary General and other personnel of the United Nations shall not seek or receive instructions in regard to the discharge of their responsibilities from any Government or from any other authority external to the Organization. The Secretary General and other personnel shall refrain from any action, including any public pronouncement, which may reflect upon their position as international officials, either in their own countries or elsewhere. Each member undertakes to respect fully the international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary General and other personnel and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities.

5. The appointment and conditions of service of the personnel of the United Nations shall be such as to permit the establishment of a truly international Civil Service with the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. The personnel shall be selected by the Secretary General under rules to be established by the General Assembly. Positions shall be open equally to men and women. Subject to the paramount importance of seeking the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity, due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting personnel on as wide a geographical basis as possible.

6. The Secretary General and other personnel of the United Nations shall be immune from legal process with respect to acts performed by them in their official capacity, except when the United Nations waives this immunity.

7. In order to guarantee the independence of the United Nations as an international institution, the General Assembly shall adopt a convention, for submission to the members with a view to ratification, establishing the legal status to be conferred on the United Nations, the official international organizations or agencies brought into relationship with it, and on the personnel of the United Nations and these related agencies."

I should appreciate it if you could give these paragraphs your immediate consideration and let me have your comments. Ends.

Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs to Delegation, United Nations Conference

TELEGRAM D-100 Ottawa, May 3, 1945

IMMEDIATE AND SECRET. Following from Read to N. A. Robertson, Begins: Your telegram H-73 May 2, 1945. I have considered draft paragraphs 4 to 7 for addition to Chapter X of Dumbarton Oaks proposals. The proposal throughout used the word "should" in the case of mandatory provisions and in these paragraphs it is suggested that the same type of wording might need to be followed for the sake of uniformity.

There is no reference to "personnel" in Chapter X and in order to take this into account the first line of the draft paragraph 4 might be revised to read:

4. "The Secretary General and personnel of the staff of the United Nations should not send etc."

The other references would not need any change with the exception of the addition of the word "other" in the second sentence of paragraph 5.

Generally I think that these paragraphs are entirely satisfactory and add greatly to the effectiveness of the proposals considered as a whole.

Mr. Wershof has made the following comments on paragraph 6:

(a) Why deal with this particular immunity at this point? There will surely be a chapter (or a separate convention) dealing with immunities of the organization and its staff.

(b) When you say "except when the United Nations waives this immunity"; what does it mean? Who can act for the United Nations in waiving immunity?

(c) The phrase "acts performed by them in their official capacity" is not precise. If a clerk is breaking the traffic laws in his motor car while on an official errand, is it an act performed in his official capacity?

I think that these points are well taken. If there is a chapter on immunities of the organization and its staff or a separate convention it may be possible to omit paragraph 6. The point with regard to waiver does raise a question as to who can act, but that could very well be taken care of in general rules as to procedure. The question of "acts performed by them in their official capacity" is not in one sense of the word precise. On the other hand, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to work out in these proposals precise categories of action which could be regarded as being "official" for the purposes of the rule. On the whole I think that these points should be kept in mind by any person on the drafting committee which settles in detail the text of the charter. At the present stage when the matters are being considered as proposals, I should be inclined to regard the inclusion of paragraph 6 as being both desirable and adequate in its present form.

TELEGRAM H-84 San Francisco, May 4, 1945

IMMEDIATE. We are submitting our amendments to Secretary General today and shall release text to Canadian correspondents here late this afternoon. In putting forward amendments we have taken account of amendments proposed by some delegations and have left it to them to advance suggestions which we could support.

Summary of our chief amendments is as follows:

(1) Composition of Security Council. Insertion of sentence requiring Assembly to adopt rules for choice of non-permanent members, giving due weight to their contribution to maintenance of security and performance of their obligations to the Organisation. (We should hope that Conference might establish Continuing Committee to prepare rules for consideration at first Assembly.)

(2) Alteration of Chapters VI D (4) on lines of Article IV (5) of Covenant to give States whose interests are especially affected right to sit as member in Security Council, together with corresponding alteration in following paragraph.

(3) Insertion of new paragraph 8 in Chapter VIII B, requiring that States not on Council should sit as members before they are called upon to provide forces under paragraphs 4 and 5. (New Zealand Government are proposing that all Council decisions, except in cases of extreme urgency, must be approved by Assembly before they become effective. We have decided not to propose amendment on lines of paragraph 6 of our memo to Great Powers of January 12th[85] since this would have no chance of adoption and New Zealand amendment ensures consideration of entire machinery for application of sanctions by States not on Council).

(4) A complete rearrangement, with some additional matter, of Chapter dealing with economy [sic] and social cooperation.

(5) Addition of paragraphs on Secretariat to Chapter X, with some revisions from form already telegraphed to you.

(6) Addition to Chapter XI of requirement that special Conference to consider revision of whole Charter shall be convened in 10 years. (Australia is suggesting that amendments should be made by two-thirds majority in two successive Assemblies, including votes of at least three permanent Council members in each majority, with elimination of ratification requirement. We have, therefore, not made a similar proposal).

Arrangements for International Economic and Social Cooperation

(Chapter IX)

Note: The Canadian Delegation is of the opinion that the various provisions of Chapter IX of the proposals could with advantage be rearranged and clarified. It, therefore, submits a revised draft of this chapter which takes account of certain amendments proposed by other delegations. (Reference is made in brackets at the end of each provision to the related provisions of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals as presented in Conference Document I).

Section A. Purposes

(The statement of purposes might in the final drafting be removed from this chapter and consolidated with the general statement of purposes in Chapter I).

2. To assist it in the discharge of its responsibilities the General Assembly shall establish an Economic and Social Council (page 18, lines 16-18) which, in addition to the functions more specifically enumerated under D and E below (new) shall receive reports from members of The United Nations and from related organizations and agencies on the steps taken to give effect to recommendations of the General Assembly (page 19, lines 15-16, and 20-22) and shall communicate its observations on such reports to the General Assembly. 1. The General Assembly shall elect eighteen members of The United Nations whose representatives shall constitute the Economic and Social Council (page 19, lines 4-6). Section D. Functions and Powers of the Economic and Social Council

In addition to the functions enumerated elsewhere (new), the Economic and Social Council shall be empowered to (page 19, lines 13-14);

(a) receive and consider reports from related organizations and agencies (page 19, lines 20-22);

(b) communicate to the General Assembly and to members of The United Nations its observations on general questions of international economic and social policy arising out of its consideration of these reports (new);

Section E. Relations with Other Official International Organizations (new)

(1) Economic, social and similar inter-governmental organizations and agencies having specialized responsibilities in their fields as defined in their basic instruments shall be brought into relationship with The United Nations on terms to be determined by agreement between the Economic and Social Council and the appropriate authorities of the specialized organizations or agencies, subject to approval by the General Assembly, (page 18, lines 19-23 and page 19, lines 1-3). Such agreements shall be initiated by the Economic and Social Council (new).

(3) The Economic and Social Council shall make suitable arrangements with related organizations and agencies for the participation, where appropriate, of representatives of such organizations and agencies in its deliberations and in those of any committees or commissions established by it (page 20, lines 21-23 and page 21, lines 1-2), and for the participation of representatives of the Economic and Social Council in the deliberations of such organizations and agencies (new).

Secretariat

(Chapter X)

Add the following paragraphs:

4. The Secretary General and other personnel of The United Nations shall not seek or receive instructions in regard to the discharge of their responsibilities from any government or from any other authority external to The United Nations Organization. The Secretary General and other personnel shall refrain from any action, including any public pronouncement, which may reflect upon their position as international officials, either in their own countries or elsewhere. Each member undertakes to respect fully the international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary General and other personnel and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities.

5. The appointment and conditions of service of the personnel of The United Nations shall be such as to permit the establishment of a truly international civil service with the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. The personnel shall be selected by the Secretary General under rules to be established by the General Assembly. Positions shall be open equally to men and women. Subject to the paramount importance of seeking the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity, due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting personnel on as wide a geographical basis as possible.

6. With a view to ensuring the independence of The United Nations, the official international organizations or agencies brought into relationship with it, and the personnel of The United Nations and such related agencies, their legal status and appropriate immunities from national jurisdiction shall be defined by a Convention to be adopted by the General Assembly for submission to the members of The United Nations. The members undertake that they will in no case subject the personnel of The United Nations to legal process with respect to acts performed by them in their official capacity unless this immunity is waived by The United Nations.

Amendments

(Chapter XI)

The following additions to be made to this Chapter:

1. "No amendment shall be considered by the General Assembly unless its text has been communicated by the Secretary General to all members at least three months before the opening of the General Assembly.

2. In the course of the tenth year from the date on which the Charter shall come into effect, a special Conference of The United Nations shall be convened to consider the general revision of the Charter, in the light of the experience of its operation."

TELEGRAM H-145 San Francisco, May 10, 1945

SECRET. UNC-8. Following for Chiefs of Staff from Pope, Begins: After several more unfruitful meetings, Committee 3 of Commission III came down to earth with a bang this afternoon when the New Zealand representative, in an impassioned oration, expressed the conviction that no Council of eleven members could possibly take it on itself, at least effectively, to speak for forty nations. Indeed, he argued, not even thirty-nine countries could validly speak for forty. He, therefore, moved an amendment to the effect that the Assembly should be associated with the decisions of the Security Council.

2. Stassen, of the United States, then spoke, and delivered himself of a speech based largely on sentimentality, coupled with the threat that it was inconceivable that members could return home having failed to reach agreement, that is to say, without having accepted the Charter as drafted by the Big Four.

3. This gave the Prime Minister an opportunity to intervene, which he did, by expressing great sympathy with the object aimed at by New Zealand, but suggesting that their amendment was somewhat for recognition. Mr. King, therefore, moved an amendment to the amendment to the general effect that the countries to be involved in a decision of the Security Council should be associated with the Council for that purpose. He then made the speech which he had prepared to deliver in support of the Canadian amendment, described in my UNC-6 of May 4th.†

4. The Committee then adjourned, and is to meet again at 10:30 tomorrow morning. Upwards of nine or ten members have already signified their intention of speaking to these two amendments, so that we are probably in for a two or three-day debate.

5. The issue has at last been joined. Ends.

Déclaration du Premier ministre

Statement by Prime Minister

[San Francisco,] May 10, 1945

STATEMENT MADE BY PRIME MINISTER IN COMMITTEE ON ENFORCEMENT ARRANGEMENTS ON MAY 10TH, 1945

The Canadian Delegation has proposed one amendment to this chapter, the addition after para. 7 of a new paragraph reading as follows:

"Any member of The United Nations not represented on the Security Council shall be invited to send a representative to sit as a member at any meeting of the Security Council which is discussing under paragraph 4 above the use of the forces which it has undertaken to make available to the Security Council in accordance with the special agreement or agreements provided for in paragraph 5 above."

The purpose of this amendment is clear — to provide that there shall be effective consultation between the Security Council and a member state not represented on the Council before that member state is called upon to despatch outside its own territories forces which it has undertaken to make available under the military agreements contemplated in paragraph 5. It seems certain that consultation would, in fact, have to take place, and we feel that a requirement of consultation should be included in the Charter itself.

The powers which the proposals would vest in the Security Council to call upon all members to join in the imposition of sanctions — military, economic and diplomatic — raise especially difficult problems for secondary countries with wide international interests. It is likely that if sanctions have to be imposed against an aggressor, the active collaboration of some states not on the Security Council will be needed. Let me contrast the position in this respect of the great powers on the one hand and of the secondary countries with world-wide interests on the other. Each Great Power is assured not only of full participation in the consideration of the dispute from the beginning, but it can itself prevent any decision to impose sanctions, even if it be in a minority of one in the Security Council. All the other members of the Organization are asked to obligate themselves in the Charter to carry out any decision of the Security Council, including decisions which might require them to send into action the forces which they are all expected to place at the Council's disposal, as well as decisions which might gravely disrupt their economic life. The council could call upon any member to do these things, and there is no assurance that the member would be consulted rather than ordered to take action. I feel sure that whenever a particular member was desired to take serious enforcement action, consultation would be a practical necessity. Therefore, the amendment which the Canadian Delegation has proposed would not delay action, since it would only incorporate in the Charter itself a step towards action which would probably have to be taken in any event. Unless this need for consultation is recognized in some manner in the Charter, the process of securing public support for the ratification of the Charter will be made considerably more difficult in a number of countries other than the Great Powers.

This matter is obviously closely related to the contents of the military agreements which all member states would be expected to conclude as soon as possible. I should like to ask whether any state not assured of a seat on the Security Council could reasonably be expected to place at the Council's disposal a substantial contingent of its armed forces unless it knows that it will have some say in the use to which these forces are put. It is likely, indeed, that the adoption of the amendment which I have proposed will tend to increase considerably the forces made available for military sanctions by countries other than the Great Powers. I regard this amendment, therefore, as strengthening the authority of the Council by giving it a larger assured backing. I need scarcely say that no suggestion from the Canadian delegation is intended to imply any action which would lessen the contribution which Canada or any other country similarly situated would be expected to make under any of the provisions of the Charter.

The position of the great powers in this connection is thoroughly protected by the voting formula included in Chapter VI C. They reserve the right of individual judgment on all questions involving the imposition of sanctions. Is it unreasonable to assume that other states should have their position protected at least to the modest degree of being brought in some manner into consultation before they are called upon by the Security Council to take action which might have very grave consequences? We all wish the Security Council to be strong and effective. I believe that its strength and its effectiveness can be increased if an effort is made to look at the proposals from the point of view of the smaller countries and especially of those which have fought and suffered.

Canada is one, but by no means the only one, of the countries to which the considerations I have mentioned apply particularly. Canadian international interests are world wide. Although Canada is geographically removed from the places of origin of this war and of the last, nevertheless Canada has been involved from beginning to end in both these great wars and has been a belligerent in them for almost exactly ten years out of the last thirty years. I am not going to talk about the Canadian war record beyond saying that I think it is widely recognized that Canada has been an effective member of the two great alliances which have been built up in our life time to resist German attempts at general domination.

What I ask, therefore, is no more than that my own country should be associated in some effective manner in the framing of decisions by the Security Council when such decisions would impose a heavy burden upon it. Obviously, there are various ways in which this process of consultation might be achieved. The Canadian amendment suggests one method of consultation to be employed when countries not on the Security Council contribute forces in connection with the application of military sanctions. This is connected with another Canadian amendment to Chapter VI which will be considered by a different technical committee. The purpose of the other amendment is to change the existing paragraphs 4 and 5 of Chapter VI D so as to provide that members not on the Security Council should have the right to sit as temporary members when matters specially affecting their interests are under consideration, and should be given the right to vote.

I think myself that it might be advisable to write into the Charter several alternative methods which could be employed in order to permit the participation of members not represented on the Council in decisions of the Council which directly affect them.

In closing I should like to raise a general question which, it seems to me, has a bearing on all the discussions in this Committee. Against what states would it be likely that Security Council could take enforcement action under this Chapter? Not against the Great Powers, since they are protected by their individual veto on Council decisions. Perhaps not against Germany and Japan, since the final paragraph of the Proposals seems to provide a means whereby a special system of sanctions against enemy states can be established in the event of their violation of the peace settlement. Is it correct to assume that what is really before this Committee is the creation of an enforcement procedure which can only be employed against smaller states? I suggest that as much light as possible should be thrown on these matters in the course of our discussions.

Mémorandum du conseiller principal, la délégation à la Conférence des Nations Unies, au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Senior Adviser, Delegation to United Nations Conference, to Prime Minister

San Francisco, May 11, 1945

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

It seems likely from this afternoon's meeting in Field Marshal Smuts' room that there are three points which will be pressed at the discussion with Mr. Eden this evening. These are (1) the association in decisions of the Security Council of members required to take active enforcement measures; (2) the question of domestic jurisdiction; and (3) the process of amendment of the Charter.

On the first point we do not know whether the great powers are ready to make any concession to meet the views expressed in the Committee. I rather think that they must be consulting among themselves on this since both Cadogan and the Russian made no reply to your speech. They may emerge with an offer like the Smuts' formula of participation without right to vote. While the particular issue of voting rights has not been debated in the Committee, we have from the first favoured temporary membership of the Council in such circumstances and have committed ourselves by the amendments which we have proposed to cover the point.

I am not much impressed by Smuts' argument that our amendment would require an alteration in the Yalta voting formula. It does not infringe in any way on the voting rights of the great powers and merely substitutes a proportion of votes for a fixed number as being requisite for a decision of the Council. I think the Yalta formula will have to be altered in this respect since it is not easily operable in event of absentees or abstentions from voting. Abstentions were very frequent in the League Council and I recall one meeting at which I was present at which a motion was carried by three votes with eight abstaining. A proportion of votes cast is a much more workable arrangement.

On the question of domestic jurisdiction, what is proposed by the four powers is that a seventh principle should be added to Chapter II, saying that nothing contained in the Charter authorizes the Organization to intervene in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the state concerned; "but this principle shall not prejudice the application of Chapter VIII B." In my own view the fears expressed by Fraser, Forde[90] and Smuts are not well founded as I do not see how a dispute over immigration policy could come before the Organization under this proposal unless it had reached the proportions of leading to the verge of war. In that event it is not a domestic dispute but an international dispute which the Council should be able to deal with as threatening the peace of the world. I should not think that we would have any serious trouble in Canada over Parliamentary acceptance of the language proposed. A number of countries are anxious for its inclusion so as to provide for the possibility of action before hostilities broke out in the event of aggressive preparations of the Nazi type carried on under the umbrella of "domestic jurisdiction".

Frank Forde, Deputy Prime Minister and Head of Delegation of Australia.

On the question of the process of amendment, I believe that we shall not succeed in getting any departure from the requirement that the permanent members of the Council must all ratify amendments before they come into effect. I think that both the Americans and the Russians would strongly oppose any change although I should like to see them forced into the open. I believe that the best we can do is to aim at something like our own amendment which would necessitate the holding of a constitutional conference to revise the Charter after a period of ten years. As this is a matter on which Smuts feels very strongly, he might well be allowed to make the running if he is willing to do so. Undoubtedly it would be helpful in securing Parliamentary approval if something were added to the Charter which could be pointed to as showing that there was a real prospect of the removal of debatable provisions without great difficulty or long delay.

Le conseiller principal, la délégation à la Conférence des Nations Unies, au sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures

Senior Adviser, Delegation to United Nations Conference, to Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs

San Francisco, May 13, 1945

Dear Mr. Read,

It has not been physically possible to keep the Department properly informed of developments here. Usually about ten of the twelve Technical Committees of the Conference meet each day with the final batch of three sitting, as someone put it, from 8:30 p.m. until unconditional surrender. In addition, there are a good many sub-committees and meetings of the various controlling committees. We are represented on all three of these latter, the Steering Committee, the Executive Committee and the Coordination Committee. What time one has between attending meetings and preparing for them is given up to ensuring reasonable liasion inside the delegation and a good deal of inter-delegation contact.

The delegation has really shaped very well. There have been no serious rifts among the delegates and the group of advisers are working together harmoniously. The delegates, however, begin to depart tomorrow when the Prime Minister leaves, as you know. Mr. St. Laurent follows the next day and

Mr. Coldwell and Mrs. Casselman later in the week. Senators King and Moraud and Mr. Graydon will stay somewhat longer, although I am not sure how long the last two will stay on.

As to the probable duration, this is still anyone's guess. At long last most of the committees are beginning to get down to the substance of the matters before them after tremendous discussions on matters of procedure which were quite unnecessarily prolonged because of the inexperience of most of the chairmen and many of the Secretariat. There is a great deal of work to be done and an enormous mass of amendments to get through so that I should think myself that we should be lucky if we can wind the show up in three weeks. Walter Lippmann remarked to me yesterday that he was leaving San Francisco at once but that he would come back in mid-August to see how we were getting on.

You know a good deal about the supposedly private meetings from the copious reports about them which appear in the press. As usual, Messrs. Reston and Crider get the story pretty straight in the New York Times.

The Prime Minister made a statement on the relationship to the Security Council of members represented on it on May 10th. This had been prepared and considered by the whole delegation for use in moving the amendment which we had proposed but the whole subject was opened up that day by Mr. Berendsen of New Zealand and the Prime Minister thought it wise to follow on while a general motion was under discussion. I enclose two copies of his statement. The debate is expected to continue tomorrow and perhaps the next day centering mainly round the amendment which he moved to the New Zealand motion. I think that we shall be defeated at this stage if the matter comes to a vote but may secure nearly the requisite two-thirds majority.

There has not been much Commonwealth consultation. I find among my papers a note I sent the Prime Minister after attending with him a discussion which Field Marshal Smuts had proposed between the chairmen of the Dominion Delegations. We had a discussion later the same evening with the United Kingdom delegates on the points mentioned in this note but I do not think we advanced far towards a solution. The heads of the Dominion Delegations are all naturally thinking in terms of the difficulties of securing the approval of their Parliaments.

The next two weeks are likely to be a very strenuous round of meetings. I do not seem to find time to write you except after dinner on Sunday evening and even then only once a fortnight.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

Mémorandum du secrétaire, la délégation à la Conférence des Nations Unies[91]

Memorandum by Secretary,
Delegation to to United Nations Conference[91]

[San Francisco,] May 14, 1945

1. A meeting of the delegates and advisors was held at 9:30 to consider a number of questions of policy that might arise during the following week on which decisions by the Prime Minister would be desirable prior to his departure. Discussion was based upon the attached memoranda which had been drawn up to present the particular points of substance that might arise in the various Committees.

2. COMMITTEE I-1

GENERAL PROVISIONS

With regard to this, the Prime Minister mentioned that in any general clause concerning human rights, it would be necessary to bear in mind the related clause about no intervention in matters of domestic jurisdiction. He felt that, so far as Canada was concerned, the Provinces would be very anxious to be sure that there would be no possibility of intervention in matters such as education which fell within their jurisdiction.

Approval was given to the proposal that we should support the Great Power amendments in regard to human rights and domestic jurisdiction. There was also agreement that in connection with the New Zealand Amendment concerning a guarantee against aggression and in support of the territorial integrity of members,[92] it would be desirable for us to give support to the general proposition as a guiding principle which could be backed up by the authority and powers of the Security Council. On the other hand, it was agreed that it would be undesirable to give support to a sweeping guarantee.

3. COMMITTEE I-2

PREAMBLE, ETC.

With regard to membership in the organization, it was felt that Canada should in general support divisions of members "that tended toward the principle of universality." Mr. St. Laurent said that the sub-committee report on membership was likely to favour inclusion of all peace-loving states which are able and willing to carry out the obligations of the Charter.

With regard to the principal organs of The United Nations, it was agreed that if it came to a vote, we should support the listing of the Economic and Social Council as a principal organ. With regard to the procedure for amendment, it was felt that a proposal providing for the possibility of withdrawal after sessions of a conference held for the purpose of revising the Charter might be open to improper construction. It might make it appear that such a Conference, as we had proposed, would be a "Withdrawing Conference" rather than a "Revising Conference." It was agreed that the Canadian Delegation should not take any leadership with regard to a withdrawal clause. It was felt that Field Marshal Smuts might take the lead in attacking the present amendment provisions and, if so, it would not be necessary for Canada to take any active initiative.

4. COMMITTEE II-2

POLITICAL AND SECURITY FUNCTIONS OF THE ASSEMBLY

Approval was given to the suggestions set forth in the attached memorandum.

5. COMMITTEE II-3

INTERIM COMMISSION ON ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS

Approval was given to the suggestion that Canada should introduce or support a proposal for the establishment of an Interim Commission along the lines suggested.

6. COMMITTEE II-4

TRUSTEESHIP

The meeting was of the view that it would be desirable to have the ultimate objective of independence for dependent peoples set out at some point in the Charter — perhaps in the statement of general problems with regard to human rights. The Prime Minister thought that it should be put in as a general objective but not necessarily in closely restrictive terms.

7. COMMITTEE III-1

SECURITY COUNCIL

General approval was given to the views set forth in the attached memorandum concerning this Committee.

8. COMMITTEE III-3-3

ENFORCEMENT ARRANGEMENTS

In general the meeting was of the view that the main thing was to ensure that the Canadian Government should have an opportunity of being consulted before any decision was reached to call upon Canadian Forces for enforcement action. It was agreed that we should not press for any general voting authority for any members called into the Council for discussion in such case but should consider our efforts on ensuring the right of voting on the specific question of use of a country's own Forces.

9. It was not possible to complete the examination of the other memoranda but the Prime Minister stated that he felt that the general views set forth in them were on the whole desirable as a guide in connection with points that might arise.

COMMISSION I, COMMITTEE 1

PREAMBLES, PURPOSES AND PRINCIPLES OF THE ORGANIZATION

This committee has made little progress so far and has served principally to give delegates an opportunity to make speeches of a very general character. Several important questions will, however, be bound to come up sooner or later for decision.

1. The four sponsoring powers have now proposed an amendment to strengthen paragraph 3 of Chapter I by providing for "the promotion and encouragement of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, language, religion or sex." But at the same time, they have introduced a further amendment, as follows: "Nothing contained in this Charter shall authorize the Organization to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the state concerned or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under this Charter, but this principle shall not prejudice the application of Chapter VIII, Section B."

The proposed amendment regarding domestic jurisdiction may be opposed in the committee, on the ground that it weakens, or even nullifies, the other principal amendment of the sponsoring powers by excluding many questions affecting human rights from the jurisdiction of the Organization. This argument has already been advanced by the World Jewish Congress in so far as it affects the position of the Jews. On the other hand, the exclusion of matters falling within the domestic jurisdiction of states will have substantial support perhaps in particular from Australia and New Zealand, who are anxious lest their immigration laws should be brought within the purview of the

[93]C. S. A. Ritchie.

Organization. On the whole, therefore, the amendment of the sponsoring powers seems to represent a compromise which the Canadian Delegation might appropriately support. We have ourselves no amendments to propose to chapters I and II.

Alternatively, it may be suggested that Chapter I should be merged with a preamble based on Field Marshal Smut's draft.[94] This might be the most satisfactory solution, as the chapter, in any event, consists rather of aspirations than of precise obligations.

2. The Mexican, New Zealand and certain other governments are proposing amendments to the effect that there should be introduced into the purposes of the Organization a guarantee as against external aggression on the territorial integrity and political independence of every member of the Organization. Presumably the Canadian Delegation would be opposed to a sweeping guarantee of this kind. The Australian amendment might afford a satisfactory compromise. It states as an amendment to paragraph (4), Chapter (2) "all members of The United Nations shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any member or state or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of The United Nations." If this amendment can be understood as simply affirming the general principle which should guide the conduct of states and not as a guarantee of territorial integrity and independence it might afford a satisfactory compromise which the Canadian Delegation could support.

COMMISSION I, COMMITTEE 2

QUESTIONS OF POLICY RELATIVE TO MEMBERSHIP AND PRINCIPAL ORGANS OF THE ORGANIZATION,
AMENDMENT AND REVISION OF THE CHARTER

1. Membership. Chapter III now provides that "membership in the Organization should be open to all peace-loving states." A number of amendments have been moved, the general effect of which is to delete the words "peace loving" and to state that membership should be open to all states which are willing to undertake the obligations of membership. This has led to a debate between the majority of delegations who are in favour of the principle of universality and several of the delegations from European countries who are in favour of supplanting the qualification "peace loving" with one more explicit and equally or even more restrictive. The suggestion has been made that the consistent policy of neutrality should disqualify a state from membership, e.g., Switzerland.

Recommendation. It is assumed that the Canadian Delegation should support the principle of universality and consequently membership in the Organization of all states willing to accept its obligations.

2. Principal Organs. Chapter IV lists the principal organs of the Organization. Here the main question of policy is the inclusion of the Economic and Social Council among the principal organs. The Big Powers appear disinclined to agree on the grounds that the Economic and Social Council is derived from the Assembly. The neatest way of avoiding controversy would be to delete the chapter altogether, but this too may be opposed. Another solution is to list all the initial organs and avoid the classification into "principal organs" and "subsidiary agencies".

Recommendation. In view of the great possibilities of the Economic and Social Council for the advancement of human welfare, it is assumed that the Canadian Delegation should support any move designed to enhance the importance of that body. Hence full support should be given to the efforts to avoid the present implication of Chapter IV that the Council is a "subsidiary agency."

3. Amendment and Revision of the Charter.

Chapter XI concerning the amendment procedure has not yet been discussed in Technical Committee I/2. Controversy is likely to centre around the provision of the proposals requiring ratification of each amendment adopted by the Assembly by all of the five powers with permanent Council seats. As the Charter will undoubtedly include a number of provisions which will be hard to explain and defend, this extension of the veto of the great powers into the process of amendment is strongly opposed. South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and India, as well as ourselves, have all expressed great concern over its effect on parliamentary discussions. On the other hand, the removal of the right of veto would cause difficulties over ratification in the U.S. Senate and possibly a refusal of the U.S.S.R. to join the Organization.

Recommendation. It is, therefore, recommended that the Canadian Delegation should support any reasonable compromise likely to be adopted without endangering the participation of the U.S. and U.S.S.R. We have proposed an amendment requiring a special conference in ten years to revise the Charter without specifying how the results of that conference would be brought into effect. The Four Powers have submitted an amendment suggesting such a conference whenever three-fourths of the Assembly and any seven members of the Council agree to convene it. The difficulty over the veto might be modified if provision were made permitting the withdrawal of a member not prepared to accept the Charter as revised at a conference of this sort. It is recommended that the Canadian Delegation should not support the inclusion of a general right of withdrawal but could support a right of withdrawal being given after a general revision of the Charter has taken place, if such a proposal receives responsible Commonwealth support.

The Four Powers have also proposed that the Charter should not come into effect until it has been ratified by themselves and France and a majority of other members. This seems to be unduly restrictive, but it may be necessary to accept it.

COMMISSION 2, COMMITTEE 2
POLITICAL AND SECURITY FUNCTIONS OF THE ASSEMBLY

The responsibility for settling disputes by peaceful means, for imposing settlements, and for using force to restore peace must be placed by the Charter squarely on the shoulders of the Security Council. If the Security Council shoulders its responsibility, the Assembly should not get in its way. If, because of the use of the veto or for some other reason, the Security Council is unable or unwilling to shoulder its responsibility, the Charter should give the Assembly power to take over from the Council as quickly and as effectively as possible the political and security functions of the Council other than the imposition of sanctions.

Ratification by the Assembly should not therefore be required in order to make binding on all members of the Organization a decision by the Security Council to impose diplomatic or economic sanctions.

The provision for expelling members from the Organization could usefully be omitted.

The Assembly, with the concurrence of the Council, should be enabled to suspend from any or all the rights and privileges of membership states which persistently violate the principles of the Charter or are wilfully and persistently in arrears on their financial contributions. Restoration of privileges should require approval by Council and Assembly.

COMMISSION II, COMMITTEE 3

SUGGESTED INTERIM COMMISSION ON ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS

It is suggested that the Canadian Delegation be authorized to propose (or to support the proposal of another delegation for) the establishment of an Interim Commission on Economic and Social Problems by this Conference.

At least a year, and possibly longer, will elapse before the Economic and Social Council can begin functioning. Meanwhile the economic problems arising out of the war will grow in intensity and numbers. It would be difficult to set up the interim machinery to handle these problems on an operating basis, but there would be great advantage in interim machinery which could lay the ground-work for an early start on the substantive problems.

The Interim Commission would have no operative responsibilities. Its functions would be:

(a) to prepare a plan for the functioning and organization of the Economic and Social Council to enable it to get started at the earliest possible time. The Commission would study and suggest the kinds of expert committees, the size and character of the staff required, etc.;

(b) to submit to the first session of the General Assembly a report on the economic and social problems which should first be dealt with by the Economic and Social Council. In the preparation of this report it would be necessary for the Interim Commission to study the problems and prepare the way for action;

(c) to negotiate with specialized agencies with a view to preparing draft agreements establishing a relationship with the organization. The negotiation of these agreements will take some time and many months of the time of the Economic and Social Council could be saved in this way;

(d) to facilitate the transfer to the new Economic and Social Council of functions now the responsibility of the corresponding agencies of the League of Nations.

Another advantage would be that the Interim Commission would have to assemble a staff which could form the nucleus for the larger staff of the Economic and Social Council.

Finally there would be great psychological advantages in having a functioning commission created out of this Conference to work on practical and urgent problems while the process of ratification of the Charter is going on.

The question of finance could be solved by having each member agree to contribute in accordance with a specified percentage. The sum involved would be small.

The procedure suggested here is parallel to that followed in the case of the Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture.

TRUSTEESHIP QUESTIONS

1. In so far as this Conference is concerned the principal job is to work out an acceptable accommodation between positions already taken up publicly by the United Kingdom and the United States. Any agreement they can come to between themselves — either on points of substance or future procedure should be endorsed by the Canadian delegation — this regardless of the attitude Australia and New Zealand may adopt.

2. In particular, I think we might support the United Kingdom suggestion that the Trusteeship Council should be composed — half of trustee states — half of states chosen by the Assembly. I see no reason why states with permanent seats on the Security Council — but no direct colonial responsibilities should stand in a different relationship to the Trustee Council from other members of the organization.

3. If issue is joined publicly between the United States and United Kingdom on the question of "non-discrimination" commercial, economic etc. in trusteeship areas, we should take no part. In principle we are prepared to forego such special advantages as we now receive from "discriminatory" or preferential regimes in certain colonial or mandatory areas administered by Commonwealth countries but I do not think we should take part in a move to force the United Kingdom from a position it has taken up publicly and to which it apparently attaches a certain prestige value.

4. It is to be hoped that adoption of a United States-United Kingdom compromise will head off division on the Trusteeship Amendments put down by the Russians and Chinese. If these questions of ultimate goals do come up — I should think we would be well advised to oppose the inclusion in the Charter of language of uncertain application which might only have the effect of bedevilling more modest and practicable projects for improving the position of dependent peoples.

COMMISSION II, COMMITTEE 1
THE SECURITY COUNCIL — COMPOSITION, POWERS AND PROCEDURES

(1) If our amendments for association of non-members with the Security Council are defeated, should we re-open the question of membership on the Council and seek to enlarge it to fifteen?

My own view is that we should not.

(2) What should our attitude be to a permanent seat on the Council for a Latin-American state?

This is likely to receive solid Latin-American support. I think we should oppose it, but should not lead the opposition forces. We should be particularly careful to avoid offending Brazil, which has been very friendly to us at this and other conferences and which might legitimately expect to be the Latin-American permanent member if one were chosen.

Opposition to the proposal should be based on the principle that another permanent member would mean that a majority of the members of the Council had veto powers and that public opinion in our country simply would not accept a Latin-American state with a veto power when Canada had none.

(3) Shall we amend our "due regard" clause in order to place squarely on the Assembly the duty of establishing rules for the application of the principle now agreed on and embodied in the Big Four amendment?

I think we should do this, and in supporting the proposal we might indicate certain rules, both for eligibility and ineligibility, which the Assembly might wish to adopt. For the above purpose, we would have to move an amendment for the insertion of a new sentence to the effect that "The General Assembly shall adopt rules to ensure that the above principles of election are followed."

In any debate on this amendment we should emphasize the correctness of the interpretation given already by Sir Alexander Cadogan that, in the Big Four amendment,[100] the words "specially" and "in the first instance" definitely establish a priority for the first functional criterion of election laid down. We should resist any effort to put the second criterion, geographical distribution, on the same basis as the first.

[99]L. B. Pearson

See United Nations, Documents, pp. 623-4.

(4) In Section B, paragraph 4, all members of the Organization are obligated to accept decisions of the Security Council and to carry them out in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

Should we not take advantage of the discussion on this paragraph to emphasize our position that non-members of the Council cannot accept without qualification general and unlimited obligations of the kind indicated and that therefore the words "in accordance with the provisions of the Charter" become of especial importance? One of those provisions is VIII-B-5, which provides that armed forces, facilities and assistance are to be made available to the Organization by members, through agreements to be concluded by them. If such agreements are not concluded, is there any provision of the Charter by which non-members are specifically obligated to carry out the decisions of the Council which impose active obligations on them? Furthermore, if conditions limiting such obligations can be attached to these special agreements, this should be made clear. The nature and extent of such conditions would, in our case, doubtless depend on action taken by this Conference in respect of the amendments we have put forward.

(5) Section C, Voting Procedure.

Under this, the question of the Great Power veto will come up, as amendments from Australia and elsewhere propose a majority decision rather than unanimity among the permanent members.

I think we should support any reasonable move to limit the veto strictly to the actual application of sanctions, but that we should not press this position to a vote in the face of strong Big Four opposition. What should we do, however, if a vote is forced by others?

Section C, 2 and 3.

The requirement of an affirmative vote of a fixed number, 7, will cause difficulties. Apart from the fact that our amendment on "association of non-members" will require a fractional majority, this would be preferable on other grounds.

Under the present system, abstention, even of non-permanent members, is equivalent to a negative vote.

Would it not be better merely to say that "Decisions of the Security Council should be made by an affirmative vote of at least two-thirds of the members present and voting?"

(6) Section D, 4.

Our amendment provides that a non-member of the Organization is placed on exactly the same footing as a member of the Organization in the case of disputes to which it is a party. This might mean that an ex-enemy state would be given a deciding vote on a Council decision. Should we not modify this position, by altering our amendment so that voting rights would be restricted to members of the Organization?

COMMISSION IV — COMMITTEE 2 — LEGAL PROBLEMS

1. Registration of Treaties

There has been general agreement that all future treaties of members should be subject to registration and should be deemed to be not binding unless registered. With regard to treaties heretofore entered into, it is probable that the final decision may be in favour of optional registration.

One problem that may arise is whether agreement between members of the Commonwealth should be subject to registration. The matter has not been raised specifically. If it is brought up, it is suggested that we should take the position that the clauses of the Charter apply to all members of The United Nations without distinction and that, accordingly, a general clause requiring registration covers agreements within the Commonwealth just as it does other agreements entered into by or between other members.

2. Treaties and Obligations inconsistent with the Charter

There has been general agreement in the Committee in favour of the insertion of a clause in the Charter to abrogate all existing obligations of members inter se which are inconsistent with the Charter, and providing that no member shall in future undertake any obligation inconsistent with the Charter. Some difference of opinion has arisen as to whether the Charter should abrogate existing inconsistent agreements other than those between members of the Organization (that is, between a member and a non-member state) or whether it should simply require members to negotiate for release from inconsistent obligations.

It is probable that a simple clause requiring abrogation is too sweeping. It might be desirable for us to suggest that a distinction be provided as follows:

(a) Agreements between members should be abrogated, and agreements between members and non-members should be re-negotiated, if they are inconsistent with the principles or objectives of, or with any clause in, the Charter of The United Nations.

(b) In the case of agreements which are not necessarily inconsistent with the Charter, but which give rise to an obligation that may, on occasion, conflict with an obligation under the Charter, the obligation arising out of the Charter shall prevail. Thus, a "most-favoured-nation" agreement might conflict with an obligation to apply economic sanctions. The agreement would not have to be abrogated immediately as being inconsistent with the Charter, but there would be a clear recognition that, if economic sanctions were called for, the obligation to impose them would take precedence over the obligation to grant most-favoured-nation treatment.

3. Capacity to carry out obligations

One proposed amendment that requires consideration by the Canadian delegation is that proposed by Belgium as a new clause in the Charter. It is as follows:

"No state can evade the authority of international law or the obligations of the present Charter by invoking the provisions of its internal law."

The Belgians have agreed to the deletion of the words referring to "international law" on the ground that there is too great doubt and uncertainty as to the extent and nature of many of the obligations arising out of international law. However, they wish to have the second portion retained.

In view of the Privy Council decision in the "Labour Conventions Case,"[102] it is probable that an amendment to the B.N.A. Act [would] be required to enable us to meet such an obligation. Section 1 of the B.N.A. Act reads as follows:

"The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all Powers necessary or proper for performing the Obligations of Canada or of any Province thereof, as Part of the British Empire, towards Foreign Countries arising under Treaties between the Empire and such Foreign Countries."

To be sure that Canada will be able to meet all obligations arising under the Charter the above Section should probably be amended to bring it into line with the constitutional development that has taken place in the Commonwealth as a result of which treaties are no longer those of "the Empire" as such. This could be done by altering it to read:

"132. The Parliament and Government of Canada shall have all Powers necessary or proper for the performing of the obligations of Canada arising under Treaties or Agreements with foreign countries."

If Canada were to agree to the Charter with the inclusion of the Belgian clause, a possible subsequent procedure might be to include in the resolution of approval for submission to the House of Commons and the Senate a revised Section 132 to enable Canada to meet the full Charter obligations. Passage of the resolution with this included would, it seems, then authorize the submission of the necessary amendment.

The immediate alternative course in Committee would be to oppose the insertion of a clause specifically designed to ensure that the Charter can be carried out in all its aspects. It will be difficult to argue successfully for this course without impugning the sincere desire of Canada to see an effective Organization brought into existence.

In considering the present problem it is desirable to consider that, if The United Nations succeeds, it is likely to give rise to a number of Conventions which will involve obligations upon Canada. While the present constitutional position continues it will inevitably involve the danger of our incapacity to meet obligations that are considered desirable in the international field.

At Delegation meeting this morning, the trusteeship proposal supported by the United States and the United Kingdom setting "self-Government" as one of the objectives in the administration of dependent peoples, was considered. Amendment proposed by China and supported by the U.S.S.R. would insert "independence" as an alternative objective. Opposition to this Chinese and Soviet amendment gives the U.S.S.R. a chance to appear as champion of dependent peoples. On balance it was felt that we should support the agreed

United States-United Kingdom text if they were unable to accept proposed amendment.

There is some indication that United States would not be opposed to eliminating the veto from Chapter VIII — A — peaceful settlement. It will not, however, introduce such a proposal. It was agreed that if a proposal of this type is brought in, we should support it unless it appears the U.S.S.R. would not accept Charter with elimination of this part of veto.

Our amendment requiring Assembly to adopt rule governing selection of non permanent members of Security Council was defeated in Committee on Wednesday. Ten of the votes in support were principally from Latin American Delegation. United Kingdom, U.S.S.R. and the United States all opposed. Substance of our Middle Power amendment has, as you know, been approved.

In Committee on Economic and Social Council, proposal for special mention of I.L.O. was withdrawn. The opposition of the United States and the U.S.S.R. was strong.

Our redraft of Chapter IX was modified in Committee by insertion on Fraser's motion of "full employment" as an objective of Economic and Social Council. We suggested preferable formula as being "highest possible level of stable employment." The U.S.S.R. strongly favoured words adopted.

Commission IV meets in public tomorrow morning to receive a report from Committee 1 regarding International Court. Decision has been taken in favour of a new Court rather than retaining the old one.

I shall try to send you a daily telegram about the important question under discussion in Conference and in Delegation meetings.

Mr. Morlock of the State Department is arranging for the United States Delegation to insure that there is a definite statement on the record, mentioning opium as being included within "other related problems" (or possibly other general language).

Colonel Sharman hopes that you will give consideration to this matter, with a view to supporting United States delegation and insuring that the language used is broad enough to include opium and other narcotics.

Executive Committee yesterday discussed proposals to expedite the work of the Conference. Termination of Committee work by the end of next week has been suggested and target date of June 2nd for final plenary session. The Secretary General privately suggested June 9th as a more probable date. Intention is to have the Conference end with 3 documents — the Charter, Statute of Court and resolution for the establishment of an Interim Commission to begin preparatory work.

U.S.S.R. has taken strong line against elimination of veto in Chapter VIII A. First paragraph of VIII A has been referred to a Sub-Committee. The impression is that Gromyko is under instructions not to yield further on veto.

U.S.S.R. is opposing our provision for association with the Security Council in enforcement of decisions involving troops of a non-member country. Privately, Novikov stated that they would not object to it for Canada but oppose generalisation.

Provision has been approved for suspension of voting rights for States financially delinquent.

CONFIDENTIAL. United States have proposed that Committee reconsider text of purposes for Economic and Social Council which was adopted last week. Their primary purpose is to lessen present emphasis on "full employment." In delegation meeting this morning it was felt that while present wording was loose, an attempt to amend it might lead to serious public misunderstanding and would be exploited by the U.S.S.R. and by Doctor Evatt. No support was given United States motion in Committee and it is hoped that they will not press it to a vote.

2. Our amendment regarding association with the Security Council before providing forces has not yet been reported from Sub-Committee. Big Five Committee is having difficulty getting Soviet approval, but prospects are good for agreement on revised but satisfactory text.

3. Delegation has been considering the part we should take with regard to the Great Powers amendment providing for four Deputy Secretaries-General who would, in effect, be Great Powers nominees within the Secretariat. Present text requires straight Council majority for election of the Secretary General and makes no mention of Deputy Secretaries-General. Great Powers are anxious to provide for the appointment of Deputy Secretaries-General in the Charter and to require Great Powers unanimity for their nomination. In view of the terms of our own amendment, which is designed to establish independent status of a real international Secretariat, I think we shall have to oppose Great Powers amendment, but shall do so in very moderate language.

The question of the domestic jurisdiction clause in the Charter will be coming up in Committee early next week. In an informal Commonwealth Committee meeting yesterday Evatt and Fraser took a very strong line re the present sponsoring Powers amendment to Chapter II of the Charter on this subject which reads as follows: "Nothing contained in this Charter shall authorise the Organisation to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the State concerned or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under this Charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of Chapter VIII, Section B." They both argued that in its present form this amendment was a direct indictment[104] to intervention on the domestic affairs of States. They were agreed that it would have a most disturbing political effect in Australia and New Zealand in relation to the immigration laws and implied they might not be able to secure ratification for the Charter in their respective countries if this question could not be settled to their satisfaction — they were supported by South Africa. The Australian and New Zealand suggestion is that the last phrase in the amendment should be left out so that it would read as follows: "Nothing contained in this Charter shall authorise the Organisation to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the State concerned or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under this Charter." It is arguable that the removal of this phrase would not, in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the State concerned or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under this Charter." It is arguable that the removal of this phrase would not, in fact, weaken the Security Council's power to deal with any situation whether domestic or international in origin which threatened peace. On the other hand it will be difficult to explain taking these words out of the amendment as they were designed specifically to preserve the powers of the Council under Chapter VIII B to deal with any threat to the peace, whatever its origin.

The United Kingdom Delegation have cabled to London recommending that the Australian and New Zealand suggestion might be accepted in principle subject to drafting changes. They will then have to attempt to reach agreement with the other sponsoring Powers on the altered text of the amendment.

There are indications that the American Delegation is divided on this issue. Their general attitude, as indicated informally, is that they are satisfied that the sponsoring Powers amendment as it stands adequately protects their domestic control of all immigration policies. However, if the question were once made a public issue by Australia and New Zealand, they would inevitably be faced with political difficulties.

It is likely that there will be strong opposition in the Committee to the proposed modification in the sponsoring Powers amendment on the ground that this would further weaken the provisions in the draft Charter for the promotion and encouragement of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. If the question comes to a vote, I assume that you would wish the Canadian representative to support any text which could be agreed between the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries and the United States.[105]

(Please repeat in code to Prime Minister). After prolonged discussion between sponsoring Powers a substitute text for the Canadian amendment to Chapter VIII B was adopted unanimously in Committee this afternoon to follow paragraph 5. Text is as follows:

"When a decision to use force has been taken by the Security Council it shall before calling upon any member not represented on it to provide armed forces in fulfilment of its obligations under the preceding paragraph invite such member, if it so request, to send a representative to participate in the decisions of the Security Council concerning the employment of contingents of its armed forces."

It is fully understood that words "participate in the decisions" includes right to vote.

Soviet Delegation would only support this text on condition that we withdraw our other two amendments to Chapter VI D concerning temporary membership in Council. Since there was little possibility of carrying amendment to paragraph 4 of this section, we have agreed to withdraw it. Netherlands Delegation have proposed amendment to paragraph 5 which meets our position and we therefore also withdrew our amendment to this paragraph, after stating that we reserved the right to support the Netherlands amendment.

Committee on Enforcement Arrangements has also been considering transitional arrangements in Chapter XII and there has been strong demand, in which we joined, for clarification of meaning of both paragraphs while accepting desirability of including their substance in the Charter. Through poor tactics of Great Powers in a Sub-Committee where they were in the majority, the original text of paragraph 1 was brought to vote this afternoon in Full Committee without any change and was defeated by 22-9. It was agreed not to vote on second paragraph and to refer whole question to Steering Committee for further consideration. We have throughout taken position that only comparatively minor drafting changes were necessary, but Soviet Delegation has obstinately pressed for adoption of original text. We suggested to Committee that no publicity be given to the discussion in order to avoid appearance of serious dissension when, in fact, difficulties were only about matters of form.

Please inform Chiefs of Staff.

IMMEDIATE. Following for J. E. Read from N. A. Robertson, Begins:

1. Consideration is now being given to the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter which has to do with the summoning of a Constitutional Conference to discuss revision of the Charter. The original Four Power amendment is as follows:

A general Conference of the members of the United Nations may be held at a date and place to be fixed by a three-fourths vote of the General Assembly with the concurrence of the Security Council voting in accordance with the provisions of Chapter VI Section C paragraph 2, for the purpose of reviewing the Charter. Each member shall have one vote in the Conference. Any alterations of the Charter recommended by a two-thirds vote of the Conference shall take effect when ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by the members of the Organization having permanent membership on the Security Council and by a majority of the other members of the Organization.

2. Since the above amendment was introduced, the sponsoring Powers have accepted a reduction of the General Assembly vote from three-fourths to two-thirds. In addition, a Sub-Committee has recommended that the Constitutional Conference should be called within a period of 5-10 years after the coming into effect of the Charter. The sponsoring Powers are maintaining their stand on ratification which would require assent by all States with permanent membership on the Security Council.

3. The general view of our Delegation has been that a more satisfactory provision would be one providing for the summoning of a Constitutional Conference without including in the Charter any stipulation as to how the Conference would conduct its business or as to how its recommendations for the revision of the Charter would be given effect. I should be glad to know whether you think that such an open provision would, in fact, permit the Constitutional Conference to make its own rules for the coming into force of the amendments which it would have approved or whether the normal amendment procedure established in the Charter would still apply until it had itself been amended in accordance with the procedure stipulated in it. IMMEDIATE. Following for Read from N. A. Robertson, Begins:

1. Reference my immediately preceding telegram concerning amendment of the Charter.

2. In view of the possibility of being unable to get any provision for amendment free from the veto, question has arisen as to the desirability of inserting a clause to enable withdrawal from the Organisation at the time of holding a Constitutional Conference in the event that the results of the Conference are unsatisfactory. It is recognized that a withdrawal clause would have undesirable aspects, and we would not wish to introduce such a provision ourselves. However, it may be difficult in many countries to secure acceptance of a commitment to permanent membership in an Organisation with the defects seen in the present Charter and without a liberal provision for change in future.

3. In connection with withdrawal, a special Sub-Committee of Committee I/2 recommended as follows on May 23rd:

"The Commission adopts the opinion of the inviting Powers that the facility of withdrawal of the members should neither be provided for nor regulated. Should the Organisation fulfil its functions in the spirit of the Charter, it would be inadmissible that its authority could be weakened by some members deserting the ideal which inspired them when they signed the Charter, or even mocked by aggressor or would-be aggressor States.

It is obvious, however, that withdrawal or some other form of dissolution of the Organisation would become inevitable if, deceiving the hopes of humanity, the Organisation was revealed to be unable to maintain peace or could do so only at the expense of law and justice. On account of this risk, inherent to all human enterprises, the Committee abstains from inserting in the Charter a formal clause forbidding withdrawals."

The above would appear to constitute an opinion that, without a specific clause, there would be no withdrawal except under rebus sic stantibus.

4. It has now been suggested informally by the United Kingdom delegation that no withdrawal provision is necessary, since there is an implicit right of withdrawal not only at the time of, or after, a Constitutional Conference but at any time in the future. This seems to be at variance with the above. It would appear to me that in a multilateral agreement of indeterminate duration withdrawal could only be on the basis of consent of the participating parties or in the light of the doctrine of rebus sic stantibus.

I should appreciate having your view as soon as possible. Ends.

SECRET. Following for Read from Robertson, Begins: The Italian Government have made application to the President of the Conference for admission to its deliberations, and Stettinius has asked the Secretary General to transmit their application to the participating Governments for their information. It is not yet clear whether, or how, the question of Italian admission will actually come before the Conference. United States Delegation is disposed to support the Italian application but does not wish to move in the matter without some assurance of United Kingdom concurrence, which has not yet been given. They are rather afraid that, if they do not sponsor the Italian application, it may be taken up and supported by the U.S.S.R.

My personal view is that we should support the admission of Italy if the question comes to a vote:

(a) Because it is another step towards universality, which we have always urged should be the objective of the Organization;

(b) Because it would help to redress the conspicuous under-representation of western Europe in the present Conference; and

(c) Because admission of Italy to the United Nations would strengthen the domestic and external position of an anti-Fascist Government which seems genuinely determined to repudiate the sins and errors of its predecessors.

We voted for the admission of Denmark without bothering you for authorization and I feel we can do the same if, and when, the admission of Iceland is considered. The possible entry of Italy, however, raises an important political question, on which it would be helpful to have an indication of the Government's views. Ends.

TOP SECRET. Following for Read from Robertson, Begins: On the resumption of discussion in Committee of the question of voting procedure in the Security Council, Evatt made a very powerful statement of the case against the unanimity rule and the Great Power veto. Senator Connolly and Professor Webster, who spoke for the United States and the United Kingdom, were no match for Evatt in argument. Webster, in endeavouring to explain how Sir Alexander Cadogan had come to give the Committee an interpretation of the application of the veto to procedures of pacific settlement which was much narrower than that subsequently given in the agreed memorandum issued by the sponsoring Powers and France, got tangled up in a very disagreeable personal exchange with Evatt and Fraser, in the course of which Fraser referred either to Cadogan's action or Webster's explanation of it as "contemptible" and "most dishonest." Senator Connolly, on question of procedure, asked Fraser to withdraw his unparliamentary references to the behaviour of the United Kingdom delegation. All told it was an extraordinary and deplorable exhibition of Commonwealth public manners. Pearson intervened effectively just before the close of the debate, and managed, I think, to put Commonwealth differences in a little better light and perspective from that in which they had been exhibited by the principal protagonists.

Pearson and I are seeing Evatt this evening and will endavour to ascertain just what object he hopes to achieve by the tactics he is pursuing. It seems clear to us that, in this year of grace, there cannot be a World organization established, with Russia a member, unless it provides for voting rights in the Security Council substantially as set forth in the Great Power memorandum which you have seen.[106] The effective choice appears, therefore, to be between such an Organization and an Organization from which the Soviet Union and those countries which feel their security most closely dependent on their relations with it are excluded. Our view is that it is better to take the Organization that we can get and, having come to that decision, to refrain from further efforts to pry apart the difficult unity which the Great Powers have attained. This means foregoing the luxury of making any more perfectionist speeches either on the voting procedure itself or on the general amendment procedure, which is very closely linked with it. We can continue to oppose the Soviet Union and other Great Powers on such essentially secondary questions as the method of election of the Secretary General, nomination of Deputy Secretaries or the omission of "expulsion" from the Charter, but we should not insist on forcing decisions on such central questions as veto and amendment to a vote in which our association with the other middle and smaller Powers might well result in the rejection of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals.

This general line of conduct carries, I think, the judgment of the members of our delegation. We may, however, be called on within the next day or two to translate this general attitude into votes on specific questions. I hope that, with the campaign now over, you may be able to have a word on these questions

SECRET. Following to N. A. Robertson from Read: Begins: Reference your H-300, 301, 302, June 10, 1945.

Your H-300, para. 2. I assume that you have in mind provision for 5-10 years conference in substitution for the Four Power amendment, and not in addition to the same. A provision for summoning Constitutional conference, without inclusion of stipulation as to how conference would conduct its business or as to how revisions of Charter would be made effective, would have following results:

(a) Revisions thus made would be subject to Chapter 11 of Dumbarton Oaks proposals, and would require ratification by countries having permanent membership, plus majority of other members of organization.

(b) Conference could provide its own procedure, by unanimous consent of countries present.

(c) Assuming all members of The United Nations present, Conference could, by unanimous consent, make overriding changes in Charter.

2. There is difference of view here as to advisability of 5-10 years scheme. In view of general view of your Delegation, it is unnecessary to state pros. It is hoped that you will not overlook the definite disadvantage in a ten year scheme. Original Four Power amendment is completely flexible and would enable summoning of Conference at time when it became necessary and convenient to do so. It would also enable summoning of Conference at any time when it became necessary and would not be spent with the first conference, as in the case of the ten-year plan. Further the ten-year automatic summoning scheme is somewhat misleading in that it would not in fact be possible to have an effective conference without Great Power support. Further, the fixed period scheme might well result in a conference at a time when it would be impossible to make progress.

3. Your H-301 raises the question as to the legal necessity for a withdrawal provision. I think that, in the case of a multilateral agreement of indeterminate duration, withdrawal could only (in legal theory) be made on the basis of consent of the other countries, or in the light of the doctrine of rebus sic stantibus. On the other hand, it is impossible to overlook a factor which is not technically legal. It might well be that a country could withdraw and that the countries generally would disregard the action and in a sense give it passive recognition. I should think that it would be a much better thing to incorporate no provision for withdrawal and to rely upon the possibility of de facto (as distinct from de jure) withdrawal. There would likely be a great deal of criticism of the Canadian Delegation, if they had any part in the incorporation of a withdrawal clause. If you think of doing so, could you let me know and I could consult Mr. King?

P.M. agreed.

4. H-302 concerning Italy. It is unlikely that we can make any progress in getting the Prime Minister's approval of the suggested course of action with regard to Italy, until tomorrow at the earliest. I have discussed the question which you raised, with my colleagues here, and there is general agreement, with no dissenting views, that it would be undesirable for Canada to have any part in raising this issue at this stage. You are familiar with the Trieste question and with the similar question vis-à-vis France in the Northwest. The acceptance of Italy would immediately prejudice claims which are being most vigorously made by two of the United Nations, because acceptance would mean an immediate recognition of peace without a peace conference, peace treaty, or the necessary negotiation for territorial or other changes. There is also the possibility that it might bring out the Polish issue again. There is also the hope that you are close enough to completion of the Charter to make it impossible to provide for representation and enable them to travel from Italy and reach San Francisco in time to have an important part in the deliberations.

5. With regard to all of these questions, I am wondering whether you are giving sufficient weight to the desirability of winding up in San Francisco before some new issue disrupts the conference, and in time to reach Ottawa before the snow flies. Ends.

TELEGRAM H-317 San Francisco, June 16, 1945

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. The Conference is working under great pressure in order to complete the Charter for signature on June 23, although some doubts remain whether this can be achieved. The major issues have all been disposed of in Technical Committees except the related questions of amendment and revision of the Charter and withdrawal from the Organization. Decisions should be reached on these points late tonight.

2. In agreeing reluctantly to the Yalta voting formula in the Council, many delegations took position that their acceptance of veto of each permanent member over important Council decisions should be met by some concession from the Great Powers in order to permit the later revision of the Charter without extending the veto to the results. The Great Powers, however, are solidly opposed in Committee discussions to such a change, with Russians insisting on their perpetual veto over all alterations. The Americans take the same line but on different grounds, since they are concerned over possible reactions in Senate if their own veto right is not written into the Charter so as to cover both ordinary amendments and the results of a general revision. There seems little chance of any concession of substance to meet the legitimate concern of the smaller countries. We should, of course, not cast our vote for any proposal which would endanger ratification of Charter by United States.

3. It may, however, be difficult to explain in Canada why the Canadian delegation acquiesced in decisions open to serious attack. We are, therefore, endeavouring to ensure that the record should show both our own views and a declaration by the United States at least that they would not accept the Charter if the changes desired by smaller countries were adopted.

4. The Great Powers are now willing to include, possibly in the Charter itself and certainly in an agreed statement, a general recognition of the right of withdrawal, probably linked with failure by withdrawing State either to accept amendments made or to secure adoption of amendments desired. Indeed, it looks as though this controversy might end in recognition of right of withdrawal more extended than that in the Covenant. We have not favoured so easy an escape from the obligations of the Charter. In view of the position described above, however, we consider it wise to include a limited right of withdrawal by States not prepared to accept results of a general constitutional revision. It is now likely that a broader provision than this will be adopted, which in the circumstances it would be difficult to oppose.

5. A great deal of difficult detailed work remains to be done in the Coordination Committee, and there are still outstanding questions in some Technical Committees. The public sessions of Commissions are also not yet half completed. In addition, the work of translation is heavy, and the entire text as revised by the Coordination Committee will have to be examined again. Unless some unexpected cause of delay arises, however, it is likely that signature will take place on the 23rd, although postponement to 25th is possible. Date of the President's visit is probably fixed within very narrow limits by arrangements for the meeting of the Big Three.

It is planned to hold organisation meeting of Preparatory Commission (on which all countries here represented will have one member) immediately before closing plenary session of Conference. Secretariat has requested delegations to appoint their representative and to provide him with the necessary credentials from his Government. These credentials can take form of a letter addressed to Mr. Stettinius as Secretary of State signed by the Prime Minister.

2. Since there remains some uncertainty about date of first meeting, it seems desirable to name myself and Wrong as alternative Canadian representatives. I, therefore, recommend that a letter† be prepared on this basis authorizing one or the other to represent the Government of Canada on the "Preparatory Commission for the purpose of making provisional arrangements for the first sessions of the General Assembly, the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council, for the establishment of the Secretariat, and for the convening of the International Court of Justice."

3. We also expect to be represented on the Executive Committee of this Commission which will, under the draft resolution, exercise all the Commission's powers when the latter is not in session. It is expected that there will be a short meeting of the Executive Committee following the meeting of the Preparatory Commission.

My telegram H-317 of June 16th.

Committee last night completed consideration of amendment and revision of Charter. Final decision was to accept original Dumbarton Oaks proposals for ordinary amendment procedure and to provide on following lines for convening special Conference for reviewing the Charter. Such a Conference can be called at any time by two-thirds vote of Assembly with concurrence of any seven members of the Council. If not held before Tenth Annual Assembly, proposal to convene it shall be placed on Assembly agenda and shall be adopted, if approved, by simple majority of Assembly and any seven Council members. This makes it almost certain that Constitutional Conference will be held within ten years if there is really widespread demand for the general revision of the Charter. Soviet delegation alone voted against proposal to place convening of Conference on agenda of Tenth Assembly. We consider this an important advance in the achievement of which the Canadian delegation played an admittedly leading part.

2. Attempts to remove the veto from results of such a Conference failed of adoption, and it was decided after long debate that ratification would be required by two-thirds of all members, including permanent members of Council.

3. It was also decided to omit from Charter any provisions for withdrawal, and instead to include in Committee's report statement that, in absence of such provisions, members could not be forced to remain in the Organization if there were good and sufficient reason to withdraw, including amendments which they could not accept or essential amendments which they could not secure. The position we took was that no right of withdrawal should be written into the Charter but that, in view of the decision taken on the veto over amendments, we could not resist a fairly strong reference to withdrawal in the report.[108]

CONFIDENTIAL [San Francisco,] July 3, 1945

PREPARATORY COMMISSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION

The first meeting of the Preparatory Commission was held in San Francisco on June 27th. I represented the Canadian Government and Maj. General Pope and Mr. Ritchie accompanied me to the meeting. The proceedings were almost

The Charter was signed on June 26, 1945. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1945, No. 2. For the report of the Canadian delegation to the conference, see Canada, Department of External Affairs, Conference Series, 1945, No. 2, Report on the United Nations Conference on International Organization held at San Francisco, 25 April-26 June, 1945. entirely formal and lasted little more than half an hour. Under the Agreement which was signed at the same time as the Charter, it is provided that all the functions and powers of the Commission are to be exercised by an Executive Committee sitting in London when the Commission itself is not in session. It is also provided that the next meeting of the Commission shall take place as soon as possible after the Charter has been ratified by the number of states required to bring it into effect.

It was agreed at the first meeting to leave all the operative decisions to the Executive Committee. The United Kingdom representative (Mr. Jebb) said that he thought that arrangements could be made for the Executive Committee to hold its first meeting at the beginning of August. The interval would be required to enable the United Kingdom Government to arrange for suitable premises and for the engagement of the requisite subordinate staff.

At the first meeting of the Executive Committee it will be necessary to appoint an Executive Secretary, other officers of the Committee, and a provisional staff. It is contemplated that the provisional staff will be mainly composed of officials appointed by the participating Governments and we shall doubtless receive a request to provide some suitable personnel for temporary duty. The Executive Secretary is likely to be a British official who will not be regarded as a candidate for the post of Secretary General of the United Nations. We have learned from the United Kingdom delegation in San Francisco that the Executive Committee will probably be accommodated in Church House, Westminster.

The Executive Committee will have a great deal of preparatory work to do in preparation for the first session of the General Assembly and the other organs of the United Nations. In addition to such essential duties as the preparation of draft rules of procedure, estimates of expenditure, staff and financial regulations and so on, it will have to prepare recommendations (subject to approval by full Preparatory Commission) on the following among other matters — the permanent headquarters of the organization, the transfer of functions and assets of the League of Nations, the annotated agenda of the first sessions of the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council, and the relationship to be established between the United Nations and some of the special organizations like the I.L.O. The date of meeting of the first Assembly depends on the speed of ratification of the Charter, and it now looks as though this might be a matter of only a few months. It is probable, therefore, that the Assembly will be convened early in 1946.

One of the reasons why decisions were deferred at San Francisco was that no agreement had been reached among the major powers on such questions as the Chairmanship of the Executive Committee, its rules of procedure, and so on. We were informed by both the United Kingdom and United States delegations that they wished to undertake diplomatic negotiations, particularly with the Soviet Government, on these matters.

We shall have to provide for suitable Canadian representation on the Executive Committee. It is likely that this will be almost a full-time post and that it cannot therefore be assumed by the High Commissioner in London or a member of his staff. The plans are, however, not yet sufficiently definite to permit a recommendation being made. We are asking Canada House to keep in touch with the United Kingdom authorities and to let us know by whom they will be represented. There was some indication at San Francisco that they would probably be represented by a junior Minister. We are also asking the Canadian Embassy in Washington to maintain contact on these matters with the Department of State.

IMPORTANT. Canada No. 153, Australia No. 242. As Prime Ministers are aware, one of the documents signed at San Francisco was entitled "Interim Arrangements Concluded by the Governments Represented at the United Nations Conference on International Organisation." This document established a Preparatory Commission (which held its first meeting the day following signature of the Charter)[110] and an Executive Committee of fourteen States which will exercise the Commission's functions when it is not in session. It was also agreed that the seat of the Commission and the Committee should be located in London and His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom should, as soon as possible, inform the other members of the Executive Committee when it would be desirable for the latter to hold its first meeting.

2. An examination of the practical considerations involved has now been made and we feel that all the necessary arrangements can be concluded in time for a meeting of the Committee on Thursday, 9th August, at Church House, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

3. Should be glad, therefore, to learn as soon as possible whether this tentative date is agreeable to you. If so, we should be glad also to be informed who will be your representative and what staff will be attached to him.

4. It was also agreed at the first meeting of the Preparatory Commission referred to above that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom would appoint an "Interim Administrative Officer" who would be responsible for making all the necessary preliminary arrangements. Mr. Gladwyn Jebb, C.M.G., has now been appointed to this post and will be available in London for consultations regarding the establishment of the Executive Committee which any Government concerned may wish to set on foot.

MOST IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Reid, Begins: United Nations Committee telegram No. 1.

1. Chairmanship of Committee may cause trouble at first meeting of Committee on 15th. Soviet propose that Chairmanship rotate among Big Five and that Chairmanship of Preparatory Commission go to Middle Power with two Vice-Chairmen of Commission from small Powers.

2. This would tend to establish pattern for Security Council and General Assembly.

3. Hasluck, the Australian representative, strongly opposes proposal on the ground that Committee is a Committee of the whole organization dealing with the kind of questions in which the military power of the Big Five is irrelevant. He is personally opposed to principle of Big Five rotation even on Security Council and fears that acceptance of Soviet proposal would constitute precedent not only for Security Council but for other Committees of the Organization. In place of Soviet proposal he would personally prefer election of Soviet representative as permanent Chairman.

4. Jebb had originally assumed that United Kingdom representative would be permanent Chairman, but in view of Soviet attitude he secured concurrence of other Great Powers in Soviet proposal. This he did before change of Government here, and he is now clearing the matter with [Noel-]Baker and Bevin.

5. In our opinion the prime consideration is the avoidance of an unpleasant debate on procedure at the first meeting of the Committee. If such a debate could be avoided by our not opposing the Soviet proposal we would be prepared not to oppose. However, if Australian and other representatives refuse to concur in it our best course might be to suggest that [Noel-]Baker be elected Chairman for first two weeks and that decision on the question of principle be postponed to give time for further consideration.

6. Would be grateful for your instructions. Ends.

Reference your telegram No. 1863.

1. Koo, at first meeting of Committee this morning, hesitatingly and with apparent distaste, put forward for discussion as personal suggestion proposal that Chairmanship rotate between Big Five thus "following precedent set at San Francisco." This was immediately opposed by Brazil, Netherlands and Australia and received support only from Soviet Union.

2. At this point I stated that Canada was opposed to the principle of rotation and that since the Technical Committees at San Francisco had had a single Chairman and this Committee was of the nature of a Technical Committee, it could be argued that the precedent set at San Francisco was contrary to suggestion made by Koo. We then suggested that in order to avoid prolonged debate at the Committee's first meeting, decision be postponed until our next meeting. This suggestion immediately received unanimous support.

3. Since then I have informally made the following suggestion:

Chairman Gromyko — First Vice-Chairman Koo — Second Vice-Chairman Freitas Valle — all serving in their personal capacities so that when the Chairman is absent he will be succeeded by Vice-Chairman. Unless the French object, it seems likely that this formula will be accepted tomorrow.

4. [Noel-]Baker stated he did not wish to be considered for Chairmanship and Jebb was unanimously elected Executive Secretary.

5. Second meeting of Committee takes place tomorrow (Friday) afternoon. Ends.

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: United Nations Committee telegram No. 3.

1. Informal discussions preceding yesterday's Committee meeting indicated that the compromise on the chairmanship referred to in paragraph 3 of my telegram No. 2 was acceptable to all members of the Committee except the Soviet delegate. He refused even to submit the proposal to Moscow.

2. As a result, the matter was debated for two hours yesterday. The United Kingdom, the United States and France made it clear that they were opposed in principle to the Chinese proposal, but that they would nevertheless vote for it with the hope that in future Technical Commissions of the United Nations would have one Chairman chosen for his personal merit.

3. Winant proposed, as a compromise, that the Committee elect a different Chairman every two weeks. The Committee accepted this subject to the formal condition that the Committee's report to the Preparatory Commission should contain a statement that its action did not constitute a precedent one way or the other. It was also subject to a gentleman's agreement that the Big Five would be elected in turn for the first ten weeks.

4. Gromyko was unanimously offered the first chairmanship, but withdrew in favour of Koo, who was unanimously elected.

5. Four votes took place:

(1) Should an accompanying statement be made to the Preparatory Commission — yes 11 — no 3. (U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia).

(2) For the principle of rotation — yes 8, (five Great Powers plus Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and Iran) — no 5, with Canada abstaining from voting.

(3) Should Winant's motion be voted before any other motion — passed by 9 to 3, with China and France abstaining and the Soviet Union being supported by the usual two votes.

(4) The Winant motion was then passed by the same vote as the previous one.

6. The debate was amicable. It demonstrated unwillingness of United Kingdom and United States to continue the practice of making arrangements on such matters behind the scenes. [Noel-]Baker made clear his belief that these matters should be settled on the floor of the Committee by the usual democratic procedure, and I feel certain that Winant concurs. Ends.

Le représentant suppléant, le Comité exécutif, la Commission préparatoire des Nations Unies, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Alternate Representative, Executive Committee, United Nations Preparatory Commission, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

London, August 21, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have been thinking over the kind of questions on which it might be useful if I could have some guidance from you.

The only one which is urgent is on the winding up of the League of Nations, since the Sub-Committee on this subject is to be established immediately and will probably take as its basis of discussion the United Kingdom proposals. Consequently, I would appreciate a memorandum from you, giving your views on these proposals which I think you must have.

Though the Sub-Committee entitled "General Section" is to be established immediately, I doubt whether it will for some time be tackling the problem of the permanent Headquarters of the Organisation. However, that subject will, no doubt, be coming up from time to time in informal conversations. Already one of the advisers to the Soviet Delegation, Mr. Roschin, has broached the subject to me. He gave me the impression that he thought there was a good deal to be said for having the Headquarters in the United States, but naturally

I did not attach much importance to this, since I think he was merely trying to sound out our views.

Another Sub-Committee to be established immediately is the one dealing with "Relations with Specialised Agencies." At some point in its procedure this Sub-Committee will have to deal with the delicate problem of the relations with the I.L.O.

The Sub-Committee on "Financial Arrangements" is not to be set up immediately. Before it is set up, it would be useful if I could have your views on the method which you think would be most desirable of assessing and collecting contributions from the member States.

The Sub-Committee on the "Security Council" is also among those which are not to be set up immediately. My guess is that when it is set up and starts discussing the rules and procedure of the Security Council the Soviet Delegation will propose that the chairmanship rotate among the Big Five. I doubt whether this proposal could go through without opposition, since I think that Australia will oppose the principle of rotation even as applied to the Security Council.

On a number of these questions, I know that the line which you will want me to take when the question ultimately comes before the Committee will depend on developments and on the impressions which I am able to secure of the general line which other delegations are likely to take. However, it would, I think, be useful if I could have, even at this early stage, some idea of your general approach to the problems.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

Le représentant suppléant, le Comité exécutif, la Commission préparatoire des Nations Unies, au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

No. 7 London, August 24, 1945

1. One important question of principle which is emerging as a result of recent meetings of the Committee is whether the Committee should content itself, for the most part, with preparing agenda on organisational problems for the principal organs of the Organisation, or whether it should also prepare agenda, with appropriate documents, on questions of substance. (See especially the minutes of the third meeting forwarded to you under cover of despatch No.4 of 20th August, 1945.)†

2. The agreement reached in San Francisco instructed the Executive Committee to "prepare the provisional agenda for the first sessions of the principal organs of the Organisation, and prepare documents and recommendations relating to all matters on these agenda."

3. The impression which Mr. Gerig, the acting head of the United States delegation, gave at the third meeting of the Committee was that the United States, in its desire to have the General Assembly meet as soon as possible, was of the opinion that the Executive Committee should confine itself to dealing with organisational problems. He argued that the functions of the sub-committees as set forth in Mr. Jebb's paper† might well be narrowed down and that the best approach to the work of the Executive Committee might be to take on the minimum tasks necessary.

4. Mr. Noel-Baker, of the United Kingdom delegation, on the other hand, stressed the importance of the Assembly at its first meeting dealing wisely with substantive questions. He said that clearly the first item on the agenda of the General Assembly would be a debate on the general condition of the world and what the United Nations could do about it. He thought that perhaps this debate might be documented by something equivalent to the annual report which used to be prepared by the Secretary-General of the League.

5. His opinion was that another item which would come high on the agenda of the first General Assembly would arise out of the insistent demands of many countries that the United Nations immediately begin to deal with urgent problems of world importance, such as displaced persons, the prevention of epidemics and the general field of economic reconstruction.

6. It would seem to us that Mr. Noel-Baker's approach is wise; that to confine the discussion at the first meeting of the General Assembly to purely organisational questions would be somewhat of an anti-climax. Moreover, it is unlikely that the General Assembly would, in fact, regardless of the desires of the states represented on the Executive Committee, confine itself to a discussion of purely organisational questions. If this is so, the choice is not between an organisational meeting of the Assembly and a meeting which would discuss world problems as well as organisation, but between an ill-prepared meeting of the General Assembly and a relatively well-prepared one.

7. If the General Assembly is to secure the respect of public opinion throughout the United Nations, it seems to us of great importance that its first session should be as successful as possible and that the Assembly should demonstrate its ability to deal with delicate problems of international significance in a wise and useful manner. The General Assembly should, from its inception, be, to use Senator Vandenberg's phrase, "a town meeting of the world."

8. Thus it would seem to us essential that the Executive Committee prepare adequately annotated and documented agenda on questions of substance for the first sessions of the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council.

9. The difficulty is obviously one of time and of staff. On the first point we suggest that it would be better to postpone the meeting of the Assembly for a month or two in order that preparations for it be well advanced than to have it meet prematurely without adequate documentation or preparation.

10. On the second point, our feeling is that the Executive Committee should do its best to secure a staff sufficiently large and able that it can make adequate preparation for the discussion of questions of substance at the first meetings of the organs of the United Nations. Mr. Jebb unfortunately seems to be thinking in too limited terms, so far as the temporary international secretariat is concerned.

11. The explanation of the attitude adopted by the United States delegation in trying to restrict the work of the Executive Committee may be that they are anxious to have the United Nations Organisation set in motion before the pendulum in the United States swings back to isolation and while the Administration can capitalise on the virtually unanimous support which has been given to the United Nations Charter in the United States.

12. In order to go part way to meet the United States desire to set things moving as soon as possible, perhaps it might be desirable to have a meeting of the Preparatory Commission take place in about another two months and for the Executive Committee to present to the Commission, at that time, its report on organisational problems. The Preparatory Commission could then discuss this report and refer it back to the Executive Committee with its suggestions for revision and amplification. The Preparatory Commission could then decide what questions of substance should be discussed at the first sessions of the principal organs and instruct the Executive Committee to prepare adequate documentation on these items. If the Preparatory Commission saw fit it might also authorise the Executive Committee to add further items to the agenda if it considered this desirable in the light of developments before the Assembly meets.

13. Another meeting of the Preparatory Commission would then be held immediately before the first meeting of the General Assembly to receive the final report of the Executive Committee.

14. The first of these two meetings of the Preparatory Commission could be held in London and the question of the place of the final meeting could be left open. The effect of this might be that the final meeting might be held at say, Geneva, and followed immediately by the first meeting of the General Assembly without prejudice to any decision which might subsequently be made about the headquarters of the Organisation. The argument for holding the final meeting of the Preparatory Commission and the first meeting of the General Assembly in Geneva would be that only at Geneva are we likely to find, for the present, the facilities which would make possible the dignified, orderly and efficient conduct of the first meetings of the United Nations. On the other hand, the U.S.S.R. and possibly other Governments, may well refuse to go to Geneva in any circumstances.

15. I should greatly appreciate your views on the questions which I have raised in this despatch.

I have etc.

Le haut commissaire par intérim en Grande-Bretagne au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

TELEGRAM 2469 London, August 28, 1945

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: United Nations Committee telegram No. 5.

1. The Committee has still not reached agreement on the text of the memorandum on its method of work and the terms of reference of the Sub-Committees. It looks as if agreement will be reached tomorrow or Thursday and the Sub-Committees can then start to work.

2. The two chief points at issue in the last three meetings, of which the last two have been open to the press, are the nature of the Executive Committee Secretariat and the relations of the Committee with the League of Nations.

3. The Soviet view on the Committee Secretariat is that the only part of the Secretariat which should be international should be the clerical and administrative staff. The rest of the Secretariat would be composed of members of national delegations who would, while serving in the Secretariat, remain members of those delegations. Their arguments indicated that this is the sort of pattern they have in mind for the Secretariat of the United Nations Organisation.

4. In view of these implications, we have taken a leading part in opposing the Soviet views on these questions, urging that the temporary Secretariat should, so far as possible, be set up in accordance with the provisions of Article 101 (3) of the Charter. The Soviet were isolated and it looks as if the Committee will, tomorrow, adopt the substance of our proposals.

5. So far as the League of Nations is concerned, the Soviet desire is to pretend that it does not exist. They, therefore, opposed our suggestion that the League of Nations should be invited by the Sub-Committees to submit papers to them on matters falling within their competence.

6. [Noel-]Baker said this morning that the Soviet Ambassador was pushing the Committee too far in asking that there be no reference to the League in the Committee's memorandum, and Massigli said that our proposal was "in perfect accord with common sense." The Soviet received no support except for a brief intervention from Yugoslavia, even Czechoslovakia taking a fairly firm line against them. The compromise tentatively adopted today was not to mention the League by name, but to instruct the Sub-Committees to seek assistance from "the existing International Organisation."

7. The Soviet delegation is obviously bound by very precise and detailed instructions. Gromyko does not show the same confidence in his abilities or his position in Moscow as Golunsky did at the Co-ordination Committee in San Francisco.

8. The rearguard action fought by the Soviet delegation on the Secretariat, League, relations with the press and the chairmanship of the Committee, has more than doubled the amount of time which the Committee has had to devote to its organisation. If, as is likely, the Soviet continue to act in this way, the most pessimistic estimates about the length of the Committee's work will be justified. Ends.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au représentant suppléant, la Comité exécutif, la Commission préparatoire des Nations Unies

Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Alternate Representative, Executive Committee, United Nations Preparatory Commission

Ottawa, August 30, 1945

Dear Mr. Reid,

I am writing in partial reply to your letter to Mr. Robertson of August 21st in which you ask guidance on a number of matters which will come up in the sub-committees of the Executive Committee. As an introduction let me say that we are concerned in the Department at not being able to supplement your efforts by providing further help for the Executive Committee. We shall talk the situation over with Mr. Pearson on his return and see if there is anything that we can do. The trouble is the old familiar one — in the first place we are desperately short of people and, secondly, we are not in a position to give you very much guidance on the issues that will arise because of the pressure of work and the large number of urgent and important matters coming up for decision.

One point on which you ask guidance is on the winding up of the League of Nations. I think that we have not seen the latest version of the United Kingdom proposals. Mr. Owen gave me in San Francisco a copy of the secret report of March 15th of the Foreign Office Committee on this subject.[†] I have not had time to reread it all but I think it is safe to say that the general line taken by this Committee is acceptable to us. The report is written more from the point of view of what has to be done to liquidate the League of Nations than from the point of view of what the Executive Committee has to do to take functions and assets from the League. It carries the judgment, I believe, of Messrs. Lester [111] and Jacklin[112] who were unofficially associated in its preparation.

One point I should mention in this connection although it is a minor one. It will be awkward for the members of the League (except for the not inconsiderable number who do not seem to be embarrassed by defaults on their obligations) to be called upon to continue to pay a contribution to the League for more than the shortest possible period after the United Nations Organization has been established. This affects both the arrangements for the transfer of assets and liabilities and the agreement between the United Nations and the I.L.O. since the I.L.O. budget is now well over half the League budget.

I doubt that there is much that I can add on the question of the headquarters of the new organization. You know our general feeling in the Department that Geneva is probably the most suitable place, if agreement can be secured on it. For purposes of practical convenience from the language point of view, it is desirable that the headquarters should be in either an English-speaking or a French-speaking country. Otherwise there would be very great difficulty in securing subordinate local staff. I suppose that it may still be necessary to postpone a decision unless Soviet objections to Geneva are removed — perhaps by some device such as the creation of a small international territory.

With regard to financial arrangements, I note that the sub-committee is not to be set up at present. Perhaps we may be able to send you some more detailed ideas before long. My own feeling is that, with the exception noted below, the League method of determining relative contributions was more effective than anything else that could be devised. I am sure that we would never be able to arrive at a strictly statistical formula and that what will in fact be used will amount to an estimate of relative capacities to pay. The exception, however, is that the League scale (or rather the I.L.O. scale which is the same thing with the United States and Brazil and a few other countries added) squeezes the middle countries badly. From the beginning of the League, for instance, the United Kingdom paid 110 units and Canada 35. When the United States joined the I.L.O. it was on condition that her contribution would be the same as that of the largest contributor — the United Kingdom. The Department of Finance in another connection has recently written on this subject expressing anxiety, in view of experience with UNRRA, F.A.O. and other bodies, over the pattern which we are getting into in which the largest countries refuse to pay more than the second largest and a number of the smaller ones are unable or unwilling to pay anything at all, thus placing an unfair burden on the middle countries which have to take up the slack from both ends. This is a very real budgetary problem, and I am sure that we shall run into trouble unless identical principles are applied in determining the contributions of the United States and of Canada to the new organization.

[111]Sean Lester, secrétaire général intérimaire, Société des Nations.
Sean Lester, Acting Secretary-General, League of Nations.

[112]Seymour Jacklin, trésorier, Société des Nations.
Seymour Jacklin, Treasurer, League of Nations.

I think that we had better leave over for the present any consideration of our attitude in the event that there is pressure for rotating chairmanship of the Security Council among the Big Five. The importance which the Soviet Government seems to attach to these matters is an indication of their lack of maturity in international affairs.

I do not feel competent at the moment to give you any suggestions on one other point mentioned in your letter — the relations of the new organization with the I.L.O. I have not followed closely enough the recent discussions in I.L.O. bodies. It is going to be a very difficult matter to settle, and I expect that a good deal will be said about it at the meeting of the Governing Body and Labour Conference in Paris in October.

I am getting Mr. Rasminsky to go through the papers and reports which you have sent from London in preparation for a talk with Mr. Pearson next week. I hope that this may produce something more helpful to you than this letter can be.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

Le représentant, le Comité exécutif, la Commission préparatoire des Nations Unies, au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Representative, Executive Committee, United Nations Preparatory Commission, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

No. 17 London, September 1, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL

1. Now that the Executive Committee has gone into sub-committee and has thus finished the first stage of its work it might be useful if I were to make some general comments on developments in the Committee during the first two weeks of its existence.

2. The most significant development is that there are no penthouse meetings taking place as at San Francisco. So far as I am aware the only joint recommendation which has been made to the Executive Committee by the five great powers was on the acceptance by the Committee of the principle of a rotating chairmanship. On the other questions which have come before the Committee the five great powers do not appear to have had any previous consultation and each has demonstrated its freedom in committee to differ from the other great powers.

3. The Executive Committee, during the past two weeks, has been dealing with a number of questions which have been charged with political and emotional content, such as the nature of the secretariat, relations with the League and relations with the press. The fact that on such matters the five great powers have not considered it wise nor useful to agree on a common line may lessen our fears that they will present the Security Council with agreed decisions on all important matters on its agenda.

4. It is too early, however, from the mere experience of two weeks' work in a committee dealing with organizational questions to forecast what the attitude of the great powers will be on the Security Council. I have a feeling that to some extent the attitude they have taken to date on the Executive Committee results from Mr. Noel-Baker's strong personal distaste for secret five power conclaves, or indeed secret conclaves of any kind. Some of the members of the British delegation have already privately referred to him as the chief spokesman of the small powers. Now that Mr. Stettinius has arrived in London, Mr. Stettinius' influence may be thrown in the direction of five power consultation, though this is far from certain.

5. The Executive Committee is, on the whole, a stronger committee than the Co-ordination Committee at San Francisco. Its most influential member is Mr. Noel-Baker. During the Coalition Government he had the task of dealing with the question of war transport which could not have been very close to his heart. Now that he is back with his old love again — collective security — he is bubbling over with ideas and enthusiasm and energy. Because of his years in the wilderness he comes to his task much more eagerly than most of the other members of the Committee.

6. Mr. Gerig, the temporary chief of the United States delegation in Mr. Stettinius' absence, has presented his brief very ably but leaves the impression sometimes that he is not very enthusiastic about it. In private conversation he frankly states that he is embarrassed by the voluminous and detailed instructions on every point on the agenda, which he receives every day from Mr. Pasvolsky and Mr. Dunn in Washington and like so many United States civil servants he does not mind stating bluntly in private the points on which he disagrees with his instructions. He regrets, for example, the line taken by his people in Washington that the Executive Committee being, in their opinion, an agent of the embryo General Assembly should keep its hands off the sacred great power organization — the Security Council — and though he has not been very precise in talking to us about the problem of the seat of the Organization, I am fairly certain that he himself is in favour of the seat being established at Geneva and not in the United States.

7. Mr. Gromyko is bound even more tightly by his instructions than Mr. Gerig. If it were not for the Soviet delegation the Executive Committee could probably have completed, in three days, what it has actually taken two weeks to do. (Indeed were it not for the Soviet Union the Committee might never have come into existence since the other powers at San Francisco would probably have been willing to appoint a temporary secretary-general and give him authority to make the necessary preparations for the first meetings of the organs of the United Nations.) Mr. Gromyko gives the impression that he follows the letter of his instructions rather than their spirit and he has sorely tried the patience of the Committee by his stubborn refusal to admit defeat and by his insistence on raising again and again questions which have already been determined by the Committee against Soviet wishes. On this Committee the prime diplomatic virtue required is patience.

8. The difficulties which the Committee has encountered in dealing with the Soviet delegation may sometimes arise not out of Mr. Gromyko's stubbornness but out of his lack of a complete command of English and French. At one meeting the other day the Committee, for example, made it clear at least three times that the Executive Secretary could appoint senior members of his secretariat from outside the ranks of officials of the fourteen countries represented on the Committee. I am fairly certain, however, that Mr. Gromyko still does not understand that this decision has been made.

9. As at San Francisco some of the difficulties in dealing with the Soviet delegation arise from the fact that the Soviet members do not understand what is meant by certain western political concepts. The idea of a civil service, whether national or international, which tries its best to be impartial and which nevertheless, of necessity, is concerned with advice on policy as well as with the carrying out of government decisions, seems to be utterly foreign to them. They appear unable to distinguish the difference between referring a proposal to a sub-committee for study and report and deciding in favour of the principle of a proposal. To them the two things are identical.

10. Dr. Koo, the chief of the Chinese delegation, has not, so far, had a chance to indicate his strength as a participant in discussions on questions of substance. As chairman he has, instead, done his best to avoid open differences of opinion in the Committee and to gloss over differences by finding a formula, even though occasionally the formula is so imprecise that it only postpones a decision on a question of substance, and may make it necessary for the battle to be fought all over again in all ten sub-committees.

11. The Australian delegate, Mr. Hasluck, has been one of the most useful members of the Committee and has demonstrated much more ability in London than he did in San Francisco. Perhaps the value of his contribution to an international discussion increases as the square of his distance from Dr. Evatt. He has been given, he tells me, almost no instructions from his government.

12. Mr. Freitas Valle of Brazil has demonstrated on this Committee the same practical common sense which he showed on the Co-ordination Committee at San Francisco.

13. Mr. Kerno, who is the Czechoslovak representative, has made useful contributions to the discussions and has shown a surprising independence of the Soviet Union. He found it necessary to vote with the Soviet Union on the question of the rotating chairmanship of the Committee and, once the Soviet Union had shown its bitter dislike of the United Nations Information Organization, he had to cease being its champion. But on other matters, and especially in the discussions over the secretariat of the Preparatory Commission, he has taken a line entirely at variance with that taken by the Soviet representative. In the discussion on the secretariat he vigorously opposed the Soviet contention that the senior members should all be members of the national delegations of the fourteen countries represented on the Executive Committee. He further stated that he "viewed with great apprehension" a system under which some of the temporary international secretariat would be paid by national governments and some by the international organization and he went so far as to urge that payments made by governments to their officials who were lent to the secretariat should be refunded to them later by the United Nations organization.

14. The representatives of Yugoslavia and Chile have contributed almost nothing to the discussions and the temporary representative of Mexico, their Ambassador here, has not said a word. Indeed, the Ambassador is reported to have said that he did not know anything about the subjects to come before the Committee, that he had not read anything about them and that he would not say anything, but that he would come to the meetings so that the Committee would not number thirteen! No doubt when the chief delegate of Mexico arrives, Señor Padillo Nervo, he will make a useful contribution to the discussions.

15. Dr. van Royen, the Chief Netherlands' delegate is not as useful a member of the Committee as his alternate, Mr. Pelt.

16. The Iranian representative, Mr. Entezam, does not say much but what he says is almost invariably to the point and it looks as if he will be a good chairman of the sub-committee on general questions.

17. The attitude taken by the Soviet delegation on the secretariat of the Preparatory Commission is a forecast, I am afraid, of the very considerable difficulties which the Executive Committee and the Organization will face in matters relating to the secretariat. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the Soviets believe that all the senior posts in an international civil service should be held by national civil servants and that only the junior posts should be held by international civil servants. The national civil servants would be merely loaned temporarily to the Organization.

18. You may have noted, for example, Mr. Gromyko's statement (pages 4 and 9 of the minutes of the meeting of Aug. 24)† that "the main creative work of the Executive Committee" would be done by sub-committees composed of repesentatives of delegations, that experts should not be on the staff of the secretariat, and that "the functions" of the secretariat were strictly technical and organizational. Moreover, the national officials lent to the secretariat would remain members of their delegations and would be paid by their national governments.

19. Mr. Gromyko has insisted, in discussions with the senior officers of the temporary secretariat, on following a sort of point system in determining how many chiefs of section and assistant chiefs of section should come from the Soviet delegation. He seems to have been trying to ensure that the Soviet Union has a position of equality with the other great powers on the temporary secretariat and works on some such assumption as that two deputy chiefs of section are equal to one chief of section. He has also taken care to make certain that the chief of section on the Security Council is a member of the Soviet delegation.

20. As a result of the line taken by the Soviet delegation the position of the international civil servants on the temporary international secretariat has been greatly weakened. I am told by Mr. Gerig that a number of the Americans on the international secretariat are unhappy because they accepted their positions on the understanding that they would be policy advising officials and they now fear that they will be nothing but minute takers.

21. It may be that on the question of the secretariat of the United Nations the Executive Committee will be unable to present a unanimous report, but that two reports will have to be presented to the Preparatory Commission, one in the name of the Soviet and Yugoslavian delegations and the other in the name of the other delegations. The issue has been so clearly drawn that it may be neither possible nor desirable to avoid this.

22. The other issues on which it is obviously going to be difficult to secure unanimity relate to the League of Nations and the I.L.O. Mr. Gromyko went so far, at one meeting, as to say that his objections to inviting observers from the League to attend meetings of the sub-committees "arose from the simple fact that the League did not exist" (Meeting of Aug. 27th. Page 5).† However, having made their position clear in the Executive Committee it is possible that the Soviet delegation will not stubbornly try to prevent the sub-committees from making use of the knowledge and experience of the League of Nations and from treating the League and its officials courteously in discussions relating to its winding up.

23. The dislike by the Soviet Union of the League appears to be equalled by its dislike of the I.L.O. and even so harmless a body as the United Nations Information Organization. The Soviet Delegation has constantly reminded the Executive Committee that it is not a member of either of these organizations and that it indeed objects to UNIO calling itself a United Nations organization when less than half the United Nations are members of it.

24. The discussions in the Executive Committee on relations with the press indicate the difficulties which the United Nations will face in dealing with this problem. The Soviet delegation did not want to have any of the meetings of the Executive Committee open to the press, except formally staged meetings at which the Committee would, without debate, adopt some memorandum on which it had previously reached agreement. Apart from that, they thought the press ought to be content with formal press releases. While it is hard to say how they can even try to prevent the General Assembly from holding most of its meetings in public, it does seem likely that they will do their best to ensure that no real discussion in the Security Council goes on in public, and they may also try to ensure that assembly committees dealing with political problems should hold their meetings in private.

25. On the question of the relations of the Executive Committee with the press the United States delegation has taken a line very similar to that taken by the Soviet delegation. Mr. Noel-Baker has taken an extreme position on the other side. In his opinion the meetings of the Executive Committee should always be open to the press unless the Committee is discussing questions of personality. He is convinced that this would not prejudicially affect the frankness of discussion nor otherwise lower the standard of discussion but would actually improve discussion and that it would help to educate the public.

26. Thus on most of the controversial questions which have so far come before the Committee, the Committee has usually been divided, with the Soviet world on one side and the rest of the world on the other. It is possible that this may not be the line-up in discussions over preparation of the agenda for the first sessions of the Security Council. On this point the United States delegation is taking an extremely restrictive line, and the Soviet delegation has not shown its hand.

I have etc.

Acting High Commissioner in Great Britain to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM 2585 London, September 7, 1945

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Robertson from Reid, Begins: United Nations Committee telegram No. 12.

My telegram No. 10, 4th September,† on the nature of the First Assembly.

1. Stettinius, at this morning's meeting of the Executive Committee, made the following formal proposal on behalf of the United States. Eighteen States had already ratified the Charter and it was estimated that thirty would have ratified early in October when the Charter would come into force. The Preparatory Commission should be convened to meet in London about October 15th and the First United Nations Assembly in London about November 15th. Each meeting would last two or three weeks. The Assembly meeting would be almost purely organizational, though could also call attention to important world problems. The regular annual meeting of the Assembly would be called for next spring, perhaps April 25th, the anniversary of the opening of the San Francisco Conference.

2. He, therefore, proposed that the work of the Executive Committee and its Committees be restricted to purely organizational matters and that the three Committees, which had not yet met, meet immediately.

3. Noel-Baker stated that he was in agreement with the main principle and purpose of these proposals, but that his Government needed more time before committing themselves to detailed dates and places. Subject of [sic] the work being well done, the United Kingdom would like to aim at a target date for the Preparatory Commission of October 15th, but it might be necessary to postpone it two or three weeks. Later in the discussion he added that three weeks would have to elapse between the completion of the Executive Committee's report and the meeting of the Preparatory Commission in order to give all fifty United Nations time to study the report.

4. The Soviet Union, the Netherlands and China expressed general agreement with the United States proposals.

5. I took the general line set forth in paragraphs 6, 7, 12 and 13 of my despatch No. 7, 24th August, and suggested as possible dates — October 15th or November 1st for the meeting of the Preparatory Commission, to receive the Executive Committee's report on organizational problems; a second meeting of the Preparatory Commission at the beginning of January to receive and approve of the final report of the Executive Committee; and the first meeting of the Assembly towards the end of January. Since the First Assembly would include most or all of the States represented at the preceding meeting of the Preparatory Commission, it could be assumed that it would approve all the organizational proposals of the Preparatory Commission in three or four days, and could then become "a town meeting of the world." My suggestion, therefore, meant that the organization meeting of the Assembly would be postponed about two months from the date set by Stettinius, but that the Assembly would meet as the town meeting of the world three months before Stettinius' date.

6. Mr. Hasluck emphasized that the problem was a practical one of discovering the best method of ensuring that each organ of the United Nations function as early as possible to the full extent of its powers. He added that the appointment of the Preparatory Commission had avoided the necessity of having a constituent meeting of the organs of the United Nations, since the organs at their first sessions need only rubber-stamp the decisions made after debate by the Preparatory Commission.

7. The discussion will be resumed and probably concluded at the next meeting of the Executive Committee on Monday, September 10th, at 4:30 p.m.

8. Since the meeting, I have learned that Noel-Baker was bound by a political decision of the Government to do his best to meet Stettinius' views.

9. One relevant consideration additional to those set forth in my despatch No. 7 is that the adoption of the United States proposal would mean that the Security Council would be in active operation for about four months before the General Assembly really begin working. This might tend to destroy the precarious equilibrium between the powers and prestige of the two bodies.

10. I should welcome your instructions on the general line which I should take on Monday. Ends.

TELEGRAM 2086 Ottawa, September 10, 1945

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Reid from Robertson, Begins: United Nations Committee telegram No. 2. Your No. 12 of September 7th.

1. I regret that we were not able to send you instructions on the timetable proposed by Stettinius in time for today's meeting. While we think that the practical considerations are in favour of a course on the lines of your suggestion to the Executive Committee you will appreciate that the dates set for the meeting of the Preparatory Commission or the Assembly are not matters on which we can take a strong stand. We have discussed this with Pearson and he agrees with this view.

2. If the United States proposals are approved, the work to be done by the Executive Committee will not be as important as seemed likely hitherto. We feel that it is unnecessary to circulate memoranda from the Canadian delegation and that your main part should be constructive criticism of proposals before the Committee and its sub-committees.

3. If you can send promptly copies of sub-committee documents, we shall do our best to give them some consideration here. Rasminsky has agreed to comment on papers relating to economic and social questions. He is not able to prepare original memoranda for circulation to the sub-committee nor could he go to London before November which now appears to be too late a date.

4. We are arranging for Mr. Turgeon to spend some weeks in London arriving as soon as possible in order to act as Pearson's successor. In addition to sitting on Executive Committee he could also attend the Court Sub-Committee and possibly more than this. He will inform Canada House of the time of his arrival.

5. We appreciate fully the difficulties with which you are confronted and will do what we can to find some further means of assisting you. The pressure on the Department, however, is now very great indeed.

1. Committee on Assembly. C. K. Webster has proposed that Committee draft regulations on election of non-permanent members of Security Council which would enable Assembly to carry out its obligation to pay due regard to the criteria of Article 23. This is what we suggested at San Francisco. Committee will discuss this at an early meeting and then appoint Sub-Committee. If you could send me draft of kind of regulations you would like to see adopted, or at least some ideas, I should be grateful.

2. One way would be for Assembly first to elect a panel of ten or so States eligible under the first criterion, then to elect three or four out of this panel; and, when these had been elected, to establish a series of panels of the main geographical areas not represented on the Council, and to elect one State from each panel. Ends.

1. Headquarters of specialized agencies. The United Kingdom delegation have, with the usual safeguards, presented a memorandum† to the Committee on Specialized Agencies advocating that the headquarters of all international specialized agencies should be at the seat of the United Nations Organization. They add that many of the new agencies and the United Nations itself will require branch offices; that conferences and meetings may be held occasionally in different countries; and that there may also be a considerable development of regional conferences.

2. Do you wish me to support this proposal in principle? My personal opinion is that the disadvantages of a single international civil service city may outweigh the advantages. I think, however, that Wrong, Pearson and yourself take the opposite line and shall, of course, be very happy to defer to your judgement. Ends.

For Reid from Robertson, Begins: U.N. Committee telegram No. 3. Your No. 14 of September 10th.

In general you may support principle of a common headquarters for most of the large international agencies. Some of them, however, may best operate from a different headquarters. This would apply to organizations such as the Monetary Fund, Development Bank and the Civil Aviation Organization. Where the work of one Secretariat should be closely related to that of another (e.g., I.L.O. and Economic and Social Council) the advantages of a single headquarters are great. Similar considerations would probably apply if a commercial policy organization is created.

2. This is not a matter of very great importance and the final decision must be affected by the choice of the headquarters of the United Nations. Ends.

1. My telegram No. 12 of September 7th on the nature of the First Assembly. Yesterday afternoon's discussion was inconclusive on this point, but agreement was reached that the target date for the completion of the recommendations of the Executive Committee on organisational matters should be October 15th, subject to the possibility of a fortnights' postponement, and that the Preparatory Commission should be summoned as soon after this date as possible, assuming that by that date the Charter had come into force.

2. Hasluck and Noel-Baker took the lead in advocating that the First Assembly should not be purely an Organisational Assembly, but should discuss questions of substance. I supported them with concrete suggestion that the First Assembly meet two months after the conclusion of the Preparatory Commission, i.e., about January 15th or 21st.

3. I shall telegraph you immediately after this morning's meeting. Ends.

TELEGRAM 2616 London, September 11, 1945

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Robertson from Reid, Begins: United Nations Committee telegram No. 17.

1. My telegram No. 16 of today's date. The Committee this morning decided that the Preparatory Commission should be convoked to meet in London between November 1st and 12th, on the understanding that two weeks interval would elapse between the completion of the recommendations of the Executive Committee on organizational questions and the first meeting of the Preparatory Commission. The general feeling of the Committee is that it will not complete its work until the end of October. The probability, therefore, is that the Preparatory Commission will meet on November 12th.

2. At its next meeting, on Thursday morning, the Executive Committee will try to decide when the first session of the General Assembly will be held. Stettinius is still pushing for a meeting in December. My guess is that the date will be fixed for January 1st, that the January meeting will be "primarily organizational in character," but that opportunity will also be provided for a general discussion on questions of substance, and that the Assembly will adjourn to meet again two or three months later.

3. The Executive Committee will, therefore, be working at top speed during the whole of October. Lester told me yesterday that he has informed Wrong of the proposal that the Supervisory Commission meet from October 12th-20th. It would be most valuable if Wrong could be in London for the rest of the month of October.

4. Perhaps either you or he, and also Rasminsky, could be here for the Preparatory Commission's meeting, beginning November 12th and lasting probably for three weeks.

5. Delighted to learn from your telegram No. 2 of September 10th of Mr. Turgeon's expected arrival.

6. The only two Canadian memoranda which have been circulated are two on the Secretariat,† which are based on draft FAO papers and were prepared in accordance with Mr. Pearson's instructions.

7. All ten sub-committees will begin meeting next week, probably six a day, two at a time. Subject to your instructions, I intend to attend regularly the Committees on Assembly, Security Council and Secretariat. Perhaps Mr. Turgeon might be able to attend the Committee on the League, as well as Court.

At the Secretariat Committee meeting tomorrow a vote will be taken on the duration of the appointment of the first Secretary General, it being understood that the tenure of subsequent Secretary Generals might be different. Only the Soviet and Chinese delegates have spoken in favour of a short term, the Soviet mentioning three years. The majority of the Committee appears to favour either seven years with a possible re-appointment for a further three years, or a straight ten year term without re-eligibility. The latter will probably be favoured by the three Latin American delegates, since this is the rule adopted at Chapultepec for the Secretary Generalship of the Pan American Union.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] September 12, 1945

We are receiving a great volume of material, most of it of a technical nature, relating to the work of the Executive Committee of the United Nations Preparatory Commission in London, and I think you should have a note on how things are going.

With regard to our own representation, Mr. Turgeon should arrive there to take Pearson's place before the end of this week. I should like to strengthen our representation further by adding one or two competent junior men but at the moment I do not see how we can spare anyone else.

The timetable for getting the new organization under way is becoming clearer. Mr. Stettinius has suggested, on behalf of the United States Government, that the Executive Committee should finish by October 15th and that the full Preparatory Commission should then meet to consider the results, to be followed by the first meeting of the General Assembly in November, primarily to approve the necessary arrangements to get the Organization into active existence. This would include such matters as the election of the non-permanent members of the Security Council, the choice of members of the Social and Economic Council, the election of the Secretary General and a large number of other decisions.

Reid has just telegraphed that the probability is that the Executive Committee will not finish its work before the end of October and that the Preparatory Commission will meet about November 12th. He thinks that it will not be possible for an Assembly to be held until about January 1st and that the Assembly would be primarily organizational in character, although there would be an opportunity of discussion of some other questions of substance. The first regular Assembly would then be convened to meet in perhaps April of next year.

If matters turn out as Reid expects, we shall have to make provision for sending a delegation to an Assembly around Christmas. If that Assembly is concerned almost wholly with constitutional problems, the delegation need not be very large but it will have to include a number of those who were at San Francisco. The first regular Assembly, if it is held in the spring, would probably have a wide variety of business on its agenda and we might have to despatch a considerable delegation to it.

It seems on the whole most likely (although not yet by any means certain) that the headquarters of the new Organization will be established in the United States with San Francisco as the most probable choice in that country.

SECRET. Following for Reid from Robertson, Begins: U.N. Committee telegram No. 4.

1. Your telegrams 16 and 17 of September 11th. It is unlikely that we shall be able to decide on our representation on Preparatory Commission for some time. In view of the congested programme it seems probable that there will be considerable discussion at the first Assembly of the recommendations on matters of organization, since governments may not have time to consider these recommendations as a whole until the Assembly is convened. Wrong has informed Lester that it is doubtful whether he can attend the October meeting of the Supervisory Commission.

2. We are not sure that great importance attaches to arrangements for the Assembly to discuss questions of substance at its first meeting and I think you need not press for a broad agenda. In view of the difficulties encountered in the operation of the Executive Committee, it may turn out that the preparation of the agenda for the first regular session of the Assembly can be done more effectively after the Secretary General has been elected by a preliminary Assembly.

3. We shall shortly let you have our ideas on questions raised in your telegram No. 13 of September 10th concerning choice of non-permanent members of Council. We doubt that effective regulations on this can be drafted in a hurry. Ends.

2. I took advantage of the opportunity to put forward the suggestion which the Under-Secretary made on a number of occasions at the Coordination Committee in San Francisco, that new members should be required to accept the obligations of the Charter in some manner equally formal and binding as that in which the original members accepted the obligation.

3. I was asked to prepare a paper on the subject for the Committee but thought it wiser to suggest that the secretary to the committee prepare the paper.

Mémorandum du représentant suppléant, le Comité exécutif, la Commission préparatoire des Nations Unies

Memorandum by Alternate Representative, Executive Committee, United Nations Preparatory Commission

[London,] September 11, 1945

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

1. Provisions of Article 4.

(1) A state (other than an original member) must, in order to become a member of the United Nations, "accept the obligations contained in the . . . Charter."

(2) The Security Council must decide that the applicant state is able and willing to carry out these obligations.

(3) The Security Council must recommend to the Assembly that the Assembly admit the state to membership.

(4) The Assembly must decide that the state is able and willing to carry out the obligations contained in the Charter.

(5) The Assembly must decide to admit the state by a two thirds vote.

2. Original members "accept the obligations contained in the Charter" by signing and ratifying the Charter.

3. It is essential that before any other state becomes a member it should accept the obligations in same equally formal and binding manner.

4. The simplest way in which new members could accept the obligations contained in the Charter would be by signing and ratifying it. But Article 110(4) may unintentionally prevent this since it says that states which sign and ratify become original members and the purpose of Article 3 is to restrict the privilege of original membership to the states participating in the San Francisco Conference and Poland.

5. Instead therefore of signing and ratifying, a new member might sign and adhere.

6. It is suggested that the procedure for the admission of new states be as follows:

(1) The applicant state writes a formal note to the Secretary-General requesting admission to membership; the request is accompanied by formal evidence (e.g. a resolution passed by the national legislature by the appropriate majority) that the application is supported by the body whose consent is necessary to ratification of a treaty.

(2) The application is laid by the Secretary-General before the Security Council which decides whether the applicant state is able and willing to carry out the obligations of the Charter.

(3) If the application is approved by the Security Council, the Secretary-General lays it before the Assembly which sends it to a committee to report on whether the applicant state is willing and able to carry out the obligations of the Charter.

(4) The Assembly, after considering the committee's report, votes on whether to approve the application.

(5) If the Assembly approves of the application the Secretary-General informs the applicant state that its application has been approved of and that its membership will become effective on the date on which it presents to the Secretary-General an instrument of adherence (approved of by its constitutional organ whose consent is necessary to ratification of a treaty) and signs the Charter.

(6) If the General Assembly is in session the presentation of the instrument of adherence and the signature should take place with due solemnity at a public plenary meeting of the Assembly.

(7) If the Assembly is not in session the state will become a member by presenting the instrument of adherence to the Secretary-General and by signing the Charter at a public ceremony in his presence. A formal ceremony of admission to the Assembly will take place subsequently at the opening of the next Assembly.

Alternate Representative, Executive Committee, United Nations Preparatory Commission, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

No. 42 [London,] September 16, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

1. Under cover of my despatch No. 38 of September 15, I transmitted to you a copy of the minutes of the fifteenth meeting of the Executive Committee held on September 13.†

2. The only subject discussed at this meeting was the proposal of Mr. Stettinius for the speeding up of the work of the Committee. The draft of Mr. Stettinius' proposal which the Committee was working on was PC/EX/3 of September 13.†

3. In the course of the discussion Mr. Nervo, the delegate of Mexico, proposed a compromise under which the first General Assembly would be held in two parts, the first part being mainly organizational and the second part taking place after as short an adjournment as possible.

4. This proposal met immediately with the approval of the Australian and Chinese representatives and it seemed clear that it provided a possible basis for agreement by the Committee. In order to crystallize discussion I suggested that the last three paragraphs of Mr. Stettinius resolution should be redrafted in accordance with Mr. Nervo's suggestion and that in this redrafting we should be as precise as possible and stick to the language of the Charter and of the Interim arrangements. The substitute which I proposed for the last three paragraphs read as follows:

To recommend to the Preparatory Commission:

(a) That the first session be divided into two parts.

(b) That the first part should be primarily organizational in character, but prepared to refer urgent world problems to the organs of the United Nations established at this first meeting of the General Assembly.

(c) That the Assembly would then adjourn in order that the organs of the United Nations proceed promptly to organize themselves and undertake their respective tasks.

(d) That the second part of the first Session of the General Assembly should be convened as early in 1946 as the organization and work of the several organs of the United Nations permit."

5. This new draft was welcomed by the committee and M. Massigli, the chairman, urged that the committee immediately adopt it with a few verbal changes. In making this proposal M. Massigli must have realised that an immediate vote would have resulted in the Soviet delegation and their two followers either voting against the resolution or abstaining. He apparently felt that it was high time that the committee refused any longer to give in to the Soviet desire for excessive delay.

6. The Soviet, however, appealed for time for further consideration and a compromise was arrived at under which a vote would be taken without discussion at the beginning of the next meeting. In order to soften the blow to the Soviet a sub-committee was appointed to see if they could make a few minor changes in my draft in order to meet the Soviet position. When the sub-committee met the next morning Mr. Gromyko was in a much more conciliatory mood, with the result that without much difficulty we agreed on the addition of a new sub-paragraph which made it possible for the sub-committee to reach unanimity.

7. Even as drafted, however, the resolution of Mr. Stettinius was still in very imprecise terms and though its meaning might be clear to the members of the Executive Committee it would not be very clear to the other members of the Preparatory Commission. Consequently I suggested that when the resolution was sent out to the members of the Preparatory Commission there should be attached to it a draft of the agenda of the first part of the first session of the General Assembly.

8. This proposal, after a very brief discussion, was approved of unanimously by the sub-committee and as a result the committee on the General Assembly has held two long meetings on Friday and Saturday, September 14 and 15 in an effort to reach agreement on the draft agenda.

9. At yesterday afternoon's meeting, which lasted for three hours, we finally reached unanimous agreement on everything except the precise wording of a number of items and the draft agenda in this form will come before the Executive Committee tomorrow. Copies of it will be sent to you in the ordinary way under form letter despatch but for your convenience I enclose a copy.†

10. As soon as I brought forward my formula in the Committee it was supported by Mr. Hasluck of Australia. This aroused Mr. Gromyko's suspicion and he made a statement which Mr. Noel-Baker not unfairly paraphrased later. . . "some of the members of the committee who have views I do not like support this compromise and therefore I oppose it." Mr. Noel-Baker proceeded to give Mr. Gromyko a tough lecture on how impossible it would be for any committee to reach a compromise if the Soviet delegation took this line.

11. The net effect of the various decisions which it is likely that the Executive Committee is going to make, in the course of the next day or so, on the date, duration and nature of the meeting of the Preparatory Commission and of the first part of the first session of the General Assembly may be that the work which the Executive Committee would have done under Mr. Jebb's conception of its activities will, to a considerable extent, be done by committees appointed by the Assembly and sitting during the period of the Assembly adjournment.

12. No matter how you slice up the work of the organizing of the United Nations the total amount of work to be done remains the same. Some of it can be done by the Executive Committee and some by the Preparatory Commission, some by the first part of the first Assembly and some by the second part of the first Assembly. I had hoped that virtually the whole work would be done by the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission so that the organs of the United Nations when they first met could rubber-stamp the rules, regulations and recommendations which the fifty United Nations had, after intensive study in the Preparatory Commission, agreed to. From the point of view of the prestige of the United Nations I think this would have been a good idea since the United Nations could then have set an example of getting down to work on questions of substance virtually as soon as the first Assembly met. Unfortunately, as a result of Mr. Stettinius' pressure and the Soviet desire to have the first Assembly do as little as possible the compromise which we are about to adopt will mean that the General Assembly and the other organs of the United Nations will have to do a great deal of the organizing work after they have been set up.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au représentant suppléant, le Comité exécutif, la Commission préparatoire des Nation Unies

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, September 17, 1945

Dear Mr. Reid,

This letter contains some informal comment on your despatch No. 29 of September 10th† touching on points which arose in the Executive Committee and its sub-committees during the week ending on September 8th. With regard to the headquarters (your paras. 3-6) I would agree with the line taken by Mr. Gerig that the organs established by the Charter should have their headquarters in the same place and I think that you should support this line. I think it would also be convenient to have the headquarters of certain of the specialized agencies at the headquarters of the Organization, though not necessarily all of them. I would not, however, agree with Mr. Noel-Baker that it would be desirable to merge specialized agencies in the United Nations Organization. I think that the pattern of association is bound to vary in relation to the function performed. Would Mr. [Noel-]Baker extend his centralizing tendencies so as to include the I.L.O.?

We would certainly save time and trouble if English and French were recognized as the working languages of the Organization and also as the official languages. If other languages are included as official languages, the Organization may later be hung up by demands for translations of copious documents into Russian, Chinese and Spanish before they are considered. Therefore, if agreement can be secured on two languages only, this would have strong advantages on purely practical grounds (your paras. 7 and 8.)

With regard to the admission of new members, I think that the Soviet Government is anxious to secure the admission of the Eastern European ex-enemy states as soon as possible. We can scarcely oppose this provided that they have Governments which most of the United Nations are prepared to recognize. It would, however, be rather deplorable if Bulgaria, for example, were admitted to the United Nations before Sweden, Switzerland and Ireland.

I would agree with the line taken by Messrs. Gerig and Webster and yourself on the office of the Secretary-General as reported in your paragraph 10.[113] If the Security Council operates fairly smoothly from the start — and that is a large assumption — the Secretary-General's power of initiative will probably in fact become a reserve power. I feel, however, that full participation of the Secretary-General in the discussions of the Council should at least not be ruled out by anything in the rules of procedure. I am not sure about the wisdom of adopting a regulation forbidding the Secretary-General to take employment under his own government after he has vacated the office. It would be a rule which would be hard to enforce in practice and which might lead to reluctance on the part of a desirable candidate to accept the post. The aim on the whole is to be commended but I am hesitant about making it a rule.

With regard to the observations of the Soviet delegation reported in your paragraphs 13-15, we are, I am afraid, going to have a great deal of trouble with the Soviet Government over establishing a working relationship between the United Nations and the I.L.O. The Soviet Government's demand for "democratic changes" in the constitution of the I.L.O. is another irritating example of their abuse of the word democracy. It may prove necessary to define the relationship with the I.L.O. over Soviet opposition. It seems to me also rather absurd to argue that the declaration of January 1st, 1942, should be taken as having anything to do with the establishment of the new Organization and I assume that the Russians will not press this point.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

Alternate Representative, Executive Committee, United Nations Preparatory Commission, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

1. Unlike most of the other committees, the committee on the Secretariat has been making fairly rapid progress. This is fortunate because it has more work to do than any of the other committees.

2. The effectiveness of the committee is largely due to the ability of the chairman, Dr. Pelt, and to the fact that it has had as chief of section Mr. David Owen to begin with and now Mr. Martin Hill.[114] The work of the committee may slow down somewhat when its chairman, Dr. Gavrilovic[115] arrives, but perhaps by that time most of the work of the committee will be being done by sub-committees.

3. Mr. Roschin is the Soviet representative on the committee and like Professor Krylov is a lot more conciliatory than Mr. Gromyko.

4. On the whole the Soviet line on this committee has not been extreme, though most of the differences of opinion are usually between the Soviet group on the one side and the rest of the committee on the other.

5. Up to the present the main discussion has been over the office of Secretary-General and Dr. Pelt and Mr. Martin Hill are now preparing the first draft of a report on this subject which will be submitted to the committee at one of its early meetings.

6. The only question of substance on which the committee has so far voted is the term of office of the Secretary-General. After long discussion it became clear that all the members of the committee except the Soviet group favoured either a five year term renewable for five years, or a seven year term renewable for three years, or a straight ten year term. The committee, therefore, had to decide whether to state this in its report or to attempt to reach a compromise which two-thirds of the members of the committee would support. The compromise suggested was a five year term subject to a five year renewal and in accordance with your instructions[116] I supported this compromise which was adopted unanimously by the committee, with the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia abstaining from voting and with Mexico and Iran absent.

7. As I have reported before, the feeling of the majority of the members of the committee is that the Secretary-General should not take office under any national government after his retirement. Tentatively, however, the committee has decided against putting this in its report, but I think the matter will be reopened when we discuss the actual draft of the report.

8. I should, therefore, be grateful if you would inform me by telegram of the line which you would like me to take on this. My feeling is that some reference at least should be made in the report to the belief of the majority of the Committee that it is undesirable that an ex-Secretary-General should take office under any national government. I am not sure whether we should go further and recommend that it be a condition of the appointment of the Secretary-General that he agree not to take office under any national government after his retirement.[117]

9. The rule which is applied to the Secretary-General should perhaps logically be applied also to at least one of his principal assistants, the man who will be in charge of the political and security division or department of the Secretariat, since he also will become the repository of the confidences of member states. Even if both these men are precluded from accepting office under a national government they ought to find no difficulty in making a living since other international organizations, both official and unofficial, would be glad to secure their services and they would also, if they turned out to be first-rate men, be offered high academic posts.

10. The Committee has just begun the discussion on the number and nature of the principal officers of the Secretariat. I prepared a rough draft of a memorandum on this subject which I showed to Professor Webster, Mr. Gerig (United States representative) and Dr. Pelt. Dr. Pelt and Mr. Gerig told me that they were in substantial agreement with it and that they thought it would be useful if I put it before the Committee. I, therefore, had it submitted (PC/EX/SEC/14, Sept. 15).† It was put before the Committee on Saturday morning after the discussion on the subject had been going on for an hour or so, and its submission was welcomed by the Committee and served to crystallize the discussion.[118]

11. The only substantial point of difference which has so far emerged in the discussions in the Committee on the principal officers is that the Soviet delegation wish to have a separate director and division of the Secretariat on

The memorandum proposed that there should be no deputy secretary-general and that the principal officers should be the directors of divisions, of whom the senior in precedence could become Acting Secretary-General in the event of the absence or incapacity of the Secretary-General.

Assembly matters and a separate director and division on Security Council matters. Professor Webster gave general support to the Soviet position. His argument seemed to be that since the Council had primary responsibility in political and security matters the section of the Secretariat dealing with these matters should come directly under the Council.

12. The compromise which Mr. Gerig favoured was that there should be one department on political and security matters and that under this department there would be three divisions, each under a director: a political division, a security division and a military staff committee division. The third division would serve only the Security Council but the other two would serve both the Security Council and the General Assembly. I had made very much the same suggestion in presenting my paper, since I had said there would be a military staff committee section of the political and security division.

13. Mr. Gerig and I have been asked to prepare a common proposal to go before the next meeting of the committee and I do not think we will have any difficulty in reaching an agreement.

14. In presenting my memorandum, I, of course, emphasized that like all other papers submitted by delegations at this time it did not bind the Canadian delegation but was merely a working paper submitted as a basis for discussion.

15. In putting forward the suggestion that there should be one political and security division of the Secretariat I said that both the Assembly and the Security Council had responsibilities in the political and security field; the line of demarcation between the responsibilities of each had been laid down in the Charter, but it was impossible to define precisely the boundary between the responsibility and powers of each organ and that it was, therefore, necessary to face the fact that it was virtually inevitable that there would be a struggle for power between the Assembly and the Security Council in the political and security field.

16. Even though the struggle might be inevitable we should do our best to ensure that it did not extend down through the Secretariat but that the Secretariat remained in fact as well as in theory a joint Secretariat for both organs of the United Nations; it would be most dangerous if some people in the Secretariat came to be known as "Assembly men" and some as "Security Council men."

17. When you have received the joint proposals of Mr. Gerig and myself which Mr. Martin Hill is now drafting, I should be most grateful if you would let me know by telegram what you think of them.

18. The interpretation of the first sentence of paragraph [?] of Article 101 of the Charter which refers to appropriate staffs being "primarily assigned" to organs of the United Nations, has caused difficulty in the Committee. I said that my interpretation was that the Secretary-General has complete authority to move specialists from one division of the Secretariat to another division, but that he must always provide each organ with an adequate specialist staff.

19. An interesting discussion took place at the second meeting of the Committee (PC/EX/SEC/4 Sept. 4) on the general character of the Secretariat and problems of its recruitment. Mr. Noel-Baker pushed hard for the creation of an international civil service commission which would protect the Secretary-General against pressure from member nations. Mr. Roschin made the point that one could not interpret the criterion of the "highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity" as applying only to short run considerations. He argued that in the short run the most efficient secretariat might be one recruited from one single state, but that in the long run the Secretariat could only be efficient if it were recruited on a wide geographical basis. I thought it wise to support him on this and to point out that the Committee had indeed already decided that, even though you might get the most efficient initial Secretariat by appointing a large number of rather young men, nevertheless long run considerations of efficiency demanded that in the initial appointments a proper age balance should be established in order to provide reasonable chances for promotion and to give the Secretary-General continuous opportunities of adjusting his staff to changing needs.

20. Mr. Roschin had said that Soviet citizens would have difficulty in qualifying for posts on the Secretariat on pure grounds of efficiency and competence because of language difficulties and because there were few people in the Soviet Union who had training in the problems of international administration. In order to help overcome these difficulties I suggested that, to begin with, a large number of probationary appointments should be made to the Secretariat of persons who do not possess an adequate knowledge of one of the two working languages, English and French, and who had not had experience in international administration. These probationaries, during the one or two years of their probationary period, would then receive "In-service training" in the administrative methods of the organization and in language so that the best of them at the end of their probation would be qualified to be given permanent appointments. These suggestions were welcomed by the Committee and will, I think, find their way into the final report. Having gone thus far to meet the Soviet position I thought I could launch an attack on the argument which Mr. Roschin, supported by Mr. Victor Hoo and Mr. Lisicky (Czechoslovakia) had put forward, that the Secretariat should include persons capable of representing the present views of their governments. I said that it seemed to me that the seat where the headquarters of the Organization was located was going to be full of people representing the present views of their governments, that there will indeed be an embarrassing wealth of talent for the Secretary-General to consult. Most, if not all, members would maintain a diplomatic mission at the headquarters, the head of which would probably have the rank of Ambassador, the states represented on the Security Council would have permanent representatives who might not necessarily be the same as their ambassador to the United Nations, the national representatives on the Economic and Social Council and Trusteeship Council would be visiting the headquarters frequently and the headquarters would also be visited by special missions. Moreover it is possible that the United Nations would have branch offices throughout the world and these could report on the views of national governments.

I have etc.

SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

Sir,

1. The most interesting development in the committee on specialized agencies has been the drive by the United Kingdom delegation for a much closer integration of the specialized agencies with the United Nations than was contemplated by the framers of the San Francisco Charter.

2. The general approach by the United Kingdom delegation is set forth in the two papers which they have submitted (SA/8 and SA/9 of Sept. 7)† Mr. Fleming, the United Kingdom representative on the committee, made clear at the meeting of the committee on September 10 that there had been a change in United Kingdom policy since San Francisco. He said that they now felt rather more strongly than at San Francisco that there may be room for new specialized agencies which could, under their basic instruments, accept a greater degree of control by the United Nations. They were also now more strongly in favour than at San Francisco, of a common secretariat and a common budget for the specialized agencies of the United Nations.

3. The United Kingdom paper immediately precipitated attacks from the other members of the committee, particularly M. Raoul Aglion, the French representative. I took the general line which the Under-Secretary had taken on the Coordination Committee at San Francisco that satisfactory working arrangements between the specialized agencies and the United Nations could be secured only as the result of a freely negotiated agreement between the United Nations and the specialized agencies and that we would prejudice our chances of getting such an agreement if the language used in any recommendation of the committee could be interpreted by a specialized agency to mean that we were going to try to bludgeon them into giving up their autonomy. I also said that we ought to distinguish clearly between agreements with existing specialized agencies which had to be negotiated and agreements with new specialized agencies which might be created on the initiative of the organization under Article 59. Such an agency might under its constitution be made virtually subordinate to the United Nations.

4. I also took advantage of the opportunity to draw attention to the fact that the agreements with the agencies, though negotiated by the Economic and Social Council, would be between the agency and the whole organization; that under Article 65 the Economic and Social Council was required to assist the Security Council, upon its request; that under Article 48, paragraph 2, the decisions of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security were to be carried out by the members of the United Nations through their action in the appropriate international agencies of which they are members; that the Security Council would no doubt request the Economic and Social Council to include in an agreement with a specialized agency a provision under which that agency would be subject to the orders of the Security Council relating to the imposition of economic sanctions and that the members of the United Nations were bound by the Charter to support, within the specialized agencies, the inclusion of such a provision in the agreement.

5. A summary of this discussion is contained in the report of the fifth meeting of the committee held on September 13 (SA/14).†

I have etc.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

I sent you a note the other day[119] on the anticipated timetable for bringing the United Nations Organization into active existence. I attach a copy of a telegram of September 17th† which gives the text of a resolution passed by the Executive Committee that day. While exact dates for the various meetings cannot yet be determined the general programme is now fairly clear. It is as follows:

1. Executive Committee to complete its report to the Preparatory Commission by November 1st at latest and if possible by October 15th.

2. Full Preparatory Commission (on which all signatories of the Charter are represented) to meet a fortnight later provided that the Charter has been ratified by twenty-nine states, including the great powers. It seems likely that the necessary ratification will have been deposited within the next month or so and it is, therefore, probable that the Preparatory Commission will meet in the first half of November.

3. The Preparatory Commission to convene the General Assembly as soon as possible after it has taken the necessary action on the report of the Executive Committee with a target date of December 4th. I should think that this date was unlikely to be realized and that the Assembly would more probably not come together until three or four weeks later.

4. The first Assembly to deal at once with the steps necessary to organize the United Nations, including the establishment of the Security Council and the Social and Economic Council and the election of the Secretary General. At its first meetings the Assembly might also refer to these other organs of the United Nations urgent world problems.

5. The Assembly then to adjourn so that the other organs may begin to operate and to meet again in the second part of its first session early in 1946 (not later than April 25th) to discharge its regular functions.

The Executive Committee seems to be getting down to work fairly rapidly after long delays at the beginning. It is operating now mainly in ten sub-committees. The programme, however, is certainly on the optimistic side from the point of view of timing since it seems to assume fairly ready agreement by the Executive Committee with the reports of its sub-committees, by the Preparatory Commission with the proposals of the Executive Committee and by the General Assembly with the proposals of the Preparatory Commission. If we are to seek representation on both the Security Council and the Social and Economic Council, we shall probably have to do a little private electioneering, and I think that we should reach a decision on this in the near future. Our part in the war would seem to me certainly to entitle us to representation on the Security Council and our general economic importance qualifies us for membership on the Social and Economic Council which has eighteen members all elected by the Assembly.

CONFIDENTIAL. Following for Turgeon from Robertson, Begins: U.N. COMMITTEE telegram No. 6. Reid's telegram No. 13 of September 10th.

1. Our feeling is that it will not prove possible to draft now satisfactory regulations governing the election of non-permanent members of the Council and we think it preferable that this should be deferred. It may prove easier to prepare rules when the Council is a going concern with only three vacancies occurring annually.

2. The criteria of Article 23 have been followed fairly successfully in selecting the 14 members of the Executive Committee. Perhaps the most satisfactory approach to the problems of the first Assembly is to consider how best to reduce from 9 to 6 the number of smaller states now represented on the Executive Committee. The countries which could most properly be eliminated would include Chile, one of Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, and one other which might be Iran or Australia. It is to be remembered that three of those chosen for the first Council will serve for only a one year term.

3. Among the arguments against preparing definite regulations at present are the following:

(a) Relevant tests of the criteria in Article 23 will be the military commitments to be made under Article 43 and the scale of contributions yet to be established.

(b) An important consideration omitted necessarily from Article 23 is the condition of dependency on a permanent member of the Council. If exact standards were formulated, we might find it hard to resist a demand for the election of the Ukraine.

(c) Until all the United Nations organs are in operation it cannot be judged which members contribute most to the economic, social and other purposes of the Organization.

(d) In its first years at any rate one of the best guides to the relative contribution of members is what they accomplished during the war.

I suggest that you should talk on these lines privately in the first place to Webster and others, without repudiating the idea which we sponsored in San Francisco that regulations ought eventually to be adopted by the Assembly. Ends.

Le haut commissaire par intérim en Grande-Bretagne au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

PERSONAL AND SECRET London, September 21, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson,

1. Noel-Baker had a dinner of about a dozen people of the British Commonwealth on Friday night, September 14, to discuss various problems relating to the Executive Committee. The Australians were Evatt, Hasluck and Tange; the Canadians Mr. Turgeon, Hudd, Holmes and myself; the United Kingdom Noel-Baker and C. K. Webster; the South Africans were represented by the High Commissioner, Nichols, and New Zealand by their Acting High Commissioner, Campbell.

2. The day before the dinner Noel-Baker had told me in the strictest confidence that he was having great difficulty with Stettinius who was putting very heavy pressure on him to force him to agree to his proposals on the dates and character of the meetings of the Preparatory Commission and General Assembly. While Noel-Baker was willing to compromise on the date of January 1 for the General Assembly, he saw great practical difficulties in the way of holding the Assembly in London beginning the first week in December.

3. Stettinius said that if the Assembly could not be held here in December it would have to be held in the United States in January and that he could rally China and the Soviet Union to his side. He then pressed Noel-Baker for a meeting of the Big Five in order that the Big Five should present the Executive Committee with an agreed recommendation.

4. Noel-Baker said to me that he greatly disliked the Big Five arranging these things behind the scenes and that he would be in a stronger position to resist the drive for secret meetings of the Big Five members of the Executive Committee if I would raise the matter at the Commonwealth dinner, since he was sure that Evatt would pick up the ball.

5. During the discussion after dinner, when we had spent some time in discussing the possible headquarters of the United Nations and a possible secretary-general, I raised the question of Big Five meetings, saying little more than what was contained in your telegram to me, No. 1863 of August 15. Evatt, of course, immediately jumped at the bait and reinforced my argument by citing with approval Mr. Mackenzie King's recent telegram about five power meetings.[120]

6. The results, I think, have been beneficial in two ways — we have been able to make again the point made in your telegram No. 1863 and Noel-Baker has been provided with some additional ammunition to use when discussing with Bevin and Attlee how far the United Kingdom ought to go in resisting the pressure of Gromyko and Stettinius for five power penthouse meetings.

7. The main subject discussed at the dinner was the location of the permanent headquarters of the United Nations. Noel-Baker put forward his arguments for Geneva, to which I gave general support in accordance with the guidance given me in Wrong's letter to me of August 30.[121]

8. Evatt plumped hard for San Francisco on the ground of its proximity to the Far East.

9. He got, however, no support from the other people present. The South African and New Zealand representatives expressed their own personal preference for Geneva though they were careful to say that they did not know what the views of their governments were.

10. In my brief intervention I emphasized the severely practical consideration that if we were to go anywhere else but Geneva we would have to camp for the first few critical years of the life of the Organization.

11. Noel-Baker linked together the choice of the secretary-general and the choice of the headquarters. He has told Stettinius that if the headquarters is in Europe he would support the choice of a United States citizen as secretary general. "Within these four walls and not for repetition outside" he said that the three Americans he had in mind were Winant, Eisenhower and Stassen.[122] The only other name suggested in the course of the discussion was Bruce[123] of Australia, whose name was put forward by the New Zealand representative. My guess is that [Noel-]Baker shows a lack of knowledge of American politics in believing that Stassen would consider the appointment; that as long as Stassen believes that he has a chance for the Republican nomination for the Presidency in either three or seven years time he would not accept the post; and that even though all the other possible candidates for the Republican nomination are ganging up against him, I should not imagine that he has yet given up the fight as hopeless.

12. The possibility of course remains that he might accept the appointment and then, after two years, resign in order to campaign for the Republican nomination, but this would be hardly fair to the Organization and I do not think he would do it.

13. Winant's virtues are obvious but he suffers from the great drawback that the delivery of a public speech is such a travail and heavy burden to him that the process is as painful to the audience as to himself. Out of Noel-Baker's list it seems therefore that Eisenhower is the only possibility. Whether he would take it is another matter. He, of course, suffers from having no direct knowledge and experience of the discussions at Dumbarton Oaks, San Francisco and here which are leading up to the organization of the United Nations.

14. I am sending a copy of this letter to Canada House.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

TELEGRAM 2733 London, September 21, 1945

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Reid, Begins: United Nations Committee telegram No. 26. General Assembly.

1. The Netherlands delegation is informally sounding out a number of members of the Committee on a draft proposal which they are considering introducing providing for the establishment of a subsidiary organ of the General Assembly under some such title as "Standing Committee of the General Assembly on Peace and Security." Pelt consulted me yesterday and hopes to give me today draft of proposed text which I shall telegraph to you[†] in view of its importance.

2. Pelt advances the following arguments:

(a) Such an organ would operate when the Assembly is not in session. Failure to set it up will increase the probability that the General Assembly will remain in continuous session with a series of adjournments in order that its Political and Security Committee can remain in existence throughout the year. This may not be contrary to the letter of the Charter but it may be difficult to reconcile with its spirit, especially in the light of the provisions for special as well as annual sessions.

(b) The General Assembly is charged under the Charter with serious responsibilities in the political and security field (see paragraph 2, page 35, of our report to Parliament). The existence of a permanent subsidiary organ making studies, reports and recommendations to the General Assembly would lessen the danger that the Assembly might discuss delicate issues in an unwise and even dangerous fashion.

(c) The need for having a large number of special sessions of the Assembly to discuss urgent political and security questions would be diminished. A custom might grow up under which member States would refrain from asking for a special session unless the calling of such a session had been recommended by the subsidiary organ.

(d) The Assembly has the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council to advise it on the carrying out of two of its important responsibilities but has no similar organ to advise it on the carrying out of its most important responsibility, that in the political and security field. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL. You may have seen Reid's telegram 2734 of September 21st concerning sub-committees of Executive Committee. We are concerned that it is proving impossible in London to attend or follow proceedings of sub-committees dealing with finance, the Social and Economic Council and relations with specialized agencies. If papers are not read until they reach here, there will be considerable delay and in any event we cannot form here a clear impression of course of discussions and general atmosphere.

We realize pressure under which Canada House is working but hope you can arrange with Turgeon and Reid for proceedings in these three sub-committees to be followed by members of your staff. This need not mean attendance at sub-committee meetings but papers should be read in London and points of interest to Canada discussed with representatives on Executive Committee. The sub-committee on Trusteeship can be left alone for the present.

Please discuss with Turgeon and Reid what can be done and report joint views.

1. I doubt the wisdom of pressing for adoption at this stage of proposal for a Standing Assembly Committee on Peace and Security. Further to my telegram No. 2753, September 24th,† regarding proceedings of sub-Committees of the Executive Committee United Nations.

1. Reid tells me that it is now probable that the ten Committees will conclude their activities on October 10th, so that Executive Committee can approve the final report on October 15th. The Finance Committee had its first meeting today, but the Committees on the Economic and Social Council and on Relations with Specialized Agencies are now more than half way through their work, and it would be difficult for someone who is new to the problems to know what points were of particular interest to Canada.

2. It now seems probable that the Preparatory Commission will meet for three weeks or more beginning November 1st, will break up into Committees and will be expected to complete the work which the Executive Committee is going to be unable to do itself. Therefore, there would be an opportunity, if Canada is adequately represented at the Preparatory Commission, for us to have the reports of the Committees on which we are not represented revised to fit our views.

I should be grateful for your views.

IMMEDIATE. CONFIDENTIAL. Following for Wrong from Reid, Begins: United Nations Committee telegram No. 38. My telegram No. 30 of September 27th.†

1. The Assembly Committee will shortly have to vote on the following proposal:

The President of the Preparatory Commission, as the temporary President of the First General Assembly, should nominate, say, ten States as members of a Nominating Committee; this Committee should limit itself to the nomination of the President and Vice-Presidents of the Assembly and the Chairman of its Committees who would together form the General Committee of the Assembly; in proposing candidates for these offices the Nominating Committee should take into account personal competence and geographical distribution; the General Assembly and the Committees concerned would retain the right to accept or reject the nominations or to make additional nominations from the floor.

2. It seems to me that, since the members of the First Assembly will know each others capacities well because they will have worked together in the Preparatory Commission, the case for a Nominating Committee in the First Assembly may be weaker than for a Nominating Committee in subsequent Assemblies. The Soviet group insist that the Nominating Committee should nominate States for Chairman of the Committees and not persons.

3. I should be grateful for your guidance on the two questions of a Nominating Committee for the first and for subsequent Assemblies. My personal inclination would be to vote in favour of a Nominating Committee, on the following conditions:

(1) That it nominate persons purely on grounds of personal competence for the Chairmanship and Vice-Chairmanship of Committees, subject to the one qualification that not more than one Committee Chairman should come from any one State;

(2) That the nominations of either States or the first delegates of States as Vice-Presidents of the Assembly should be such as to ensure an adequate geographical distribution of membership of the General Committee.

4. We are, I assume, opposed to this Nominating Committee or any other Committee being given the right to nominate members of the Councils. Ends.

1. On the question of whether there should be one or two Assembly Committees in the economic and social fields, we strongly support the view expressed by the majority in the Sub-Committee, i.e. that there should be two Committees.

2. While it is true that all the subject matter of the Economic and Social Council is part of the welfare work of the Organization, different types of experience will be required for the consideration of different aspects of the work. We fear that as a result of having only one Assembly Committee, not all of the problems will receive adequate consideration. Ends.

TELEGRAM 2318 Ottawa, October 4, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL. Following for Reid from Wrong, Begins: U.N. Tel. No. 13. Your telegram No. 36. Rules of procedure for the Assembly.

We are in general agreement with the Secretariat text† of the draft rules of procedure of the General Assembly and with most of the tentative suggestions put forward by the Canadian delegation for the amendment of the Secretariat draft. We have the following comments to make.

(a) With regard to Rule 7, paragraph 3 of the Secretariat draft, you suggest substituting "the senior Vice-President shall act as President" to take the place of the Secretariat draft provision that the President shall "appoint a Vice-President to take his place." It does not seem desirable to introduce the idea of seniority among the Vice-Presidents. The Secretariat draft therefore seems preferable on this point.

(b) Your suggestion regarding Rule 5, paragraph 3 of the Secretariat draft is that reports from the International Court of Justice and from "subsidiary organs of the General Assembly" shall be added to the list of reports to be placed on the provisional agenda of the regular session of the Assembly. We are in agreement regarding reports from the International Court of Justice, but are not clear as to the precise meaning of your suggestion regarding "reports from subsidiary organs." Reports from such organs as the Economic and Social Council, Trusteeship Council and Security Council are already provided for, whereas genuinely subsidiary organs such as e.g. a commission on employment, should report not direct to the General Assembly but through the organ to which they are responsible. In the case of an employment commission, for instance, this would be the Economic and Social Council.

(c) Rule 2, paragraph 2 of the Secretariat draft. Your suggestion is that in the case of special sessions, the summons shall be addressed to the Members not less than 10 days before the date fixed for the opening of the session, rather than 15 days as proposed by the Secretariat. On balance we prefer the 15-day period suggested by the Secretariat. Ends.

Your telegram No. 2861 of October 2. United Nations Committee.

1. We consider the working paper on financial arrangements† presented by the United Kingdom delegation to be a satisfactory basis. It proposes in effect the adoption of the system developed by the League of Nations with certain modifications to meet current conditions.

2. It should, however, be made clear that the temporary use of the scale provisionally adopted for the budget of the Food and Agriculture Organisation carries no suggestion that this scale would be satisfactory to us for the United Nations since the scale does not apply the principle of relative capacity to pay in the case of the United States and probably some other countries.

3. We are consulting the Department of Finance on the United Kingdom proposals and may have some further comments later.

Rules of Procedure Security Council.

1. I have been told informally by the United States delegation that they are under hard and fast instructions from Washington to resist an elaboration of the provisional agenda and the rules of procedure of the Security Council. These instructions apparently come from the Army and Navy and are supported by Pasvolsky. Some of the United States delegates strongly disapprove of these instructions but feel that the utmost they can secure as a compromise is that agenda and rules should be somewhat expanded beyond the United States proposals and that the accompanying report from the Committee should include a statement of the urgent problems which the Security Council will have to deal with once it has exhausted its provisional agenda, and also a statement of the problems which it will have to face in drawing up its permanent rules of procedure.

2. Without making any statement to this effect, I am falling in with this line and the United Kingdom appears to be taking the same position.

3. This does not, however, preclude us continuing to work on extensive permanent rules of procedure for the Security Council in order that, when the Security Council meets, either the Secretariat or some of its members can present the Council with a carefully worked out and complete draft. Emphasized the qualifications on the covering page of the rules of procedure I presented and have, therefore, refused to defend such principles as that of rotation of Chairmanship. I agree, however, with the virtually unanimous opinion of the Committee that the provisional rule which had the best chance of being accepted without debate at the first meeting of the Security Council would be rotation among all eleven States in alphabetical order, each State holding the position for one month, reserving, however, the right of the Canadian delegation to support an alternative proposal, if that alternative proposal were better and were politically feasible. Ends.

SECRET. Following for Reid from Wrong, Begins: United Nations telegram No. 5.

Your telegram No. 41 of October 6th. We feel it best, as you suggest, not to press for adoption by Executive Committee of very detailed rules of procedure. Some of the matters covered in your draft† are probably better worked out as a result of experience than prescribed in advance. For example, we prefer Secretariat draft† to your proposed Rules 1, 3, and 7. Your Chapters XII and XIII also seem to provide rather too elaborate a code to start with.

2. There is much to be said, however, for your Rule 16[127] in place of the Secretariat's Article VIII, which would make it possible for a single member, by absenting himself, to prevent all discussion in the Security Council.

3. We are rather concerned lest difficulties arise over the distinction made in both drafts between consideration at ordinary and at periodic meetings of the Security Council. It seems very difficult to lay down in advance what special rules should govern periodic meetings.

4. While we would prefer to see the omission of paragraph 7 of Article IX of the Secretariat draft, probably the best that can be done now is to seek to postpone a decision, and you might confine your argument to urging omission of a definite rule at present.

5. With regard to the agenda for the first meeting of the Security Council, we doubt whether in present circumstances a general discussion of the state of the world would be productive. Ends.

Mémorandum du deuxième secrétaire, le haut commissariat en Grande-Bretagne

Memorandum by Second Secretary, High Commission in Great Britain

[London,] November 6, 1945

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE 7 ON BUDGETARY AND FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

1. Contributions. The work of Committee 7 was made much lighter by a decision which was reached at an early stage, that the question of contributions should not be considered in any detail. It was recognized that the responsibility for apportioning contributions had been placed by Article 17 of the Charter on the General Assembly. It was also felt that this was a question with far greater political implications than any of the other matters with which the Committee had to deal. Accordingly, it was decided to recommend that a Standing Expert Committee on Contributions should be established at the First Part of the First Meeting of the Assembly and should be charged with the responsibility of working out a proper scale of contributions. (Recommendation 6.)

The Committee restricted itself to listing some of the dangers which have to be avoided in apportioning contributions. The Netherlands delegate pointed out that some countries might wish to pay too little for reasons of economy, while other countries might wish to pay too much for reasons of prestige. In accordance with the instructions contained in telegram No. 2243 of the 27th September, I pointed out that there was a third danger: if the smaller countries could not be persuaded to pay their full share and if a limit was put on contributions from the largest countries, the middle countries might find themselves called upon to pay a disproportionate contribution and this inequity might prejudice the United Nations Organization in the eyes of their people. As an example of the danger to be avoided, I mentioned the International Labour Office scale where the United States pays 110 units and Canada 35 units. You will find a reference to my remarks in the Summary Report of the Fifth Meeting of the Committee, which I have attached.† It was as a result of this argument that the sentence, "If a ceiling is imposed on contributions, the ceiling should not be such as seriously to obscure the relation between a country's contribution and its capacity to pay" was inserted into paragraph 7 of the Report.† The question of whether or not there should be a ceiling was left in abeyance. But one point of interest emerged from the short and inconclusive discussion. The United States delegate believed that there should be a ceiling, while the United Kingdom delegate assumed that capacity to pay would be taken as the sole criterion and would not be modified by the imposition of either a maximum or minimum. The United States delegate argued (and I think with some justice) that, if the United States contributed strictly in accordance with its capacity to pay, the size of its contribution might seem to give it a dangerous weight in the work of the Organisation. In my own view, we should not dismiss out of hand the advisability of setting a ceiling on contributions. I think it might have real political advantages and, if care were taken to adjust the contributions of other countries below those affected by the ceiling, I think it could be fitted into a scale which would avoid the embarrassment in which the I.L.O. scale has involved us.

Until the first budget of the Organisation has been approved at the Second Part of the First Meeting of the Assembly, funds must be found through some interim arrangements. These are set out in paragraph 10 of the Report which provides for contributions to an Emergency Working Capital Fund based essentially on the scale of the Food and Agricultural Organisation. The use of this scale was originally suggested in a paper submitted by the United Kingdom delegation. In accordance with the instructions received in telegram No. 2320 of the 2nd [5th] October, I requested that the provisional nature of the use of this scale should be made clear. The Australian delegate also wished this fact to be put beyond doubt. As a result of our representations, the sentence, "It should be stressed that the use of the F.A.O. scale is merely a matter of convenience and is in no sense a precedent for any assessment of any contribution" was written into this paragraph.

2. Combination of Committee 6 and 7 at the Preparatory Commission Stage. You will notice that it is recommended that the Preparatory Commission should appoint an Administrative and Budgetary Committee as one of its eight committees (Recommendation 8) or, in other words, that the present Committees 6 and 7 should be combined at the Preparatory Commission stage.

This recommendation was proposed by the United States delegation. It is an expression of their general view that administrative and budgetary concerns are closely inter-related and should be considered together. This view was put forward the more continuously and strenuously because the chief United States delegate on the Committee was Mr. Eric H. Biddle of the Office of the Budget in Washington.

3. Location of the Budgetary Functions. At another point, however, the United States delegation was unable to get this view translated into a recommendation in the Report. The original paper submitted by the United Kingdom delegation had proposed that, when the system was in full working order, the preparation of the budget should be entrusted to the Treasurer of the Organisation. Mr. Biddle argued that the budget is an instrument of high policy and that its preparation should, therefore, be a function of the Executive. He proposed that there should be a Director of the Budget on the Secretary-General's own staff. This proposal was belatedly supported by the Soviet delegation at the Sixth Meeting of the Committee, but it did not win support elsewhere.

In my own opinion, this is a technical question and of no great importance. After listening at length to Mr. Biddle's argument, which was plentifully interspersed with such terms as "estimate appraisers" and "administrative analysts" and with references to the General Motors Corporation of America, I still could not make up my mind as to whether it would be wiser to adopt the United States or the British system of handling the budget for the new Organisation. However, I think it would be useful if the Canadian delegation to the Preparatory Commission could come equipped with a view on this question.

4. Canadian Representation at the Preparatory Commission Stage. With the exception of the question of contributions (which will not now be considered again until the Assembly has met), the Committee did not have to deal with any questions which arouse political debate. Nor did any of the matters dealt with require the attention of a trained economist. Most of the discussion was a perfectly amicable consideration of what administrative and financial devises would be best adapted to ensure the smooth and efficient conduct of the Organisation. In my opinion, Canada would be most usefully represented on the parallel committee of the Preparatory Commission by someone, not necessarily with any formal training in economics, who has had wide experience in large-scale administration.

INTRODUCTION

1. The introduction to the report of the Executive Committee to the Preparatory Commission sets forth the constitution and terms of reference of the Executive Committee.

2. The Executive Committee held thirty-six meetings, the first on August 16, 1945, the thirty-sixth on November 22, 1945. It held no meetings between October 27 and November 22.

3. The chief delegate of Canada from August 16 to 29 was Mr. L. B. Pearson. From August 30 to September 16, and at the meeting on November 22, the acting chief delegate was Mr. Escott Reid. From September 17 to October 27, the chief delegate was the Honourable W. F. A. Turgeon K.C. In the periods in which he was not chief delegate Mr. Reid was alternative delegate.

4. The attached "Directory of the Delegations, Committees and Secretariat"† gives the representation of Canada on the ten committees. Canada was continuously represented on Committees 1, 3 and 6 by Mr. Reid. From September 17 on Canada was continuously represented on Committees 5, 9 and 10 by Mr. Turgeon. Canada was represented on Committee 7 by Mr. D. V. Le Pan. Mr. Reid attended a few meetings of Committee 3 and about a third of the meetings of Committee 8. Canada was not actively represented on Committee 4.

5. Though Mr. Holmes is included in the official directory as secretary of the delegation he was unfortunately unable, owing to pressure of other duties arising especially out of work in connection with the Five Power meeting,[131] to give time to the work of the delegation.

THE STRUCTURE OF THE REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

6. The report of the Executive Committee distinguishes between the "recommendations and positive proposals" on the one hand and the "appendices" on the other. The recommendations and positive proposals, unless it is specifically stated to the contrary, are to be regarded as agreed by the fourteen delegations (not the fourteen governments) as a suitable basis for the work of the Preparatory Commission. The appendices are put forward with the same object but more tentatively. The recommendations and the proposals are "working documents" subject to revision by the Preparatory Commission.

7. Thus the Canadian Government is not bound by the recommendations and positive proposals in the report and is free at the Preparatory Commission to propose amendments to them.

8. Part I of the report is a brief introduction. Part II contains all the formal recommendations. Part III is divided into ten chapters, one for each of the ten committees of the Executive Committee. Each chapter begins with the appropriate recommendations. (The recommendations thus appear twice in the report, once in Part I and once in Part II). The recommendations are followed by positive proposals such as provisional agendas and provisional rules of procedure. Seven chapters conclude with an appendix or appendices. The appendices are not uniform in character. A few are summaries of the main considerations taken into account by the committee in arriving at its recommendations. Others elaborate the recommendations. Others are papers submitted by national delegations or are extracts from the records of Committee or Executive Committee meetings.

9. Part IV gives the terms of reference of the ten committees and the report ends with an annex which gives the text of the Interim Arrangements concluded at San Francisco setting up the Preparatory Commission and the Executive Committee.

SECTION 3

THE MAIN DIFFERENCES OF OPINION WITHIN THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

10. The amount of agreement reached between the fourteen delegations in the ten weeks of the Executive Committee's work is most encouraging. The main points of difference have been narrowed down to seven, and on only three of these is the minority composed of the Soviet group — the U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. The seven main points of difference are:

(1) An organic versus a functional organization of the Secretariat;

(2) The relative importance of the criterion of equitable geographical distribution and the criterion of personal competence in the selection of chairmen of the working committees of the Assembly and of advisory committees of experts;

(3) The amount of preparatory work which the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission might wisely and usefully do for the first meetings of the Security Council;

(4) The relations of the United Nations with the I.L.O.;

(5) The relations of the United Nations with the League of Nations;

(6) The choice of the site of the United Nations;

(7) The establishment of a temporary Trusteeship Committee.

11. While these differences of opinion are important and involve questions of principle they must be seen in the perspective of the large area of agreement embodied in the whole report. Thus the proposed provisional rules of procedure for the General Assembly contain 140 rules and there is agreement on 130 of these rules. Similarly there is virtually complete agreement on the whole of the 30 page Secretariat report with the exception of the difference of opinion on an organic versus a functional organisation. Moreover the extent of each of the seven main differences is not as great as might first appear.

12. Thus the Soviet contention that the Secretariat should be divided on organic rather than on functional lines is set forth in a chart under which half the departments are functional not organic, so that the difference between the Soviet view and the view of the other members of the Executive Committee is not really over the whole structure of the Secretariat, but over whether the Security Council should have a separate department of the Secretariat and the Assembly a separate department, or whether there should be one political and security department serving both organs.

13. Similarly the Executive Committee is unanimous in believing that both equitable geographical distribution and personal competence must be taken into account in the election of the chairmen of the working committees of the Assembly, the vice-presidents of the Assembly and the members of expert committees. The point at issue is the relative importance of the two criteria.

14. While at the beginning of the Executive Committee's work both the United States and Soviet delegations were opposed to the committee on the Security Council doing virtually anything, at the end of the committee's work they supported the present compromise report which contains not only a quite extensive set of rules of procedure, but also a preamble which would justify an elaboration of the present agenda and of its documentation and an expansion of the provisional rules of procedures.

15. While differences of opinion over the relations which should be established between the I.L.O. and the United Nations have been a constant source of trouble at meetings of the Executive Committee and of a number of its committees, the Soviet delegation have never stated that they are opposed to the I.L.O. being brought into relation with the United Nations. They have restricted themselves to stating that relations should not be established until "certain changes of a democratic character" have been made in the constitution of the I.L.O.

16. Though differences within the Executive Committee still persist on relations between the United Nations and the League of Nations the Soviet delegation appear to share the view of most of the other members of the Executive Committee that it is in the general interest that the League of Nations be liquidated as soon as possible. The difference between the Soviet view and the view of most of the other members of the Committee is over the method of liquidation.

17. There is disagreement within the Executive Committee over where the site of the United Nations should be but there is complete agreement on the criteria which should govern the precise location of the site and on the facilities and immunities which the host government should accord to the Organization.

18. The objection which the Soviet delegation has made to the establishment of the temporary Trusteeship Committee is based entirely on constitutional grounds.

19. On only three of the seven outstanding issues are the U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia arrayed against the rest of the Committee — the organisation of the Secretariat, relations with the I.L.O. and the establishment of the Temporary Trusteeship Committee. The Soviet group have a certain amount of Latin American and Chinese support in what the majority of the Executive Committee would consider to be an over-emphasis on equitable geographical representation. So far as the Security Council committee was concerned the Soviet group and the United States delegation took, at the outset of the committee's work, virtually the same position but the United States delegation was divided as to the wisdom of the instructions which they had received from Washington. On relations with the League of Nations the Soviet Union and Australia were on the same side. On the choice of the site of the United Nations the Soviet group were aligned with the majority of nine against a minority which consisted of the three western European states — the United Kingdom, France and the Netherlands. (The United States and Canada refrained from voting on this question.)

SECTION 4

PART III OF THE REPORT — CHAPTER BY CHAPTER

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY (CHAPTER I)

20. The importance of this Chapter derives from the importance of the General Assembly. The General Assembly is the town meeting of the world. Two of the principal organs of the United Nations — the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council — are subordinate to it and, under the Charter, it can itself discharge all the functions of these two organs. It elects a majority of the members of a third principal organ — the Security Council. It and the Security Council, sitting separately, elect the members of a fourth principal organ — the Court. It establishes the regulations for the fifth principal organ — the Secretariat. It has a reserve power over all the organs through its control over finance. Its powers will be further enhanced if it appoints the Atomic Energy Commission.

21. The most important part of the chapter on the General Assembly is Section 3, the provisional rules of procedure. The Executive Committee has proposed that these rules be adopted without debate as the rules of procedure for the Preparatory Commission and for the first part of the first session of the General Assembly.

22. These rules are a simplified and modernized version of the rules of the League Assembly. They make possible the calling of a special session of the General Assembly on ten days' notice (Rules 3 and 8). Provision is made for the use of two working languages and five official languages (Rules 57 to 66). The meetings of the General Assembly and of its Main Committees are to be held in public save in exceptional circumstances (Rule 67). Elections of persons and of states are to be by secret ballot (Rules 86 and 92). Committees can take decisions on any question by a majority of the members present and voting (Rule 114). A formal procedure is established for the admission of new members in order to ensure that new members formally, and in accordance with their respective constitutional practices, undertake commitments as binding as those undertaken by founder members (Rules 119 to 123).

23. An adequate committee structure is recommended for the General Assembly in Section 4 of the Chapter.

24. It is recommended that the first part of the first session of the General Assembly be divided into two parts, the first of which would be primarily organizational, and a provisional agenda is drawn up for this first part. (The recommendation on the two-part Assembly was based on the assumption that the first part would be concluded before Christmas, 1945. The decision to postpone the Assembly until January, 1946 will probably result in a reconsideration of the whole question and it is possible that the General Assembly might sit from about February 1 to April 25, the anniversary of the opening of the San Francisco Conference, with only a brief adjournment of perhaps a fortnight after the election of the Secretary-General).

25. The Netherlands delegation submitted a proposal for the establishment of a Standing Committee of the Assembly on Peace and Security. (See footnote to paragraph 34 of the Appendix to Chapter I). This proposal will probably provoke a good deal of discussion in the Assembly committee of the Preparatory Commission.

26. The Canadian delegation submitted the proposal made to the League Assembly by Norway in 1926 that the single transferable vote be used in electing the members of the Councils. This may give rise to a good deal of discussion in the Assembly committee of the Preparatory Commission.

THE SECURITY COUNCIL (CHAPTER II)

27. This Chapter embodies a compromise which is satisfactory to neither of the two schools of thought on the Executive Committee's committee on the Security Council, and presumably both sides reserve the right to reopen the whole question in the preparatory Commission.

28. In the committee the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. were at one extreme, Australia and Canada at the other extreme. Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia followed the Soviet line which was also supported in principle by China, France and Chile. Brazil, the Netherlands, Mexico, Iran and the United Kingdom in general supported the Canadian-Australian line.

29. The U.S.-Soviet position was that the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission need not, and indeed ought not to, make recommendations to the Security Council on how it should organize itself. The Canada-Australia position was that the Interim Arrangements required the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission to prepare as carefully for the first session of the Security Council as for the first sessions of the other organs, that experience had demonstrated the necessity both of early agreement by any international deliberative body, however small, on detailed rules of procedure and also of the advance preparation of a well-documented agenda.

30. The United States delegation pretty well reversed their position in the final debate in the Executive Committee and this reversal probably marks a victory of the U.S. delegation over Mr. Pasvolsky and the United States chiefs of staff.

31. The preamble to the recommendation concerning the Security Council is an almost complete victory for the Canadian-Australian position. The large words of the preamble are, however, followed by an agenda which does not even include all the constitutional or organizational questions which the Security Council ought to deal with in order to organize itself promptly and efficiently; the provisional rules of procedure are a bare minimum and do not include any suggestions on how the Security Council is to carry out the instructions given it in the Charter to so organize itself as to be able to function continuously; though the Interim Arrangements require the preparation of documents and recommendations relating to all matters on the agenda, there is no adequate documentation for the item on the Military Staff Committee (item 9) and no documentation at all for the items on the staff to be assigned to the Security Council (item 10) or on the special military agreements (item 11).

32. However the mere inclusion of items 9 and 11 demonstrates the desire of the Executive Committee that the Military Staff Committee begin work as soon as possible and that the special military agreements be concluded as quickly as possible.

33. Rule 9 in the provisional rules of procedure is of special interest; it provides for the presidency of the Security Council to rotate among all eleven members in the English alphabetical order of the names of the member states. This solution to the vexed problem of the presidency is open to serious adverse criticism since it may mean that in a crisis the presidency is held by the least competent representative on the Council. It was agreed to only as a temporary expedient because it seemed to be the proposal most likely to be accepted without prolonged debate at the first meeting of the Security Council.

34. The Canadian delegation received the support of a majority of the Committee, but not the requisite two-thirds, for the inclusion in the Rules of Procedure of nine rules on the conduct of the business of the Security Council. (The vote was 6 in favour and 5 against). The Canadian delegation contended that differences of opinion over what was proper procedure might hold up the work of the Security Council and seriously lower its prestige unless the Security Council were, as soon as possible after its creation, to agree on normal parliamentary rules of this character.

35. The committee in its report to the Executive Committee submitted a list of questions of organization and procedure requiring the early attention of the Security Council. This was a much curtailed version of a longer list submitted by the Australian delegation. The Executive Committee, however, rejected this list by eight to five (Australia, Canada, Iran, Netherlands, United Kingdom) with one abstention, France.

36. The emphasis in Rule 27 on publicity of meetings is that normally the Security Council shall meet in public. This provision was included only after long debate.

THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AND SPECIALIZED AGENCIES (CHAPTERS III AND VIII)

37. Chapters III and VIII are to be considered by one committee of the Preparatory Commission and should therefore be read together.

38. One point of special interest in the recommendation concerning the Economic and Social Council is that the Preparatory Commission should consider suggesting urgent problems in the economic, social, cultural, educational, health and related fields for discussion by the Council at its first session. This may prove to be one of the most important tasks of the Economic and Social Committee of the Preparatory Commission, especially if, in accordance with the Interim Arrangements, it prepares documents and recommendations relating to the substantive items which it places on the agenda of the Council.

39. The provisional rules of procedure of the Council are deficient in that they do not include, even by reference, the standard rules on the conduct of business along the lines of Rules 70 to 81 of the proposed rules of the General Assembly.

40. The committee on the Economic and Social Council unanimously recommended the establishment of eight commissions. Due to Soviet opposition in the Executive Committee the recommendation for a Coordination Commission and a Fiscal Commission was dropped. Soviet opposition to a Coordination Commission probably arises out of the fact that it would contain the director general of the I.L.O. as soon as the I.L.O. was brought into relation with the United Nations.

41. The Interim Arrangements instructed the Preparatory Commission to "examine the problems involved in the establishment of the relationship between specialized intergovernmental organizations and agencies and the Organisation." It did not (probably at Soviet insistence) instruct the Preparatory Commission to "prepare recommendations" concerning the establishment of these relationships. Consequently the Soviet delegation insisted that the Executive Committee should not approve of the report of the committee on specialized agencies. The Soviet group was alone in this insistence but nevertheless scored a formal victory though the minutes of the Executive Committee demonstrated that all the members, except the Soviet group, approved of the report.

42. The reason for the Soviet attitude is that they do not want in any way to approve of relations being established between the Organization and the I.L.O.

43. The report of the committee on specialized agencies is termed, at the insistence of the Soviet Union, not a "report" but "observations" and it is not even said whose observations they are.

44. The "observations," like the report of the committee on the Economic and Social Council, is not a very penetrating study. It does not touch the real problems of coordination of the work of specialized agencies, which is basically a problem of coordinating national social and economic policy within each nation. Nor does it make clear that the ultimate coordinating agency must, in the absence of an international legislature, be the national governments. Nor does it test the value of the general principles which it recommends by applying them to one or two existing specialized agencies such as, for example, the Food and Agriculture Organization or the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization.

THE TRUSTEESHIP SYSTEM (CHAPTER IV)

45. The recommendation to set up a temporary Trusteeship Committee refers to the proposed Committee as an "interim organ". The Soviet, Czechoslovakian and Yugoslavian delegations, as has already been noted, objected to the creation of this Committee as being non-constitutional; they also objected to the use of the word "organ" on the ground that the Charter recognizes only two sorts of organs: the principal organs (Article 7) and subsidiary organs (Article 22) to be established by the General Assembly for the performance of its own functions exclusively. They argued that the proposed committee could not properly be referred to as an "organ" under either of these definitions, and that there was no room for it within the Charter.

THE COURT: THE REGISTRATION AND PUBLICATION OF TREATIES: PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES (CHAPTER V)

46. The report sets out the steps taken to comply with the requirements of paragraph 4(e) of the Interim Arrangements Agreement regarding the issuing of invitations for the nomination of candidates for the International Court of Justice.

47. The Australian delegation objected to the action taken on the ground that, since the provisions of Article 5 of the Statute could not be complied with (there being no Secretary-General), no effective action could be taken under the authority of the Interim Arrangements Agreement. This objection was overruled.

48. The report makes useful recommendations concerning the registration and publication of treaties and international agreements, stressing the importance of preventing any gap occurring in the publication of these instruments between the termination of the League of Nations treaty series and the beginning of the treaty series of the United Nations, and of securing the voluntary registration of treaties by non-member states.

THE SECRETARIAT (CHAPTER VI)

49. This is probably the most important chapter in the whole report. It is certainly the chapter which contains the most creative work and it may, in the long run, turn out to be the most significant for the future of the Organization. It is the product of a most harmonious and hard-working committee whose members found themselves in general agreement on virtually all the questions that came up. Where, at the beginning of the discussion, the points of view differed, the recommendation which was worked out was usually not so much a compromise as a synthesis.

50. The report is important for what it excludes as well as for what it includes. Thus the Soviet proposal for a number of under-secretaries-general who would not be working heads of departments but some of whom should coordinate the work of two or more Departments was beaten in committee by a vote of seven to three. Another Soviet proposal that a permanent deputy-secretary-general should be appointed was defeated — four voting in favour and six against. Thus there are no officers between the Secretary-General and the working heads of the departments. These heads of departments are called "assistant secretaries-general".

51. The structure proposed for the Secretariat is democratic in form and substance. It differs from the League structure in that the grades are not divided into an upper-class, a middle-class and a lower class. A specific recommendation is made that there be no lopsided age distribution among the first appointees to the Secretariat. The Committee was unanimous in agreeing in principle to the establishment of an international civil service commission.

52. The following passages in Section 2 "Report on the Organization of the Secretariat" are of special interest:

(a) The general character of the Secretariat (paras. 1-7);

(b) The functions of the Secretary-General (paras. 8-17);

(c) The methods of selection of the Secretariat (paras. 52-56) especially the recommendation for in-service training for which the Canadian delegation was chiefly responsible;

(d) The suggestions on salary scales (paras. 68-71) especially the assumption that official salaries and allowances will be free of national tax and that salaries shall be supplemented by childrens' allowances.

53. The following regulations in Section 3 "Staff Regulations" are of special interest:

(a) Regulations 1-8 on the duties and obligations of the Secretariat;

(b) Regulation 19 on the probationary period;

(c) Regulation 27 on the forty hour week.

BUDGETARY AND FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS (CHAPTER VII)

54. The recommendations concerning budgetary and financial arrangements are made with a view to ensuring the proper preparation and thorough examination of all proposals involving expenditure before they are given final approval. One of the most interesting of these recommendations is that for the creation of a Supervisory Committee for Administrative and Budgetary questions, which is to be a small body of independent experts. The budgetary staff of the Secretariat will compile the proposed budget before it is submitted to the General Assembly for action, the budget will be examined and analyzed by the Supervisory Committee. The report of these experts to the Assembly will greatly facilitate the Assembly's task in dealing with administrative and budgetary matters.

55. The proposed committee is to consist of seven members selected on the basis of broad geographical representation, personal qualifications and experience. No two of them are to [be] citizens of the same state; at least two of them are to be financial experts of recognized standing. Their term of office is to be three years, although, in the first instance, two members might be elected for one year, two for two years and three for three years.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS (CHAPTER IX)

56. The League of Nations is to be wound up and the Executive Committee recommends that the United Nations take over its assets (subject to the liabilities which accompany these assets) and such of its activities as are found to be non-political in character.

57. The question of determining in advance what activities are undoubtedly non-political was admittedly hard to solve in committee: for instance, the Soviet, Czechoslovakian and Yugoslavian delegations contended that the activities concerning refugees could not be said to be non-political, nor those of the international bureaux. In the result, no recommendation was made in respect of the transfer of League activities concerning mandates, refugees or international bureaux.

THE PERMANENT HEADQUARTERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS (CHAPTER X)

58. At a meeting of the Executive Committee held on October 5 two votes were taken: one that the permanent headquarters of the United Nations should not be in Europe and another that it should be in the United States. At the preceding meeting of the Executive Committee a report from a committee was adopted setting forth the exact requirements which should be complied with in respect to the location, wherever it might be.

59. As a result the Executive Committee has recommended that the headquarters be established in the United States and that the Preparatory Commission agree upon a recommendation to the first part of the first session of the General Assembly as to the precise location of the permanent headquarters and the exact requirements to be embodied in an agreement between the competent authorities of the host country and the United Nations.

THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

60. The report of the Executive Committee is a synthesis of ideas put forward in writing or orally by all fourteen delegations. It thus represents the views not of any one delegation nor of a number of delegations but of all the delegations. It is, therefore, not only impossible but unwise to try to pick bits out of the report and to state that such and such a delegation was responsible for one bit, such and such for another bit and so on.

61. The Canadian delegation to the Executive Committee conceived it to be their duty not to attempt to promote short-run Canadian interests but to promote the long-run interests of Canada by contributing as best they could to the creation of an effective world organization. The members of the Canadian delegation acted therefore not so much as national civil servants but as international civil servants.

62. In this the Canadian delegation claims no special merit since this was also the attitude of the other members of the Executive Committee. All were doing their best to contribute to the smoothest possible operation of the United Nations. The members of the Executive Committee differed not in their objectives which were common but in the methods which they proposed should be followed in order to realize those objectives. The differences in suggested methods resulted in the main from different backgrounds and different concepts of international administration.

63. The Canadian and Australian delegations took the lead in insisting that the Executive Committee try to do as much as possible in the brief time at its disposal to prepare well documented provisional agendas for all the organs of the United Nations so that when they met they would be able to get down to business as quickly as possible.

64. Those two delegations also emphasized the importance of agreement in advance on as extensive rules of procedure as possible in order to avoid waste of time on procedural matters when the organs held their first sessions.

65. To begin with a number of the members of the Executive Committee had no clear idea about its task and many indeed argued that since each organ was given the power to adopt its own rules of procedure the Executive Committee should not itself draw up provisional rules. Gradually, these members retired from this position so far as the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council were concerned, but they stuck to it so far as the Security Council and the Court were concerned. They compromised finally on the Security Council but refused to compromise on the Court, with the result that the Executive Committee has done virtually no work to prepare the way for the first sessions of the Court, thus making a distinction between the Court and the other organs of the United Nations which has no warrant in the Interim Arrangements.

66. The Canadian delegation did its best to insist that the language used in the report and especially in the rules of procedure and the staff regulations should be as simple as possible. This meant, on the one hand, that it was necessary to revise almost every text taken over from League of Nations documents, since these documents are usually bad translations of French, and on the other hand that it was necessary to re-write almost any document submitted by the United States delegation.

67. The Soviet delegation insisted at the beginning that the committees should take as their basis of discussion papers prepared by national delegations. They did this in order to try to clip the wings of the temporary international secretariat. They, themselves, however, did not submit a single paper and the only national delegations which submitted extensive papers were the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia and Canada. China submitted only one paper and the Netherlands only one paper. Most of the United States papers were submitted at a late stage in the meetings. The result was that the secretariat had to produce papers in order that the committees could get on with their work. It is to be hoped that this experience has convinced the Soviet Foreign Office that an international meeting of this kind cannot succeed without a strong international secretariat which is allowed reasonable freedom of action.

SECTION D

RÉUNION DE LA COMMISSION PRÉPARATOIRE, LONDRES, DU 24 NOVEMBRE AU 24 DÉCEMBRE 1945
MEETING OF THE PREPARATORY COMMISSION, LONDON, NOVEMBER 24-DECEMBER 24, 1945

537. DEA/5475-J-40

Le représentant suppléant, le Comité exécutif, la Commission préparatoire des Nations Unies, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

SECRET AND PERSONAL London, September 22, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson,

Now that the Executive Committee has fixed fairly definite dates for the meetings of the Preparatory Commission and the first United Nations Assembly I hope that you will be able to give early consideration to the problem of Canadian representation.

The Preparatory Commission is to meet on November 1 if possible and by November 15 at the latest. The General Assembly of the United Nations is to meet on Tuesday, December 4 and this date is definite if agreed to by a sufficiently large number of governments members of the Preparatory Commission.

The number of representatives which we will need at the Preparatory Commission will, of course, depend in part on whether it breaks up into committees. I hope that we shall be able to get the Executive Committee to make up its mind on this question during the next week. I, myself, am strongly of the opinion that if the Preparatory Commission is to do a thorough job in revising and amplifying the report of the Executive Committee it must break up into committees.

The choice really seems to me between the Preparatory Commission doing a thorough job on the Executive Committee's report and the United Nations General Assembly doing a thorough job on it. If the Preparatory Commission does a thorough job then the Assembly meeting only a week or so later can rubber-stamp the Preparatory Commission's report in so far as it affects the Assembly.

Assuming that the Preparatory Commission does break up into committees it might well break up into committees of the same type as those of the Executive Committee perhaps amalgamating the committee on the Economic and Social Council and the committee on Specialized Agencies. This will leave us with nine committees.

In appointing the Canadian delegation to the Preparatory Commission and the United Nations General Assembly it will be useful to bear in mind the desirability of including in the delegation the officers whom the Department will be appointing to its mission to the headquarters of the United Nations.

We would, I think, have very adequate representation at the Preparatory Commission if the Canadian delegation were to be made up somewhat as follows:

(1) Mr. Wrong or yourself as chief delegate and representative of Canada, on the committee on the Security Council and the committee on the League of Nations.

(2) Mr. Turgeon as representative of Canada on the Legal committee and the committee on the seat of the Organization.

(3) Mr. Rasminsky as representative of Canada on the committee on the Economic and Social Council and the financial committee.

If you want me to stay on for the meeting I might perhaps attend the committees on the General Assembly and the Secretariat.

I would hope that the delegation might also include two other members and that these might be the officers whom the Department intends to appoint to the Canadian mission to the headquarters of the Organization. On the assumption that Rasminsky would be unable to join the staff of the Canadian office at the headquarters, it would be useful if he had an understudy at the Preparatory Commission who might, for example, be Jean Chapdelaine. The other junior officer might be Saul Rae or John Holmes and one of these three might be secretary of the delegation to the Preparatory Commission.

If, however, you are thinking of appointing Holmes to the delegation I would urge that it be made a full-time assignment for him and that he be relieved of his duties at Canada House during the period of this assignment. A part-time assignment would, I think, be neither fair to him nor to the Canadian delegation.

These three officers could assist the chief representatives on the committees and one of them could also be the Canadian representative on the Trusteeship Council.

As you will have noticed from recent communications the Assembly and the Security Council cannot proceed to the election of the judges of the international court until December 15. This election may take three days. This would mean that the earliest date for the conclusion of the General Assembly would be about December 18.

My guess, therefore, is that the first part of the first General Assembly will last for about two weeks, from about December 4-December 18. It would seem to me that the Canadian delegation to the Preparatory Commission could be carried over to the General Assembly with one or two important additions.

I would urge that the Prime Minister should, if at all possible, lead the delegation to the first Assembly. The opening of the first Assembly is going to be a great historic occasion and it would be most appropriate if the Prime Minister could attend.

The addition of Mr. St. Laurent would be most valuable and if the Prime Minister could not stay for the whole of the two weeks of the Assembly, Mr. St. Laurent might be able to take his place as chief of the Canadian delegation.

These ideas are passed on to you merely to help you in working out what I know will be a very difficult problem, and I realise that in view of our lack of staff you may not find it possible to accept all my suggestions.

I do feel, however, that both from the point of view of the prestige of the new Organization and of the prestige of Canada it is most desirable that Canada be well represented at the meetings of both the Preparatory Commission and of the first Assembly. It is particularly important that our representation be strong in the economic field, so that if we are elected (as I assume we will be) to the Economic and Social Council, we can immediately appoint a first-class person to represent us at the initial meetings of that Council. Similarly, if we are elected to the Security Council it would obviously be most desirable that the Prime Minister be present so that he can immediately take his seat on the Security Council.

Moreover, the effect of our having a strong delegation at the Preparatory Commission and the first Assembly will increase our chance of being elected to the Security Council.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

PERSONAL Ottawa, September 29, 1945

Dear Escott [Reid],

Norman has handed to me your letters of September 22 and September 25[132] about Canadian representation in the Preparatory Commission and the Assembly. This is very much in our minds, but I am not in a position even to guess what will happen. We are doing our best to get Rasminsky. Unfortunately the Debate on the Address has been more protracted than was expected and the Parliamentary programme for dealing with financial matters with which Rasminsky is concerned, has been retarded. I still hope, however, that he will be available in time to reach London at the beginning of November. You will doubtless be talking over the whole situation with Norman soon after his arrival in London in a week's time.

Our difficulties arise in part from the extraordinarily congested programme of international meetings, combined with the additional volume of work which has fallen on the Department with the end of hostilities. I think that there will be between 7 and 10 international conferences or meetings of one sort or another between now and the end of the year at which Canada will have to be represented, and in many of the cases this Department will have the main responsibility. I am personally alarmed over the hurried programme which is being pushed in London for the new Organization. The sour discussions in the Council of Foreign Ministers are not a good prelude to the first Assembly and the initial activities of a Security Council. They make the doctrine of unanimity of the Great Powers look pretty silly as an assurance for the maintenance of international harmony. This seems so apparent that I wonder whether there will not be a move from on high to lengthen the programme and postpone the opening of the Assembly.

Another point. The Prime Minister thinks that we should attempt to secure election both to the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council. We have not yet taken any steps of an electioneering character, and I am not satisfied that we would be well advised to do so. With regard to the Security Council, a relevant factor would be the method proposed for determining which of the non-permanent members are to sit for only a one-year term. This is also a matter which you may have a chance of discussing with Norman in London.

Yours sincerely,

HUME WRONG

SECRET. Preparatory Commission telegram No. 9.

Reference your telegram No. 3414.[†] I fear selection of a Canadian as Chairman of the Preparatory Commission might prejudice Canada's chances of election to the Security Council and to the Economic and Social Council and that in fact it would be difficult to combine Chairmanship of the Commission with active leadership of our delegation. For these reasons suggestion that Wilgress be Chairman should be discouraged.

Of other names suggested Masaryk would be acceptable though in the light of his experience of the UNRRA Council he would probably be unwilling to take the post. We have no views as to suitability of Colban[133] but think Freitas-Valle[134] would be an excellent choice whom our delegation could support without reservations.

The suggested slate of Committee Chairmen proposed in paragraph 4 of your telegram strikes us as excellent.

MEMORANDUM FOR MR. ROBERTSON:

Re: Interview with Mexican Ambassador

The Mexican Ambassador, Dr. Del Rio, called on me at 3:30 this afternoon at my room in the House of Commons. He mentioned having had a previous word with you, and said that his purpose was to ask the support of the Government of Canada for Mexico being given a place as a non-permanent member on the Security Council of the United Nations Organization.

I told the Ambassador he might be assured that our Government would carefully consider the request of the Mexican Government, but that as he would anticipate we had been approached by other governments as well, and I could not give him any definite word beyond saying that the request of the Mexican government would receive the most careful consideration of our Government.

The Ambassador then asked if he might learn of the decision when it was made. I said I could not give an assurance of this as the circumstances under which the Canadian Government's decision would be made known, would depend on developments that I could not, at the moment, foresee. These were not the exact words of my reply, but it is what it was intended to convey.

I assume it is quite proper for one country to ask the support of another in these matters of representations on Council and committees. I doubt, however, if it is proper for any country to ask for a definite decision, or to do more than await developments with the promise, meanwhile, of careful consideration of its request.

The Ambassador also spoke of a trade treaty between Mexico and Canada which he said he expected would be in readiness for signature during the Christmas season. He said he was hoping that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. MacKinnon, might visit Mexico for the purpose of the ceremony of the signature. He also indicated that Mr. MacKinnon had said he did not wish to approach me personally on this but would have no objection to the Ambassador so doing. I gave no definite assurance as to what might be agreed to in this regard. I was not myself over-familiar with the present status of the negotiations.[135]

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

I think you took the only possible line with the Mexican Ambassador when he pressed for an assurance of Canadian support for his country's election to the Security Council. He had tackled Mr. St. Laurent when the latter was Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, and sent him the enclosed memorandum† in support of Mexico's claim. He also spoke to me on Thursday, when I gave him an interim answer along the line you used.

The Executive Committee of the San Francisco Conference, which has been continued as the Executive Committee of the Preparatory Commission for the United Nations Organization, consists of 14 members, the five Great Powers and nine others designated originally by the Sponsoring Powers in accordance with the principles which it is expected will govern the election of the non-permanent members of the Security Council. The real nub in the election of the six non-permanent members of the Security Council will be the dropping of three of the nine states now represented on the Executive Committee. My guess is that one of the three Latin American states (Mexico, Brazil and Chile) will go, and I assume it will be Chile. One of the three states bordering on the U.S.S.R. (Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and Iran) will be dropped. I think it likely that it will be Yugoslavia. If Iran is dropped it would almost certainly be replaced by some other Middle Eastern state, thus preserving the present due regard for "equitable geographical distribution."

The remaining states on the Executive Committee are Canada, Australia and the Netherlands. If the Netherlands is not continued on the Security council, its place would, I think be filled by Belgium, for the representation of Western Europe on the Security Council should not be further reduced.

This process of elimination would leave Canada and Australia candidates for the last seat. This is an awkward, undesirable and, as far as I can see, inescapable consequence of the reduction in membership from fourteen to eleven. Australia is anxious to be elected to the Council, though disposed, I believe, to concede Canada's prior claim.[136] Evatt said in Washington that he thought Canada and Australia should both be elected to the first Security Council and that Canada was entitled to election for the whole two-year term, while Australia would be content with initial election for the junior one-year term. Such an arrangement would be very welcome from our point of view, but I do not see how it would be feasible.

In assessing Canada's chances of election, we have to recognize that this country does not fit conveniently into any of the groups, blocs or regions which may be expected to mobilize themselves to elect representatives to the Security Council and to the other elected agencies of the United Nations. This country's claim has to stand pretty much on our record of performance, our readiness to take our fair share of international costs and responsibilities and our capacity to send good delegations to international conferences and organizations, i.e., in the words of Article 23 of the Charter, on the "contribution we can make to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization."[137]

On these premises I am inclined to the view that we should not specifically put forward our candidature for the Security Council or the Social and Economic Council, and certainly should not canvass other countries for pre-election promises of support. In conversations with representatives of other countries here, in London and in Washington, I have assumed that Canada would be chosen[138] because it would be an obvious and sensible choice for other countries to make, and have taken it for granted that the more responsible members of the Organization, who are concerned to see the Council strong and representative, will, of their own motion, see that the Canadian claim to representation is not overlooked. This may prove to be rather a hopeful view of things, for it is quite possible that, when the gerrymandering begins, we may be squeezed out by the organized voting blocs. This, however, is a risk that has to be run, for we cannot hope to organize a comparable counter-bloc that would ensure our election.[139]

SECRET. Following for Wilgress, Begins: Preparatory Commission telegram No. 11. With the experience of the San Francisco Conference and the Executive Committee in mind, the Canadian position on the main issues likely to arise in the Preparatory Commission will be familiar to the Delegation. You will of course refer for instructions any major question of policy which may arise. Otherwise it is considered desirable that the Delegation should have wide enough discretion to deal with day to day business in the Committees. In this connection you will no doubt be holding daily meetings of the Delegation to discuss the line to be followed at the meetings of the Committees. The allocation of members of the Delegation to the various Committees is left to your judgment after consultation with the members of the delegation.

The following are our views on certain particular points of importance:

(1) When the proposal put forward by the Netherlands representative to the Executive Committee for the establishment of a standing committee of the Assembly on peace and security comes up for discussion, you may speak along the following lines, expressing at the same time our appreciation of the motives which prompted the Netherlands Delegation in making this suggestion. At San Francisco the Canadian Delegation accepted the principle that primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security was placed on the shoulders of the Security Council and that there should be no divided jurisdiction. This principle is recognized in the structure of the organization. We are concerned lest the Netherlands proposal for a standing committee on peace and security may reopen this whole question before the present allocation of responsibility has been given a fair trial. If experience warrants, the Assembly can later establish such a committee.

If Mexico were on the Security Council and Canada not this would surely raise a question here! W. L. M. K[ing]
The reasons for Mexico's representation apply with greater force to Canada. K[ing]

(2) With regard to the elaboration of rules of procedure and the further specification of items of the agenda for the Security Council, our instructions to the Delegation to the Executive Committee will stand. The Delegation should not press for the further elaboration of detailed rules of procedure for the Security Council unless the permanent members of the Security Council themselves favour such a course, nor do we wish to press at this time for the inclusion of specific items in the agenda of the Security Council.

We consider that pressure for the elaboration of detailed rules of procedure and the adoption of a broad agenda for the Security Council would be largely a waste of time as the Security Council is not likely in practice to allow itself to be bound by the recommendations of the Preparatory Commission.

(3) Secretariat. You should resist any proposals which would have the effect of giving each national Government the right to the appointment of any of its nationals to the international Secretariat. You should also oppose the proposal prohibiting the appointment of persons not nationals of any of the United Nations to the Secretariat.

With regard to the Soviet proposal for the division of the Secretariat which would have the effect of setting up a separate Secretariat for the Security Council, it may not be unreasonable that the Secretary-General should consult the Security Council about appointments to the political and security department of the Secretariat.

(4) The United Kingdom and United States delegations share our interest in a satisfactory definition of the relationship between the I.L.O. and U.N.O. We are committed to no formula and would favour any solution on which these delegations reach agreement.

(5) The Canadian delegation should hold a watching brief on discussions relating to Trusteeship, but when the United Kingdom and United States delegations are in agreement, should give them general support.

(6) With regard to the prior preparation of rules of procedure for the International Court of Justice, the Canadian Delegation should refrain from pressing for the preparation of such rules of procedure by the Preparatory Commission. The legal advisor considers that rules of procedure should not be formulated until the court meets.

(7) You may support the proposal of the United Kingdom Government that the election of the judges of the International Court of Justice should be postponed until March, 1946, to give more time for study of the qualifications of the candidates.

(8) With regard to the recommendation of the Executive Committee that the real value of the emoluments of the judges of the International Court of Justice should not be less than those of the judges of the old court during the period 1936-1939, we consider that the emoluments of the judges should be related to those of senior officers of the Secretariat.

(9) We are in general agreement with the recommendations of Chapter 9 of the Executive Committee report[140] on the League of Nations, and also with those of Chapter 7 on budgetary and financial arrangements.

(10) Headquarters of the Organization. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom spoke to the Prime Minister on this subject while in Ottawa[141] and asked for Canadian support for the establishment of the headquarters in Europe. Mr. Attlee has been told that the Canadian Government incline to the view that the headquarters should be in Europe. We understand that the United Kingdom proposal is for Copenhagen or Luxembourg as headquarters. Should the Preparatory Commission modify the recommendation of the Executive Committee we should not be averse to either of these sites although we think Geneva has advantages over both. We think something could be said for having the headquarters of the Organization in Central Europe at a point where eastern and western influence intersect. In any event you should consult us before taking any definite stand on this subject, and meanwhile report the sense of informal discussion in the Commission. You will see from the telegram of November 23rd from the Canadian Ambassador in Washington,† which is being repeated to you, that the United States Government will not press for headquarters in the United States.

(11) It seems certain that the whole question of holding the Assembly in two parts will be reopened during discussions in the Preparatory Commission, because of the necessity of bringing before the first Assembly as soon as possible the question of the Atomic Energy Commission and its relation to the United Nations Organization. We expect that the Canadian Government will have to have further consultations on procedure with the other signatories of the Washington Declaration[142] and we shall instruct you when the position is clearer. Ends.

and the U.S. Commissioner of Narcotics are concerned over the proposals of the Executive Committee for organizing the committee work and secretariat on the traffic in dangerous drugs. Recommendation IX, paras. 3 and 4,[143] for the transfer of League functions in this field is satisfactory in form and substance, but the proposals in Chapters 3 and 6 of the Executive Committee's report seem to reduce control of the drug traffic to a minor division of the welfare activities of the Organization.

2. International narcotic questions are administrative and technical in character and can only be handled satisfactorily by experts. They are governed by special conventions which established the Permanent Central Opium Board and the Drug Supervisory Body as administrative agencies. Matters of policy have been handled by the Opium Advisory Committee of the League which reported to the Assembly, and there was a separate section of the Secretariat to handle drug questions. There is much to be said for continuing to treat these problems as separate international questions handled by an expert committee directly under the Economic and Social Council, with their own branch of the Secretariat directly responsible to the senior official on the economic and social side.

3. The delegation should consult with other delegations on these matters, particularly with the United States and United Kingdom delegations and with Dr. Victor Hoo[144] who has served on the Opium Advisory Committee and is aware of the views of the U.S. Commissioner of Narcotics. Dr. Hoo might be asked to show you a copy of a letter addressed to him on November 9th by Mr. Anslinger.[145] We are also sending you a copy by bag.† Ends.

Your telegram No. 11,[146] paragraph 10. Headquarters of the United Nations.

1. Informal discussions with Webster[147] this morning, indicated that he had hopes of support from about twenty delegations for a site in Europe. United Kingdom succeeded in securing McEachen of Uruguay as Chairman of Committee 8. At the meeting this morning, Chairman first introduced question of Sub-Committee to take evidence from delegations representing places that had invited the United Nations. This gave several delegations an opportunity of pointing out that it was logical, first of all, to consider Section 2 of Chapter 10, on criteria of site before the Sub-Committee was established. Australia pushed, without support, for immediate consideration of Recommendation 1 of Section 1, that the site be in the United States.

2. The United States representative urged that delegations from places in the United States be heard by the sub-committee as quickly as possible. At this stage we offered a compromise proposal which, after minor amendment, was accepted unanimously. Under this proposal a Sub-Committee of 7 has been appointed to hear these delegations beginning December 1st, and the whole Committee will devote its meetings on Thursday and Friday to discussion of Section 2. Sub-Committee consists of States not likely to be host state. For these and other reasons we declined to serve.

3. Our compromise pleased the United States delegation and also coincides with United Kingdom strategy as outlined by Webster. He believes that a discussion on criteria will strengthen arguments for Europe. He states that United Kingdom have now pretty well abandoned idea of Geneva and their present first choice is Brussels. Webster also thinks that at some stage resolution may be offered against location of site on territory of a great power, but he is not yet sure of wisdom of this course.

4. The lack of support for Australian proposal and the general freedom of discussion in committee indicated that the United States was not pressing for decision in favour of it.

5. Coville, who appears to be chief liaison officer of United States delegation, lunched with me after the meeting. He opened up question by asking our advice on how United States delegation could make clear to the other delegations that it wanted a free vote on the merits of the issue. I tentatively suggested that perhaps the best way of securing a general agreement on a site which might turn out to be a compromise not now being considered would be:

(a) No nominations.

(b) Series of secret ballots on specific sites.

(c) No elimination of lowest sites from subsequent ballots, and

(d) The opportunity of introducing new sites as balloting proceeds.

Sir Charles Webster, Delegate of Great Britain, Preparatory Commission.

This seemed to appeal to him and in course of conversation he himself suggested Versailles, even Berlin, and mentioned as one consideration the desirability of strengthening the economy of Austria by selection of Vienna. After canvassing all the other European possibilities, i.e., Luxembourg, Brussels, Prague, Copenhagen, we mentioned London. He appeared very interested and questioned me closely on possible Soviet attitude. This morning's meetings and conversation with Coville confirms information given in your telegram No. 12 of November 27th.†

6. In discussions in committee on the criteria governing the choice of the site, the line which we propose, subject to your instructions, to take is that while statement on criteria in the report can usefully be amplified, Committee should not decide that failure of a site to fulfil one of the criteria necessarily debars that site from consideration.

7. Possibility exists that an eastern Canadian city might emerge as possible compromise. List of inviting cities circulated by secretariat includes Navy Island, Sault Ste Marie, Vancouver Island and Quebec, but compromise on Canada might be some other city, e.g., Montreal. Ends.

Your telegram No. 15, United Nations headquarters.

1. We were glad to have your views since we had ourselves had in mind the possibility of suggesting that two decisions be made concurrently, one on Geneva as temporary headquarters for, say, three years and one on permanent site to which organization would move when buildings had been constructed.

2. We feel that it would be premature to make any such suggestion, unless it becomes apparent that general agreement cannot be reached by the Preparatory Commission on permanent headquarters.

3. I feel that Soviet objections to Geneva are so strong that choice of Geneva as permanent headquarters would endanger Soviet cooperation on the Organization. We do not yet know what their attitude would be to temporary use of buildings at Geneva. The premature suggestion of Geneva as temporary headquarters might also lessen the chances of a European site being chosen as permanent headquarters.

4. Noel-Baker has been canvassing possibility of persuading Preparatory Commission of the wisdom of postponing for some years a decision on a permanent site and indicated that, if this happened, he himself would not press his objections to the choice of a site in the United States as temporary headquarters. We feel, however, that the Preparatory Commission as a whole wants to make a firm recommendation now of the permanent headquarters and that the Commission would consider Noel-Baker's suggestion only if it were deadlocked.

5. We are today circulating to the Technical Committee a suggestion for their consideration on the method of voting. This method was summarized in paragraph 5 of my telegram No. 19.[148] Our memorandum† to the Technical Committee includes the suggestion that one entire meeting of the Committee be devoted to the taking of successive ballots and that the first item on the Agenda of the following meeting shall be the procedure next to be adopted in order to arrange soon a site. The memorandum goes on to point out that while the method of voting we propose may not result on the first day of voting in any specific site receiving two thirds of the votes, it will clarify the position and narrow the field down to a few sites, one of which eventually may be selected either by a continuation of this method of voting or by some other procedure to be agreed upon by the Committee after they have seen the results of the first day of voting.

6. If the method of voting we propose is adopted we shall, subject to your instructions, cast our first vote for Geneva and then follow United Kingdom line on sites in Europe.

7. Noel-Baker told us yesterday that Stevenson[149] showed him a telegram from Byrnes indicating United States embarrassment over reports circulating to effect that United Kingdom delegation were spreading report that United States Government did not wish site to be in the United States. SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for Robertson from Wilgress, Begins: Preparatory Commission, No. 28. Our telegram No. 15. United Nations Headquarters.

1. At delegation meeting this morning Graydon again raised necessity of taking into consideration strong desire of Canadian public to have United Nations Headquarters located in Canada. He said he was mentioning this in order to protect Canadian Government from criticism and during the course of the discussion it became evident that his views were shared by Knowles. At the time of the discussion the other Parliamentary delegates were not present.

2. I explained that the best chance of a site in Canada being selected would be in order to resolve a deadlock between a United States and a European site. In such an event it would be quite likely that a Canadian site might emerge as a compromise. I said that this possibility would be seriously prejudiced if we took any active steps to promote the selection of headquarters in Canada. I then went on to explain that our proposal on voting was designed to bring about agreement on some site generally acceptable to two-thirds of the members and that it was quite possible that in the course of this voting a Canadian site might emerge as the most strongly supported compromise. I pointed out the provision for inclusion of a new site at a later stage in the balloting.

3. The whole discussion arose out of the manner in which we should cast our votes if our proposal was accepted. I said that our instructions were to support a site in Europe and this occasioned Graydon's warning. Later in the discussion he urged that we ourselves should take the lead in bringing forward a Canadian site but I said that to do so, too prematurely, might defeat the purpose he had in view.

4. In view of this you may wish to give us more freedom to use our discretion and to follow the United Kingdom only up to the point at which, in our judgment, no site in Europe is likely to secure a two-thirds majority. When this point arises, would it be in order for us to switch our votes to a Canadian site or should we at any stage support the most favoured United States site? Ends.

TELEGRAM 3571 London, December 5, 1945

1. The question of the relative jurisdiction of the Security Council and the General Assembly in matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security has arisen in the Administrative and Budgetary Committee. The Soviet delegation have given up their attempt to have the whole Secretariat organized on organical lines and are now concentrating on having a Political and Security Department that will work mostly for the Security Council. In this they have had the assistance of Stone, a Bureau of the Budget official, who is the United States representative on the Committee and who clearly obtains his instructions from his own Department and not from the State Department whose representatives here favour the proposals of the Executive Committee.

2. The Soviet proposal is for a Department called the Security Council Department, but they are willing that the report should mention that "A certain number of the members of the staff of this Department" shall work for the General Assembly on matter relating to international peace and security.

3. We have been opposed to the Soviet proposal and have had a number of talks with the United Kingdom, United States, Netherlands and Soviet delegations, but the matter has not yet come up for discussion in the Committee. This morning a meeting was held in Jebb's office at which these delegations were represented, as well as Mexico and Czechoslovakia. An effort was made to effect a compromise but without success. The chief difficulty arose over title of Department. Three possible titles emerged as follows:

(1) Security Council Department;

(2) Department for Security Council Affairs; and

(3) Political and Security Council Department.

Gromyko insisted on the first title, but towards the end intimated he might accept the second. The United Kingdom and United States indicated preference for the third title but were willing to accept the second title and were not, repeat not, disinclined to agree to first title. I stood out for inclusion of word "Political" in the title and was strongly supported by Netherlands and Mexico.

6. While, in an effort to secure unanimity, I was prepared this morning to accept the words "Security Council" in the title, I feared that once this is adopted, it will be used by the Soviet Union as an indirect means of restricting the exercise of the political and security functions of the General Assembly. In any event, the proposed compromise is still born owing to the refusal of Gromyko to accept the word "Political".

7. I can see some force in Gromyko's arguments for a Department which will serve chiefly the Security Council, but we fear that if we give way at this stage it may encourage the Soviet Union to make further efforts to restrict the exercise of the functions assigned to the General assembly under the Charter.

8. There is no doubt that the majority of the Technical Committee will support Administrative Organization as proposed by Executive Committee or a compromise that made it clear that the Department could also serve the General Assembly. We consider that substance of Soviet case is met by the provision for a separate division for enforcement measures which would serve the Security Council exclusively.

9. Hugessen has speech prepared along following lines:

(a) The extent of General Assembly's political and security functions under the Charter (see paragraph 2, page 35 of report to Parliament);[150]

(b) Delicate balance achieved at San Francisco in this field would be disturbed in giving the Security Council a privileged position in its relations with the general Political and Security Sections of the Secretariat; and

(c) That such a privileged position would increase the danger of possible rivalries between the Council and Assembly being reflected by division of loyalties within the Secretariat, whose members should owe their allegiance to the whole Organization, not to one organ.

10. Since further efforts to effect a compromise may be made within the next few days, I would appreciate your views and also your opinion on wisdom of voting Soviet Union down on a motion to accept, without change in substance, the relevant portions of the Executive Committee's report. Ends.

2. It was agreed that, as a first choice, the Canadian delegation should support a site in Europe, on the general ground that the successful operation of the organization would thereby be facilitated.

3. If, in the event, a European site is rejected by the delegates, the second choice from our point of view would be some site in the United States, preferably in the northeastern area.

4. Should Canada be proposed, the delegation should describe frankly conditions in this country which might be disadvantageous. The government have in mind, particularly, the lack of accommodation in present circumstances for headquarters as well as for residential purposes and in the matter of hotels. A second consideration which might affect the choice is the comparative distance of many locations in Canada from large centres of population.

We should, of course, prefer the adoption of the proposals of the Executive Committee concerning the Political and Security Department, most of the work of which would be on matters dealt with by the Security Council. I think, therefore, that you should continue to support either the title originally proposed by the Executive Committee or the third alternative mentioned in your paragraph 3. Apart from the question of the title, we feel that the establishment of two divisions inside the Department as proposed is sound and corresponds to the provisions of the Charter. Your telegram No. 17, December 6th.

1. Debate at yesterday's meeting and first part of today's meeting was wholly taken up with question of procedure, Delegations favouring a site in Europe pressing for adoption of Canadian proposal on voting instead of a discussion on recommendation of Executive Committee. Arguments were well summed up by Spaak who referred to reluctance of delegates to speak against location of headquarters in United States.

2. Chairman, at commencement of today's meeting, ruled that Canadian proposal could only be discussed when question of voting came up for consideration after discussion had been completed.

3. After question of procedure had been settled, Philippine delegate led off with rhetorical effort urging location of headquarters in United States in order to maintain that country in the Organization. He was followed by Stevenson who delivered a carefully prepared statement stressing the desire of the United States Government that the decision on the site should be freely reached.

4. I followed, stating that from the point of view of national convenience and our close ties with the United States, the location of headquarters in that country would have advantages for Canada but that we had to consider the question from the point of view of the interests of the Organization as a whole. Because many of the most important problems with which the Organization will have to deal, are European, the Canadian Delegation supported a site in Europe.

5. I found it necessary to make the statement at this early stage for the following reasons:

(1) Our motives in submitting our proposals on voting have been questioned and there was an advantage in coming out into the open rather than letting our position remain obscure until a later stage in the proceedings.

(2) It seemed desirable that, our position should be made clear before the United Kingdom and other European States had declared for Europe, since we were considered by some Delegations to be acting as cat's-paw for the United Kingdom.

(3) Stevenson's statement presented a favourable opportunity for my intervention.

6. Discussion with [Noel-]Baker, Spaak and Massigli, yesterday, revealed that they now favour Liege as a possible compromise site in Europe.

My telegram No. 36, December 7th, (No. 3596). United Nations Headquarters.

1. At delegation meeting this morning Graydon, in a very reasonable statement, reserved his position regarding my statement that the Canadian delegation favoured a site in Europe. He said that this was a matter on which he had personally taken a position in the House of Commons and he felt that our delegation should have made some move to secure the location of the headquarters in Canada. He appreciated fully the arguments I had previously advanced that probably the best chance Canada had of being chosen for the headquarters was for a Canadian site to emerge as a compromise to resolve a deadlock. As a member of the delegation and as one who had personally taken a definite public position, he felt it necessary that his position should be made clear, although he did not want to embarrass the delegation by any public disclaimer at this stage.

2. Knowles then spoke and said that he also wished to reserve his position, although for different reasons than those outlined by Graydon.

3. If it becomes necessary for me to speak on the lines of the instructions in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 17, (No. 2879)[151] Graydon's embarrassment will be further increased. In the debate earlier this week on desirable features of the site, I stressed importance of office and living accommodation to be immediately available. Since lack of accommodation under present circumstances is common to virtually all possible sites other than Geneva, I cannot stress this factor in regard to Canada. Indeed the situation in North America is incomparably better than in Europe, both as regards immediately available accommodation and facilities for early construction. Ends.

My telegram No. 31 of December 5th. Secretariat.

1. A further meeting of the delegations referred to in my previous telegram took place on December 6th, during the course of which a compromise was put forward for the consideration of the Soviet delegation.

2. This compromise was based on a Canadian proposal for the insertion of paragraphs in the report on the Secretariat, emphasizing the functional principle on which it was proposed to organize the Secretariat. During the course of the discussions, Webster tried hard to have us agree to title 2 in paragraph 3 of my telegram No. 31. He argued that there was really very little in a name, but we continued to insist on the inclusion of the word "political" in the title and were strongly supported in this by the Mexican representative. Finally, Pelt[152] proposed as a possible compromise, the acceptance by the Soviet delegation of our paragraphs describing the functional principle in return for the acceptance by us of title 2 and the description of the Department as referred to in paragraph 2 of my telegram No. 31. I agreed to this proposed compromise but Gromyko pleaded for time to consider the Canadian draft paragraphs.

3. This morning, we were again called to a meeting at which the other delegations were present, except the Mexican. The Soviet representative expressed his agreement with the compromise, subject to a few minor textual changes which we were able to agree to. The compromise to be put before the Committee 6 as a draft of the delegations concerned but the proposal has first to be cleared with the Mexican and Brazilian delegations who have, hitherto, strongly supported the Canadian stand and were not represented at today's meeting.

Sir,

The Swedish Minister in Ottawa, who has recently returned from a brief visit to Sweden, called to see the Under-Secretary recently. Before leaving Sweden he had had a conversation with Mr. Osten Unden, the new Swedish Foreign Minister, which he wished to have reported to me. The Swedish Government have formally recorded their readiness to accept all the obligations of membership in the United Nations Organization and have abandoned the policy of neutrality which they have pursued since 1935. You will recall that Sweden, like a number of other smaller European countries, formally reserved its policy in respect of League of Nations obligations after the failure of sanctions against Italy, which they felt had proved that the system of collective security would not protect them.

The new declaration of policy is a welcome indication that Sweden is now prepared to join her forces with other countries under the United Nations Organization in resisting any new aggressor. I think that of all the neutral countries Sweden has probably the biggest contribution to make to the success of the new world organization, particularly in the economic and social fields. I consider that the presence of Sweden in the Organization would strengthen support of the general point of view which we are inclined to put forward, and should on all counts be welcomed.

(c) That, accordingly, the basic advance of each member should be raised from 5,000 dollars (U.S.) to 10,000, and

(d) That the certain members required by Section 2, paragraphs 23-4, to supply the remainder of the fund should be Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, France, India, U.S.S.R., United Kingdom and United States of America.

2. It is suggested that the total fund should be comparable in size with an annual budget, which we are confidentially informed may be 20,000,000 dollars. Only 510,000 dollars would be supplied by the basic advances of the 51 countries. The remainder, of which Canada's share would be 6.75%, would come from the additional advances of the nine countries.

3. The experts further recommend that a permanent working capital fund of substantially the same size eventually replace the emergency one. Advances to this would be made by all members in proportion to their contributions to the United Nations. Meanwhile, it is proposed that members should not, repeat not, set off their advances to the emergency fund against their assessed contributions as suggested in paragraph 23. Accordingly, Canada and eight other countries would be required, in 1946, to make available:

United Nations, Report by the Executive Committee to the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations, p. 96.

(a) Basic advance of 10,000 dollars.

(b) Additional advance depending on FAO scale, and

(c) Annual contribution in full.

4. The emergency working capital fund should be large enough to cover, if necessary, all expenditures, through 1946. The Organization cannot approve its first budget until about May. It is unlikely that funds can be voted by Legislatures until autumn, or possibly later depending on sessions. Actual contributions may be further delayed.

5. The experts, in explaining why the permanent fund should be equally large, advance the following purposes for it:

(a) To "finance security measures" in emergencies.

(b) To provide for enlarged expenditures when necessary between voting a budget in September and beginning of fiscal year in January.

(c) To meet other contingencies.

6. As a result of strong arguments by experts, Committee 6 has approved recommendation that fiscal year be calendar year. The Committee appears favourable to the other proposals, although Russians may object to large outlays in 1946. A meeting to decide on recommendations will be held on Thursday at 5:00 p.m.

7. In the absence of other instructions we shall be taking the following line:

(a) We approve proposals in principle.

(b) We believe that permanent fund as proposed may be unnecessarily large.

(c) We are anxious that the permanent fund be set up as soon as possible because it will provide for equitable proportional participation by all countries and release Canadian advances in excess of equitable proportion. Ends.

Your telegram No. 42 of December 12th, financial proposals. I think you should adopt reserved attitude toward these proposals about which there has been no time to consult anyone else. In addition to the payments required from Canada under your paragraph 3 we shall be expected to pay our final contribution to League of Nations in 1946, which will amount to nearly $500,000 (including provision for I.L.O. for the year). It seems certain that U.N.O. would not be able to spend $20,000,000 in 1946 and my own feeling is that the experts' proposals should be scaled down substantially. Ends.

TELEGRAM 3665 London, December 14, 1945

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Wilgress, Begins: Preparatory Commission telegram No. 45.

Your telegram No. 26. Discussion of procedure and agenda of Security Council.

1. In accordance with instructions given in paragraph 2 of telegram No. 11, November 27th, our attitude in Security Council Committee has been that the compromise embodied in the Executive Committee's report should not be disturbed. We have, therefore, proposed no additions to the proposed agenda, and have only proposed drafting amendments to the proposed rules of procedure. We did, however, propose a commentary† on the rules of procedure which led to debate in last meetings of Committee. This was the basis of the press reports which came to your attention.

2. At first this Committee made very rapid progress and approved the agenda, draft directive to the Military Staff Committee, and the more important of the provisional rules of procedure, in two meetings. Then followed a long debate over the rules on languages. The delegate of Ecuador objected to English and French being the sole working languages and he received support from the Soviet group. The question was referred to the Steering Committee who decided the San Francisco rules[155] should prevail until otherwise decided. Even this decision, however, led to another long debate in the Security Council Committee. Similarly, three meetings of the Committee were devoted to a discussion of secret versus open diplomacy raised by a Syrian amendment to Rule 31.

3. At last meeting of Committee, a commentary on the rules of procedure which we had drafted was introduced and objected to by the representatives of the Great Powers. We put up a very mild defence, but received some support from Australia and Netherlands, after which, at our suggestion, the matter was put to the vote and turned down. This was followed by a discussion of a Syrian amendment pointing out the need for rules of procedure on items listed at bottom of page 45 of Report of Executive Committee. This was combined with a discussion of an Australian proposal for the inclusion of an item in the agenda providing for the constitution of a sub-Committee of the Security Council to consider method of dealing with these items.

4. We gave support to both amendments, but do not intend to press matter any further, particularly as opposition of permanent members is indicated.

5. We felt it was necessary to give support to the Syrian proposal, because it was along the lines of an item included in our commentary, and we had previously opposed the Syrian delegation on their amendment to Rule 31, about which there had been a lengthy debate and on which we had voted with the majority, including the permanent members.

6. The United States representative has expressed his appreciation for our attitude throughout the discussions of this Committee. We have indicated no desire to obstruct work of Committee or to force matters against the opposition of the permanent members of the Security Council. It has been necessary for us, however, to show some constancy with our attitude in Executive Committee, and consistent with your instructions not to accept without question the thesis that the Preparatory Commission has no right to provide the necessary documentation for the Security Council.

7. Committee is likely to complete its work today, and its report will be very much in the form proposed by Executive Committee, but with changes in the language rules and minus any appendix. Ends.

Now that the Canadian preference for a European Headquarters has been made clear publicly, we think that no more need be said on the matter. This reticence may help to avoid some controversy here. TELEGRAM 3675 London, December 17, 1945

Your telegram No. 28 of December 14th.

1. Committee 8 voted on December 15th in favour of location of headquarters in the United States. This was preceded by a vote on Europe. Canada voted for Europe and against United States, since to have voted for United States or to have abstained on the last vote would have been interpreted as lack of courage, and would have caused resentment among supporters of a European site when every vote was of such importance. Abstention would not have won us any approval from those in favour of a seat in the United States. I was able to take advantage of opportunity to move that the vote in favour of the United States be made unanimous.

2. Committee meets today, and after hearing report of Sub-Committee on invitations and data received from the various localities in the United States, it is presumed that there will be discussion on what site in the United States should be chosen. There is now general measure of agreement that the Canadian proposal on voting[156] should be applied to selection of site in the United States, although some delegations feel that selection of specific site should be left to the General Assembly stage.

3. Assuming voting takes place on a specific site, my inclination is to give our first preference to Hyde Park on account of its associations with late President Roosevelt, our second preference to Boston and our third preference to Philadelphia. Delegations who were in favour of Europe appear to incline to Boston, but this site is not favoured by Latin Americans, who object to Boston on grounds of Puritan atmosphere and attitude of superiority towards Latins. The Soviet delegation have told us definitely that they favour site in Eastern United States, and Philadelphia and Duchess County seem to be their preferences. In view of this, I think there are good chances of Duchess County being the site most likely to receive general support, although it suffers from the disability of having no facilities immediately available.

4. Representatives of Navy Island have been undertaking very intensive lobby and are critical in general of our attitude on account of technical difficulty that Navy Island is in Canadian territory; they now propose that site should be located on adjacent Grand Island which is United States Territory. I doubt if this site is likely to have much support owing to general absence of cultural facilities in cities near Niagara frontier.

5. A number of delegations advocate Chicago or some other Middle Western site in order to counter possible growth of isolationism in the United States, but others argue that atmosphere in Middle West might be a handicap rather than an advantage to the Organization.

6. Finally, there is a solid block of about nine delegations representing countries bordering the Pacific who are strongly in favour of San Francisco.

7. Since discussion of specific site is likely to continue over tomorrow's meeting, I should appreciate any views you may be able to transmit, and a general indication as to whether or not you approve of our first preference being Dutchess County, second preference Boston, and third preference Philadelphia. Ends.

Your telegram No. 46 of December 17th.

1. We feel that practical considerations against selection of Duchess County are strong. It is essential that Headquarters should have ample hotel accommodation, easy communication facilities capable of expansion to meet heavy peak loads, and housing, schools, etc., for members of Secretariat. This points to desirability of Headquarters being on outskirts of a city of some size. Boston and Philadelphia in that order seem preferable to Hyde Park.

2. In any event a good deal must depend on suitability of exact site and we do not know enough of specific proposals before Preparatory Commission to make a firm choice at this stage.

TELEGRAM 3719 London, December 20, 1945

SECRET. Following for Wrong from Wilgress, Begins: Preparatory Commission telegram No. 54.

Our telegram No. 42, December 12th, and your reply No. 25 of same date, regarding working capital fund.

1. Since that time experts have submitted three complete revisions of their plan as a result of representations, including our own. Yesterday, Committee 6 took following action:

(a) Recommended establishment at first part of first session of a fund, which is called neither temporary nor permanent.

(b) Advances to this fund "will eventually be set off in a manner to be determined by General Assembly at earliest possible date."

(c) The fund is to be sufficient to cover all expenditures through 1946.

(d) Advances to this fund are to be made in installments by all, repeat all, members in proportion to F.A.O. scale, and the General Assembly is to decide at first part of first session whether it should be the F.A.O.'s first year scale (Canada 5.09%) or second year scale (Canada 3.80%).

(e) F.A.O. scale will be superseded by U.N.O. scale as soon as latter is decided.

(f) Provision will be made at second part of first session for individual adjustments to latter scale.

2. Because of successive revisions of experts' plans, many delegations were not in a position at yesterday's meeting to give firm assent to newest proposals, particularly those delegates whose advances were to be increased from 10,000 dollars to substantially larger figures under F.A.O. scale. Accordingly, the general approval of the new plan is qualified as follows:

"The Committee agreed, in principle, to these paragraphs on the express understanding that they do not prejudge the financial obligations to be undertaken by member States at the General Assembly."

However, there was no opposition at all to the general principles involved.

3. The U.S.S.R. delegation was unable to accept immediately new proposal of experts that the second year of F.A.O. (being more up to date and presumbaly more fair) should be used as a basis for initial advances because they had not time to refer question to their Government. Hence, they asked that the matter be left open as indicated in 1 (d) above. Their percentage under F.A.O. first year is 8 and under second year is 10. On the other hand, the fact that all members would make initial advances, instead of just nine, would reduce their share of the whole in roughly similar proportion. Accordingly, they may well accept second year basis.

4. Argentine and Turkey have made specific reservations because they are not mentioned in either F.A.O. scale.

5. Choice of the host State is still too recent for any progress to have been made in budgeting. United States representatives are still speaking of normal years budget possibly exceeding 20,000,000 dollars, but United Kingdom believe this is substantially too high. At any rate that figure is no longer being used in connection with 1946.

6. One reason advanced in conversations by United States and United Kingdom for keeping the Organization in a very liquid position during first couple of years (in addition to those mentioned in paragraph 5 of our earlier telegram), is the possibility that the Security Council might suddenly wish to initiate extensive investigations or conferences involving large extra-budgetary expenditures. Under such circumstances it would be undesirable for the Council to have a complaint against the Assembly for insufficient provision of funds or, even worse, an excuse for a subsequent attempt to establish independent financial arrangements. For this and other reasons the experts will recommend to the General Assembly that the fund be maintained through 1947 at the level established by advances to meet expenditures through 1946, and that this proposal should be considered in September at the second session. End.

your views which will, I think, be of considerable help to the Canadian delegation at the Assembly.

We have now received a further report from the delegation to the Preparatory Commission on the arrangements contemplated for the initial financing of UNO. This is contained in Mr. Wilgress' telegram No. 54 of December 20th, of which I enclose a copy. It seems to me that the changes made from the earlier plans are practicable and constitute an improvement, and I feel that the Canadian delegation can agree to these proposals whether or not the initial advance is based on the first year's scale or the second year's scale of the Food and Agriculture Organization.

CONFIDENTIAL London, January 14, 1945

DEA/5495-J-40

Rapport du représentant, la Commission préparatoire des Nations Unies

Report by Representative, United Nations Preparatory Commission

CONFIDENTIAL [London,] January 4, 1946

1. Experience at the preparatory Commission demonstrated that if Canada sends to a general international conference a competent and hard-working delegation, it becomes almost automatically one of the Big Five of the conference.

2. French delegations at international conferences during 1945 have been tragically weak. The Scandinavian countries, which used to play so large a role at Geneva, are not yet able to send strong delegations. The strength of the Belgian delegation to London lay in one man, Mr. Spaak, but he played a big role on only one committee, that on the choice of the site. The strength of the Netherlands delegation lay also in one man, Dr. Pelt, but due to his energy and ability he was able to influence very greatly the committees on the General Assembly, on the Secretariat and on finance.

3. The Chinese delegation contained two powerful members — Dr. Koo and Dr. Victor Hoo; without them the Chinese delegation would have played a minor role.

4. The influence of the leading powers at the Conference was probably very much in this order:

United Kingdom
U.S.S.R.
United States
China
Canada Australia Netherlands
Brazil
Mexico
Iran
France

5. The strength of the delegations from Brazil, Mexico and Iran was derived entirely from the ability of Mr. Freitas-Valle, Mr. Nervo and Mr. Entezam respectively.

6. The mixture of members of parliament and of civil servants in the Canadian delegation was a source of great strength. Experienced House of Commons men are able quickly to sense the feeling of an international meeting and to intervene at the right moment and in the right way. In the work of the Preparatory Commission their experience was of particular value in working out the Canadian revisions to the rules of procedure of the various organs.

7. As soon as the delegates arrived in London they were put hard at work in delegation meetings, and in meetings of sub-committees of the delegation. On every weekday throughout the Conference the delegation met from 9 to 10.15 in the morning and held a full discussion of problems which were likely to arise during the next day or so. Thus every member of the delegation was made to feel that he was expected to contribute to the utmost of his ability to the success of the work of the Preparatory Commission.

8. Daily press conferences were held by Mr. Reid with the Canadian newspapermen in London. These began at 10 a.m. and usually lasted until about 10:45 a.m. The direct result of the press conferences was presumably a more intelligent coverage of the news by the Canadian newspapers; the indirect — and probably in the long run the more important — result was that the group of Canadian newspapermen who know something of the real problems of the United Nations is gradually increasing.

9. The ability of Mr. Picard and Mr. Cote to speak fluently in either French or English was a source of strength to the delegation, and it is to be hoped that future Canadian delegations to international conferences will include a substantial group of members who are fluent in French.

10. Much of the influence which Canada exerted at the Preparatory Commission was the result of Canadian membership on the numerous and influential sub-committees which were created. In order to get on as many sub-committees as possible the delegation submitted proposals or amendments as early in the conference as it could. The value of this was amply demonstrated.

11. The Report (dated November 2, 1945) by the Canadian Delegation on the work of the Executive Committee listed in paragraph 9[159] the following seven main points of difference which existed between the delegations represented on the Executive Committee:

(1) The conception of one single Secretariat as opposed to the idea of a separate department of the Secretariat to be allotted to the Security Council;

(2) The relative importance of the criterion of equitable geographical distribution and the criterion of personal competence in the selection of chairman of the working committees of the Assembly and of advisory committees of experts;

(3) The amount of preparatory work which the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission might wisely and usefully do for the first meetings of the Security Council;

(4) The relations of the United Nations with the I.L.O.;

(5) The relations of the United Nations with the League of Nations;

(6) The choice of the site of the United Nations;

(7) The establishment of a temporary Trusteeship Committee.

12. Of these seven points the fourth was not touched upon during the Preparatory Commission since there was general agreement between the powers principally concerned that it would be wise to let the dispute on this stand over until the sessions either of the Assembly or of the Economic and Social Council.

13. The other six points listed did provide the main sources of controversy in the Preparatory Commission, though to these were added two other points — the question of official and working languages, and the question of how many of the United Nations should be permitted to see records of private meetings of the Security Council.

14. The solutions of the major controversies were affected by an agreement which seems to have been arrived at behind the scenes by the United States and the United Kingdom early on in the conference that they would not, if at all possible, press any one of the major controversies to a vote if the vote would result in the Soviet Union being put in a small minority.

15. Thus the first point was met by a compromise under which the Soviet Union was awarded the title of a department — "Department of Security Council Affairs" — but very little else, since this so-called Department of Security Council Affairs will serve both the Assembly and the Security Council in political and security questions. The compromise is, however, an unstable one and though it is to be hoped that it is not re-examined during the first year or so of the United Nations, it will probably require re-examination shortly after.

16. The second point likewise resulted in a compromise under which the criterion of personal competence is not given the weight which it should be given in the interests of the whole Organization.

17. The five Great Powers obviously decided shortly after the Preparatory Commission began its work that they would resist any changes of substance in the Chapter on the Security Council in the Report of the Executive Committee. At the beginning the Great Powers were willing to accept minor improvements in that Chapter. Thus the United States and the United Kingdom members of the Security Council Committee approved informally, and in their personal capacities, the text of the explanatory notes which Canada submitted, and also the text of the amendments on secret balloting on the appointment of the Secretary-General, and on suspension and amendment of the rules. However, shortly after this informal discussion, the United States delegate received instructions from the Chiefs of Staff in Washington to resist any further change however slight. (This information was given us by him in the strictest confidence.) These instructions he interpreted so literally that at one time he said in private that the United States delegation could not accept the deletion of the two "whereas's" from the draft directive to the military staff committee.

18. The controversy on the fifth point — "The relations of the United Nations with the League of Nations" — appears to have resulted in a generally acceptable compromise.

19. The discussion and controversy over the sixth point — "The choice of the site of the United Nations" — demonstrated that the Canadian proposal made in the Executive Committee, that no vote be taken on this recommendation, was sound. The debate would have been less acrimonious, though it might have led to the same result, had it not been forced into a straight-jacket by this recommendation. The choice of the United States will undoubtedly leave a great deal of bitterness. Before the United States was chosen it fortunately became clear however, that, regardless of what the United States said officially, it was pushing very hard to get the seat in the United States. Thus the United States is itself in large part responsible for the choice of the United States as the host state and, being in large part responsible, it must assume an even greater degree of responsibility than before for the success of the United Nations.

20. The controversy over the seventh point — "The establishment of a temporary Trusteeship Committee" proved almost the most difficult to resolve, and unfortunately the final decision was one to which a member [number?] of states had to attach formal reservations — the only formal reservations which were made to any part of the Report of the Preparatory Commission.

21. The results of the work of the Executive Committee and of the Preparatory Commission are encouraging. Within six months of the signature of the Charter at San Francisco all 51 United Nations have ratified the Charter and have reached agreement on a bulky volume of recommendations, resolutions and reports. Unless some unforseen event occurs the result will be that the various organs of the United Nations need each spend only a day or so rubber-stamping the recommendations of the Preparatory Commission. This means that in a day or so each organ will have sent other parts of the Report to committees for study and revision. The organs will thus be able to get down to their real business of dealing with questions of substance within a few days after they are set up.

22. Had the Preparatory Commission not been held, or had it been, as was contemplated by most of the members of the Executive Committee, a formal conference of heads of mission in London to rubber-stamp at plenary sessions the Executive Committee's Report, this happy event would not have been possible and the Assembly would have debated organizational questions for at least four weeks.

23. The form which the Preparatory Commission took seems to have been the accidental result of the fact that the Canadian member of the Executive Committee (Mr. Reid) assumed that all the other members had the same idea of the Preparatory Commission as he had, namely that it would be a hard working conference which would split up into committees. Actually all the members seemed to have had the opposite idea, but when Mr. Reid incidentally mentioned his conception they rallied to it in the course of two weeks or so.

24. Much of the work which the Preparatory Commission did could have been done, and perhaps done as well, by a small group of highly qualified officials got together by the Executive Secretary. This procedure would have been analogous to that followed by Sir Eric Drummond[160] in the early days of the League. However, this procedure would not have had the same educational value which the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission have had on those who participated in their work. The long arguments in the long committee sessions, which went on for thirteen weeks in all, were to a very great extent a discussion between the Soviet world and the Western world. If the Soviet Union had not been present, the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission could have done their work in about one-third of the time they actually took. But the long discussion has given the representatives of the Western world a greater knowledge and understanding of the Soviet approach to international administration and an organized international conference system. Presumably it has likewise given the Soviet representatives a greater knowledge and understanding of the western approach to international administration and an organized international conference system.

25. The Soviet, who are always worried by the thought that they do not possess persons who can compete on equal terms at international conferences with representatives of the Western world, must feel, as the result of the work of the last six months, somewhat more assured. The individual capacity of their delegates to the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission was on the average as high or higher than that of any other delegation. Their international lawyers topped all the other international lawyers present except Mr. Bailey of Australia. Moreover, their men have visibly grown in ability in the past five months — Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Roschin, for example, are now much more able to hold their own in discussion without having to fall back on the simple negative repeated monotonously for a long period.

26. One dominant theme in the first Assembly of the United Nations, as in all future Assemblies, will be the preservation of a proper balance between the Assembly, the Security Council and the Secretary-General. The smaller powers will try to tip the balance in favour of the Assembly as against the Security Council. The British States and all other states accustomed to responsible government will resist attempts by the United States to make the Secretary-General not the chief civil servant but the international equivalent of a United States cabinet member (with however no President to be responsible to). The Soviet will play up the special position of the Security Council and will resist efforts by the Assembly to occupy effectively the political and security field.

27. During the last six months it has become clear that the powers of the Assembly are potentially larger than was thought when the Charter was signed. Thus, though the Charter explicitly gives the Assembly power only to establish regulations on the appointment of the staff of the Secretariat, the 51 United Nations have agreed to a report in which the General Assembly is requested to approve recommendations concerning nearly every aspect of the work of the Secretariat.

28. This power flows from Article 10 of the Charter under which the General Assembly may make recommendations on any matter relating to the powers and functions of any of the organs of the United Nations (subject to the one proviso contained in Article 12, which relates only to disputes and situations).

29. Moreover the Assembly derives a potentially enormous power because the budget of the organization must be approved by it and, in approving the budget, it can settle for example the structure of the Secretariat.

30. The interests of the Organization will be furthered by preserving intact all the implied as well as the explicit powers of the Assembly, even though it may not be wise for the Assembly to exercise all its powers immediately or in relation to certain matters. It is therefore, suggested that Canadian delegations to meetings of the organs of the United Nations should be instructed to resist any interpretation of the Charter which restricts the potential powers of the Assembly.

31. A decision will have to be made on how far the Canadian delegation to the Assembly should go in pressing for the election of competent chairmen of the main committees. The Great Powers will prepare a slate of committee chairmen and expect it to go through automatically. This slate will probably contain a number of incompetents. Since it is embarrassing to single out one or two nominees and oppose them, it might perhaps be wise if Canada, in consultation with a number of other responsible middle powers, agreed in advance to arrange for contested elections in all the main committees or to press for reconsideration of the proposal for a nominations committee.

32. It is clearly unlikely that the resolution on atomic energy framed at Moscow[161] will go through the Assembly without critical examination. One question which will be asked is whether the veto extends to the giving of directives to the Atomic Energy Commission and to the publication of its recommendations. The policy of the Canadian Government on this and on other aspects of the draft resolution will need to be communicated to the Canadian delegation.

33. Another item which is delicate and on which instructions will be needed is the question of refugees which is now on the agenda for both the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council.

34. In the debate in the Assembly the Members will raise urgent questions which they consider should be given immediate attention. Possibly Canada ought to be prepared to raise itself a number of urgent questions to which it thinks high priority should be given.

35. The procedure to be followed in calling international conferences on trade and on health will occasion debate in the Assembly. The Mexican representative, Mr. Nervo, proposed late in the Preparatory Commission that instead of calling special ad hoc conferences on questions such as these, an extraordinary session of the Assembly should be summoned to discuss each of them. This proposal was made too late to be examined thoroughly, but it would appear to offer obvious advantages. For one thing an extraordinary session of the Assembly called to draft an international trade convention would automatically have from its very first session an agreed set of rules of procedure. It would also have a staff experienced in handling an international conference. Moreover, the use of the Assembly for this purpose would increase the prestige of the Assembly, and would tend to develop its international legislative powers. There would also be less danger that an independent and unrelated agency would be established since the General Assembly, even though it might decide that a separate agency should be established for trade problems, would at the same time work out the agreement between that agency and the United Nations.

36. The deferred controversy over relations with the I.L.O. will break into the open either in the Assembly or the Economic and Social Council, and instructions on this matter will be required by the delegation.

37. Another matter on which instructions will be required will be on the treaty between the United Nations and the United States relating to the site of the United Nations. If a point near the border is chosen, such as Grand Island, it will probably be necessary to include in this treaty, or in a supplementary treaty made with Canada, provisions under which Canada undertakes special obligations. It might, for example, be necessary for Canada to transfer to the United Nations the adjacent Navy Island.

38. Another matter on which instructions will be required is on the general multilateral convention granting privileges and immunities to the United Nations. It looks as if the Chinese and Soviet Delegations may be reluctant to agree to a binding and precise convention and may prefer innocuous general resolutions.

39. The sub-committee on the permanent seat of the United Nations will propose to the Assembly some six seats which will probably include Boston, New York, Hyde Park, perhaps a place in the Connecticut River Valley, and Grand Island. Canada's preference between these sites should be indicated.

40. Other questions on which instructions would be useful are the following:

(1) Loans guaranteed by the League of Nations
(2) Setting up of Trusteeship Council
(3) Question of working and official languages
(4) The admission of new Members
(5) The appointment of the Secretary-General
(6) Elections of Members to the Councils

41. Canada's chances of election to the Economic and Social Council are at the present not good. We can scarcely hope for election unless we receive the support of most, if not all, of the Latin-American republics. These republics seem to be firmly convinced that a state which is a member of the Security Council ought not to be elected to the Economic and Social Council. They believe in the sharing of honours. In this attitude they appear to be supported by a considerable number of other delegations. It would seem that the best thing for us to do is to meet this argument head on in public in a speech in the General Assembly, and to support for membership in the Economic and Social Council states which have been elected to the Security Council.

42. At present we have a more than even chance of being elected to the Security Council, but it is possible that our chances may be weakened by the application of the theory of the distribution of honours since we are virtually assured of election to a very important body, the Atomic Energy Commission.

43. Competition for the Security Council will probably be diminished if three of the non-permanent members are elected for only 8 month terms since states which fear that they will only get an 8 month term may prefer to wait till September and try to get a 2 year term. Canada's chances of election will also of course be affected by the general position it takes in controversies between the Great Powers and the smaller powers. If Canada swings too much to the support of the Great Power position it may lose more small power votes than it will gain from the votes of great powers and their satellites.

44. So far in the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission Canada has steered a middle course, and has been able, on the merits of the questions which have come up, to vote against the Great Powers about as frequently as it has voted with them. It is to be hoped that this happy situation will continue.

No. 304 Ottawa, March 26, 1945

Sir,

You will recall that no effort was made during the Dumbarton Oaks conversations to prepare a statute for the International Court of Justice envisaged by Chapter VII of the proposals on the establishment of a general International Organization that resulted from those discussions.[162] The proposals contemplated that the statute should be either (a) the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice continued in force with such modifications as may be desirable or (b) a new statute in the preparation of which the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice should be used as a basis.

It is now deemed desirable to have a preliminary meeting of jurists of the United Nations to prepare, prior to the San Francisco Conference, a draft of a statute to be submitted to that conference for consideration.

Accordingly, the Government of the United States of America on behalf of itself and of the Governments of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the Republic of China, invites the Government of Canada to send a representative to a meeting of the United Nations Committee of Jurists to be convened at Washington on April 9, 1945, for the purpose of preparing a draft of a statute of an International Court of Justice.

The above named governments suggest:

a. That each of the invited governments appoint one representative to the Committee of Jurists, to be accompanied, if desired, by not more than two advisers.

b. That if the work of the Committee of Jurists is not completed by the time the United Nations Conference begins, sessions should be continued at San Francisco.

Excellency,

I have the honour to refer to your note No. 304, March 26, 1945, in which you transmitted, on behalf of the Governments of the United States of America, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the Republic of China, an invitation to the Government of Canada to send a representative to a meeting of the United Nations Committee of Jurists to be convened at Washington on April 9, 1945, for the purpose of preparing a draft of a statute of an International Court of Justice.

The Government of Canada will be glad to cooperate in this work and has appointed as a representative to this meeting of the United Nations Committee of Jurists John E. Read, K.C., Legal Adviser of the Department of External Affairs.

The arrangements for advisers have not yet been completed, but it will probably be possible to let you have their names within the next day or two.

UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION
CONFIDENTIAL MEMORANDUM
MEETING OF COMMITTEE OF JURISTS, WASHINGTON
APRIL 9TH-20TH, 1945

TOP SECRET

1. The report of the Rapporteur and the draft Statute of an International Court of Justice[163] give a clear indication of the work which was done at the Washington meetings of the Committee.

2. This Memorandum will confine itself to the points which are likely to give rise to controversy at San Francisco.

3. The questions raised in Article 1 of the Draft Statute.

There are two contrasting views with regard to the nature of the Statute.

The first view is that the old Statute should be continued and that the new Statute should be in the nature of a revision and consolidation of the old. A very substantial number of countries represented on the Committee of Jurists favour this course. It offers definite advantages. It ensures the continuity of the Court. It preserves its jurisdiction under several hundreds of international agreements, many of which continue in force, the most recent being the Aviation Agreement.[164] It preserves the position of States which have accepted the Optional Clause.

The second view, which has received substantial support, is that a new Statute, based upon the old Statute adapted to meet present-day needs, should be brought into operation by a new multilateral agreement. It would be annexed to and form a part of the Charter. It is likely that it can be brought into being with less delay than would be involved in a Statute providing for revision and consolidation. The old Statute has no provisions for amendment and changes can only be made with the unanimous agreement of all of the parties. The effect of most of the treaties conferring jurisdiction can, to a large extent, be preserved by a General Agreement along the lines suggested in the comment in the Canadian brief,† para. 3, sub-para.(d), pp.7 and 8.[165] Upon the acceptance of the Charter and Statute of the Court by all countries, there would be complete preservation of existing jurisdiction.

There is a political angle to this question which should not be overlooked. Some of the countries, especially the Soviet Union, would have very strong objections to the continuation of the old statute. It would give a voice in the organisation and control of the Court to States which are not members of The United Nations, such as Estonia, Germany, Japan, Italy, Spain, etc. If Chapter VII, para. 5 of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals is intended to mean that States which are not members of The United Nations can only be parties to the Statute upon appropriate action by the General Assembly and the Security Council, the continuation of the existing Statute would be inconsistent with the proposal.

4. The disposition of the questions raised in Article 1 may involve the submission of drafts.

(a) Suggested draft based upon continuation of the present Statute and Court.

Article 1.

The Permanent Court of International Justice established in 1920 shall function under this Statute, and shall be the chief judicial organ of the United Nations. This Court shall be in addition to the Permanent Court of Arbitration organised by the Conventions of The Hague of 1899 and 1907 and to other tribunals to which States are at liberty to submit their disputes for settlement.

(In this draft the particular references to the old Statute are restricted to a minimum with a view to making it less offensive. The second sentence is modified in accordance with understandings reached at the meeting of the Committee of Jurists. The preservation of the position of special tribunals of arbitration was inconsistent with the French text and seemed to imply that the position of general tribunals might be prejudiced. It would be better to drop the sentence out entirely, but if it is retained it is essential that the preservation of alternative methods of disposition of disputes should be broad enough to extend to all types of tribunals including the International Joint Commission!)

Paragraph (d) read as follows:

(d) Continuity and existing jurisdiction could be substantially preserved by appropriate provisions in a new Statute of the Court. For example, a provision whereby it was agreed by all of the participating States that all treaties conferring jurisdiction upon the Permanent Court, to which they were parties, should be deemed to confer jurisdiction upon the Permanent Court of International Justice as established by the new Statute, would be effective in most instances and would ultimately be completely effective upon accession of all, or substantially all, civilized States. In so far as the Optional Clause is concerned, there could be a similar provision in the new Statute, and those countries which were still content to accept compulsory jurisdiction would doubtless accept it.

Article 1.

(1) The Permanent Court of International Justice is hereby established and shall function under the present Statute as the chief judicial organ of The United Nations.

(2) This Court shall be in addition to the Court of Arbitration organised by the Conventions of The Hague of 1899 and 1907 and to other tribunals to which States are at liberty to submit their disputes for settlement.

(3) The Permanent Court of International Justice established under the provisions of this Article shall be deemed to continue and may exercise, under the provisions of any treaties or conventions in force, any jurisdiction which has been conferred upon the Permanent Court of International Justice established by the Protocol of Signature of December 16, 1920, by treaties and conventions now in force.

(The third paragraph might just as well be placed among transitory provisions in a Protocol bringing the Statute into force; or in the Charter; or in the Protocol bringing the Charter into force, along with other transitory provisions. It should be recognized that it would not immediately preserve all existing jurisdiction. It would, for example, preserve jurisdiction under the Aviation Convention because the parties to it and to the Charter would be identical. It would preserve jurisdiction under all Agreements in which both or all of the parties accepted the present Statute. It would presumably be made a condition of admission to the fold that other countries, both enemy and neutral, should agree to the Court's jurisdiction. Ultimately all existing jurisdiction would be preserved.)

5. There is no special Canadian interest in this matter. The Canadian and American Bar Associations recommended that the present Statute should be continued with necessary modifications, but that, if the creation of a new Statute should be deemed unavoidable, the continuity with the past should be fully maintained and jurisdiction conferred on the Court under existing treaties and agreements should be preserved. There would be no serious disadvantage to any country concerned, and this appears to me to be a case in which even a substantial majority should give way to meet a minority position if the concession would result in a more general acceptance of the Court.

6. The questions raised in Articles 3-13 of the draft Statute.

7. It will be observed that alternative proposals are presented, covering some of these Articles, which are concerned with the nomination and election of Judges. The following comments will indicate the position:

(a) The Committee of Jurists decided by a very large majority that the number of the Court should be maintained at 15 members. The U.K. delegation tried hard to reduce the number to 9. Bearing in mind that the system of nomination and election was of such a character as to make it certain that the Court would always contain members from the countries having permanent seats on the Security Council, it was thought by most of the members of the Committee that there would be dissatisfaction with a Court of 9, with only 4 members from the other countries including both middle and small powers. It was also thought that 4 was too small a number to give effect to the provisions of Article 9. The Sub-Committee which studied this problem had the advantage of consultation with two members of the Court, and with one ex-Judge (the Chinese representative) who had sat on the Court when it consisted of 11 members and whose term of office extended over into the period when the numbers had been increased to 15. It was made clear to the Sub-Committee that the increase to 15 members was essential in order to enable the Court to do its work. Further, most of the Sub-Committee expected that there would be a substantial increase in the business of the court arising from United States membership. The Committee and Sub-Committee were influenced by the recommendation of the American and Canadian Bar Associations that the number of 15 Judges should not be reduced. There would therefore appear to be good reasons for resisting an effort which will probably be made at San Francisco to re-open this question and to reverse the position taken by the Committee of Jurists.

(b) On the question of whether Judges should be nominated by governments or by national groups, there was a very close vote. The Committee was equally divided and the Chairman ruled that the motion was lost. On this point the Bar Associations recommended that the present practice should be continued, but there does not seem to be any strong Canadian interest either way. The present practice is described in the Canadian brief at p. 21 para 2, and it is clear that the method followed in Canada could be continued even if the Statute provided for nomination by the Government. When I sat on the sub-committee studying this point, I followed the Bar Association recommendation, but was prepared to accept the U.K. proposal in deference to the views of the majority of the sub-committee. When the question was raised again in the main committee as the result of a very strong appeal from the United States delegation, I went back to my original position. I think, however, that this is a case in which the United States might very well be willing to make concessions. The United States view is based largely on the embarrassment which would be placed upon their Government if they had to nominate directly, but they could follow the same course as we do and accept the advice of their national group and thus get rid of most of their political difficulty.

(c) The third point relates to the number of nominations. The United Kingdom led a movement to cut down the number to one and to restrict the countries to nomination of their own nationals. Here again I followed the general views which had been approved by the Bar Associations, bearing in mind that there had been some advantage to countries such as Canada, which were unlikely to have Judges on the Court, to have a part in the nomination of candidates who were likely to succeed. There is, however, no very strong Canadian interest on this point. On the other hand, I do not think that there is any very strong United Kingdom interest unless San Francisco reverses the position taken by the Committee of Jurists on the next point.

(d) The United Kingdom had proposed that defeated candidates should become members of the Court available on call to serve on the Court when the Court became short-handed. The countries would be limited to such members in their selection of ad hoc Judges. If it is revived and action taken in Washington reversed, it would follow automatically that each country should be limited to a single nomination of one of its own nationals.

8. The questions raised in Article 36 of the draft Statute.

(a) Paragraph one defines the extent of the jurisdiction of the Court. If the parties agreed to submit a matter to the Court which did not come within the limitations prescribed by paragraph one, the Court would be bound to rule that it was without jurisdiction and that it could not deal with the matter notwithstanding the concurrence of the parties. The United Kingdom urged very strongly that there should be inserted the word "justiciable" governing "cases" or some similar word or phrase such as "of a legal character." The reason for this revision is to prevent the Court from being concerned with political questions. There was a strong feeling to the effect that the Court would lose the respect of the world if it went beyond justiciable matters in its jurisdiction. This point was taken by Judge Jackson of the Supreme Court of the United States in a very able address before the American Society of International Law on April 14. There was general agreement in the Committee that it was desirable that the Court not be concerned with other than judiciable disputes. There were, however, many of the delegates who felt that "justiciable" was a very vague word, lacking in exact definition. Others felt that the alternative phrase "of a legal character" might present unforeseen difficulties. Further, the application of the paragraph by the Court during the last 25 years had not presented any difficulty. The principal objection was to the Austrian reference which was clearly both a justiciable dispute and a dispute of a legal character. The objection, if sound, should have been taken to the action of the Council of the League in referring the matter to the Court. The Committee therefore by an appreciable majority rejected the proposal.

(b) The principal point of difference concerned the question of compulsory jurisdiction. The draft in the right-hand column presents the views of a substantial majority of the Committee. It provides compulsory jurisdiction for legal disputes in four classes of cases. The compulsory jurisdiction under paragraph 2 of this draft is narrower in its scope than the voluntary jurisdiction which may arise under paragraph 1, but it is still very extensive. There is no provision for reservations or for contracting out in any way. There was a very solid objection to this position taken by the U.K., U.S.A., U.S.S.R., France, Norway and perhaps three or four other countries. I objected to it largely by reason of the fact that it offered no scope for essential reservations such as those which are set forth on pp. 38, 39, 40 and 41 of the Canadian brief. The United States delegate, Mr. Hackworth, who was President of the Committee, made a very strong appeal for the maintenance of the system of the Optional

Clause. He assured the Committee that the United States could be expected to accept the Statute of the Court on the basis of the Optional Clause and that there was good reason to expect that the Optional Clause would also be accepted by the U.S.A. perhaps later. He did not say that the United States would be unable to accept a Statute with compulsory jurisdiction, but I am convinced that he had a good deal of doubt as to United States acceptance on a compulsory basis. The British and French objected strongly, but I think that they would be unwilling to stay out of the Court even if it were established on a compulsory basis if the Statute were accepted by the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. It was very clear that the Soviet representatives did not think that their Government could accept the Statute on a compulsory basis.

(c) The Bar Associations had put forward a proposal which was the basis of the draft in the right-hand column, but which included an additional provision that, in becoming a party to the Statute, a State should be permitted to attach reservations to its acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction and thereafter to withdraw or waive or limit such reservations. Reservations made by a State were to enure to the advantage of any other party to a dispute against which the State might have invoked the Court's jurisdiction. This view commended itself to a good many of the delegates. It was actually put to a vote and defeated, but in view of the fact that few of the members of the Committee heard the motion or knew what they were voting about, it is not certain what the actual sentiment of the Committee was on the point. In substance a provision of this sort would go a long distance to meet the difficulties which are faced by the countries which prefer the Optional Clause. It would not, however, meet the traditional jealousy of the U.S. Senate in asserting its right to make the approval of the Senate a condition upon the validity of any Agreement for submitting a question to international arbitration. Traditionally, the Senate has insisted that particular international questions should be subject to approval by two-thirds majority of the Senate. Further, I am doubtful as to whether the Russians would accept this compromise position. Insofar as Canada is concerned, our experience in the past would indicate the need to extend it so as to make it possible, not merely to withdraw or waive or limit reservations, but also to add additional reservations to meet future conditions. With such an extension the Canadian position would be indistinguishable in substance from that which we have enjoyed under the Optional Clause.

(d) This question, like the point arising under Article 1, is the sort of question which might affect the question of acceptance or non-acceptance of the Statute. It might give rise to difficulties which would go beyond the Court question and affect the broader position under the Charter of The United Nations. It might form a focal point for a revival of isolationist sentiment on this continent. I should think that it would be necessary fully to explore the U.K., U.S.A., U.S.S.R. and French position and to try to avoid any position which might wreck the main scheme. (I do not think that my fears in this point were shared by the Canadian Advisers, except, perhaps, Chaput).

(e) It should not be overlooked that this question is one of differences in the method of approach to an objective which is desired by all. There is a general desire, shared by all of the United Nations, to reach a position in which there will be general compulsory jurisdiction to deal with legal questions. One view based upon logical reasoning to which there is no easy answer, is that the objective could best be attained by an immediate universal acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction. The other view is that the objective could more certainly be obtained by beginning with voluntary jurisdiction and providing machinery whereby the countries concerned could accept compulsory jurisdiction under the Optional Clause. Following upon the adoption of the Statute of the Permanent Court in 1920, 46 out of 51 parties to the Statute accepted the Optional Clause. It took nearly 10 years before the United Kingdom, Canada and other nations of the Commonwealth were ready to accept the Optional Clause. There can be little doubt that acceptance would have been universal if it had not been for the decline in internationalism in the "30's". If, as it is hoped, the United Nations, as a scheme for World Organization, succeeds, there will be a progressive growth of world sentiment favouring the international disposition of political and juridical questions. It can be expected that this will be accomplished by a general acceptance of the Optional Clause so that it will not be many years before there is in fact universal acceptance of the principle of the settlement of international disputes by judicial process. It is suggested that the Canadian policy might be to bring about the acceptance of the draft in the right-hand column with the addition of a suitable provision for reservations; but that, if it proves to be impossible to get unanimous acceptance of this course, the Canadian policy might be to urge the majority to acquiesce in the maintenance of the present position, rather than to take a chance on non-acceptance of the Statute by any of the countries concerned.

10. Chambers to deal with particular cases.

11. The most important change in the Statute of the Court is tucked away in Article 26. This Article provides that the Court may at any time form a Chamber for dealing with a particular case. It provides that the number of judges to constitute such a Chamber is to be determined by the Court with the approval of the parties. This needs to be read in conjunction with Article 28 which provides that the Chambers under Articles 26 and 29 may, with the consent of the parties, sit and exercise their functions elsewhere than at The Hague.

12. While there is a sort of conventional understanding that everybody should talk about what wonderful work the Court has done, it is impossible to overlook the fact that the Court as it has functioned is not an entirely satisfactory world tribunal. It has not attracted to itself a large proportion of international questions which are dealt with by pacific means. It has failed to supplant ad hoc tribunals, especially where difficult problems need to be dealt with. We have had, during the period when the Court has been functioning, a dozen or more important international questions, all with the United States. They have been dealt with for the most part by the International Joint Commission, with two of them by special tribunals, namely, the Trail Smelter[166] and the I'm Alone[167]. Measured on a basis of their relative importance, they would compare favourably with the general run of cases before the Permanent Court. I should not be inclined to advocate the transferring to the World Court of the job which is done by the International Joint Commission. On the other hand, a World Court should be capable of doing the sort of jobs that the Commission does very well indeed.

To deal with cases such as those referred to above, it is necessary to have a reasonably small Court which is capable of moving to the place where the international dispute has arisen. In the Trail Smelter case, for example, the tribunal met at the following places: Washington, Spokane, Ottawa, Montreal. In addition it surveyed the Columbia valley and went over the plants at Trail. It could not have done justice otherwise. It may be important that an international tribunal should present itself in the place in which the dispute has arisen and give to the people affected in both countries concerned an opportunity to have their day in court. A feeling may thus be created that justice is being done and people are ready to accept an adverse decision by a court more readily, if they have the feeling that the court has given full consideration to all aspects of the question.

The present provision gives the Court the power which is necessary in order to enable it to work out this problem in conjunction with the parties. At Washington there was an attempt by the Philippine representative to curtail the powers of the Court on this point by specifying the number of judges who should form a Chamber of this sort. This movement was successfuly resisted by Mr. Hackworth and there should be no real difficulty in preserving the provisions of Article 26(2) and (3) intact.

13. There is one point which arose with the discussion of Article 31. In the provision for ad hoc judges the right of representation seems to be limited to cases inter partes. We had some discussion of an alternative draft for para. (2) and (3) which had been put forward by the United Kingdom representative. The alternative draft was clearly preferable from every point of view, especially in that it made it possible to provide for ad hoc judges in the case of proceedings for advisory opinions where a particular country had an interest. It is possible that a reference might be made under Dumbarton Oaks proposal, Chapter 8, Section A, para. 6, or under Article 65 of the present Statute, in which there might be an important interest of a particular country which did not have a judge on the Court. A question might be dealt with by this procedure which would be as important or even more important than questions arising inter partes. When we were discussing this question in the drafting committee, there was a general feeling that Article 31 should be left as it is. It was very badly drafted, but it has worked well in practice. I think that we had in mind the possible incorporation of another provision applying the provisions of Article 31 to proceedings under Chapter 4 of the Statute. We never got around to it. The place where we thought that it might be dealt with was in Article 68, and I think on the whole that the Court would have ample power in that Article if a case arose in which a particular State had a genuine interest in a proceeding of the same sort as it would have in a proceeding inter partes. I am mentioning the point, but I am inclined to think that the matter will not give rise to any practical difficulties and can safely be left to a broad construction of Article 68.

14. The Committee did not discuss the question of provision for advisory opinions in the Charter itself. It did, however, provide for advisory opinions in the Statute, and there was no dissent with regard to the extension which was involved in Article 65 as drafted, where the power to refer was given to the General Assembly as well as to the Security Council. This was carrying out the same scheme as in Article 65 of the old Statute. It was not in accord with the position taken in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals.

It should be noted that the scheme put forward in Article 65 of the present Statute is broad in its scope. It does not go as far as the I.L.O. want. It does not give to the I.L.O. or to any other international organisation a right of direct reference to the Court. The position taken on this as on other matters by the Committee of Jurists was dictated to some extent by a very obvious prejudice against the I.L.O. On the other hand, the giving of the power to make references for advisory opinion to the General Assembly would, I think, be adequate to enable the General Assembly to authorise references by the Social and Economic Council, which is probably a good thing. Provision is made whereby questions can be laid before the Court by the Secretary General of the United Nations under instructions from the General Assembly which presumably would enable the General Assembly to give general instructions, as well as instructions in a particular case, and the general instructions might well extend to matters referred by the Economic and Social Council within limitations imposed by the general instructions.

I am not sure that the position taken will stand up at San Francisco. There may well be a strong movement to limit the right to lay questions before the Court for advisory opinion to the Security Council. There may well be a strong movement to limit the right to lay questions before the Court for advisory opinion to the Security Council. There may well be a strong movement for taking the provisions of Chapter 8, Section A, para. 7 outside of the scope of the proviso to Chapter 6, Section C, para 3. In substance, if not in theory, the power to refer a matter for advisory opinion involves compulsory jurisdiction imposed upon a country which has a direct and substantial interest in the matter referred.

Following from Read to Chipman, Begins: With regard to the proposals for changing the text of Article 36, I should like to make the following observations:

(a) The text settled at Washington is in my opinion adequate for all purposes. It is essentially the same text as Article 36 of the old statute. More than fifty countries adopted the optional clause, a substantial number making reservations. I do not think that it is even arguable, under International Law, that there was no legal power to make reservations. "The statute" is not a "statute," i.e. it is not an enactment of a legislature and cannot be compared to an act of the Parliament of Canada; and is not subject to the same rules of law in the matter of construction. It must be interpreted and applied in accordance with International Law. When the new "statute" is given legal effect, it will be necessary to take into account the legal position under the old "statute," especially where the articles are substantially identical.

(b) Further, apart from the interpretation placed upon "the statute" by the parties, I should have no doubt myself about a power to make reservations. The acceptance of the optional clause is fundamentally a unilateral declaration under which the declarant power has by its unilateral act accepted jurisdiction vis-à-vis the other countries which have made or may later make similar declarations. The other countries have no power to question a limitation by the declarant state of the jurisdiction thus assumed insofar as the limitation eliminates a class of legal disputes. It might be contended that a declarant state could not eliminate a specific dispute. A question might even be raised as to the elimination of disputes as between particular states, e.g. as between members of the Commonwealth. There could, however, be no grounds for questioning the elimination of any classes of legal disputes by way of reservation.

(c) Assuming that you are intending to cut out the words "in all or any of," I agree that it is necessary to provide for authority to make reservations.

(d) I should have thought that it would be a wise course to have a general power such as that which has in fact existed under Article 36 of the old statute. Assuming the desirability of universal compulsory jurisdiction, it is expedient to offer substantial inducements to countries with a view to their acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction. A general power of reservation, such as we now have, has proved to be a most effective inducement. It is possible that if you adopt a restricted list of powers of reservation, you may postpone the realization of universal compulsory jurisdiction. The experience of the past has shown that there is no likelihood of a general power of reservation being abused.

(e) On the question of the "war" reservation, I think that we would be justified in relying upon rebus sic stantibus, but you will remember that our departmental view on that point is not shared by the Foreign Office nor, I think, by the other Commonwealth countries.

(f) On the other points of revision in wording, I find it difficult to comment without a precise text. I think that it would be a very great mistake to leave out the word "compulsory." I should think that it would be of the utmost importance to insure that acceptance of the optional clause brought about compulsory jurisdiction and clear, unequivocal words should be used for the purpose.

TELEGRAM H-258 San Francisco, May 31, 1945

Following for Read from Chipman, Begins: I have your telegram D-267 of May 30th. The Sub-Committee is reporting tomorrow in favour of the optional clause, with no changes but the following, namely: the substitution of the words "in all legal disputes" for the words "all or any of the classes of" as a sweetener for those who wanted compulsory jurisdiction, and an insertion of a new paragraph 4 between old paragraph 3 and old paragraph 4, now paragraph 5, of following: "Declarations made under Article 36 of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice and which are still in force shall be deemed as between the parties to the present statute to have been made under this article and shall continue to apply in accordance with their terms."

Hackworth and Fitzmaurice[168] both thought "all or any" unnecessary and that new paragraph 4 was sufficient to preserve the possibility of reservations. They also point out that all adherences in the past covered all four classes of disputes enumerated in paragraph 2 and that there would be no difficulty in getting adherences on the new language. It is hoped that with these changes the Committee's report may be accepted. I should be glad to know if you agree. Ends.

Your H-258, May 31, 1945. Following from Read to Chipman, Begins;

1. I have noted substitution of words "in all legal disputes" for words "all or any of the classes of," in paragraph (2) of Article 36. The references in second sentence of last paragraph of your telegram suggest that Hackworth and Fitzmaurice may have overlooked the meaning of the words "all or any of the classes of legal disputes concerning." They may think that they relate to an acceptance of all or any of four classes (a) (b) (c) or (d). We are of the opinion that "all or any" relate to an indeterminate number of classes of legal disputes concerning the subjects enumerated in subparagraphs (a) to (d) inclusive.

2. We are of the opinion that right of reservation upon declaration is based upon the existence of these words. Reservation can more properly be referred to as "exclusions" and, if you will look at the "Permanent Court of International Justice 1920-42" Hudson at page 467, you will see the close relationship between the words in question and the right of exclusion upon acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction.

3. We have no objection whatsoever to the elimination of "all or any," provided that something is put into Article 36 which would give rise to a right of reservation or exclusion.

4. We are convinced that the new paragraph 4, as quoted in your telegram, does not preserve the possibility of reservation or exclusion.

5. While we view the drafting of the new paragraph 4 without enthusiasm, we are of the opinion that it would result in a partial preservation of the Canadian position as it now exists under our declarations of 1930 and 1939.[169] It would still exclude the classes of disputes to which they make specific reference. On the other hand, it would no longer be possible to make a new reservation or exclusion, and it would not be possible either to amend or even to renounce any of the reservations already made.

6. The effect of the new paragraph 4 would be that new members would have an option, but old members would not. I am not suggesting that this would be an objection.

7. The new draft would create a position in which Canada and other countries would have effective reservations or exclusions. A new party, such as the U.S.A. would have no power of reservation. For example, a dispute over the provisions of a United States Immigration Act would be subject to the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, but a similar dispute over a provision of a similar Canadian Act would be excluded from the jurisdiction of the Court. I have no doubt that you will be giving due weight to the possibility that an issue would be raised in this manner which might make it difficult to obtain ratification in countries such as U.S.A. and U.S.S.R..

8. I have no doubt that you have given due weight to the effect of the elimination of a power of reservation upon the acceptance by new countries, such as U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. of compulsory jurisdiction under Article 36.

9. My own personal opinion is that the course suggested in the proposed amendments would set back for many years the possibility of reaching a position in which there would be universal acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of Court on most important matters.

TELEGRAM San Francisco, June 4, 1945

IMPORTANT. Following for Read from Chipman, Begins:

1. I have your telegram D-282 of June 1st.

2. I have delayed replying until I had discussed your points with Hackworth, Malkin[170] and Fitzmaurice.

3. I should have added to my telegram H-258 of May 31st reference to the following paragraph in the Sub-Committee's report:

"The question of reservations calls for an explanation. As is well known, the article has constantly been interpreted in the past as allowing States accepting the jurisdiction of the Court to subject their declarations to reservations. The Sub-Committee has considered such interpretation as being henceforth established. It has, therefore, been considered unnecessary to modify paragraph 3 (of Article 36) in order to make express reference to the right of the States to make such reservations."

4. Hackworth's view expressed on Saturday afternoon is that this paragraph, if made of record as part of the Conference report, will cover the matter. Malkin and Fitzmaurice, whom I saw this morning, take the same view. Malkin had earlier raised your point with Fitzmaurice, who thought that the power to make reservations did not come from the words "all or any of the classes" since these would only permit reservations excepting entire classes. This view seems reinforced by French text. Malkin is now inclined to think that the more indefinite the source of power to make reservations, the better, provided the Sub-Committee's report be of record. He also thinks that since

Sir William Malkin, Legal Adviser, Foreign Office.

Russia and the United States concurred both in the Sub-Committee's report and in Article 36 as drafted therein and, generally speaking, since all those who are interested in reservations also adopted the article as drafted, there was no need to trouble further as to the likelihood of general adherence. He also thinks there could be no difference about further reservations, modifications or renunciations.

5. The Sub-Committee was appointed because it seemed impossible to get a two-thirds majority for either the left hand or right hand Washington draft and it was supposed to bring in some sort of compromise solution with concessions in both directions. Any attempt further to amend the article would recreate an impasse in the opinion of Hackworth, Malkin and Fitzmaurice. A first vote of 26 for optional against 16 for compulsory jurisdiction which did not give the two-thirds majority was followed by a second vote, taken specifically on the new draft of Article 36 and was carried by 30-14, Australia, New Zealand and China reversing their position for the purpose of escaping the impasse.

6. The Minutes of the Committee meeting at hand this morning do not specify that, as many of us understood, the Sub-Committee's report was adopted as well as the draft article. The Committee meets again either tomorrow afternoon at 5:30 p.m. or more probably tomorrow night, and the suggestion is that China or some other country should move to clarify the record and make certain that the whole of the Sub-Committee's report, including the abstract quoted in paragraph 3 above, becomes part of the final record. If you think that the general position will not be sufficiently covered if this course be followed, can you let me know your views in advance of tomorrow's meeting. Ends.

San Francisco, June 8, 1945

Dear Mr. Read,

I enclose, herewith, copy of the Reports of the last six meetings of the Committee on the Court† which are almost exclusively concerned with the questions of compulsory jurisdiction and advisory opinions.

The outcome and developments of the debate on compulsory jurisdiction are clearly outlined in the reports. At the second meeting of the Sub-Committee on compulsory jurisdiction, Mr. Chipman proposed four amendments to Article 36, one of which secured the necessary majority. This was the deletion of the words "all or any of the classes" with which you are familiar. Copy of the Sub-Committee's report is enclosed herewith.†

The Committee devoted a great length of time on the question of advisory opinions. Surprisingly enough, however, not one single statement referred to the merits of the case. Procedural matters were the sole concern of those present. The question of access of international organization to the advisory jurisdiction of the Court was decided in the negative in the first place by a vote of 19-10, the two-thirds majority required not being secured. Provision was later inserted in the Charter to the effect that the Security Council and the Assembly would be entitled to ask for advisory opinion. When it came to the Statute, however, Mr. Chipman succeeded in having inserted in Article 65 provision whereby organs authorized to that effect by the Charter would be permitted to ask for advisory opinions. It finally came out that the Steering Committee ruled that the Committee of the Conference dealing with the powers of the Assembly should decide the question on the principle. That committee pronounced itself in favour of international organization and the relevant paragraph of Chapter VII of the Charter was accordingly amended at our meeting last night. This last meeting ended at 12:30 a.m. and constitutes the end of our work. It was concerned with Chapter VII and with the provision of the Statute for amendments.

May I point out in closing that the Committee agreed that the Sub-Committee's report on Article 36 be inserted in the Conference report.

Yours sincerely,

ROGER CHAPUT

Special Adviser, Delegation, United Nations Conference, to Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

San Francisco, June 13, 1945

Dear Mr. Read,

During the meeting of June 7th to which I referred in my last letter, the Court Committee spent a whole hour on the proposed Article 69 for amending the Statute. The Washington draft apparently did not please the Peruvians, who presented an alternative Article merely providing that the Statute should be amended by the same method as will apply for the Charter. They were not surprisingly supported by the Russians and also by Nizot,[171] who has been following them quite closely lately. Basdevant,[172] however, strongly opposed the Peruvian draft and asserted that he could not conceive how states parties to the Statute but not to the Charter could be expected to accept in advance all future amendments. A full scale debate ensued, which, I think, is one of the most "substantial" which took place in the Committee. Hudson[173] intervened with a relatively fiery statement in favour of Basdevant's thesis, during which he was suddenly interrupted by the Russian (Krylov), who asked him what countries he had in mind when referring to states who would adhere to the Statute but not to the Charter. A compromise solution was finally reached which embodied the Peruvian point subject to any thought which the Assembly may have for states not parties to the Charter. An additional Article (70) empowering the Court to propose amendments was unanimously adopted.

The Cuban tried hard to have a provision inserted in Chapter VII (which, incidentally, will become Chapter X) for the enforcement of the Court's decisions. He was strongly and solemnly supported by Cordova, who acted more as a sponsor of the amendment than the Cuban himself. Malkin, Krylov and others contended rightly, I think, that the Cuban Article as it read could not be passed upon by the Court Committee, whereupon an alternative Australian draft was adopted whereby states merely undertake to comply with the Court's decisions.

The Rapporteur's text was adopted at the 21st and last meeting, with a few amendments, among which, at Mr. Chipman's request, the insertion of the second last paragraph of the Sub-Committee's report on Article 36 which deals with reservations. The report was considered to-day by the Jurists and also by the Coordination Committees without apparently any substantial change being made since Commission IV is meeting tomorrow for the purpose of considering the report of its two Committees.

On the whole, the Committee has worked pretty well. As a matter of substance, however, its work can hardly be compared in my opinion with that of the Washington Committee. For a great part, it consisted in approving what had been done there and, while it took decisions on questions left undecided, no new contribution was made in the discussions of the merits. Indeed, in some cases, e.g., advisory opinions, the merits were not discussed at all. This probably explains why those who contributed most in Washington (United Kingdom, United States, the Netherlands, Greece) took very little part in the discussions here. Even Egypt remained silent.

I enclose herewith copies of the last documents issued on the Court Committee including the report.[†]I discovered yesterday that documents on the Court were being sent to you from another source. However, since your second set is almost complete by now, you may as well have them all.[174]

Constitution of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations.[175]

Both the Report and the Constitution have been approved unanimously and without reservations by the members of the Interim Commission on which are represented forty-four governments and authorities.

The Report represents the views of the members of the Interim Commission on what should be the purposes and functions of the proposed Organization, its administrative structure, and its management.

I should be grateful if you would transmit this document to your Government so that consideration can be given by them to the acceptance of the Constitution of the Food and Agriculture Organization.

May I call your attention to Article 21 of the Constitution which is pertinent to this matter:

"1. This Constitution shall be open to acceptance by the nations specified in Annex I.

2. The instruments of acceptance shall be transmitted by each government to the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture, which shall notify their receipt to the governments of the nations specified in Annex I. Acceptance may be notified to the Interim Commission through a diplomatic representative, in which case the instrument of acceptance must be transmitted to the Commission as soon as possible thereafter.

3. Upon the receipt by the Interim Commission of twenty notifications of acceptance the Interim Commission shall arrange for this Constitution to be signed in a single copy by the diplomatic representatives, duly authorized thereto, of the nations who shall have notified their acceptance, and upon being so signed on behalf of not less than twenty of the nations specified in Annex I this Constitution shall come into force immediately.

4. Acceptances the notification of which is received after the entry into force of this Constitution shall become effective upon receipt by the Interim Commission or the Organization."

It would be appreciated if, in due course, the instrument of acceptance by your Government of the Constitution could be transmitted to the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture. When at least twenty such instruments of acceptance are received, the Commission is empowered to arrange for the formal signature of the Constitution, which shall then immediately come into force. Its coming into force will make possible the assembly of the first Conference of the Organization, on the opening of which the Interim Commission will be dissolved.

CANADIAN ADHERENCE TO THE FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION OF THE UNITED NATIONS

1. Canada has been asked to signify readiness to accept the Constitution of the proposed Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations which has been prepared by the Interim Commission, of which Mr. L. B. Pearson is Chairman. This Constitution has been approved in its final form by the Departments concerned, namely, Agriculture, Fisheries, Mines and Resources, Trade and Commerce, and Finance and has been approved in a substantially similar form by the War Committee of Cabinet.

2. The Legal Adviser of the Department of External Affairs is of the opinion that acceptance of the Constitution is the equivalent of the signature of a multilateral agreement which contains no provision for ratification and that, while it could be accepted without offending the strict letter of the resolution of the House of Commons covering treaty procedure, it would not be in accordance with the constitutional practice, which has been observed by the Canadian Government over the last sixteen years, to accept this Constitution without Parliamentary approval.

3. It is also suggested that it would be convenient for Canada's final acceptance to be postponed until it is clear that the United States Congress will approve of United States acceptance.

4. It appears very desirable, however, that public intimation of Canada's intention to adhere should be given at an early date and it is suggested that a Ministerial announcement should be made of the intention of the Canadian Government to introduce the necessary legislation when Parliament meets. This might conveniently take the form of a speech by the Minister of Agriculture, who could avail himself of the occasion to explain the main features of the proposed United Nations Organization on Food and Agriculture and the reasons for Canadian particpation.

IMMEDIATE. At the meeting of the Executive Committee of the Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture held on Saturday last, June 30th, consideration was given to the time and place of the holding of the first Conference of FAO. It is now practically certain that United States approval of the Constitution of FAO will have been completed within the next fortnight and that it is safe to make, at least provisionally, decisions on the above matter.

At the discussion Saturday, it was agreed that if the Canadian Government approved, and subject to confirmation by the full Commission, the first Conference should be held in Canada beginning the week of October 8th or October 15th. I was asked to ascertain informally whether the Canadian Government would approve of this suggestion. The Canadian authorities would, of course, not be responsible in any way for the organization of the Conference though if the same kind of help could be given that was given to the UNRRA meeting in Montreal,[176] it would be most gratefully received. If there were any expenditures made by the Canadian Government on the Conference, they would be deducted from Canada's first contribution to FAO, assuming, of course, Canada joins FAO. If the Conference were held in Canada, and I hope that this can be done, it might be in a Laurentian hotel like Mount Tremblant, or alternatively it might be held in the west in Winnipeg or Regina. A good deal could be said in favour of the latter course though transportation difficulties might make a Laurentian locale preferable. I would be glad to receive your preliminary reaction to this proposal as quickly as possible as I have been asked to report back to the Executive Committee at its next meeting.

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: With reference to our telephone conversation of a few minutes ago, I most earnestly hope that it will be possible for the Canadian Government to approve Canada as the site of the first Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization, which it is hoped to hold in October. At the Executive Committee meeting this morning, all the members, including the European members, agreed that it would be much less satisfactory if the first Conference met in France, as the preparatory work had all been done over here and a Conference in France would mean moving a large Secretariat across the ocean and bringing them back. Furthermore, it was doubted whether the French Government could make suitable arrangements for the Conference. Confidentially, it was felt by the Committee that the French invitation, forwarded at the last moment, was largely influenced by prestige political considerations. I was, therefore, instructed to tell the French member of the Commission that the Executive Committee felt that they could not at this stage alter the arrangements which, it was hoped, would result in the Conference being held in Canada. It would, therefore, be most disappointing, and indeed embarrassing, if we could not now follow through on these arrangements.

2. In view of transportation and accommodation difficulties, I think it would be preferable to hold the Conference in the east. A place like Mont Tremblant Lodge would be ideal, if it were large enough and we could secure it. Would it be possible to have someone like Wing Commander Cumyn look into these possibilities. If the Canadian Government agree in principle to holding the Conference in Canada, then a member of our Secretariat should go to Ottawa immediately to discuss accommodation and administration questions with Cumyn or someone else designated for that purpose. In my absence, any message on this subject might be addressed directly to the Executive Secretary of the Interim Food Commission through this Embassy. Piquet, the former Secretary, has been forced to resign and his place is being taken by Mr. Gove Hambidge of the United States Department of Agriculture. Ends.[177]

CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP IN THE FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION

1. The F.A.O. will meet some time in October. Action should therefore be taken as soon as possible for Canada's acceptance of the constitution.

2. Twenty-five Governments have now informed the Interim Commission of their intention to adhere. The constitution provides for signature as soon as twenty nations have given such notification.

3. The United States have accepted membership in the organization by joint resolution of the House and the Senate. The resolution passed the House on April 30 and the Senate on July 21. It will also be remembered that the United Kingdom notified acceptance without referring the matter to Parliament on January 12, 1945.

4. Plans will soon be made for the actual signing of the constitution, which probably will be soon before or at the time of the Conference.

5. With Parliament meeting soon, it would seem that the method for Canada's acceptance of the constitution would be to have a bill passed early in the session. A draft bill is available in print, copy attached,† and also a draft resolution,† as it is believed that the bill is a money bill and would therefore require procedure by resolution.

6. The bill incorporates the F.A.O. constitution as a schedule. The Cabinet War Committee has already approved the constitution in substantially the same form. Certain amendments† suggested by Canada were later abandoned and the interested Departments agreed to this being done.

7. In view of that fact, the draft bill should probably be presented to Cabinet for consideration and approval in the near future[179] in order that it may be presented quite early in the session.

8. Once the bill becomes law, it has been agreed that the Instrument of Acceptance be transmitted by the Canadian Embassy in Washington to the Interim Commission in the following form:

"I am authorized by the Government of Canada to inform you that it accepts on behalf of Canada the Constitution of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations set forth in Appendix I of the First Report to the Governments of the United Nations by the Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture, dated August 1, 1944, and that it undertakes faithfully to perform and carry out all the stipulations therein contained."

9. If the bill can be made law early enough, the procedure for Canadian acceptance of the Constitution would be in accordance with the principles as laid down in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister in 1926 and 1928 as well as on other occasions. The alternative as set out by the Legal Division, would be,

(a) To transmit the Instrument of Acceptance of the Constitution after approval by Order-In-Council.

(b) Orders-in-Council, if necessary to give effect to the provisions of the Constitution pending the enactment of legislation by the Parliament of Canada.

(c) Tabling of the Orders-in-Council along with the Constitution immediately they are passed and Parliament is sitting.

Monsieur le Sous-Secrétaire d'Etat,

J'ai l'honneur de vous faire savoir que mon Gouvernement s'est associé au Governement britannique pour convoquer, au nom de la Conférence des Ministres alliés de l'Education, la Conférence qui se réunira à Londres le 1er novembre en vue de réaliser une organisation internationale de coopération en matière d'éducation et de culture.

Le 3 août, le Gouvernement britannique a adressé cette invitation conjointe, en l'accompagnant d'un projet† élaboré par la Conférence des Ministres de l'Education en février dernier.

Le Gouvernement français, qui procédait de son côté à l'étude d'un projet, vient de communiquer celui-ci au Gouvernement britannique et de le transmettre, comme document de la prochaine Conférence, aux autres membres des Nations Unies invitées, par l'entremise de leur représentation diplomatique à Paris.

Ainsi que vous le constaterez, le projet français, dont l'ordonnance est la même que celle du projet de la Conférence des Ministres Alliés de Londres, s'en écarte cependant sur les points suivants:

1. Le préambule affirme que l'idéal de démocratie et de progrès, commun aux Nations Unies, doit être à la base de tout effort en matière d'éducation et de culture.

2. Le projet s'efforce de mettre sur le même plan les activités de la future organisation en matière d'éducation et en matière de coopération intellectuelle, les seconds ayant paru, dans le projet de Londres, quelque peu sacrifiés aux premiers.

3. Il resserre les liens avec l'organisation des Nations Unies en précisant le rôle de contrôle que celle-ci exercera sur la nouvelle organisation de coopération intellectuelle.

4. Il assure à cette dernière, par une représentation tripartite des Gouvernements, de Commissions Nationales et des grandes associations mondiales, un caractère moins étatiste et plus humain visant à sauvegarder tout à la fois les intérêts des Gouvernements et ceux des formes variées de culture nationale.

5. Il renforce le rôle du Comité directeur.

6. Enfin, il propose d'utiliser, comme Secrétariat de l'organisation nouvelle, l'Institut de Coopération Intellectuelle de Paris, pour lequel seraient élaborés des statuts entièrement nouveaux.

Mon Gouvernement, en me chargeant de vous communiquer les indications qui précèdent, m'a prié de vous signaler le prix qu'il attacherait à connaître le point de vue du Gourvernement canadien et, le cas échéant, le projet ou les amendements qu'il se proposerait de présenter.

Veuillez agréer, etc.

Each member undertakes, insofar as may be possible under its constitution and laws, to accord diplomatic privileges and immunities to the Organization, to persons appointed by other members as their representatives in or to the Organization and to the higher officials of the Organization not being their own nationals.

TELEGRAM 2578 Ottawa, November 2, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL. Education Conference. Please transmit to the Canadian delegation the following general observations for their guidance:

1. We are in general agreement with the purposes and principal functions set forth in Articles I and II of the draft proposals, but consider the language of these Articles can be improved. The chief problem of the Conference relates to the methods whereby these Articles are to be applied by the Organization. The draft contemplates that the Organization should mainly be a centre for collecting and disseminating information on education and cultural matters, but it would also vest in the Organization more positive functions of investigation and recommendation.

2. In connection particularly with this aspect, the Canadian delegation should constantly bear in mind the character of the Canadian educational system and the position of the Provinces. It would seem desirable that any powers given to the Organization to conduct research should be clearly drawn and that investigations should be carried on within the territory of member states only by agreement. It is important to resist the inclusion of any language which might be interpreted as authorizing the Organization to interfere in the educational system of member states.

3. The constitution should not be framed so as to necessitate the passage of domestic legislation to permit its adoption, as this would give rise to difficult problems in federal states.

4. Nevertheless, no impression should be conveyed that Canada is adopting an obstructive attitude at the Conference. Our jurisdictional problems affect other states and it may be expected that the United States will be equally reluctant to agree to anything which might be construed as authorizing interference with their educational system.

5. The following observations relate to specific points in the draft proposals:

(a) the constitution should not commit member states to create national commissions or cooperating bodies and on this point alternative (c) of Article VIII A is preferred;

(b) we therefore prefer general language in Articles V A and VIII B concerning the composition of national delegations, which would avoid any requirement of consultation with a national commission;

(c) Article X on the juridical status of the Organization should be redrafted on general lines of proposal given to MacDermot.[183] On this point and other points in which the draft contains provisions similar to those in the United Nations Charter such as Articles VII, XIII and XIV, the delegation should consult with the Canadian representatives in London who are connected with the United Nations Preparatory Commission;

(d) If it is decided that the Organization should be separately financed, the best scale of contributions would be that to be adopted for the United Nations Organization. Article III(i) suggests automatic membership for all members of UNO, but this proposal may be resisted as inconsistent with Article III(iii) which contemplates support by separate contributions. On the whole, we tend to favour close association with UNO;

(e) there is much to be said for the headquarters of the Organization being the same as that of UNO, but this depends in part on the site to be chosen by UNO, and San Francisco may be regarded as too remote for ECO. French delegation are certain to press for Paris and we have already been approached by French Embassy for our support. They will also suggest incorporation in secretariat of staff of Institute of Intellectual Cooperation. We have given a non-commital answer. You should take the same line until position of other delegations is clearer;

(f) there is very little in the draft about the scientific aspects of the work of the Organization, although we feel that this may be important. We should be glad to receive further information on what is proposed.

6. The United Kingdom Government has informally suggested that ECO should be established by resolution of the Assembly of UNO rather than by an agreement requiring independent ratification. This has definite advantages of simplicity, rapidity and assurance of intimate relationship between the two Organizations. The delegation however should not commit themselves at this stage to support of this proposal if it is made to the Conference by the United Kingdom delegation.

7. As at all large conferences, difficult political problems will arise on which it may be necessary for you to seek guidance. You should keep us generally informed of the course of the Conference and seek instructions on any important new questions which may arise.

PROCEDURE FOR ACCEPTANCE OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE ORGANIZATION

The new Constitution was adopted by the London Conference without dissenting voice "subject to acceptance" and is to come into force when it has been accepted by twenty of its signatories. The Constitution provides that instruments of acceptance shall be deposited with the Government of the United Kingdom; that the Constitution shall remain open for signature in the Archives of the United Kingdom; signature may take place either before or after the deposit of the instrument of acceptance; no acceptance shall be valid unless preceded or followed by signature.

Apparently most of the States represented at the London Conference signed the Constitution, the Final Act of the Conference and the intergovernmental instrument setting up the Preparatory Commission. Mr. Massey has signed the Final Act of the Conference, the Constitution and the instrument establishing the Preparatory Commission,[184] and deposited the original copy in the Archives of the Government of the United Kingdom. The Canadian delegate does not seem to have had any full powers to sign.

The Constitution

The Constitution itself seems a commonsense document (apart from a somewhat "phoney" preamble). It is certainly an improvement from our point of view over the draft proposals prepared by the Conference of Allied Ministers of Education. One or two of the more important points of difference between the two documents may be noted. By Article I.3, the Organization is prohibited from intervening in matters which are "essentially within', the domestic jurisdiction of States Members of the Organization. Article VII deals with the National Cooperating Bodies and states:

1. "Each Member State shall make such arrangements as suit its particular conditions for the purpose of associating its principal bodies interested in educational, scientific and cultural matters with the work of the Organization, preferably by the formation of a National Commission broadly representative of the Government and such bodies.

Canada, Treaty Series, 1945, No. 18.

2. National Commissions or National Cooperating Bodies, where they exist, shall act in an advisory capacity to their respective delegations to the General Conference and to their Governments in matters relating to the Organization and shall function as agencies of liaison in all matters of interest to it."

This seems satisfactory enough from our point of view as it appears to make it clear that the functions of the National Cooperating Bodies come into play only if they are created by the Government concerned and that the Government may take or reject their advice as it sees fit.

With regard to the General Conference, Article IV A. states "The Government of each Member State shall appoint not more than five delegates, who shall be selected after consultation with the National Commission, if established, or with educational, scientific and cultural bodies." National Governments are thus committed to consultation, but the extent of it and the procedure to be followed would remain within their discretion.

Reports by Member States are covered by Article VIII which states "Each Member State shall report periodically to the Organization in a manner to be determined by the General Conference, on its laws, regulations and statistics relating to educational, scientific and cultural life and institutions, and on the ation taken upon the recommendations and conventions of the General Conference." (Recommendations to Member States may be made on a majority vote of the General Conference. International Conventions require a two-thirds majority of the General Conference.)

Relations with the United Nations Organization are covered by Article X which provides that the Organization shall be brought into relation with the United Nations Organization as soon as practicable as a specialized agency by the means indicated in the relevant articles of the Charter of the United Nations.

Budgetary arrangements are to be determined by the General Conference subject to the arrangements laid down by the agreement with the United Nations Organization.

Headquarters of the Organization

The Conference adopted a resolution to the effect that the seat of the Organization should be in Paris but that this resolution "shall not in any way affect the right of the General Conference to make decisions in regard to this matter by a two thirds majority." The French apparently tried to make this decision on the location of the Headquarters an article of the Constitution but did not succeed.

Preparatory Commission

The functions of the Preparatory Commission, as laid down in the instrument establishing it, follow the pattern of the interim arrangements setting up the United Nations Preparatory Commission. The same machinery for the Executive Committee has also been adopted. The Executive Committee will be sitting in London for approximately a six months' period prior to the establishment of the Organization and its transfer to Paris. States have apparently been elected to the Executive Committee on a provisional basis subject to their representatives receiving authority from their Governments to sit on the Committee. The Executive Committee consists of:

Belgium	Mexico
Brazil	India
Canada	Netherlands
China	Norway
Columbia	Poland
France	United Kingdom
Greece	United States

If Canada is to be a member of the Executive Committee, we shall have to find an appropriate representative. Mr. MacDermot has suggested that "there might be someone at C.M.H.Q. on the educational side or at Khaki University who might serve."

Technical Sub-Committee

The Technical Sub-Committee consists of the following provisional list of States:

Belgium	Irak
Brazil	Lebanon
Canada	Netherlands
China	Norway
Czechoslovakia	Philippines
Egypt	Poland
France	Syria
Greece	United Kingdom
Luxembourg	United States
Iran	Jugoslavia

It is to begin immediate work on the following agenda:

1. Survey of:

(a) Educational needs of devastated countries.

(b) Measures already taken by national authorities.

(c) National and International bodies engaged in meeting educational needs.

2. Distribution of the work.

3. Report by representatives of relief and reconstruction agencies such as UNRRA, ISS,[185] etc.

[185]International Social Service.

Canada has been elected to the chair of the Sub-Committee and Mr. MacDermot is now acting as Chairman. There are to be two or three more meetings of the Sub-Committee which will then disperse, leaving the Secretariat to carry on its work. The Sub-Committee is apparently divided between those European countries which not unnaturally are principally concerned with having their urgent needs for educational reconstruction met through UNESCO and the United States which, while admitting that relief is urgent, maintain that this is not the primary purpose for which UNESCO was set up. The sort of procedure which the Sub-Committee seem to be contemplating at present is that a country in need will make its requirements known to the Secretariat of the Preparatory Commission. These would then be put before the Preparatory Commission for approval and passed on to the Government or international organization which might have indicated its readiness to deal with these particular types of needs.

Mr. MacDermot has asked for instructions on the following points:

1. Is the Canadian Government prepared to make any further contribution towards relief for educational reconstruction purposes in Europe in the shape of funds or supplies, or both?

It is pointed out that that there is a commercial aspect to this question as Canadian publishers, particularly in Quebec, might find an opportunity for obtaining markets. Mr. MacDermot thinks there will be some demand for French text books printed in the province of Quebec. There will also be the possibility of markets for the producers of school supplies, desks, blackboards, etc.

2. Can Canadian UNRRA funds already contributed be applied to educational relief?

The general question of the employment of UNRRA funds for this purpose has been debated in the Sub-Committee. Presumably under UNRRA's present regulations UNRRA funds would not be available for this purpose. Mr. MacDermot asked our views on this point also.

3. Would the Canadian Government encourage or allow the raising of funds on private appeal in Canada for these purposes?

It seems that this latter is the most hopeful course. The United States Government seem to be willing to inaugurate a propaganda campaign for the purpose of raising funds privately although they do not appear to contemplate a Government contribution.

Report of Canadian Government Delegates

REPORT OF THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT DELEGATES TO THE UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE
FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION

London, November, 1945

INTRODUCTION

In October 1942, at the invitation of the British Council and under the chairmanship of the President of the English Board of Education, Rt. Hon. R. A. Butler, representatives of 9 Departments of Education from European countries met in London to exchange views on the educational needs of the post-war period.

The Conference of Allied Ministers of Education that resulted, began at once to plan for the educational and cultural reconstruction of occupied countries. The conditions that confronted the Ministers were staggering, and as the war went on they grew worse. The teachers, the books and schools, the libraries and museums, in short, all those processes through which normal family life is supported and nourished in a community, had been subjected to a savage and calculated policy of destruction and degradation. Europe emerged from an ordeal during which millions of its children, and tens of thousands of its educators and leaders in thought, creative fervour and spiritual strength, had been deprived for upwards of five years of the freedom and opportunity in which their civilization was rooted.

From 1942-1945, therefore, the Conference of Allied Ministers of Education, through Commissions and Committees, numbering by 1945 ten in all, studied a multitude of questions that their task involved — the provision of books, the training of personnel, the restocking of libraries and laboratories, the care and restoration to their rightful places of looted works of art.

Through the Commissions and Committees and through regular bimonthly meetings of the Conference of the whole, not only was a great quantity of essential statistical material compiled, but stocks of books and other supplies were collected and plans drawn up for their subsequent use. At the same time, the Conference broadened its discussion to include questions of international cooperation in educational and cultural matters.

The necessity for organized action to deal immediately with the collapse of cultural educational life in many parts of the world pointed the way to organization for longer range policy between nations in the same general field. In 1945, therefore, the Conference invited nations which had attended its meetings as observers to become members; and in the Conferences that followed, the creation of a general Organization to deal so far as it could with emergency needs, but designed also to serve the cause of peace through the agencies of education and culture, was given approval. A Draft Constitution for an Organization which was presented by the U.S. Delegation, led by Hon. J. William Fulbright of the U.S. Senate and circulated to the Governments of the United Nations was given substantial support.

The idea was advanced still further by the general endorsement of the French declaration on cultural co-operation at San Francisco, and in August 1945, draft proposals to establish a permanent educational and cultural organization of the United Nations were published by the Council of Allied Ministers of Education, and submitted to the governments of the United Nations as a basis for the discussion at the Conference held in London between November 1st and November 16th, 1945.

Such, in brief outline, are the events that led immediately up to this Conference. It may be added, however, that if the constitution of UNESCO is widely enough approved and enables the foundations of a genuine collaboration between the interdependent nations of the world to be laid, it will be the fruit not only of the Council of Allied Ministers of Education, but of the work and aspiration of a number of other bodies during many years past. Notable among these may be mentioned the Organization for Intellectual Co-operation, initiated in 1922 at Geneva, and later reinforced by the establishment of the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation in Paris, and the International Bureau of Education, Geneva in 1931. These bodies, together with others in Great Britain, the U.S.A. and elsewhere, have steadily accumulated the data and diffused the spirit on which a serviceable international co-operation in educational, scientific and cultural matters can be founded.

It is also of great importance in this connection that in Art. I, Sec. 3, and elsewhere in the Charter of the U.N., full endorsement is given to the principle of promoting "international culture and educational co-operation."

Interest in these matters in Canada was established by the calling of the Educational and Cultural Conference, and by the wide distribution of the Draft Proposals. In a large number of communications received by the Government from the organized educational, scientific and cultural bodies in Canada, it was strongly urged that Canada should participate in the Conference and associate itself as far as possible in the Organization it was called to establish.

The same groups will now wish to know the outcome of the Conference and it is suggested, therefore, that opportunity be made for giving the details of the purposes and functions of UNESCO adequate publicity.

The Conference drafted a Constitution for a new experiment in world agencies for the maintenance of peace. The sincerity and sober desire of those at the Conference from the countries represented to lay the foundations of an organization through which the ideas and creative output of the people might be given freedom and scope were very evident. But it was also noticeable that many of those most convinced that such an organization had a task to do in international life, were also perhaps most aware of the difficulties that lie ahead.

The Organization will take time to consolidate itself: its range of operations, certainly in its early years, must be limited by practical consideration of financial resources and other considerations, and experience must be gathered before it can assume even a substantial portion of its responsibilities: it will require full governmental support from the member states. These were some of the views freely expressed at the Conference.

It was realized, therefore, that the development of UNESCO must be gradual. It was equally clear to delegates that the success will in large part depend on the teachers in all institutions of learning, the scientists, the artists and writers who are responsible for the work of education, science and culture, in each country member of the Organization. Supporting them, will be the large number who participate in the institutions of learning and culture, and those who enjoy the fruits of their work. It is important, therefore, that UNESCO be widely known by the public and its purposes clearly understood.

(h) Order of Proceedings

The Conference opened on November 1st and held plenary sessions during that day and the next. Business included election of a President, the Hon. Ellen Wilkinson, President of the English Board of Education, adoption of rules of procedure, an address by Rt. Hon. Clement Attlee, Prime Minister of Great Britain, and addresses by the President, the Associate President, Hon. Leon Blum, and the Vice-Presidents of the Conference. From November 5th to November 16th inclusive, the Conference broke up into five Commissions which sat twice daily. On November 15th and 16th plenary sessions were resumed for the approval of the reports of the Commissions, the acceptance of resolutions, and the signing of the Final Act, the Constitution, and the Instrument of Establishing the Preparatory Commission.

Immediately following the signing, a Preparatory Commission met to discuss the agenda for a second meeting which was held on Monday, November 19th.

(i) Entertainment

During the Conference, the delegates were the recipients of most generous hospitality on a number of occasions. Their hosts, to whom deep appreciation is due, were:

The Government of the United Kingdom
The English Minister of Education
The Royal Society
The British Council
The English-Speaking Union
The British Film Institute
The Vice-Chancellor of Oxford University.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE WORK OF THE COMMISSIONS

The general procedure in the Commissions was to take up in sequence the Articles of that section of the Draft Proposals for which the Commission was responsible. These articles were studied in close conjunction with the corresponding sections of the proposals put forward by the French Government which had been received by States attending the Conference some weeks in advance. These proposals made a very valuable comparative document, for they had been drawn up in considerable detail and crystallized a number of important points most effectively. Supporting these basic documents were the proposals and recommendations submitted by the various delegations during the Conference. Amongst these, owing to the broadly representative character of its delegation, and the diverse experience of the advisers and technical experts, the contribution of the United States Group constituted an especially important portion of the documentation.

Supplementing the recommendations of delegates, were the statements made to the appropriate Commissions by the representatives of the official international organizations listed above (Section III a). These were not only valuable in themselves, but introduced into the Conference discussions, points of view, experience, and practical reports on work done and services available from bodies with whom UNESCO will later be associated.

The comment that follows does not attempt to cover the whole course of the deliberations of each Commission. It deals with what are considered the main issues raised, and in particular the points in which the Canadian Delegation were especially interested.

In the event it will be seen by a comparison of the Draft Proposals of the Council of Allied Ministers of Education and of the draft Constitution that was finally approved, that the many months of discussion and exchange of views between various governments on which the Draft Proposals were based, went far towards clearing the ground for the establishment of UNESCO. There were, of course, numerous points of detail, both in substance and drafting, that had been overlooked or inadquately treated. But the Constitution follows the Draft Proposals in their essential pattern, so that those in Canada who have studied the basic document will find in the Constitution, it is believed, a reasonably satisfactory embodiment of its main principles.

The Canadian Delegation supported the main structure of the Organization as laid down in the Draft Proposals, and its members endeavoured generally to contribute helpfully towards the clarification of points in discussion and drafting. In particular, however, the delegates drew attention wherever necessary to the significance that any article might have for a federal constitution and were satisfied that both in the discussions and in the final draft, this important consideration was appreciated. It is believed that the constitutional position of federal states is fully safeguarded in principle and in detail by the terms of the final document.

COMMISSION I

The Title

In both the Allied Ministers' and the French drafts which were considered by the Conference, the proposed organization was referred to as the United Nations Educational and Cultural Organization. The United States delegation proposed the inclusion of the word "scientific". The Canadian delegation joined with the representatives of several other countries in supporting this proposal. The vital part which science plays in the modern world, its distinctive cultural contributions and its importance in a balanced education are sufficient warrant for this support. Moreover, the inclusion of "scientific" in the title will invite the support of scientists the world over for the new organization, and will provide them, for the first time, with a recognized international agency through which their concern for the social implications of new technical advances may be given effective expression. The motion was carried and the full title became "The United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization," giving the abbreviation "UNESCO" which, as the Chinese delegate pointed out, will serve as a universal name requiring no translation.

Preamble

In the view of some of the delegates, and this was the Canadian view also, the preamble would be adequate if couched in brief, simple, and dignified terms, setting forth the fundamental ideals of the Organization under which the practical purposes might be pursued. Several of the European delegations, however, whose homelands had suffered grievously in the war, advocated a somewhat more extended statement. They felt strongly that the world should be reminded of the demoralization and strife that flow from lack of understanding and the breakdown of free education and culture and they were supported by representatives of some of the Latin American countries.

The resulting statement, therefore, is an attempt to incorporate lasting principles and a vivid consciousness of a lesson learned in the fires of war, and was adopted without dissent.

Article I

This article is concerned with the functions of the Organization. From the first, the Canadian delegation advocated a statement in sufficiently broad terms that the work of UNESCO will not be hampered by too rigid terms of reference, which, however suitable they might be at present, might not be suited to the changed world conditions which there is every reason to anticipate, but whose exact nature cannot be foreseen. At the same time, in order to stimulate effective action, it was felt that the main and pressing problems of the moment should be indicated. This view was in harmony with the opinions expressed by most of the delegations in the preliminary discussions. The drafting committee, in attempting to give concrete expression to the wishes of the delegates, produced initially a statement of functions which, by general consent, was felt to be too long and too detailed, and had the general effect of seeming to exclude all functions not expressly included. The article was redrafted and adopted in the form in which it now appears in the constitution. As it now stands, the Organisation will be able to take any measures for international co-operation within its fields which may at any time be feasible and desirable. At the same time, some of the lines along which such co-operation might be fostered now are indicated. These include:

1. The recommendation of international agreements to promote the free flow of ideas by word and image.

2. Collaboration with members, at their request, in the development of educational activities.

3. Study and recommendation of educational methods.

4. Recommendation of conventions for the protection of books, works of art and monuments of history and science.

5. International interchange of personnel in the three fields covered by UNESCO.

6. International co-operation in making universally available books and other materials of information or culture.

This Organization is specifically prohibited from intervening in matters within the domestic jurisdiction of any state. It may make recommendations, but it may not take further action except on the request of the state concerned.

The actual working of the Organization will depend on the decisions of successive general conferences and on the efficiency and imagination of the Secretariat. The functions as outlined give full opportunity for valuable work by the Organization and its officers with proper safeguards against improper or unwarranted interference in matters of purely domestic concern. The Canadian delegation felt that this was an adequate constitutional statement of functions and accordingly voted for the adoption of the article.

COMMISSION II

The General Structure of the Organization

Membership

A brief discussion showed the general desire to have all members of United Nations eligible for membership in UNESCO, and also to open membership from the earliest stages to certain other countries, such as Switzerland and Sweden.

A provision for withdrawal, in the Council of Allied Ministers of Education draft, was deleted to correspond with the results of the discussions at San Francisco (as reported p.21 Conf. Series 1945, No. 2) after the opinions behind the decisions in the United Nations Charter were pointed out by the Canadian representative on the Commission.

The Council of Allied Ministers of Education draft provided for "suspensions" of members to be automatic upon suspensions from U.N.O. On the suggestion of the U.S. representative, it was agreed that suspension need be only at the request of the Assembly.

At the suggestion of the Chinese representative, it was agreed to add a provision regarding "expulsion," and to make it automatic upon expulsion from U.N.O.

Composition of the Conference

The suggestion of the Council of Allied Ministers of Education draft for five representatives from each state was accepted without debate.

The manner of selection of these representatives, however, was the subject of lengthy debate, discussion centering particularly on whether all should be named by governments (or some by cultural bodies) and to what extent and in what way governments should consult with national bodies in selection. At the one extreme was the French view, backed by Chile, that some of the five should be named by National Commissions (broadly representative of the government and national bodies.) At the other extreme was the position of Belgium and the Netherlands that they should be named by governments without any obligation on their part to consult cultural bodies. By the time half of the delegates had spoken in the debate, it became apparent that a procedure midway between these two extremes would have to be adopted. (See final text 1 V.A. (1), in which consultation is called for, but all representatives are appointed by governments.)

Functions of Conference

The proposals of the Council of Allied Ministers of Education draft were accepted with little alteration, although the French proposal to empower the Conference to prepare draft "conventions," as well as "recommendation" found ready acceptance.

The calling of international conferences was added as a function, partly as a result of French suggestion, and partly to meet the desire of the Council of Allied Ministers of Education to make it possible for them to continue to meet.

Voting in Conference

The relevant clause in the Council of Allied Ministers of Education draft was made more precise by stipulating "a simple majority" except where otherwise specified, and adding "of those present and voting."

In this debate the Canadian representative raised the question of a quorum, and after thorough discussion, in which the corresponding debate at the San Francisco Conference was referred to, it was decided to omit any provision relative to a quorum. The weight of opinion led by the British representative seemed to be that in order to establish a quorum high enough to be of any practical importance, it would constitute a handicap or limitation, e.g., if the quorum was 20, as proposed by French, there might be a meeting with 23 present of whom 4 were opposed to a measure, 19 in favour. These 4 could walk out before the vote was taken and thus defeat or frustrate the 19.

Procedure at Meetings

There was insistence that the place of meeting should vary "from year to year," i.e. in no two consecutive years in the same place. The United States Representative proposed this phrase, together with the words making provision "for public access" to meetings.

Provision for "technical" committees was included on French insistence.

National Co-operating Bodies

The position of National Co-operating Bodies was in the main settled in the debate on the composition of the Conference. A concession to the French point of view was made by the inclusion of "preferably", at suggestion of the United States representative.

Clause VII. 3 of the final draft was added at French suggestion, the purpose being to enable the central organization to help National Committee develop strength in countries so wishing.

COMMISSION III

The Commission examined very carefully the details of the draft and other proposals regarding the election and selection of the Executive Board, its powers and functions, the powers of the Director General, and the Secretariat. In the approved article VI it is laid down that members of the Executive Board should be chosen from the delegates to the Conference, after which they will hold office for three years at a time, excepting those during the first three years who retire according to a ballot and Article VI A, 3. From this, it would seem to follow that when a representative is chosen from a member state for the Executive Board, his place on the Delegation could be filled by the appointing government, or not, as it chose.

Some emphasis was laid on the desirability of Executive Board members being chosen for their administrative capacity and experience, the implication being that in selecting delegations, governments might take into consideration not only eminence and leadership in execution and achievement in the fields of education, science, and culture, but ability organizations [sic] in these fields.

With regard to the Director-General, it was the aim of the Commission to give him considerable scope for initiative and independence of action in the performance of his duties and at the same time to give the Executive Board and its Chairman definite duties and some freedom of initiative as well. The wording of the Article and clauses in VIB are so designed.

It had been one of the French proposals or suggestions that the staff of the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation might be incorporated in the staff of UNESCO. This proposal, however, was withdrawn and the French delegation made it clear that they merely desired that UNESCO should avail itself, if it wished, of the contacts, the experience, and the documentation of the Institute.

It was agreed that for the most part the staff of the Secretariat should be appointed by the Director-General under conditions to be approved by the Conference (Art. VII 3). But it was desired, particularly by the French delegation, that it be recorded that there was a difference of opinion as to whether or not higher grade appointments should be approved by the Executive Board.

In the draft proposal there was a recommendation that an administrative tribunal be established to deal with disputes relating to the terms and conditions of appointment of members of the staff. It was agreed, however, that while this would not be included in an Article of the Constitution, the report of the Commission should draw attention to the fact that "in view of the small amount of work such a tribunal would have to deal with, the desirability of setting up a single Administrative Tribunal to cover the various branches of the UNO should be emphasised."

COMMISSION IV

Relations with Social and Economic Council

Article X. This article bases UNESCO on an agreement to the be reached with UNO under Art. 63 of the Charter. An important discussion followed in connection with the Budgetary relationships of the two bodies in which it was generally felt that the budget of UNO [UNESCO] might be a "chapter" of that of UNO, or a portion of the consolidated budget of UNO, but that, the allocation being made, UNESCO should have autonomy in the disposal of its funds.

Article XI. This article precipitated lively debates on the part that both governmental and non-governmental organisations should have in the general scheme of UNESCO. There were those who felt that either full membership or a quasi-membership, with or without voting powers, should be accorded these bodies, the purpose being to render UNESCO less rigidly official and exclusively representative of the governmental point of view. Others thought that non-governmental organizations in particular would in fact exert a greater influence in their own fields and through UNESCO if they were given no official connection with it. There was general agreement, however, that UNESCO should co-operate fully with all such organizations and use opportunity to consult with them on their special field of activity. Sub-sections 1 and 4 of the Article are designed to facilitate this co-operation, and at the same time to retain the essentially nation-wide character of UNESCO and allow it to work in close association through Committees etc., with inter-governmental and international bodies with similar aims.

This position commended itself to the Canadian Delegation as one which achieved the general international consolidation of all types of organizations in the intellectual and cultural field which the delegate from France urged, for example, and avoided the difficulties of acceptance that the introduction of non-government members might create as was pointed out by Norway.

COMMISSION V

The Interim Commission

Provision for the establishment of an Interim Commission of UNESCO was included in the draft proposals, but in a separate paragraph and not as one of the articles of the Constitution. A separate instrument for this purpose therefore was drawn up as a result of the work of Commission 5.

At the outset, there was a difference of emphasis between those who were primarily concerned with making preparations for convoking the first meeting of UNESCO, and the group of European countries, together with China, who felt that the most immediate function for an Interim Commission should be to determine ways and means of dealing with the emergency situation in the educational, scientific life of countries sorely wounded by the war.

There was no fundamental conflict between the two points of view, however, and as the sittings of the Commission proceeded, it was possible to reconcile them and to agree on terms of an instrument under which both needs would be satisfied.

It was decided, therefore, that a Preparatory Commission should be established with the normal functions of such a body, these being mainly to prepare for the first session of the General Conference, but with special machinery for dealing with the immediate needs of the devastated countries. This was to be done through a Technical Sub-Committee which would at once make a thorough examination of material already accumulated on the subject and get into touch also with the various organizations through which reconstruction measures might be taken. There was some discussion as to whether or not the whole task of reconstruction could be handled by the Preparatory Commission itself, by UNRRA, or by all international agencies suitable for the purpose. It was decided that the first alternative was not feasible, and after some discussion, the same decision was reached with regard to the second alternative. UNRRA, however, through one of its representatives was reported as ready to assist materially in planning the co-ordination of the administration of reconstrution measures, to assist in the reconstruction of buildings and structures, and in the supply of scientific equipment. A number of countries indicated ways in which assistance had already been rendered to devastated areas.

The question of the form and amount of the contribution which might be made towards the work of the sub-committee was left entirely to the governments of the member states. But a number of the delegations present indicated what might be expected in this regard. Denmark referred to the assistance which had already been given to scholars from Norway; Belgium expressed optimism and felt sure that small nations would make whatever contribution that they could and would also feel confident that the great nations would help too. The French Delegation undertook to ask its Government to make a contribution, and the United Kingdom Delegation stated that they felt sure that Great Britain would not wish to be left behind in this matter. The United States Delegation stated quite clearly that they could not undertake to commit their government in any way, but unofficially their representatives expressed the opinion that when the facts of the situation were known to the American people as clearly as they had been brought to the attention of the Conference, they would feel the same sympathy for the cause as everyone at the Conference.

It was clear from the remarks of the Delegation of Poland and from Belgium and Greece that some tangible expression of the sincerity of the Conference in this matter was necessary, and consequently, that no time should be lost in getting the matter under way.

It was agreed that the Technical Sub-Committee should meet as soon as possible and sit for 6 months during which it would make the necessary investigations, take whatever steps were practical to deal with interesting conditions and then turn over the continuing work of reconstruction to the Organization.

LOCATION OF UNESCO

The resolution regarding this matter was introduced on November 9th in Commission IV by the United Kingdom delegate, and is included in the Final Act of the Organization. Not unnaturally it was a subject that had received a great deal of consideration beforehand in all delegations, and the announcement of the unanimous approval given to the United Kingdom proposal had the most gratifying effects throughout the Conference.

In moving the resolution, Mr. Richardson of the United Kingdom made two interesting reservations: (1) that there were admittedly two views on the location of UNO and its specialized agencies, one being that all should be in the same centre, the other that this was an unnecessary and perhaps undesirable centralization. It was urged by some that centralization would increase the individual strength of all agencies, and result in economic and greater efficiency, but while the arguments for centralization could not be ignored, the United Kingdom made an exception in respect of UNESCO; (2) that whatever was decided by the Conference on this matter could not be regarded as irrevocable, that it might be subject to changing circumstances, and that in fact the final decision even for the immediate present might not lie wholly in the hands of the Conference.

He felt that for his government, he might almost say for any Englishman there was — keeping these reservations in mind — only one choice. His delegation proposed, therefore, that Paris should be the seat of UNESCO and he moved this because of the close links of France with his country, because of the long historical association of Paris with the intellectual and cultural leadership of the western world, and in recognition of all that France has stood for and her services to the cause to which we were all pledged.

THE PREPARATORY COMMISSION

The Preparatory Commission is composed of representatives from each of the member states attending the Conferences. Its functions and duties are laid down in the Instrument establishing the body, which was signed with the Final Act and the Constitution.

A meeting of the Commission was held immediately after the final Plenary Session. The Hon. Ellen Wilkinson was elected as Chairman, and the Commission at once proceeded to elect the Executive Committee of 14 members. The 15th place was left vacant and it was recorded in the minutes that this fact should be communicated to the government of the U.S.S.R. with the hope expressed that that government would accept the vacant place.

The election was made by each delegation submitting a secret ballot containing 14 names of countries, the 14 names receiving the maximum number of votes being declared elected.

The Commission's work falls under two heads: —

(a) Preparation for the convoking the UNESCO and —

(b) Immediate action to deal with the urgent needs of education and culture in devastated countries.

Discussion turned on the date at which the next meeting should be held, and in view of the urgency of the second part of its functions, a meeting was called for Monday, November 19th. There was also some preliminary discussion of the topic which might constitute the main basis of discussion at the first meeting of UNESCO. While no final decision was reached, considerable support and enthusiasm was expressed for the suggestion that the topic should be "Adult Illiteracy".

At the second meeting of the Commission on November 19th, the question was raised by the Czechoslovakian representative as to the authority under which he and certain other delegations could attend this meeting, and this position was supported by a number of states. This made it impossible to continue to transact business on an official basis, though the Chairman ruled that decisions taken at the first meeting were valid.

A list of countries were nominated from the Chair to compose the Technical Sub-Committee on an entirely provisional basis, however, and a meeting of this Provisional Sub-Committee was called for the latter part of the week, later fixed for Friday, November 23rd. This arrangement was approved and it was agreed that while authoritative action by the Sub-Committee and subsequent action by the Preparatory Commission must await the obtaining of credentials by the member states of both Committees, the Technical Sub-Committee should meanwhile meet and discuss tentative plans.

COMMENT

The effectiveness of the Conference as a whole will be determined by future developments. As is made clear in the final documents, the working of the constitution depends at many points on a relationship between UNESCO and UNO which still remains to be defined. Delegates to the Conference were fully aware of this, recognizing that they were breaking new ground in international organization and that unforeseen circumstances would probably arise for which adequate provision had not been made. The instruments under which the organization will operate, therefore, will need adjustment. Moreover, while final agreement on the constitution was reached without dissent, it was realized that the document was not without imperfections and that it did not, perhaps could not, at this stage wholly satisfy the expectations of every country signing it.

The discussions in plenary session and in commission were marked by certain general features. At the outset two somewhat different emphases were laid on the purposes of the Conference. One, representing chiefly the views of the delegations whose countries had suffered most from the war, concentrated on the urgent necessity of beginning at once to restore the equipment and personnel through which education, scientific study and cultural activities which had been destroyed, might be restored. The speeches of delegates like M. Leon Blum of France, and representatives from China, Belgium, Poland and Greece, underlined in a striking manner the pressing needs in those countries.

The other point of view stressed rather the importance of laying the firm foundations of an international organization which would be concerned with the long range interests of intellectual and cultural co-operation. The United States delegation put the case for this view most strongly.

The significance of this situation as the Conference progressed, however, was not the divergence between groups, but the firm determination of all delegations, from the outset, to reconcile the two views. At many points, therefore, delegates manifested their readiness to understand the preoccupation of others and to accommodate their own opinions to them. It was in this conciliatory spirit, marking the whole Conference, that in the Preamble, the Definition of Purposes, and in the establishment of the Preparatory Commission — which provides machinery both for long term matters and short term emergency — it was found possible to reach amicable unanimity on the final draft of documents.

A second point on which the Conference found itself in fundamental agreement concerns the Organization itself. UNESCO is constituted in very close relationship with the United Nations and in many respects is based on the Charter of UNO. This was held to be important for many reasons. It would allow for co-ordination of effort, economy of personnel and administration, and, most important, would associate UNESCO closely with the vital peace aims for which the United Nations Organization was established. In this connection, due attention was paid in Conference discussions to the Report of the Executive Committee of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations.

At the same time, the Conference also felt that if it was to achieve its objectives in the fullest sense, if it was to guard and promote in any effective way the free circulation of knowledge, and ideas, it must itself enjoy the maximum amount of autonomy. Hence the provision for conference administration and its own budget — subject to the agreement reached with the United Nations and the emphasis laid on the co-operation of the Organization with the independent and unofficial bodies national and international in the fields of education, science and culture.

There was general agreement, too, that the vigour of the Organization would largely depend on the support given to its recommendations, and the interest shown on its discussions, by the organized intellectual and cultural life of each member state. Each member not only has its own contribution to make in these matters to the Conference, and to the work of the Organization; it also has much to gain for its own use. It was hoped, therefore, that through the many forms of organizations concerned with education, science and culture, the findings and accumulated data of the Organization would be constantly diffused throughout the world.

Another aspect of the discussions was the prevalent sense among Delegates that workers in the field of the mind, particularly science, were discovering new responsibilities in the modern world, both for promoting the free flow of scientific and cultural information, and for ensuring that these products of the laboratory and study should be used to help to maintain peace and to serve human needs. This feeling injected a note of seriousness into the Conference which was reinforced by the Washington discussions on Atomic Energy in progress at the time.

Constitutional considerations made it necessary for a number of delegations to be quite explicit as to the relation of the UNESCO to their national governments though there was no disposition indicated by the Conference to ignore this matter. The principle of sovereign equality as the basis of the Organization was observed, and the strict inviolability of national sovereignty as laid down in Art. 2, sub-sec. 7 of the UNO Charter was expressly incorporated in the Constitution. By implication and as stated by the Canadian delegates on a number of occasions, the absolute constitutional autonomy of each country in the educational field was also clearly put before the Conference.

Two last points may be mentioned. In many speeches and remarks throughout, it was urged emphatically that the Conference should never lose sight of practical and realistic considerations in drafting its constitution. The purpose of the Organization is to restore that which had been destroyed, and to build for the future. It must recognize that the need may often be greater than the capacity to relieve it; that it is easier to plan than to complete enterprises; that without fundamental experience such an Organization as UNESCO should proceed cautiously and without too many preconceived notions; that intellectual and cultural studies and projects should be related to actuality and the possible.

The second point was the hope expressed by more than one delegation, e.g. France and the United States, that the U.S.S.R. would, in due course, ally its educational, scientific and cultural life with that of the other members of UNESCO. Special reference was made to this in the record of the Preparatory Commission, and a place was left vacant on the Executive Committee of the Commission, which, before long, it was hoped the U.S.S.R. would take.

TELEGRAM 2955 Ottawa, December 14, 1945

Following for MacDermot begins: — Your letters of November 24th† and December 3rd† to Ritchie, reference to question of Canadian participation in UNESCO.

1. The Canadian Government would not, repeat not, be in a position to grant special assistance from public funds towards educational reconstruction in Europe. Moreover, we find some difficulty in distinguishing between educational and other supplies delivered to European countries. As you are aware, several of the countries concerned are receiving export credits from

Canada and they can, therefore, purchase supplies available here with the dollars so provided.

2. So far as UNRRA is concerned it is clear that unless UNRRA authorizes the use of its funds for the purpose of educational reconstruction, Canadian contribution to UNRRA cannot be so employed. It would seem anomalous that countries which are paying for their relief supplies should be furnished by UNRRA with textbooks and other school equipment when relief food stuffs are being bought. In countries which are not paying for their relief supplies, consideration might presumably be given to the expansion of supplies furnished by UNRRA to include at any rate some essential equipment for the schools, but this would be a matter for UNRRA to decide.

3. As an alternative to governmental assistance from public funds, question of private appeal in Canada on lines proposed by State Department might be considered. We are, of course, in sympathy with the emergency needs of devastated countries for educational supplies, but we do not possess sufficient information as to the nature of the supplies likely to be in demand, nor the private bodies in Canada which might be interested. Further consideration can be postponed until your return to Ottawa.

4. As regards Canadian representation on Executive Committee of UNESCO, we gather from your telegram 3419[†] that no further meetings of its sub-committee will take place before late in January, the affairs of the Executive Committee being handled in the interim by the Permanent Secretary. You should consult with the High Commissioner with regard to the possibility of Rive attending these meetings. Alternatively, it would be necessary to secure the services of an appropriate Canadian educationalist now in the United Kingdom. Ends.

MOST SECRET February 8, 1944

Dear Mr. MacDonald,

Thanks for your letter of Feburary 5th,[†] quoting despatch from Sir John Anderson. I am glad that Sir John approves the action taken. We are doing everything possible to restrict discussion, and considering the rather drastic action taken, I think that we are meeting with some success.

I will, of course, inform the Combined Policy Committee of the action taken, but having in mind my last discussion in Washington with members of the Combined Policy Committee, I have no doubt of their views. Unfortunately, Sir John Dill was not present when the matter was discussed.

Unfortunately, the time and place of meetings of the Combined Policy Committee are so secret that I have never been able to attend a formal meeting. To date I have no advice of the time and place of the next meeting other than the information given me by Sir John Dill. If you can obtain any information on this subject, I shall be glad if you will advise me so that I can be among those present.

Perhaps you might let your correspondent in Washington know that I would appreciate a formal notice from the Secretary of the Committee.

Yours sincerely,

C. D. HOWE

PERSONAL AND MOST SECRET Ottawa, April 10, 1944

Dear Mr. Howe,

As requested I have prepared and am enclosing three memoranda on the very secret Radiological Project:

Number 1 — General status of project

Number 2 — Recommendation of the Subcommittee on joint development of a heavy water pile Number 3 — Recommendation of C. J. Mackenzie to the Honourable Mr. Howe.

My recommendations under number 3 have been made without the benefit of consultation with General Groves and Professor Chadwick and may have to be modified in some respects after the meeting in Washington.[1]

I have been as brief and general as possible in memorandum number 1 but the document does give on paper statements that the Americans would probably object on security reasons to having on any but the most secret files.

Yours sincerely,

C. J. MACKENZIE

MEMORANDUM NUMBER 1

GENERAL STATUS OF RADIOLOGICAL PROJECT

To: The Honourable C. D. Howe

From: C. J. Mackenzie

For some years it has been generally known that vast quantities of energy are locked up in the atom.

---

[1]Réunion du comité conjoint de la politique le 13 avril 1944.
Meeting of the Combined Policy Committee, April 13, 1944.

Nuclear physicists tell us that even the large energy released in modern high explosives involves only the relatively small energy of the electrons in the outer fringe of the atomic envelope.

The discovery of radium brought a knowledge of radioactivity, i.e. the spontaneous breaking away of a part of the atom. The total energy released is small as only a small portion of the atom is liberated, but atom for atom the energy release in radioactivity is 100,000 times that in the most modern high explosive.

This gave physicists an idea: if the total atom could be made to "burst" a theoretical amount of energy could be obtained, at least a million times greater than that obtainable from high explosives or fuel.

In December, 1938 and January, 1939 in France and Germany a discovery was made that certain elements, chiefly uranium, could be made to "burst" (scientific term "fission"). Since 1941 active research in the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada has been carried out and it is now certain a bomb can and will be made that will be, if not a million times, at least hundreds of times more powerful than anything yet known. It is also certain that power units will be made in the future for aeroplanes, ships and submarines that will drive planes thousands of miles and carry ships across the ocean on a few pounds of fuel.

In 1943 the United Kingdom effort was combined with that of Canada and transferred to Montreal. The American effort has been enormous: expenditures and commitments to date are over two billion dollars.

Time and military urgency demand that every possible avenue be explored. The United States has six separate projects underway — a seventh depending on heavy water, while most important and proving, could not be started until plants to manufacture heavy water were constructed. These plants, built in America at a cost of perhaps a hundred million dollars, are now coming into production.

The present proposal is to build the pilot plant for this important phase of the project in Canada as a joint United States, United Kingdom and Canadian effort. Our ownership of uranium ores, our early interest in the production of heavy water at Trail and the presence of a highly expert group of workers in Canada give us a special interest and facility for this work.

In my opinion Canada has a unique opportunity to become intimately associated in a project which is not only of the greatest immediate military importance, but which may revolutionize the future world in the same degree as did the invention of the steam engine and the discovery of electricity. It is an opportunity Canada as a nation cannot afford to turn down.

RESUMÉ OF REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON JOINT DEVELOPMENT OF A HEAVY WATER PILE TO THE COMBINED POLICY COMMITTEE

United Kingdom and Canada	Sir John Dill Sir Ronald Campbell Hon. C. D. Howe.

At the February 17, 1944 meeting of the Combined Policy Committee, a subcommittee was appointed to bring in recommendations in connection with the joint development of a heavy water pile. The subcommittee consisting of Major General L. R. Groves,[4] Professor J. Chadwick[5] and Mr. C. J. Mackenzie recommends as follows:

(a) Make no increase at this time in the present facilities for heavy water.

(b) Continue the present programs at Chicago and Montreal for the development of fundamental information on heavy water piles.

(c) Undertake the design and construction of a heterogeneous heavy water pilot pile in Canada, as a joint American-British-Canadian project.

(d) When adequate information has been obtained, or when the performance of the pilot plant is known, consider the design, construction, and location of a single heterogeneous heavy water pile of about 50,000 K.W.

(e) Review the situation when the performance of the first large scale graphite pile at Hanford becomes known.

(f) Set up an organization to supervise the pilot pile project.

(g) Strengthen the Montreal Laboratory by the inclusion of American scientists as well as British and Canadian scientists and the appointment of a Director.

MEMORANDUM NUMBER 3

RECOMMENDATION OF C. J. MACKENZIE
TO THE HONOURABLE MR. HOWE

To: The Honourable C. D. Howe

From: C. J. Mackenzie

1. It is my opinion that Canada should agree to the recommendation of the subcommittee.

2. WHAT IS INVOLVED:

Cost — While the subcommittee has not presented estimates of cost, it is believed the following figures represent the proper order of magnitude.

Capital Cost:
Construction of pilot plant	$4,000,000
Supply of heavy water, graphite and uranium metal, etc.	4,000,000
TOTAL	8,000,000
Yearly operating cost	1,500,000

The United States Army has now available all the heavy water, graphite and uranium metal necessary and it is assumed that as the project is a cooperative one they will supply the material, and the other expenses will be shared between the United Kingdom and Canada so that the capital cost to Canada would be about $2,000,000. The operating cost also might be shared by the American and British but in my opinion we should be prepared to meet the following minimum costs:

1944 —	Capital Cost of Pilot Plant	$2,000,000
	Operation of existing Montreal Lab.	750,000
		2,750,000.
1945 —	Operating pilot plant and Labs.	1,750,000.

3. ORGANIZATION:

The project is to be a joint effort with scientific and technical personnel from the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, and will presumably be under the auspices of the Combined Policy Committee.

IT IS MY OPINION THAT:

(a) The project should be directed as to general policy by a subcommittee of the above Policy Committee such as:

Major General Groves representing United States
Professor Chadwick representing United Kingdom
C. J. Mackenzie representing Canada

(b) There should be immediately appointed two senior officers, i.e.

(i) A Scientific Director General — To be responsible for the scientific direction and management of the laboratories: a national of either the United Kingdom or the United States to be agreed upon by General Groves and Professor Chadwick.

(ii) A Managing Director — To be in charge of the construction of the pilot plant and all administrative matters, and take general directions from the above mentioned subcommittee. This officer should be a Canadian or at least be appointed by the Canadian member of the Policy Committee. This officer should be an experienced and high grade industrial engineer.

(c) That apart from payment of salaries and expenses of United Kingdom and United States members of the team, authority and responsibility for all matters of discipline and administrative detail should be clearly and definitely vested in a Canadian organization and that the Managing Director be an officer of that organization. Whether the organization should be the Department of Munitions and Supply, the National Research Council, or some other agency such as R.E.L.[6] or D.I.L.[7] should be decided as soon as possible.

1. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY submitted a proposal recommended by the Acting President of the National Research Council for the construction and operation, in Canada, of a pilot plant for the further development of a special process of the highest secrecy. The product of this process promised to be of the greatest importance to the war effort and its postwar significance was likely to prove revolutionary.

The project was being conducted under a Combined Policy Committee representative of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. Large sums had already been spent upon it by the U.S. government. Estimated cost of the present proposal included $4 millions for capital construction, $4 millions for materials and $750,000 annually for operation.

Participation of the Canadian government was strongly recommended. Appropriation of the necessary funds would have to be kept secret.

2. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved the Minister's recommendation and authorized expenditure to Canadian account of up to $4 millions capital cost and $750,000 operating expenses.

4. MONTREAL PROJECT

Major-General Groves reported on behalf of the Special Sub-committee, appointed at the meeting of 17th February, 1944, to study a proposed joint development of a heavy water pile in Canada. He summarized its Report to the Combined Policy Committee,[10] which had been circulated previously to all members of the Committee, emphasizing the premises from which conclusions had been derived and setting out the recommendations made therein.

Mr. Howe stated that Canada was prepared to accept the recommendation and, indeed, was willing to accept the cost of the development now planned. Mr. Howe thought a suitable site had been found where all technical facilities, housing and other services were already available and where security conditions would be satisfactory.

Field Marshal Sir John Dill referred to anxiety which had been shown in Great Britain that the services of the team of scientists now in Montreal should be used to the full. He expressed relief that a programme of work could now be envisaged which, with adequate priorities and exchange of information, would make that possible.

Major-General Groves stated that he foresaw no difficulties with regard to American priorities required by the proposed work in Canada. He also explained that whatever information from American sources was required for the successful prosecution of the work in Canada would be forthcoming. He thought the group in Canada should be given full support and should operate under the same security restrictions as a similar group working in the U.S.A.

Mr. Howe stated that the project would be given top priority in Canada. He agreed that there should be no difficulty over priorities on materials necessarily to be obtained in the United States. Mr. Howe felt these matters could be cleared easily through machinery already established in Canada for dealing with Canadian and American priorities.

The Committee adopted unanimously the Recommendations of the Special Subcommittee.

In fulfillment of recommendation (f), the Committee unanimously agreed that Dr. James Chadwick, Major-General L. R. Groves and Dean C. J. Mackenzie, who had constituted the investigating Special Subcommittee, should continue to act as a Subcommittee of the Combined Policy Committee to supervise, on behalf and under the general supervision of the Committee, the carrying out in Canada of this joint American-British-Canadian project in accordance with the Recommendation now adopted.

Dear Mr. Webster,

I have your two letters of May 24th† with reference to the Agreement and Declaration of Trust. I am quite satisfied with the form of the Agreement, and it will be satisfactory to Canada.[11]

I note that Sir Charles Hambro and Mr. F. G. Lee are likely to be nominated as the two U.K. Trustees.

I suggest as the Canadian member, Mr. George C. Bateman, Deputy Member of the Combined Production and Resources Board, and Associate Metals Controller, for Canada. Mr. Bateman, who is resident in Washington, has a wide knowledge of the problems with which the Trust will be faced, and is, I believe, well qualified for the responsibilities that he will assume. Mr. Bateman will be able to give whatever time is necessary to the work involved.

Negotiations with Belgian Government

Thanks for your letter of July 17th,† setting forth the position of negotiations between the Belgian Government in Exile on the one part and the Governments of the U.K. and U.S.A. on the other part.

I agree with you that we on this side should permit considerable latitude to those in London who are acting on our behalf. Accordingly, I have instructed Mr. Bateman that Canada will not object to such reasonable terms as may be agreed to by the U.K. and U.S.A., provided always that materials of Canadian origin are not discriminated against in the markets of U.S.A. and the U.K.

Your letter reaches me just as I am leaving Ottawa to be absent one week. I will be glad to examine the matter with Malcolm MacDonald on my return to Ottawa. If in the meantime a decision is requied from Canada, you may accept the judgment of Mr. Bateman as being my own judgment. If I may comment at this time, it seems to me that our Belgian friends are attempting to drive a very hard bargain.

If a meeting of the Combined Policy Committee is required, I will be glad to attend at a mutually convenient date after August 1st.[12]

6. MATTERS RELATING TO THE COMBINED DEVELOPMENT TRUST

(a) Upon motion duly made and seconded, the Combined Policy Committee RESOLVED unanimously that the appointment of the following persons on July 6, 1944, as Trustees of the Combined Development Trust pursuant to Paragraph 1 of the Agreement and Declaration of Trust entered into between the two Governments dated June 13, 1944, be hereby approved and ratified:

Mr. George C. Bateman
Maj. Gen. L. R. Groves
Sir Charles J. Hambro
Mr. George L. Harrison[13]
Mr. Frank C. Lee
Mr. Charles K. Leith[14]

(b) A letter dated September 18, 1944, from Maj. Gen. L. R. Groves, sent as Chairman of the Combined Development Trust to the Secretary of War as Chairman of the Combined Policy Committee, a copy of which is annexed hereto,† was read to the Committee.

[14]Chef, Direction des métaux et des matériels, Bureau de la production, de la recherche et du développement, Commission de la production de guerre des États-Unis.
Chief, Metals and Materials Branch, Office of Production, Research and Development, United States War Production Board.

After some discussion of a point arising from the wording of the Trust Agreement, an interpretation of that point submitted in the third paragraph of Maj. Gen. Groves' letter was approved unanimously by the Committee subject to the adoption of rules of procedure of the Combined Development Trust requiring that a quorum of the Trust shall include one representative of the United Kingdom.

The Combined Policy Committee also discussed an outline of general practice on business between the Committee and the Trust which was submitted in the fourth paragraph of Maj. Gen. Groves' letter. The Committee approved this practice unanimously.

(c) The Combined Policy Committee considered Rules of Procedure which have been adopted by the Combined Development Trust and which were submitted by Maj. Gen. Groves as an annex to his letter addressed to the Secretary of War. The Committee accepted and approved these Rules of Procedure unanimously with the provision referred to in Paragraph 6(b) above. A copy of the rules approved is annexed hereto.†

(d) The Combined Policy Committee considered a financial plan for the administration of the Combined Development Trust which had been submitted as a further annex to the letter from Maj. Gen. Groves to the Secretary of War. Maj. Gen. Groves entered the meeting and explained that it was the opinion of the Combined Development Trust that a definite substantial sum should be allocated to the Trust in order to enable it to carry out its duties under Paragraph 2 of the Trust Agreement. He pointed out that some of these duties would require the placing of contracts which would run for a considerable period of years and which, for example through options, might entail payments not easy to estimate at the present time. He reported the view of the Combined Development Trust that it was important for it to have sufficient funds in hand to go forward in carrying out its duties as set forth in the Trust Agreement. It was reported to the Committee that necessary U.S.A. funds were available.

After discussion and upon motion duly made and seconded the Combined Policy Committee RESOLVED unanimously that this financial plan for the administration of the Combined Development Trust be accepted and approved by the Committee subject to the authorization of the appropriate financial agency of the U.K. Government. A copy of this financial plan is annexed hereto.†

(e) As a result of these deliberations, it became clear that the Combined Policy Committee now understands that the Combined Development Trust will proceed within the limits of such monies as may be made available to it and acting in accordance with the provisions of the Declaration of Trust dated June 13, 1944, and subject to the principles of operation referred to in the preceding paragraphs of this section and to any further directions which the Combined Policy Committee may have to give from time to time, to obtain, insofar as may be practicable, control of the supply of uranium bearing ores and thorium bearing ores from the areas assigned to it by the Provisions of the Trust Agreement.

Aide-mémoire du haut commissaire de Grande-Bretagne au ministre des Munitions et des Approvisionnements

Aide-Mémoire from High Commissioner of Great Britain to Minister of Munitions and Supply

TOP SECRET [Ottawa, c. December 23, 1944]

AIDE MÉMOIRE

It is understood that some little time ago Mr. Howe was somewhat anxious to know whether our contribution to the Montreal project in skilled personnel, without which the project could not go on, might be withdrawn at the end of the war.

After the termination of hostilities it will, or course, be difficult at the same time to meet the needs of the universities, whose scientific departments will have to be rapidly re-established, and to find skilled personnel required for this kind of project.

Sir John Anderson wishes Mr. Howe to know however that there can be no question but that the United Kingdom must continue to give support to the Montreal project and to continue to do everything to ensure its success. Ways will have to be found of getting over the personnel difficulty — for instance, arrangements might be made for university physicists to be seconded to Montreal in rotation for a limited period of time.

Before Mr. Churchill left for Quebec on the last occasion the Chancellor gave him a note in this sense about the Montreal project with the object that if the question of our continued support after the war were raised by Mr. Mackenzie King or Mr. Howe satisfactory assurances could and should be given on this point. In that event, however, it is understood that Mr. Churchill did not discuss the Project with Mr. Mackenzie King on that occasion.

The Chancellor is therefore anxious that Mr. Howe should be under no misapprehension about our intentions in this respect and has accordingly asked the High Commissioner to explain this to Mr. Howe on his behalf.

There should accordingly be no doubt as to the United Kingdom's intention to continue to support and to co-operate with the Canadian authorities in respect of the Canadian activities in this connection after the war.

Dear Mr. Howe,

My latest information from Washington concerning the proposed technical or scientific statement is that the Americans will not (repeat not) be putting out any scientific statement at any rate for the present. I understand that they contemplate a considerable revision of their statement as at present proposed, but I have no details. I have been requested, therefore, to ask for your co-operation in ensuring that there will be no Canadian scientific statement issued until we get a release for such from Washington. The United Kingdom are of course conforming accordingly. In the meantime the French translation of your scientific statement (which Dr. Cockcroft is having done in Montreal) will be up here probably this evening or at any rate tomorrow morning. I will send this over to you as soon as received.[17]

Now that the news of the atomic bomb is out the United States authorities rescind their existing censorship stop on this subject and are replacing it with a censorship stop on the following lines.

Atomic Bombs

Nothing may be written, discussed or used in any media or publication on the following:

1. Specific processes, formulas and mechanics of operation.
2. Stocks, location of stocks, procurement of stocks and stock consumption.
3. Quality and quantity of production of active material.
4. Physical characteristics of the weapon and methods of using it.
5. Speculation in the future development of the processes for military purposes.
6. Information as to the relative importance of the various methods or plants or of their relative functions or efficiencies.

The American authorities have expressed the hope that the United Kingdom will act in confirmation with the above and I am requested to ask if you will be good enough also to comply.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Howe,

Your attention may have been called to a discrepancy between the text of President Truman's broadcast speech last night as given in the United States press and the text as it appears in the Canadian papers, or at any rate in the Gazette of Montreal.

The passage in question, one of those relating to the Atomic Bomb, reads in the Gazette as follows:

"The Atomic Bomb is too dangerous to be loosed in a lawless world. That is why Great Britain, Canada and the United States, who have the secret of its production, do not intend to reveal the secret until. . . "

I understand that the speech was delivered in these terms, but that in the advance version given to the United States press, the word "Canada" did not appear and that consequently, it will not or may not have occurred in the version published in the United States. You may like to know this. What happened, I gather, was that the advance version was received very shortly before the time of delivery at our Embassy at Washington who communicated at once with the White House, with the result that "Canada"was inserted by the President when he actually spoke.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Howe:

I saw General Groves this morning.

With regard to the heavy water, I did not have an opportunity of taking this up before, partly because I was away and partly because Groves has been practically incommunicado for some time.

He tells me that we need feel no uneasiness regarding the continued use in Canada of the heavy water borrowed from the U.S. The only chance of this being called back would be if the Americans abandoned the project, which, of course, is unthinkable. The continuation of the loan is, of course, on the understanding that it will continue to be used in Canada for the purpose for which it was intended.

He says that the heavy water which they obtained in Germany is of different grades, none of which is suitable for the purpose which Canada requires.

He considers that the U.S. and Canadian partnership is much more important to the U.S. than the U.S.-U.K. partnership. He did throw out a hint, which I did not think it wise for me to explore, to the effect that the U.S. had been carrying the full financial burden and I assume that he may wish to see this revised so that in the partnership arrangement, the U.S. will not be called upon for more than its proportionate share.

I spoke to him about the publicity emanating in the U.S. which carried unfavourable implications as far as Canada is concerned. He thought that the President's speech last night would go a long way towards correcting any such impression but said that at the first favourable opportunity he would emphasize the very high degree of cooperation which exists between the U.S. and Canada in all phases of this project.

Groves says that the bomb was exploded a considerable height above the ground, partly to get the maximum explosive effect over the widest area and also partly to minimize the danger of emanations extending over a considerable period of time, which might result from explosion on contact.

Yours sincerely,

G. C. BATEMAN

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] August 17, 1945

Dear Mr. Bateman:

Thanks for your letter of August 10th. The assurance of General Groves regarding heavy water is quite satisfactory.

Progress at the Chalk River project is slow, but improving, and it looks as though the project will be finished some time in November. We expect to have an interesting operation.

I am glad to know that Groves expects the U.S. and Canadian partnership to continue. I think that he is right about the relative merits of the two partnerships. We intend to strengthen our own staff and be independent of outside help. I do not understand his reference to the U.S. bearing all the cost, as Canada is now bearing the cost of its own project without help from anyone, but this can be discussed if Groves raises the question formally.

I am not greatly worried about the publicity emanating in the United States. Fortunately for us, the Canadian contribution has been wholly creditable to Canada.

I was glad to notice that Mr. Churchill gives the atomic bomb credit for stopping the war.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

SECRET [Ottawa,] August 18, 1945

The great public interest in the atomic bomb makes it highly probable that a number of matters concerning its manufacture, employment and future control will be raised in Parliament early in the session and that the Government will be expected to make some declaration of policy. Quite apart from this the successful development of the bomb is of such far-reaching importance that it may profoundly affect international affairs even to the point of altering the whole balance of international forces overnight. It seems desirable, therefore, that we should attempt as a matter of some urgency to arrive at a careful appreciation of the results of this tremendous discovery as soon as possible. It is worth considering whether you should make a statement on the orders of the day early in the session covering certain aspects in which we are specially concerned.

2. The fact that Canada has played a considerable part in the development of the bomb and is a guardian of at least some of the secrets connected with it both puts the Government in a position of special responsibility and places at its disposal knowledge and experience available only to the United States and United Kingdom Governments as well as ourselves. Since Canada is also a major source of the essential ingredient our policy concerning the control, production and export of uranium and other radioactive minerals is a matter on which long-term decisions will have to be taken soon.

3. In order to consider the political issues arising from the development of the bomb, it is necessary to secure the best scientific opinion available on a number of technical questions. These include such questions as the following:

(a) Is the secret of the manufacture likely to be preserved or is its independent discovery probable in other countries?

(Mr. Churchill in his speech of August 16th expressed the view that the secret would remain in present hands only for three or four years.)

(b) In any event, is the process of manufacture likely to remain so elaborate and costly that the bomb could only be produced in two or three countries?

(c) Is uranium likely to remain the principal ingredient?

(d) What is the known distribution of deposits of uranium, thorium and other actual or potential ingredients?

4. The list of questions could be lengthened easily. To get an interim answer to them would require the assistance of persons informed on the scientific and technical aspects of the development. Such an answer is needed before one can assess the effect of the bomb on international relations, defence planning and so on. I, therefore, suggest that you should approve consultation with the President of the National Research Council and such other experts as he may suggest with a view to developing information of the type proposed in the last paragraph.

5. Public interest is centering naturally on the future control of the bomb and its relation to the preservation of world security. Mr. Coldwell has already declared that "it should immediately be placed under the control and supervision of the Security Council of the United Nations." Both President Truman and Mr. Churchill have taken the view that the secret should be kept by those who now hold it at least for the time being. There will doubtless be strong pressure, especially from the Soviet Union, for detailed information. (I understand that the Soviet Government has already requested us to provide them with 50 tons of uranium.) Since the Security Council is impotent to act in a dispute between its own permanent members and since the danger of another great war in present circumstances can arise only from such a dispute, it is optimistic to assume at this stage that the development of the bomb greatly enhances the authority of the Security Council by placing at its disposal an effective weapon against major aggression. The answer to the question of how the use of the weapon can best be related to the preservation of world peace in general and the responsibilities of the Security Council in particular must depend in part on the technical aspects referred to above and perhaps still more on the attitude of the United States and United Kingdom Government.

6. It seems too soon to estimate with any certainty the effects of the bomb on our own defence planning with relation to the size and disposition of our post-war forces. There is even a possibility that the discovery will heighten tension between the great powers rather than reduce it. Furthermore, jealous eyes may be turned towards the sources of the essential ingredient and we may feel compelled to take special measures to protect those sources within Canada. We may also find that our part in the development will lead for the first time to a serious effort to plant foreign agents in Canada with the object of securing information on secret processes.

7. If you agree with the general lines of this memorandum, I think that as a first stage consultation with the President of the National Research Council should take place without delay.

You may be interested in the attached memorandum on the effects of atomic bombs on defence planning. This paper, which was submitted to the Joint Intelligence Committee (on which we are now represented), has made a great impression on the service members. They are now anxious to begin a study of the functions and organization of intelligence services in Canada and are asking for our advice.[19]

This will have to be related also to the questions twice put informally to us, first by Arnold-Forster[20] and secondly by Cavendish-Bentinck,[21] as to whether there would be a co-ordinated intelligence organization in Canada which would be willing to co-operate with a smaller body being planned in the United Kingdom. J.I.C. are starting an immediate study of this and if you agree I would suggest that for the time being they confine themselves to drafting possible plans which could then be examined by this department.

1. The general principles of the atomic bomb are so well known that any country willing to spend the requisite amount of money can learn the secret of the manufacture.

2. Uranium ores are sufficiently widely spread that any country, even a large private corporation like Standard Oil or the Aluminum Company of America, can readily gather a stockpile adequate for the production of atomic bombs. Furthermore, scientists are likely to find other sources of atomic energy beside uranium ores.

3. While atomic bombs have so far been transported against hostile targets by plane alone, some method is likely to be found for projecting them by rocket also.

4. The present range of rocket-firing guns can certainly be greatly increased. Within ten or twenty years it may be possible to "rocket" atomic bombs against the city of New York from as far away as the coast of France in Europe, or of Brazil in South America.

5. No adequate defence against the atomic bomb is known. It may be that none is possible. So great is its destructiveness that navies, armored vehicles, concrete fortification and fleets of intercepting planes are as futile as was the body armour of the mediaeval knight against cannon.

6. International control of the manufacture and employment of atomic bombs is exceedingly difficult. Factories diverted to their manufacture can be readily camouflaged as chemical and metallurgical plants; and no nation can be trusted not to use atomic bombs in order to gain world power, or perhaps even (e.g. Japan) merely to obtain revenge.

If the above statements are correct, as I believe them to be, then large navies and armies have lost most of their value and will shortly cease to exist. No country is going to spend $100 millions to build a battleship which can be obliterated in its home port by a single bomb launched perhaps from 2,000 or 3,000 miles away and costing, it may be, no more than $10,000. Hereafter, all that a nation planning an offensive war would seem to require is a coterie of scientists and technologists, a few industrial plants, and a small standing army to serve as a police force.

Intelligence Requirements in the Past

The present war demanded full and up-to-the-minute information on almost every phase of enemy life and activity; and each of the three services had its own peculiar intelligence needs.

The army needed to know the numbers, organization and distribution of the forces which the enemy could put into the field, their equipment, methods of transport and communication by land, sea and air, the industries that supplied their armaments and the food and medical services that kept them in the field.

The navy had to know every detail of the enemy's warships and mercantile marine, their sources of fuel and other supplies, their dockyards, harbor installations, etc.

The air force concentrated especially on the enemy's air resources, on air communication and transport, and on the military targets in enemy territory that could be attacked from the air.

Under these conditions each of the three services naturally required an intelligence branch of its own. True, it was necessary to coordinate the activities and pool the information of the three branches through a joint committee (the C.J.I.C.) and a joint sub-committee. But the system of three intelligence branches worked, and worked, on the whole, quite satisfactorily.

Today, conditions are entirely changed. As far as one can foresee, large armies and navies are both on their way out, and air forces are destined to be limited, probably to fast transport planes capable of carrying atomic bombs. War, if it recurs, will be waged with rockets and planes carrying atomic bombs; and it will be directed against all the major population centres, and against all places where rockets, planes and atomic bombs are either manufactured or stored.

Under conditions such as these, the maintenance of three separate branches of intelligence, all gathering exactly the same information about enemy installations and plans, will be absurd. Indeed, the division of the defence forces of any country into the three services, army, navy and air, will itself be open to question as anachronistic.

Future Intelligence Requirements

The atomic bomb is still in its infancy. At the present time the United States alone possesses the full secret of its manufacture, but Russian scientists are capable of discovering it within two or three years, and even Spain or Argentina, given the help of fugitive German scientists, may be manufacturing these bombs within a decade or two. We do not know the limits of their destructiveness, the length of time they can be kept in storage, or the precautions a nation should take, the information it should gather, to protect itself in the event of another war.

A few things seem reasonably certain:

1. Any future war is likely to be a matter of a few hours only, or, at the most, a few days. No nation will be able to survive a continuous rain of well-directed atomic bombs; and no nation is likely to attack another without preparing in advance what it believes to be an adequate stock of them.

2. Practically all the intelligence that was so essential for this war (e.g., on navies, armies, air-fleets, anti-aircraft defences, fortifications, landing beaches, etc.) will be useless. The short duration of any future war will preclude any problems of security and censorship, any interrogation of prisoners, etc.

3. Probably the main information a nation should possess, for its self-protection, will be the atomic bomb strength of its potential enemies and their means of launching them. Such information may be extremely difficult to obtain (as witness our ignorance of the industrial set-up of Russia before and during this war). Yet the perils of ignorance are so great that peace-loving nations may be willing to pool their intelligence, and exchange information on such topics as:

(a) Stocks of uranium and other source materials for atomic bombs.

(b) Locations and production of every chemical and metallurgical plant that might serve for the manufacture of atomic bombs, or of airplanes and rocket-guns capable of launching them.

(c) Activities of every scientist and technologist who might conceivably be engaged in research on, or the manufacture of, atomic bombs.

It is obvious from this that the information we shall require in the future will be very different from the information we have needed in the past. We shall be less concerned with purely military matters; e.g., armaments on sea and land, defence installations, etc.; but we will need to watch very closely the political and industrial organizations of all countries, and study also their topographic features and their economic and scientific resources. What more we shall need to know we cannot yet tell; and until the picture becomes clearer, it would be unwise perhaps, to scrap the intelligence services which we now possess, and which have served us so well in the past. But the handwriting is on the wall, and the change to some new intelligence set-up cannot be long delayed if Canada is to survive and maintain her place in the changed world.

Recommendation

In the light of the foregoing discussion I strongly recommend that the Canadian Joint Intelligence Committee suggest to the Chiefs of Staff Committee:

1. That a senior intelligence officer be sent to England to consult the heads of the various British Intelligence services, and to sound out their opinions concerning the nature of the intelligence they believe will be required henceforth and the kind of organization best fitted to obtain that intelligence.

2. That, subsequently, the same or another senior intelligence officer be sent to Washington on a similar mission.

[Ottawa,] September 5, 1945

With reference to my memorandum of August 18th concerning questions of policy arising from the development of the atomic bomb and the Canadian part therein, I gather from Mr. Malcolm MacDonald that it is expected that matters concerning the bomb will be discussed in the Council of Foreign Ministers. They would not be surprised in London if Mr. Molotov were to introduce the subject by requesting that the secret data should be revealed to the Russians. Mr. Byrnes has let Mr. Bevin know that he hopes to talk over with him in London the attitude which should be adopted at the Council but he is apparently not prepared to disclose the views of the U.S. Government in advance of his own arrival in London.

The suggestion may be made that we should participate in any discussions in the Council of Foreign Ministers on this subject but I think that we can leave that to be dealt with if it should arise.

The probability of international negotiations in the near future makes it very desirable that any statement made in the House of Commons should be most carefully weighed in advanced.

TOP SECRET Ottawa, September 5, 1945

Dear Mr. Fraser,

We are heading into some intricate problems of much concern to this Department arising from the development of the atomic bomb. It is likely that questions relating to it will come up at the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers which will open in London next week. In this connection I think that we should have exact knowledge of the approaches made to you by the Russians for a substantial quantity of uranium. You mentioned to me that they had asked some time ago for 50 tons of uranium, explaining that they wished it for use in a steel hardening process and that they had been put off with requests for further information on the process in question.

Could you let me have an abstract of the information appearing on your files about the Russian request and any information that is available about their following this up both before and after the first use of the atomic bomb? This may turn out to be a matter of some urgency and I hope that you will, therefore, be able to answer this letter soon in spite of your many other preoccupations at the moment.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Wrong:

The request from the Soviet Commission here for uranium was verbal.

A few months after Mr. Sergeev[22] returned to Moscow after his first visit to Canada in the Fall of 1943, Mr. Krotov[23] presented me with a direct request from Mr. Sergeev to supply them with fifty tons of uranium salts and a small quantity of uranium, if possible.

I was aware, at the time, of our operations in this field so discussed it immediately with Dr. Thompson before making any inquiries as to the availability of this item. Dr. Thompson asked me then to inquire for what purpose it was required and they advised me at this time that they wanted it for certain types of steel they were developing, so we then asked them to advise us how they used it in steel production and to indicate to us the formulas to be used and advised them that, when we received this information, we would then reconsider their request.

After this date, I never had a serious request for this item again, merely references to their previous request and I always replied that they had never supplied us with the information which we had requested. I am advised by Dr. Thompson that experiments have been made in steel manufacture with uranium but that no particular desirable results have been obtained.

I have had our files searched to make sure that there was no written request for these salts and we do not have any written record of such a request having been filed with us.

Yours very truly,

KARL C. FRASER

SECRET [Ottawa,] September 2, 1945

CONTROL OF THE ATOMIC BOMB BY THE UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION

President Truman in the course of his statement of August 6, 1945, announcing the first use of the atomic bomb, said, "Because of the wide-spread knowledge and interest in this subject even before the war, there is no possibility of avoiding the risks inherent in this knowledge by any long-term policy of secrecy." The President went on to name a committee to be set up "charged with the responsibility of formulating recommendations to the President concerning the post-war organization that should be established to direct and control the future course of the United States in this field, both with regard to the research and developmental aspects of the entire field and to its military applications. It will make recommendations with regard to the problem of both national and international control." In his subsequent broadcast of August 9 on the Potsdam Meeting, President Truman said, "The atomic bomb is too dangerous to be loose in a lawless world. That is why Great Britain and the United States who have the secret of its production do not intend to reveal the secret until means have been found to control the bomb so as to protect ourselves and the rest of the world from the danger of total destruction."

The President did not specify the United Nations Organization as the body which might be entrusted with international control of the atomic bomb, but it seems probable that the Organization which is to be responsible for world peace might, in the event of any form of international control being decided upon, be given this responsibility. Meanwhile there has been a good deal of talk in the press and elsewhere about the United Nations Organization being given control of the atomic bomb.

In the British House of Commons a group of Labour Members offered an amendment to the Government's motion for the ratification of the United Nations Charter in the following terms:

"And further expresses the opinion that the security proposals contained therein have been rendered inadequate by the atomic bomb and that the Government should take steps to represent to the United Nations that:

(A) An international centre for research and production in relation to atomic power should be created at international expense and staffed by international scientists and experts;

(B) A system of international inspection of national laboratories and production plants should be instituted for the purpose of ensuring that no development of atomic power for purely national purposes takes place."

No doubt when our own House of Commons comes to consider the ratification of the United Nations Charter, there will be discussion of the atomic bomb. There may be proposals for its control by the United Nations Organization or by some other international body specially created for the purpose.

The issues involved may perhaps be considered under three headings:

1. Control of existing capacity to manufacture the weapon. (This is at present vested exclusively in the United States, apart from dependence on Canadian supplies of uranium.)

2. Control of the secret of the scientific discoveries on which the manufacture of the bomb depends. This information is confined to the United States, United Kingdom and Canadian Governments.

3. International control of future scientific experimentation in this field, of future production of these weapons and of the raw materials concerned in their production.

All three questions are interconnected, but it is wholly within the power of the United States Government to decide the first. There is nothing in the United Nations Charter to compel the United States Government to submit the manufacture of the atomic bomb to the control of the United Nations Organization. So far as its obligations under the Charter are concerned, the United States would be free to carry on the manufacture of such weapons for its own exclusive use. The Charter does not provide for compulsory disarmament or the limitation or control of special forms of armament, but merely states in Article 26 which deals with disarmament, that "in order to promote the establishment and maintenance of international peace and security with the least diversion for armaments of the world's human and economic resources, the Security Council shall be responsible for formulating with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee referred to in Article 47, plans to be submitted to the Members of the United Nations for the establishment of a system for the regulation of armaments."

By Article 2 of the Charter the United States, like all other Members of the Organization, is committed to refrain in international relations from "the threat or use of force," but it could perfectly well be argued that the continued manufacture of the atomic bomb does not in itself constitute a threat of force any more than the maintenance of any other form of armaments.

It is possible that if the United States has not by that time come forward with some plan for the international control of the atomic bomb, the subject may be raised and discussed by the Assembly of the United Nations at its first meeting. The Assembly has the power under Article II of the Charter to "consider the general principles of co-operation in the maintenance of international peace and security, including the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments." It is possible that the Assembly might recommend the control of the atomic bomb by the United Nations Organization. Such a recommendation might be made either to the United States Government or to the Security Council, or to both. The Government of the United States could, if it so decided, ignore the recommendation of the Assembly, and if the question came before the Security Council the United States could exercise its veto to prevent any interference with its exclusive control and manufacture of the bomb.

In view, however, of President Truman's declaration concerning the future control of the bomb, it seems more probable that before the first meeting of the Organization the United States Government, perhaps in association with the United Kingdom Government, will declare its policy with regard to the future of these weapons. It has been suggested in the press that this subject may come before the Council of Foreign Ministers at its forthcoming meeting in London.

Any attempt to forecast United States policy in the matter is pure speculation as there is no indication of the intentions of the United States Government. One possibility is that the United States might announce its willingness to place the atomic bomb and any similar weapons which may be discovered at the disposal of the Security Council to be used for the preservation of international peace and the suppression of aggression. Such an offer might have to be made dependent on the understanding that if the manufacture of similar weapons were undertaken by other countries, they in their turn would make them available to the Security Council and would give assurances that they would not be employed in any way inconsistent with the Purposes of the Organization. It would doubtless be understood, however, that all the nations concerned would retain the right under Article 51 of the Charter to make use of these as of any other weapons in self-defence.

A proposal of this kind would not in itself involve international control over the production of the atomic bomb. It might perhaps be linked with the further proposal to entrust the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations with the responsibility for formulating a plan for the control of the atomic bomb by the United Nations Organization. In terms of the Charter the Military Staff Committee would be the appropriate body to undertake this responsibility. It would have to be assisted in its planning by expert scientific advisers. If the Military Staff Committee or perhaps some other special body set up to consider the international control of the bomb reported in favour of the practicability of its control by the United Nations Organization, the United States and United Kingdom Governments would at once be faced with a decision of the gravest kind. It seems fairly obvious that no system of international control could be made to work unless it was based on full reciprocity of scientific information amongst the nations concerned. The position has been well stated by Sir Henry Dale of the Royal Society in the United Kingdom. He argues for the complete disclosure of the scientific facts. "The abandonment of any national claim to secrecy about scientific discoveries must be a prerequisite for any kind of international control such as will obviously be indispensable if we use atomic energy to its full value and avoid the final disaster which its misuse might bring."

In any event, in the words of President Truman, "there is no possibility of avoiding the risks inherent in this knowledge by any long-term policy of secrecy." Mr. Churchill has suggested an interval of 5 years before the secret can be discovered by scientists elsewhere. If this secret is withheld from the Soviet Union, it can be assumed that Soviet scientists will be devoting all their energies to its discovery. It has been suggested that French scientists who had made considerable progress in research in this field before the German occupation will not be long in achieving results.

Despite the likelihood of similar discoveries in other countries, there will no doubt be a case put forward for the retention of secret scientific information about the bomb by the Governments which now control it. Senator Vandenburg in a press interview on August 25 said that the secret could not be shared with the world until "after the creation of absolutely free and untrammeled rights of intimate inspection all around the globe." He added, "That is a freedom which does not yet unfortunately exist." No doubt many of his fellow citizens will share Senator Vandenburg's views.

Should the British and American Governments arrive at the decision in principle that the secret of the production of the atomic bomb is to be shared, the question would at once arise with whom it should be shared. Presumably if the control of the weapon is to be vested in a body responsible to the Security Council, the nations whose representatives compose the Council might be expected to share in the secret of production. Alternatively, it might be proposed that this information should be restricted to the permanent members of the Security Council whose representatives sit on the Military Staff Committee. Any restrictive arrangement of this kind would be almost impossible to work out in practice. If the effective control of the atomic bomb is to be vested in the Great Powers or to be shared between the two great Anglo-Saxon powers and the Soviet Union, a hegemony of power would result which would be intolerable to the other states of the world and might drive them into competitive experimentation and manufacture of such weapons. Yet it is hardly likely that at this stage the United States and United Kingdom Governments would be prepared to pool their information with all the Members of the United Nations, many of which would never in any event be in a position to manufacture atomic bombs.

But international control to be effective would have to mean much more than the mere pooling of information. The body charged with this responsibility would have to have world-wide powers of investigation. There would have to be some form of control of the production and manufacture of the weapons themselves. Production might be limited to states authorized by the Security Council to produce weapons for the use of the Organization, but any such system would be open to formidable objections. As an alternative, production might be confined to international zones and produced as a charge on the Security Council by international staffs. There would also have to be control of raw materials.

The present Charter does not envisage a problem of this kind. The Security Council has general responsibility for the maintenance of world peace and the Members have agreed to accept and carry out its decisions "in accordance with the present Charter" (Article 24). The present Charter would not appear to give the Security Council authority for such far reaching invasions of the domestic jurisdiction of member states as would be implied by any effective international control of experiment and production in this field. Moreover, the United Nations Organization does not embrace all states and control would have to be world-wide. If, however, the Members of the United Nations accepted international control, the Organization might act with regard to non-member states under the authority of Article 2 of the Charter — "The Organization shall ensure that states which are not Members of the United Nations act in accordance with these Principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security."

But the most superficial review of the difficulties involved in international control of this new discovery must raise the question as to whether it would be possible at all in a world organized in nation states.

The possible beneficent results of the new discovery have not been touched upon as these seem remote and problematical. It may possibly be suggested that a body responsible to the Economic and Social Council should be appointed to explore this aspect of the question.

Canada's Position:

At the present time it appears (although positive and detailed information on this point is not available) that the continued manufacture of the atomic bomb is dependent on supplies of Canadian uranium. If Canada were a Great Power, its monopoly of the indispensable component of the atomic bomb might put this country in a position to determine decisions as to the future use and control of the bomb; but as Canada is not a Great Power, her possession of uranium is perhaps more likely to expose her to embarrassments and difficulties.

In any event, our exclusive possession of the essential material for the manufacture of these weapons is not likely to be of very long duration. Uranium is known to exist elsewhere in the world, in the Belgian Congo for example. It is possible that more will be discovered, perhaps among the varied mineral resources of the U.S.S.R. It also seems likely that in the course of time other substances may be discovered which can be used instead of uranium in the production of the atomic bomb.

But as long as the United States is dependent on Canada for supplies of uranium, the policy of the United States Government with regard to the atomic bomb will require the cooperation of Canada. If the United States should decide that the time is not ripe for international control of the atomic bomb and that its production should be a United States monopoly, the United States Government might insist that Canada should continue to supply American requirements of uranium to the exclusion of those of all other nations. Such a policy has already been advocated by one irresponsible American newspaper. It seems unlikely that it will ever be the policy of the United States Government.

It seems more probable that the United Kingdom and United States Governments will co-operate closely in their plans as to the future of the atomic bomb. The two Governments might jointly decide that it was not safe to disclose the secret of production and that international control was not yet practicable. The Canadian Government might share this view, but even if the Government of Canada had come to the opposite conclusion and was willing to co-operate now in pooling information and in setting up a system of international control, it would hardly be possible for Canada to take any action in this direction of which the United States and the United Kingdom did not approve. In such circumstances we might find ourselves in a difficult position if other nations (e.g. the U.S.S.R. or France) should request the Canadian Government to supply them with uranium on similar terms to those under which we are making it available to the United States and the United Kingdom.

It would therefore be in Canada's interests for an effective system of international control to be set up, for we should no longer have to bear the responsibility of controlling the supplies of this essential material. But the prospects of such a system being established seem at present to be somewhat remote. Meanwhile there does not in practice appear to be any alternative open to Canada but to concur in any major decisions of policy which may be agreed upon by the United States and United Kingdom Governments. If these Governments decide that international control and pooling of scientific information can safely be attempted, the Government of Canada would not presumably object to international control of Canadian uranium supplies. If, on the other hand, the two great Anglo-Saxon powers decided to maintain the present position, Canada would not wish to press for international control at the risk of parting company on so important a question with both the United Kingdom and the United States. A difficult situation from the Canadian point of view would, however, arise if the policies of the United Kingdom and the United States diverged — if, for example, the United Kingdom were to advocate some measure of international control which the United States felt to be dangerous or premature.

The hypotheses which have been outlined above are necessarily mere guesswork as to possible alternative situations with which the Canadian government might find itself faced. If they show nothing else, they at least indicate the importance of the Department of External Affairs being as fully informed as the requirements of secrecy permit with regard to developments of Government policy and of public opinion in this field both at home and abroad.

The policy of Canada with regard to the international control of atomic weapons will obviously have to be considered not only on the technical or military plane, but in relation to Canada's foreign policy. The subject of the atomic bomb is explosive in more ways than one. It is capable of producing sudden and drastic effects on the relations of Canada with other states. It seems, therefore, to be essential that somebody should be set up in the Department of External Affairs to study the problem (perhaps with the advice of scientific experts) and to consider the question of the future control of the atomic bomb and of its bearing on Canada's foreign relations.

To: Major General Maurice Pope

Mr. Heeney suggested that I might send to you for your consideration various memoranda concerning the atomic bomb. On putting together my papers I have made quite an accumulation. These are my only copies and I should be glad if you would return them when you have perused them and made any extracts that you wish. The enclosures are as follows:

1. A note from me to the Prime Minister, dated August 18th, some of which is slightly outdated (e.g. I have now learned a good deal more about the questions raised in paragraph 3) but the main points in which still seem to me to be sound.

2. A memorandum on international control of the atomic bomb prepared by Mr. Ritchie, which is also a little bit outdated on some of the scientific points, but which contains a very useful analysis of the problems inherent in any attempt to entrust control of the bomb to the Security Council.

3. An interesting paper prepared by Mr. Jenness for the Joint Intelligence Committee on August 20th, with a short covering note from Mr. Glazebrook.

4. Three clippings from recent issues of the New York Times, of which the most important is the article by Phillips.†

5. A letter to me of September 13th from Lt. Col. P. W. Cooke of the Department of National Defence,[24] which arose out of some previous correspondence concerning his desire to secure an appointment as a Military Attaché. I have not answered this nor as yet discussed it with Glazebrook who represents this Department on the J.I.C.

I am quite sure that we must do something to further the preparation of a general policy. This will, of course, have many facets, of which the Intelligence field is only one. The first step is the collection of further information about our own position in relation to production of materials, control of radioactive deposits, part in the scientific research and development and participation in joint planning bodies with the U.K. and U.S. I am surprised that the matter has not yet been brought up in Parliament.

Mémorandum du représentant principal de l'armée canadienne, CPCAD, au sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Senior Canadian Army Member, PJBD, to Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET Ottawa, September 21, 1945

I have read the attached papers relating to the atomic bomb, which are returned herewith.

To my mind, it is more than difficult to assess, or even to attempt to assess, the influence of this new agency of destruction on the future organization of the Armed Forces, and on the broader question of its effect on international relations in the years which lie ahead. The participants in a revolution rarely, if ever, perceive the ultimate or even the short-run consequences of their actions. I am indebted to Mr. Scott Macdonald for the remark that it was not until about 1840, that Guizot first noted that the French Revolution has marked the end of the Feudal System in France and subsequently in the greater part of Europe. I therefore venture to doubt if the advent of the atomic bomb will prove an exception to this general rule. The timing, however, will be somewhat quicker.

The effects of this new weapon are admittedly devastating in the fullest sense of the word. But if history is a worth-while guide it may be recalled that while mediaeval armour proved useless against primitive cannon, the invention of gun powder did not drive armies from the field; that if cavalry could not operate over ground swept by machine-gun fire, other soldiers were not thereby prevented from closing with the enemy. In 1918 we learned that men armed only with rifles would not dally to argue the point with advancing armoured fighting vehicles, but in a short space of time they were provided with weapons which enabled them to do so, and with success. Twenty-five years ago the tank led the van of the attack. Today the tank follows in the wake of the foremost infantry.

Throughout the centuries there has been a see-saw struggle between the weapons of offence and those of defence. An advance in the one has invariably brought along a counter to the other. It may then be a little early to decide that President Truman was merely indulging in wishful thinking when he publicly stated that it was not intended to reveal the secret of the atomic bomb "until means have been found to control it so as to protect ourselves and the rest of the world from the danger of total destruction." The time to chant Dona ei requiem aeternam over the blasted bodies of the Fighting Services may not be just yet.

On the contrary, I cannot escape the conviction that our sea, land and air armies will retain their corporate existence for yet a while. That they may undergo radical change in the next few years is hardly open to doubt, but the toughness of their hold on life is likewise not to be doubted. Twenty years ago it was the fashion to predict that the next war would be fought by small compact armoured formations. Actually, in this war there were deployed in Europe upwards of 1,000 divisions, and at a guess I should say that not less than half of these were old-time infantry divisions equipped with horse-transport. I think, therefore, that in respect to our Armed Forces we should wait and see, in the meantime quietly going on with the plans we have in hand.

Elsewhere, and in other words, I have suggested to you that in most matters, excluding perhaps those relating to trade, economics and finance, it is but the policy of wisdom on our part to pass on the first round and to content ourselves with a supporting bid when we next have an opportunity to speak. Whatever may be thought of this as a general rule of policy, I have no hesitation in saying that it seems the appropriate one to follow with respect to the question under discussion.

Some earnest minds seem to believe that the closely-guarded secret of the atomic bomb "should immediately be placed under the control and supervision of the Security Council of the United Nations." To this I shall content myself by observing that those who can bring themselves to believe that Great Powers, such as the United States or the United Kingdom, would be innocent enough to give the world (for there would be no security in the Security Council or its Military Staff Committee) information of such vital political and military importance are merely seeking to be disillusioned. How much of the whole secret may be in the possession of Canadian authorities I do not know, but however this may be, I can only conclude that under this head we should be content to follow the lead of the United States and the United Kingdom.

As regards the control of the extraction and export of uranium, it seems clear that our policy should be such as fully to accord with that of the two English-speaking Great Powers. Consequently, we should not export uranium or other radio-active substances without first having obtained a green light from the United Kingdom and United States, which Powers I think we may feel assured will continue to pursue in these matters closely parallel lines of policy.

To revert to the question of the effect of this new discovery on the organization of the Fighting Services, I would repeat that we should adopt a policy of wait and see. The Canadian people have admirable martial qualities, but they are not, nevertheless, the world's leading militarists. You were good enough to bring to my notice that the United Kingdom had recently set up an important Advisory Committee to inquire into the report on the international treatment and the further industrial and military development of the atomic bomb. It may be that for breadth of knowledge we could match this committee in Canada, but I have some doubt as to this. In any event I think we should keep in touch with the work of this Committee and take such action as may be necessary to ensure that we are made aware of its findings. I might add here that the Chiefs of Staff have asked our Missions in London and Washington to report to them whatever information they can obtain under this head.

In the matter of research, I do not know precisely the part played by our Canadian scientists. Very properly the greatest reticence is being observed. My guess is that our people carried out specific tasks allotted them by the United States (and the United Kingdom?). It is very much to be desired that our people should be in a position to continue their close liaison of the past few years with London and Washington and do their part in further development. I would add the thought that as a special project they might undertake the study (if they are not already doing so) of the possibility of developing "guided" means of defence against "guided" missiles.

There is another military aspect to which it might be useful to make passing reference. As regards Europe, the desolate lands of Newfoundland are closer by 1,000 miles to possible trans-Atlantic targets than North American targets of importance are to European launching sites. The point lends added interest to Canadian and United States defence interest in Newfoundland.

Intelligence, I think, is the last remaining point to be touched upon. We of course should strive to keep ourselves posted in every aspect of the atomic war. We must, however, avoid the temptation to indulge in flights of fancy. Apart from our Discrimination activities, we have never enjoyed any original sources of information. It is possible that we may make some progress in this direction, but this in all probability will be rather gradual. I think for some time to come we shall have to depend on our usual United Kingdom (and possibly United States) sources of information. The proposal of a unified Government Intelligence Bureau, while interesting, is hardly germane to this paper.

The domestic security aspect of the question is one which I am sure has not escaped the notice of appropriate authorities.

To summarize, my present views are:

(a) that it is extremely unlikely that the U.S. and the U.K. are likely to make their special knowledge available to the Security Council, and that we should agree with them on this point;

(b) that as henceforth all demands on us for uranium and other radio-active substances will be open to question, we should not allow any of these materials to be exported without the prior knowledge that such action is agreeable to the United States and the United Kingdom;

(c) that we should not show undue haste in deciding in our own minds the effect the atomic bomb will have on the organization and tactical handling of our Armed Forces, but on the contrary;

(d) that we should keep in the closest possible touch with the development of thought on this question both in the U.K. and the U.S.;

(e) that our research authorities should continue their present privileged liaison with their U.S. and U.K. opposite numbers;

(f) that as a special, though possibly not separate activity, they should study (if they are not already doing so) the possibility of developing "guided" means of defence against "guided" missiles;

(g) that the possible importance of Newfoundland in atomic bomb warfare should not be lost to view, and

(h) that obviously our Intelligence should keep in the closest possible touch with atomic warfare development in foreign countries.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: Confirming my telephone conversation of a few moments ago, I have been told by the Acting Secretary of State that the President is submitting to Congress at 4:00 p.m. this afternoon a message regarding the control of the atomic bomb. The domestic part of that message provides for the transfer of authority over the bomb and its development from the War Department to a Commission under the President. On the international side, the President's message emphasizes that the secret of the bomb cannot be indefinitely maintained and probably should not, and that the main thing is to ensure that its development should be along constructive rather than destructive lines. For this purpose international discussions are desirable; are in fact essential with the United Kingdom and Canada, countries which share the secret with the United States. The President's message adds that later these discussions should probably be extended to other countries. Acheson hopes that this message which he thinks corresponds with the line which Mr. King and with sic Mr. Truman took in their discussion Sunday last should prove helpful and he was anxious to let us know about it before it was given to Congress.

Pearson telephoned this morning to say that a meeting of the Joint [sic] Policy Committee on the Atomic Bomb would take place in Washington on Saturday morning, October 13th. This is the top level Committee, the appointment of which was agreed at the Quebec Conference of 1943 and on which Mr. Howe sits. Both Acheson and Makins[25] had discussed the position with Pearson, and it appears not improbable that the United States will use this Committee as the channel for consultation on the international questions relating to atomic energy which were mentioned in President Truman's message to Congress of a few days ago.

Pearson went on to say that the organization of the Committee seemed not to reflect adequately the positon of Canada. The Canadian member was regarded as one of three British members and notices of meetings were conveyed to Mr. Howe through the United Kingdom High Commissioner here. He thought that this should now be changed and that Saturday's meeting might be a good occasion for suggesting some change. He had gathered that this meeting will be largely concerned with questions of organization. On the United States side they have to replace Mr. Stimson as one of the members, and they are to consider the establishment of a joint secretariat. He suggested that, if Mr. Howe was unable to go to Washington for the meeting, he might take his place.[26] If the existence of the Committee was to be continued, it would no longer be concerned with questions of production and development but with matters of policy relating to control, mainly in the international field. He knew that there would be no objection on the United States or the United Kingdom side to his acting in place of Mr. Howe at the meeting.

This morning's meeting was presided over by the Secretary of War. The point of chief interest raised was the possibility of using this Committee as the mechanism for the international discussions referred to in the President's statement of last week and Mr. Attlee's statement in the House of Commons.[27] Mr. Patterson[28] said that no decision on this matter had been reached, so far as he knew, by the President or the Secretary of State. This Committee might be used, but, on the other hand, discussions might be conducted through the Foreign Office and diplomatic channels. Lord Halifax said that he had not received the views of the United Kingdom Government, but he spoke in such a way as to give the impression that he favoured using this Policy Committee for the discussions in question, and I learned afterwards from him and Makins that the United Kingdom Government will likely confirm this.

Three questions of specific interest to Canada arose. The suggestion was made by the United Kingdom that we should also appoint a Joint Secretary, with Makins United Kingdom and General Groves U.S.A. There was no opposition to this, and I said that I would enquire of my Government whether they wished to nominate a Joint Secretary. The question also arose regarding the method of appointment of new members of the Committee. The practice has been that new members should be appointed only after approval of both the President and the United Kingdom Prime Minister, but it was agreed today that this was unnecessary and possibly inappropriate and that, on the United Kingdom side, approval of the Prime Minister only was required, and, on the United States side, approval of the President only. I stated that I assumed that the same procedure would apply if any change in Canadian membership were ever required and that approval by the Canadian Prime Minister would be sufficient. This was agreed.

The third point was brought up by the United Kingdom who wondered whether Canada's association with the Committee should be made somewhat more formal. It was pointed out that the Quebec Agreement establishing the Committee was between two Governments, not three, and that Canada's membership was based on a clause in the Agreement inviting her participation. Patterson expressed the view that Canada's membership on the Committee had been most valuable and that, if any formal change was required to regularize her position, this probably could be made. I said I would take up the matter with my Government, that so far as I knew the terms of Canada's membership on the Committee in the past had been satisfactory. If, however, the Committee were to be given new functions beyond those originally contemplated and which were possibly more diplomatic than scientific in character, some action might be required to put Canada on exactly the same basis of membership as the other members; assuming of course that Canada desires to continue its membership in the new circumstances.

which is enclosed herewith. The original which came from Makins is kept here and is numbered Copy No. 1.

It is perhaps out of order for me to comment on this document, but it is certainly an extraordinary one to say the least.

I think I should tell you that I had a call from George Bateman this morning saying that he had heard from Howe that he had had word from you that there would be a policy meeting last Saturday and that Mike[29] would be calling Bateman to take him along to the meeting with him. Howe observed to Bateman that this was the first occasion on which he had not been informed direct of a meeting of the policy committee. Mike decided on Saturday, when he found, I think, that only Halifax was going to the meeting from the British Embassy, not to take Bateman with him. Bateman, therefore, expressed considerable surprise to me on the telephone today after he had heard from Howe. I simply told him that it was a matter which Mike had handled himself and that I had not had anything to do with it. I said, however, that I would write to the Department about it. Bateman observed that he supposed that the atomic bomb matters were now going into the hands of the diplomats, but that he thought that the diplomats should have somebody along who knew something about atomic bombs. I said that I supposed that if they were going into the hands of the diplomats it was because the questions to be decided at this particular meeting were probably questions concerning the policy in respect of atomic power rather than any technical matters having to do with atomic power. I did not, of course, tell Bateman that that was exactly what this meeting did consider and that Mike told me on his return from the meeting that he was very glad that he had not taken Bateman because he would have been quite out of place.

Bateman, however, will pursue enquiries as to how the meeting was organized and why Howe did not get notification direct and there is no way that I can stop this. You may, therefore, get some repercussions of it in Ottawa.

Yours sincerely,

THOMAS A. STONE

MOST SECRET [Washington, c. October 15, 1945]

DRAFT ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT GOVERNING COLLABORATION BETWEEN THE AUTHORITIES OF THE U.S.A. AND THE U.K. IN THE MATTER OF TUBE ALLOYS

1. WHEREAS it is vital to our common safety in the present War to bring the Tube Alloys project to fruition at the earliest moment; and whereas this may be more speedily achieved if all available British and American brains and resources are pooled; and whereas owing to war conditions it would be an improvident use of war resources to duplicate plants on a large scale on both sides of the Atlantic and therefore a far greater expense has fallen upon the United States;

It is agreed between us

FIRST, that we will never use this agency against each other.

SECONDLY, that we will not use it against third parties without each other's consent.

THIRDLY, that we will not either of us communicate any information about Tube Alloys to third parties except by mutual consent.

FOURTHLY, that in view of the heavy burden of production falling upon the United States as the result of a wise division of war effort, the British Government recognize that any post-war advantages of an industrial or commercial character shall be dealt with as between the United States and Great Britain on terms to be specified by the President of the United States to the Prime Minister of Great Britian. The Prime Minister expressly disclaims any interest in these industrial and commercial aspects beyond what may be considered by the President of the United States to be fair and just and in harmony with the economic welfare of the world.

And FIFTHLY, that the following arrangements shall be made to ensure full and effective collaboration between the two countries in bringing the project to fruition:

(a) There shall be set up in Washington a Combined Policy Committee composed of:

For the U.S.A.	For the U.K.	For Canada
Secretary of War	Field Marshal Sir John Dill	The Hon. C. D. Howe
Dr. V. Bush	Col. The Rt. Hon. J.J. Llewellin
Dr. J. B. Conant

The functions of this Committee, subject to the control of the respective Governments will be:

(1) To agree from time to time upon the programme of work to be carried out in the two countries.

(2) To keep all sections of the project under constant review.

(3) To allocate materials, apparatus and plant, in limited supply, in accordance with the requirements of the programme agreed by the Committee.

(4) To settle any questions which may arise on the interpretation or application of this Agreement.

(b) There shall be complete interchange of information and ideas on all sections of the project between members of the Policy Committee and their immediate technical advisers.

(c) In the field of scientific research and development there shall be full and effective interchange of information and ideas between those in the two countries engaged in the same sections of the field.

(d) In the field of design, construction and operation of large-scale plants, interchange of information and ideas shall be regulated by such ad hoc arrangements as may, in each section of the field, appear to be necessary or desirable if the project is to be brought to fruition at the earliest moment. Such ad hoc arrangements shall be subject to the approval of the Policy Committee.

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] October 16,1945

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN DEVELOPMENT AND CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY

At the meeting of the Special Committee of the Cabinet on Defence Questions, held on October 16th, the Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that policy affecting atomic energy would soon require serious decisions in the international and probably domestic fields.

According to information received from our Ambassador in Washington, the Combined Policy Committee was being reogranized and steps were being taken by the United States to establish, by Act of Congress, a Commission for the development and control of atomic energy. It was also understood that an Advisory Committee had been appointed in the United Kingdom under Sir John Anderson. The status of Canada's membership on the Policy Committee and the appointment of a Canadian joint secretary were immediate questions to be considered.

Since Canada would soon be participating in international discussions, preliminary steps which might be taken included:

(a) preparation of a concise non-technical statement of the facts and problems involved;

(b) establishment of a small official committee for the formulation of recommendations; and,

(c) consideration of international machinery such as our position on Combined Policy Committee and revision of its terms of reference.

The Committee, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that at the present stage, these questions were primarily for consultation between the Minister of Munitions and Supply and Reconstruction and External Affairs; and

(b) that the Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorized to consult the President of the National Research Council and other officials concerning all questions relating to the development and control of atomic energy, with particular reference to forthcoming international discussions.

Dear Mr. Wrong,

Thanks for your letter of October 15th† enclosing copy of message WA-5310 of October 13th from Mr. Pearson regarding the Combined Policy Committee on atomic energy.

Should it be decided to use the Joint [sic] Policy Committee for international discussions, it is quite possible that the Prime Minister will wish to take over Canadian representation on the Committee, which would be quite satisfactory to me. Joint policy on technical matters having to do with production is largely completed. An alternative might be to ask for full representation on the Committee and add a representative of External Affairs as a Canadian member of the Committee.

I suggest that George Bateman, who is resident in Washington, would be logical appointment as Secretary. He is a member with general knowledge of the uranium trust and is the only man in Washington familiar with the work of the Policy Committee. He is also well known to Makins.

It is true that the position of Canada on the Committee is somewhat unsatisfactory in that the one Canadian member and the two U.K. members have been working under the U.K. Secretary; whereas the three U.S. members have their own Secretary. Perhaps a logical step would be to have three members from each of the three countries, in which event Dean Mackenzie might be a logical third member.

I regard it as very important that Canada retain membership on this Committee in order to obtain a full exchange of technical information. I think the U.K. will feel that Canada must retain membership on the Committee if for no other reason than that all U.K. scientific work connected with atomic energy is being carried out in Canada at present.

In my opinion, it would be well to await the return of the Prime Minister to Canada before taking further action in this matter.

Yours sincerely, bomb and related questions.† The letter was handed to me personally by Mr. Norman Robertson in whose care it had been placed. Mr. Robertson advised you office of my having received the letter personally from him.

I thought at the moment that this acknowledgment was perhaps all that was necessary. I have since, however, felt that for the purpose of record, I should send this further personal acknowledgement to yourself.

With your letter was enclosed a copy of the communication of the 16th of October from yourself to the President[32] in which you mention having discussed the matter of the atomic bomb and related questions with myself and add that you think it important that you and the President and myself should have a discussion as soon as possible, and that you are prepared to go over as soon as convenient.

At the time Mr. Robertson handed me your letter he told me he had just learned that you had received a reply to it from the President, giving alternative dates as to the time at which it would be convenient for the President to see you in Washington. Mr. Robertson did not know whether or not any reference had been made in the President's letter to my being in Washington at the same time.

In my interview with the President on Sunday, September the 30th, the day before I sailed from New York for London, the President said to me that he and you and I might talk over matters together when you came to Washington and reach agreement on the course of action to be taken. Mr. Truman also asked me if I would come and see him again on my return from London.

Now that the date has been fixed for the time of your visit to Washington, I am wondering whether it would not be well to have the President informed by you, as well as by myself, of my intention to return via the Queen Mary which sails on November the 4th and to go on from New York direct to Washington so as to be there at the time of your own arrival by 'plane.

In this all important matter, I feel it is most important that you should be fully aware of any and every conversation between the President and myself and my movements in relation thereto; also that the President should be equally aware of my conversations with yourself and my movements in relation thereto.

TELEGRAM 3101 London, October 24, 1945

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Please transmit following to Canadian Ambassador to the United States, Washington, Begins: October 24th, 1945. Top Secret and Private. Please transmit following for President Truman from Prime Minister of Canada, Begins:

Dear Mr. President,

1. Mr. Attlee has informed me that in reply to a communication from him to you of the 16th instant on the atomic bomb and related questions, he had received a reply to the effect that you would be much pleased to meet him and myself on November 11th.

2. I have since been informed that the date fixed for this meeting has been changed for the following day, Monday, November 12th.

3. Recalling our conversation on Sunday, September 30th, on the eve of my departure for England, and your wish expressed at the time that you would like to have a talk with me after my return from London, I am sending this message to let you know that I have booked passage on the Queen Mary sailing from Southampton, Sunday, November 4th, expected to arrive at New York on the evening of Friday, November 9th. In view of the meeting arranged with yourself and Mr. Attlee for Monday the 12th, I shall not return to Canada until after visiting Washington but will remain over in New York or Washington pending the time of Mr. Attlee's arrival which, I understand, will be by plane.

4. I have asked Mr. Pearson, our Ambassador, to let me know of the time and place of meeting. I shall keep in touch with Mr. Pearson so that any word which may come from the White House to the Canadian Embassy for me will reach me immediately. Signed W. L. Mackenzie King. Ends. Message ends.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET AND PERSONNAL [Ottawa,] October 29, 1945

With reference to my telegram No. 2461 of October 20th,† and my memorandum of October 22nd† concerning the forthcoming discussions on the control of atomic energy, I have received Dean Mackenzie's reply to the questionnaire which Heeney and I prepared for him, and I am enclosing two copies of this as you may wish to give one to the Prime Minister. The questions are Heeney's and mine, and the answers are reproduced exactly as I have them from Mackenzie.

We have now, of course, heard that the arrangements have been completed for the top level meeting on November 12th, and we have seen the text of the letters exchanged between Mr. Attlee and President Truman. The enclosed memorandum only bears indirectly on the subject of discussion as set forth by Mr. Attlee in his long letter to President Truman of September 25th.† If I feel that we can produce anything useful in the way of a commentary on this letter, I shall try and get it into your hands in time for the meeting.

I have had some general talk on the high questions of international policy, which the invention of the atomic bomb has raised, with both Mackenzie and Mr. Howe. They both agree that it is folly to talk about a defence against an attack with atomic bombs, as the only possible method of defence is to intercept the airplane or rocket or other projectile before it reaches its target, and the possibility of doing this in a sudden attack would be remote. Mackenzie has said to me that, the more he thinks about it, the more profoundly impressed he is with the revolutionary results of the discovery in the political field. But is it possible to conceive a voluntary renunciation of state sovereignty by at least all the major industrial powers of the world, which would provide for the creation of an international government capable of exercising continuous and effective control over all release of atomic energy on more than a laboratory scale? This is the central question.

I have not yet told Pearson of the plans for the November meeting as he has been at Quebec steadily since the 15th of October, having been coerced into accepting the Chairmanship of the F.A.O. Conference. He may be here in a day or two on his way back to Washington, and I shall then give him the information. In any case, Stone knows of the meeting (although not of the exchange of correspondence between the President and Mr. Attlee which preceded it), as Mr. King's message was passed to the President through him.

Reply by Acting President, National Research Council, to Questionnaire prepared by Clerk of Privy Council and Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] October 29, 1945

CANADA'S POSITION IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF ATOMIC ENERGY

1. What is the absolute and relative importance of Canada's part in the development related to the employment of the atomic bomb, specifically:

(a) as a source of raw materials;

(b) as a contributor to research, in terms of personnel and results;

(c) with respect to development, including actual manufacturing operations;

(d) measured in terms of finance, i.e., expenditures upon personnel, materials, etc.

Answer

(a) The Great Bear Lake development is a sizeable source of material and second only to the properties of Union Minière in Belgian Congo, which of course are more extensive and the ore of a higher quality. The American project, on the other hand, was not entirely dependent on Canadian ore as they had stockpiled a great deal of Belgian Congo material, and while they valued our present and potential supplies greatly on account of obvious advantages I think they might have carried out their immediate plans without our material.

(b) Our contribution to research was tied up with that of the United Kingdom as our scientific group in the Montreal laboratory consisted of about fifty per cent United Kingdom and fifty per cent Canadian personnel. On the research side and from the standpoint of results obtained our contribution, I think, was much greater than the ratio of moneys spent.

(c) Canada's development work was not a major factor in the production of the atomic bombs dropped on Japan, but may have a very great effect on future plans. The development work in Canada using heavy water was not duplicated anywhere else and was one of the several alternative methods tried.

Also our Chalk River plant will have the highest density of neutron emissions of any plant. It should also be remembered that the Canadian development is the only one in the British Empire and that the acceptance of the British scientific personnel in the American plants was largely made possible by the existence of our plant in Canada.

(d) The Americans estimate they have spent over two billions of dollars. The Canadian effort will probably amount to twenty millions by the end of the fiscal year. From the standpoint of research personnel, while we have no firm United States figures I doubt if the same ratio applies to personnel engaged as to dollars spent. I have no exact figures of the United Kingdom expenditures, but while they have talked in rather sizeable amounts of projected expenditures I doubt very much if to date they have spent more than a fraction of what we have.

2. What estimate can be made of Canada's potential importance in the future development of atomic energy for purposes of war and peace, specifically:

(a) as a source of raw materials presently employed or likely to be employed at later stages;

(b) as a possessor of relevant scientific technique and industrial "know how";

(c) as owner and operator of plants and processes.

Answer

(a) I think Canada's present situation as a source of raw material is much stronger than the total amount of ore in sight, as our geographical position as far as the United States is concerned is of very great importance. Uranium, of course, has been found widely in small quantities in many countries of the world but as I have said the Canadian source is the second largest of the developed properties and it is quite possible that still larger ore bodies may be disclosed in the active exploration which is now being carred out. While I have no official information it has come to my ears that considerable ore bodies have been discovered in South Africa, and if this is true it is significant. However, it seems to me that at the present moment Canada's raw material represents a significant asset.

(b) Canada has no advantage in knowledge of relevant scientific technical and industrial "know how" over the United States or Great Britain but definitely has over the rest of the countries of the world. Our scientific knowledge is greater than our present industrial "know how" but within the next year we will be very definitely in possession of valuable general "know how" and particular "know how" in connection with the type of plant we are operating. In addition a great deal of fundamental speculation and planning has been done in connection with possible future industrial applications, but I think that both in the United Kingdom and Canada we are all in the idea stage in this field and it is difficult to know whose ideas are best.

(c) As the owner and operator of the only plant in the British Empire I think we have, at the moment, a rather strong position as far as everyone else excepting the United States is concerned. As mentioned above we have some advantage in being the operators of the only plant using heavy water.

3. To what extent are the U.K. and the U.S. dependent upon Canadian participation in the future development and employment of atomic energy, i.e., to what extent has Canada a peculiar stake in a joint enterprise? What can we give or withhold to those associated with us, whether it be the U.K. and the U.S. only or an alliance or an international organization?

Answer

As far as the United States is concerned they have always felt, I think, that they were quite able to carry on alone, and as a matter of fact in the early days they put every conceivable difficulty in the way of cooperative efforts outside the United States, largely I think owing to an honest fear of security leakages. While I think the United States welcomes the Canadian contacts I also think they feel, as they do in the matter of military defence, that they are quite competent to look after themselves. As far as the United Kingdom is concerned it is my conviction that we hold very strong cards at the moment as they have no atomic energy plant whatsoever in England, and it will take them some time to build even an experimental pile. So, for the moment and for the next year or so they will be dependent entirely on our development in Canada for experience in piles and it will be from our plant that they must obtain any of the by products which look so promising in the field of medical research. At the present moment there is much discussion in England as to future plans. One school apparently would like to build large scale plants there and they are talking of capital expenditures of the order of eighty million pounds. The other school of thought, which in my opinion is by far the better formed, feels that the wiser plan would be to establish a large Commonwealth plant in Canada, which could supply the material for the other parts of the Empire, and to the research laboratories of which teams for the various Dominions and Britain could come for research work. Personally I think this latter is by far the wiser scheme unless there are some higher policy considerations unknown to me.

4. What is the present position with respect to the Chalk River plant and the research unit in Montreal and any other related Canadian undertakings? What personnel and money (capital and operating expense) have we committed to these projects? How does this compare with the U.K. and the U.S. qualitatively; quantitatively?

Answer

The scientific research laboratory in Montreal is presently costing about $750,000 per year. It is impossible to make an accurate estimate of future budgets until the question of co-operation with the United Kingdom is determined, but it is felt that a research laboratory budget of about $500,000 per year will be a minimum. Regarding the Chalk River project the capital costs on completion will be in the neighbourhood of twenty million, and again it is very difficult to estimate yearly operating expenses for a type of industrial plant that has no parallel in history. Informed guesses run from two million to one million dollars per year. As far as the United Kingdom is concerned outside of the scientists who are being maintained in our Canadian laboratories and in the stations in the United States there is little money being spent, but as mentioned above from informal discussions going on in England I have learned that capital expenditures of the order of eighty million pounds are being contemplated. As far as the United States is concerned all we know is that the overall cost up to 1945 was in the neighbourhood of two billion dollars but it is certain that operation costs are of an altogether different order of magnitude from those undertaken by Canada.

5. What briefly are the government controls in Canada over

(a) deposits of radio-active raw materials;

(b) production of and refining of radio-active ores;

(c) atomic research and development? Should a comprehensive method of control on a long-term basis be established?

Answer

(a) In the Northwest Territories all rights in connection with future mines of uranium have been reserved to the Government, and similar agreements have been reached with several of the provinces.

(b) As far as I am aware there are no Government controls on refining of radium ores but actually only Eldorado is conducting such an operation.

(c) There are no Government controls in Canada in connection with atomic research and development but in my opinion there certainly should be. Such controls should be established on a long-term basis but any legislation should be very carefully framed so that ordinary fundamental scientific work on nuclear physics is not brought under Government control, but only the design, development, construction and operation of atomic energy plants and the distribution of radioactive fission products.

6. What, in outline, are the agencies through which the development of the atomic bomb has been directed on the tripartite international basis? In your view, is it desirable to continue these tripartite agencies, perhaps in accordance with a new agreement?

Answer

The Combined Policy Committee, established out of an agreement reached by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill at Quebec, was the control body, but its authority and responsibilities were limited. My understanding is that the body was really not set up on a tripartite basis but was a United Kingdom-United States object with three representatives from the United States (Stimson, Bush and Conant) and three from the British end (Dill, Campbell and Howe). I do not know whether Mr. Howe was nominated by Mr. Churchill or was nominated by our Prime Minister.

In the United States authority and responsibility for the project passed through a series of steps until it reached the Army. At first when the work was on a very limited scale control was in the hands of a scientific committee. Later as interest increased responsibility passed to O.S.R.D.[33] and then when it became evident there was a reasonable chance of dropping a bomb in this war, and when an extraordinarily large sum of money was involved, the project was put under the administrative control of a specially organized unit called Manhattan District, over which General Groves of the United States Army presided.

In England there were various committees working from 1939 on and it was in 1942 that an agreement was made between the British and Canadian Governments to enter a joint project for the establishment of a joint laboratory under the National Research Council administration in Montreal. The Combined Policy Committee was set up in 1943 to have general supervision over the cooperative aspects that were being worked out. For instance, our decision to build a plant at Chalk River was taken after a Joint Policy Committee was formed and that body approved of the programme as a suitable plant to fit into the American programme. The Joint Policy Committee also laid down the general regulations as to how far information could be shared, and took responsibility for other general aspects in connection with world surveys of sources of uranium. The Combined Policy Committee, however, had no executive or administrative control over any of the work in the United States, Canada, or the United Kingdom. All of the information in the United States was certainly not shared with Canada and the United Kingdom. For instance we were not given any details of design but had to work out for ourselves all plans and detailed design of the Chalk River plant. In the case of individual specialists, where disclosures would be of benefit to the scheme as a whole interchange of information took place on a strictly limited scale.

My view is that the whole matter of tripartite agreements should be examined and a new agreement worked out in which Canada's place would be more definitely stated, and in which the actual authority of the Combined Policy Committee would be more clearly defined.

7. Is it likely that denial

(a) of raw materials now controlled by the U.K., U.S., and Canada

(b) of the "secret" of the manufacture of plutonium; or

(c) of information on the construction of the bomb itself would long prevent its production in other countries?

Answer

(a) The question of where and how much raw materials there are in the world, or even what the raw materials of the future will prove to be is not certain but I do not think that the control of the raw materials in Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States would prevent, for any great length of time, developments in other countries.

(b) I think the same answer can be given for both (b) and (c) as everyone is agreed that it is a matter of time. The more theoretical scientists are apt to put [33]Bureau de la recherche et du développement scientifique.

Office of Scientific Research and Development.

a lower limit of three to five years on it. The more experienced engineer industrialists, who in my opinion know more of the actual difficulties to be overcome, place a minimum of five with a probable ten years as the time that it would take countries like Russia, Germany or Japan to do it if they were working under prewar conditions. It is my opinion that even with the knowledge which the United Kingdom scientific and technical staff have, which is very extensive indeed, they could probably not build a large plant in England and get it into production on a sufficient size to really produce material with which to make bombs in useable quantities, under five to seven years.

8. Is it likely that the limits of destructiveness of the atomic bomb can be greatly increased?

Answer

It is certain that the destructiveness of the atomic bomb can be increased but figures of the magnitude of a thousand times are not talked about by those who know most about it. There are two ways in which the increase can take place, first, by increasing the efficiency of the existing materials in the bomb which might double the effectiveness. In connection with the second possibility there is a large question mark, i.e., may fission be possible with other materials? In that field of speculation there is no consensus of opinion. On the other hand there is always available the simple expedient of increased destructiveness by dropping more and more bombs at the same time, i.e. "sticks of bombs."

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire, le ministère des Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by First Secretary, Department of External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] November 6, 1945

MEMORANDUM ON MR. ATTLEE'S LETTER OF SEPTEMBER 25TH TO PRESIDENT TRUMAN† REGARDING THE FORTHCOMING EXCHANGE OF VIEWS ON THE ATOMIC BOMB

Introductory

It is in the interest of Canada and indeed of all the nations that the problems arising out of the development of atomic energy should be dealt with on a boldly imaginative plane and that the question should not be considered merely in terms of accustomed political and strategic conceptions which may prove inadequate to the changed world situation brought about by this discovery.

Canada's particular interest arises, of course, out of our position as a supplier of uranium, our contribution to scientific research in this field, and our geographical situation. The course of the forthcoming discussions in Washington may affect our political relations with the United States and the Soviet Union as well as our position within the British Commonwealth. So far as the United States is concerned the fact that we control an important source of the essential raw material, combined with our geographical position, must give Canada a new importance from the standpoint of United States interests. While it has always been true that the United States could not look with indifference on any major development of Canadian foreign policy this will be much more the case in the future.

Canada's relations with the rest of the Commonwealth may be greatly affected by the development of atomic energy. At the present time and at any rate for the next year or so the United Kingdom will be entirely dependent for experience in research on the Canadian plant. There is no atomic energy plant in the United Kingdom, and it will take time to build even an experimental plant. It is known that discussion is going on in the United Kingdom as to whether large scale plants should be constructed there, or whether it would be preferable to establish a Commonwealth plant in Canada which could supply material to other parts of the Commonwealth and become a centre for research. If the latter plan were adopted, it might have important long term implications. It would mean that the heart of the war-making power of the British Commonwealth was located in Canada.

The unique position of Canada in relation both to the United States and the United Kingdom will certainly not fail to attract the attention of the Soviet Union and may have important, though unforeseeable, effects on the relations with that country.

Our participation in the forthcoming talks in Washington raises the question of how much effective influence Canada may have on the decisions to be taken at that meeting. From the point of view of exercising any important influence, we are, of course, in a much stronger position in relation to the United Kingdom than to the United States. The United States is not dependent on Canada for the continued production of atomic weapons or for experimentation in this field. They could perfectly well get on without us. They are, however, bound to be closely concerned with any policies which we may adopt, either independently or in association with the rest of the Commonwealth. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, at least, may be expected to give considerable attention to Canadian views on this subject.

Our prinicipal interest in the outcome of the Washington discussions is the avoidance of a situation in which the nations of the world will be conducting a desperate race in the production of new forms of atomic destruction, and, in particular, that the world should not split up into two great blocs of power, one headed by the United States and the other by the Soviet Union, each devoting their energies to keeping pace with the destructive powers accumulated by the other. Such a development would offer particular danger for Canada since, should a final atomic struggle break out between these two power blocs, Canada on account of her geographical situation, her control of a principal source of raw material, and the location in this country of an important plant, might become a target for attack.

MR. ATTLEE'S LETTER OF SEPTEMBER 25TH, 1945, TO PRESIDENT TRUMAN

The following are the main points of importance in Mr. Attlee's communication:

1. There is a full realization of the revolutionary character of the new discovery. It is obvious that the United Kingdom Government are aware of the necessity for adjusting their thinking to new concepts of policy and strategy. In Mr. Attlee's words, "The emergence of this new weapon has meant, taking account of its potentialities, not a quantitative but a qualitative change in the nature of warfare."

2. Mr. Attlee considers that no bounds can be set to the destructive potentialities of the new weapon and he has "so far heard no suggestion of any possible means of defence."

3. He considers that, "any other country possessing the necessary scientific and industrial resources could also produce atomic bombs within a few years if it decided now to make the effort," and that, therefore, "it would thus appear that the lead which has been gained as a result of the past effort put forth in the United States may only be temporary and that we may not have much time in which to decide what use is to be made of that lead."

4. The main conclusion which the British Prime Minister draws from his analysis of the situation is that, "we have, it seems to me, if we are to rid ourselves of this menace, to make very far reaching changes in the relationship between states."

5. Mr. Attlee gives a clear indication that he is thinking along the lines of control by a revised and strengthened United Nations Organization for he says, "now it seems to us that the building, the framework of which was erected at San Francisco, must be carried much further if it is to be an effective shelter for humanity."

The great importance of Mr. Attlee's letter to President Truman lies in the emphasis which he places on the necessity for a radical transformation of the basis of international relationships in the light of this new discovery.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S VIEWS

We have no parallel knowledge of what is in President Truman's mind. His statements on the subject are contained in his message to Congress of October 3rd on atomic energy, and in his Navy Day address of October 28th.[34]

President Truman's analysis of the dangers inherent in the new discovery and of the urgent necessity of securing international collaboration in dealing with it are similar to Mr. Attlee's. He also seems to contemplate that sooner or later the United Nations Organization will be the appropriate body to work out plans for dealing with this world problem. There is no indication, however, in his message to Congress of any realization of the effects of this development on the relations between states, nor is there any reference to international control of research and production. The President's speech rather looks to the renunciation of the use of the atomic bomb and to collaboration between nations in the exchange of scientific information. It is impossible to know whether he is merely proceeding with politic discretion in his public pronouncements and whether he is, in fact, more prepared to face the implications of this discovery than his public statements would indicate.

Speculation as to the proposals which the United States Government may put forward at the Washington conversations must, therefore, remain pure speculation. It may, however, be worth while to consider certain proposals which might be advanced.

AN INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION FOR THE RENUNCIATION OF THE USE AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE ATOMIC BOMB

Something of this sort is foreshadowed in President Truman's message to Congress. An international convention for the renunciation of this weapon would, in all probability, in the present state of world opinion encounter a certain amount of scepticism. The suggestion may seem, at first sight, to have a parallel in the Geneva Protocol prohibiting the use of poisonous gas, but the analogy is not a sound one. It seems very probable that the principal motive which dissuaded belligerents in the last war from the use of this weapon was that each side knew that the other possessed great stocks of poisonous gas and would be in a position to retaliate, but if a nation launched a determined atomic bomb attack upon another it would be with the object of so obliterating the nerve centres of its enemy's life that no question of reprisal would arise, so that this deterrent would not operate. Moreover, wars are not won by the sole use of poisonous gas. It is merely an auxiliary weapon, whereas it is clearly contemplated, at any rate by the British Prime Minister, that future wars may be won by the sole use of the atomic bomb, so that to outlaw the use of atomic bombs would, in fact, be to outlaw war itself. The true parallel with an international convention for the renunciation of the use of the atomic bomb would be the Kellogg-Briand Pact to renounce war.

An international convention of this kind, unless accompanied by adequate measures of international inspection and control, would not lull the suspicions of those who do not yet possess this weapon, but it might have the unfortunate effect of lulling American public opinion into the belief that the question was settled.

THE EXCHANGE OF SCIENTIFIC INFORMATION

It is possible that a proposal for the renunciation of atomic weapons might be accompanied by arrangements for the exchange of scientific information regarding atomic energy. If all the nations had agreed to renounce the use and development of the atomic bomb, there would be no question of their exchanging information with regard to the development of atomic weapons. The exchange of information would, therefore, presumably be in the general field of research in atomic energy. This would be highly desirable in itself, but unless accompanied by arrangements for international inspection it might become a mere facade behind which nations, despite their pledged word, could be busily experimenting with the more lethal aspects of atomic energy.

INTERNATIONAL CONTROL

Arrangements of the kind suggested above could be concluded without any interference with the accepted ideas of national sovereignty and without the United States being obliged to share their knowledge of the industrial techniques necessary for the manufacture of the bomb. Unfortunately such arrangements do not go to the heart of the problem. Nor will the United Nations Organization have the powers necessary to deal with the situation. The Security Council, it is true, has general responsibility for the maintenance of world peace and security and the Members have agreed to accept and carry out its decisions "in accordance with the present Charter," but the present Charter does not give the Security Council authority for such far reaching invasions of the domestic jurisdiction of member states as would be implied in any effective international control of experiment and production in this field. Moreover, the United Nations Organization does not embrace all states, and control would have to be world wide.

The Military Staff Committee of the United Nations might, however, be charged with the formulation of plans for the control of atomic research by the United Nations Organization. They should be assisted in their task by expert scientific advisors and they would report to the Security Council. It would then be the duty of the Security Council if they accepted the report of the Military Staff Committee to bring it before the United Nations Assembly with recommendations for the inauguration of those changes in the United Nations Charter which would be necessary for setting up effective control of atomic energy.

It may be that such controls could only be achieved through the establishment of:

a. A system of international inspection of national laboratories and production plants for the purpose of ensuring that no development of atomic power for purely national purposes takes place.

b. The establishment of an international centre for research and perhaps for production also in relation to atomic power created at international expense and staffed by international scientists and experts.

It is enough to state such objectives to appreciate the formidable obstacles which lie in the path of their realization. The most immediate obstacle lies in the fact that the United States will almost certainly be unwilling in the interim period before such a system of control could be set up to share with the Soviet Union the information as to the "know how" of the manufacture of the atomic bomb. If this is to be the attitude of the United States Government we must be prepared for a period of accumulating mutual suspicions which will not be laid to rest by any signatures affixed to a pact of renunciation of the atomic bomb. It remains to be seen whether in this atmosphere of suspicion it will be possible to achieve any progress towards the solution of the problems raised by the discovery of atomic energy, but at least it is to be hoped that the facts of the situation will be squarely faced at the forthcoming Washington meeting. Even if the United States is only prepared to move slowly it should move in the right direction — that of eventual international control — and it is to be hoped that the discussion will not be obscured by proposals which sidestep the central issue.

Mémorandum du deuxième secrétaire, l'ambassade aux États-Unis
Memorandum by Second Secretary, Embassy in United States

[Washington,] November 8, 1945

THE A-BOMB AND THE UNO

Proposals to place the Atomic Bomb under the control of the United Nations Organization seem to boil down to the following suggestions:

(I) Give the secret of the A-Bomb to the Security Council

(II) Place the use of the A-Bomb at the disposal of the Security Council

(III) Give to the Security Council the power to control the production of the A-Bomb

(IV) A combination of I-III; II-III, I,II,III, etc.

These proposals may be examined with a view to determining their practicability:

(I) Give the secret of the A-Bomb to the Security Council or the Military Staff Committee

A preliminary question might be raised: Is the "secret" of the A-Bomb of such a nature that it could be turned over to a group of political or military representatives of UNO? This would be the case if the secret consisted of a formula, a set of blueprints, or written comments. But the secret of the Bomb is really a technology that can only be learned by a large number of scientists and technicians making a prolonged stay in the laboratories and the plants which are now processing the Bomb.

Supposing, however, that it could be done, the proposal means in effect that the U.S. would reveal the manufacturing "know-how" of a particularly effective weapon to Russia, China, France, plus six smaller nations, and in time to most of the nations of the world. The hope is that these nations, having obtained the "secret" as members of a peace Organization, would not use the knowledge imparted to them: i.e., manufacture the A-Bomb. In this hypothesis, the U.S. should logically be asked to discontinue the manufacture of atomic weapons.

It is more than doubtful that the U.S. would agree to discontinue the manufacture of the A-Bomb and that Russia and France, once in possession of the A-Bomb "secret" would agree not to manufacture it. Even if they agreed not to, how could we be sure that they were not secretly working on the A-Bomb? In other words, what guarantee is there that once the A-Bomb "secret" is disclosed, the world will not enter a race of armament unprecedented in history?

A word may be added about the danger of revealing the secret of the A-Bomb to small nations. It is true that in the present state of development of the Bomb it is difficult for a small nation to manufacture it, but in a few years the situation may be entirely changed. If, for instance, some Latin American Government could manufacture such a weapon, it may be feared that it would be used for internal wars as well as for external wars.

(II) Place the use of the A-Bomb at the disposal of the Security Council

Some argue that although the "secret" of the A-Bomb should not be shared, its use might be placed at the disposal of the Security Council, acting in accordance with the provisions of the Charter. Thus, the United States, under Article 43 of the Charter, would agree to make available to the Security Council A-Bombs which would be used to remove any threat to the Peace.

Any of the Permanent Members of the Council could of course veto the use of the Atomic Bomb against itself, and therefore the A-Bomb would be used only in armed intervention involving conflicts between small nations. If this is the case, why should it be necessary to use A-Bombs to settle disputes which could just as effectively be settled with the weapons that are currently used? Is it proper, furthermore, that the World Peace Organization use an arm which spreads destruction on so vast a scale and strikes civilians as well as military forces?

(III) Give the Security Council the power to regulate the production of the A-Bomb

This presumably could be achieved by establishing a special commission under the Security Council to supervise the inspection of plants. The Security Council could also assume responsiblity in regard to the control of world uranium ores.

It may perhaps be pointed out that international control of the production of a weapon has no precedence in international administration and that the UNO would be breaking new ground if such a proposal were adopted.

The main difficulty about international supervision of the production of the A-Bomb is: how can it be successfully carried out without the full cooperation of the Government concerned? It may be recalled, for instance, that during the war, the Soviet Government was very reluctant to make scientific information available to her Allies. It has even been more difficult for Allied scientists and technicians to visit Soviet laboratories and manufacturing plants.

Scientists are skeptical about any form of control based on the production of the raw materials used in the fabrication of the A-Bomb; they point out that it is entirely in the realm of possibilities that very soon atomic energy will be obtained from more abundant material than uranium, such as clay or water.

(IV) Various Combinations of (I), (II), (III), above

In practice, proponents of UNO control over the A-Bomb will probably suggest that control be established over the secret and the production of the A-Bomb; over its use and production; over its secret, use and production, etc. Such combinations simply, in my opinion, add up the difficulties outlined above.

It would seem therefore that international control of the A-Bomb by the UNO is impracticable. If it is considered important that the A-Bomb should be internationally controlled, the only alternative left, I think, is to outlaw the use, of the Bomb by an agreement between the Five Great Powers and Canada to which other nations would accede in due course. The agreement might provide also for the re-establishment of exchange of information in the field of nuclear physics (as distinct from A-Bomb technology). The engineering "know-how" of the A-Bomb should not, however, be given to any nation not having it at present.

ATOMIC ENERGY;
UNITED KINGDOM-UNITED STATES-CANADA CONVERSATIONS

3. THE PRIME MINISTER reported at some length upon discussions in Washington with the U.K. Prime Minister and the President of the United States, submitting for approval a brief agreement already signed by Mr. Attlee and Mr. Truman.

The agreement expressed the desire for full and effective co-operation in the field of atomic energy between the United States, United Kingdom and Canada, agreed that the Combined Policy Committee and the Combined Development Trust be continued in suitable form, and requested the former to consider and recommend appropriate arrangements for this purpose.

(Agreement signed in Washington by the President and the U.K. Prime Minister, Nov. 16, 1945).

4. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY reviewed the course of Canadian participation in the combined U.K.-U.S.-Canada development of atomic energy during the war.

The matter had first come to the attention of the Canadian government as one of the utmost secrecy in 1942. In August of 1943, Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt had signed, at Quebec, draft articles of agreement governing collaboration between the United Kingdom and the United States under which the Combined Policy Committee was established. Subsequently, he (Mr. Howe) had been added to the Committee and Canada had played an active role in research and development. In 1944, the Cabinet War Committee had authorized expenditure of up to $4,750,000 for the construction and operation of a plant in Canada.[36] In November of that year, the War Committee had approved procedure to be followed for assignments of patents in accordance with the decisions of the Combined Policy Committee. In December, Orders in Council† were passed appropriating funds for the secret plant and authorizing arrangements for the assignments of patents.

Canada was not concerned directly with the Combined Development Trust.

It was felt that Canada should continue work in the field of atomic energy along the lines which had been initiated during wartime.

5. THE PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL described the extent and nature of Canadian participation in research and development work during the war. A combined research unit had been in operation in Montreal consisting of Canadian, U.K. and U.S. scientists and a plant had been constructed and was being operated at Chalk River in accordance with agreements with the other partner governments. Canada had also been an important source of raw materials to the United States.

Total Canadian expenditure to date had been of the order of $15,000,000 on both projects. In peacetime, the cost of an adequate programme of research and development would be approximately $2,500,000 annually. In the opinion of those concerned, Canada should continue these operations in close collaboration with the United Kingdom and the United States.

6. THE CABINET, after discussion, approved the agreement between the United Kingdom, United States and Canada as submitted by the Prime Minister, and agreed that it should be signed by Mr. King, noted the reports of Mr. Howe and Dean MacKenzie, and agreed that arrangements for the development and control of atomic energy within Canada were problems for further consideration.

In conversation this morning, Mr. Neville Butler[37] enquired what the views of the Canadian Government were as to the publication or otherwise of the tripartite agreement on cooperation in the development of atomic energy, which, I understand, you signed after discussion in Council on Saturday.[38] His first thought was that the agreement might be published in the ordinary course, with the concurrence of the signatory countries, but his second, and I think sounder thought,[39] was that, in view of the reference in the agreement to the "Combined Development Trust," to which no public reference has hitherto been made, that consideration of the question of publication might, with advantage, be deferred until the governments came to consider closely the terms of reference and composition of the Atomic Energy Commission to be set up under the United Nations. In the meantime, he thought it would be quite appropriate for Mr. Attlee, in the speech he is to make in London, to refer to the existence of understanding for continuing cooperation between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada in the development of atomic energy.[40]

DESPATCH 2714 [Washington,] November 21, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to submit the following brief report on the Prime Minister's recent visit to Washington.

2. The genesis of the recent conversations in Washington between President Truman, Prime Minister Attlee and the Canadian Prime Minister concerning the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes, is to be found in the following words from Mr. Truman's message to Congress on October 3:

"I therefore propose to initiate discussions, first with our associates in this discovery, Great Britain and Canada, and then with other nations, in an effort to effect agreement on the conditions under which cooperation might replace rivalry in the field of atomic power."

3. Subsequently, the President invited Mr. Attlee and Mr. King to meet him in Washington on November 11, and the invitation was accepted.

4. Certain arrangements for the visit and the discussions were made by the Embassy with the White House and the State Department prior to the Prime Minister's arrival.

5. The Prime Minister, accompanied by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, arrived at the Union Station, Washington, on Saturday morning, November 10. He was met by representatives from the White House, State Department, and this Embassy. Shortly afterwards, Prime Minister Attlee arrived in Washington by air, accompanied by Sir John Anderson, Mr. Rowan (his principal Private Secretary), Mr. Neville Butler, of the Foreign Office, and others. Mr. King was joined in Washington by the Minister of Reconstruction, Mr. Howe, by Mr. Hume Wrong and Dr. C. J. Mackenzie.

6. Mr. King proceeded from the station to Blair House, where he resided during his stay in Washington as the guest of the United States Government. Later in the morning, Mr. King, accompanied by the undersigned, met the President, the Secretary of State, Admiral Leahy, Prime Minister Attlee and Lord Halifax in Mr. Truman's study in the White House, where the President announced the arrangements for the ensuing talks and for the Armistice Memorial Service to be held the next day at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Arlington Cemetery. Those who participated in this first meeting were invited to remain for lunch at the White House. This was purely social and no official business was discussed.

7. That same evening, Saturday, November 10, the President entertained the visiting Prime Ministers and their advisers, as well as members and officials of the United States Government at a State dinner, during which he and Mr. Attlee spoke briefly.

8. On November 11, at 11 a.m., wreaths were laid at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Arlington cemetery during an impressive ceremony. As each head of government moved forward to the tomb, the National Anthem of that country was played, and the guard of honour presented arms. Afterwards, Mr. King laid a wreath at the Canadian Cross of Sacrifice and, Mr. Attlee, a wreath on Sir John Dill's grave. The President, Prime Minister Mackenzie King, Secretary of State Byrnes, Admiral Leahy, Sir John Anderson, the United Kingdom and Canadian Ambassadors, and Mr. Rowan then motored to the Navy Yard, where they boarded the Sequoia, the yacht of the Secretary of the Navy. The yacht, in damp and misty weather, began its sail down the Potomac about noon, and returned to its mooring about 8:30 p.m. that same evening. Luncheon and dinner were served on board. By request, no record was made during the day of the discussions that took place.

9. Before luncheon, the President and the two Prime Ministers discussed between themselves the problem that had brought them together in Washington, the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes, and found that they were in general agreement on the main principles which should govern national and international action in this matter. After luncheon they were joined by their advisers around the table, and each member of the party was invited to express his views as to how the problem should be dealt with. There was complete agreement on the fundamental and far-reaching nature of the problem, on the necessity of an international approach to its solution, on the importance which the world attached to these discussions, and the desirability of issuing a combined statement embodying the agreement reached, as quickly as possible. During the afternoon, various other questions of international importance, which concerned more particularly the United Kingdom and the United States Governments, were also discussed.

10. The Presidential party left the Sequoia with the advantage of a complete and frank exchange of views on the general problem which had brought them together, but without any definite arrangements having been made for further meetings or for the drafting of a statement which could be used as a basis of discussion at such meetings. To rectify this omission, the U.K. delegation produced a paper, on Monday, which is attached to this despatch as Annex 1,† and which was later circulated to the Canadian group.

11. The Secretary of State entertained the visiting Prime Ministers at a dinner on Monday night, at which both Mr. Attlee and Mr. King replied to toasts proposed in their honour by Mr. Byrnes. After this dinner, Mr. Wrong, Mr. Robertson, and Mr. Pearson, had an opportunity to exchange views with the Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, on the particular subjects under discussion.

12. The information obtained above from Mr. Acheson was of assistance in the preparation of a Canadian draft of a proposed statement based on an earlier memorandum by the undersigned (Annex 2) and on views expressed on Sunday by Mr. Truman, Mr. Attlee, and more particularly, by Mr. King. This draft was submitted to Mr. King, Tuesday morning, and is attached to this despatch as Annex 3.

13. Discussions between the two Prime Ministers and President were resumed at the White House on Tuesday afternoon. At this meeting the Secretary of State produced a draft statement (Annex 4)† which he hoped would be acceptable to all. This was given careful consideration, but it was felt to be not entirely suitable as drafted, and that further time was necessary before a text could be finally approved.

14. On Wednesday morning, a Canadian redraft of the Byrnes statement was drawn up (Annex 5).

15. A U.S. second draft (Annex 6)† was discussed at the White House Wednesday afternoon. Mr. King suggested certain changes to this document, two of which were of particular importance. He thought, first, that the reference to the appointment of a Commission under the United Nations should be subordinated to the recommendations of the three signatories as to immediate action. For that purpose, these recommendations should be placed in the statement before the references to the appointment of a Commission. Mr. King also suggested that, at the end of the paragraph: "We are not convinced that the spreading of the specialized information regarding the practical application of atomic energy before it is possible to devise . . . safeguards . . . would contribute to a constructive solution of the problem of the atomic bomb", there should be added the following sentences: "On the contrary, we think it might have the opposite effect. We are, however, prepared to share on a reciprocal basis with other United Nations detailed information concerning the practical industrial application of atomic energy just as soon as effective and forcible safeguards against its use for destructive purposes can be devised." Such a change would make this very important part of the statement positive rather than negative. Both these changes were warmly supported by the President and Prime Minister Attlee. The Canadian Prime Minister also suggested the removal of all words and phrases from the document which implied that, in accepting the agreement, the signatories were acting for their respective governments. As finally approved, the agreement is between heads of governments and not between the governments themselves.

16. The Byrnes draft included the sentence: "It was agreed that, in respect of the carrying out of the plans outlined above, there should be consultation at the earliest possible date with the other permanent members of the Security Council." Mr. Byrnes stated that this sentence was included to meet a point made by Mr. King on Sunday that such consultation take place. Mr. King pointed out, however, that in his reference to consultation on Sunday, he had in mind informing the other permanent members of the Security Council of the proposed statement before it was issued. He did not have in mind subsequent consultation with them before the plans outlined in the statement should be carried into effect. As a result, the above sentence was deleted from the statement.

17. It may be said that the general effect of the changes proposed by Mr. King at this meeting and accepted by the others, was to remove from the Byrnes draft much of the impression that the three conferees were shelving the problem by sending it to a Commission and that they had no fixed ideas about it themselves.

18. At this Wednesday meeting the United Kingdom also produced a redraft (a copy of which I do not possess) of their original statement and designed to take into consideration points from the Byrnes draft and other points which had been raised the previous day. The U.K. draft was not as specific in its recommendations as the Byrnes draft but was more impressive in its emphasis on the fact that the only final solution to the problem was the development of political conditions which would strengthen confidence and cooperation among the nations and make the use of this weapon unnecessary because war would be unnecessary.

19. At this meeting also, the President returned to an idea which he had previously expressed; namely, that there should be a forthright statement that atomic warfare was prohibited and that any nation engaging in it should be outlawed. There was general agreement on the principle of prohibition, but there was agreement also that prohibition alone was worse than useless as it merely gave a feeling of false security without doing anything to make that security effective. It was therefore agreed that the question of "outlawing atomic warfare" should be left as it was in the Byrnes draft, as one of a number of steps to be taken.

20. It will be noticed that in the draft, "atomic weapons" are to be eliminated only from national armaments. There was some discussion whether specific reference should be made to the possiblity of turning such weapons over to the United Nations, to be used only on orders from the Security Council and against an aggressor. President Truman did not favour this course as he thought it was undesirable to recognize the use in any way of such a weapon. Furthermore, as Mr. King had already pointed out, a provision of this kind would remain futile as long as any one member of the Security Council possessed a veto over its use.

21. There was, however, a general understanding that, in referring the problem to a Commission of the United Nations, the world organization was being given a very severe test at the very outset of its existence and that the three powers were now obligated more than ever to strengthen and develop the United Nations organization so that it could successfully meet this and other tests.

22. At this Wednesday meeting, Dr. Vannevar Bush, who had joined the discussions as a United States adviser, suggested also that a sentence be included in the statement to the effect that the Commission should work by stages, each stage being successfully completed before the next one was attempted. It was agreed that reference to this idea should be included.

23. In view of the fact that the two drafts were already before the meeting, and that Mr. King had succeeded in having alterations made to the U.S. draft to meet the Canadian point of view, the Canadian draft was not produced.

24. At the close of the Wednesday afternoon meeting President Truman suggested that a small drafting committee of Dr. Bush, Sir John Anderson, and the undersigned, should be appointed to produce a new draft which would combine those parts of the United States and United Kingdom drafts on which there had been general agreement, and other ideas which had been put forward and found acceptable. This drafting committee met at 5:30 at the White House and again at 9 p.m. that evening. At 10 p.m. the President and the Prime Ministers met again at the White House to consider the draft so hurriedly produced by the drafting committee (Annex 7).† This was gone over sentence by sentence and a final text was agreed to by midnight. A clean copy was ready for signature by 11 a.m. Thursday morning. The formal agreement (Annex 8)[41] was signed by the President and the two Prime Ministers at that time, and immediately afterwards was read to the White House correspondents, who were invited to the President's office for this purpose.

25. The Prime Minister paid a farewell visit to the President at the White House, Thursday afternoon, and left that day by the 4:10 p.m. train for Ottawa, accompanied by Prime Minister Attlee.

26. There are one or two observations that might be made on the procedure adopted for conducting these discussions and drafting the resulting agreement. The discussions, until Wednesday afternoon, were carried out without any record being made or any drafting committee set up to submit texts, for consideration by the principals. If a drafting committee (representing the three governments concerned) had been appointed after the discussions on Sunday, it would have been able to submit a document on Monday or Tuesday which could have been used as the agreed basis of discussion. Instead, separate drafts were produced by the United States and the United Kingdom, which somewhat complicated matters. In the end, a drafting committee was appointed, but not until Wednesday afternoon. This meant that it had to work very quickly, as the President had indicated that the statement should be made public the following day.

27. Consideration of speed seemed to weigh heavily in the minds of Mr. Truman and Mr. Byrnes. In a sense it was unfortunate that more time could not have been devoted to the discussions or the drafting of the resulting document. One of the reasons for expedition, put forward by the President, was the desirability of putting an end to press speculation and comment, unauthorized, and sometimes mischievous. There was no doubt in this connection that the President had in mind the activities of the United Kingdom press officer, Mr. Francis Williams, who, on Sunday and Monday had held press conferences where he apparently gave in some detail the United Kingdom view on these matters. This, in turn, resulted in considerable publicity in the

Canada, Treaty Series, 1945, No. 13.

Monday and Tuesday papers being given to what was called the "Attlee Plan". It must be admitted that the press policy adopted by the United Kingdom delegation at this conference was unhelpful. In contrast to this policy, no information whatever concerning the discussions was given out by the White House, the State Department, or the Canadian delegation.

28. It was noticeable that the Secretary of State was not accompanied by any advisers from his Department at any of the meetings that took place. This meant that, on the United States side, there was no one who was in a position to make a record of the progress of the discussions or report on the points on which agreement had been reached. In the earlier discussions, Mr. Truman and Mr. Byrnes were alone. It was only on Tuesday afternoon that Dr. Bush, a scientific expert, was asked to attend. It was rumoured that the War Department was annoyed at its exclusion from the talks and there is reason to believe also that the State Department would have welcomed the opportunity of sending an adviser to the meetings with the Secretary.

29. At the signature on Thursday morning, at which congressional leaders were present, Senator Connally expressed openly and in no uncertain terms his irritation at the fact that Administration leaders in the Senate had not been given any information about the progress of the discussions until, as he put it "5 minutes before the press were called in." Possibly, if the President and Secretary of State had been in a position to devote more time to the questions under discussion, and had not been under such pressure from other directions during the four days of the visit, there would have been greater opportunity for consultation with their scientific and political advisers and time for more careful drafting of the final document.

TOP SECRET November 8, 1945

ANNEX II

CANADIAN MEMORANDUM ON ATOMIC WARFARE

Before any sound policy, national or international, can be laid down in respect of the development, manufacture and use of atomic energy for warlike purposes, the following assumptions must be confirmed.

(1) That the atomic bomb is not merely a new weapon in a long succession of weapons, since man first began to fight with clubs, but something revolutionary and unprecedented; a new departure in destruction and annihilative in effect.

(2) That the atomic bomb dropped on Japan, if development is not controlled, is only the beginning, not the end, of the use of atomic energy for destruction; that even more devastating bombs are being or could be developed which will be to the present bomb as a machine gun is to a breech-loader.

(3) That the secret of the atomic bomb cannot be kept and that within, say, five years a country like the U.S.S.R., will know all about it.

(4) That the manufacture of the atomic bomb is possible in any industrial state which knows the secret.

(5) That projection by rockets with accuracy over great distances is now or will shortly be possible.

It is assumed that the above statements are substantially true. If this assumption is correct, then no government has the right to give its people a feeling of security, which can only be false, by basing its policy on the opposite assumption, that a national or three-country monopoly of development and production is possible. Even if, for some years at least, such a monopoly were possible, its value to enforce peace would not be great because other countries would know perfectly well that Anglo-Saxon public opinion would not permit the preventive use of such a terrible weapon.

It might conceivably be technically possible for the government of a parliamentary democracy to destroy a menacing power by pressing a button the moment the menace became clear (though buttons presumably could be pressed a few seconds later in the other country as well). Politically, however, this would not be possible, at least in the U.S.A. As an American commentator has put it: "It would obviously be unconstitutional for a President of the U.S.A. to 'press the button' for destruction of an ostensibly friendly power without securing a prior declaration of war from Congress — the mere mention of which would cause the potential enemy to press his own button first."

It is clear that unless there is agreement between nations regarding atomic bombs, there will be competition. Such competition in the development of atomic energy for destructive purposes would be the most bitter and disastrous armament race ever run. Like every other armament race in history, it would follow the same course, of fear, suspicion, rivalry, desperation and war; only in this case the war would probably mean international suicide.

It follows, therefore, that any constructive solution of this problem of the war use of atomic energy, must be international — not national. There is, in fact, no national solution.

This does not mean that the three countries concerned should make a gift of their atomic knowledge to other countries without conditions. That would be folly. It means that they should exploit the temporary advantage they now possess in order to bring this weapon under international control, so that it can never be used by anyone. This can be attempted by trading the knowledge of invention and manufacture they alone possess at present, for renunciation by all nations of the right of production or use, except, possibly, on orders from the United Nations. This in its turn means international supervision and control of the development and use of atomic energy. If an honest offer of this kind, made by the United States, United Kingdom, and Canada, were refused by any other state, that refusal would certainly disclose which nations were to be trusted and which feared.

This type of international solution seems implicit in the following paragraphs from President Truman's Message to Congress on October 3rd:

".....Scientific opinion appears to be practically unanimous that the essential theoretical knowledge upon which the discovery is based is already widely known. There is also substantial agreement that foreign research can come abreast of our present theoretical knowledge in time.

The hope of civilization lies in international arrangements looking, if possible, to the renunciation of the use and development of the atomic bomb, and directing and encouraging the use of atomic energy and all future scientific information toward peaceful and humanitarian ends. The difficulties in working out such arrangements are great. The alternative to overcoming these difficulties, however, may be a desperate armament race which might well end in disaster."

To get down to details, the following principles might be embodied in an international agreement proposed by the three governments to all other governments:

(1) Prohibition of the manufacture or the use of atomic weapons, except on instructions from the United Nations. The "outlawing of atomic warfare" alone, would be the worst of all possible solutions. It would lull into a false and dangerous security, without in fact making any contribution to that security. As one of a number of steps, however, it is important.

(2) The destruction of all existing atomic weapons or their transfer to the United Nations, as trustee.

(3) The pooling of all the basic scientific knowledge of atomic energy so that the secret development of new atomic weapons would be impossible.

(4) To reinforce this prevention of secret developments, and hence to remove fears and suspicions, the establishment under U.N.O. of an international commission of scientists of world reputation with full authority to make periodic investigations of all national laboratories, industries, raw materials and every form of technical development in the field of nuclear physics and atomic energy.

Without such regular scientific inspection, effective control would be impossible. With it, secrecy would be equally impossible. Further, no country could justify its refusal to accept this kind of international, scientific supervision.

(5) Annual reports by this scientific commission to the General Assembly of the United Nations.

It would, of course, be understood that, until an agreement such as that suggested above, came into force, no country would be under any special and separate obligation regarding atomic warfare.

In default of a genuine and sincere effort to find an international solution of this kind, it is unlikely that the world will be reassured by President Truman's statement on October 27th: "We regard it (the atomic bomb) [sic] as a sacred trust. Because of our love of peace, thoughtful people know that the trust will not be violated." "Thoughtful people" are not likely to include Soviet officials in the Kremlin! This "sacred trust" approach to the problem, as a substitute for international agreement, is, in fact, negative and unsatisfactory. There can be no lasting world security on that basis. The U.S.A. simply cannot remove fears concerning atomic warfare, or prevent the inevitable and fatal competition that would follow, merely by sitting on the bomb as a self-appointed "sacred trustee". There must be a better solution than that.

It has been said that the discovery of atomic weapons is the most revolutionary event in human history since Noah launched the Ark. In sober fact, its significance for the future can hardly be exaggerated. It presents us with the greatest threat to man's existence ever conceived, and, paradoxically, the greatest opportunity to realize world peace. Weapons so horrible in effect, possessed by many nations and under national control only, might, of course, produce peace; in the sense that life might be made impossible on this planet. There is another and better kind of peace, however, which the grim prospect of atomic warfare might help to produce; that which comes from sanity and co-operation in international relations, influenced by the prospect of what will happen, if the peace is disturbed. I do not know whether that kind of peace can be achieved. But with the atomic bomb suspended over our heads, it would be madness not to attempt it.

The atomic bomb, finally, may force the United Nations to become an effective association for peace. This, however, can only happen if the problem it has posed is approached and solved internationally. No other solution is, in fact, possible and the effort to find one will be fruitless — and worse.

If there was ever an occasion for seeking a solution to any international problem on the broadest possible international basis — this is it.

If the thesis of my memorandum is correct, that the only possible solution for the problem of atomic warfare is an international one, then concrete steps should be taken at the forthcoming meeting to bring about such a solution. To that end, could there not be a statement by the President and the two Prime Ministers of principles on which an international agreement might be based and an announcement made that such a draft agreement would be submitted shortly to all governments for subsequent discussion at the Assembly of the United Nations?

A pronouncement of this kind would be of such exceptional interest and importance that it should, of course, be made in as impressive a form as possible. If the world air channels can be cleared for less important statements, surely they could be cleared for this. My idea would be that every radio station in the three countries concerned should be freed for half an hour or so from all programs and that a preliminary communique should be issued which would make it possible for radio stations in other countries to take the same action if they desire.

The following program might then be broadcast:

(1) Short statements by Prime Minister Attlee and Prime Minister King.

(2) A ten- or fifteen-minute statement by a scientist of world reputation concerned with the development of the atomic bomb, like Oppenheimer or Bush, which would be given in the most dramatic and impressive fashion possible, and would drive home to listeners the implications for human existence of atomic warfare.

(3) A ten-minute statement by President Truman outlining the principles of an international agreement which the three governments propose to submit to their legislatures and to all other governments and designed to bring this new weapon under international control and supervision.

ANNEX III

CANADIAN DRAFT STATEMENT

President Truman and Prime Ministers Attlee and Mackenzie King have issued the following statement.

In our examination of the problems arising from the development of atomic energy, our conviction has deepened that any approach to this subject must be controlled by the following considerations.

(1) The release of atomic energy has undermined existing concepts of national security and international organization, because it has provided a force which, misused, could annihilate whole nations.

(2) There is no national solution to the problems of security which the release of atomic energy has now placed squarely before the world.

(3) There can be no enduring international solution, unless nations succeed in working together for peace within the framework of an effective United Nations Organization. Atomic energy cannot be safely used in a world of competing sovereign states.

(4) The fear of atomic bombs is basically fear of an international situation in which the possibility of their use as an instrument of national policy cannot be excluded. No nation can hope to be freed from this fear by the possession of a temporary advantage in atomic development. An armament competition in atomic energy would be the most catastrophic arms race ever run.

The only hope for a lasting solution to the problem is the creation of conditions which make the use of this weapon unthinkable. To further such a solution has now become an urgent and practical necessity. Action toward this end must be taken at once by the United Nations.

The Members of the United Nations Organization are pledged by acceptance of its Charter "to live together in peace with one another as good neighbours and to unite their strength to maintain international peace and security." The control of the use and development of atomic energy is the first great test of this pledge.

If, in consideration of this matter by the United Nations, it becomes clear that a strengthening of the Organization is necessary, that strengthening should be undertaken promptly. The United Nations cannot be static in the face of these dangers.

We accept and recommend for prompt consideration by The United Nations the following principles as bases for an international agreement:

(1) The prohibition of the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes and the outlawing of any government which breaks this pledge.

(2) The exchange of fundamental scientific information on the development of atomic energy.

(3) The right of technically qualified personnel, under the auspices of the United Nations Organization, to examine all national installations engaged in the field of nuclear physics and atomic energy, as well as to make investigations of sources of raw material, in order to give every possible security against the secret evasion of undertakings openly given.

(4) The sharing of information relating to the technique of the production and operation of plants and equipment for the development and use of atomic energy as soon as international arrangements concluded for the exercise of the rights under (2) and (3) above, are in effective operation.

(5) Extension to the United Nations Organization, in due course, of the right to make equitable allocations, according to the principles of Art. of the Atlantic Charter,[42] of material for the production of atomic energy for constructive purposes, if a world survey of the sources of such material indicates that such allocations are necessary.

(6) Annual reports on national developments in this field to be made to The United Nations by Member States and by any agency of examination or allocation which may be set up under (3) and (5) above.

We desire, in conclusion, to associate ourselves with the following excerpt from a recent Presidential Message to Congress on this subject:

"The hope of civilization lies in international arrangements looking, if possible, to the renunciation of the use and development of the atomic bomb, and directing and encouraging the use of atomic energy and all future scientific information toward peaceful and humanitarian ends. The difficulties in working out such arrangements are great. The alternative to overcoming these difficulties, however, may be a desperate armament race which might well end in disaster."

ANNEX V

TOP SECRET November 13, 1945 [sic]

SECOND CANADIAN DRAFT BASED ON U.S. DRAFT

1. The President of the United States, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and the Prime Minister of Canada have discussed the possibility of international action:

(a) To prevent the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes; and

[42]Voir le volume 7, document 327./See Volume 7, Document 327.

(b) To promote the use of recent and future advances in scientific knowledge, particularly the advances in our knowledge of atomic energy, for peaceful and humanitarian ends.

The primary objective of the discussions has been to take the first step in the prevention of a secret arms race, in atomic weapons or other major weapons which in our view are scarcely less terrible. This is an essential preliminary to the removal of the burden of armaments from the world and the final banishment of the fear of war.

2. As a contribution to this end, we propose, and accept for ourselves, the following bases for international policy:

(1) The prohibition of the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes and the outlawing of any government which breaks this pledge.

(2) The exchange of fundamental scientific information for peaceful ends and on the basis of mutuality, effectively guaranteed and safeguarded.

(3) The interchange of scientists, students and publications for peaceful ends with any nation which will fully reciprocate.

(4) The exchange of detailed information regarding the practical industrial application of atomic energy whenever it is possible to devise effective, reciprocal and enforceable safeguards acceptable to all nations in order to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and evasions.

(5) The immediate preparation by the United Nations, through a Commission, of recommendations and draft convention for the purpose of implementing the principles outlined above, and for submission to Members of the United Nations, and possibly to other states. The Commission should consider open-mindedly and on their merits, all proposals to eliminate the manufacture and use of atomic and other major weapons, having in mind that the military exploitation of atomic energy depends in large part upon the same methods and processes as would be required for industrial use. The Commission should proceed with the utmost dispatch to submit recommendations and draft conventions dealing with the separate phases of its work.

We desire to emphasize that responsibility for the devising of safeguards to remove the threats to the very fabric of civilized life which are involved in the use of new scientific discoveries for destructive purposes, rests not upon three countries alone, but upon the whole civilized world.

Although efforts to formulate and apply special measures to protect the civilized world from annihilation by the use of atomic bombs or other major weapons must not be relaxed, we are aware that the only complete protection of the civilized world from the destructive use of scientific knowledge lies in the prevention of war.

We, therefore, declare the unswerving intention of our three countries to co-operate with all the United Nations to maintain the rule of law among nations and to banish the scourge of war from this earth.

Le haut commissaire de Grande-Bretagne
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

High Commissioner of Great Britain to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL [Ottawa,] November 28, 1945

My dear Prime Minister,

I have received urgent instructions to inform you that the Government of the United Kingdom have under consideration the question of the procedure for bringing before the United Nations Organization the proposals made in the statement on atomic energy which was signed at Washington on the 15th November by yourself, the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

The statement refers to the proposed special commission being set up "under the United Nations Organization to prepare recommendations for submission to the organization." The terms of reference under the heads in paragraph 7 cover matters which under the Charter would fall within the scope of the General Assembly, the Security Council, and also possibly the Social and Economic Council.

It has been noted from press reports that President Truman is reported to have said at his press conference on the 20th November that the General Assembly would be asked at its first meeting to set up the commission, that the General Assembly, not the Security Council alone, should take part in establishing the commission, and that he was in favour of all countries sharing in the task of establishing the commission. There has been much speculation in the United Kingdom about the exact procedure to be adopted and it formed the subject of various questions to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the recent Foreign Affairs debate in the House of Commons. Mr. Eden in particular suggested the need for a special meeting of the United Nations. To this Mr. Bevin replied by pointing out that the General Assembly would be meeting early in January, that there was therefore no purpose in a special meeting, (which would not in fact be technically possible) and that the Assembly would have, as its first task, the elections to establish the Security Council. He added that the tripartite proposals would no doubt then be considered and early decisions taken as to how the commission should be set up.

First and most urgent, because it is almost bound to come up in the Preparatory Commission, is the question of procedure for bringing the proposal for the Special Commission before the General Assembly. This could apparently be done either by: —

(a) a resolution of the Preparatory Commission placing the matter upon the provisional agenda for the General Assembly;

(b) action by one or more of the United Nations proposing an additional item for the General Assembly's agenda at some time between the closing of the Preparatory Commission and the beginning of the prescribed period before the General Assembly meets; or

(c) by raising the matter in the General Assembly after it has met and adding it on to the agenda.

The question also arises under each alternative which powers should propose placing the item on the Assembly's agenda.

On the whole the Government of the United Kingdom prefer alternative (b) as the simplest and most natural procedure which they think could be justified. In their view it is desirable to discourage the Preparatory Commission from embarking on a detailed discussion about the proposed commission in relation to the atomic problem. However, it might be impossible, in view of the widespread interest in the proposed commission and the general sense of urgency, to delay the next move until after the Preparatory Commission is over. Moreover it is very likely that some delegation will raise the question directly in the Preparatory Commission. In either of these contingencies, recourse might be had to alternative (a).

In the view of the United Kingdom Government it would be natural that the initiative under either course (a) or course (b) should be a joint one by the three Powers which issued the Washington statement. It is, however, argued in certain quarters that the Soviet Government in particular ought to be associated with sponsoring the tripartite proposals before the United Nations Organization. Obviously the Powers in question want above all to get the co-operation of the Soviet Government and any procedure which secured this would be the best. But for their part the Government of the United Kingdom are very doubtful on past experience whether the Soviet Government would associate themselves in sponsoring a statement about which they were not consulted, particularly as the proposal would be to place the matter on the agenda of the General Assembly.

Then there are the questions of the formation and composition of the eventual commission itself. Under the President's reported remarks at his press conference, the commission would be initially appointed by the General Assembly. This leads up to the difficulty, which is sure to be raised by the Soviet Government and which will have to be considered, about the precise working of the commission and the particular organ of the United Nations to which it will report. A solution might be that the commission would make its recommendations to the Assembly so long as it was dealing with the first two stages of its work as defined in paragraph 8 of the tripartite statement, but that at the stage when it came to deal with the control and supervision of atomic energy to prevent its misuse as a weapon of war it would report to the Security Council in accordance with Article 24 of the Charter. It seems from his public remarks that President Truman may have some such dual allegiance in mind and that if this were made plain such an arrangement might not be unacceptable to the Soviet Government.

The composition of the special commission would, no doubt, be influenced by discussion in the Assembly, but the United Kingdom Government would naturally like to reach an understanding beforehand with the Canadian and United States Governments. Mr. Bevin was also pressed in the recent debate about this aspect of the matter. Here again your views would be greatly welcomed.

Lord Halifax at Washington has been instructed to discuss these urgent matters with the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes, in the light of the explanation which I have given to you. He is also to inform Mr. Byrnes (with reference to the last paragraph but two above) that the United Kingdom Government would very much like to know the attitude of the United States Government on the point affecting Russia and in particular he is to enquire whether they have had any reaction from the Soviet Government to the advance notice given them by the United States authorities of the tripartite statement. Mr. Byrnes is also being invited to consider sounding the Soviet Government through the United States Ambassador at Moscow. (It is doubted in London whether any progress on the point could be made with the Soviet delegation at the Preparatory Commission.)

I should be very grateful if you would let me know the Canadian Government's views as soon as possible on the various matters which I have been instructed to raise with you in order that I may send a very early reply.

Yours sincerely,

MALCOLM MACDONALD

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] November 28, 1945

UNITED KINGDOM SUGGESTIONS CONCERNING ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

Mr. Malcolm MacDonald's letter raises two separate questions (1) How should the proposal of the three powers to establish the Commission be brought before the United Nations? (2) What should be the composition of the Commission and to what body should it report?

With regard to (1), the procedure to be followed seems to be relatively unimportant. The U.S., U.K. and Canada should be associated in action to place the matter on the agenda whether this is done at the Preparatory Commission or between the conclusion of the Preparatory Commission and the opening of the Assembly or early in the session of the Assembly. We can readily fall in with any course acceptable to the U.S. and U.K. It is agreed between them that the Assembly should establish the Commission and that course should be accepted by Canada.[43] Indeed, a good deal of the work outlined for the Commission in the Washington statement seems to fall outside the scope of the Security Council's powers.

A subsidiary question raised is whether there should be an attempt to associate the U.S.S.R. On this I would suggest that the parties to the Washington Declaration should reach an agreement on procedure and should jointly notify the Soviet Government before taking action involving publicity.[44] It is open to question whether they should notify as well the French and Chinese Governments. I think that Canada should not take any initiative in proposing such an approach.

The second question is the difficult one. How should the commission be composed? In addition to the three parties to the Washington Declaration it is clear that at any rate the U.S.S.R. and France should be invited to appoint members. It will probably be necessary to add China, one Latin-American country and at least one smaller European country. The Soviet Government will undoubtedly seek to have included a satellite state to prevent their being placed in the minority of one.

The U.K. proposals seem to contemplate that the terms of reference to the Commission should be those in the Washington statement. This appears to be satisfactory to us. They raise the question of the body to which the Commission should report. The work outlined for the Commission in the Washington statement includes some matters which appear to fall outside the scope of the Security Council's functions, such as exchange of scientific information for peaceful ends and control of atomic energy to ensure its use for peaceful purposes. These would appear properly to be functions entrusted to the Assembly. The Assembly also has power under Article 11 to consider the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments whereas the Security Council by Article 26 is responsible for formulating plans for the regulation of armaments. There is thus an area of concurrent jurisdiction in which elimination of atomic weapons and the nature of the required safeguards come within the scope of both bodies. The Security Council could only claim exclusive jurisdiction if it were able to argue under the provisions of Articles 12 and 34 that the development of atomic weapons constituted a "situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute." If so, the Assembly would be debarred from making recommendations but would not be debarred from discussing the matter.

It seems to me that we cannot at this stage settle definitely to what body the Atomic Energy Commission should address its reports. It may bring forward proposals requiring Assembly action as part of plans which also would require action by the Security Council. Through which organ any such proposals should be implemented will doubtless be a subject of discussion in the Commission itself and it seems desirable that the three sponsoring governments should propose that the reports of the Commission be addressed both to the Security Council and to the General Assembly.[45]

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut commissaire de Grande-Bretagne

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner of Great Britain

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL Ottawa, November 29, 1945

My dear High Commissioner,

I have received your letter of November 28th informing me of the tentative views of the Government of the United Kingdom on the procedure for bringing before the United Nations Organisation the proposals made in the statement on atomic energy signed in Washington on November 15th by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and myself. I appreciate the need for reaching an early agreement between the parties to the Washington Declaration and I welcome the opportunity of commenting on the suggestions made by the United Kingdom Government before a final decision is taken.

With regard to the method whereby the proposal for the establishment of a special Commission should be brought before the United Nations Organization, I am in full agreement with the view that the matter should be considered by the General Assembly. The exact means whereby it is placed on the agenda of the General Assembly is relatively unimportant. I think that it would be appropriate for the parties to the Washington discussions jointly to propose its inclusion in the agenda, preferably after the Preparatory Commission has closed its session and before the date for the opening of the General Assembly. If, however, the matter is raided in the Preparatory Commission joint action could be taken by the delegations of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada to sponsor a resolution adding the question to the provisional agenda for the General Assembly. My views are thus in accordance with the preference expressed by the Government of the United Kingdom.

The suggestion that the Government of the U.S.S.R. might be approached with a view to securing their sponsorship for the tripartite proposals seems unlikely to bring any fruitful results. As you point out, past experience indicates that the Soviet Government would be unlikely to associate themselves in sponsoring a statement about which they were not consulted and might also complicate the whole procedure by insisting at this stage that the subject was one which should properly be considered by the Security Council. I think, therefore, that the three governments directly concerned should reach agreement between themselves on the course to be followed. They might then inform the Soviet Government, privately in advance, of the action which they propose to take without inviting comment from the Soviet Government. If this is done, it would be well to consider whether similar notification should be addressed to the Governments of France and China.

[45]Note marginale:/Marginal note:

The desirable composition of the special Commission is difficult to determine. Perhaps the easiest course to pursue would be to suggest that it should be composed of representatives of the Governments serving on the first Security Council. It is, however, essential that Canada as one of the sponsors for the establishment of the Commission should be assured of representation on it, whether or not Canada is elected to one of the non-permanent seats on the Security Council. The Commission is likely to continue in existence for a considerable period and it would not be desirable that its membership should change automatically as a result of new elections to the Security Council. There might be included in it, initially at any rate, representatives of the five states with permanent membership, together with representatives of Canada, at least one Latin-American country and at least one smaller European country. A wide degree of overlapping with the membership of the Security Council would be some assurance against conflicts over questions of jurisdiction within the United Nations Organization.

As you indicate in the second paragraph of your letter the terms of reference set forth in paragraph 7 of the Washington Declaration cover matters falling within the scope of both the General Assembly and the Security Council. It might be that some of the proposals made by the Commission would require consideration by the Economic and Social Council and the collaboration of some of the specialised agencies to be brought into relationship with the United Nations, such as The Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. The most satisfactory course may prove to be the submission of reports by the Commission to either or both of the General Assembly and the Security Council. Matters falling directly within the competence of the Security Council under Articles 24 and 26 of the Charter could be the subject of recommendations from the Commission to the Security Council alone if necessary. Quite apart from the specific allocation of functions included in the Chapter (whereby some of the recommendations of the Commission would properly be for consideration by the Assembly), it is most unlikely that agreement could be secured among the members of the United Nations for concentrating wholly in the Security Council responsibility for dealing with the problems raised by the development of atomic fission.

It will be necessary to decide in advance on a suitable designation for the proposed special Commission. Under the Washington Declaration the functions of the Commission would not be limited to questions of the use or misuse of atomic energy. They would include the bringing forward of proposals for the elimination from national armaments "of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction" and also for the exchange between all nations of "basic scientific information for peaceful ends." While the Commission might be generally known by the short title of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission, the designation given to it in the resolution to be placed before the General Assembly should clearly indicate its broader functions.

I am asking the Canadian Ambassador in Washington to inform the Secretary of State of the United States of the views put forward in this letter and to exchange information on these matters with Lord Halifax.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. MACKENZIE KING

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT. My two immediately following messages† contain the text of top secret and personal letters exchanged between the United Kingdom High Commissioner and myself concerning the procedure for bringing before the United Nations Organization the proposals contained in the tripartite declaration on atomic energy which was signed in Washington November 15th. You will note that Lord Halifax was instructed to approach Mr. Byrnes with the suggestions contained in Mr. MacDonald's letter of November 28th and that in my reply of November 29th I have told Mr. MacDonald that you would inform the Secretary of State of the United States of the views put forward in my letter and would exchange information on these matters with Lord Halifax.

2. It will be necessary to instruct as soon as possible the chairman of the Canadian delegation to the Preparatory Commission on the attitude which he should adopt if the question of the special United Nations Commission on Atomic Questions is raised in the Commission. He is being informed today that discussions are proceeding urgently between the parties to the Washington Declaration and that until they have resulted in agreement he should seek to defer consideration of any proposal which may be brought up in the Preparatory Commission. I should be glad if you would take the matter up urgently with the Secretary of State and the United Kingdom Ambassador.

I am leaving an aide-mémoire† at the State Department this afternoon, passing on to Mr. Byrnes the views expressed in your letter to the United Kingdom High Commissioner as given in EX-4076.

Lord Halifax has sent me today, a copy of an aide-mémoire[46] which he left with Mr. Byrnes yesterday afternoon covering the points which Mr. Malcolm MacDonald brought to your attention in his letter of November 28th. Last night the United Kingdom Ambassador telegraphed to the Foreign Office that Mr. Byrnes had told him that he, Mr. Byrnes, was clearly of the opinion that the United Kingdom and United States and Canadian Governments ought to get together in regard to laying the proposal before the UNO Assembly, and his thought moved very much with Mr. Bevin's as to the best way of doing this. Mr. Byrnes also very much wants to bring in Russia if this can be managed. He had expected to make a suggestion to you and to Mr. Bevin that he, Mr. Byrnes, should work out with the United Kingdom Ambassador and myself here, subject to approval of our Governments, the various questions of procedure and handling of the matter as he thought this might be the most expeditious way of doing it. The Secretary of State promised to study the United Kingdom note with which he expected to find himself in very general agreement.

MOST IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. Your WA-5966 of November 27th.† My immediately following message contains text of letter addressed to you by Mr. Howe requesting you to represent him at the meeting of the Combined Policy Committee on December 4th and suggesting certain amendments in a document addressed to the chairman of that Committee by Sir John Anderson and General Groves. This text of this document is annexed to Mr. Howe's letter to you.

2. It seems likely that the principal discussion at the Combined Policy Committee will relate to the proposals contained in this document. You should press for the amendments suggested by Mr. Howe, which have been discussed also with the Prime Minister and Dean Mackenzie, subject to the following additional amendment.

3. We feel that the reference in paragraph 4 of the Anderson-Grove document and in paragraphs 4 and 4 (a) of Mr. Howe's revision to the use of uranium and thorium for military purposes should be eliminated. The first part of paragraph 4 should read, "All materials at the disposition of the Trust shall be allocated to the two Governments in such quantities as may be needed in the common interest," thus leaving out the phrase "for scientific research, military and humanitarian purposes." This change does not in any way weaken the effect of the proposal.

TELETYPE EX-4100 Ottawa, December 3, 1945

MOST IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. Reference my immediately preceding message. Following is the text of Mr. Howe's letter to you dated November 30th and of the memorandum annexed thereto: Begins, November 30, 1945.

My dear Ambassador,

During the tripartite meeting on atomic energy in Washington, Sir John Anderson and General Groves signed a document entitled "Memorandum to: The Chairman of the Combined Policy Committee" copy of which is attached. Canada was asked to have this agreement signed by C. J. Mackenzie as an indication of favourable consideration by the Government, but it was decided that for the time being, Dr. Mackenzie would not sign the document.

Paragraphs numbered 1, 2, 5 and 6 are satisfactory as far as Canada is concerned.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 deal with the operations of the Combined Development Trust. Canada is not at present a member of the Combined Development Trust, although at the request of the United Kingdom Government, George Bateman is one of the Directors of the Trust, representing the Government of the United Kingdom. Canada has undertaken no financial commitments in relation to the Trust, but has undertaken to conduct, at her own expense, exploration for and development of uranium ores within the Dominion of Canada. Canada desires to leave the present arrangement unchanged. Therefore, I suggest that paragraphs 3 and 4 be reworded and a new paragraph 4(a) inserted, all as follows: —

3. "The two Governments presently responsible for the Combined Development Trust will take measures so far as practicable to secure control and possession, by purchase or otherwise, of all deposits of uranium and thorium situated in areas comprising the United States, its territories and possessions, and the United Kingdom. They will also use every endeavour with respect to the remaining territories of the British Commonwealth (except Canada) and other countries to acquire all available supplies of uranium and thorium. All supplies acquired under the provisions of this paragraph will be placed at the disposition of the Combined Development Trust.

4. All materials at the disposition of the Trust shall be allocated to the two Governments in such quantities as may be needed, in the common interest, for scientific research, military and humanitarian purposes. Such supplies as are not allocated for these purposes shall be held by the Combined Development Trust and their disposal shall be determined at a later date in the light of then existing conditions and on a fair and equitable basis.

4(a). Canada will take measures so far as practicable to secure control and possession, by purchase or otherwise, of all deposits of uranium and thorium situated within its areas. Canada will develop its deposits and use the product, in the common interest, for scientific research, and military and humanitarian purposes."

The arrangement outlined above is wholly consistent, since the special position of Canada was recognized when the Trust was formed. Canada was the first to acquire all uranium deposits within its borders, and, perhaps for that reason, those forming the Trust were content to proceed with the Trust without asking commitments from Canada. I see no reason why any change in the situation is desirable at this time.

Regarding the next meeting of the Joint Policy Committee, it would appear that the meeting will be concerned, principally at least, with procedure which might be followed when setting up the United Nations Commission on atomic energy. This would seem to be a matter for diplomacy rather than for development. Therefore, I would ask that you represent me at the meeting to be held next Tuesday, in the office of the Secretary of State. My only interest is consideration of the document signed by Sir John Anderson and General Groves, referred to above, and if this document is considered, I will be glad if you will put forward my views as above stated. I regard it as important that Canada does not become involved in the operations of the Combined Development Trust.

Yours truly,

C. D. HOWE

Mémorandum au président, le Comité conjoint de la politique

Memorandum to Chairman, Combined Policy Committee

[Washington,] November 16, 1945

We recommend that the following points be considered by the Combined Policy Committee in the preparation of a new document to replace the Quebec Agreement, which should be superseded in toto, together with all other understandings with the exception of the Combined Development Trust Agreement which should be revised in conformity with the new arrangements.

1. The three Governments, the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, will not use atomic weapons against other parties without prior consultation with each other;

2. The three Governments agree not to disclose any information or enter into negotiations concerning atomic energy with other governments or authorities or persons in other countries except in accordance with agreed common policy or after due prior consultation with one another;

3. The three Governments will take measures so far as practicable to secure control and possession, by purchase or otherwise, of all deposits of uranium and thorium situated in areas comprising the United States, its territories or possessions, the United Kingdom, and Canada. They will also use every endeavour with respect to the remaining territories of the British Commonwealth, and other countries to acquire all available supplies of uranium and thorium. All supplies acquired under the provisions of this paragraph will be placed at the disposition of the Combined Development Trust.

4. The materials at the disposition of the Trust shall be allocated to the three Governments in such quantities as may be needed, in the common interest, for scientific research, military and humanitarian purposes. Such supplies as are not allocated for these purposes shall be held by the Combined Development Trust and their disposal shall be determined at a later date in the light of then existing conditions and on a fair and equitable basis.

5. There shall be full and effective cooperation in the field of basic scientific research among the three countries. In the field of development, design, construction, and operation of plants such cooperation, recognized as desirable in principle, shall be regulated by such ad hoc arrangements as may approved from time to time by the Combined Policy Committee as mutually advantageous.

6. The Combined Policy Committee, already established and constituted so as to provide equal representation to the United States on the one hand and to the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada on the other, shall carry out the policies provided for, subject to the control of the respective governments. To this end, the Committee shall:

1. Review from time to time the general program of work being carried out in the three countries.

2. Allocate materials in accordance with the principles set forth in the fourth paragraph above.

3. Settle any questions which may arise concerning the interpretation and application of arrangements regulating cooperation between the three Governments.

The above is to be understood as being without prejudice to the consideration by the Combined Policy Committee of any matters not covered in this memorandum.

TOP SECRET Washington, December 4, 1945

Dear Norman [Robertson]:

The receipt of teletypes EX-4099 and EX-4100 over the weekend on the Combined Policy Committee and the uncertainties which they raised in our minds here, prompt me to write you not only about these particular messages, but also about our whole relationship to this Committee.

As you know, Mr. King signed a short document[47] when in Washington, along with Mr. Truman and Mr. Attlee, accepting the principle of co-operation between the three powers in respect of atomic developments and instructing a small group to prepare a memorandum of proposals designed to implement this principle. That memorandum is contained in your teletype EX-4100, where I saw it for the first time.

In his letter to me dated November 30th, Mr. Howe proposed certain amendments to that memorandum which were, I understand, approved by the Prime Minister and Dean Mackenzie and for which I was asked to press at the meeting of the Combined Policy Committee which was held this afternoon.

Mr. Howe, in support of these proposals, states that they would merely maintain the status quo in respect of Canada's relationship to the Combined Development Trust. According to Mr. Howe, Canada is not a member of that Trust at present, although George Bateman is one of its directors representing the United Kingdom. There seems to be some misunderstanding here, because Bateman has shown me a letter from Howe to him dated June 3rd, 1944[48] a copy of which is attached to this letter and which shows that Mr. Howe appointed Bateman to the Committee as a Canadian, not a United Kingdom, representative. Bateman has always considered himself as a Canadian representative, and so have the other members of the Trust.

The changes suggested by Mr. Howe to paragraphs 3 and 4 of the memorandum will, I think be a surprise to the members of the Policy Committee, and will be interpreted by them as an indication of the desire of Canada to contract out of her present membership in the Trust, while retaining full membership in the Policy Committee. I feel pretty sure that the other members of the Policy Committee will demur at this proposal. As I understand it, we are asking them to accept certain obligations in respect of the pooling and control of all supplies of uranium and thorium which we do not desire to accept ourselves. In other words, all supplies required by the United States and the United Kingdom inside or outside their territories will be placed at the disposition of the Combined Development Trust, while Canada merely promises to take measures so far as practicable to secure control and possession of all uranium and thorium deposits situated within its territories and use the production thereof in the common interest.

Incidentally, the additional amendment you propose to the memorandum, namely, the omission of the words "for scientific research, military and humanitarian purposes," will be opposed by the United Kingdom. They are very anxious to have these words included, because they feel that it strengthens their right to have allocations made to them under Section 2 of paragraph 6.

As it happened, there was no necessity at the meeting this afternoon for us to bring these matters forward, as the Anderson-Groves memorandum was referred to a drafting sub-committee, which will discuss its terms and report back to the full committee. General Groves and Roger Makins will be the U.S. and U.K. members of that Committee, while the Canadian member will be myself.

It was made clear at the meeting this afternoon that this memorandum, when approved by the Policy Committee and signed by the heads of governments, will replace the Quebec Agreement. I raised the question of the constitutional effect of an agreement of this kind. Secretary Byrnes is referring the matter to Hackworth of the State Department for advice in so far as the United States is concerned. I think it should also be looked into from our point of view. It is quite clear that a memorandum of agreement of this kind, signed merely by members of the Policy Committee, has no legal effect, but what would be the exact situation if it is signed by the President and two Prime Ministers?

I think I should point out the great emphasis laid this afternoon on the necessity of secrecy in these matters. You can imagine the interest that would be caused if it leaked out that the three governments were negotiating a formal agreement of this kind, justifiable though that arrangement may be in present circumstances. Every possible precaution therefore should be taken here and in Ottawa to avoid any leakage. This will, among other things, necessitate great caution in any request for legal advice.

The activities of the Trust were approved at this afternoon's meeting of the Policy Committee, including an arrangement for an equal division of the cost of purchasing the entire product of the Belgian mines. General Groves stated this afternoon with some satisfaction that, as a result of contracts made and other steps taken, the Trust now controlled some 97 percent of the known and producing sources of uranium in the world; and about 60 percent (I think) of the thorium resources. The United States and the United Kingdom authorities, in fact, seem to have been very successful in building up a monopolistic cartel!

At the meeting this afternoon, Secretary Byrnes was elected as Chairman of the Committee, replacing Secretary of War Patterson. We were asked to submit the name of a Canadian Joint Secretary, and I proposed George Bateman, who was present, and he was duly elected.

At the end of the meeting this afternoon I asked the Chairman, Secretary Byrnes, whether he proposed to use this Committee to discuss questions such as the proper procedure to be adopted in approaching the United Nations on matters arising out of the Washington declaration; specifically the questions raised in our memorandum to him sent on November 30th,[49] copy of which I forwarded to you in our Despatch No. 2811.† Mr. Byrnes thought that this and similar matters should be discussed between the three governments through ordinary diplomatic channels and not through the mechanism of this Committee. It would appear, therefore, that the Combined Policy Committee is not likely to extend its activities as widely as I, for one, had expected.

I feel myself that the whole question of our relationship to this Combined Policy Committee should be given the most careful consideration. If we are in fact in any doubt as to the wisdom of full participation in any of its activities and those of the Trust, might it not be better to withdraw from membership now rather than attempt to limit our obligations as members? I realize that it may now be too late, of course, to withdraw, even if it were desirable, but surely the subject is of such far-reaching importance that the pros and cons of such withdrawal should be given the most careful consideration. This would seem to be the time to do it, before the sub-committee reports back to the full Committee.

Frankly, I feel that, as a junior third party in this Committee, we may be dragged along in directions where we might not desire to go but over which we would have little control. Would it be possible for us to leave the Policy Committee to the two governments chiefly concerned and regulate our association with it by an assurance to those governments along the line of new paragraph 4(a) proposed by Mr. Howe and including the provisions of present paragraphs 1, 2, 5 and 6? This would make it possible for the two members of the Policy Committee to call us into consultation whenever they so desire, but would release us from the responsibility of approving or disapproving all of the decisions taken by the Committee. In other words, our association with the Committee would be somewhat like our association with the Combined Chiefs of Staff here.

As I said above, it may be too late for this now, but I would be glad to get your reaction to the suggestion, based, I admit, on very sketchy knowledge of the origin and activities of the Committee in question and its sub-agency, the Trust. In any event, I think that the amendments which we suggest to the memorandum should be reconsidered in the light of the considerations that I have put forward; and those which are also being put forward in a letter from Bateman to Mr. Howe, a copy of which he has sent to me and which is enclosed.

Yours sincerely,

MIKE [PEARSON]

Le cosecrétaire, le Comité conjoint de là politiqué, au ministre des Munitions et des Approvisionnements et de la Reconstruction

Joint Secretary, Combined Policy Committee, to Minister of Munitions and Supply and of Reconstruction

TOP SECRET [Washington,] December 4, 1945

Dear Mr. Howe,

When I first spoke to you over the phone on Monday with reference to the C.D.T. and the meeting of the C.P.C. on Tuesday, I had not seen either your letter to Pearson or the Anderson-Groves memorandum on which your letter was based. When I spoke to you the second time, I had only read the papers over very hurriedly. Since then I have gone over them more carefully and can readily see the reason for the position taken in your letter.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Anderson-Groves memorandum are badly drafted and could be very readily misconstrued. There also appears to be some confusion about my position on the Trust. I have always considered myself as being there as your representative and therefore as the Canadian representative. This would seem to be confirmed by your letter to me of 3 June, 1944, copy of which is attached. I interpreted the last paragraph of your letter to mean only that we would not be signatories to Trust contracts, as the funds are, and I think should continue to be, supplied by the U.S. and the U.K. My understanding is that Canada became a member of the C.P.C. by virtue of the Quebec Agreement in the fall of 1943 and that the Trust was formed by C.P.C. in the spring of 1944.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Anderson-Groves memorandum might convey the impression that the Trust is to be given more authority than is either intended or desirable. The principal change in the proposed new Trust charter is to extend the authority of the Trust to acquire supplies from the member Governments as well as from the outside areas. I believe that the procedure actually contemplated by these two paragraphs would be as follows:

1. That all uranium and thorium supplies acquired by the three Governments jointly or severally, anywhere in the world, will be subject to allocation by the C.P.C. for use by the Governments for certain definite purposes.

2. All material not so allocated for use will pass into the ownership of the Trust to be held on behalf of member Governments jointly until allocated by the C.P.C.

3. Such stockpile material is not to be purchased directly by the Trust unless it originates in territories outside those of the three Governments. If it originates in the administrative ambit, it would be purchased in the first instance by that member Government and resold to the Trust at cost.

4. Material allocated directly for use by a member Government need not pass through the ownership of the Trust as this would be financially and administratively cumbersome.

It is not proposed that the Trust should, for example, have anything to say about Canadian operations. The Trust could, of course, make recommendations on such matters as the desirability of an extensive exploration and development campaign in Canada but that would be about the limit of the extent to which it could go.

As you will see from 2 and 3 above, it is proposed that the Trust should purchase only unallocated material. It seems to me that there might be some advantage to us in giving the Trust authority to purchase supplies in any or all of the three member countries. Under the present authority of the Trust, if the U.S. were to stop buying from Canada, we would have no place to sell our concentrates. Under the proposed extended authority, if the U.S. stopped buying from us, our market would presumably be with the Trust itself.

It is my understanding that you approve the principle of having all supplies subject to allocation by the C.P.C. Having regard to this, and on the assumption that Canada is in fact a member of the C.D.T. and the further assumption that the proposed enlarged authority of the C.D.T. is to be exercised as I have set out above, I think it would be difficult to write ourselves into the C.P.C. and out of the C.D.T.

I would suggest that before making a final decision on this point we should wait until the drafting subcommittee has prepared a revised and clarified draft of the Anderson-Groves memorandum, which will then be submitted to you for any changes and comments before it goes to the C.P.C. I presume you would want it made clear that acceptance does not involve a natural participation in the C.D.T.

Yours sincerely,

G. C. BATEMAN

Dear Mr. Howe,

At the C.P.C. meeting Tuesday afternoon the Anderson-Groves memorandum was read but there was no discussion because of the understanding that it was simply to act as a framework for the more formal memorandum of agreement to be prepared by the drafting committee, which draft was to be submitted by the C.P.C. for approval. As the drafting Committee will also have to prepare a document to replace the Quebec Agreement, I thought it better that Pearson should be on the drafting committee with Makins and Groves and that I should act as Pearson's adviser.

TELETYPE WA-6132 Washington, December 5, 1945

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. I have just received the following aide-mémoire from the Secretary of State on the procedure to bring the Washington Declaration on Atomic Energy to the United Nations Organization, Begins:

"The Secretary of State has the honor to acknowledge receipt of the Canadian Ambassador's aide-mémoire† concerning the procedure for bringing before the United Nations Organization the proposal, made in the agreed declaration of November 15th on atomic energy, to set up a 'commission under the United Nations Organization to prepare recommendations for submission to the Organization.'

2. The views of the Government of the United States with respect to the proposed commission are in general accord with those expressed by the Canadian Government.[50] In particular, this Government believes that Canada should be given representation on the proposed commission. This Government believes, however, that it would be unwise to attempt to establish in definite form its position on the organization of the commission prior to discussion of the subject with the Soviet Government.

3. It is the opinion of this Government that it would be desirable to discourage the Preparatory Commission from undertaking a detailed discussion of the proposed commission. The United States delegate to the Preparatory Commission has been so informed and has been instructed to take up the matter with his Canadian and British colleagues.

4. The Secretary of State finds it impossible to concur in the view expressed by the Canadian Government with respect to approaching the Soviet Government. This Government considers that it is essential, both for the successful establishment of the proposed commission and for its effective functioning, that its composition and terms of reference be acceptable to the Soviet Government. For this reason, the Government of the United States plans to take up promptly with the Soviet Government the question of the establishment of the proposed commission with a view to obtaining its cooperation in submitting a proposal to the United Nations Organization or at least its concurrence in such a proposal.

5. As the Canadian Ambassador is aware, the Secretary of State transmitted directly to the Foreign Ministers of the Soviet Union, France, and China, the text of the agreed declaration prior to its publication. The replies of the Soviet and Chinese Governments are enclosed for the information of the Canadian Government. No reply has yet been received from the French Government.

6. The United States Government believes that further consideration should be given to possible discussions with the Governments of France and China prior to the meeting of the General Assembly.

7. The Government of the United States is grateful for the views of the Canadian Government with respect to the establishment of the proposed commission under the United Nations Organization, and desires to discuss this matter further with the Canadian Government in the very near future."

2. Copy of reply from Chinese Government.

My dear Mr. Secretary:

I have the honor to transmit the following message dated November 21st, 1945, addressed to you by the Minister for Foreign Affairs:

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Your Excellency's telegram November 15th, 1945, in which you transmitted to me the full text of the joint statement on the control of atomic energy issued by the President of the United States of America, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and the Prime Minister of Dominion Government of Canada. The Chinese Government fully subscribes to the view that the only complete protection for the civilized world from destructive use of scientific knowledge lies in the abolition of war and that this can be brought about only by consolidating and extending the authority of the United Nations Organization. It is to be hoped that the proposed commission will be set up without delay so as to ensure that atomic energy will be diverted from destructive purposes and utilized for peaceful and humanitarian ends.

[Ottawa,] December 7, 1945

Following our conversation last night, I asked Malcolm MacDonald to let his Government know that you thought it would avoid embarrassment for everybody if they were to drop the suggestion that Canada should be associated with the Three-Power talks which are to be held in Moscow next week. At the same time it would be easier for us if the official communiqué announcing the talks did not make specific reference to the control of atomic energy. I also told Mr. MacDonald that, though you fully appreciated the spirit and intention of Mr. Bevin's instruction to Lord Halifax to approach Mr. Byrnes with a view to associating Canada with the conversations, it was felt here that the suggestion that Wilgress could return to Moscow from London, where he is Chairman of the Canadian Delegation to the Preparatory Commission, was perhaps a shade officious.

I then called Mr. J. D. Hickerson of the Department of State in Washington and spoke to him along the lines of my conversation with Mr. MacDonald, without, of course, saying anything about the appropriateness or otherwise of the suggestion about Wilgress. Hickerson undertook to get in touch with his Secretary of State immediately. He called me back in about twenty minutes to say that the communique had been issued at 8 o'clock that evening and that it was therefore not possible to take up our suggestion that no specific reference should be made to control of atomic energy.

Dear Mr. Howe,

We had another meeting of the C.D.T. this morning, and yesterday I had some prior discussions with Hambro and Makins. One of the suggestions which the British had proposed to bring forward at this meeting was that in the case of any material produced in any Empire country which might be sold to the Trust, the sale in the first instance should be to the U.K., and from the U.K. to the Trust. I told them that I was sure that such a proposal would be most unacceptable to Canada and that they should not even raise the point. As a result they dropped the matter.

Last night Hambro raised the financial question. He had in his mind the hope that Canada would share equally with the U.K. the U.K.'s financial commitment to the Trust. I told him that I thought he would be ill-advised to raise this point; that at the present time Canada had spent considerably more in connection with this project than the U.K. had obligated itself for to the Trust, and that such a proposal would be inappropriate until such time as the U.K. had actually spent as much as Canada, even if then. As you know, the U.S. and U.K. agreed to place at the disposal of the Trust the sum of $25,000,000 to be split fifty-fifty. The principal obligation of the Trust is in connection with the Congo contracts, where the British pay their 50% in sterling.

As I advised you, there was no discussion of the Anderson-Groves memorandum at the meeting of the C.P.C. last Tuesday. There was, therefore, no necessity, and in fact no occasion, for mentioning the amendments to the Anderson-Groves memorandum contained in your letter to Pearson. As there appeared to be some confusion on certain points, no mention has been made to the Americans of the possibility of our position being altered. However, I understand that Pearson told Makins something about it and Makins in turn told Hambro and Lee. However, I warned Makins not to say anything to the U.K. until the position on our side had been clearly defined. At this morning's meeting, therefore, I carried on as usual.

During the discussion of the Anderson-Groves memorandum this morning and the method of operation under the proposed new chapter of the C.D.T., I raised the point of what obligation on the part of the Trust there would be to purchase unallocated material, having in mind what our position would be if at any time our contract with the U.S. should not be continued. The British, in the persons of Lee and Hambro, expressed the view that each of the three countries should assume financial responsibility for material produced in their respective countries. This view, if it prevailed, would mean that if our contract with the U.S. was not renewed, Canada would be responsible for stock-piling material which it produced.

I explained to them in considerable detail the various factors and difficulties involved in the operation of the Eldorado property. I also told them that it was not our desire to produce at a high rate, but that if the operation is to be carried on production could not fall below a minimum economic limit. I also told them that if the C.P.C. was to have the right of allocation, and that if at the same time the C.D.T. was not prepared to find a market for any material which might not be allocated, that we might have to reconsider our position with both C.P.C. and C.D.T.

Groves and Harrison both agreed with me that the new charter of the Trust, and the agreed basis of operation by the Trust, should provide that where desired the Trust should find a market for unallocated material and not leave it as an entire charge upon the producing country. The British receded from their view and accepted this suggestion. I should say that in talking privately with Makins and Hambro, particularly at this morning's meeting, I made it clear that I had not had an opportunity of consulting you as to your views, and that I was expressing a personal opinion which might be subject to correction when I heard from you.

I would appreciate your comments and advice.

Yours sincerely,

G. C. BATEMAN

Ottawa, December 11, 1945

Dear George [Bateman],

I have your letters of December 4th and 5th regarding C.P.C. and C.D.T. I think that you now understand why I declined to have anyone initial the Anderson-Groves memorandum.

I feel that Canada should not at this time undertake responsibility for financing the Trust. We have spent some $6,000,000 in purchasing Eldorado and are spending $1,000,000 each year in development work which is bringing excellent results in the way of locating new uranium prospects. It seems to me that if we look after the Canadian source of supply at our own expense, that should be our full share.

I have no particular objection to permitting the Trust to allocate our uranium, particularly should the Trust be willing to undertake to purchase any uranium that we do not sell direct to the United States or the United Kingdom. If the Trust will not give such an undertaking, it seems to me that we should be left free to make our own arrangements. We can never hope to do better that break even with Eldorado and we will be fortunate to do that if the market for radium goes to pieces as now sems likely.

I think that Canada should remain a member of C.P.C., but I am not so concerned about our membership in C.D.T. Should it be decided that the U.K. and U.S. desire to operate the Trust without Canada, I will have no objection. My file indicates that you were named by the British as a desirable member of their side of the Trust and it was my understanding that they desire your membership on account of your wide knowledge of metallurgy in many countries. It was known that you would represent Canada and report to me but it is also a fact that Canada did not ask to be represented on the Trust.

I do not wish to take too narrow a view of Canada's relations to the Trust and therefore I think we should reserve our position until the results of the Drafting Committee are known. The above thoughts are for your guidance as a member of the Drafting Committee. The Prime Minister feels that we should try to be as independent as possible in all these matters, and while I have not discussed details of the Trust with him, I think I am interpreting his feelings correctly. When the work of the Drafting Committee comes to hand, I will take up the matter with him and with my Colleagues in the Cabinet.

You were correct in presuming that I would want it made clear that acceptance of membership in the Trust does not involve financial participation in operations outside Canada.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Bateman,

Thanks for your letter of December 7th after your meeting of the C.D.T. I am sure you appreciate more than before my reluctance in signing the Anderson-Groves memorandum without a great deal more clarification.

I am sure that you and I have a common viewpoint on these matters and I am sure that you will produce an agreement covering the future operations of the Trust that will protect the position of Canada.

I note that other members of the Trust agreed that the Trust should provide a market for unallocated material and not leave it as an entire charge upon the producing country. If this arrangement prevails, I will have no objection to permitting the Trust to allocate all Canadian production not required in Canada; this provided we are not required to assume financial obligation for purchases made outside our three countries.

In any event, the new Trust document will be carefully considered here when it comes to hand.

Yours sincerely,

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. For Immediate action. Following message received late last night from State Department. Byrnes leaves this morning for Moscow. Message Begins:

AIDE-MÉMOIRE

1. The Secretary of State makes further reference to the aide-mémoire dated November 30th, 1945,† from the Canadian Ambassador concerning the procedure for bringing before the United Nations Organization the proposal, made in the agreed declaration of November 15th on atomic energy, to set up a "Commission under the United Nations Organization to prepare recommendations for submission to the Organization," and to the aide-mémoire from the Secretary of State dated December 5th, 1945,[51] in reply thereto.

2. The Government of the United States has given further consideration to the best method of presenting to the Soviet Government its views on the procedure for establishing the Commission and also on the nature of the Commission's authority. A tentative statement of the present views of the United States Government on this subject is forwarded herewith for the information of the Canadian Government. This Government plans to submit this paper to the Soviet Government with a view to obtaining its concurrence as to an agreed line of action. It should be emphasized that, although these views reflect the approach that this Government is taking to this very difficult problem, the draft may be changed before final submission to the Soviet Government in the forthcoming discussions in Moscow. It is, therefore, requested that this statement be regarded as strictly confidential.

3. This Government would be glad to have a statement of any recent views of the Canadian Government on this subject.

PART II

Following are enclosures sent with aide-mémoire quoted in Part 1 of this teletype. Enclosure one, Begins:

Draft Proposals on Atomic Energy for Submission to Soviet Government

It is the earnest desire of the United States to collaborate with other nations for the purpose of developing with the greatest practicable speed international measures to prevent the use for destructive purposes of atomic energy and other means of mass destruction, and to promote the use of atomic energy and other scientific advances for the benefit of mankind.

The President of the United States announced on October 3rd, 1945, that, in furtherance of this purpose, it was the intention of this Government to hold conversations with the other Governments associated with it in the development and use of atomic energy, and subsequently with other Governments. The first step having been taken, it is now desired, as the next step, to hold exploratory conversations with the Soviet Government in regard to this matter which is of such vital importance to the peace and well-being of the peoples of the world.

As the Soviet Government is aware, the Governments of Great Britain, Canada, and the United States believe that a Commission should be established under the United Nations Organization to study the problems raised by the discovery of atomic energy and other related matters and to make recommendations for submission to the Organization. It is the hope of this Government that the Soviet Government will join in the sponsorship of a proposal to this effect at the first meeting of the United Nations in January, 1946. A draft embodying the present views of the Government of the United States as to the method of establishing the Commission is submitted herewith. It is the desire of this Government to have a full exchange of views on this draft and to learn whether the Soviet Government will join in a proposal along these lines.

It is the belief of this Government that the substantive problem presents very difficult questions; in consequence agreed international action is likely to be exceedingly complex and must be based upon careful and earnest study.

The problem appears to this Government to consist of a number of separate although related segments. These segments include:

(1) The ever-widening exchange of scientists and scientific information; and scientific techniques and materials,

(2) The development and exchange of knowledge concerning natural resources,

(3) The exchange of technological and engineering information,

(4) Safeguards against and controls of methods of mass destruction. It is the belief of this Government that successful international action with respect to any phase of the problem is not necessarily a prerequisite for undertaking affirmative action with respect to other phases. Affirmative action should be taken whenever it is likely to be fruitful.

This Government believes that mutually advantageous international action might well be undertaken promptly with respect to the first segment listed above — the exchange of scientists and scientific data. This Government attaches great importance to the development of effective collaboration in all fields of science.

The other segments present very troublesome questions which require for their solution the devising of effective, reciprocal and enforceable safeguards acceptable to all nations. The United States Government does not purport to have the solution to these questions, but it is eager and willing to work with the Soviet Union and other nations toward the establishment, as rapidly as possible, of mutually acceptable arrangements for full collaboration in these areas. To this end the United States Government will be glad to consider such proposals as the Soviet Government may wish to make in respect to any phase of these problems and to discuss them with the Soviet Government both in the United Nations Commission and separately. Enclosure one ends.

Enclosure two, Begins:

Annex

Proposed Recommendation for the Establishment by the United Nations of a Commission to Deal with the Problems Raised by the Discovery of Atomic Energy and Other Related Matters

I. Establishment of the Commission

The Commission should be established by the General Assembly which is the only body, under the terms of the Charter, possessing the authority to examine the entire problem of atomic energy.

II. Reports of the Commission

The reports of the Commission should be made to the General Assembly for transmission to the members of the United Nations, the Security Council, and the Economic and Social Council. The General Assembly should also request action of the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council on those aspects of the reports which require action, and which fall within the respective jurisdiction of those bodies.

III. Composition of the Commission

The Commission should be composed of one representative each of those nations represented on the Security Council, and Canada when that nation is not a member of the Security Council. Each representative on the Commission should have such assistants as he may desire.

IV. Rules of Procedure

The Commission should establish its own rules of procedure. It should choose its own officers, and have whatever staff may be deemed necessary.

V. Terms of Reference of the Commission

The Commission should proceed with the utmost despatch and enquire into all phases of the problem, including the following matters, and make such recommendations from time to time with respect to them as it finds feasible:

(1) Wide exchange of scientists and basic scientific information for peaceful ends,

(2) Further measures to facilitate and promote the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, and the controls necessary to limit its use to such purposes,

(3) The elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and all other weapons capable of mass destruction, and

(4) Effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means for those nations complying with the recommendations of the Commission.

The Commission should not infringe upon the responsibility of any organ of the United Nations, but should present recommendations for the consideration of those organs in the performance of their tasks under the terms of the United Nations Charter.

Enclosure two ends.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires exteriéures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] December 12, 1945

I attach a copy of message WA-6206 of today from the Ambassador in Washington conveying the text of a communication from the Secretary of State which sets forth the proposals he intends to put up to the Soviet Government in Moscow in an effort to secure their concurrence in an agreed submission to the United Nations Organization of the Washington proposals to establish a Commission on atomic problems. Mr. Pearson tells me that this note was delivered to him shortly before midnight last night and that Mr. Byrnes is leaving today for Moscow. If we have any observations to make we should, therefore, submit them promptly, probably through both of our Embassies in Washington and Moscow. The communication says that the United States Government would be glad to have a statement of any recent views of the Canadian Government on the subject. It also states that the text submitted to us is not necessarily the final text to be submitted to the Soviet Government.

The most important part of the communication from our point of view is the second annex containing a draft recommendation to the United Nations. On the whole, this meets quite satisfactorily the points which we have already made to the U.S. and U.K. Governments.

1. The Commission would be established by the Assembly.

2. It would report to the Assembly which would transmit recommendations requiring action by the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council or individual Governments. (We suggested that the Commission might address its reports to either or both of the Assembly and the Security Council, depending on the nature of the recommendations; the present proposal, therefore, keeps the Assembly rather more in the center of the picture than we had suggested.)

3. The Commission would be composed of representatives of the countries on the Security Council, plus Canada when Canada was not sitting on the Council. (This is generally in accordance with our suggestion although we pointed out that it might be undesirable for the membership of the Commission to change automatically as a result of new elections to the Security Council. I doubt, however, whether a preferable formula for the composition of the Commission can be discovered.)

4. The Commission's terms of reference would be those set forth in paragraph 7 of the Washington Declaration with only minor verbal changes. It is made clear that the Commmission would be a recommending body and that the appropriate organs of the United Nations would continue to have responsibility for acting on the Commission's recommendatons.

The proposals with the covering memorandum which is also quoted in the attached message, would be put forward by Mr. Byrnes entirely on his own responsibility and we are not asked to endorse them. The most that I think we need do at this stage is to instruct Mr. Pearson to inform the Department of State that we have no objection to Mr. Byrnes presenting this statement of the views of the United States Government. I doubt that the United Kingdom Government will have much to say in criticism since the proposals follow pretty closely the position taken in Mr. MacDonald's letter to you of November 28th.

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: Reference my WA-6206, December 12th, text of Mr. Byrnes' aide-mémoire on atomic discussions in Russia, which you will have now received. This reached the Embassy last night and I had not had an opportunity to have any discussion with the State Department concerning it or the matters referred to in our aide-mémoire of November 30th to the Secretary on the subject. You will have gathered from today's aide-mémoire that, while the approach on this matter to the U.S.S.R. is by two Governments — U.S. and U.K. — the proposals seem to be unilateral, for the aide-mémoire says that the United States is considering the best method of presenting its, repeat its, views, not the views of the three Governments, to the Soviet.[52] It also refers to the desire of the United States Government to have a full exchange of views with the Soviet Government on this United States draft. In other words, a basis is presented by the United States Government to the Soviet Government for discussion with a view to eventual submission to the United Nations on behalf of three or four Governments. I suppose the United Kingdom, who are more concerned in this aspect of the matter than we are, may seek to get this procedure and form altered.

2. Paragraph 5 of the United States draft proposals enumerates the various segments of the problem and, by enumeration, indicates a priority of treatment, a priority which seems to be confirmed by paragraph 6. This enumeration, however, puts "the exchange of technological and engineering information" ahead of "safeguards and controls." I think this order will please the U.S.S.R., but I wonder whether it is wise. Furthermore, do not the last two sentences of paragraph 5 contradict the first sentence of paragraph 8 of the declaration of November 15th, which suggests that one stage must be completed successfully before the next stage is begun? Considerable importance was attached to this principle during the Washington discussions, but it is weakened, I suppose, by the Byrnes proposals.

3. The proposed recommendation in the Annex seems to me to be reasonably satisfactory, though it does not take into consideration one or two of the points which we had raised previously. Some confusion, however, might be caused by the enumeration of subjects for possible Commission recommendations in Section 5 of the Annex and the enumeration of the various segments of work in paragraph 5 of the proposals, especially as the two lists are not the same in all respects. Ends.

With regard to my earlier memorandum today concerning the proposals which Mr. Byrnes intends to put up to the Soviet Government on questions relating to atomic energy, Pearson has let us know the results of his further consideration of these proposals and of a discussion on them which he has had with Makins of the British Embassy. I need not bother you with his full report as a good deal of it was covered in my memorandum of this morning. There is one new point of importance, however. This related to the paragraphs which appear at the top of page 4 of Pearson's message WA-6206. He points out that this page begins by enumerating the various segments of the problem and indicating by the order employed the priority in which they should be treated. This priority would put the exchange of technological and engineering information ahead of safeguards against and controls of methods of mass destruction, whereas the basis of the Washington Agreement was that the controls and safeguards must be developed before full engineering and technological information was made available to other countries. Pearson, furthermore, points out that the Washington Declaration laid down that each stage of the work of the Commission should be successfully completed before the next stage was undertaken and this principle does not seem to be adequately expressed in Mr. Byrnes' draft.

He tells me that the British Ambassador is telegraphing London urgently on this point to which he attaches considerable importance. We can, therefore, probably safely leave it to the United Kingdom to bring it to Mr. Byrnes' attention before he presents his proposals in Moscow. We should also [sic], however, comment on it ourselves to the State Department if you so desire. In order to be sure that our comments are received in time, they should be presented tomorrow.

I have your letter of December 12th,† in which you advise that you have adopted an arrangement with United States authorities whereby British scientists working on atomic energy may be free to disclose information, providing that the disclosure is made to persons authorized to receive such information as being essential to them in the course of their work.

I am quite agreeable to the application of the same principle as regards British scientists working on the Canadian team in Canada.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] December 14, 1945

In light of the discussion between the Under-Secretary, Mr. Bateman and myself yesterday evening and the discussion the previous evening with Dean Mackenzie and Mr. Heeney I telephoned to Mr. Pearson this morning to indicate the general line which we thought he might take at the Drafting Committee's meeting today. I suggested that while he need not present the exact text of the amendments by Mr. Howe to the Groves-Anderson draft he should indicate that the Canadian position with respect to the operations of the C.D.T. was different from that of the other two members, especially in view of the fact that we were the only producers among the three of the materials. In consequence, the provision that we should share equally in the purchasing operations of the C.D.T. would not be acceptable to us.

I told him that we understood from Bateman that a further draft on this aspect would be produced by General Groves at the Drafting Committee. This draft, in the preparation of which Bateman had had a hand, would define the position of Canada more accurately. I suggested that he should stall on indicating his own approval of any draft and told him that before any agreement could be made we had a good deal of work to do here in clearance with the Ministers concerned. I said it might turn out to be advisable that there should be two separate documents, one on the C.P.C. in which we wished to continue to participate on approximately the present footing, and the other on the C.D.T. recognizing our special position.

Perhaps the gist of this may be said to be that Pearson was not to press for a position which would be equivalent to our "contracting out" from the C.D.T. so long as our special relationship with it was spelled out. I said that we had at this stage no particular objection to the paragraphs of the draft agreement which related to the C.P.C. itself although we should undoubtedly want to consider these further before any agreement was signed on our behalf.

I did not touch on the legal question raised in his letter[53] which I consider is not particularly important. In any case, the U.S. will make the running on this.

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Your messages WA-6206 and 6210 of December 12th. The Prime Minister has considered the Aide-Mémoire quoted in your WA-6206 and the draft annexes which the Secretary of State intends to present to the Soviet Government. He has also considered the criticism of the first annex made in paragraph 2 of your WA-6210. In the light of the Washington discussions he feels that a certain amount of exchange of technological and engineering information must take place before international safeguards and controls can be agreed upon, or at any rate as part of the same process of negotiation. He, therefore, considers it unnecessary for us to bring this point to the notice of the Secretary of State although he agrees that it would be desirable for the proposals submitted to the Soviet Government to follow as closely as possible the language of the Washington Declaration of November 15th.

2. In these circumstances the only reply you need make to the Aide-Mémoire of November 11th from the Department of State is to say that the Government of Canada does not desire to offer any comments on the draft proposals which the Secretary of State intends to present to the Soviet Government on behalf of the Government of the United States. L'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET Washington, December 14, 1945

Dear Norman [Robertson]:

I have just returned from the first meeting of the sub-committee of General Groves, Roger Makins and myself, appointed by the Combined Policy Committee to prepare a draft of an Agreement on atomic energy to replace that signed at Quebec; as well as a new Agreement and Declaration setting up the Combined Development Trust.

General Groves is an energetic administrator with, I gather, some suspicion of diplomats and all "unpractical" people. He is also, I fear, inclined to think that things like international agreements and the drafting thereof are less important than effective measures to maintain the lead already secured by the United States in the development of atomic energy. I hope I am not being unfair to him, but I received a fairly definite impression that he is more concerned with the national than the international aspects of this matter and with the military more than industrial uses of atomic energy.

It was clear that he was quite willing to begin drafting at once the two documents for immediate submission to the Combined Policy Committee. This did not suit Makins or myself. We wished to have a more general discussion of the form and purpose of the Agreements and return to the drafting of it [sic] at a subsequent meeting. You will be aware of my special reasons for this attitude. I really had very little to go on in respect to the Canadian attitude. I was not even certain whether the amendments proposed by Mr. Howe in his letter to me dated November 30th[54] were to be maintained, though I gathered from Hume this morning that this was not to be the case. I was further handicapped at this meeting by not having a copy of the original Agreement and Declaration of Trust or a copy of the minutes of the last meeting,† which, according to General Groves, had been sent to Mr. Bateman. I was, therefore, in hearty support of Makins when he suggested that we first talk about general principles and then, if necessary, give the two documents only a first reading at this meeting. So far as general principles are concerned, the U.K. and U.S. feel that what is required is an Executive Agreement to be signed by the President and the two Prime Ministers; or, rather, two, one dealing with the Combined Policy Committee and one dealing with the Combined Development Trust. The Americans feel, however, that an Agreement of this kind is a binding inter-governmental one. I assume, therefore, that the Canadian signature would have to be authorized by Order-in-Council. Groves himself seems to have preferred a Treaty to a Memorandum of Agreement, a preference which seems to indicate somewhat his inexperience in international politics. A Treaty along the lines of the Draft Memorandum which is now being considered would, of course, have to be made public and receive congressional approval. It is difficult to contemplate this with equanimity in present circumstances.

We then took a look at the former Trust Agreement. I brought up the question of our position and said that we were quite satisfied with our present relationship to the Trust. The other two, however, thought that it would be most unfortunate if Canada did not sign the new Agreement. Groves, in fact, thought that if we were going into the Combined Policy Committee, we would have to become full members of the Combined Development Trust, especially as the latter Agreement will provide for the appointment and removal of members of the Trust by the Policy Committee. Groves added that he had always assumed that Bateman was already a member of the Trust for Canada and that all that was required was an alteration of the new Agreement to make that membership as valid in theory as it was in practice. He said that Bateman's participation in the work had been most valuable and that the Americans would regret very much our withdrawal. Makins echoed this. I replied that I would be in a position to let them know at the next meeting whether we would participate in the signature of the new Declaration of Trust, but I added that I could tell them at once that if we did, it would be on the basis that no new financial commitments of any kind were involved. They both accepted this.

I think myself that if we are to remain on the Combined Policy Committee, we will also have to become formally members of the Combined Development Trust.

We then looked at the Memorandum of Agreement[55] which is to replace the Quebec Agreement. A few changes of form were suggested to it, though nothing of substance. They will be embodied in a second draft, which Makins will put together and which I shall be able to telegraph to you next week, by which time I hope that our policy in respect of this matter will be somewhat more definite than it is at present.

I suggested the omission of "for scientific research, military and humanitarian purposes" in paragraph 4. This was opposed both by Groves and Makins. Apparently there had been a great deal of argument before these words were included and they did not wish to re-open the question. I can, however, revert to this matter, if you so desire, when the draft reaches the full Committee.

In paragraph 1, I also suggested that, if there were wider international arrangements outlawing the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes, it would be a little anomalous to sanction its use in this Agreement after consultation between the three governments. The paragraph will therefore be revised by including some such words as "pending the conclusion of an international Agreement governing the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes," etc.

Groves and Makins had considerable discussion of the present draft of paragraph 5. Makins said that his people were a little worried lest this by implication meant that there would not be full co-operation and exchange of information in this field unless it could be shown to be "mutually advantageous". He wanted it, therefore, to be made clear that "mutually advantageous" applied only to the words "ad hoc arrangements" which preceded them. Groves, while he agreed with this interpretation, at the same time made it quite clear that the United States authorities did not necessarily intend to provide either the United Kingdom or Canada with all the information in their possession in the field of "development, design, construction and operation of plants." He was afraid that if they did this, some of the information might leak out, and that therefore the U.K. and Canada would have to justify as "mutually advantageous" each particular request for information.

The next meeting of the sub-committee will probably be a week from today, when the two documents will be formally passed for submission to the full Committee.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for the Ambassador from Wrong begins: Your letter of December 14th. We are not able to give you any further instructions for your guidance at the meeting of the Drafting Committee of the Combined Policy Committee which may take place tomorrow. Mr. Howe had left for Bermuda long before your letter arrived and there has been no opportunity of discussing the position with the Prime Minister who is away from Ottawa today.

2. I think, therefore, that your best course is to try to secure the adoption by the Drafting Committee of proposals in the form which seems most acceptable to you in the light of the views we have expressed and of the further information which Bateman is able to give you after his visit last week to Ottawa. Thus, you might agree to submit to Ministers here for their consideration proposals which provide for our association with the trust on the understanding that no new financial commitments were involved. We have not, ourselves, seen in the Department the original agreement and declaration of trust relating to this body.

3. With regard to the memorandum of agreement suggested to replace the Quebec agreement, it would seem to be necessary to make a change of substance in Paragraph 3, spelling out our special relationship to the trust, if we are not to assume any new financial responsibility. You need not press against strong opposition for the omission of the words in Paragraph 4 which we desire to exclude. I think that there is a good deal to be said for the suggestion you made which is reported in the fourth paragraph on Page 3 of your letter.[56]

4. If it is intended that the documents emerging from the Drafting Committee are to be signed by the Heads of Governments, it is obvious that there must be an opportunity for further consideration so that revisions may be suggested, if necessary, when they come before the C.P.C. You should take the line that the Drafting Committee is framing proposals of high importance for the consideration of the three governments. I think it would be a good idea if you could come yourself to Ottawa in the interval between the preparation of the drafts and their consideration by the C.P.C. Bateman might profitably accompany you.

5. I am afraid that this message is not vey helpful but it is the best we can manage at present. Ends.

Mémorandum du chef, la première direction politique[57]

Memorandum by Head, First Political Division[57]

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] December 20, 1945

MEMORANDUM ON THE DECLARATION OF NOVEMBER 15TH ON ATOMIC ENERGY

The purpose of establishing an Atomic Energy Commission under the United Nations Organization is set forth in paragraph 7 of the Declaration in the following words:

"In order to attain the most effective means of entirely eliminating the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes and promoting its widest use for industrial and humanitarian purposes, we are of the opinion that at the earliest practicable date a commission should be set up under the United Nations Organization to prepare recommendations for submission to the Organization."

This statement, therefore, puts emphasis on the complete elimination of atomic weapons as the main purpose of the Commission.

On the other hand, it is stated in the Declaration that the Commission should make specific proposals "for the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction." It will be noticed such weapons are to be eliminated only from national armaments. There was some discussion during the Washington meeting as to whether specific reference should be made to the possibility of turning atomic weapons over to the United Nations to be used only on orders from the Security Council and against an aggressor. President Truman, however, did not favour this course, as he thought that it was undesirable to recognize the use in any way of atomic weapons.

[56]La référence concerne le huitième paragraphe du document précédent.
Reference is to the eighth paragraph of the preceding document.

Moreover, the President adhered to the idea that atomic warfare should be prohibited and that any nation engaging in it should be outlawed.

The inclusion of the idea of the total prohibition of the use of atomic weapons and their exclusion from the armaments at the disposal of the Organization for keeping the peace has introduced into the Declaration confusion both of language and of purpose.

The following questions suggest themselves in connection with this all important point and should be clarified before the Atomic Energy Commission is set up.

(1) The Atomic Energy Commission is to make proposals for the elimination not only of atomic weapons but of "all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction" from national armaments. These other weapons are not defined. What the authors of the Declaration may have had in mind is the possibility of the development of new and still more terrible weapons in the future, but among weapons already in existence which are capable of mass destruction would, no doubt, be included bomber planes and rockets, as well as poison gas and bacteriological means of destruction. Incidentally, it is perhaps worth noticing that mass destruction is made the criterion for the abolition of weapons and that there is no mention of peculiarly cruel weapons which do not inflict mass destruction, e.g., flame throwers.

The conception of the continued existence of national armies which have renounced the principal weapons of modern warfare is unconvincing, nor is the experience of past disarmament conferences encouraging. The fine distinction between different types of weapons with the object of eliminating those which are adaptable to mass destruction presents endless opportunities for evasion by states unwilling to reduce their war potential. There is the obvious further danger that such states would be tempted to concentrate on building up those branches of peacetime industry which can readily be converted to the production of these weapons.

(2) It is clear from President Truman's statement at the Washington meeting that he does not contemplate that the United Nations Organization should have at its disposal the instruments of atomic warfare. It is not clear, however, whether other weapons of modern warfare, such as squadrons of bombers, are also to be eliminated from the armaments at the disposal of the Organization for the maintenance of peace. Presumably this must be contemplated as such weapons would be eliminated from the national armaments of member states, and the forces at the disposal of the Organization will be composed of contingents drawn from national armed forces.

(3) As a result of a decision that the United Nations Organization is not to have at its disposal the major weapons of modern warfare, there might well arise a complete paralysis of the Organization's effective power to maintain peace. It will be recalled that great emphasis has been laid by those who framed the Charter of the United Nations Organization on the importance of the Organization having at its command overwhelming force. This realistic basis of the authority of the Organization was widely acclaimed as an advance on the League of Nations. But if the Organization does not possess modern weapons of mass warfare, it will not possess this essential element of overwhelming force. The authors of the Atomic Energy Declaration have themselves recognized, in paragraph 3 of the Declaration, that "no system of safeguards that can be devised will of itself provide an effective guarantee against production of atomic weapons by a nation bent on aggression." It is surely an unavoidable consequence of this statement that the Organization itself should have atomic weapons at its disposal.

It may be argued that so long as the veto power of permament members of the Security Council exists no purpose would be served by the Organization having atomic weapons at its command, because an individual member of the Security Council could always veto their employment against an aggressor. But this argument applies to any force placed at the disposal of the Security Council. It has always been recognized that a permament member could by its veto paralyse the enforcement provisions of the Charter, but this fact did not prevent the provision of armed forces to be employed by the Organization against aggressors. Atomic weapons are only another form of force.

During the Washington discussions agreement seems to have been reached on the principle of the prohibition of atomic warfare, but there was also agreement that prohibition alone was worse than useless as it merely gave a feeling of false security without doing anything to make that security effective. If it is admitted that an aggressive state will, despite all possible safeguards, be able to produce atomic weapons, then for the Organization itself to renounce such weapons is to make plain to the world its naked incapacity to deal with the most dangerous form of aggression. Such a decision would offer a standing invitation to any aggressor to proceed with the secret production of atomic weapons in the certainty that the Organization of peace loving states will have only relatively obsolete armaments at its command.

The prohibition of atomic weapons combined with safeguards which can never be completely adequate to prevent the production and use of these weapons by an aggressor affords no guarantee of the power of the Organization to maintain world security. The Organization must, as the architects of the Charter understood, be armed with overwhelming force, and force in the modern world will reside in the possession of atomic weapons and other weapons of mass destruction. It follows that while every effort should be made to eliminate these weapons from national armaments, they should be retained by the Organization. It may also follow that such weapons should be entrusted to a genuinely international army-air force responsible to the Organization. This would be the first step in the direction indicated by the Prime Minister in his speech in the House of Commons on December 17th when he spoke of "some form of world government restricted at least at the outset to matters pertaining to the prevention of war and the maintenance of international security."

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET. Your telegram No. 249 of December 19th.† We received from the United States State Department on December 11th the original draft of the United States Government's proposals for communication to the Soviet Government concerning the establishment of a United Nations Commission on atomic questions.[58] Since the draft recommendation met on the whole our point of view as communicated to your High Commissioner here on November 29th and since we would not be taking part in the Moscow discussions of these matters, we have confined ourselves to informing the United States Government that we do not desire to offer any comments on the draft proposals which the Secretary of State intends to present to the Soviet Government on behalf of the Government of the United States.

2. A comparison of the draft of December 11th with the revised draft[59] quoted in your telegrams 250† and 251† shows that Mr. Byrnes has decided to follow the language of the Washington Declaration of November 15th with much greater fidelity. We consider this an improvement as otherwise there might be a tendency on the Soviet side to argue that the proposals presented in Moscow bore at certain points a different interpretation to the Washington Declaration.

3. We do not, however, regard ourselves as being in any way precluded from making further comments and suggestions on the form and substance of the recommendations to be placed before the United Nations Organization.

Dear Hume [Wrong],

I am sending to you herewith some "atomic"[60] documents which I have received from Roger Makins. Fortunately we did not have our meeting yesterday as General Groves was out of town and will not now be back before Christmas. Pending more specific instructions I shall be guided by your teletype EX-4278 of December 20. It would be helpful, however, to have a policy decision as soon as possible, whether we are to participate in the work of the two agencies in question. As you know, I have some doubts about the wisdom of such participation, but after further consideration I think it would be difficult for us to withdraw now from the Combined Policy Committee. That being the case, I think we will also have to accept membership in the Combined Development Trust.

I do not think that I am supposed to send copies of these documents to you, but I am taking that risk because there is not much likelihood of your securing them from any other sources. They are, of course, not for circulation.

I should add that I saw Roger Makins this morning about this matter and he indicated that London would probably have some further suggestions to make to the Combined Policy Committee draft declaration. They are, I gather, not quite happy about paragraph 4, the pledge of cooperation.[61]

Yours sincerely,

1. We are informed from London that the final comuniqué of the Moscow meeting will contain the text of the recommendation which the three Foreign Ministers have agreed to sponsor at the General Assembly. This is being submitted to the Chinese, French and Canadian Governments in the hope that they will also act as sponsors. I am not telegraphing the text to you as you will get it from the communiqué.

2. You will note that the principal change made at Soviet insistence has been to place the Commission under the general direction of the Security Council rather than the Assembly. On the other hand Mr. Molotov has agreed to the inclusion of language based on paragraph 8 of the Washington Declaration concerning procedure by separate stages. (Mr. Byrnes explained that this had been inadvertently omitted from his original paper).

3. We should like your views (as an atomic expert) on the acceptability of the recommendation. Since we have always felt that the Commission should have much the same composition as the Security Council, I am inclined to think that it will not hamper unduly its activities for it to be placed under the Security Council, although this undoubtedly will leave more openings for the use of the veto as a method of bargaining both in framing and carrying out recommendations of the Commission.

Sir:

I have the honour to transmit to you the following communication from the Secretary of State of the United States of America:[62]

"The Governments of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom and United States of America consider that it is of the highest importance to establish without delay a commission under the United Nations Organization to study and make recommendations upon the vital problems raised by the discovery of atomic energy and other related matters. The three governments believe that the initiative for the establishment of this commission should be taken by the five permanent members of the Security Council of the United Nations together with Canada, as partner in the development of atomic energy. They consider that this initiative could best take the form of a resolution to be placed on the agenda of the first meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations, which is due to be held in London in January next.

For this purpose the three governments recommend the following text:

'Resolved by the General Assembly of the United Nations to establish a commission, with the composition and competence set out hereunder, to deal with the problem raised by the discovery of atomic energy and other related matters.

I. Establishment of the commission.

A commission is hereby established by the General Assembly with the terms of reference set out under Section 5 below.

II. Relations of the commission with the organs of the United Nations.

(a) The Commission shall submit its reports and recommendations to the Security Council, and such reports and recommendations shall be made public unless the Security Council, in the interests of peace and security, otherwise directs. In the appropriate cases the Security Council should transmit these reports to the General Assembly and the members of the United Nations, as well as to the Economic and Social Council and other organs within the framework of the United Nations.

(b) In view of the Security Council's primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Security Council shall issue directions to the Commission in matters affecting security. On these matters the Commission shall be accountable for its work to the Security Council.

III. Composition of the Commission.

The Commission shall be composed of one representative from each of those states represented on the Security Council, and Canada when that state is not a member of the Security Council. Each representative on the Commission may have such assistants as he may desire.

IV. Rules of Procedure.

The Commission shall have whatever staff it may deem necessary, and shall make recommendations for its rules of procedure to the Security Council, which shall approve them as a procedural matter.

V. Terms of Reference of the Commission.

The Commission shall proceed with the utmost dispatch and inquire into all phases of the problem, and make such recommendations from time to time with respect to them as it finds possible. In particular the Commission shall make specific proposals:

(a) for extending between all nations the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends;

(b) for control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to ensure its use only for peaceful purposes;

(c) for the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction;

(d) for effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and evasions.

The work of the Commission should proceed by separate stages, the successful completion of each of which will develop the necessary confidence of the world before the next stage is undertaken. The Commission shall not infringe upon the responsibilities of any organ of the United Nations, but should present recommendations for the consideration of those organs in the performance of their tasks under the terms of the United Nations Charter.'

In my capacity as chairman of the meeting at which the foregoing was agreed, I have the honour to extend on behalf of the Governments of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom and United States of America a cordial invitation to the Government of Canada to join with them in sponsoring the above resolution. In order that the necessary steps may be taken to place this draft resolution on the agenda of the General Assembly, the three Governments would be grateful to receive an early reply to this invitation.

A similar invitation is being extended to the Governments of France and China."

Accept etc.

TELETYPE WA-6431 Washington, December 28, 1945

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: Your EX-4310, December 26th, proposal for establishment of United Nations Atomic Commission. The Moscow communiqué states that we are to be asked to sponsor this proposal. I assume this means that if we accept sponsorship, we will have to support the proposal in all its details. Some of these details, however, will undoubtedly cause considerable discussion and some objection at the proposed Assembly. The United States original recommendation,[63] for instance, correctly states that the General Assembly is the only Body under the terms of the Charter with the authority to examine the entire problem of atomic energy and that the reports of any Commission set up by the General Assembly should be made to the Assembly. In spite of this, the Moscow recommendation states that the Commission should report to the Security Council even though it is a Commission set up by the Assembly. This procedure will not, of course, find favour with many members of the Assembly. Furthermore, the reports of the Commission are to be made public only when the Security Council approves of this and are to be transmitted to the General Assembly only "in appropriate cases". Presumably any permanent member of the Security Council could veto either publicity or transmission. I think there is a good deal to be said for putting the Commission under the Security Council, but even more to be said for making its reports, without exception, available to the Assembly for its information. If this cannot be done under the Moscow recommendation, and if we are a sponsor of that recommendation, are we thereby prevented from supporting proposals in the forthcoming Assembly to ensure that the Assembly shall be given unfettered right to discuss every aspect of the control of atomic energy? I hope not. Sponsorship of this Moscow proposal, then, which in the circumstances it would be difficult to refuse, may mean either

(a) supporting certain detailed points on which we may have some doubts and about which we were not consulted, or

(b) sitting back and letting the three sponsors who drafted the proposals bear the responsibility of justifying them to the Assembly. Neither course is an attractive one.

2. Section 4 of the proposal deals with Rules of Procedure. Apparently the Security Council is to approve of these by a non-veto majority. It should be possible, therefore, to have these rules provide that no member of the Commission shall exercise a veto over its decisions.

3. I would not have you think from the above that I do not realize that the acceptance by the U.S.S.R. of this proposal for the establishment of an Atomic Commission is a very considerable achievement, even though it does not commit the U.S.S.R. to anything except the establishment of the Commission with agreed terms of reference. Some of the radio commentators within the last twenty-four hours speak as if international control of atomic energy is already established. That battle remains to be fought, but nevertheless a good beginning has been made. All I am worried about is that by our sponsorship of the proposal we will be unable to initiate, or possibly even approve, amendments to it which would improve it. Ends.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] December 29, 1945

With regard to the agreement reached at Moscow concerning the Commission on atomic questions, I attach the following papers:

1. A copy of Mr. Atherton's note of December 27th in which we are invited to join in sponsoring the resolution prepared at Moscow.

2. A copy of message WA-6431 of December 28th from Mr. Pearson in Washington commenting on the acceptability of this resolution from the Canadian point of view.

3. A draft reply to Mr. Atherton† for your consideration.

4. Notes on the Canadian reply which might be communicated verbally to Mr. Atherton when he is handed the formal answer.

Pearson's comments on the possible difficulties in our sponsoring the resolution at the Assembly raise a real problem. We should not, in agreeing to act as sponsor, so tie our hands that we cannot support a reasonable attempt to clarify the language of the Moscow draft. Unless some clarification is made, there is a danger that the individual veto of the great powers may cast its influence over the treatment of its reports and recommendations in the Security Council.

Our formal reply will be communicated by Mr. Byrnes to the U.K. and Soviet Governments. The informal commentary which might accompany it need, I think, be given only to Washington and London.

There is a fair degree of urgency about answering since the resolution must be placed on the agenda of the Assembly under the draft rules not less than six days before the opening date of January 10th.

SECRET [Ottawa,] December 29, 1945

Although we are ready to accept the resolution which has been drafted by the Foreign Ministers in Moscow concerning the constitution of the United Nations Commission on atomic questions, this decision has not been reached without some misgiving. In Mr. Byrnes' original draft of this resolution, which was annexed to the Aide-Mémoire sent to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington by the Secretary of State on December 11th, it was stated — in our view accurately — that the General Assembly was "the only body, under the terms of the Charter, possessing the authority to examine the entire problem of atomic energy." In the course of the Moscow discussions, however, the Commission although to be established by the General Assembly has been subordinated to the Security Council in its operations.

We are gratified that agreement was reached at Moscow with the Soviet Government to seek a solution of the problems created by the discovery of atomic energy on the lines set forth in the Washington Declaration of November 15th and we consider that it has been a considerable achievement to secure the acceptance by the Soviet Government of the establishment of the Commission with these terms of reference. A good beginning has thus been made.

We are, however, somewhat disturbed lest the language employed in Section II of the draft resolution might result in limiting or even blocking the usefulness of the Commission through the exercise of the power of veto in the Security Council by one of its permament members. Since the Commission is to be set up by the Assembly, there is likely to be objection in that body to the acceptance of the resolution without some clarification of its terms in this respect. This objection seems likely to center on two questions:

1. Could a permanent member of the Security Council block the publication of the reports and recommendations of the Commission?

Since under the draft the Security Council would have to direct that publication should not take place (publication failing such direction presumably being automatic), it may be that the individual veto would not operate on such a motion.

2. Could a permanent member of the Security Council block the transmission of such reports and recommendations to the Assembly, to Member Governments and to other organs of the United Nations?

It would appear that this could be done unless it is recognized that the transmission of reports and recommendations to other bodies is a procedural matter. The final sentence of the resolution providing that the Commission should present recommendations for the consideration of organs of the United Nations in the performance of their tasks under the Charter would seem to support the view that this question of transmission of reports to other bodies is a question of procedure.

There is perhaps not a great danger that the veto power would be directly employed to prevent the publication or transmission of reports of the Commission. Unless, however, it is understood that the veto power cannot be so employed, its existence would be certain to affect both the consideration of the Commission's reports in the Security Council and the actual work of the Commission itself. If a single member of the Commission were in a position to say that his Government would not accept such and such a proposal and would employ its veto if included in a report, he could exercise an undue influence within the Commission. In such connections the long shadow of the veto power might obscure the real issues and exercise a more important effect on the results than the actual casting of a negative vote in the Security Council.

We have, therefore, felt it desirable to place our understandings on record. Should there be a strong demand in the General Assembly for the amendment of the resolution to make clear the points in question, we do not wish the Canadian delegation to be placed in a position in which it could not support the insertion of clarifying language because of the fact that the Canadian Government is one of the joint sponsors of the resolution.

Memorandum by Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] December 29, 1945

Mr. Pearson told me on the telephone yesterday that there had been a meeting that day of the Drafting Committee of the C.P.C. at which draft agreements had been prepared for further consideration covering the constitution of the C.P.C. and the functions of the C.D.T. He said that he and Mr. Bateman both felt that these new drafts sufficiently safeguarded the Canadian position in view of the reservations which we had expressed about the relationship of Canada to the C.D.T.

He also said that he thought it would be possible to stall further action on these documents for a while, so that they could be considered, before being submitted to the C.P.C., by Mr. Howe after his return from the West Indies. I suggested that he should bring the drafts to Ottawa himself so that he could explain them fully to the Prime Minister and Mr. Howe before they were formally laid before the C.P.C. He agreed that this would be a good method of procedure. He will in the meantime send up the drafts by bag.

TOP SECRET Washington, December 29, 1945

Dear Hume [Wrong]:

We had a second meeting yesterday morning of the drafting committee working on the Memorandum of Agreement to replace the Quebec Atomic Policy Agreement. General Groves was not in a very good mood, as he felt that the Moscow decisions announced that morning had sold the United States out to the U.S.S.R. in so far as atomic energy was concerned. His views on international affairs — or most of them — are worthy of the "Times Herald."

Roger Makins produced a second draft Memorandum of Agreement embodying suggestions made at our first meeting and one or two additional ones sent from London. That second draft is attached to this letter as Annex 1. We went over it paragraph by paragraph.

Preamble. General Groves thought that the first "WHEREAS" paragraph might be removed, and I supported him in this. I think the phrase "fruitful in its results" might be open to ironic misinterpretation. The rest of the preamble remains unchanged.

Paragraph 1. The underlined words were included to meet a point I made at the earlier meeting. They are, however, not quite satisfactory in this regard as they seem to assume the possibility of a wider agreement, not only on control and prohibition of atomic weapons, but also over their use. This was not intended, but it was agreed that the wrong impression might be created by the words as they now stand. We decided, therefore, to cover this point, and also a similar point in paragraph 4, which refers to allocation of supplies for military purposes, by putting a new paragraph at the beginning of the Memorandum which makes all its recommendations subject to any wider international agreement to which the three Governments may become parties, for the control or prohibition of atomic weapons.

Paragraph2. We had some discussion over this. I pointed out that as it now stands, any one of the three Governments could disclose any information concerning atomic energy to another government without prior agreement with the other signatories to the Agreement. The only obligation is to consult. General Groves, however, said that this was done deliberately as it was felt that there might be certain occasions when agreement to disclose information would be impossible and yet one Government might wish to do so.

Paragraph 3 was accepted as re-drafted.

Paragraph 4 caused considerable discussion and in its new form should meet our point that the Combined Development Trust will purchase from us all uranium supplies which we produce on the basis of the policy laid down by the Combined Committee, with the exception of those supplies allocated directly to us. I have not yet shown this paragraph to Bateman, but I think it will meet with his approval.

Paragraph 5 in its re-drafted form was unacceptable to General Groves. The U.K. Government attach great importance to a specific commitment for full and effective co-operation between the three Governments in the whole field of atomic development. If this can be accepted in principle, they are willing to qualify the implementation of the principle by the words of the second sentence. General Groves, however, prefers the earlier paragraph and remains opposed to any wider pledge of co-operation. However, he has agreed to re-examine the matter. I suspect, however, that we will have to submit both drafts of this paragraph to the Combined Policy Committee and let them choose.

Paragraph 6. No change.

We also agreed that there should be a tie-up between the draft Memorandum of Agreement and the draft Declaration of Trust by a reference to the latter in the former.

In so far as the draft Declaration of Trust is concerned, there is a change in paragraph 2, section (e). General Groves does not like the obligation expressed therein for the Trust to "undertake the treatment and disposal" etc. He is going to attempt to re-draft this, making the obligation a little less specific. He does not want to get the Trust into the business of refining.

There is also a consequential change required in the Declaration of Trust if the amendments to paragraph 4 of the Memorandum of Agreement are accepted. That change and a further less important change is attached to this letter as Annex II.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

WHEREAS the association of the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada in the development of atomic energy during the second world war was fruitful in its results; and

WHEREAS the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the Prime Minister of Canada have expressed the desire that there should be full and effective cooperation between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada in the field of atomic energy;

The Government of the United States, the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the Government of Canada are agreed as follows:

1. Subject to any wider agreements to which they may subsequently become parties, the three Governments will not use atomic weapons against other parties without prior consultation with each other;

2. The three Governments agree not to disclose any information to or enter into negotiations concerning atomic energy with other governments or authorities or persons in other countries except in accordance with agreed common policy or after due prior consultation with one another;

3. The three Governments will take measures so far as practicable to secure control and possession, by purchase or otherwise, of all deposits of uranium and thorium situated in areas comprising the United States, its territories or possessions, the United Kingdom and its Colonial dependencies, and Canada. They will also, jointly and severally, as may be appropriate, use every endeavour with respect to the remaining territories of the British Commonwealth and other countries to acquire all available supplies of uranium ores and concentrates and thorium minerals. All supplies thus acquired will be subject to allocation by the Combined Policy Committee.

4. Such supplies as are not allocated for these purposes shall be offered for sale to the Combined Development Trust which will hold the supplies thus purchased on behalf of the three Governments jointly. The disposal of these supplies shall be determined by the Combined Policy Committee at a later date in the light of the then existing conditions and on a fair and equitable basis. Supplies in the ownership of the Trust allocated to one of the three Governments will be resold to that Government by the Trust.

4. (a) The Combined Policy Committee will discuss and settle the policy to be followed in the mining and producing of uranium ores and concentrates and thorium minerals, and the Combined Development Trust will not be obliged to purchase supplies mined and produced otherwise than in accordance with the policy thus laid down.

5. There shall be full and effective cooperation between the three Governments in regard to the exchange of information concerning the development of atomic energy. Insofar as such exchange relates to the development, design, construction and operation of plants, its implementation shall be regulated by ad hoc arrangements approved by the Combined Policy Committee.

6. The Combined Policy Committee, already established and constituted so as to provide equal representation to the United States on the one hand and to the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada on the other, shall carry out the policies provided for, subject to the control of the respective governments. To this end, the Committee shall:

1. Review from time to time the general programme of work being carried out in the three countries.

2. Allocate materials in accordance with the principles set forth in the fourth paragraph above.

3. Settle any questions which may arise concerning the interpretation and application of arrangements regulating cooperation between the three Governments.

667. DEA/74-M-40

Le directeur par intérim, le Bureau international du Travail, au ministre du Travail

Acting Director, International Labour Office, to Minister of Labour

Montreal, January 19, 1944

Sir,

1. I have the honour to confirm my telegram,† despatched from London on 20 December 1943,† by which I communicated to you the decision of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, at its Ninety-first Session (London, December 1943) to convene the XXVIth Session of the International Labour Conference on 20 April 1944.

2. Agenda of the Conference

I have also to confirm that the Agenda of the Conference adopted by Governing Body, as communicated to you by my aforesaid telegram, is as follows:

I. Future policy, programme and status of the International Labour Organisation.
II. Recommendations to the United Nations for present and post-war social policy.
III. The organisation of employment in the transition from war to peace.
IV. Social security: Principles, and problems arising out of the war.
V. Minimum standards of social policy in dependent territories.
VI. Reports on the application of Conventions (Article 22 of the Constitution).
VII. Director's Report.

I have the honour to enclose a number of copies of an explanatory memorandum† which the International Labour Office has prepared, in the light of the discussions in the Governing Body, in order to provide some preliminary information on the scope and purport of the several items on the Agenda of the Conference, in regard to which reports will be forwarded to you as soon as possible.

It should be noted that the Governing Body decided that the questions numbered III, IV, and V, should be placed on the Agenda under the provisions of Articles 3 and 19 of the Constitution of the Organisation. In virtue of these provisions, each Delegate to the Conference may be accompanied by two advisers for each of these three questions. Moreover, should the Conference decide on the adoption of proposals with regard to any one of these three items, it will rest with the Conference to decide whether these proposals should take the form of Recommendations or Draft Conventions; it is, however, the intention of the Office, as explained in the enclosed memorandum, to include in the reports on the various items on the Agenda proposals for several Recommendations but only one draft for a Convention, dealing with a special aspect of the problem of social insurance, which from its nature can only be appropriately dealt with in a Convention.

3. Place of the Session of the Conference

The Governing Body decided, on the invitation of the Government of the United States of America, that the Session of the Conference should be held in the United States, probably in Philadelphia; a further communication will be made to you on this subject. In coming to this decision the Governing Body was guided by the resolution unanimously adopted by the Conference of the International Labour Organisation in New York (October-November 1941), which runs as follows:

"The Conference of the International Labour Organisation places it on record for the information of the Governing Body that the members of the present Conference advise that the next session of the International Labour Conference may be held outside of Geneva if circumstances should so require."

4. Organization of the Conference

In addition to explanations about the Agenda of the Conference, the enclosed memorandum also contains information on certain decisions of the Governing Body and of the Conference respecting the composition of delegations and on various provisions of the Standing Orders.

5. Credentials and draft resolutions

I venture to draw your attention to the importance for the efficient working of the Conference of the observation of the statutory time limits for the communication of credentials of members of delegations (not later than 6 April 1944) and of draft resolutions other than those relating to a question on the Agenda (not later than 13 April 1944).

6. Documents of the Conference

The International Labour Office is preparing reports on the several points enumerated in the second paragraph above. Every effort will be made to ensure that those reports are communicated to you as soon as possible.

7. Election of the Governing Body

Finally, I have to remind you that the Governing Body, which was last appointed for a period of three years in 1937, decided at its 90th Session (New York, October-November 1941) that it should continue in office, as last constituted, until a regular Session of the International Labour Conference could be held at which a new election of members of the Governing body could take place. It will therefore be for the Government delegates to the Twenty-sixth Session of the Conference, other than those representing the eight States of chief industrial importance, and for the delegates representing the employers and workers respectively to take the necessary decisions concerning their representatives on the Governing Body at the forthcoming Session of the Conference.

I have etc.

Washington, April 11, 1944

Dear Mr. Wrong,

Thank you for the I.L.O. Report† on Item 1 of the agenda for the forthcoming conference, "Future Policy, Programme and Status." I have managed to read it, but wish I had more time to send to you and Mr. Rive my views on some of the very important matters discussed therein.

It seems clear that the I.L.O. is attempting to establish for itself a very important place in the post-war international set-up. This is, of course, perfectly understandable, and no one can take exception to it if the I.L.O. is the most competent body to fill the place proposed. That, I think, is a debatable point. The fact that the I.L.O. is a pre-war organization has some bearing on it, though there may be a tendency to over-emphasize this factor at a time when new international agencies are being established or contemplated on a United Nations, rather than on a wider international, basis.

Certainly the ambitious programme outlined in the I.L.O. Report will be of very considerable interest, not only to governments, but also to United Nations organizations such as the Interim Food Commission. The I.L.O. report itself recognizes this fact and does, it is true, make very broad and concrete suggestions for co-operation. Nevertheless, it seemed to me as I read the Report that the emphasis was placed not so much on co-operation as on the desirability of the I.L.O. playing a predominant part in international economic and social questions. This emphasis may, of course, be partly defensive in character and spring from a tendency in other quarters to ignore, sometimes deliberately, the I.L.O. and other pre-war international organizations. It is quite true that there are those who would like to start all over again in international organizations and to discard, at least institutionally, practically everything that existed before 1939. This tendency is not, I think, so strong now as it was a year or so ago, but is probably strong enough to arouse a certain defensive-offensive reaction in the minds of the I.L.O. and League officials.

The proposed formal Declaration on General Principles which the Conference is to be asked to accept confirms, I think, the feeling that I have expressed in the preceding paragraph, that the I.L.O. has ambitious plans for its own future. The Conference is to declare through this Declaration that it is the "responsibility of the I.L.O. to scrutinize all international economic and financial policies and measures. . . . . .and consider all relevant economic and financial factors and include in its decisions and recommendations any provisions which it considers appropriate." That is pretty far-reaching, in the light of what follows in the Report. For instance, on page 40 of the Report, the

I.L.O. claims a "primary interest in the achievement of harmonious working relationships between all the constituent functional parts of the body of social and economic institutions which the world's needs require." The I.L.O. itself is to be considered not so much as one of those functional parts, but as something above them, to co-ordinate and, in a sense, review and direct their activities. Using its special relationship to "workers" as a basis for the statement, the Report declares that the I.L.O. should not be subordinated to any general world organization; that it "differs from highly specialized international agencies now being envisaged for the discharge of specific responsibilities in the economic field in that it is itself, in virtue of the participation in all its activities of representatives of highly important elements of organized public opinion, potentially an instrument through which there can be achieved both a measure of co-ordination of the work of these specialized agencies and an adequate backing for their work, from public opinion."[1]

The Report goes on to argue that co-ordination of the different fields of international public policy will require both machinery for taking immediate decisions and machinery for general exchange of views on objectives and methods of approach, and suggests that for the fulfilment of this second function the I.L.O. is a uniquely appropriate instrument. In other words, the I.L.O., instead of accepting a place as one functional organization among a group of such organizations under the possible supervision and control of some world economic council, almost claims for itself the right to be considered as that council. I am not sure whether governments or other United Nations organizations will accept that claim.

An interesting development of the above idea is found in the emphasis in the Report on the importance of the Permanent Agricultural Committee of the I.L.O. I am not, of course, disputing that the I.L.O. has a very legitimate interest in agricultural labour questions, but the suggestions made go far beyond that and may well bring the I.L.O. into conflict with the new United Nations Permanent Organization on Food and Agriculture. In view of the development of the new United Nations Agricultural Organization, I should think the I.L.O. would be well advised to play down, rather than play up, its Agricultural Committee. This is certainly not the case in the Report.

The proposal to divorce the I.L.O. budget from that of the League is also, I think, related to the matters that I have discussed above and indicates that the I.L.O. itself is preparing to cut adrift from the pre-war set-up so that it can exercise a greater, almost a dominating, influence in post-war international economic and social organization. There are important references to these financial questions on pages 166 and 167, which you no doubt have noticed. I am rather inclined to think myself that the emphasis in discussing this matter at the I.L.O. Conference should be on the necessity of reaching as soon as possible a single international budget, rather than on the advantage of separate budgets for separate international organizations. As the I.L.O. rightly points out, such a single budget cannot be worked out until far more information is known about the general number and nature of international agencies which will be in existence, but the principle could, I suppose, be adopted now.

[1]Note marginale:/Marginal note:

I was glad to note that the I.L.O. rightly emphasized the necessity of close co-operation between various international bodies and that, where the work of those international bodies overlap — and it is impossible always to avoid this — such devices as the "Mixed Committee" should be adopted.

The relationship between the I.L.O. and the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture provides a specific illustration of some of the matters I have touched on above. Incidentally, the I.L.O. have invited the Interim Commission to be represented at its sittings and have asked me as Chairman to attend the formal opening. I expect to do this, but someone else will have to take on the job of following the work of the Conference, as I anticipate being in Philadelphia for a couple of days only. Meanwhile, the Interim Commission is producing a memorandum on the Conference; more particularly those aspects of it which are related to our terms of reference. I am sending you a rough draft of the first part of this memorandum which one of the Commission's secretariat is preparing.†

Article I, l'ordre du jour, la Conférence internationale du Travail

Item I, Agenda, International Labour Conference

[Philadelphia,] April 12, 1944

AGENDA ITEM I REPORT I CHAPTER I AND II PP. 1-47 RESOLUTION I

Aims and Purposes of the International Labour Organization and its Role in relation to other International Bodies

It is highly desirable that the formulation of the future policy and programme of the I.L.O. should proceed in harmony with the current proposals and developments respecting post-war international co-operation and organization in the economic field as a whole. Present discussions look to the establishment of the desired international economic institutions on a functional basis. It is suggested that there should be a number of separate agreements and organizations, each of which would cover a particular phase of international economic relations and each institution would possess the powers and organization appropriate to its specialized task. Thus separate international arrangements and organizations are projected in the sphere of monetary and exchange policy, commercial policy, international collaboration to promote full employment, international commodity policy, international investment, food and agriculture, and cartels. It is possible that there may be others. A United Nations Administration for relief and rehabilitation is already established.

It is intended that these various projected arrangements should together constitute an integrated framework of policy and machinery for post-war international economic co-operation. It is hoped that progress in working out the proposals and in reaching agreements would be simultaneous, as far as possible. It is important that the functions which are to be assigned to each of the proposed bodies should be as clear-cut, concrete and specific as they can be made. Since the object is to achieve a better international economic order there may be a tendency for each organization to take on all sorts of vague general purposes which could encompass a very wide range of activities. Furthermore, since all economic matters are related to a greater or lesser degree, duplication and overlapping leading to friction and confusion could easily result. In the drawing up of constitutions and in the definition of policies and functions a serious effort should be made to avoid these consequences from the outset.

The assumption by any one functional organization of an overriding or primary responsibility for such vague and general things as the "social welfare," "freedom from want," "full employment," "raising standards of living" etc. is not only unrealistic but likely to lead to trouble. These worthy objectives cannot be achieved by any unique policy, any one set of activities or any particular institution. The accomplishment of these ends will be the outcome of a proper integration of the policies and a combination of the efforts in all the particular fields that are covered by agreements and specialized organizations. We must look to specific undertakings and action in each of the important spheres of monetary policy, trade, raw material controls, investment, etc. It should be possible to define policies and programmes with respect to exchange rates, trade barriers, regulation of primary products, wage and labour standards, international lending, etc., with a useful degree of concreteness and precision. It should be possible also to establish institutions with primary responsibilities in each of the particular spheres, to obtain appropriate governmental representation and expert personnel for each purpose, and to define the duties of such functional organizations with the necessary clarity. The emphasis should be on the achievement of progress in these directions and not on the extension of the functions of a particular institution to include a long catalogue of vague generalities and unrelated subjects in respect of which the organization concerned has no special competence. Little or nothing will be accomplished by the adoption of general and loose resolutions or recommendations on all manner of admirable economic and moral objectives. Furthermore, the appropriation by some particular institution of the function of "watch dog" for some all-pervading social purpose can produce nothing but difficulty. Progress will come through the development of concrete policies and agreed lines of action by means of the particular arrangements and specialized machinery required for each purpose. Co-ordination will be necessary but that must be accomplished by methods appropriate to this end. It is contemplated that something in the nature of a World Economic Council will be needed to co-ordinate the various functional bodies, including perhaps the I.L.O. Such a council, established perhaps in some suitable relation to the over-all political organization, would have as its general objective the integration of policies throughout the whole international economic field.

In the light of the foregoing, the argument contained in chapters I and II in the report under consideration raises a number of questions. The things to which positive objection could be taken either in the chapters or in the Proposed Declaration are relatively few but the general tenor of the discussion is disturbing. There is a conscious effort to magnify the functions of the I.L.O. and to aggrandize its purposes much beyond what it is capable or designed to perform. In chapter II an elaborate case is built up on the proposition that the I.L.O. is "a world parliament of social and economic affairs." Consequently, because of the tripartite representation, it is argued that the I.L.O. is "singularly well adapted, to serve as the forum of representative opinion which is one of the necessary instrumentalities for the co-ordination of the work of the various international bodies now envisaged." The work of co-ordination is of the most general interest to governments as a whole and a body upon which they are represented very largely by Departments of Labour is not satisfactory for this purpose, any more than if they were represented by Departments of Agriculture or Trade. The important task of co-ordination is a special problem with wide ramifications which must be dealt with in an altogether different context. Too much should not be allowed on the claim that the I.L.O. is peculiarly fitted for certain large purposes because it includes representatives of workers and employers. It is very doubtful whether the labour or employers delegates, except for a minority of ten or twelve countries, are in fact representative.

A considerable argument is made on the ground that the I.L.O. is somehow the custodian of the "social welfare," or the "social objectives," and that it thereby possesses the keystone of all economic policy. Hence it is suggested in the Proposed Declaration that "The Conference declares that it is accordingly a responsibility of the International Labour Organization to scrutinize all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of the fundamental objective and that in discharging the tasks entrusted to it the International Labour Organization may consider all relevant economic and financial factors and include in its decisions and recommendations any provisions which it considers appropriate." The "social welfare" or the "social objectives" cannot be regarded as the unique property of any one institution for international economic co-operation but constitute the central aims for all and can only be achieved by the combined efforts of all. The proposed monetary or commercial policy organizations could with equal logic claim the function of scrutiny over everything. There would be no end of confusion from such universal scrutinizing and intervention in any and every aspect of economic policy. An illustration is to be found in the Office report on Recommendations to the United Nations for Present and Post-War Social Policy[†] where it is proposed that the I.L.O. adopt a resolution on the "development, conservation and equitable distribution of the world's oil resources." This is plainly ridiculous.

The same general considerations would apply to a proposal that the I.L.O. should have an overriding or primary responsibility with respect to the achievement of full employment. Full employment is another one of the general aims the attainment of which depends upon the integrated policies and efforts in the economic field as a whole, national and international, and to which all the functional organizations including the I.L.O. should make their respective contributions. The necessary integration must be the function of the central co-ordinating authority established for that purpose. It is not intended to suggest that the I.L.O. should not do everything it can to assist or promote the attainment of desirable objectives in any part of the economic field or to call attention to particular aspects of any question in respect of which it has a special competence. The adoption of resolutions and recommendations for these purposes on a wide range of subjects is unobjectionable but they should not extend to the submission of specific proposals for adoption by governments in respect of matters which are more properly, or are primarily, the responsibility of other functional organizations. There is every reason for a full exchange of information and of observers between the various functional bodies but this should not involve the aspect of "scrutiny" or supervision. These are functions, in so far as they are desirable, for a central co-ordinating authority.

The re-statement of the future policy and programme of the I.L.O. will be most fruitful if it is directed to those subjects where it has special qualifications and which will not be covered by other organizations. There is a wide and important field — standards of wages and hours, standards of social security, labour-management relations, industrial health, industrial safety, standards of training, labour mobility, employment machinery and organization, etc. These are vital matters where further progress in international collaboration is important. A more precise definition of the functions and programme of the I.L.O. in this field and the development of concrete proposals for the progressive implementation of that programme would provide ample scope for a significant contribution to the attainment of the better international economic order. The concentration of the efforts of the I.L.O. on the achievement of progress in these directions — along the general lines outlined in chapter III — will be far more useful than the refurbishing of generalities meaning all things to all men or the dissipation of its energies on matters for which it has no special competence and cannot have primary responsibility.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures à l'ambassadeur de Chine

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador of China

Ottawa, April 14, 1944

Dear Dr. Liu,

I wish to refer to our conversation this afternoon, in which I endeavoured to explain why the Canadian Government was not in a position to support the Chinese Government's request for an immediate increase in the number of permanent seats on the Governing Body of the International Labour Organization.

The Canadian Government believes that it is necessary to maintain and extend the application of the functional principle in international organizations in order to secure the widest and most effective collaboration of all peace-loving nations in tasks of common concern. The constitution of the Governing Body of the International Labour Organization in establishing the permanent representation on the Governing Body of the States of chief industrial importance, recognizes the validity of this principle by its provision that the criteria of "industrial importance" shall be objectively determined and applied. Canada accepted the application of these criteria when it became a member of the International Labour Organization. Their application gave Canada a permanent seat on the Governing Body in 1922, took that seat away in 1934, and restored it some years later. The principle of relating national representation on international bodies to the specific contribution which a particular country can make to the work of a particular international agency seems to us to be important and one which should be maintained and extended. We should be reluctant to abandon or modify this principle of policy even to meet the special political considerations which have won for China the very high place which she holds in the political and strategic councils of the United Nations. In any case, as I told you this afternoon, I am confident that the progressive application of the principles already incorporated in the constitution of the International Labour Organization will assure, in the almost inevitable course of events, China a permanent seat on the Governing Body as one of the chief industrial states of the world.

Yours sincerely,

IMMEDIATE. Following from Government delegates to Labour Conference, Begins: Canadian Workers' delegate Bengough has submitted to Conference following Resolution relating to Federal States obligations under Article 19 of Constitution of International Labour Organization:

"WHEREAS the constitution of a number of Federal States, members of the International Labour Organization, prevent their ratification of I.L.O. Conventions dealing with matters within the competence of their constituent State Governments, and in such circumstances the usual procedure for dealing with Conventions and recommendations cannot be adopted;

AND WHEREAS it is desirable that a method be established whereby Conventions and recommendations may be dealt with, pending any necessary change in the Constitution of the International Labour Office;[2]

THEREFORE be it resolved, that the Acting Director be instructed to communicate with Governments of such Federal States, in the period between the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh Sessions of the International Labour Conference, suggesting that arrangements be made whereby draft Conventions of [or] recommendations which apply to matters within the competence of the constituent State Governments would be referred to such Governments by the Federal authority, with the request that they deal with the Conventions or recommendations in the same manner as is prescribed for action by a member State:

AND FURTHER, that the Federal Governments be requested to obtain in due course a report regarding the action taken with respect to the recommendation or the ratification of a Convention, and convey such information to the Secretary-General."

Renaud[3] observes that this Resolution is based on assumption in paragraph 2 that some change is necessary in Article 19.

He is further afraid that the words "in the same manner as is prescribed for action by a member State" in paragraph 3 might justify the Labour Office to contend that the following construction put by its Legal Adviser on Article 19 on page 171 of report 1† before the Conference applies to the case of Labour Conventions which apply to matters within the competence of Provinces and which the Provincial Legislatures are prepared to enforce through legislation of their own, namely, that "once the consent of the competent authority (and he means the Legislature) has been given, there is an international obligation resting upon the member to take any steps which may still be necessary under its own law to permit of the communication of a formal ratification or to make effective the provisions of the Convention."

Finally Renaud points out as regards the word "ratification" — in last paragraph of Resolution that (a) Provinces cannot ratify Labour Conventions,

(b) Member States have not been allowed so far to ratify Conventions for a part only of their territory,

(c) Federal States are reluctant to ratify Labour Conventions which apply to matters within the competence of constituent States or Provinces, as it appears from the United States Government's view as reported in paragraph 2, page 179 of report 1 above mentioned.

Renaud considers that Resolution would be more acceptable if word "ratification" were deleted from last paragraph as unnecessary and confusing and the words "recommendation" and "Convention" put in the plural to harmonize with paragraph 2; and if, in paragraph 3, the words "deal with the Conventions or recommendations in the same manner as is prescribed for action by a member State" were replaced by the following borrowed from Article 19: "Bring the recommendations or draft Conventions before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action."

As we are anxious not to oppose or amend Bengough's Resolution if possible, we should be glad of your views and instructions. Ends.

Delegation, International Labour Conference, to Department of External Affairs

Philadelphia, May 5, 1944

Your teletype EX-1867 of May 4th. Mr. Robertson might be informed as follows: Labour Conference, which opened at Phildelphia April 20th, decided after a general discussion on Items 1 and 2, in which Paul Martin took part, to refer Items 3 to 5 each to a separate committee and Items 1 and 2 to a single committee with exception of the proposed draft declaration on the aims and purposes of the International Labour Organization which will be revised by a separate drafting committee.

On April 26th Paul Martin tabled a draft resolution recommending that a committee be set up to meet during and after the Conference to consider certain constitutional problems of the Organization and report thereon to the next Conference.

On April 29th, the Conference, with the agreement of the Canadian delegates, decided to refer this proposal to the Committee on Items 1 and 2.

On May 5th Mr. Claxton spoke in that committee in support of the proposal which he presented in a revised form in the name of both the Canadian and United States Government delegates. The proposal was supported by all the speakers and then referred for closer examination to a subcommittee on which Canada is of course represented.

As amended the Canada-United States draft resolution provides first for certain emergency powers which the Director of the International Labour Office might be authorized eventually to exercise by the Governing Body of the Office, for the fixing of the next session of the Conference, for the planning of further regionalization of the Organization and the consideration of the problems of particular industries, for assuring close collaboration during the deliberations of the committee on constitutional matters between the Organization and the other international bodies, and secondly for the setting up by the Governing Body of the office of a committee to consider the future constitutional development of the Organization.

It is understood that Bengough's proposal that Federal States be asked to request constituent States or Provinces to deal with recommendations or conventions of the Conference in same manner as Central Governments and consequently to bring these texts before Legislatures for enactment of legislation, will be considered by the committee to be set up in accordance with the above Canadian proposal.

Other subcommittees on Items I and II have been appointed to deal with questions respectively of constitution of permanent industrial committees, assistance to enemy occupied countries, and recommendations to be made to United Nations.

The subcommittee on recommendations to United Nations has before it, in addition to texts proposed by the Office, a draft convention on statistics of employment submitted by the United States and a counterdraft convention submitted by the Australian Delegation.

Question of accepting or rejecting credential of workers' delegate of Argentina not to be considered by plenary conference until observations received from Argentine Government.

Governing Body being re-elected today. Conference likely to last until May 13th.

The Committee also adopted without discussion and dissent the report of its Sub-Committee on Industrial Committees. This report records the unanimous desire of members of the Sub-Committee that action should be taken as rapidly as possible with a view to defining a policy for the constitution of Industrial Committee and for translating that policy into action.

1. Reference your telegram D-208. Efforts to indicate in the Charter special relationship of the I.L.O. to the new International Organization have met determined opposition both from the U.S.S.R. and the United States of America. In the case of the U.S.S.R., this opposition appears to stem from long standing antipathy to all the organizations of the League system, accentuated by the Soviet disposition to press claim for international recognition on behalf of World Trades Union Congress, which U.S.S.R. is trying to develop as its chosen instrument. The United States opposition to mentioning the I.L.O. in the Charter reflects a sharp domestic division between the C.I.O.[9] and the A.F. of L.[10] The United States joined in voting down the Russian motion for recognition of the W.T.U.C., which the C.I.O. is supporting and they now feel that it might prejudice the Congressional reception of the whole Charter if they accepted the A.F. of L.'s representations on behalf of the I.L.O.

2. In these circumstances, the United Kingdom delegation are not prepared to press their motion naming the I.L.O. in the Charter to a division. In view of the support which the United Kingdom motion received from other Commonwealth countries, most countries of western Europe and some from Latin America, it is likely that the motion could have been carried on division, but very doubtful whether such an affirmative vote would have done any real service to the status of the I.L.O. These doubts are, I understand, shared by the I.L.O. representatives in San Francisco.

3. As matters stand, it is not expected that debate will be resumed in Committee on the United Kingdom motion or on any of the other amendments naming the I.L.O., so that Chapter IX, establishing an Economic and Social Council, will not refer nomination to any of the intergovernmental functional organizations which are to be brought into relationship with the United Nations. When the Conference comes to consider the need for setting up an interim Organization to carry on in the interval between the signing of the Charter and its entry into force, it is being suggested that the interim body should be instructed, inter alia, to negotiate with the I.L.O. and perhaps with other named intergovernmental bodies on the terms of their relationship with the United Nations Organization. The United Kingdom delegation are taking up this suggestion with the United States delegation shortly and hope that the latter will not find the same political difficulty in supporting it that they have had in all proposals for mentioning the I.L.O. expressly in the Charter.

4. In view of foregoing developments, I do not see much prospect of I.L.O. securing at this Conference any formal recognition of the special character of its relationship with the United Nations. The character of this relationship will have to be negotiated by agreement between the I.L.O. and the Economic and Social Council and the negotiations should give an opportunity for taking the tripartite character of the I.L.O. into appropriate account. Ends.

Philon, Greek Government's representative called on me today and suggested question of readmission of Italy should be postponed one or two years. I told him I had, as yet, no instructions but did not think Canadian representative would take an active part in the debate as matter was mainly of European concern.

I made no remarks on (a) Italy, but as regards (b), said external relations of these countries were controlled by armistices imposed by certain Powers in the interest of all United Nations. I thought Governing Bodies could not take a decision until those Powers or at least their representatives on Governing Bodies had been consulted. United Kingdom and U.S.A. representatives said that they had as yet no instructions but hoped to receive them soon.

Approval of this telegram was given personally by the Prime Minister to Mr. J. E. Read on the telephone. June 22nd.

We should take no initiative on re-admitting Italy or inviting other former enemy states pending agreement between United Kingdom and United States delegations. In this connection importance of not prejudicing Soviet attitude towards I.L.O. must be borne in mind.

I agree your general line that Canadian representatives should not take active part in this debate as one in which we have no direct interest. In any case it is desirable that decision on this question should be postponed until it can be considered in relation to the general question of admission of former enemy states to new International Organization.

If the admission of any of these countries is pressed, you would be justified in urging strongly delay in disposition until clarification of their general position and relationship to United Nations. Ends.[13]

When Mr. Jenks[14] was recently in Ottawa he raised the question as to whether the Canadian Government would be agreeable to the holding of the 1946 International Labour Conference in Canada in the event the Office should still be here. Subsequent to Mr. Jenks' visit the matter was mentioned to the Prime Minister who agrees to the conditional suggestion that if the office is still in Canada the conference might be held here.

It is the earnest hope of the Canadian Government that the International Labour Organization will become universal but we should not despair if universality is not achieved immediately. It should be remembered that a number of the staunchest of the present members of the organization remained outside for some years, their absence no doubt limited the effectiveness of the organization, but at no time was its existence imperilled. Let us therefore carry on with the work of the organization so far as we are able, confident that if it is well and truly done our place with the United Nations will be assured and that eventually the nations outside the organization may be convinced by the practical demonstration of the value of our work that their absence from our councils is their loss. Let us take our decisions in all matters with regard only to their effect on the achievements of the organization in its proper field and not with the idea that we must secure more members at any cost. Order in Council

P.C. 6852 Ottawa, November 15, 1945

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 3rd November, 1945,† from the Minister of Labour, representing:

1. That a number of standing Industrial Committees are being set up within the framework of the International Labour Organization with a view to providing specialized machinery to consider the problems of certain of the major world industries;

2. That the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has decided to set up standing committees for, in the first place, seven industries, viz.: Coal Mining; Inland Transport; Metal Trades; Textiles; Iron and Steel Production; Petroleum Production and Refining; and Building; Civil Engineering and Public Works;

3. That these committees will act as technical advisers to the Governing Body and to the International Labour Conference and, at the same time, promote the interests of the industries concerned by exchanging information and concluding agreements on matters of mutual interest;

4. That the Governing Body has determined the countries which should be represented on each committee, and that Canada has been accorded the right to representation on all seven; Coal Mining (11 countries); Inland Transport (24); Metal Trades (13); Textile Industry (17); Iron and Steel Industry (14); Petroleum Industry (12); and Building, Civil Engineering and Public Works (19);

5. That these committees will consist of six members from each country represented: two Government, two Employers' and two Workers' representatives;

6. That the representatives of employers and of workers are to be appointed by the Government concerned in agreement with the principal organizations of employers and workers having a substantial membership in the industry concerned; and

7. That the International Labour Organization will be responsible for the expenses of the representatives of both management and labour but that the individual Governments shall be responsible for those of their two Government representatives.

The Committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour advise,

1. That the Government of Canada be represented on these standing International Industrial Committees;

2. That the two representatives each of the employers and the workers of Canada on such committee be appointed after consultation with the principal organizations of employers and workers having a substantial membership in the industry concerned, the expenses of these representatives being borne by the International Labour Organization;

3. That subject to any special provisions otherwise made in the circumstances of any particular case, Government representatives on these various committees be paid their actual, necessary and reasonable travelling and living expenses incurred in connection with the meetings of the committees which are held from time to time and shall be paid from the Department of Labour appropriation for International Labour Conferences;

4. That appointment of representatives to each such industrial committee be made by the Governor in Council.

Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Delegate, International Labour Conference

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, December 15, 1945

Dear Alfred (Rive),

I have received two unanswered letters† from you on I.L.O. matters, your commentary of October 30th from Paris on the proceedings of the Conference and Governing Body and your letter of December 5th from London on I.L.O. staff questions.†

It all sounds as though six years of war and the addition of a good many new faces have not made a great deal of difference in the way the I.L.O. behaves. I have always found the internal politics of the Office depressing with too much concealment of real motives and a lot of personal rivalries.

I think that probably the most useful role for the I.L.O. in the modern world is that of a safety valve. A certain number of pressures can be reduced through its machinery. What comes out is usually only hot air but the fact that it does escape is of some usefulness and importance. I doubt that the I.L.O. will operate even as effectively as it did during its first fifteen years in the capacity of an agency for the production of international legislation on labour questions. Even in the countries dedicated most sincerely to free enterprise the relationship of the state to workers and employers has changed so much since 1919 that the tripartite structure of the I.L.O. now means something different from what it did then.

I have no comments to offer at this time on the proceedings of the conference. Mr. Turgeon, you will be interested to hear, has written to the Under-Secretary speaking in very warm terms of your part there. With regard to the staff questions raised in your letter of December 5th, I really have no useful suggestions to offer. My own feeling is that a good many of the officials whose contracts were terminated or suspended during the war would be better replaced by new faces and I should like to have these cases dealt with individually. I am surprised to learn that as many as fifty non-Swiss officials spent the war in idleness in Switzerland under suspended contracts. If they were nationals of Allied countries with any capacity for work, I should be inclined to count this against them but it is always unsafe to generalize on questions of this sort.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

PARTIE 2/PART 2
SOCIÉTÉ DES NATIONS
LEAGUE OF NATIONS

694. CH/Vol. 928

Le secrétaire général par intérim, la Société des Nations au sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures

Acting Secretary General, League of Nations, to Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

URGENT London, September 8, 1945

My dear Mr. Wrong,

In view of impending discussions with the Executive Committee of the United Nations concerning recommendations as to transfer of League activities, etc., and in view of meeting of the League Assembly, Sir Cecil Kisch[16] and I went to Oslo last week to have some preliminary consultations with Mr. Hambro in his capacity as Chairman of the Supervisory Commission and as President of the adjourned Assembly.

We are endeavouring to limit if possible the number of League Assemblies to one meeting in view of widely expressed opinion of representatives of Governments. I had been planning for this meeting to take place about the 15th November but as a result of consultations both with Members of the Supervisory Commission available in London and with some Governments represented on the Executive Committee of the United Nations, it has seemed better that I should propose that States Members agree to delegating a certain limited authority to the Supervisory Commission for such discussions and planning as may be necessary with the Executive Committee. With this in view the attached telegram† has been provisionally approved by Mr. Hambro and Sir Cecil Kisch.

The Chairman, Mr. Hambro, desires me to ask for your approval or comments on the telegram before it is despatched to the Governments and I should be very grateful if you would cable me immediately.

You will probably be concerned as to what duties this may involve for Members of the Commission. I should first of all tell you that the Chairman himself will be unable to leave Norway until about the 8th October. We are fortunate that Sir Cecil Kisch, Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur, will be available constantly in London. Should you be able to be available in London from time to time it would be a great advantage and help but if this is difficult you may count upon my keeping you fully informed with regard to any discussions which may take place, and on any serious or potentially contentious questions to ask your advice at an early stage.

I myself do not at present expect the discussions in the early stages to go much further than supplying information to the Executive Committee. In this connection I attach for your information copies of letters† exchanged this week with the Secretary of the Executive Committee. I would hope that at a later stage both the Executive Committee and the representatives of the League would be able to come to more detailed discussions and arrive at a series of recommendations which could be recommended to the Assembly. There will I understand in the first case be a proposal at the Executive Committee that the Assemblies of the two organizations would be asked to agree to a complete transfer of all duties, assets and liabilities. Due regard would be given in any suggestions put forward with the authority of the Supervisory Commission and/or the Secretary-General to the interest both of those States Members signatories to the United Nations Charter and the other States Members in regard to the disposal of the material assets, and, as stated in the draft cable to Governments, no final arrangement would be arrived at without full consultation with you.

Assistant Under-Secretary of State for India; member, Supervisory Commission, League of Nations.

Should any proposal made at the Executive Committee for a complete transfer prove not to be acceptable, we should have to enter into a series of detailed discussions.

Referring again to the effort to hold only one meeting of the League Assembly, it is as yet impossible to foresee a date. We cannot of course decide this without paying due attention to the coincidence of meetings of the United Nations Organization and with the hope of presenting a more complete scheme to the meeting. It will of course be understood that if such an Assembly were held, say, early in the new year, some continuing body fully authorized would be essential to deal with residual problems.

I have tried in this covering note to give you an impression of the position as seen from here. Its inadequacy is largely due to facts outside our control.

Yours sincerely,

SEAN LESTER

Le sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au secrétaire général par inérim, la Société des Nations

Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Acting Secretary General, League of Nations

Ottawa, September 18, 1945

My dear Mr. Lester,

I have sent you through Mr. Holmes of Canada House a reply† to the most urgent point raised in your letter to me of September 8th — concurrence in the despatch of the draft telegram† from Mr. Hambro to states members of the League of Nations. I think that the procedure which you, Mr. Hambro and Sir Cecil Kisch have worked out is as good a one as can be devised in present circumstances. I have always been doubtful about the wisdom of trying to hold two League Assemblies if some way round the difficulty could be found, and it seems to me that the wisest course is to secure the agreement of all states members to a single Assembly which could be held more or less concurrently with the first Assembly of the United Nations. We shall, I am sure, have great difficulty in arranging dates and adequate representation unless we adopt this course. I have not consulted the authorities of my own Government on the contents of the telegram but I am fairly sure that it will meet with no objections here.

I appreciate your desire to have some members of the Supervisory Commission available in London for consultation during the period of negotiations with the Executive Committee. All I can say at present about the prospects of my being there myself is that there are so many international gatherings of one sort or another taking place in London and Paris during the next few months that I may be one of the Canadian representatives at one or more of these meetings. As you can imagine, however, the end of the war has brought a new spate of work to my department here in common with most of the Foreign Offices of the world and we already were suffering seriously from shortage of staff, particularly of experienced senior men. The result is that it takes rather a lot to get me unstuck from my office in Ottawa. I would regard a trip to London, Paris and Geneva to attend meetings of the Supervisory Commission almost in the light of a vacation.

I would not be surprised if we had considerable difficulty in getting general agreement on adequate procedure for the winding up of the League as I am nervous about Soviet opposition in particular and the reports which we have received on the proceedings in the Executive Committee are not reassuring. What they are ready to agree to should, however, be made clear soon.

As the time draws close I am a bit worried about the reception by some governments of the necessity of voting sums for both a League budget and a United Nations budget for next year. I do not see, however, how that can be avoided and I think the proposal that contributing states would have the unused part of their contributions refunded when the transfer is effected could go some way to meet criticism. The bulk of the budget in any event will be for the I.L.O. and it is usually fairly easy to get approval of reasonable expenditures for the support of the I.L.O.

Yours sincerely,

Le sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures au ministre adjoint des Finances

Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Finance

SECRET Ottawa, December 14, 1945

In my letter of yesterday† concerning proposals placed before the United Nations Preparatory Commission about the financing of UNO,[17] I said that I should be writing to you shortly on certain questions of finance in connection with the liquidation of the League of Nations. I am enclosing copies of three documents in that connection. The first is despatch No. 18 from Mr. Wilgress† covering a memorandum prepared by the United Kingdom Government† discussed at an informal meeting at the Foreign Office which was attended by a Canadian representative. This memorandum is a convenient summary of the financial problems connected with the liquidation of the League of Nations. The proposals made in it are, of course, subject to the approval of both the General Assembly of the United Nations and the final session of the League Assembly.

The second enclosure is a copy of a telegram† from the Acting Secretary General of the League of Nations sent on November 28th, concerning the League budget for 1946, which was approved by the Supervisory Commission last month. This telegram concludes with a statement of the contribution assessed against Canada under the budget amounting in all to 1,343,207.54 Swiss francs.

[17]Voir le document 557./See Document 557.

The third enclosure is a copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary General, dated November 30th, forwarding the budget of the League for 1946 and the report of the Supervisory Commission for 1945.[†] The documents attached to this letter have only been received as yet in single copy by airmail. They will be sent to you as soon as additional copies are received.

It will be noted that under these proposals the final League budget for next year will be somewhat larger than the budget for 1945. About half the 1946 budget, however, will be required for the I.L.O. which will continue in existence. The arrangements for financing the I.L.O. independently of the League have still to be worked out following negotiations between the I.L.O. and the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

There will be certain payments due to members of the League of Nations arising from the process of liquidation. The working capital fund of the League is owned by states members and their share is, therefore, repayable without question. The Canadian share at the end of 1944 amounted to 309,568.88 Swiss francs without the inclusion of interest. If it is agreed that interest is to be included a further sum of 80,575.72 Swiss francs would be added to this refund.

Other payments or credits which might accrue to Canada will depend on decisions still to be taken. The possible credits seem to fall under three heads:

1. When the transfer to UNO has taken place it is suggested by the Acting Secretary General that any excess provision for personnel, etc., of the League transferred to UNO would be credited to the contributing states, thus reducing their net contribution for 1946.

2. It is suggested in the Foreign Office memorandum attached to the first enclosure (paragraph 5 (1)) that League members should be credited by UNO with their share of a fair valuation of the material League assets transferred to UNO, consisting presumably almost wholly of buildings, grounds and equipment. The Canadian share, based on the contributions made by member states from 1919-1944, would amount to something more than 6% of the total valuation.

3. It is also suggested in the Foreign Office memorandum (paragraph 5 (2)) that states members of the League should be credited with their proportionate share of any liquid funds which may remain when the winding up of the League has been completed.

I have commented in this letter chiefly on the financial effect of these proposals on Canada. The Canadian delegation to the Assembly will be called upon to discuss them in all their aspects and I should be glad to know whether you have any observations to make, particularly on the suggestions made in the Foreign Office memorandum. I may also have to consider all these questions at a meeting of the League Supervisory Commission which is expected to take place early in January.

Le sous-ministre par intérim des Finances
au sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures

Acting Deputy Minister of Finance to Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, December 20, 1945

Dear Mr. Wrong:

I have your letter of December 13th† concerning the recommendations for financing the United Nations Organization and I have received also your letter of the 14th concerning the financial problems connected with the League of Nations.

We have not had time to give detailed study, as we would wish, to these matters but there are certain comments which we can make.

In regard to U.N.O., I think our major concern is with the equity of the basis arrived at for contributions. If we are satisfied that that basis is an equitable one, I do not think we should be too concerned as to the needs for advances to provide working capital. I would be much more concerned with the adequacy of the budgetary control of the new Organization than with the actual size of the advances. Presumably, if we are going to take the U.N.O. seriously, it will require to have an adequate reserve to meet contingencies.

The basis which the U.K. suggests for the transfer of League of Nations assets seems a reasonable one to me. I do not quite see myself why even ex-members, such as the Soviet Union, might not be given a credit proportionate to the contributions which, in fact, they made during the period of their membership. This could be done for ex-members who become members of the U.N.O. I would not think, however, that this should be done for any members of the League of Nations who were not in good standing and who did not become members of U.N.O.

It will probably be awkward making three requests to Parliament next year for advances and current contribution to U.N.O. and also a final contribution to the League of Nations. Since, however, the assets of the League are to be transferred and members given credit for their value, the question of substance is really whether the League of Nations actually needs a full year's contributions before the transfer is effected. If there is no unnecessary spending, we ought not to lose by making our contribution this year. I would not be too sure, however, that the transfer would be made as rapidly and economically if there was full financial provision for twelve months of 1946.[18]

I am, yours very truly,

MEETING OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COUNCIL
JANUARY 31ST-FEBRUARY 1ST

1. The Canadian delegation requested that the Canadian shipments of wheat under the Greek Relief Scheme be credited to the Canadian 25,000,000 bushel commitment to Wheat Council relief pool. The Council passed a resolution recognizing shipments of relief wheat to Greece as cumulative installments against contributions to this pool. Canadian shipments of relief wheat to Greece since their inception total about 10.5 million bushels which, together with shipments in the future until UNRRA (if and when) takes over, will now be credited against the 25 million bushel commitment.

2. The Council passed a resolution formally recognizing UNRRA as the "intergovernmental relief body" referred to in the Agreement.[19] The Council may now transfer wheat from its relief pool to UNRRA for distribution. The Argentine delegate said he had not yet received any instruction from his Government regarding this matter but that he personally agreed with the resolution and that he felt fairly certain that his Government would approve.

3. The Canadian delegation requested the deletion of the clause in the Memorandum of Agreement which fixed export prices during the six-month period following the conclusion of hostilities at the price of the last bulk sale by Canada to the United Kingdom. The United States and United Kingdom delegations stated that they would be very reluctant to agree to the deletion of this clause before a serious attempt had been made to find a substitute. After lengthy discussion a resolution to the following effect was adopted. The Council;

b. recommends that immediate efforts be made to find a substitute,

c. agrees that if an acceptable substitute is not found by April 30th that it would recommend the deletion of the present clause.

The United States delegation said that in order to start the ball rolling on the price clause negotiations, they are prepared to propose the Canadian Wheat Board price to producers of $1.25 per bushel as a basis upon which to begin discussions.

SECRET. Following for Robertson from Canadian Delegation, Economic Policy Talks,[20] Begins:

1. Dunnett of United Kingdom Treasury and Twentyman of Food Ministry asked us and McCarthy of Australia to participate in an informal discussion regarding possible arrangements concerning wheat prices. We informed them that we had no authority or instructions for a discussion of this subject, but that we would be willing to listen and to report what was on their minds. United Kingdom representatives speaking unofficially said they have given much thought to what should be done at next Wheat Council meeting concerning the price clause in the memorandum of agreement. The present provision regarding Canadian bulk sale price is to be deleted and they are anxious to obtain agreement on a substitute. They fear that wheat prices, particularly in the United States, will continue to rise and may get out of hand in the immediate post-hostilities period. They feel that extremely high wheat prices, which they consider the Wheat Agreement was intended to avoid, would not be in the interest of either exporting or importing countries and that it would be very desirable to prevent development of such a situation. Dunnett hinted that extremely high wheat prices in immediate post-war period might have a repercussion on ability of United Kingdom to purchase other foodstuffs, including bulk purchases from Canada and Australia. They proposed that agreement be reached now on a range of prices to apply during period immediately following close of hostilities.

[20]Voir le document 20./See Document 20.

2. McCarthy said he was prepared to recommend to his Government that agreement on range of prices should be reached but that these should be applicable immediately. Twentyman thought that it would not be possible to get agreement on a price to be immediately effective which was less than the present Canadian price to the United States. This price was higher than United Kingdom could contemplate either now or in immediate post-war period. Twentyman thought it possible that the United States might be prepared to accept a range of 95 to 115 United States effective at close of hostilities. However in the course of discussion with McCarthy, United Kingdom representatives thought it worth while to explore possibility of reaching an agreement on prices to be effective prior to end of the war.

3. Aside from explaining a few relevant Canadian circumstances we said nothing. Ends.

SECRET. Following for Economic Delegation from Robertson, Begins: Your telegram No. 568 of March 9th. Minister of Trade and Commerce and[21] McIvor feel that the Canadian position respecting the forthcoming price negotiations within the International Wheat Council should not be anticipated by bilateral discussions with certain members of the Council. They take the view instead that the proper place for such discussions is within the International Wheat Council itself.

As you are aware, tentative plans have been made to convene the Wheat Council in Washington during the last week in the present month, at which meeting the representatives of each of the five Governments are expected to present the position of their respective Governments regarding a minimum and maximum range of prices to apply under the terms of Article V of the Draft Convention. It is intended that the Canadian position be presented in this agreed manner.

Under the circumstances the position taken by you that you had no authority to discuss the matter with British and Australian officials at this stage was the correct one. Ends.

IMMEDIATE. Canada No. 39, Commonwealth of Australia No. 86. International Wheat Council. His Majesty's United Kingdom Ambassador at Washington reports that Russians have expressed to Chairman their desire to become members of Council. In view of great Russian interest in wheat trade and more generally of desirability of encouraging Russia to participate in international organizations we are of opinion that Russian request should be supported. So far as legal position is concerned we see no reason in principle why Russian admission should not be effected by means of supplementary protocol or memorandum.

We do not know what is attitude of United States authorities to proposal, but in view of short time before Council meeting on May 1st, we are informing our representative on Wheat Council that in our view proposal should be supported. He has been instructed to keep in touch with his Canadian and Australian colleagues in the matter but should there be any special consideration from point of view of Canadian or Commonwealth Governments of which you wish us to be aware before matter is raised at Council, I should be glad to be informed as soon as possible.[22]

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT PRICE NEGOTIATIONS

At the meetings of the International Wheat Council held last week, concrete proposals were made for an international agreement on minimum and maximum export prices for wheat to go into effect immediately and to continue for a period of two years after the close of hostilities. The Canadian representatives, acting on instructions from the Wheat Committee of Cabinet proposed that the wartime range of export wheat prices under the Agreement should run from the present Canadian minimum paid by the Wheat Board to farmers

($1.25 per bushel F.O.B. Fort William) to the United States maximum received by United States farmers (which at present is equivalent to 172 Canadian cents F.O.B. Fort William) and that the price in the immediate post-war period should be based on the last wartime commercial export sale. Canadian sales to the United States and to neutrals are now being made at approximately $1.47 and shipments to the United Kingdom of Government owned wheat are charged to Mutual Aid at $1.25. The representatives of all the other countries taking part in the discussions — Australia, Argentina, the United Kingdom and the United States, thought that the Canadian price proposals were too high. The United Kingdom delegation suggested a price range of 90(to $1.30. At the conclusion of the meetings, the United States representatives made a compromise proposal for a floor of $1.00 and ceiling of $1.50 both F.O.B. Fort William. All the delegations undertook to refer the United States proposal to their Governments and to request instructions necessary to enable the Wheat Council formally to consider it at its next meeting, which will begin on April 19th.

While not certain, there is a considerable chance that the United States suggestion will, after some discussion, be acceptable to Australia, Argentina and the United Kingdom. However, it can be argued that Canada should not agree to the United States proposal, and that Canada should adhere to its original proposition, namely a range between the Canadian minimum and the United States maximum. It may be felt that it is not practical (politically) for Canada to agree to a fixed maximum export price which is substantially lower than the probable rising prices which United States farmers will be receiving during a period when the United States is importing heavily from Canada. Under the United States parity price policy, it is quite likely that United States domestic wheat prices will continue to rise for a time.

Depending upon the Canadian attitude it is probable that agreement could be reached on the United States proposal, or some slight modification of it. It is not likely that the Canadian suggestion outlined above will be acceptable to any of the other Governments. If the Canadian position is maintained, the Wheat Agreement, for all practical purposes, will become meaningless and possibly break down altogether. This might have some unfortunate repercussions on the possibility of getting sensible international commodity arrangements in the future. Failure to obtain agreement on a reasonable price might also intensify British caution, and lead her to husband her bargaining power with reference to the purchase of agricultural products generally from Canada during the immediate post-war period.

We must consider also whether, in all the circumstances, export wheat prices higher than $1.50 are really in our interest. During the period of the war and perhaps for a short time after, the Canadian Government will have to finance, directly or indirectly, a good part of our wheat exports to the United Kingdom and Russia. The higher the prices the greater the burden on the Canadian Treasury. Also, export prices in excess of $1.50 if maintained for some years are sure to result in an over expansion of wheat production both on the part of ourselves and our competitors, with a renewal in the post-war period of the difficulties of the thirties. The Canadian interest lies in a large volume of exports at reasonable prices. This will not be possible for long if the higher cost export competitors in the rest of the world are induced to expand their output considerably. In Canada itself the inevitable extension of production into marginal areas would bring in its train the social and economic problems consequent upon the subsequent readjustment.

TELEGRAM 1029 Ottawa, May 29, 1944

The International Wheat Council functioning in Washington under the Memorandum of Agreement of June 27, 1942, undertook last January to negotiate a new price agreement to be substituted for the price provision in paragraph 6 of the Memorandum of Agreement which fixed prices for the first six months after the total cessation of hostilities, including the end of the war with Japan as well as with Germany, at the level of the last bulk purchase price negotiated by the United Kingdom with Canada. Now that bulk purchases have been discontinued in favour of Mutual Aid transfers, either a new price provision must be negotiated or the existing provision must be deleted. The latter admittedly would seriously weaken the wheat agreement.

Meetings of the International Wheat Council have been held intermittently since the first of April to negotiate a new price agreement. The British, American and Australian delegates were strongly in favour of having a minimum and maximum range of prices effective now rather than negotiating a range to take effect at the end of hostilities. At first the Council endeavoured to find a range which would take effect now but be subject to review every six months or year. When the ranges proposed by the various delegations on this basis were found to be irreconcilable, the United States delegation made a formal proposal that the following clause be substituted for the concluding sentence of paragraph 6 of the Memorandum of Agreement:

"Pending such determination the five countries will maintain, from the 1st May 1944 and until the termination of the provisions of this Memorandum, export prices of wheat of not less than 100 Canadian cents per bushel and not more than 150 Canadian cents per bushel, both basis No. 1 Northern in store Fort William-Port Arthur; equivalent f.o.b. prices will be calculated for wheats of the other exporting countries and will be adjusted from time to time to meet substantial changes in freight and exchange rates."

The Memorandum of Agreement ends two years after the total cessation of hostilities.

The American proposal gave rise to two substantial difficulties, the first being that an effective ceiling of $1.50 would be placed on the Canadian wheat exports to the United States which is an abnormal movement inasmuch as the United States normally a net wheat exporter is importing more wheat from Canada in 1944 than is the United Kingdom. It was never contemplated until recently that the machinery of the Wheat Agreement should be employed to control the price on this movement.

The second difficulty is the duration of the Agreement, the United Kingdom having been unable to accept a floor price commitment of $1.00 for as long as two years after the end of the war with Japan.

The first difficulty has been largely resolved by agreement on the part of the Americans to add the following clause:

"Inasmuch as trade in wheat between exporting countries arises largely from dislocations resulting from the war these minimum and maximum prices shall not apply in respect to such trade."

The British Government, however, has queried this clause, and has proposed acceptance of it on condition that the Canadian Government, through an exchange of notes, will undertake, in spite of the possible attractiveness of the American market, to meet all the United Kingdom's requirements from Canada of wheat and flour within the price range. The Canadian delegation were surprised that the British Government would require such an assurance, particularly in the light of past policy which has been so to meet British requirements. In fact the Mutual Aid procedure as applied to wheat was established in order that the full British requirements could be transferred on a different and lower price basis than that on which Canadian wheat is being offered to the United States.

The question of the duration of the agreement is a more difficult one. The British Government at first replied to the American proposal with the following amendment:

"That the price range of 100 to 150 Canadian cents per bushel, basis No. 1 Northern f.o.b. Fort William-Port Arthur, should be maintained until 1st August 1946 or until the first August 1st occurring not less than twelve months after the cessation of hostilities in Europe, whichever be the later date, and that thereafter, and up until two years after the end of the war with Japan, the price range should be lowered to 90 to 130 Canadian cents per bushel, basis No. 1 Northern f.o.b. Fort William-Port Arthur."

On advice that the American Government could not agree now to any period in which the floor would be based on 90 cents Canadian, the British Government offered a second amendment as follows:

"That a range of $1.00 to $1.50 should be maintained from the date agreement is reached until August 1, 1946, or until the first August 1 occurring not less than 2 years after the cessation of hostilities in Europe, whichever be the later date."

The proposal to terminate the agreement at the expiration of two full crop years after the end of the war in Europe in place of the American proposal to relate the termination to the expiry of two years after the end of the war with Japan would shorten the period in which the floor price of $1.00 Canadian might be effective. By having the price agreement commence now, rather than at the end of the war, the agreement would be substantially at Canada's expense. Canada would have to forego prices above $1.50 for the remainder of the war and for some period thereafter on wheat sold to commercial buyers except the United States. In return, the agreement would be terminated shortly after the freeing of shipping, and the fulfilment of relief demands might result in the floor of $1.00 becoming effective.

For this reason, when the second British Amendment was submitted to the Wheat Council, Dr. Wilson,[23] the Canadian delegate from Ottawa, suggested that the effective period of the British proposal be extended to include the expiry of three years from the date of the cessation of hostilities in Europe. The text of his proposal follows:

"The range of $1.00 to $1.50 be maintained from the date agreement is reached until August 1, 1947 or the expiry of three years after the cessation of hostilities in Europe, whichever be the later date."

It may be pointed out that the British proposal as it stands terminates the agreement two years after cessation of European hostilities at the shortest, and three years at the longest. Dr. Wilson's proposal, since confirmed by the Canadian government, would make the three year period definite.

At the meeting of the Council on May 18, Mr. Twentyman,[24] the British delegate, reported that he had consulted his government on the Canadian proposal and that it was unacceptable.

The United States, Australian and Argentine delegates reported that they could accept either the British or the Canadian proposals and accordingly left the matter for direct discussion between the British and Canadian delegates.

On May 20, Mr. Twentyman offered to submit any further representations from the Canadian delegation to his Government, but since negotiations through this channel of communication appeared to have been exhausted the Canadian delegates proposed that the matter be taken up directly by the High Commissioner for Canada in London.

Will you please, therefore, arrange a meeting with the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs and request a reconsideration of the British position on the Canadian proposal. The view of our Government is that the duration of the agreement proposed by the British Government falls considerably short of balancing the interests of exporting and importing countries, when, as carefully as any prediction may be made, export prices during this period will almost certainly be kept in check for the greater part of the period by the ceiling of $1.50, whereas there is little probability of their being supported by the floor of $1.00 until shortly before the end of the agreement. The Canadian proposal represents a substantial concession in time from the American proposal and makes definite the longest period which the British proposal would permit.

[24]E. Twentyman, Mission alimentaire britannique, Washington.
E. Twentyman, British Food Mission, Washington.

General acceptance might be obtained in Canada for an agreement extending three years after the European war, but not for an agreement which might terminate two years after that date. The Canadian Government feels that as a matter of equity in conformity with the principle of balancing producer and consumer interests in a commodity arrangement, the duration of a minimum and maximum price range should be such that the floor price should have prospects of being effective for as long a period as the ceiling price is likely to be effective.

Regarding the British request for an undertaking by Canada to furnish British requirements within the price range, you might say that no departure has been contemplated from our demonstrated policy of making British requirements our first export priority. If on the other hand, the British Government feels it should have some definite assurance, we would propose a further clause in the price agreement coinciding with the intention of paragraph five of Article five of the Draft Convention. At the same time, we should call attention to the fact that the proposed agreement does not bind the United Kingdom not to buy below the floor from non-signatory exporters. Although we appreciate that the British delegate has recorded in the minutes of the Council that it is not the intention of the British Government to seek to take advantage of the agreement by buying below the floor from non-signatory exporters, and although we also appreciate that the agreement cannot long survive unless all substantial exporting countries ultimately become parties to the agreement, we feel that the British Government should be prepared to undertake in the agreement not to pay less than the floor price for any wheat imports if they attach importance to our binding ourselves to offer wheat freely to the importing countries within the limits of the price range.

I would suggest that you invite Mr. R. V. Biddulph[25] to accompany you on these discussions, since he has participated in similar negotiations conducted through the Wheat Council.

Mr. Twentyman is being given the substance of this cable in order that he might separately submit these representations through the channels he has been using.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

PRICE DISCUSSIONS

1. The United Kingdom Government have given careful consideration to Mr. Massey's aide-mémoire of the 7th June,† dealing with certain aspects of the recent discussions at the International Wheat Council on the subject of wheat prices. The United Kingdom Government greatly regret that it has not been possible for them to accept in their entirety the views advanced by the Canadian Government in this matter, and it may perhaps conduce to a fuller understanding of their attitude if a brief reference is first made to the history of the recent negotiations.

Brief History of Price Discussions.

2. It will be recalled that the view originally put forward by the United Kingdom Government was that it would be inadvisable to attempt to fix wheat prices under the Wheat Agreement, since in their judgment conditions generally were too uncertain to make such an attempt profitable. As, however, it became clear that other Governments represented on the Wheat Council were anxious to make an attempt to reach agreement on a price formula, the United Kingdom representative was authorized to announce at the meeting of the Council in August, 1943, that the United Kingdom Government were willing to play their part in an endeavour to reach agreement on a price fair to producer and consumer; it was then contemplated that the range of prices agreed should come into effect at once, and be reviewed in the August of each ensuing year. In reaching this decision the United Kingdom Government were influenced particularly by the desire of the Canadian Government to amend the last section of paragraph 6 of the Memorandum of Agreement.

3. At that time the range of prices envisaged by the United Kingdom Government (but not conveyed to the Wheat Council) was 80/100 cents a bushel f.o.b. Fort William. Meanwhile the exceptional trade between Canada and the United States caused prices to rise considerably. In February 1944, it was the issue of the United Kingdom Government that had it not been necessary to make provision for this special Canada-United States trade, a maximum price of 120 or 125 cents would have been appropriate. It was, however, the aim that a price range should be fixed which covered all the export trade of signatory countries including that between the exporting countries themselves. Full recognition of the rise in prices was given in the subsequent instructions to the United Kingdom representative to accept if necessary a revised price range of 100/145 cents to remain in force until August, 1945, and to be reviewed thereafter; this maximum of 145 cents was accepted by the United Kingdom Government solely in order to cover Canadian sales to the United States of America without involving a reduction of the price ruling in those sales.

4. It was made clear however in further discussions that the Canadian Government felt unable to accept a price agreement on these lines. Consideration was then given to the United States proposal of a price of 100/150 cents to run until two years after the cessation of hostilities but the United Kingdom Government felt bound for their part to oppose this since, in accordance with the final minutes of the Wheat Discussions at Washington in 1942, the proposal would have involved fixing prices for two years after the end of the war with Japan — possibly until 1948 or 1949. The United Kingdom Government considered that it would be altogether inappropriate for them, having regard especially to their position as the only representative of consumers, to accept such a high level of prices for such a long period. They therefore offered the following alternatives:

(a) A price of 100/150 cents until 1st August, 1945, or 1st August not less than twelve months after the end of European hostilities and thereafter until two years after the end of war with Japan a price of 90/130 Canadian cents, or

(b) a price of 100/150 cents until 1st August, 1946, or the 1st August not less than two years after the end of hostilities in Europe, whichever were the later date.

These proposals were made on the assumption that they would cover all wheat moving in international trade sold by signatories to the Wheat Agreement, including the trade between the United States and Canada.

5. Proposal (a) was not acceptable to the Canadian or United States Governments. Proposal (b) was acceptable to all other Governments except the Canadian Government, which considered, in the first place, that the duration of the price range was not sufficiently long to protect Canada, and, in the second place, that it should not apply to trade between Canada and the United States. In order to reach agreement, the United Kingdom Government, though with misgiving agreed that the price range should not apply to trade in wheat between any of the four major exporting countries. They felt unable to agree however to the proposal that the duration of the price range should be extended.

6. It will be seen that in the course of these negotiations the United Kingdom Government, in their desire to reach agreement, have made considerable concessions to the views of the other participating Governments.

Canadian Representations

7. The Canadian Government, in their aide-mémoire of the 7th June, raise two points —

(i) The United Kingdom proposal that Canada should give an undertaking to supply the requirements of the United Kingdom within the agreed price range.

(ii) The duration of the agreed price range.

Supply of United Kingdom Requirements Within the Price Range

8. The Canadian Government have stated that if the United Kingdom Government need some definite assurance that wheat will be made available to fulfill their requirements, they would propose that a further clause should be added to the Price Agreement, coinciding with the intention of paragraph 5 of Article V of the draft Convention (which provides that the exporting Governments should ensure that wheat for export is at all times on sale at prices not in excess of the maximum equivalents fixed under that Article). The Canadian Government ask that the United Kingdom Government should for their part, give an undertaking not to pay less than the floor price for any wheat imports from non-signatory exporters. It should be explained that in asking for an assurance that adequate supplies of wheat would be made available within the price range to meet United Kingdom requirements, the United Kingdom Government did not of course mean to cast doubt on the willingness of the Canadian Government to continue in the future, as in the past, to supply the United Kingdom with the wheat which it might need. The request was prompted simply by the fear that if sales of wheat from Canada to the United States were to continue at unrestricted prices outside the provisions of the agreement the traffic might grow to such proportions as possibly to encroach on, or constitute a handicap to, the normal trade in wheat between Canada and the United Kingdom. Since in order to meet the difficulties of the Canadian Government, the United Kingdom Government had agreed to the trade between Canada and the United States being excluded from the provisions of the price agreement, notwithstanding that it was in order to cover that trade that a price range of 100/150 cents had been accepted, it was felt that the Canadian Government would readily understand the desire of the United Kingdom authorities to protect themselves against any risk there might be of wheat sales to the United States causing a reduction in the supplies available for the United Kingdom's essential needs. It is recognized, however, that there may be little likelihood in practice of the trade with the United States reaching such dimensions, and if the Canadian Government for their part regard any such apprehensions as unrealistic, the United Kingdom Government are fully prepared to defer to their judgment and to refrain from pressing their request. They have every confidence that the close co-operation which has existed throughout the war between the two countries in this as in other fields will continue and have no doubt that any difficulties which may be found to arise from time to time on either side will be readily capable of adjustment in discussion between the two Governments.

Duration of Price Range

9. The United Kingdom proposal was that the agreed price range should remain in force until 1st August, 1946 or 1st August two years after the cessation of European hostilities, whichever were the later date. In view, however, of the passage of time since these proposals were originally made, and in the hope that the proposals may be more readily intelligible to Canadian public opinion, the United Kingdom Government now suggest that the date 1st August, 1946 in the above formula should be altered to 1st August, 1947. The Canadian Government, for their part, suggest the continuance of the price range until the 1st August, 1947, or three years after the European Armistice, whichever is the later date. Assuming that the European war ends before 1st August, 1945, the United Kingdom proposal would terminate the price range on 1st August, 1947 and the Canadian proposal at some date between the 1st August, 1947 and 1st August, 1948. The Canadian Government justify the suggested longer duration of the price range on the grounds that in order to balance the interests of producers and consumers, the price floor should have prospects of being effective for as long a period as the price ceiling, and that under the United Kingdom proposal prices would be prevented from rising for a longer period than the floor would prevent them from falling.

10. Given the high levels of the agreed price range, the United Kingdom Government feel unable to accept the view that its duration should be so fixed as to enable both the maximum and the minimum price to operate effectively over approximately equal periods. Such an arrangement would introduce a principle which would be extremely difficult to apply in that it would be impossible to say in advance how long prices would remain at the maximum and therefore how long the minimum price should operate after prices had fallen to that figure. Indeed, such a neat balancing of maximum and minimum prices over a period of time seems artificial and inappropriate to the arrangements under discussion.

11. The United Kingdom Government believe that it was not the intention under the draft Convention itself to balance the interests of producers and consumers in the manner suggested by the Canadian Government. Paragraph 2 of Article V of the draft Convention provides that the prices fixed should in the opinion of the Council,

(a) return reasonably remunerative prices to producers in exporting countries,

(b) be fair to consumers in importing countries,

(c) be in reasonable relationship to prices of other commodities, and

(d) make appropriate allowance for exchange rates and transportation costs.

They read this as meaning that a price range should, whilst fulfilling these requirements, be as narrow as possible, and that the problem of balancing the claims of producers and consumers should be achieved rather by a choice of a suitable price range, than by its duration. The latter method would in particular be much more speculative in its operation. In this connexion it will be remembered that the arrangements under discussion are transitional and will doubtless be replaced before their expiry by something more comprehensive and complete. In that event, wheat producers will secure continuously prices which have received the joint approval of both importing and exporting countries.

12. For the transitional period the maximum price is now agreed. It appears to the United Kingdom Government important that before a minimum is fixed for longer than the minimum transitional period, the discussions should embrace a number of considerations which cannot now be properly assessed, and should take into account the views of the importing countries which have hitherto had no voice. The Memorandum of Agreement will no doubt be superseded by a comprehensive Agreement, possibly before its expiry, and the United Kingdom Government were prepared, with this in mind, to conclude an amendment to the Memorandum of Agreement providing a minimum price of 90 cents for a longer period. But an agreement that would suggest that a minimum of 100 cents should be held for longer than two full years from the cessation of European hostilities (which should be adequate for further discussions) appears to the United Kingdom Government to be open to objection.

13. For these reasons, therefore, the United Kingdom Government express the hope that the Canadian Government will now be prepared to accept the United Kingdom proposal that the price range should last until the 1st August, 1947, or until 1st August two years after the cessation of European hostilities, whichever is the later date.

705. DEA/4171-40

Aide-mémoire du haut commissaire de Grande-Bretagne
Aide-Mémoire by High Commissioner of Great Britain

516B/181 [Ottawa] August 3, 1945

AIDE MEMOIRE

by High Commissioner for United Kingdom)

It is understood from the Ministry of Food that the stocks of Crown Wheat are, or will shortly be, exhausted and that it will therefore be necessary in the near future to fix prices for new purchases. While it is recognized that this is, of course, a matter entirely for the discretion of the Canadian Government, the United Kingdom authorities are anxious to submit certain points for the consideration of the Canadian Government since they feel that any proposal to raise prices would have far-reaching effects.

As the Canadian authorities are aware, the Wheat Council is due to meet in London later this month. At this meeting a further (and possibly final) attempt will be made to reach agreement on the Australian, Argentine and U.S.A. price equivalents for $1.00 to $1.50 for Canadian No. 1 Manitoba wheat. Any further rise in Canadian prices would probably mean a figure in excess of the suggested maximum of $1.50 and might therefore seriously threaten the whole basis of this plan. Furthermore, any such increase would be likely to have immediate repercussions on the price of Argentine wheat, irrespective of the price ultimately determined under the Wheat Agreement.

The United Kingdom authorities feel also that the possible financial implications of any increase in price may be important. They appreciate that the Canadian authorities might wish to make any necessary adjustments in Mutual Aid to absorb the increased price in the immediate future, but even in this event the long term problem would remain serious. The United Kingdom does not feel entitled to count upon any extension of Mutual Aid into Stage III, which may now be near, and in this event the United Kingdom's already very grave financial problem in Stage III would be correspondingly aggravated. Moreover, a higher wheat price might very well result in pressure for higher prices for other commodities. If such increases were granted the financial difficulties of the United Kingdom would be pro tanto greater. On the other hand, a further increase in the price of wheat without a corresponding increase of livestock products might be expected to encourage wheat production at the expense of livestock production. Though this might be partially offset if any limit on wheat deliveries were fixed, the Ministry of Food feel there would be a serious risk of the non-fulfillment of the minimum contracts already completed for beef, bacon and eggs in 1946, and as the Ministry have already made clear, they are anxious, if possible, to obtain whatever supplies can be made available in excess of the minimum which have already been stated.

The United Kingdom authorities therefore venture to express the most earnest hope that it will be possible for the matter to be settled in such a way as will enable any increase in the price of Crown Wheat to be avoided.

DESPATCH 970 Ottawa, August 5, 1944

Sir,

I am referring to your despatch No. A. 439 of July 18th, in which a memorandum that you had received from the United Kingdom Government setting forth their views on the subject of wheat prices was enclosed. The Canadian Government shares the view set out in paragraph 8 of the memorandum that it is unnecessary to record formal recognition of Canada's readiness to meet the full wheat requirements of the United Kingdom within the price ranges about to be agreed on, and shares the confidence expressed by the United Kingdom Government that the close co-operation which has existed between the two countries in this as in other fields will continue and that any difficulties which may arise will be capable of adjustment by direct discussion between the two Governments.

The views of the United Kingdom Government, as set out in paragraphs 9 to 13 of the memorandum concerning the duration of the price range, have been given careful consideration, including the reasons for the United Kingdom's rejection of the Canadian proposal that "the range of one dollar to dollar fifty be maintained from the date agreement is reached until August 1, 1947, or the expiry of three years after the cessation of hostilities in Europe, whichever be the later date." The United Kingdom Government's alternative proposal that the price range should last until August 1, 1947, or until the first August 1st occurring two years after the cessation of European hostilities, whichever is the later date, substantially meets the objection raised by the Canadian Government to the earlier United Kingdom proposal. The Canadian Government accordingly appreciates and welcomes this new proposal, and is instructing the Canadian delegation to the International Wheat Council to support the new British proposal at the forthcoming meeting of the Council.

I shall appreciate it if you will convey this reply to the United Kingdom Government. It is to be hoped that an early meeting of the Council can be arranged in order to conclude the Agreement. It is our understanding that the question of f.o.b. differentials of the dollar to dollar fifty range in Australia and Argentina is the only remaining difficulty and that this point is the subject of direct discussion between the appropriate Australian and United Kingdom officials.

TELEGRAM 1853 Ottawa, August 13, 1945

Following for Biddulph from Wilson, Begins: Re International Wheat Council. With majority of Wheat Council delegates in London, it was agreed that August meeting of Council should be held in London rather than Washington. Have not yet received advice of definite date of meeting.

Wheat Committee of Cabinet last Tuesday decided that you should represent Canada at this meeting. Please contact Cairns[26] and advise him you still represent Canada.

Principal issue at meeting will be price discussions initiated at January 1944 meeting and not yet concluded. You will recall early in 1944 Canada offered to [26]Andrew Cairns, secrétaire, Conseil international du blé.

Andrew Cairns, Secretary, International Wheat Council.

accept floor of $1.00 and ceiling of $1.50 basis No. 1 Lakehead, provided we had practically a three-year agreement. To date only Argentina has agreed Argentine equivalent this range. Australia and United States still holding out.

At August meeting United Kingdom may press for conclusion of agreement.

Canadian position approved by Wheat Committee is that our original offer $1.00, $1.50 still open for purposes of negotiation at August meeting on understanding that agreement would continue in force three years. If other exporters during August negotiations fail to fall in line, then our $1.00, $1.50 offer to be definitely withdrawn. In other words, if price negotiations break down again, as they may do, you should support our January 1944 request for deletion of last sentence of paragraph 6 Memorandum of Agreement.

Reference relief item on agenda, hope to have you advised before meeting where Canada stands on 25,000,000 bushel relief commitment. Roughly 15,000,000 bushels was sent as gift to Greece and remainder to UNRRA paid for out of Canadian contribution to UNRRA.

Draft Agenda of August Wheat Council meeting as follows:

"1. To consider the approval of the minutes of the fourth and fifth sessions of the Eighth Meeting (I.W.C. (Minutes) 8/4 and 8/5)† held on 28th August 1944 and 30th January 1945.

"2. To elect a Chairman of the Council to succeed Mr. Paul H. Appleby.

"3. To consider the advisability of electing a Vice Chairman (at its first meeting held on 3rd August 1942 the Council agreed indefinitely to postpone the election of a Vice Chairman).

"4. To exchange views on the 1945/46 supply position.

"5. To consider the present position regarding the contributions of Governments of relief wheat under paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article VI (Relief Pool) of the Draft Convention (letters from: the Argentine representative, dated 20th April 1945; the Australian representative, dated 12th July; and the United Kingdom representative, dated 16th July).

"6. To approve its budget for the year ending 31st July 1946 (Note by the Secretariat to be circulated at the meeting.)

"7. To consider the report of the Executive Committee on the determination of prices (Document I.W.C. (Prices) 5/45 to be circulated as soon as its text — now in draft form — has been agreed by the members of the Committee).

"8. To exchange views on the following provision of paragraph 3 of the Memorandum of Agreement: '. . . the United States, so soon as after consultation with other countries it deems the time propitious, should convene a wheat conference of the nations having a substantial interest in international trade in wheat which are willing to participate . . .'

"9. Any other business." Ends.

TELEGRAM 1985 Ottawa, August 29, 1945

Following for Biddulph from Wilson, Begins: Have reviewed correspondence mentioned McIvor's cable twenty-fourth[27] and his explanation in that cable quite correct.

Would add that in spring of 1944 I had a long discussion with Twentyman over principle of a three-year price agreement versus two-year agreement which United Kingdom then favoured. In May 1944 United Kingdom Government accepted three-year principle leading to acceptance of August 1, 1947, termination. While not expressly stated, this was clearly on assumption agreement would commence around August 1, 1944.

Canadian Government's position now is that loss of a year in negotiations should extend and termination date to August 1, 1948. With prices over ceiling and world position very strong, floor guarantee unlikely to be any use to exporters in two-year agreement now while having to make concessions on ceiling.

Re price extensions generally, first issue is whether United States and Australia will accept their equivalents. If not, negotiations break down and you should withdraw Canadian Government's offer to accept $1.00 and $1.50 because of other exporters' failure to reach agreement. If others accept their equivalents then you would need to advance our August 1, 1948, termination based on immediate commencement of agreement, and you would probably get support of other exporters, also that of United Kingdom who have recently shown their anxiety to bring the $1.50 ceiling into effect.

Am at present convalescing and out of touch with office; would appreciate your following up other matters through McIvor. Ends.

1. United Kingdom could not reconcile Australian equivalents. Nothing was said of United States and United Kingdom equivalents.

2. United Kingdom suggested new approaches to hold the 1 dollar to 1 dollar 50 range for two years irrespective argumentative equivalents.

3. You may recall that disagreement on equivalents automatically closed the eighth meeting with the deletion of the bulk sentence. Therefore, could not permit paragraph 2 approach without stating Wheat Committee views to show Government's willingness continuing negotiations on 3 year basis.

4. It appeared a shock to the United Kingdom to hear of 3 years.

5. I made it definite that we withdrew unless these equivalents were agreed to there and then.

6. There was no agreement.

7. The eighth meeting closed with a recommendation to Government for the deletion of the last sentence of paragraph 6 of Memorandum of Agreement and, of course, the price range also disappeared.

8. The ninth session opened with suggestions of the same range — the same two years.

9. Further suggestions, when previous paragraph failed, that prices reach no higher than at present for the present crop. This being occasioned as a Preparatory Committee is to be formed inviting ten nations to discuss the Wheat Agreement within the next few months.

10. Finally, on my flat disagreement at the wording of above paragraph, as it simply meant Canada sacrificing and no one else, it resolved itself into a recommendation to Governments to keep the price as low as possible.

11. Eventually the United States spoke at greater length and, as I had already assumed from their previous remarks, they mean to obtain a price on the export markets of the world as near their parity as possible and no subsidy considered.

12. The United Kingdom, through Mr. Broadly, openly recognised our difficulty vis-à-vis with United States and expressed the pious hope that Canada would do all possible to keep prices low. I pointed out that this is what she had been doing continuously and with great difficulty.

13. A further personal talk with Farringdon of United States implied that United States might be in the position to make some small compromise, which presume must be through some type of parity juggling, as their orders appear to be no subsidy possible balance this crop.

14. You may be able to explore this point when he returns in a fortnight.

15. All else personal letter.[†] Ends.

7. Your position at meeting would appear to have been most difficult but must comment that situation well handled.

WHEAT PRICES

21. THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE explained the position concerning export prices for wheat.

A critical situation had arisen. International discussions had failed to achieve agreement as to price and the United States had now declared their intention of obtaining on export business a price as close as possible to their own "parity" price.

In the opinion of the Wheat Board, this situation and the Canadian supply position justified prompt corresponding increases in Canadian prices by approximately 30 to 35 cents a bushel. No increase was being made, however, pending government decision.

The question had been considered by the Cabinet Wheat Committee, but no decision had been reached. Alternatives which had been discussed were a possible long term agreement with the United Kingdom, or the establishment of a ceiling price of $1.55, coupled with a floor of $1.00, such arrangement to be effective for a period of five years.

(Copies of an explanatory note† were circulated and returned to the Secretary at the end of the meeting.)

(Minister's memorandum, updated, re wheat prices — Cabinet Document 60).†

22. THE CABINET, after considerable discussion, agreed to defer further consideration of this question to a special meeting to be held the following day.

WHEAT PRICES; STABILIZATION POLICIES

1. THE PRIME MINISTER, referring to the discussion at the previous meeting, emphasized the gravity of the issues involved in reaching a decision on the question raised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

2. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE read a memorandum from the Wartime Prices and Trade Board assessing the effects upon administration of the govenment's stabilization policies of an increase in the export price of wheat. If wheat prices were permitted to rise, corresponding increases would follow in coarse grains, livestock and dairy products, with the inevitable result that the whole price ceiling programme would be critically affected.

3. THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE suggested that consideration be given to a solution along the lines suggested in the memorandum which he had circulated at the previous meeting, namely, a floor price of $1.00 a bushel and a ceiling of $1.55 for a definite period of years.

4. THE CABINET, after further considerable discussion, agreed that a draft measure be prepared for consideration at the next meeting on the basis of a guaranteed floor of $1.00 a bushel and a ceiling price at the present level of $1.55 to be effective for a period of five years.

WHEAT PRICES; STABILIZATION POLICY

11. THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE submitted an explanatory memorandum, a draft public statement and a draft recommendation to Council for disposition of this question along the lines agreed by the Cabinet at the meeting of September 14th.

The proposals contained in these documents, of which copies were circulated, had been discussed meantime with the Ministers of Finance and Agriculture. They provided for instructions to the Wheat Board to offer wheat for export overseas at prices not higher than the current price of $1.55 a bushel, and for an undertaking by the government that for five years producers would receive not less that $1.00 a bushel on authorized deliveries for each crop year.

(Memorandum to the Minister, Sept. 17 and attached draft statement; also Minister's submission to Council, updated — Cabinet Document G3).†

12. MR. MACKINNON read the draft statement which it was proposed to make in the House of Commons, that afternoon, with certain minor revisions therein made since the draft had been first prepared.

13. THE CABINET, after discussion, approved the documents submitted by the Minister with certain amendments to the draft statement which it was understood would be made that afternoon in the House, and agreed to the passing of an Order in Council to give effect to the policy therein set forth.

P.C. 4666 Ottawa, July 3, 1944

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 16th June, 1944, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs representing as follows:

1. Under the authority of Order in Council P.C. 787 of the 18th April 1934†, the instrument of ratification in respect of the Government of Canada of the Convention relating to International Exhibitions, and the Protocol of Signature, signed at Paris on the 22nd November 1928, on behalf of Canada, and approved by the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada on the 6th and 8th March, 1933, respectively, was deposited with the French Government, in conformity with Article 33 of the Convention, on May 22, 1934;[28]

2. Under Article 37 of the Convention the Government of Canada has the option to elect to withdraw, with effect one year after the date of the receipt of the notification of denunciation;

3. In view of the course which is being followed by other interested governments in denouncing the Convention and thus clearing the ground for the negotiation and conclusion of a new Convention dealing with the same matters, it is expedient that action should be taken by the Government of Canada notifying the other interested governments of the denunciation of the Convention in respect of Canada.

The Committee, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (concurred in by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue) advise that appropriate steps be taken to denounce the Convention in respect of the Government of Canada.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

May I refer to your reference note of the 8th instant,† transmitting copy of Despatch No. 979, of July 16, from the Canadian Ambassador at Paris, concerning the invitation to have a representative from the Embassy attend a preliminary meeting on November 6, of representatives of member countries, to study the question of revising the Convention relating to International Exhibitions.

As you know, the whole situation, immediately pre-war, in regard to the status of this Convention and to the functions of the International Exhibitions Bureau was far from satisfactory, and any move that is to be made in the near future to re-draft the Convention and to put the functions of the Bureau itself on a better defined basis should be carefully considered and guided.

We believe that it would be well to arrange for a representative from the Canadian Embassy in Paris to attend this preliminary meeting and that the Canadian Ambassador should be so informed.

Perhaps, in the first instance, however, it would be advisable to ascertain what views the United Kingdom Government hold in regard to participation in this proposed meeting — as the United Kingdom Government took the initiative in moving for the denunciation of the Convention of November 22, 1928.

This Department is actively interested in the resumption of exhibitions work — including, of course, the field of international exhibitions — and the re-establishment of our Exhibitions Branch on a more adequate basis is one of the matters to which it will be necessary for us to give immediate attention.

Yours faithfully,

You will remember that, at your suggestion, we inquired what the attitude of the Governments of the United Kingdom and Australia would be towards attending this conference. In the circumstances, we have suggested to our Paris Embassy that Mr. Yves Lamontagne[29] should be nominated as the Canadian representative, to hold a watching brief.

Rapport du secrétaire commercial sur une réunion du Bureau international des expositions

Report by Commercial Secretary on Meeting of International Expositions Bureau

[Paris,] November 10, 1945

Notes on Meeting held in Paris on November 6th, 1945.

Agenda

1. President's report on the activities of the B.I.E. since the outbreak of the war.
2. Proposal to amend the Convention.
3. Collection of fees and determination of their amount.
4. Pending proposals for forthcoming exhibitions submitted to the B.I.E.
5. Fixing of date of 1946 meeting.
6. Naming of delegations and appointment of committees.

Chairman: Mr. Leon Barety (France).

Delegates: The following countries and organizations were represented at the meeting:

Belgium, Canada, France, United Kingdom, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Tunisia, International Chamber of Commerce, American Chamber of Commerce in Paris.

The U.S.S.R. had signified its intention to send a representative, but he failed to turn up.

The following countries were not represented: Denmark, Morocco, Roumania, Spain, Australia, New Zealand, Finland.

The Chairman outlined the activities of the Paris office, which were very restricted as a result of the war. A pamphlet was published in 1942 (copy attached)†, containing the text of the 1928 Convention, together with the resolutions and recommendations which the Bureau was called upon to draft for the interpretation of and completion of the Convention. This documentation is preceded by an Introduction setting out the reasons for the Convention, and giving certain details regarding its application.

The Chairman expressed regret at the death of Mr. Maurice Isaac, Director of the Bureau, and referred to the problem of his replacement. He pointed out, incidentally, that it would be necessary, in view of the high cost of living in Paris, to considerably increase the salary of the new incumbent, suggesting a coefficient of increase of nearly 5 over the pre-war salary. This matter will be considered by the Budget Committee, which will also discuss the question of membership fees, their amount, and date at which they should become applicable (April 1945 or April 1946).

The following countries have denounced the Convention: United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, and the Netherlands.

The United Kingdom delegate (observer), replying to the Chairman's question respecting the reasons which led to the United Kingdom's denunciation stated that these were (a) the desirability of increasing the number of countries which had adhered to the Convention; (b) the fact that the United States was not a signatory, and that it was desirable that it should be; (c) the intervals between exhibitions were too long. The United Kingdom desired that the Convention be revised and this would be a condition to its re-adhering.

It was unanimously agreed that the Convention should be revised, and a Committee of five was appointed for this purpose. It was also agreed that the United States Embassy in Paris be approached with a view to securing the membership of that country. The U.S.A. and the signatory countries will be requested to state their views in respect to the revision of the Convention.

The Bureau has been informed that an exhibition is planned for Milan, but no date has been fixed for this exhibition. The French Government (Ministry of Reconstruction) is considering an exhibition in Paris during the summer of 1946, in which foreign countries may participate. Switzerland has applied for a priority for an exhibition of popular art.

The next regular meeting of the Bureau will be in May 1946.

Dear Mr. Pierce,

With reference to despatch No. 1749, of November 20, from the Canadian Embassy in Paris, concerning the proposed revision of the Convention relating to international exhibitions, we have been reviewing our file for the purpose of ascertaining on what precise points we would be prepared to suggest revisions of the Convention. In the light of the material that is available in our records, we consider that the letter from Mr. Stephen L. Holmes to your Department, under date of October 19, 1945†, summarizes very well the chief weaknesses in the former Convention that require to be corrected.[30] We would lay particular emphasis on the importance of adherence by the United States to the revised Convention (see paragraph (a) of Mr. Holmes' letter).

Mr. Lamontagne, who attended the meeting of the Council of the International Bureau of Exhibitions in Paris early in November, will be in Ottawa probably within the next fortnight, and we will have an opportunity then of going into this question in somewhat greater detail. I will keep it in mind to write you further with regard to any additional points with reference to changes in the Convention to which also we may wish to attach some special emphasis.

Yours faithfully,

Memorandum by Special Wartime Assistant to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa,] March 28, 1944

NOTES ON CANADA AND THE PAN AMERICAN UNION

1. There has been no change of any significance in our attitude towards the Pan American Union since Mr. Brooke Claxton gave the address to which Mr. Scully[31] refers in his letter of March 24.[32] The Chilean Foreign Minister wrote to Mr. King offering to sponsor Canada's entry into the Pan American Union shortly before Christmas[33], but the invitation was politely declined with the suggestion that the members of the Pan American Union might prefer to settle such problems as had recently been raised by conditions in Argentina and Bolivia before Canada became a partner. It is the feeling of this department that in any event Canada should not become a member of the Pan American Union until she has been extended a unanimous invitation to join. In other words, we are not interested in membership unless the United States would welcome our participation. That apparently is not yet the case. We are also not disposed to enter the Union only to be used as a factor in controversial matters with the United States by Latin American countries. Friendly relations with the United States must precede cooperation with Latin American states. There seems to be no doubt as to the general friendliness towards Canada in Latin America and the growing prestige of Canada because of her part in the Second World War. When the retiring Minister from Brazil left Ottawa he publicly expressed the hope that Canada would soon be with her sister nations in the Pan American Union. The address of Mr. McCarthy to the Montreal Canadian Club last November, of which Mr. Scully presumably has a copy, was warmly received in Latin American countries.

2. The Canadian government has no objection to participation in conferences of a scientific or technical character organized on a Pan American basis. In the last few months Canadian officers have attended a conference in Demography in Mexico City and on Cartography in New York. Invitations have been extended to attend a Pan American Highway Conference in Peru and a Criminal Jurisprudence Conference in Chile. The United States government has invited Canada to send an observer to a meeting of the Inter-American Development Commission which is scheduled for New York in May. All these invitations are under consideration. In the near future Canada will adhere to the Convention of the Inter-American Indian Institute with headquarters in Mexico.[34]

3. The Pan American Union is not well known in Canada. In a Gallup Poll not long ago 72% were recorded as never having heard of the Pan American Union and as not knowing what its purpose was. Of those who did, 80% favour membership. Statements reiterating membership in the Union have been made during the past year either in the House of Commons or on public occasions by Mr. Brooke Claxton, M.P., of the Liberal Party; Mr. Howard Green, M.P., of the Conservative Party; and Mr. M. J. Coldwell, M.P., leader of the C.C.F. At its convention in February the Bloc Populaire endorsed Canada's membership in the Pan American Union. The Union can scarcely be regarded as a party issue, although its enthusiastic support by the Regional Isolationists in the Bloc Populaire might possibly make it somewhat suspect in Conservative circles in Ontario.

4. According to recent comments made by an official of the United Kingdom Foreign Office, the British government would welcome Canada's membership in the Pan American Union. They regard the Union as a background type of regional organization which may help to contribute to world peace after the war, and they feel that Canada could act as a bridge between the British Commonwealth and the Union. They would in no way regard Canadian membership in the Union as a weakening of Commmonwealth loyalties.

5. Canadian contacts with Latin America are steadily increasing. There are now Canadian Embassies in Brazil and Mexico and Canadian Ministers accredited to Argentina and Chile. Canada and Peru are also expected to exchange missions in the near future. Canadian Trade Commissioners are found elsewhere in the leading Latin American countries. The Wartime Information Board has a Latin American Section which is active in spreading information about Canada in Latin America and in assisting in arranging visits for prominent Latin Americans to Canada.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

Thank you for your letter of July 8th.†

I had drafted a letter to you in connection with the Pan-American Union, but what I was saying seems to be considerably affected by the recent speech of the Prime Minister,[35] of which extracts were given in your telegram No.8.† I take this to be an indefinite postponement of the idea of Canada joining the Pan-American Union. I have not seen any reference yet in the local press to the speech, but if I am right in my diagnosis of it, I think that it would be well to have some formula ready in case I am again asked about Canada's stand.

In this connection Mr. Soward's confidential report of April 17th, 1944,[36] enclosed with your confidential circular 108 of July 15th† states on page 11 that, to the Chilean expression of willingness to sponsor Canada's entry now or in the future into the Pan-American Union, "a polite and evasive refusal was returned." I have rather gathered that Sr. Fernandez takes the answer that was forwarded by Dr. Grove to be not so much a refusal as a deferring.

I am wondering whether the fundamental changes in the Pan-American constitution, to which the Prime Minister refers as being necessary before an invitation can be given to Canada, may not have to go beyond the question of the designation of members. Assuming that Pan-America becomes more and more political, there will have to be some idea where it will fit into peace plans and world organization. There would also, I think, have to be some re-statement of the bases of the Union making for democratic equality between the members. The tone used by Mr. Hull in his recent memorandum on the Argentine[37], whatever the merits of the complaint, fills one with misgivings and is in sharp contrast to the tone used by Mr. Churchill. The Churchill rebuke[38] was made from an equal to an equal. The Hull memorandum is in a very different tone. It may yet be brought home to the United States that such a tone defeats its object and, in my opinion, helps powerfully to inspire "Hispanidad". One certainly would not like to have Canada at any time exposed to such a tone. And even if such language were not addressed to us one would not wish to be compromised from time to time through its being addressed to others.

Whether or not Canada joins the Pan-American Union, there is a concrete question that might possibly arise for us. What stand is Canada going to take should Argentina actually run amuck? Mr. Bowers[39] says to me, as I have quoted elsewhere, "We are fighting against Fascist aggression in Europe and Asia, we cannot let it go unchecked in America". Will Canada feel that this line equally applies to her? Mr. Bowers has twice expressed to me his relief that there is another non-Iberian but American country speaking down here, and with a special title to do so. So far, of course, our speaking has been restricted to politenesses. Are we going to take the line that difficulties between South American countries are not our concern unless we enter the Pan-American Union, or are not our concern as one of the United Nations, but are for those countries, and particularly for the United States to solve? The point will necessarily affect thinking on regionalism and the linking up of any regions with an international system; but it might also suddenly bcome a practical question upon which a Canadian stand might be expected and might have to be taken without a great deal of time for taking it. This may well be one of several cases in which Canada will be confronted with some of the consequences of growing up and of going out into the world.

Yours sincerely,

SECRET Ottawa, August 23, 1944

Dear Mr. Chipman:

I was much interested in your secret letter of August 12th discussing the Canadian position in the Pan American Union. While it is difficult to give a positive answer to all the points raised in your letter, the following comments may perhaps be helpful.

The Department feels that until the views of the United States are clarified on Canadian participation in the Pan American Union, it is best to avoid any appearance of eagerness in seeking membership. If and when an invitation is extended to Canada by all the members of the Union, which presumably will not happen until the general conference planned for Bogota in 1943 has been convened, the Canadian Government will be prepared to consider the invitation sympathetically. Meanwhile there will be an opportunity for the Canadian people to learn more of the nature of the Pan American Union and our relations with Latin American states. The Wartime Information Board is preparing a reference paper on that topic which should aid in the process of education. The Government will also continue to participate in such scientific and technical conferences of a Pan American character to which it is invited to send representatives. In the discussions in the House of Commons on the Prime Minister's statement it is perhaps significant that no opposition was expressed to membership in the Union. At that time Mr. Coldwell and Mr. Howard Green again favoured membership, with the latter adding the reservation, provided that it did not weaken Commonwealth ties.[40]

Our answer to Dr. Grove's[41] letter of February 17th,† in which Chile offered to sponsor Canada's membership in the Union, might perhaps be interpreted by Dr. Grove and Señor Fernandez[42] in the manner you suggest. Yet our letter did refuse the offer of immediate sponsorship and left purposely blurred any comment upon the suggestion that Chile might reserve the right to sponsor Canada's membership in the Pan American Union at a later date. As I have already pointed out it is not our intention to secure membership through sponsorship by a member of the Union.

I agree with you in your opinion that the role of the Pan American Union in the system of world order needs careful examination. A Departmental memorandum on that subject[43] has already been sent to you with the request for comment. I note your opinion that the tone of Mr. Hull's recent indictment of Argentina may help to defeat its own ends. From such comments as we have received from our Legation in Buenos Aires, Mr. Kirkwood[44] has been inclined to share your views.

For the moment our greatest anxiety in the Argentine crisis is the adverse effect that it may have upon Anglo-American relations. There seems no doubt that Mr. Hull is most concerned about the possible menace of Fascist Argentina to the Good Neighbour Policy and to the Inter-American Society, while the United Kingdom appears chiefly interested in the effect that the present regime in Argentina may have upon her contributions to the United Nations war effort. Once the war in Europe is over there is some danger that the present minor irritations with each other's attitudes and methods may become more acute in both London and Washington. I hope to discuss the issues involved with members of this Department most interested to see if we can explore any middle course between those taken by the United States and the United Kingdom at present. If you have any comments in that connection, I should be very glad to receive them.

As to the danger of Argentina running amuck, I should think it likely that this danger is unlikely to materialize until her army is better equipped and until the United States becomes more immersed in domestic problems. Should Argentina openly attack her neighbours, it would certainly be a matter of concern to Canada as a member of the new world association in the process of organization, which would certainly not permit aggression to pass unnoticed in Latin America any more than it would in any other continent. It seems to me that it would be unnecessary for Canada to participate in a military manner in checking Argentina for geographic and strategic reasons, but I should certainly expect that Canada would readily cooperate in whatever economic and political sanctions would be imposed upon Argentina under those circumstances.

I hope that you will find time again to send me further comments upon the general Latin American scene as viewed from Santiago.

SECRET. It has been arranged that a conference of "Delegates of the United and Associated Nations of the Americas" will be held in Mexico City between approximately February 1st and 15th to which all Latin American states except Argentina and El Salvador will be invited. It is expected that the United States delegation will consist of Stettinius, Nelson Rockefeller, Avra Warren, Leo Pasvolsky and other experts.

2. The Agenda for the meeting is still under discussion but we understand that the meeting will be primarily devoted to the discussion of urgent hemispheric war problems. Some of these problems are the successful completion of the economic warfare programme in Latin America, preparations against the migration of Fascism to the hemisphere, and the increased production of certain strategic materials urgently needed for prospective military offensives. The Dumbarton Oaks proposals will also be discussed, but we understand that the United States will attempt to limit the discussion to the best ways and means of integrating the Pan American system into the general framework of the world organization in accordance with Section C of Chapter 8 of the proposals.

3. In view of the suggested title for the conference, it would appear that Canada would be eligble for representation although the title chosen was primarily adopted to exclude Argentina from the discussions. The Mexican Ambassador here was disposed to send a message to his Government recommending that Canada be invited to attend the conference. He explained to us that his Government had been for some years anxious to have Canada more closely associated with the other American countries in the consideration of American problems, and having taken the initiative in the past in proposing Canadian participation in Pan American meetings, it would seem appropriate that as host country they should raise the question of Canadian participation.

4. The Ambassador was informed that in the light of all the circumstances the Canadian Government did not wish the question of Canadian participation in this conference to be raised by the Mexican Government. While it was true that the meeting in Mexico City was not technically under the aegis of the Pan American Union and therefore the technical difficulties preventing our participation in the conference of American Foreign Ministers were no longer present, nevertheless, the prospective conference was in fact and spirit a continuation of what had begun as purely Pan American consultations.

5. In reply to this statement of Canadian policy, the Mexican Ambassador said that his Government would fully appreciate the reasons why we thought an invitation to attend this particular conference would be inexpedient and would advise his Government not to raise the question of Canadian participation.

SECRET Washington, January 31, 1945

Dear Mr. King:

Since receiving your warm and thoughtful letter,† all of us here have been through a most interesting and somewhat hectic period. One can see the beginning of the crystallization and formation of the pattern for future world relations. In the light of the unbelievable human sacrifices which have been and are being made, the great responsibility for the preservation of the things for which so many are giving their lives is a matter of constant concern.

It is my deep conviction that the unity and strength of the nations of the Western Hemisphere will play a determining part in the future security of the world as a whole. As you well know, at the present time there are many factors which have undermined that solidarity. Through consultation we have arranged for a Conference to be held within the next few weeks in Mexico City, of representatives of those republics whose governments are cooperating in the war. I sincerely believe that this meeting will result in a great step forward in the history of inter-American cooperation because of its importance, not only to the American republics but to Canada and the Canadian people as well.

I would appreciate it if you could have someone in Mexico City at that time with whom I could unofficially keep in touch, in order that you may know of the plans as they are being formulated, and that we may get the benefit of your thoughts, the mutuality of the interests of Canada and the American republics being so strong. Our Ambassador in Mexico is being informed of this suggestion, in order that he may notify Foreign Minister Padilla. I am enclosing a brief outline of the subjects for discussion,† and as our thinking becomes more specific, I will take the liberty of keeping you informed through Ray Atherton in our Embassy in Ottawa.

Equally important to the success of the Conference itself is the reorientation of Argentina, not only from the point of view of the war but from the point of view of the future security of this Hemisphere. As the situation is today, it constitutes a serious threat for all of us. This is a matter which is being given most serious consideration and considerable progress has already been made.

Your kindness and personal interest has always meant a great deal to me and I have often thought recently of the conversation we had in Father's apartment. I share your objectives for the future. There are many problems and many difficulties but a great opportunity lies ahead.

With very best wishes,

Sincerely,

Ottawa, February 12, 1945

My dear Nelson [Rockefeller],

I wish to acknowledge the receipt of your secret letter of January 31st with its generous reference to the interest which I have always taken in your career. I feel as you do that great opportunities confront us to achieve something worthy of the tragic sacrifices of the finest young men of our respective countries.

We in Canada have become increasingly aware during this war of the importance of good neighbourliness in this hemisphere. I have watched with interest your own efforts to further inter-American cooperation and am confident that in your wider sphere of influence you will do much to promote that solidarity of outlook which will help to make the American Governments a bulwark of world order.

I appreciate your suggestion that I should designate some one in Mexico City with whom you can keep in touch unofficially, in order that we might be informed of what plans are being formulated at the forthcoming conference. I believe the most suitable person for that purpose would be our new ambassador to Mexico City, H. L. Keenleyside, who is presenting his credentials to President Camacho this week. As a former Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, in charge of the American and Far Eastern Division, he has been intimately associated with the shaping of Canadian policy in this hemisphere. I shall advise him immediately of your offer and forward a copy of the agenda for the conference† which you kindly sent me. I note also that you will furnish us from time to time with further detailed information upon the subjects to be discussed through your ambassador in Ottawa.

I am very glad to learn that considerable progress has already been made in dealing with the problem of Argentina. As you know, our Government has refrained for almost a year from official contacts with the Farrell administration as a mark of its uneasiness at the implications of the words and deeds of the little group which has governed that country. We have also pursued an economic policy closely approximating your own in dealing with Argentina, while appreciating the limitations on that policy which Argentina's possession of important raw materials required for the prosecution of the war entail. If Fascism can be uprooted in Argentina before it has perverted Argentine Nationalism it will be a cause of rejoicing for us all.

With warmest personal regards, believe me

Your sincerely,

DESPATCH A. 54 London, February 22, 1945

Sir,

Some time ago you were kind enough to send me under cover of despatch No. 63 of January 26th, 1943,† certain papers concerning the Pan American Union which I read with much interest. I now have the honour to offer in this despatch some observations on this subject and on Canada's general relation to the inter-American system. Although this question is not an immediate concern of this office, I hope this despatch will not appear as coming from an inappropriate source. During my own sojourn at Washington in the years which followed the establishment of our Legation, the matter was of some current importance and therefore of much interest to myself as Head of the Mission. I may say I feel that the views which I then formed on the subject have been confirmed rather than altered by subsequent events.

2. In this despatch I use the phrase "Pan American Union" in its popular sense as meaning what correctly should be called the "Union of American Republics". As I need not point out, the phrase "Pan American Union" is strictly speaking applied only to the Secretariat of the Union in Washington. I also interpret membership of the Pan American Union to mean full participation in all inter-American activities, as presumably, if Canada joined the Union she would also take part in conferences of Foreign Ministers and functional hemispheric organisations.

3. There are two main arguments advanced from time to time for our adherence to the Pan American Union: (a) that it would increase our trade, (b) that it would improve our status. As far as the first point is concerned, one can see no valid reason to substantiate the belief that our admission to the Pan American Union would result in an increase in trade with Latin America. Canada will develop her commerce with this area through direct trade and diplomatic representation. There is no evidence that any country in the inter-American system has increased its trade with any other part through the machinery of inter-American organization.

4. The question of status is a more complicated matter. It is constantly assumed that our national status will be raised or at least demonstrated by joining the Pan American Union. This view is usually associated with the illusion that Canada's policy is at present dictated by the Foreign Office. The events of this war have surely made it much less necessary for us to take any action solely for the purpose of achieving status. In view of the rejection by the United States of Canada's bid to participate in the Rio de Janeiro Conference and join the Pan American Union in 1941 and 1942[46], nothing would be more derogatory to Canadian status than to apply again, cap in hand. If we are to consider our status it would be wise for us to decline even to consider an invitation to join the Union until after a period of zealous and unanimous courtship.

5. It is perhaps natural that at this stage of our development as a nation there should occasionally be expressed the belief that Canada should "join all the clubs", and membership of the Pan American Union is increasingly referred to as a symbol of our independence as a sovereign state. This is to lend such a proposal all the dangerous attributes of a slogan. There is no basic reason, of course, why Canada could not belong to the Pan American Union and remain a loyal member of the British Commonwealth. Nevertheless, membership in the Union and participation in inter-American affairs might embarrass us in several ways. In the Commonwealth Canada has insisted on the equality of status of all members. This equality of status is not so clear in the Pan American Union, in which the United States enjoys a position which is not conceded to the United Kindgom within the Commonwealth. (In the Pan-American Union building, if I remember correctly, the relation of the United States to the other members is symbolized by a group of busts representing national heroes in which that of the American representative is placed on a plinth a pace or two in advance of a single rank of those bearing the effigies of the others.) Within the Union Canada might find she had equality of status with Paraguay rather than the United States.

6. Canada has constantly opposed the establishment of a Commonwealth Secretariat, but the Pan American Union is a Secretariat. It is true that the two organizations are not entirely analogous, but it may be difficult for the [46]Voir le volume 9, documents 764, 767-9./See Volume 9, Documents 764, 767-9.

Canadian citizen to understand why Canada rejected Mr. Curtin's proposals for a Commonwealth Secretariat[47] on the grounds that it might endanger her sovereignty, and then proceeded to take part in the activities of a Pan-American Secretariat. This inter-American system includes a large number of functional organisations in which Canada would be pledged to take part. In view of our reluctance to take part in purely Commonwealth functional organizations on the grounds that they are exclusive, it is difficult to understand what arguments could be used for participation in purely hemispheric bodies.

7. It is perhaps not correct to say that Canada's participation in the Pan American Union is occasionally advocated because of belief that it would strengthen the forces of Isolationism but there is little doubt that our entry into the Union would greatly encourage Isolationist thinking in the country. This is probably the most important objection to such a step. Although, as has been stated above, there is no reason why such membership should loosen Canada's ties with the Commonwealth, with Europe, or with Asia, and although the Inter-American system may outgrow its isolationist complexion, it must be admitted that Canadians tend to take a rather simple view of this question. The greatest enthusiasts for membership in the Pan American Union are to be found among both French and English speaking nationalist-isolationists. It is true that there is support for membership among a large number of genuine internationalists and strong supporters of the Commonwealth, but there is the great danger that closer association with the inter-American system would be interpreted by Canadians as a retreat from Europe and the Commonwealth. This interpretation might be nourished into a belief that Canada would run away from the problems of the northern hemisphere of which she is as much a part as she is of the western hemisphere.

8. There is no real unity in the western hemisphere. Culturally, Canada differs much more from South American than she does from northern European countries. The idea that there is any strategic unity in the western hemisphere has been thoroughly exploded by this war. Geographicaly, there is no unity, unless one believes that the Isthmus of Panama has some mystic significance. Communications with South America are still, for the most part, by sea, and it is much farther from Canadian ports to Rio or Buenos Aires than to any of the important ports of Western Europe. Culturally we are worlds apart. The French Canadian is inclined to believe that he has much in common with the Catholic and Latin countries of America, but there is a good deal of sentimentality involved in this claim. These points are not intended to be an argument against the development of the closest possible relations with Latin America, but merely to question why relations with this part of the world should be of any greater importance to us than relations with countries in Europe and other parts of the world with which we have always had more in common. The only unity of the western hemisphere is historic. The Americas are populated by European or semi-European peoples, many of whose ancestors came to the New World to get away from the old for various reasons. The United States and the Latin-American republics broke their political ties with the Old World, and in doing so created a certain bond. Canada has achieved its independence without breaking its political ties, and therefore does not share fully the one element of unity in the hemisphere.

9. Positive disadvantages would flow from our membership of the Pan American Union. If Canada joined the Pan American Union she would undoubtedly find it necessary to take part in the activities of the many inter-American bodies. The only one of these which could conceivably be of positive value would be the conferences of Foreign Ministers. In this case there would be danger of undesirable entanglements. Inter-American bodies dealing with all sorts of subjects from international law to health, radio and the press, seem to be of questionable value. The exchange of ideas on all these subjects with other countries is always useful, but there are a good many countries from which we have much more to learn. Australia and New Zealand, for example, may be a long way from Canada, and we may not be able to travel to them by means of an Isthmus, but there is good reason to believe that we will get much more value out of the exchange of views with Australians and New Zealanders on health, social security and almost any other subject, because in spite of the distances that separate us the patterns of our communities are similar. In the same way we should also find an interchange of ideas with Dutchmen or Norwegians of more value than a similar exchange with other American countries except the United States.

10. Although it may seem to be a minor matter, it should be borne in mind that relations with Latin Americans are carried on in rhetorical terms, with which Canadians are fortunately unfamiliar, and with which they could rapidly become excessively bored. Canadian enthusiasm for inter-American gatherings might be dimmed after too great exposure.

11. The greatest danger which would follow our entry into the Pan American Union would derive from our relation to those issues which in Pan American affairs frequently divide the United States on the one hand from the twenty Latin American republics on the other. As we stand at present we can regard such controversies from a position of dignified aloofness. As a member of the Pan American Union we would frequently be obliged to take sides and either incur the criticism of our powerful neighbour or share the unpopularity of the United States in America. In spite of the improvement brought about by the "good neighbour" policy which at present prevails in Washington, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the United States is not popular in Latin America. There has been a good deal of evidence of efforts on the part of Latin Americans to curry favour with Canadians by provoking joint antipathies to the United States. This is a short-sighted and dangerous game in which Canada must not be involved. We should find it very difficult to avoid joining with Latin America in an anti-United States attitude on the one hand or on the other being classed simply as a puppet of Washington.

12. It must be borne in mind that the inter-American system is in a state of transition, and it would be most unwise for Canada to associate itself with this system before it is clear in what shape it will emerge. As it stood in 1941, its chief aim in foreign policy was the preservation of neutrality and the isolation of the western hemisphere. We could not be associated with such an organization. No doubt adjustments will be made in accordance with the new attitudes in the United States and the Latin American countries, although it is not entirely clear what other purpose can usefully be served by a system which is arbitrarily limited to a hemisphere which has no strategic, economic or cultural unity. It is particularly important that Canada should not associate itself with a regional group until the shape of the World Organization becomes clear, but we should be careful not to align ourselves with a particular region until we understand the nature of the association.

13. There is only one other American country with which we must maintain specially close relations in our own interest, and that country is the United States. We have formulated satisfactory arrangements for settling our problems and arranging for our joint defence. From our point of view there is nothing to be gained from complicating these arrangements by involving ourselves in wider commitments with all the South and Central American countries.

14. In conclusion it might be noted that the principal value in Canadian association with the Pan American Union and related activities is a negative one. Particularly in French Canada, and to some extent in English Canada, there has grown up a sense of grievance, a belief that Canada has not joined the Pan American Union because she is prevented from doing so either by the United Kingdom Government (an allegation which is completely untrue) or by "Imperialist" Canadians who do not recognise that Canada is "an American nation". There may be some argument to prove that the best way of removing this sense of grievance would be to join the Union. This negative argument can, I believe, be easily met by the positive reasons for not taking this step. The advantages of our participation are illusory and the disadvantages concrete.

15. In expressing these views I should like to make it clear that I am in no way reflecting what might be the attitude of the United Kingdom Government. Indeed, I have no reason to believe that they have any views on the matter. It is a subject which I have never heard discussed by members or officials of the British Government. These are opinions which I have formed out of my own experience in Washington.[48]

I have etc.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Chapultepec Conference.

We have now obtained in confidence exact text of Chilean resolution regarding Canada. This resolution was presented to Steering Committee on Monday and will today be sent to one of six Commissions for meditation. The resolution translated reads as follows:

"Considering:

That Canada has contributed and still contributes materially to the defence of the American continent, having made a war effort, the magnitude of which embraced all resources of the country;

That by its geographical situation Canada belongs to the American hemisphere and within that hemisphere occupies a prominent place because of high degree of development, its proved industry and its democratic institutions, and

That Canada maintains diplomatic and consular as well as commercial and financial relatons with Latin American States;

The American Conference on Problems of War and Peace resolve:

(1) To pay a tribute of admiration and thanks to Canada for its magnificent war effort in the defence of the American continent;

(2) To express the desire of the American Republics that Canada, whenever it deems it opportune, should join the Pan American Union system;

(3) That the Governing Board of the Pan American Union should immediately invite the Government of Canada to form part of the Union in conformity with terms of the present resolution."

From various indications we believe the resolution will either be allowed to remain unreported in the Committee to which it is assigned or, and this is more probable, be reduced to a simple recognition of Canada's war effort and other virtues combined with an expression of generalized hope that Canada will, in due time, and in a suitable manner, take a more direct part in inter-American affairs. We shall keep you informed.

It would assist us in reporting, if you would indicate whether there is any considerable delay in receipt of our telegraphic messages. There are reports here that congestion on wires is causing prolonged delays even of official telegrams.[49]

TELEGRAM 68 Mexico City, March 3, 1945

IMMEDIATE. My telegram No. 62 of February 28th, Chapultepec Conference and Chilean resolution regarding Canada.

In a secret session of the Committee on Initiatives under the Chairmanship of Padilla, the Chilean motion was approved "with acclamation and applause" after 300 [3] sentences of actual resolution had been consolidated into two, reading as follows:

1. To pay a tribute of admiration to Canada for its magnificent war effort in defence of the American continent.

2. To express the desire of the Conference that collaboration of Canada in the Pan American system will steadily increase.

This resolution will probably not be conveyed officially to the Canadian Government until it has been acted on by the whole Conference. It may then be transmitted through me or through the Mexican Ambassador, Ottawa, or by direct telegram from the Conference to the Prime Minister. It would be well to have a message from Mr. King ready to use as reply, and I shall be grateful if I may have text available here in case this channel is used.

Sir,

I have the honour to submit the following report on the proceedings of the Third Inter-American Radio Communications Conference held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, between September 3rd and 27th, 1945.

This Conference was originally scheduled to meet in 1943, in accordance with the provisions of the Inter-American Radio Convention, but was postponed because of the prevailing wartime conditions. On invitation from the Government of Brazil it was convened in Rio de Janeiro with over 250 delegates, technical advisers, and representatives of the Western Hemisphere. In accordance with their status, Newfoundland and the Bahamas sent representatives, and the Antilles were represented by an observer. Of the larger powers present, the United States of America had a delegation of 42, exclusive of translators and secretarial staff; Argentina was represented by 38, and Brazil 50.

As approved by P.C. 5778 of August 28th,[†] the Canadian delegation consisted of the following:

Chairman:

F. H. Soward, Special Assistant to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Delegates:

W. A. Rush, Controller of Radio, Department of Transport.
Donald Manson, Assistant Manager, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.
Wing Commander S. R. Burbank, Acting Director of Signals, Department of National Defence for Air.
J. W. Bain, Senior Radio Engineer, Department of Transport.
C. J. Acton, Supervising Radio Inspector, Department of Transport.

Representatives:

W. D. Richardson, Transmission and Development Engineer, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.
S. S. Stevens, Superintendent of Communications, Trans-Canada Air Lines.
K. A. MacKinnon, Consulting Radio Engineer, All Canada Radio Facilities.
Henry S. Dawson, Chief Engineer, Canadian Association of Broadcasters.

Messrs. Soward and Rush were authorized to sign any agreements between governments which might be reached at the above Conference, subject to ratification or approval by the Canadian Government.

The Conference was formally opened by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Brazil on September 3rd at the Palacio Itamaraty. The Minister of Transport and Public Works, General Joao de Mendonca Lima was elected Chairman of the Conference at the first plenary meeting.

The agenda for the Conference as circulated before it opened included such topics as the revision and possible expansion of the Inter-American Radio

Communications Convention, Havana, 1937, examination of the regulations governing Inter-American Radio drafted at the Conference of 1937 and 1940, principles for the allocation and economic use of radio frequencies, and exchange of opinions between the governments for the revision of the International Telecommunications Convention of Madrid, 1932, and the appended Radio and Telegraph Regulations of Cairo, 1938. At the request of the Canadian Government its proposal for the extension of the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement was also on the agenda.

Four main committees were established, on which each country was entitled to representation. These included:

1. Initiatives Committee
2. Technical Committee
3. Juridical Administrative Committee
4. Drafting Committee.

The Initiatives Committee was composed of the heads of the delegations or their alternates, and was chiefly concerned with allocating questions on the agenda to the appropriate committees and such further recommendations as were advanced by various delegations during the Conference. It also supervised the work of the Conference generally.

Due to the variety of topics entrusted to the Technical Committee and the Juridical Administrative Committee, it was necessary for each of them to set up four sub-committees. The Technical Committee established the following sub-committees:

1. Committee on Allocation of Frequency Bands to Services.
2. Committee on Mobile Services.
3. Committee on Meteorological Services.
4. Committee on Miscellaneous Technical Matters.

The Juridical Administrative Committee divided its duties among four sub-committees designated as follows:

1. Committee on Rates and Finance.
2. Committee on Organization.
3. Committee on Miscellaneous Matters.
4. Committee on Freedom of Information.

As the request for the extension of the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement[51] had been placed on the agenda by Canada, its disposition may be appropriately discussed first. This request had originally been submitted by Canada in 1944 to the other signatory Governments because of the fact that with wartime conditions limiting radio equipment, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had been unable to establish the stations and facilities to make use of the frequencies accorded to it. If an extension were agreed to, it was hoped to secure enough time to install equipment for the CBC stations using these frequencies. This request had been circulated by the Inter-American Radio Office, and with one exception had been approved by the Governments concerned. The United States suggested that a year's extension should be sufficient, on the understanding that if a further extension were still required it would be sympathetically considered. The only Government which did not reply was the Cuban, and for that reason the Canadian Government asked that its request be placed on the agenda of the Inter-American Radio Communications Conference. When this topic came before the Initiatives Committee for discussion, the Cuban delegate stated that he was under instructions from his Government to oppose any extension. He also expressed his dissatisfaction with the existing frequency allocations which, he felt, were inadequate for Cuba's needs and which, he argued, were the reason for the interference of Cuban stations with the stations of the United States, Mexico and Canada. This interference, in the case of Station CMQ of Havana with Station CBF of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, had already made necessary representations by the Canadian Government to the Cuban Government. Delegates from countries other than those signatory to the Agreement were of the opinion that the question should preferably be discussed only by those governments directly concerned. It was accordingly agreed that there should be informal discussions by representatives of the signatory governments at a meeting to be convened by the Chairman of the United States delegation. At this meeting it became clear that the Cuban opposition to the Canadian proposal largely arose from engineering difficulties, and it was decided that these difficulties should be examined by a sub-committee of technicians. On this committee, Messrs. Bain and Richardson were appointed to represent Canada while the Newfoundland representative asked that Mr. MacKinnon should act on his behalf. The sub-committee unanimously recommended that a Technical Conference should be held in December in Washington to study the situation in detail, with the understanding that the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement should remain in force until these studies have been concluded. This solution was acceptable to the Cuban delegation, which was appreciative of the consideration and understanding of its situation expressed by the other delegates.[52]

During the discussions on the agenda of the Conference in the Initiatives Committee, the United States delegation recommended, and the Committee adopted, the following principles as a basis for the work of the Conference:

1. In general do not duplicate in the Inter-American agreements those provisions which are or have to be in the world agreements.

2. Endeavour to have the World Conference held in 1946, and a further Inter-American Conference immediately thereafter.

3. Revise the Inter-American Convention at this Conference and discuss, but not formally adopt, at this Conference revision of the Inter-American "Arrangement" (Habana 1937, Santiago 1940).

4. Discuss at this Conference proposals for World Conference but not adopt formal agreements.

In recommendating the adoption of these principles the United States delegate stressed the importance of the Conference avoiding the appearance of any attempt to form an American "bloc" on telecommunications questions which might make more difficult the proceedings of the projected World

[52]Un accord intérimaire pour réglementer l'emploi de la bande normale de radiodiffusion dans la région de l'Amerique du Nord fut signé à Washington le 25 février 1946. Canada, Recueil des traités, 1946, N° 8.

Telecommunications Conference. In general, his argument parallelled the views expressed on the Conference by the Assistant Chief of the Division of Telecommunications of the Department of State, who, writing on the eve of the Conference in the Department of State Bulletin for August 26, 1945, declared "the entire purpose of these discussions is a clarification of thinking and an exchange of views which will facilitate the solution at the World Conference of the many and complex problems which will confront it."

In connection with the plans for the World Conference, it is of interest that at a meeting of the Initiatives Committee, the Delegate from Brazil expressed the opinion that the World Telecommunications Conference should be held in Canada. No intimation of this suggestion had previously been given to the Canadian Delegate, but, in thanking his colleague for the suggestion he pointed out that his Government had been given no instructions on this question, and that as Canada had been, or would be the host country for a number of international conferences on such topics as UNRRA, Civil Aviation, and Food and Agriculture, it was anxious to avoid the impression of securing more than its share of these meetings. It was finally decided that the countries of the Western Hemisphere should not press for the World Conference meeting in an American country, but should state their willingness to provide the meeting place if thought desireable by the other Governments. It was also agreed that the United States and the Canadian Delegates at Rio de Janeiro should informally decide as to which of their countries should be the host if it were necessary. Accordingly the United States consented to act as host Country if desired.

In the work of the Technical Committee, the Canadian Delegates played an active part, and were successful in having a set of principles as a guide for deciding the priority of services in the allocation of frequency bands and other related matters, generally approved. The order of priorities agreed upon was:

(a) Radio services involving the preservation of human life and property, where no other means of communication are available.

(b) Essential communication services which must use radio because no other method of communication can be used.

(c) Radio broadcasting, excluding high-frequency (HF) broadcasting.

(d) Essential communication services which find it inexpedient to use other means of communication. High-frequency (HF) broadcasting is placed in this category.

(e) Other radio services.

The Canadian Delegation also secured approval of its nomenclature for the subdivision of the frequency spectrum. The nomenclature read as follows:

Limits in Kilocycles	Designation	Abbreviation
Below 30 kc	Very-low	VLF
30 to 300 kc	Low	LF
300 to 3,000 kc	Medium	MF
3,000 to 30,000 kc	High	HF
30,000 to 300,000 kc	Very-high	VHF
300,000 to 3,000,000 kc	Ultra-high	UHF
3,000,000 to 30,000,000 kc	Super-high	SHF

The United States Delegation was responsible for the presentation of a proposed plan for the allocation of frequency bands to the services. With this plan which was accepted for study in preparation for the projected World

Telecommunications Conference, the Canadian Delegates were in full agreement in principle, while suggesting that certain existing services, or services under development should continue for the time being to operate on the frequencies at present assigned to them. These services include Air Navigational, Maritime Direction Finding, and Municipal Police Services. The Canadian comments on their retention were included in the Conference document† outlining the proposed Allocation Table.

The sub-committee of the Technical Committee dealing with Aeronautical Services reaffirmed, with some clarification, the principles adopted at Santiago in 1940. It also drafted a new recommendation, accepted by the Conference, as follows:

"CONSIDERING:

1. That it is advisable to make a clear distinction between questions relating to facilities granted to the aeronautical services by international radio conventions, and questions relating to the application of these facilities to best advantage from the standpoint of aviation.

2. That it is advisable and necessary to standardize the rules governing the utilization of radio from the point of view of aviation.

3. That the questions referred to in the second part of premise 1 and in premise 2 above should be resolved by the competent international and regional aeronautical organizations.

BE IT RESOLVED:

That the countries of America be invited to accept the following principles:

1st. That questions relating to the utilization of the facilities granted to the aeronautical services by international radio conventions should be resolved by the competent international and regional aeronautical organizations.

2nd. That the countries which are not parties to the above-mentioned aeronautical organizations bind themselves to endeavour to the greatest possible extent, within their own laws, to comply with the decisions of the said organizations, with a view to standardization and uniformity in aeronautical radio communications."

The sub-committee on Meteorological Services examined a proposal by Argentina for a meeting of the Regional Commission on Meteorology, and presented the following recommendation adopted by the Conference:

"IT IS RECOMMENDED:

1st. That there be convened as soon as it is possible to arrange it, a joint meeting of Meteorological Regional Commissions III and IV (O.M.I.),[53] one objective of which should be to determine on an integrated basis, the general requirements for meteorological service and the telecommunications facilities necessary to provide it;

2nd. To assure the necessary coordination, in making the preliminary preparations for the above joint meeting, the Presidents of Regional Commissions III and IV (O.M.I.) are urged to approach the official telecommunications agencies concerned, in order to obtain the attendance at this meeting of appropriate technical telecommunications representatives.

3rd. That wherever synoptic meteorology is dealt with in the projected Interamerican Telecommuniations Convention, or in other documents resulting from Interamerican telecommunications conferences, the expression 'Meteorological Telecommunications' be employed; and

[53]Organisation météorologique internationale.

4th. That the American governments, in the preparation of proposals which they may present for the forthcoming World Telecommunications Conference, employ the expression 'Meteorological Telecommunications' wherever synoptic meteorology is involved."

No major matters were dealt with by the sub-committee on Miscellaneous Technical Matters, but a number of resolutions were adopted on such topics as a continental network of monitoring stations, the standardization of broadcast receiver design, the standardization of time in the American Region, etc.

The Juridical Administrative Committee examined proposals from several Governments covering a wide variety of topics, and as previously described, referred them to the four sub-committees. Arising from the work of these committees the Conference adopted, on recommendation of the Juridical Administrative Committee, two major documents. These were:

1. A new Inter-American Convention on Telecommunications.

2. New regulations for the Inter-American Conferences on Telecommunications.

The new Inter-American Telecommunications Convention, if approved by five signatory governments, will replace the existing Convention drafted in Havana in 1937. It was felt that the advances in telecommunications since Havana made it desirable that all forms of electrical communication should be covered by a single Convention. The United States Delegation, which presented the first draft of the Convention, also thought it advisable to provide for the formation of an Inter-American Telecommunications Union, patterned after the existing world wide Telecommunications Union, and finding its expression chiefly through the periodic Inter-American Conferences.

The Convention contains a definite description of the American Region which, for telecommunication purposes, is deemed to be bounded as follows:

(1) From the North Pole on the meridian approximately 169° W to 65° 30' N latitude, coinciding with the international boundary in Bering Strait;

(2) Thence by great circle in a southwesterly direction to a point located on 50° N latitude, 165° E longitude;

(3) Thence by great circle in a southeasterly direction to a point located on 10° N latitude, 120° W longitude;

(4) Thence directly south on the meridian 120° W longitude to the South Pole;

(5) Thence from the South Pole north on meridian 20° W longitude to the intersection point of parallel 10° S latitude;

(6) Thence by great circle in a northwesterly direction to a point located on 40° N latitude and meridian 50° W longitude;

(7) Thence by great circle in a northeasterly direction to a point located on 72° N latitude, 10° W longitude;

(8) Thence directly north on the meridian 10° W longitude to the North Pole.

After defining the bounds of the American Region, the Convention proceeded to draft regulations for the organization of an Office of Inter-American Telecommunications which will replace the existing Inter-American Radio Office, and possess increased powers that should make it more useful than its predecessor. In that connection, it should be noted that in the Initiatives Committee the Canadian Delegate expressed, on behalf of Canada, as well as Newfoundland, the Bahamas, and the Antilles, the dissatisfaction of these signatories to the existing Convention, with the operation of the present office. The dissatisfaction voiced by Canada was also expressed by the United States, Brazil, and Colombia. It was admitted by the Cuban Government, which, while accepting no responsibility for the working of the Havana Office, gave an undertaking to reform the administration of the existing office, pending the establishment of the new Telecommunications Office which is also to be established at Havana. It is hoped the new office will commence operations on July 1, 1946.

Among the new duties allotted to the Office of Inter-American Telecommunications are included the creation of a department specializing in general broadcasting matters, the publication of a quarterly telecommunications journal, and active participation in the organization of Inter-American Plenipotentiary and Administrative Conferences. In supporting this Office, whose financial maintenance is apportioned on the same basis as its predecessor, the contracting governments agree:

To furnish without delay to the Office of Inter-American Telecommunications (OIT) copies of all provisions of telecommunications legislation and the regulations in force in their respective jurisdictions, and such amendments as may be introduced in these provisions; as well as appropriate statistical, technical and administrative reports relative thereto.

To transmit to the Office of Inter-American Telecommunications (OIT) every six months an official list of the frequencies assigned by them to all broadcasting stations and to notify monthly all changes and additions thereto. Such notifications shall be made in accordance with the procedure adopted in the General Radio Regulations in force and shall also include:

(a) Power actually in use
(b) Maximum contemplated power
(c) Hours of transmission

The required notifications referred to shall be made in all cases, independently of the usual notifications sent to the International Telecommunications Union.

To inform the Office of Inter-American Telecommunications (OIT) of all proposed multilateral conferences and meetings for the exchange of views or the making of agreements on telecommunications subjects affecting the American Region, and the results of such meetings.

In connection with the last-mentioned obligation, it should be noted that the Canadian Delegation succeeded in having this article so drafted as not to interfere with confidential discussions at Conferences of members of the British Commonwealth on their telecommunications problems.

In line with the prevailing tendency in this hemisphere to place as many as possible of the existing technical organizations under the jurisdiction of the Pan-American Union, the Convention provides for general supervision over the administration and finances of the Office by that body. In view of this stipulation and their non-membership in the Union, the Canadian Delegates succeeded in securing a clause which excepted Canada, Newfoundland and the Bahamas from the routine correspondence with the Pan-American Union specified in the Convention. This clause reads as follows:

In all cases where communications with the Governments are specified to be through the agency of the Pan-American Union it will be understood that, with respect to states or colonies which are not members of that Union, the Director of the Office of Inter-American Telecommunications (OIT) may communicate with those Governments directly.

A new feature of the Convention is a section containing draft articles specifying the general principles that should be followed regarding rates for international telecommunication services. With these principles the Canadian Delegation was in general accord. Other new articles contain special provisions concerning the maintenance of frequency measuring stations, the adoption of appropriate measures for the safety of life at sea and in the air, the establishment of facilities for transmission of meteorological information, cooperation between the governments in discovering and locating clandestine and unauthorized stations, provisions for the interchange of cultural broadcast programs, and the adoption of measures to encourage the rapid and economic transmission, dissemination and interchange of news and information among the nations of the American Region.

The internal regulations for Inter-American Conferences which are annexed to this Convention represent a concise and workmanlike redrafting of the rules for the organization and working of such Conferences. They may prove effective in improving the technique of such conferences in future. It should be noted that the Convention has provided for a new type of conference known as an "Administrative Conference" which may meet to adopt and revise regulations on technical and administrative matters, either at intervals of not greater than three years, or at the request of five or more governments party to the Convention, when urgent matters are to be considered. Such Administrative Conferences would be convened at the seat of the Office of Inter-American Telecommunications and under its aegis.

The Rio de Janeiro Conference also studied the Agreement concluded at Santiago of 1940 and decided that, in view of the imminence of a World Telecommunications Conference, and the plans for convening a further Inter-American Conference in Colombia following its deliberations, it was inadvisable to revise the Santiago Agreement. However, the Agreement was examined clause by clause, and various recommendations placed on record for its modificaton in the light of developments since its adoption in 1940. It was thought that this material would be useful in preparation for the World Conference and the next Inter-American Conference.

It has already been mentioned that a special sub-committee was set up on Freedom of Information. The importance of this topic was particularly stressed by the United States Delegation which reminded the other Delegates that the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace at Mexico City in 1945 had urged the American Governments (a) "to recognize the essential obligation they have to guarantee to their peoples free and impartial access to the sources of information," and (b) "to adopt measures separately and jointly to develop unrestricted interchange of information between their peoples." Recognizing that radio was "one of the most effective media for the expression of human thought," the Conference accordingly recommended the drafting of new regulations designed to liberalize the existing rules for the transmission and reception of Press radio transmissions addressed to multiple Press destinations. These regulations were carefully examined and keenly debated by the sub-committee. Although finally adopted by the Conference they were qualified by reservations on the part of Argentina and Paraguay.

In line with these recommendations dealing with freedom of information, were a series of recommendations on reduction of rates for telecommunications service. It should be emphasized that these were not more than recommendations to Governments, but they included suggestions for the reduction as much as reasonably possible of charges for radiotelegrams exchanged between mobile stations of American registry, or between such mobile stations and land stations of the American countries. They called also for a reduction as much as was reasonably possible of rates on Press telegrams and on urgent telegrams. They recommended uniform terminal charges for telegrams exchanged exclusively between American countries, except when considerably more service was rendered by one end of a circuit than the other. They also recommended that on Press and Government telecommuncations no excise tax should be applied, except for services actually rendered, and that on all other telecommunications such taxes should be progressively reduced until they were completely eliminated. Administrations and private companies were asked to give special attention to speeding up the transmission, reception and delivery of Press telegrams and Press radiotelegrams. The Governments were asked to carry out thorough studies of rates and tariffs in order to determine

(a) Elements or factors which should compose a rate.

(b) Possibility and advantages of establishing uniform tariffs also the probable effect of stimulating traffic through the application of low rates.

(c) Fair and equitable division of charges and tariffs.

(d) The possibility of establishing on direct circuits a compensation in words limiting the payments to the differences in words transmitted and received.

(e) The International Monetary Unit and the establishment of its equivalent in the National Currency of each Country.

(f) The establishment of a rate for urgent traffic on a world-wide basis.

In the field of broadcasting the most important recommendation adopted was one which called for a world conference immediately after the next Telecommunications Conference to seek "a satisfactory solution to the problems of high frequency broadcasting." The term "high frequency" is a definition now given to the so-called "short wave transmissions" such as are carried on by Canada's new short wave station at Sackville, New Brunswick. In view of the fact that certain important interests in telecommunications are now of the opinion that short wave broadcasting should be reduced in favour of point to point communications, this recommendation is of considerable importance to Canada whose interest in the short wave field must be carefully watched and protected.

Space prevents the inclusion of detailed discussion of other resolutions adopted by the Juridical-Administrative Committee and approved by the Conference as a whole. There were resolutions, for instance, concerning aviation communications, forwarding of documents related to aviation, frequency modulation broadcasting in the VHF spectrum, standardization of the instruction of radio operators and technicians, and other related matters.

The Drafting Committee was concerned with the organization and parallel rendering in the four official languages (English, French, Spanish and Portuguese) of the various resolutions and documents adopted by the Conference. The services of this Committee were obviously not required until the closing sessions of the Conference. Its work was highly intensive as a consequence and marked by a careful study of the wording of the resolutions and their appropriate translations, which greatly facilitated the work of the Conference.

In conclusion, may I, as Chairman, express my warm appreciation of the able and willing cooperation of all members of the Canadian Delegation at the Conference. The energy and technical skill which they displayed at the meetings of the Committees to which they were assigned made the Canadian contribution to the work of the Conference a considerable one. All members of the Delegation would also, I am sure, wish to record their thanks and appreciation for the generous assistance and hospitality tendered to them by the Ambassador and the personnel of the Canadian Embassy in Brazil.

I have etc.

IMMEDIATE. For Massey from Robertson, Begins: For your information Lord Halifax's speech last night in Toronto[1] was made without any prior consultation with the Canadian authorities. It is already causing serious domestic political difficulties and it was in our view most inopportune. The Prime Minister will probably reply soon after Parliament opens. Meanwhile you should refrain from comment.

IMMEDIATE. PERSONAL AND SECRET. 1. I am greatly distressed to learn from you of the annoyance[2] I have unwittingly caused to the Prime Minister by my Toronto speech.

As regards the speech itself I had in mind the speech made by Cranborne as reported in the Times of November 24th last and the speech of Brooke Claxton in the House of Commons of July 9th last. I deliberately rejected the idea of "single voice" to which Claxton referred.

I had indeed hoped that in the general spirit of much of what I said the Prime Minister would recognize an echo from his own great speech at the Guildhall [sic] in September 1941.[3]

I do not readily appreciate in what way the speech itself, if read as whole, can be used to support the doctrines that would be as unpalatable to myself as I imagine to the Prime Minister.

2. Real cause of distress however for me is the fact that Mr. King himself should feel I have embarrassed him. There is no one for whom I have felt or feel more real affection and respect, and whose friendship I have more valued. Ever since I have been in politics, I have looked up to his statesman-like wisdom and personal character as an example we might all seek to follow, and I can truly say that I have drawn much from influence he has exerted on us all.

3. If you think it is not presumptious please show him this telegram. Quite apart from any public reaction I should for these reasons be very deeply pained at anything that might cloud our own personal relations.

TELEGRAM 270 London, January 28, 1944

MOST SECRET. At a confidential press conference held at the Ministry of Information by Mr. Brendan Bracken[4] on Thursday, January 27, which was attended by Mr. Campbell Moodie of this office, questions were asked and answered as follows:

Question — Was the Halifax speech Lord Halifax's own idea.

Mr. Bracken — Yes, it was Lord Halifax's own idea. The Secretary of State for the Dominions was not consulted about it.

Question — It was not in any way a statement of policy.

Mr. Bracken — No, it was not in any way a statement of policy, the British Government had no knowledge of what Lord Halifax was going to say until they read it in the newspapers. He did not consult with the Dominions Secretary. Everything he said, as a matter of fact, was largely hallowed by antiquity, but whether it is the wisest possible thing at the present moment to talk in Canada of some form of Imperial Federation is, I think, very much open to question. It is a matter of party politics in Canada, and I noticed that South African newpapers gave a few growls when they received his Lordship's oration, and I do not know whether he is over popular in other parts of the British Empire. At any rate, the Prime Ministers are meeting and they will discuss this question as their fathers did before them, and see what can be done, but anything that helps to keep the British Empire together is of the greatest possible benefit to mankind, but let me tell you that the looseness of structure of the British Empire is in many ways one of its greatest advantages.

Question — The British Government will put forward no proposals or suggestions.

Mr. Bracken — I should not think so because if you are going to hold a conference you ought not to arrive with a lot of plans that are more or less set. You ought to listen to the discussions and then try and form some conclusions, but what may be suitable in Canada may not by any means be suitable in South Africa, or vice versa, and the British Empire is not kept together by legalistic codes. It is kept together partly by the Monarchy and much more by sentiment which is very deep and which has survived two of the worst wars in history in which the Dominions have not been primarily interested, and it is one of our duties to the Empire to see that this strain on their manpower does not occur again. Ends.

Le ministre, l'ambassade aux États-Unis, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

SECRET Washington, February 1, 1944

Dear Norman [Robertson]:

I have just read with very much interest your teletype EX-428 of January 31st† giving certain paragraphs from Mr. King's speech last evening[5] which dealt with intra-Commonwealth relations generally and Lord Halifax's Toronto address in particular.

Lord Halifax's address did not, naturally, arouse the attention in this country that it did in Canada. I have, however, seen two or three editorials which have dealt with it in a non-commital, but certainly not a disapproving, way. His Lordship is, I think, somewhat surprised at the commotion that he has caused. Those who advised him to speak as he did certainly did him no service.

It seems quite clear that during the coming months we are going to hear a good deal about Commonwealth relations, and a lot of what we hear will be based on loose thought and superficial reasoning. We shall, I think, have to decide whether the history of the last ten years has changed the problem of Canada's position in the Commonwealth and Canada's position in any wider international organization. Certainly we now know — or should know — that there is no safety in a League of Nations which does not make adequate provision for peaceful change and police action against the aggressor. We shall, I think, have to revise our attitude toward any future Article X or Article XVI of an international convenant. We have also, I think, learned something from our Commonwealth experience. We had little to do with British foreign policy leading up to the present war, but we were as deeply involved in the results of that policy as Great Britain herself. That being the case, surely we should seek to influence British policy in some way when it appears to be going in the wrong direction. I do not mean by this that we should adopt certain ideas now being thrown out by various British Commonwealth leaders which look to the British Commonwealth as a unit in international affairs. If we act as a unit, I do not see how we can act also separately and maintain the national and international position we have gained. We can't have it both ways. Therefore, there is only one way. It is, I think, quite impossible for us, even if we so desired, to reverse the history of the last twenty years. The Prime Minister was, in my opinion, absolutely right when he deprecated this talk of a British Commonwealth unit in foreign affairs; talk based on views held, I'm afraid, in pretty high quarters, in the White House, in No. 10. Acting in unison as separate States is one thing; acting as a unit is quite another. I suppose you have noticed developments of the last few days in Moscow, where the Russians appear to be dividing up their State into a Russian Commonwealth of Nations. It looks as if they may flatter us by imitation, just at the time when there are some among us who desire to abandon the model which they are imitating.

[5]Canada, Chambre des communes, Débats, 1944, volume I, pp. 37-44.
Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1944, Volume I, pp. 36-42.

Canada is achieving, I think, a very considerable position as a leader, if not the leader, among a group of States which are important enough to be necessary to the Big Four but not important enough to be accepted as one of that quartet. As a matter of fact, the position of a "little Big Power" or "big Little Power" is a very difficult one, especially if the "little Big Power" is also a "big Dominion". The big fellows have power and responsibility, but they also have control. The little fellows have no power and no responsibility; therefore are not interested in control. We "in between" States sometimes get, it seems, the worst of both worlds. We are necessary but not necessary enough! I think this is being felt by countries like The Netherlands and Belgium as well as by ourselves. That is why these countries are not only looking toward the Big Powers, but are looking toward each other for support. There is, I think, an opportunity for Canada, if we desire to take it, to become the leader of this group. This might be not only desirable in itself, but also would supply a useful corrective to those who think we should exercise no influence except within the confines of the British Commonwealth. It need not affect in any way our relationship within that Commonwealth, so our "Imperialists" could not object to it. By emphasizing our international position outside the Commonwealth, it should appeal to our nationalists and our internationalists.

As it happens, a group of people in Washington have been discussing how the influence of these middle Powers can best be exerted at the present time so as to ensure that the future world organization be based on all States and not merely on four. You will recall that we decided — I think very wisely — to oppose any automatical accession to the Moscow Declaration[6] on this question of post-war organization. Certain people here, however, think that the time has come when the States which were not represented at Moscow, but which are important in their own right, should themselves take initiative by a resolution or declaration, or some such act, in supporting the Moscow statement that the post-war organization should be a genuine United Nations one. To that end, they have drawn up a Declaration — which is still in very rough form — which the Governments concerned might make. I am attaching three copies of it,† and would be glad to get your views on it. If by any chance Canada wished to take the lead in this matter, I think she would find certain other Governments — I have mentioned two or three above — which would be most responsive to that lead and might be glad to associate themselves with our Government in a Declaration of this kind.

I have done this note in a great hurry — I had hoped to spend much more time on it — but John Deutsch is leaving by plane in an hour or so, and I thought that if I finished it before he left you might get it at once and we could talk about it over the week-end.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

PERSONAL CONFIDENTIAL London, February 2, 1944

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I am enclosing copy of a memorandum prepared in the Foreign Office on the subject of Intra-Imperial Relations, which I think you will find interesting. The history of this document is that it was written in the Dominions Information Section of the Foreign Office. It was seen and approved by Mr. Law[7] and Sir Alexander Cadogan and printed as a Foreign Office Print, so that it has that measure of the authority of the Foreign Office behind it, although I do not know that Mr. Eden has seen it.

As I thought that this memorandum would be useful to you and to Mr. Robertson I obtained a copy but was asked not to pass it on until the Foreign Office had consulted with the Dominions Office as to whether it was a suitable document for circulation. Apparently this approval has not yet been secured from the Dominions Office. I think, therefore, that we should respect this confidence and that this document should not be mentioned in conversation with the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Ottawa or any members of his staff as this might make difficulties between the Dominions Office and the Foreign Office.

I am anxious to hear how the memorandum strikes you. It is interesting to compare the attitude towards machinery for Commonwealth consultation, expressed in paragraph 5, with certain subsequent public pronouncements. I think on the whole the memorandum is a pretty shrewd appraisal of the realities of the situation from the United Kingdom point of view.

Yours sincerely,

C. S. A. RITCHIE

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Mémorandum du Foreign Office concernant les relations au sein de la Commonwealth britannique

Memorandum by Foreign Office on British Commonwealth Relations

CONFIDENTIAL [London,] November 30, 1943

THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

After four years of war it may be useful to review the general attitude of the Dominions other than Eire, and to draw attention to certain tendencies which have become apparent.

2. The war has proved the cohesion of the British Commonwealth in a way which has surprised the world and probably a good many individuals in the Commonwealth as well. When there was no immediate threat to their territories, the Dominions voluntarily came into the war, and they remained firm throughout the dark days of 1940. That is, of course, only part of the story, but it showed an appreciation of global strategy that was not shared by some other countries in similar postions. The circumstances in which they declared war and their actual war efforts varied, and vary, to some extent. Then our successive defeats on many fronts, following a hesitant pre-war policy, made them question our political and military leadership and enhanced their understandable tendency towards independent action. Above all, it made the Dominions turn more markedly towards the United States, and it has since become evident that the latter as a factor in Dominion affairs have come to stay.

3. In their habits and ways of living, people of the Dominions, with the exception of French Canadians and possibly South Africans, are in many respects more akin to Americans than to ourselves. This may not make them like each other any more when they come into contact, but it will, together with their comparative geographical remoteness from Europe, make them look at many international problems from very much the same angle. The fact that they have all emerged from a colonial status must give them some identity of outlook, and may indeed colour their views on the future of colonies as a whole. Whereas, however, Canada apparently shares the traditional American reluctance to undertake colonial commitments, Australia and perhaps South Africa, either on grounds of the necessity for more "modern" methods of colonial administration, or on account of their own strategical needs, appear to wish to participate in the administration of further dependencies, including parts of the British Empire, and even of the colonial possessions of other Powers. The political and strategic interests of the Dominions and the United States, also, are now interwoven to an extent that guarantees their mutual collaboration to a greater or lesser degree for decades. Finally, their association with the United States in the war gives the Dominions a sense of their ability to act independently of the United Kingdom, while, on the other hand, membership of the Commonwealth affords them protection from any undue assumption of our mantle on the part of the United States. A balance is thus emerging which may in the long run either be advantageous to all English-speaking peoples or create a situation fatal both to the harmony of the Commonwealth and to Anglo-American relations.

4. As regards the feelings of the Dominions towards us, there would appear to be preponderantly a sentiment of loyalty to the Commonwealth idea, qualified by a certain feeling of frustration at their comparatively junior position vis-à-vis the United Kingdom, and some jealousy of each other, and no large body of opinion outside the South African Opposition parties in favour of secession. There is also a definite and not to be underestimated sentimental attachment to the "Mother Country" and to our common history, but this goes with an extreme sensitivity regarding their own sovereign rights and no great love for the home-grown Englishman as such. Despite our recent military achievements, there is still a considerable feeling that they are tougher and "freer" than we are; they are inclined to misconstrue the different sense of discipline of our armed forces as subservience and to attribute it to an outmoded social system. Nor can they get rid of the suspicion that we are fundamentally old-fashioned and may therefore ensnare their unsuspecting statesmen into reactionary policies.

5. The problem is to preserve and improve the unity of the Commonwealth and yet satisfy the Dominions that the fullest use and development of their newly attained independence will in no way be impaired. There is perhaps not a great deal we can do directly to maintain the structure of the Commonwealth. That depends more on common interests rather than on any formal action by us to strengthen existing ties. Public and even official opinion in the Dominions may from time to time demand the creation of imperial machinery for post-war consultation but it appears certain, although events may always take an unexpected turn, that Dominion Governments as a whole will not consent to any step which might limit their independence of action or even seem to do so in the eyes of other nations. It has also been shown on a number of occasions, notably at the International Food Conference at Hot Springs this year,[8] that they will shy off any publicly acknowledged arrangement which binds them to act as a Commonwealth unit and which even hints at the exclusion of the United States. Nor would a formalisation of relations accord with the essential flexibility of the Commonwealth. What would perhaps be more desirable are frequent informal and personal consultations and contacts at all levels, a strengthening of representation between ourselves and the Dominions and between the Dominions themselves and closer collaboration between our diplomatic missions abroad as the Dominions expand their Foreign Services.

6. As regards the further problem of Dominion representation at post-war conferences, there is no ideal solution. In general and so long as our representation of their interests is strictly informal and not officially assumed, the Dominions will generally allow and even expect the United Kingdom Goverment to act for the Commonwealth in matters of major political or strategic importance such as would be discussed by the four World Powers.

[8]Voir le volume 9, documents 716-32./See Volume 9, Documents 716-32.

They may be reluctant to accept even this subordination of their individual representation, but they will probably do so because they realise that this is the best way of advancing their point of view and so obtaining a greater say in formulating policy than the minor Powers. On the other hand, they will insist on separate representation at all United Nations conferences, as well as at any conferences or on any commissions which are directly concerned with their particular areas and functions. Due provision for this is accordingly being made in plans that are being elaborated for the post-war World on a regional and functional basis.

7. While there may not therefore be a great deal that we can do directly, there is a great deal that we can do indirectly to maintain the reality of the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth still depends almost exclusively for its continued existence on the United Kingdom and on United Kingdom leadership. The moment we cease to be a World Power the Commonwealth automatically dissolves, because, despite their common origin and other bonds, the Dominions (with the possible exception of Australia and New Zealand) have no strong political affinities between themselves. It follows that the maintenance of the Commonwealth depends chiefly on our showing as a World Power; our ability to co-operate on equal terms with the Americans; the maintenance of the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force at a level and in places which will contribute to the security of the Dominions; and, to a lesser extent, the demonstration of our progressiveness in all fields, not least those of social and economic reform. It is our showing as a European Power which may be expected to decide the attitude of Russia towards the Commonwealth. The Russians are well aware that we are the mainspring of the Commonwealth, and they may therefore judge it by the results of the Twenty-Year Pact.[9] If this works out well, the Russians should regard the Commonwealth and Empire with an open mind. If not, they will reinsure elsewhere and presumably look upon the Commonwealth, though not necessarily the individual Dominions, with disfavour, while their ideological dislike of the dependent Empire will be given fresh impetus. On their side, the Dominions will probably not be inclined for some time to do anything more than admire Russia from a safe distance, and this period should coincide with Russia's preoccupation in her own internal reconstruction. Meanwhile they will probably be more realistic than the United States in appreciating the need for concessions to Russian views.

8. It seems clear that we must be prepared to do two things. First, we must in future regard the Dominions not so much as offspring of the Mother Country but as fellow members of the United Nations, whose goodwill we already have in large measure and wish to retain on the basis that the more friends we have the better. We must do this because a clear-eyed approach to the question of Commonwealth relations, as opposed to a sentimental one, is necessary if we are not to endanger our relations with English-speaking peoples by becoming resentful either of the behaviour of the Dominions, who are naturally determined to have the best of both worlds, or of the intervention of the United States in Commonwealth affairs. It will help us to do this if we realise that, although the Dominions are very useful to us and we to them, we could still be a Great Power without them. We are a Great Power not merely by reason of our striking-power, our national cohesion and our colonial empire, but also by virtue of our political and economic experience and recognised leadership among the other Powers, helped by the unique position of London in the financial world. The foregoing does not mean that the Dominions value their membership of the United Nations above that of the Commonwealth. Probably the reverse is the case. Nor does it mean that we can dispense with their support any more than we can afford to alienate the confidence of any Power. We are a much greater World Power with the addition of Dominion man-power and industry and with the advantages provided by their geographic positions, while without us they would only be minor Powers. This insistence on flexibility and informality does mean, however, that the family bond which undoubtedly exists and which we should continue to make use of as a fund of goodwill and assistance in interntional relations cannot be presumed upon and must not be exclusive.

9. Secondly, we must accept with good grace, though with no apologies for the past and indeed some insistence on our rights, the fact that the United States is now in an undefined way associated with the Commonwealth. It is asking a lot of human nature to expect manifold rivalries and jealousies to merge eventually into a workable collaboration of English-speaking peoples, but any reasonable plan for the future demands as much, and this first step forward may initiate some wider scheme about which, as Mr. Curtin has said, "men have dreamed". Under the pressure of war a beginning has been made. How far it can be continued when we are faced with the problems of peace cannot be foretold. It has been well said that the majority of human problems are not solved so much by deliberate design as by the process of living through them and coming out at the other end.

My dear Prime Minister,

I have intended to write to you for several days, but put it off each day because I knew how busy you were, and I have failed to do so in the last few days because I went to New York to meet my wife who was just returning from England.

I had it, however, very much at heart to tell you how vexed and distressed I had been to learn through Malcolm MacDonald of the annoyance I had caused to you by my speech at Toronto. I asked him to give you a message in this sense from me[10], but I wish to reinforce it by a personal line.

Quite apart from the merits or demerits of anything in my speech, I have been greatly disturbed to think that I should in any way have added to your difficulties at the present time, and I would beg you to accept my assurances that nothing was further from my thought or desire. I have admired the general wisdom with which you have given counsel to us all too much to make me unmindful of all the considerations that must be constantly present to your thought.

Nor do I think that our thought would be found in any substantial way to differ on this question. Perhaps one of these days there may be an opportunity of talking about it. I should value it very much.

With every good wish and again with many personal regrets that I should unwittingly have caused you annoyance,

Believe me,

Yours very sincerely,

My dear Charles [Ritchie],

I was greatly interested in the Foreign Office memorandum called "The British Commonwealth" which was enclosed with your personal letter of February 2nd. I enclose a copy of a note which I sent to Norman and he tells me that he endorses the points made in it. I think on the whole that it may be just as well that the document has not been circulated officially. It could, however, be recast without a great deal of trouble in a form suitable for official circulation.

I am going to send copies personally to Dana in Moscow and Mike in Washington and I shall show the paper to two or three other people here. If this results in further comments of value I shall write to you again.

You may find an opportunity to do some useful work in London in criticizing along the lines I suggest.

Yours sincerely,

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa,] February 7, 1944

The attached letter from Ritchie covers a very interesting and on the whole encouraging Foreign Office document on Commonwealth relations. The policies proposed in paragraphs 7, 8 and 9 seem to me sensible and realistic. I wish that they would be practised in deed and in word by Mr. Churchill, Lord Halifax and others.

My main criticism, and I think it is really rather a vital one, concerns the phraseology adopted. So long as they go on generalizing in London about "the Dominions" they will mislead themselves and produce unnecessary reasons for friction. Note, for example, at the beginning of paragraph 4 the phrase "the feelings of the Dominions towards us." They would not write in the Foreign Office about the feelings of Europe or even the feelings of Latin America towards the United Kingdom. It is true, of course, that there is some substance to this lumping together of all the Dominions but I think that it is far less substantial than it was a couple of decades ago and that in the younger generation in Canada what might be called "Dominion consciousness" is almost non-existent.

On a first reading, apart from this general criticism, I have not a great deal to add. I think that in paragraph 3 the argument that because Canada was once a colony this gives it a special public opinion on colonial questions is unsound. The truth there is that we are geographically remote from colonial areas in the normal sense and we contain great undeveloped territories inside our national boundaries. I think also that the generalization about the attitude of the Dominions towards Russia in the latter part of paragraph 7 is unsound mainly for the very reason that this is one of the things on which we cannot assume a "Dominion point of view."

As a whole I find the memorandum encouraging in substance and mildly irritating in form. In view of the way in which it has reached us I am not sure what use we can put it to. It does give us a good opportunity to send some pointed comments to Canada House which can be disseminated tactfully among United Kingdom officials.

[Ottawa,] February 17, 1944

On the whole this memorandum strikes me as a sensible analysis from the point of view of the United Kingdom. In view of the Smuts and Halifax speeches[11] it is refreshing to see the United Kingdom represented as a Great Power. Another good point is in showing the United Kingdom as a common denominator in the Commonwealth. Canadian opinion, at least, always sees Commonwealth relations in terms of the United Kingdom.

I agree with the points noted by Mr. Wrong.

Since the Foreign Office Memorandum is frankly and quite properly written from the United Kingdom point of view, it would be useful if the same situation could be examined from the Canadian point of view.

Mémorandum de l'adjoint, le ministère des Affaires extérieures, au sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Assistant, Department of External Affairs, to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] February 19, 1944

NOTE FOR MR. WRONG

It is to be hoped that this cool appraisal of the weaknesses and strengths of the United Kingdom position is typical of contemporary thinking in the Foreign Office.

I should agree with the comments of Mr. Wrong and Mr. Glazebrook, particularly with regard to the generalizations about the views of "the Dominions".

The most encouraging fact about this memorandum is that it indicates an interpretation of the Commonwealth which, although regarded from the U.K. point of view, is not dissimilar from what might be called the views of this Department — a fact which should facilitate collaboration.

The rejection of the sentimental approach is worth noting. While this should mean that the United Kingdom will not try to take advantage of us by appealing to imperial sentimentality, it may also mean that we shall not be able to get away with the sentimental approach either. We may find it difficult to try to eat our cake and have it. Britain, it is pointed out, can get along without us.

[11]Pour le discours de Smuts, voir:/For Smuts' speech, see:
J. C. Smuts, Thoughts on the New World. London, Empire Parliamentary Association, 1943.

There are several minor points which might be noted: The suggestion in paragraph 3 that the United States and the Dominions have, because of their emergence from colonial status, a common viewpoint on colonies is, as Mr. Wrong has pointed out, unsound. It might be argued, on the other hand, that the radically different ways in which the United States on the one hand and the Dominions on the other emerged from colonial status have given them differing views. History is to some extent at least responsible for the emphasis placed by Americans on political independence as a panacea for colonial problems, an attitude which is less widespread even in Canada.

The last two sentences in paragraph 7 suggest that the Foreign Office has accepted the principles of functional representation.

I think that the statement that the United Kingdom must remain strong in order to hold the Commonwealth together may be right, although I am not certain. A relative decline in the strength of the U.K. and a relative increase in strength on the part of the Dominions would make equality of function as much of a reality as equality of status. Such a situation might render collaboration easier than at present, as there would be less fear in the Dominions that Commonwealth consultation would mean domination from London.

RE: THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

I was interested in the bootlegged copy of the Foreign Office memorandum of November 30th which you sent me, with copies of your letter to Mike[†] and your memorandum to Norman.

As I have already said, I agree entirely with your comments. I like the comparatively hard-boiled approach a good deal better than the mixture of old Toryism and sentimentality to which we are often enough subjected. Further, there is a good substance of truth in the analysis. On the other hand, like you, I feel there is something vaguely irritating about the general tone.

Apart from my agreement with your own comments, I might add:

(a) I do not think the strength of "the Commonwealth idea" (paragraph 4) is much of a factor so far as Canada is concerned — the attachment to Britain herself is much more important;

(b) the contention that the maintenance of the Commonwealth depends chiefly on Britain's "showing as a world power", ability to co-operate on equal terms with the Americans and maintenance of large defence forces (paragraph 7) is a good deal less applicable to us than to the members of the new South Pacific axis;

(c) I think we have gone beyond "admiring Russia from a safe distance;" it seems to me we have the real beginning of something a good deal more direct and individual.

The main point, of course, is yours. You cannot continue to lump "the Dominions" together and draw any conclusions of any value. Let's get rid of the term altogether.

PERSONAL Ottawa, March 3, 1944

Dear Lord Halifax:

I hope you will forgive me for having been so long in acknowledging your kind letter of February the 8th; also the message which came to me from you through Malcolm Macdonald, some days earlier — each in reference to the concern I felt as to the possible reactions throughout Canada for the speech you delivered before the Toronto Board of Trade on January the 24th.

I did ask Malcolm Macdonald to let you know of my appreciation of your word to me through him and to express my thanks for your kind thought in all that it expressed. But for the exceptional pressure of my duties during the past month, I would, long before this, have written to thank you for both your message through Malcolm and for your letter.

What I said in Parliament in reply to the Speech from the Throne — a copy of which, I understand, you have since seen — will have been sufficient to let you see the cause of my concern with respect to the speech itself. Quite frankly, it was not so much a feeling of annoyance as of dismay which overcame me when I gained for the first time, through the medium of the press and the radio, any knowledge of what had been said at Toronto and, in particular, of the parts of the address which were being featured. No subject in Canadian politics over the past forty years has occasioned more in the way of controversy than that of intra-Imperial relations as related to foreign policy and defence. To have had the subject brought up at all at a time of war, and in Toronto of all places in Canada seemed, for the moment, just too much for me to have to face, knowing what the reactions in certain parts of Canada were certain to be.

The Toronto gathering, as you will recall, was on Monday, the 24th of January — the week in which our Parliament met to wind up the business of the fourth session, and to begin, on the following day, that of the fifth session. I saw instantly that the whole subject would come up for debate on the address and that it would be necessary for me to say something upon it in my first speech in the new session.

The last thing that I had hoped would occur in the course of the war was that, in any way, it might come to be necessary for me to say so much as a word which might be construed as indicating a divergence of view between Canada and any other part of the Commonwealth in a matter which pertained to the well-being of the whole. As you will have seen from what I said in the House, I did my best to silence, for the time being at least, further discussion in Parliament and in the press. From the controversy which notwithstanding has arisen, you will find, I am sure, that my fears at the time were not without justification. My feeling was not against controversy as such, since the questions raised by your address in Toronto were certainly deserving of careful study and mature deliberation, but against controversy arising at that particular time.

I need hardly say that at no time have I entertained so much as the thought that you would take any step which you might have reason to feel would occasion me, in my present responsibilities, the slightest embarrassment. I am only too grateful for the personal friendship which, over many years, you have permitted me to share, and also for what your life and work and example have meant to me over that period of time.

Again let me express my regret at having been so long in thanking you for your letter. I thank you for it most warmly.

With kindest personal remembrances and, as always, warmest regards and best of wishes,

Believe me, dear Lord Halifax,

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Washington, March 21, 1944

Dear Hume [Wrong]:

A month or so ago you were good enough to send us a memorandum on "The British Commonwealth" which Charles Ritchie had procured, in some devious way, from the Foreign Office. I agree with you that this is a "shrewd appraisal" of the existing situation, showing a good deal of insight and knowledge, with an occasional mildly irritating attitude or expression allowed to creep in.

I note that in your memorandum to Norman[12] you quarrel with the practice in London of generalizing about "the Dominions". I know how you feel. This is annoying and, of course, often misleading. Yet I do not see how we can always avoid it as long as we are members of a Dominions group. It would be less annoying, and less misleading, if we could include the United Kingdom in that group. That would at least emphasize that such a group has little uniformity of political or economic, or even social, views.

I think one might take exception to the first sentence of paragraph 3 of the memorandum. Apart from ourselves, I do not think the other members of the Commonwealth are in many respects more akin to Americans than to Englishmen. Do you feel that what is termed "our emergence from a colonial status" has had any influence on our views on colonial questions generally? I think it extremely doubtful myself.

I find myself unable to accept the assumption in the last two sentences of paragraph 4; that the feeling indicated has no basis whatever in fact. I still think that, in some respects at least, Canadians are tougher and freer and less old-fashioned than they are in the "old country".

In paragraph 5 the statement is made, and it is certainly a correct one, that the "Dominion Governments as a whole will not consent to any step which might limit their independence of action or even seem to do so in the eyes of other nations." It never seems to occur to the people in London that acceptance of the imperial machinery suggested would limit the U.K. as well as the Dominion Governments. The fact that it never does occur to them is one of the best reasons for our rejection of it, because it indicates that the limitation is meant to be pretty one-sided.

I wonder what the writer is getting at when he states that the Hot Springs Conference proved our reluctance to accept any limitation of our independence. This question never arose there; at least to my knowledge. There was no suggestion at that Conference that we should act as a unit, though I believe the South Africans quibbled at the proposal that the Commonwealth delegations might occasionally meet together. The writer may have been thinking of that.

An extremely important statement is made in paragraph 6, that "the Dominions will generally allow and even expect the United Kingdom Government to act for the Commonwealth in matters of major political or strategic importance." In so far as Canada is concerned, don't you think that this is going a little too far, though I admit that the practice of the last four or five years gives the writer some ground for assuming that it is true?

Paragraph 7 and the first part of paragraph 8 are, I think, very good. Lord Halifax apparently would not agree with the statement that "although the Dominions are very useful to us and we to them, we could still be a Great Power without them."

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, April 21, 1944

Dear Mike [Pearson],

Thank you for your letter of March 21st about the Foreign Office memorandum on the British Commonwealth. You will be interested to know that Earnscliffe enquired informally as to whether we had heard of or seen this document and we admitted that it had reached us also informally. Garner and Costley-White came down and had a talk with Holmes and Glazebrook about the memorandum and points arising out of it. The two former were relieved and interested to find that on the whole we thought the memorandum took a useful line. For some reason the Dominions Office seems to have short-circuited and they were not very happy about this process.

Some of the points which you mention in your letter were taken up during this conversation, one of them the habit of generalizing "about the Dominions". But it is difficult to find any short alternative way of describing them in writing or conversation.

I quite agree with your suggestion in the third paragraph of your letter and I do not think that Canadians have any special qualifications for or interest in colonial questions.

I quite agree with your conclusion about the contradiction between the statement that the Dominion Governments are anxious to preserve their independence of action and the plans for Imperial machinery. As to the willingness of the Dominion Governments to allow the United Kingdom to act for them, I agree that this is not as true as it once was though we are still a long way from a readiness to express views on policy firmly at the time when policy is being made. This, however, is a generalization which has had important exceptions and I think you feel that the exceptions will tend to become the rule in time.

I am inclined to think that the train of thought started by the Foreign Office memorandum may be quite useful and healthy. Whether the Dominions Office are to carry on the analysis we haven't as yet heard. Several of us were interested in seeing the Foreign Office looking at the Commonwealth from a United Kingdom point of view rather than making an attempt to define the interests of the Commonwealth as a whole. There is, in general, a more realistic touch in the Foreign Office memorandum than has appeared in most documents on the same subject. I will let you know if there are any further developments.

Mémorandum du troisième secrétaire, le ministère des Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Third Secretary, Department of External Affairs

[Ottawa], April 21, 1944

COMMONWEALTH COMMITMENTS FOR CANADA
AS FACTORS FOR CONSIDERATION
IN CONNECTION WITH GENERAL SECURITY

(1) The achievement of world security must be the paramount consideration of policy and, consequently, no commitments should be made which would in any way impede the achievement of the objectives which are considered necessary for it.

(2) It was stated by the Prime Minister in the House on January 31, 1944, that world security depends on

(a) "preserving on the side of peace a large superiority of power, so that those who wish to disturb the peace can have no chance of success", and

(b) the creation of "an effective international system inside which the cooperation of all peace-loving countries is freely sought and given."

(3) It has been suggested by Lord Cranborne, speaking at the Guildhall on November 23, 1943, and by Lord Halifax, speaking at Toronto in January, 1944, that the Commonwealth should aim at having "one single foreign policy" (Cranborne) or a common policy in respect of defence and foreign affairs (Halifax). Any commitments toward such objectives would be justifiable from the point of view of Canada only if the objectives contemplated

(a) would not hamper the achievement of a general system of security; and

(b) would allow a policy which could be adapted sufficiently closely to the needs and interests of Canada within that system of security.

(4) In view partly of the way in which the arguments in favour of Commonwealth unity in policy have been advanced thus far, but in view more especially of the intrinsic nature of the proposal, it is inevitable that such a move would be seen by other countries as the formation of a power bloc to increase the strength and influence of a particular segment of the peaceful nations, from which the rest are excluded. The effect of this would be to encourage the tendency to form such blocs, which would cut across the lines of general cooperation on which international security must be based. The result would be to encourage forces which would disrupt the entire framework of security.

(5) The influence of the countries of the Commonwealth will be in the direction of peace. Their influence will be greatest if they can act in harmony on the issues which are deemed to be fundamental in the maintenance of peace and in the context of a group of nations which do not suspect them of combining forces on all matters in an effort to obtain a predominant influence whatever the merits of a question at issue may be. Any such suspicion can be best allayed if there is no formal obligation to act as a bloc, and if reliance is placed rather on the community of tradition, history and culture and on a full and free exchange of views, to ensure that action will be in harmony on all issues in which a matter of fundamental importance is involved.

(6) Even assuming that no resentment at or emulation of such a "bloc" were forthcoming, and that it did not positively interfere with the achievement of general cooperation, it would be an advantage only if it did in fact produce a general continuity of policy which would add to the joint strength of the individual members as forces for peace. However, the interest of the various members of the Commonwealth are diverse in many respects, and their relations with other countries vary widely as a result of geographical position, economic relations and other matters. An attempt to fit the interests of all into a Procrustean bed of common policy would produce such friction that it would be likely to vitiate and stultify the efforts toward unity of policy in issues affecting the maintenance of peace. The Commonwealth has gained strength through the freedom of its relations which meant that there was little cause for friction, and thus unity, when it was necessary, could be achieved by free cooperation and brought wholehearted effort behind a policy decided on by each member of its own volition.

(7) In summary, it can well be argued that the proposals for a common policy would effect, not only a relative diminution in the influence of the Commonwealth as a force for peace, but also a positive diminution in that influence.

(8) So far as the position of Canada herself is concerned, Canadian relations with the United States are of a character different from those of any other part of the Commonwealth. Her position as an American nation is something unknown to any other member. Any Commonwealth commitments which would interfere with the adaptation of Canadian policy to the vital interests arising out of her geographical position would be intolerable. The flexibility of policy necessary for the successful maintenance of Canadian relations in the Americas could not be achieved if prior consideration had to be given to the possible necessity of modifications and amendments in the light of more remote and general interests of other British nations.

(9) The onus is on those who would radically alter the Commonwealth relationships and, in fact, reverse the whole trend of development, to show beyond any possible doubt that their innovations would effect a great and certain improvement. The results thus far have been good. The loss could be enormous and the risk is great of incurring such loss by tampering with present relationships.

(10) Lord Cranborne suggested on November 23 that "a British Commonwealth of Nations with divided councils on international affairs would lose all its influence" and concluded that we must have "one single foreign policy". The conclusion is not a necessary or even a sound one. What is wanted is a community in attitude resulting in a harmony of policy. An attempt at forced community of policy might defeat the very objective that is sought.

(11) No regard has been had in this argument to the constitutional and legal problems involved, such as the responsibility of distinct executives to distinct legislatures for a common policy. Some of these appear to be virtually insoluble on the basis of a parliamentary democratic system but their consideration appears unnecessary at this juncture.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut commissaire en Grande-Bretagne

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in Great Britain

DESPATCH 707 Ottawa, June 7, 1944

Sir,

It has been brought to my notice as a result of the recent meeting of the International Labour Conference in Philadelphia that the representatives of the Government, Employers and Workers of the United Kingdom continue to be described in the official record of proceedings as Government Delegate, Employers' Delegate and Workers' Delegate of the British Empire. The use of this title to describe a delegation appointed by the Government of the United Kingdom is so much of an anachronism that it is desirable that a change should be made at the instance of the United Kingdom Government.

This description was, of course, employed during the Peace Conference and in the signature of the Treaty of Versailles in 1919. It was discontinued, however, in 1927 with respect to representation on the League Council and Assembly. In the records of the last meeting of the Assembly the description is used "Delegation of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland." The change made in 1927 followed on the discussions at the Imperial Conference of 1926. Sir Austen Chamberlain on March 9th, 1927, at a meeting of the League Council made a statement "at the express desire of all the Governments represented at the Imperial Conference" requesting that the form of treaties negotiated under the auspices of the League should be altered. His statement included the following paragraph:

The Covenant of the League of Nations has omitted to take note of the fact that there is an entity Great Britain, as well as the Dominions. The seat which I occupy here and in the Assembly is attributed by the Covenant to the "British Empire", but the Dominions sit in the Assembly in their own names. Great Britain appears nowhere, and the existing form of treaty concluded under the auspices of the League, therefore, causes us some inconvenience. If the League were willing to revert to the older and well-established form, it would facilitate our acceptance of treaties negotiated under its auspices.

Sir Austen Chamberlain's statement was particularly concerned with the form of treaties. The action taken by the League of Nations resulted in the replacement of the term "British Empire" by the term "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland" on the list of members of the League and of delegations to the Assembly from the Thirteenth Assembly of 1932 onwards.

It is felt that the practice adopted by the League of Nations should also be followed in the case of the International Labour Organization and I should be glad if you would ask the United Kingdom authorities to take the necessary steps to bring about this formal change. The desirability of such a change has been increased by the extensive use of the term "British Empire and Commonwealth" to indicate all the territories collectively which owe allegiance to the King. I am not aware of any particular reason which has brought about the survival of the old terminology in the case of the International Labour Organization. To secure a change all that would be necessary would probably be for the United Kingdom Government to address a formal communication to the Acting Director of the International Labour Office or perhaps to the Chairman of the Governing Body and also to issue credentials using the new style to their delegates at future International Labour Conferences.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of copy of despatch No. 707 of June 7, 1944, addressed to the High Commissioner for Canada in London, in which he is instructed to object officially to the use of the title "Delegate of the British Empire" by the United Kingdom delegates to the International Labour Conference recently held in Philadelphia.

2. I should like to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the receipt of the copy of this despatch to mention that I believe the uncertainty about the international position of Canada in the minds of Soviet citizens could be cleared up if more precise definitions could be given to the terms "British Empire" and "British Commonwealth of Nations". The latter term was adopted after the passage of the Statute of Westminister to describe the position of free and equal partners in an association of nations, but the term is not becoming accepted on account of obstinate refusal to use it by those who are unwilling to admit the full implications of that historic document.

3. Viewed from one sense the use of the title "Delegate of the British Empire" by representatives of the United Kingdom is not so much an anachronism, if by "British Empire" could be understood the territory embraced by the United Kingdom and the colonies, reserving the term "British Commonwealth of Nations" to describe that association of nations of which Canada is a member. If official steps could be taken to assure the future distinction between the two terms our international position would then become clear not only to people in the Soviet Union but also to those in the United States and other countries who are now misled by the loose phraseology used to describe what is a very subtle relationship difficult of comprehension by minds trained to formal and explicit political relationships.

4. The word "Empire" has come to connote a metropolitan area to which is subordinate a group of other areas. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, together with the colonies and dependencies, embraces a territory to which this term can very aptly be applied. It is, however, in its modern connotation a misnomer when applied to all the territory under the sovereignty of His Majesty. It is true that the title "Emperor" is only included among those of His Majesty in respect of India, but this fact could be used as an argument against any use of the word "Empire" to describe territory under the sovereignty of His Majesty apart from India.

5. We cannot rightfully object when Mr. Churchill and other British statesmen use the designation "British Empire" to describe the territory which is governed undisputably by the Government of the United Kingdom, but we can point out that the term "British Commonwealth of Nations" is a more correct description when they wish to use a term to describe territory that includes Canada. A short time ago Sir Archibald Sinclair in the House of Commons declared that the United Kingdom was prepared to participate in an international conference on civil aviation "as an empire" adding that this term related to the United Kingdom and the colonies. This use of the term by the United Kingdom Minister for Air shows the value of having a modern term to apply to the territory under the control of the Government of the United Kingdom and another distinct term to describe the association of nations usually incorrectly described as the "British Empire".

6. Viewed from this aspect it can be argued that we should not object but rather should encourage the use by United Kingdom representatives of the term "Delegate of the British Empire." At the same time, however, we should take steps to make clear to all the world that this term does not include Canada and that the only correct designation of that association of nations of which Canada is a member is the term "British Commonwealth of Nations".

Memorandum from Assistant, Department of External Affairs, to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Re: Despatch No. 235 of July 21st from Moscow.

I think there is a good deal worthy of consideration in what Mr. Wilgress says. It has seemed to me that our objection to the use of the phrase "British Commonwealth and Empire" by United Kingdom spokesmen has not been entirely consistent with our general attitudes. We have never liked the word "Empire", but we have protested against any suggestions that the free and independent nations of the Commonwealth were of a kind with Uganda or Sarawak.

There are good idealistic reasons for thinking of the British Commonwealth as a great congeries of countries some of which have achieved self-government and some of which are in various stages on the way. This, however, has never been a conception which appealed greatly to Canadians and we have preferred not to be classed with niggers. It might be considered contankerous of us to object to an effort on the part of the United Kingdom spokesmen to emphasise a differentiation on which we have insisted.

In spite of the above comments, I should think that there are practical objections to a continuation of the practice of calling United Kingdom representatives at I.L.O. Conferences a "British Empire Delegation".[13] However correct this might be, it would be too difficult to explain to lesser breeds without the law. If these representatives were called representatives of the United Kingdom, it would be understood that they spoke for the Colonies just as the representatives of the United States would speak for the Virgin Islands. Furthermore, it is not impossible that in the near future some British countries which have not yet achieved full self-government might have independent representation on international bodies.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have received your letter of August 12th† in which you refer to my despatch No. 208 of June 30th† commenting on the papers relating to post-hostilities planning which you sent me with your despatch No. 97 of May 13th.†

I note that you would like me to clarify one point in my despatch. This is the statement I made at the end of paragraph 5 where I wrote "that the possibility of direct conflict of views (with the Soviet Union) will be less if we continue to permit the United Kingdom to speak for the British Commonwealth as a whole."

In making this statement I was giving expression to my views about a state of affairs that has become very obvious ever since the Moscow Conference of October, 1943. At that time I had a talk with Mr. Eden about the formation of the European Advisory Commission and I expressed to him our anxiety about confining membership to the three great powers. Mr. Eden, after explaining why the membership could not be enlarged, ended our conversation with the remark "tell Mr. Mackenzie King not to worry and that I will see that Canada's interests are looked after." I have often thought over the significance of this remark. At first I was inclined to pass it off as a casual remark of the sort that sometimes falls from the lips of harassed statesmen who do not realize the full significance of what they are saying. From what has happened since I am coming now to the belief that Mr. Eden's remark indicated a state of mind which is very marked in the case of Mr. Churchill and only somewhat less strong in the case of Mr. Eden.

This state of mind derives from the realization of the rapid growth of power relative to the United Kingdom on the part of both the United States and the Soviet Union. Seeking means of bolstering United Kingdom relative power and prestige, men brought up as Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden have been instinctively feel that this can be accomplished in part by their becoming the undisputed spokesmen for the British Commonwealth of Nations as a whole. The three-power pattern of control of United Nations affairs gives them such an opportuntiy and it is my suspicion that they welcome this opportunity and will do as little as they possibly can to change the existing set-up.

The constitutional changes introduced in the Soviet Union last February have become an additional obstacle to the participation of Canada in United Nations organizations dealing with major political as distinct from questions of a purely functional character. The United Kingdom Government can always point to the danger of the Soviet Government raising the question of the participation of the constituent republics. It suits the Soviet Government to have the United Kingdom Government regarded as representing the British group of nations in the higher councils of the United Nations just as they wish to be regarded as representing the Soviet group of nations. The United States also prefers not to have Canada and the other British dominions, including India, participating too directly in major political questions because criticism is constantly directed in the United States against the many votes of the British Empire.

Thus we are finding our position in international affairs becoming still more subordinate to the United Kingdom. Whereas in the last war we advanced in status, I detect in this war a tendency in the reverse direction. It is true, of course, that in respect of autonomy in domestic affairs each member of the British Commonwealth is independent and equal. This, however, is becoming less true of international affairs because the three-power pattern of the United Nations is placing us more and more in a position of subordination to the United Kingdom.

What is happening today is that the only opportunity we have of exerting any influence on major questions of policy is when we are consulted on these questions by the United Kingdom. It is quite true, as you state, that the United Kingdom can only speak for us or for the British Commonwealth as a whole with our express consent, but the point is that we have to give that consent if our views are to be made known at all. No one has yet been able to foresee what would happen if there should be a serious divergence of view between Canada and the United Kingdom. From the practical point of view, all that the Soviet Government learn of our views in the majority of instances is that they are told by the United Kingdom Government "the dominions have been consulted and have concurred."

As a Canadian one must feel that this position of greater subordination to the United Kingdom in questions of major political importance does not conform to our contribution to the war nor to our political and economic importance. Moreover, while we have a special relationship to the United Kingdom we also have a special relationship to the United States, the development of which is rendered difficult if on major questions of international policy we only have the opportunity of making our views known and of exerting our influence through the Government of the United Kingdom. The same considerations apply to our relations with the Soviet Government, although in this case it is of much less importance that we establish close and intimate relations.

Frankly, I do not know what we should do to correct the situation which has been developing in a manner so unsatisfactory to our future position in international affairs. Last November I proposed to you that whenever we are consulted by the United Kingdom Government on a political question of importance we should make our views known not only to that government but also to the United States and Soviet Governments. I now realize that this would hardly be practical at least so far as the Soviet Government is concerned and we might be laying ourselves open to rebuffs if we approached too often the United States Government. The only other course that suggests itself is to follow the tactics that General de Gaulle has pursued in order to assure that the French Committee of National Liberation shall not be entirely overlooked in the consideration of political questions. This would be tantamount to making a nuisance of ourselves which we could not do now without prejudicing both Allied harmony and our own national unity. After the Germans and Japanese have been defeated it may become necessary to exert ourselves because after all that we have done in this war Canadians may not be content that Canada should continue to play only a subordinate role in world affairs.

Yours sincerely,

DESPATCH 1849 London, October 27, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 707 of the 7th June, in which you requested me to bring to the attention of the Government of the United Kingdom the question of the continued use by the International Labour Organization of the archaic term "British Empire" as descriptive of the Delegation of the United Kingdom.

2.On receipt of your foregoing despatch a communication† along the lines you suggested was sent at once to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. A reply† has now been received from Lord Cranborne in which he states that the Acting Director of the International Labour Office is being requested to arrange for the use in future of the term "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland" in place of "British Empire" in lists of State members of the International Labour Organization issued by the International Labour Office. In lists of the Delegations the abbreviated form "United Kingdom" will be employed.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I was extremely interested in Mr. Wilgress's despatch from Moscow dated September 28, a copy of which you were good enough to send to this Embassy, and which deals with the increasingly important question of single or separate representation of the nations of the British Commonwealth at international conferences and discussions. Mr. Wilgress repeats in this regard a remark of Mr. Eden's, "I will see that Canada's interests are looked after." This remark expresses a point of view which is held, I think, by Mr. Eden and much more strongly, as Mr. Wilgress states, by Mr. Churchill. It is apparently held also by Viscount Halifax and Mr. Harold Butler[14] in Washington. The latter, in an interesting speech at Cincinnati on November 17, on "The Structure of Post-War Security" made, for instance, the following misleading statement:

"The other day, at Dumbarton Oaks, a beginning was made in laying the foundations of a new and more secure peace. The first stage consisted of conversations between the four principal powers — the United States, the British Commonwealth, the Soviet Union and China. That seems to me a beginning at the right end."

Mr. Butler must surely have known that it is not correct to say that the British Commonwealth was represented at Dumbarton Oaks even though one member of the Commonwealth kept the other members informed of what was going on there. I am tempted to add that if the price for such information is an alteration of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, it is probably too high to pay.

Similarly Lord Halifax, forgetful apparently of his Toronto experience, is reported in the New York Times this morning as having said the following in a speech yesterday in New York:

"This society for the promotion of American-Soviet friendship speaks for two sides of the triangle. The third side is the British Commonwealth; and it is symbolic of this threefold association that the United States, Soviet Russia and the British Commonwealth are represented here tonight. I am convinced that the combination of these three, rallying all the peace-loving forces among the nations, can secure our children and children's children against a repetition of the present tragedy."

It seems to me that the evidence is quite clear that remarks of the kind mentioned above are not casual and unthinking but are deliberate and considered and spring, as Mr. Wilgress suggests, from the realization that the U.K. itself may no longer be powerful enough to be placed securely along side the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. in the triumvirate of Great Powers. Therefore, the conception of the single Commonwealth and Empire should be built up. This building up process is encouraged, on occasions, both in Washington and in Moscow, by those who for one reason or another prefer to deal with the British Commonwealth as a unit, and who seem unaware of the fact that the course of historical development cannot be altered in this way. Mr. Wilgress also touches on this aspect of the question in his despatch. From all this, he draws the lesson, which I must say I sometimes draw myself in Washington, that if we are not careful our international position as an independent nation within the British Commonwealth will be weaker at the end of this war than it was at the beginning.

Is there not some way in which we can bring again officially to the attention of the U.K. authorities the fact that their leaders in high places cannot, without prior consultation and consent, set themselves up as spokesmen for the British Commowealth.

Yours sincerely,

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] February 2, 1945

You have once or twice queried the use of the name "Canada" as distinct from "Dominion of Canada" in departmental and general usage.

Strictly speaking, "Dominion of Canada" is not the correct name of this country; over a period of several years we have used Canada standing by itself in all External Affairs documents. All foreign governments follow the same usage in documents addressed to us or in agreements negotiated with us. I find that in 1938 it was pointed out officially to the United States authorities that the name "Canada" should be used in a treaty which we were negotiating with them at that time. Since then the United States authorities have been careful to use the proper name on all occasions. In 1941 the same point was made in correspondence with the United Kingdom authorities, who agreed that it was not strictly correct to use the name "Dominion of Canada". The authority with regard to the proper name of the country is Section 3 of the British North America Act, which is as follows:

"It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, to declare by Proclamation that, on and after a Day therein appointed, not being more than Six Months after the passing of this Act, the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall form and be One Dominion under the name of Canada; and on and after that Day those Three Provinces shall form and be One Dominion under that Name accordingly."

Originally the inclusion of the words "Dominion of" in the national style may have been due in part to a desire to distinguish the new country from the old province of Canada. When dominion status was a new development and the use of the term emphasized the fact that the old colonial position had been left behind, I think there may have been some value in stressing the term. Now, however, I think the contrary is true. The term "dominion" has acquired the general connotation of a status distinctly more than colonial, but still somewhat less than fully national. Talk of the granting of "dominion status" to India after the war, subject to certain restrictive agreements as to the British position, or of granting the same status to Burma, subject to limitations on her capacity to enter into external relations, serves to indicate an understanding of the term as involving a more or less qualified autonomy. If this meaning is commonly attributed to it, and I think in many cases it is, the general association of the term in the name of Canada can only lessen the general appreciation of full maturity that has been achieved and which we wish to have understood. For these reasons I think it is desirable that the continued use, especially by Government departments, of what is, in any event, not the correct name for this country should be discouraged.

CONFIDENTIAL London, February 28, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson,

As you are aware the Third British Commonwealth Relations Conference is now in session at Chatham House. Recently I arranged a dinner in my rooms for the Canadian delegates. I was anxious to provide them with an opportunity of talking frankly and confidentially with members of the United Kingdom Government and several leading journalists in London. We had a most interesting evening in which the conversation was fortunately candid and outspoken. The views expressed at the meeting by the Cabinet Ministers present are, I think, of considerable significance from the point of view of Canadian policy. I am enclosing, therefore, a memorandum of the discussion prepared by Mr. Holmes, who was present.

In view of the fact that this occasion was private and informal this document should be treated as highly confidential.

Mémorandum du deuxième secrétaire, le haut commissariat en Grande-Bretagne

Memorandum by Second Secretary, High Commission in Great Britain

STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL [London,] February 28, 1945

On Wednesday, February 21st, Mr. Massey held a private dinner for the Canadian delegates to the British Commonwealth Relations Conference in order to provide them with an opportunity of meeting leaders of opinion in this country whom they would not otherwise have had a chance of seeing. Those present at the dinner, in addition to Mr. Massey, were:

E. J. Tarr, K.C., Winnipeg,
Lt.-Col. Victor Sifton, Winnipeg,
B. K. Sandwell, Toronto,
W. A. Irwin, Toronto,
R. G. Trotter, Kingston,
F. A. Brewin, Toronto,
L. B. Unwin, Montreal,
D. R. Michener, K.C., Toronto,
Lionel Roy, Quebec

The Rt. Hon. C. R. Attlee, Deputy Prime Minister and Lord President of the Council,
The Rt. Hon. Viscount Cranborne, Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs,
The Rt. Hon. Viscount Swinton, Minister of Civil Aviation,
The Rt. Hon. W. S. Morrison, Minister of Town and Country Planning,
The Rt. Hon. Richard Law, Minister of State,
Geoffrey Crowther, Editor of The Economist,
R. M. Barrington-Ward, Editor of The Times.

At the conclusion of dinner Mr. Tarr and other Canadian delegates, at Mr. Massey's invitation, inaugurated discussion with a very frank explanation of the differences in approach which they found between the Canadian and the United Kingdom delegations at the Conference. The Canadian delegates were worried over the preoccupation of the United Kingdom delegates with the desirablity of integrating the Commonwealth by the establishment of more formal machinery. This attitude was not only contrary to the trend of opinion in Canada but was considered by Canadians to be contrary to the best interests of the Commonwealth and of the world at large. Although the Canadian view was accepted by the United Kingdom delegates it was accepted with regret. The Canadians, on the other hand, did not understand the reason for regret as they did not consider their views of Commonwealth relations to be second-best. These opinions were expressed by Mr. Tarr in the first place and supported by almost all the Canadians present. Mr. Sandwell emphasized the fact that the delegates represented various shades of Canadian opinion on domestic and international policy, but they found themselves in very substantial agreement on the nature of Commonwealth relations. Mr. Unwin, who said he represented the Right, and Mr. Brewin, who said he represented the Left, concurred.

After most of the Canadians had expressed their views Mr. Massey asked Lord Cranborne to comment. Lord Cranborne outlined some of the current views on Commonwealth relations. He said that Mr. Lionel Curtin's advocacy of federation was logical and in some respect attractive but he could not consider it practical politics. He referred to the proposals for central machinery made by Mr. Curtin[15] and indicated that he rejected this approach also as impracticable. Then he proceeded to outline the present machinery of consultation, which he seemed to consider eminently satisfactory. What was important, he said, was that there should be as much consultation as possible. There was constant consultation going on of a very satisfactory nature. It was important that we should seek to compose our differences and agree as much as possible but we should not insist upon unanimity. He referred to the happy experience at Geneva where each Commonwealth country acted on its own and sometimes differently from the others but there was always constant consultation.

Lord Cranborne was followed by Mr. Attlee who, in a concise and forceful statement, expressed agreement with Lord Cranborne. He emphasized the great values of the present informal relations which were consistent with British constitutional practices. Mr. Attlee pointed out that the constitution of the Commonwealth had developed ad hoc to meet new situations. The Statute of Westminster did not create a new situation but confirmed that which already existed. He deplored the approach to Commonwealth relations of those who wished to devise new paper constitutions.

Mr. Law later carried on in the same vein. He said that the Commonwealth was not a mechanism but an organism and he feared the effects of formalization of its relations. Possibly the most forceful support for what might be called the Canadian view came from Lord Swinton. He was highly pleased with his experience of Commonwealth relations in Chicago and Montreal. There had been constant consultation, but each country acted independently. At a conference where all countries of the Commonwealth were represented there was no question of the desirability of each acting independently. He did suggest, however, that on occasions when they were not all represented one nation might be delegated to speak for others on matters on which there was agreement. Mr. Morrison expressed agreement with what had been said by his colleagues, although he did not go into the subject as thoroughly as they had. Those Cabinet Ministers present seemed to be agreed that:

(a) the Commonwealth relations are in a healthy and satisfactory state,

(b) constant consultation is desirable,

(c) satisfactory machinery of consultation exists and any changes should be in the direction of improving and developing that which exists rather than of setting up central bodies, which might only cause trouble,

(d) the "single-voice" theory is not only impracticable but is not in the best interests of the nations of the Commonwealth who will be more influential if they act independently.

The representatives of the press were also asked to express their opinions. Mr. Barrington-Ward seemed to be in complete agreement with the prevalent views. He particularly emphasized the importance of a truly international security organisation to the survival of the Commonwealth, a point which had been stressed previously by Mr. Brewin. The prevailing unanimity of opinion was somewhat impaired, however, by Mr. Geoffrey Crowther. Mr. Crowther was prepared to accept the Canadian view as inevitable but he insisted on preserving his regrets. He could not see why a closer integration of Commonwealth policies was inconsistent with the interests of the world organisation. The Soviet Union and the United States were obviously making special agreements and he thought this a good thing. From his knowledge of United States opinion he did not think the Americans would object to closer Commonwealth association. It should be added that Mr. Crowther was not entirely alone in his views, which received some sympathy from Mr. Michener of the Canadian delegation.

The convictions expressd by such an influential group of British statesmen had a profound effect on the Canadians present. Mr. Tarr said he was profoundly relieved to know that the views to which they had been exposed were not necessarily the views of the United Kingdom as a whole. He was reassured from what he had heard that Britain was still great. There is no doubt, I think, that this occasion served a most useful purpose. It put the Canadians in touch with opinions that really matter in this country and served to correct the impression created by what seems to be an unfortunately chosen United Kingdom delegation at the Conference. On the other hand, it was, I think, useful for British Cabinet Ministers to hear this frank exposition of Canadian opinion. It should serve to put at rest any doubts they might have had — and I have no reason to believe they had any — that the Prime Minister spoke for most Canadians last Spring.[16] The frank statements by Lord Cranborne and other Ministers should also put at rest, I think, uncertainties which might have been felt as to the intention of the United Kingdom Government, at least of an influential portion of it, in this respect. I do not think that those present had any doubts whatever that the United Kingdom representatives spoke from real conviction and not out of politeness.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 718 London, May 1, 1945

SECRET. We are at present preparing draft Commercial Treaty with China contemplated under provisions of Article 8 of Extra-Territoriality Treaty of January 11th, 1943. In accordance with normal procedure, we shall communicate draft to Dominion Governments when it is contemplated [completed], but meanwhile we should be glad of their views upon following points.

2. It will be remembered that Drafting Committee of Imperial Conference of 1930, in a report on form of commercial treaties, recommended that "the practice of stipulating for benefits (I) for all His Majesty's subjects, (II) for all Commonwealth ships, (III) for goods imported from whatever part of the British Empire and (IV) for an accession clause in treaties or other agreements with foreign Powers when His Majesty acts on behalf of one of the members of the British Commonwealth only should be continued, as far as possible, in as much as it is felt by all that it would be in the interest of each member of the British Commonwealth to be placed in such a position as to be able to avail itself of these advantages whenever it so desires". Representatives of all Governments of British Commonwealth, except Government of Irish Free State, agreed to this recommendation which was in accordance with our existing practice.

3. Under provisions of such a Commercial Treaty between United Kingdom and a foreign Government, Dominion nationals and ships secured identical benefits to those accorded by the Treaty to British subjects belonging to the United Kingdom and British ships connected with the United Kingdom, whilst it was possible for Dominion Governments by granting most favoured nation treatment to goods of a foreign country to secure under the "nevertheless clause" (where one existed) similar terms for Dominion goods in that country without being bound to reciprocate most favoured nation treatment granted to their goods by a foreign country. It was, therefore, in practice, unnecessary for the Dominions to accede to a United Kingdom commercial treaty in order to secure most of its benefits to their nationals, ships and goods.

4. As Dominion Governments are aware, it has already been found impossible to secure inclusion of "nevertheless clause" in recent commercial treaties and it is proposed to abandon the attempt in future negotiations. Further, our experience shows that it is becoming increasingly difficult to justify to foreign Governments the inclusion in a treaty with the United Kingdom alone of provisions which apply to all British ships and all British subjects. So far as ships are concerned, it seems to us impossible to continue to secure inclusion of all British ships as port of registry of any ship is an easily ascertainable fact which shows whether ship does belong to United Kingdom, unlike a British subject regarding whom it is often difficult to decide to what part of British Commonwealth he "belongs" for present purpose.

5. As regards British subjects, so far as contemplated treaty with China is concerned, we think that in view of definition in Article 1 (II) limiting application of Extra-Territoriality Treaty to British subjects belonging to territory to which that treaty applies, it may prove impossible to secure benefits of commercial treaty for all British subjects. There may be particular difficulty in case of Dominion nationals, but we should propose to try to retain at least the definition of subjects to include those in Colonial territories. We should be glad to know what your views are about exclusion of Dominion nationals from definition and to learn whether, in the case of any future commercial treaties which may be negotiated, your Government would desire us to continue our present practice in accordance with recommendations of Drafting Committee of 1930, quoted in paragraph 2, to attempt to secure inclusion of all British subjects. In some cases in the past it has already been found difficult to accept this. We should also be glad to learn your views upon inclusion of accession clause both in China Treaty and in any future commercial treaty.

6. It will, of course, be appreciated that if we are faced with strong resistance to maintenance of previous practice from foreign Governments concerned, we should not feel justified in jeopardising whole of negotiations for inclusion of particular provisions in question. Matter is one of some urgency as we are anxious to submit draft treaty to Chinese Government in near future. An early reply would, therefore, be appreciated.

TELEGRAM 143 Ottawa, June 7, 1945

SECRET. Your circular D. 718, May 1, proposed commercial treaty between U.K. and China and form of commercial treaties in general. In view of changed conditions since 1930 and considerations set forth in your telegram we should not (not) be inclined to object to the abandonment of the procedure recommended by the Drafting Committee of the Imperial Conference in 1930.

2. We should not object to dropping, from future commercial treaties, the accession clause and the "nevertheless clause". As regards ships, we should not object to the limitation of benefits to ships registered in the part of the Commonwealth which is making the treaty. We should be inclined to favour the limiting of clauses giving benefits to His Majesty's subjects to subjects "belonging to" the part of the Commonwealth which is making the treaty.

3. It is possible that a case may arise in which one nation of the Commonwealth may wish to ask another to attempt to include one or more of the "old style" clauses in a commercial treaty. However, if your Government follows its normal practice of giving advance notice of treaty negotiations, there will be an opportunity for any other nation of the Commonwealth to suggest such a course.

4. We should be glad to know the views of the other members of the Commonwealth.

5. The general views expressed in paras. 1 and 2 of this telegram are especially applicable to the proposed commercial treaty between the U.K. and China because Canada and China are bound (by the Canada-China Extra-Territorial Treaty of April 14, 1944[17]) to negotiate a commercial treaty between Canada and China. There is therefore no reason for including Canada in the benefits under the proposed U.K.-China Commercial Treaty.

Mémorandum du deuxième secrétaire
au sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Second Secretary to Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] September 11, 1945

The attached memorandum from John Holmes is a most useful one. If, as it now appears likely, the United Kingdom is to make an attempt to define British foreign policy in terms of the new world situation, and in particular the radical changes in the power position in Europe, the consequences to Canada are bound to the far reaching. As John Holmes suggests, it does not seem to be a question so much of the British trying to secure identical views on the part of the Commonwealth Governments, as to avoid a situation in which having taken up a position they might find themselves at odds with certain of these governments.

From our point of view, Canada cannot avoid commitments arising from decisions of the Big Powers and, of these Powers, the United Kingdom is the only one likely to be at all receptive to our suggestions or to any influence we may wish to exert. Moreover, should the present tendency of dividing Europe into spheres of influence continue to develop, with a British alliance bloc in the West, Canada as part of Britain's "Alliance Potential" would be directly affected.

As regards method, surely discussion of individual problems, on an official level would be preferable to the preparation of a statement of "broad opinions" suggested in the memorandum. I do not think we will get anywhere by the exchange of memoranda, nor are we likely to get a very clear insight into British policy by this method. A meeting of top level officials, however, would probably yield the best results.

Mémorandum du deuxième secrétaire, le haut Commissariat en Grande-Bretagne à l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis[18]

Memorandum from Second Secretary, High Commission in Great Britain, to Ambassador in United States[18]

[London, n.d.]

I have made some informal enquiries at the Dominions Office in order to assess the motive behind and the background of the invitation to the Commonwealth Prime Ministers to come to London or to send deputies during the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in September.[19] The Dominions Office officials admit that this was inspired to some extent by the recent exclamations from Canberra,[20] but they insist that its primary inspiration was the desire of the new Government to make certain that in their major policies they are keeping in step with the wishes of other Commonwealth governments. As one Dominions official frankly put it, "This is not the Halifax plan for a single voice. The members of the new Government are anxious to meet representatives of other Commonwealth Governments and inform themselves of the general trend of their views on international policy.".

It looks as if, in spite of the continuity of foreign policy displayed up to the present by the new administration, Mr. Bevin and his colleagues are preparing to come down with some definite decisions on a number of matters. The most urgent of these matters is the treatment of the Soviet Union. There are increasing signs of impatience on Mr. Bevin's part with the cat and mouse game that has been going on in the Balkans. (Witness his consistent policy of telling Tito[21] to put up or shut up.) The United States initiative in Roumania and Bulgaria alarmed the Foreign Office who were afraid of interference in areas beyond their reach. But to everyone's surprise it looks as if these bold gestures will succeed. If they do, they will have to be followed up (as the British representatives in Bucharest are now pointing out). The tendency of the previous government seemed to be in the direction of writing off a good deal of Eastern Europe as a Soviet protectorate about which one could do little but make face-saving protestations. The United Kingdom may, therefore, with the United States (although the United States is very nervous about a closed partnership) be on the point of taking an important plunge with increased commitments.

Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence of Yugoslavia.

The Balkan situation is mentioned merely as an example of the kind of problem which the United Kingdom will wish to discuss. It could be argued that they are seeking a guarantee of Canadian and Australian support for their policy in the Balkans and elsewhere, and Canada would naturally be reticent about signing any blank cheques of this kind. I feel reasonably convinced that the Labour Ministers really do want something else. Just as they are always anxious to know the views of the French and the Americans before they act, they wish to make sure that they do not make irrevocable decisions without being assured that their policies are generally acceptable to the other Commonwealth countries. Although Labour Ministers' views on the Commonwealth tend to be inchoate and sometimes garbled, temperamentally I think that they are close to the Canadian conception of the "alliance potential". They seem to share the suspicions of other peoples about the inablility of the Conservatives to understand the Commonwealth and treat it properly, and there is evident a suggestion of slightly revolutionary mission about the way in which they are emphasizing "consultation and collaboration". It is natural that they should be peculiarly sensitive about the criticisms which come from their ideological brethren in the Antipodes and they will perhaps be inclined to take for granted that Canada and South Africa want the things Dr. Evatt demands. Until they understand the Canadian point of view they may embarrass us with invitations and proposals. (They will have to learn not to act precipitately and offer participation to us in the way in which it was offered in the occupation of Japan.)[22] They don't understand the Commonwealth as well as Lord Cranborne or Mr. Eden did, but their instincts are sound, I think — and Mr. Attlee understands the Canadian viewpoint better than Mr. Churchill ever could.

It is difficult to overestimate the importance for Canada of the matters which will be discussed at the first meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers. Whether a Canadian representative would be admitted to the Council or not is doubtful. How far we could influence final decisions by influencing the United Kingdom representatives is also doubtful. It is not clear however, what other channels are open to us. We should not under-estimate our improved chances of influencing the British since the San Francisco Conference. There is no doubt of the profound impression made on the United Kingdom authorities — as well as those of other countries — by the Canadian delegation at U.N.C.I.O. [United Nations Conference on International Organization]. The important thing about this Canadian contribution was that it was not in a limited sphere in which we were considered to be specially interested but in the broadest sphere of world affairs. We are now looked upon as a country which has sound and responsible ideas on important problems.

The acute problems of personnel will, it is presumed, make it difficult for Canada to send a high level representative to London as suggested. Dominions Office officials with whom I have spoken have indicated the hope that Canada might be able to send a Cabinet Minister and, if we considered it necessary, an expert adviser. I pointed out that although I had no indication of the Government's intentions, it would be very difficult to spare men of either kind at this time. If this is not feasible, would it be possible for the Canadian Government to give some indication to the United Kingdom of its broad opinions on the principal matters to be discussed, in particular: relations with the Soviet Union and specifically the policy to be followed in Eastern Europe, and the treatment of Germany and Japan. We should have enough information on which to base sound judgements. Such a statement might be useful to clarify Canadian policy (and incidentally provide guidance for Canadian representatives abroad) even though the final decision will be taken by the Great Powers. We should not expect the United Kingdom to accept our views, and we should not expect to be committed by United Kingdom decisions. (Perhaps our old preoccupation with commitments needs to be re-examined in the light of the experience which proves that we, like the Nicaraguans and the Dutch, are committed to some extent at least, by decisions of the United States and the United Kingdom whatever the state of our sovereignty.) Such an independent statement might actually forestall a situation like that which occurred after the Prime Ministers Meetings of 1944 when Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden showed some disposition to claim a particular, rather than a general, support on our part for United Kingdom foreign policy.[23] It might even be argued, I think, that we owe it to the United Kingdom in return for the frank information which they give to us on all details of their policy and which we freely accept to give them some idea of our views on major problems. That they would be interested in knowing I should judge from the fact that we are constantly being asked in the Foreign Office what Canada's views are on all subjects from the future of General Franco to the future of Hong Kong. If it is considered possible or desirable to formulate these views they might be embodied in a memorandum to be presented to Lord Addison or to Malcolm Macdonald with extensive oral gloss.

Question of position of Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia in relation to proposed meeting of Prime Ministers needs to be settled. Sir G. Huggins has for some time had a standing invitation from us to visit England for discussion of Southern Rhodesia questions and has indicated that he would be in a position to accept it this summer. We would propose to ask him to be in England during the Prime Ministers meeting. In that case he would not in view of the status of Southern Rhodesia be invited to take part in the meetings as a whole but he would be available to attend on occasions when matters of special concern to Southern Rhodesia were under discussion. May I take it that this arrangement would be agreeable to you. The Indian representatives to the War Cabinet will be in London and would similarly be available to attend meetings when matters of special interest to India are discussed. Ends.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following personal for the Prime Minister.[24] Begins: Your telegram Circular D. 122 of January 25th. As I understand it, the meeting of Prime Ministers is a special gathering of the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom and the other nations of the Commonwealth (excluding Ireland). While I agree that if questions are discussed which are of particular interest to Southern Rhodesia or India there would be no objection to an invitation being given by the five Prime Ministers for Sir G. For this reason I think it would be inadvisable that any public statement concerning the meeting should mention the possible participation of the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia or an Indian representative.

I hope that you will be able to let me have, as soon as convenient, your ideas on the agenda of the meeting so that the necessary preparatory work may be put in train. Ends.

Following personal for the Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins: I agree with you that the intention has been and remains to have a personal exchange of views between the five Prime Ministers and not an Imperial Conference of the usual type with full delegations and formal organisation. But you will recognise the difficulty of excluding India and Southern Rhodesia from discussion of questions specially affecting them. Huggins, who has for some time had a standing invitation to come to London to discuss questions affecting Southern Rhodesia, would almost certainly wish to take this opportunity of doing so. I am glad, therefore, that you see no objection to proposals in Secretary of State's telegram, Circular D. 122. So far as publicity is concerned, I see no possibility of our being able to avoid all public reference to the position of India and Southern Rhodesia in relation to the meeting. We are likely to be questioned in Parliament here. Moreover, the presence of Sir Godfrey Huggins in London at the time of the Conference is bound to become known both in Southern Rhodesia and in this country. Form of announcement would make clear the differences in function and status between the Dominion Prime Ministers and other representatives. Ends.

Following from the Prime Minister for the Secretary of State, Begins: Your telegram, Circular D. 243.† Union Government are deeply grateful for United Kingdom Government's offer of hospitality to myself and members of my party. With regard to list of party two questions arise. In first place what are matters to be discussed, as size of party must depend on them? In second place what will be scope and nature and level of consultations at this meeting? Prime Minister has already emphasized that it will not be ordinary Imperial Conference. Will meeting be more in nature of general exchange of views on war and immediate post-war situation without attempting to formulate recommendations on particular problems such as has been customary at Imperial Conferences? In that case it will not be necessary for me to bring more than a few personal attendants. But if recommendations have to be reached on economic, financial, aviation and such like subjects, Dominion experts on these matters may have to be included in party. Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

[Ottawa,] March 18, 1944

Heeney, Wrong and myself have given some consideration to the agenda for the meeting of the Prime Ministers which was suggested in telegram D. 335 of March 5th from London. I attach, for your consideration, a draft telegram of comments.†

There follow additional comments of our own on each of the items proposed from London:

1. "The Immediate Military Situation" — This is likely to begin with a review of the war from Mr. Churchill, possibly supported by the Chiefs of Staff. If the matter is not settled by that time, there will be an opportunity for discussing the questions concerning the command of the Canadian forces and the position of the Joint Staff Mission in London with Mr. Churchill. It would be desirable for these questions to be considered chiefly as a matter between the U.K. and Canada and to be discussed outside the Prime Ministers' Conference. The U.K. sometimes tend to regard such questions as necessarily affecting the position of "the Dominions" collectively, and this is often misleading and unrealistic.

2. "Questions Arising from the Conduct of the War Against Japan Including the Provision of Forces from the British Commonwealth for that Purpose and for the Policing of Europe after the Defeat of Germany" — There are certain questions which might come under this general heading that seem to deserve discussion although they should probably not be mentioned in the agenda. The problem of command and Canadian participation in planning already mentioned is one of these questions. Our position as developed in the memorandum on air policy given to Capt. H. Balfour[25] is another. Others relate to the position of China and the assistance which it is desirable to give China from the military point of view and to the position of India. If India is discussed the appointment of an Australian High Commissioner there may well be brought up by Mr. Curtin, and the question of sending a Canadian High Commissioner in the near future may well come to the front again. With respect to the policing of Europe, certain suggestions on Canadian participation have already been submitted to the War Committee by the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems,[26] and it will be possible to prepare some papers for your use on the general plans and our relationship thereto.

It is proposed in the draft telegram that an item might be added to the agenda after this point dealing with the Inter-Allied machinery of control after the defeat of Germany and the methods for ending hostilities and establishing a definitive peace settlement. It seems important that these matters should be discussed between the Prime Ministers. Australia and New Zealand have publicly demanded full representation on all armistice planning and executive bodies. We have reserved our position, but have indicated that we would probably require direct representation on any United Nations Commission for Europe if we are to continue to contribute to relief and occupation. The question also arises of the transformation of certain specific agencies such as the Combined Boards into more genuine United Nations agencies. Since Canada is represented on two of these Boards, it would be better if pressure arose from other Commonwealth Governments. It may well turn out that problems concerning the relationship of the Big Three to smaller countries will become most acute during the transitional period from war to peace, and that we shall have to face awkward questions, both as a secondary power and as a member of the Commonwealth, on our relations to the great powers in general and to the United Kingdom in particular.

3. "The post-war settlement viz

(a) Political aspect including nature of post-war world organization future of Germany, Italy and the Italian colonies, France and French Colonial Empire.

(b) Defence aspect including world security and international use of bases.

(c) Regional arrangements with special reference to policy in the Pacific."

— Under 3 (a) it is curious that they mention the future of Germany, Italy and France but omit Japan. It seems very desirable that there should also be discussion of long term relations with the Soviet Union and China and that some special consideration should be given to the relations between Commonwealth countries and the United States. Item 3 (a) indeed is the most important item in the whole agenda as it presumably takes in the form of the future substitute for the League of Nations involving discussion of the representation and authority to be given to large states and secondary and minor countries. As there seems now to be little prospect that any important country will favour the use of the League covenant in an amended form as the basis for the new world organization, consideration should also be given to the methods whereby the obligations of Commonwealth countries toward the League are to be terminated. In connection both with this item and item 3 (b), it is desirable that you should be in a position to express views on the relative advantages to Canada of regional or universal systems of security and defence. A study of this question should, therefore, have proceeded to some tentative conclusions before the meeting takes place.

Item 3 (b) also deals with very difficult and important questions. The question of the international use of bases cannot be separated from the question of the international regulation of civil aviation and the addition of this as a separate item in this paragraph is proposed in the draft telegram. We have some information on what the planners in the United Kingdom are thinking about the organization of world security forces, and this can be put into a form convenient for your use in London. It is by no means unlikely that there will be a direct clash on this point between the views of the Big Three (possibly with the idea of including the British Commonwealth as one of the Big Three) and the advocates of a general security system supported by all member states.

Item 3 (c) appears to relate particularly to regional arrangements of the type proposed in the Agreement between Australia and New Zealand[27] with respect both to regional defence and to colonial development. We are not likely to have any special contribution to make to the colonial question. If regional defence zones are to be considered, you should be in a position to take a line on the nature of post-war defence arrangements with the United States which we regard in Canada as desirable.

4. "Questions affecting co-operation within the British Commonwealth after the war such as defence, transport and migration." — It is interesting to notice that the question of methods of consultation within the Commonwealth have been omitted.[28] It was explained to Mr. Hudd in London that this was done because they felt that the Australian Government would raise this matter. Mr. Curtin has not, however, requested its insertion in the agenda. There is no direct mention of economic or constitutional questions, and this is probably not an appropriate occasion for considering either of these subjects.

In the draft telegram an enquiry is suggested on the contemplated organization of the meetings and the provision of secretariat. We have learned from Mr. Hudd that they do not propose to establish committees to deal with different subjects. There is, I think, a good deal to be said for our having a joint secretariat so that a competent Canadian official[29] will be associated with the work of making a record of the proceedings and of making arrangements in connection with the meetings. While our information is not complete it seems that none of the Prime Ministers proposes to take any colleagues with him to London and that each will be accompanied only by a few officials from his own capital or from his London office.

Following from the Prime Minister for Colonel Ralston, Begins: Conclusion of meetings arranged for first week of Prime Ministers' meeting gives me an opportunity for an interim report to you and our colleagues. First three meetings were devoted to a review of the general military situation in Europe and the Far East. General Stuart and Air Marshal Breadner were present. Mr. Churchill's exposition of the strategic situation was supported by reports from the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff, and General Blamey[30] reported on the developments of the New Guinea campaign. Discussion of operations in the European theatre was confined to exposition of lines of major operations planned for early execution on both northern and Italian fronts and to be synchronised with resumed offensives in the East. Pending their outcome it was difficult to forecast the development of the war in Europe.

Exploration of an enlarged Commonwealth participation in the war against Japan was rather sketchy. Apart from the Burma campaign, from which favourable developments are still expected, and from the current concentration of naval strength in Indian waters, there is not as yet a definite plan for further Commonwealth action in this theatre. We received the general impression that natural preoccupation with OVERLORD and related operations has thus far postponed any close consideration of alternative ways in which Commonwealth resources could be most effectively used in the war against Japan after the European war had been won. In the circumstances there was no occasion for discussion of the character or composition of Canadian forces which might be made available for use against Japan. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX

Review of Foreign Affairs.

MACKENZIE KING said he wished to express his appreciation of the clear and comprehensive statement which had been made by Mr. Eden — a statement that was helpful in every way. He would like to repeat what he had said at the close of yesterday's Meeting — that he was convinced of the soundness of the principles which the British Government had adopted in foreign policy. It was essential in present conditions to bear in mind that we had to deal not merely with wars between nations but that in most countries there was a clash of interests between classes — that we were in a social revolution as well as a world war. It was important to keep our eyes on both those aspects of the problem and on the changes and developments in relation to them. He greatly appreciated the extent to which the Government of Canada had been kept informed on these great questions. So close indeed had the liaison been and so full the information, that practically all of what Mr. Eden had told this Meeting yesterday, they already knew in essentials. He had personally at times marvelled at the extent to which the Dominions had been kept informed and at the rapidity with which that information had reached them. There had inevitably been a few cases where they would have liked rather fuller information, but he had no complaint to make about the extent to which the Canadian Government had been kept in touch. The present range of correspondence was working out splendidly. It had developed, he thought, beyond the ken of most of those not immediately concerned with government. There was now direct correspondence with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, in addition to correspondence with the Dominions Office, on a growing scale. The result was to place the Dominions in possession of much information. In the event of it proving inadequate, it placed them in a position to telegraph and to get an immediate reply from His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom. He wished to add that, quite apart from the importance of this prompt and full service of information, it had the value of being in textual form. The result was that on the one hand there was no room for misunderstanding of what was passing on either side and, on the other, it put the Dominion Prime Minister in a position to discuss authoritatively with his colleagues and to reach a collective decision that was a Cabinet decision and in his own country. That was a great advantage in relation to the people of one's own country. There was not a Canadian decision over the war that had not been made by the Government of Canada in Canada, and that was an added source of confidence. It was always necessary to reckon with the misunderstandings that might arise in the public mind where it was not possible to take Parliament into full confidence. At the end of the war, he hoped himself to say publicly that all major decisions respecting Canada's part in the war had been taken by the Government of Canada, in Canada.

Another very definite advantage in this connection was the presence in Canada of High Commissioners and other representatives from Great Britain and from each Dominion. Mr. Malcolm Macdonald had been a most efficient representative of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom. He had been as helpful there as Mr. Massey had, he knew, been helpful here. And the presence of Canadian Ministers and Ambassadors in a number of capitals, more particularly in those of the United States, Russia and China, had been of great service. Those representatives of the Canadian Government had been able to send their Government reports prepared from the point of view of what was likely to be of interest to the Dominion of the play of forces in the capitals in which they were. And the fact that they were in touch in those capitals with the British and Dominion representatives gave an additional sense of security to their Governments, and an additional feeling of confidence that they had the whole picture before them and were able to balance the conflicting considerations. The difficulty at the moment was to find the right men to represent Canada abroad. That was a situation that could not be met until the war was over, and some of those who had taken part in it had returned. He desired to repeat that he had nothing whatever to complain of as regards the fullness of the information which had been received from His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, or the adequacy of the opportunity given to consider it with his Cabinet colleagues.

MR. MACKENZIE KING continued that it would perhaps be presumptuous for him to talk in detail of the European situation. Canada was concerned essentially, like the United Kingdom, to ensure that no possible action should be spared to avoid a further war.

He had been very glad to hear Mr. Eden say that there were no secret understandings. That was of itself a most valuable help to dissipating any suspicions there might be, and of first-class importance in discussions or dealings with foreign countries.

As regards specific problems which had been touched on in Mr. Eden's statement, he would in the first place like to refer to the Polish question. Canada had a substantial population of Poles and Ukrainians. The very fact of that large element with European continental origins gave Canada a special interest in general international problems in Europe. In matters such as regional groupings, boundary disputes, dynastic successions or the form of government in a particular country, they might not be so primarily concerned. In revising Polish boundaries there might arise a serious problem of moving from certain areas substantial elements of population into other areas, possibly into more restricted areas. The seeds of future trouble might arise in that connection, and the various aspects of that problem would call for careful consideration. What was of real significance in all these affairs was that policy should be along the line of removing the possibility of further strife.

Russia.

As regards Russia, a Russian Mission had recently been established in Ottawa. The Dominion Government has been at pains to give every possible opportunity to establish and develop contacts with the Head of that Mission and with his staff, and to make him feel that Canada was anxious that Russia should feel that in Canada she had a good friend, and that there was the fullest possible goodwill in Canada towards Russia. He might comment in that connection that the response of the people of the Dominion to appeals for aid to Russia had been so large as to be almost embarrassing, and to make it necessary to institute an arrangement under which appeals for assistance to the Allies and countries overseas should be gathered together into a single organisation. That generosity of response showed the real sympathy for Russia of the Canadian people, who were impressed by what Russia had done, and by the magnitude of the sacrifices that she had made. Her sympathy with Russia was indeed very strong. He thought and hoped very strongly that the Russia that was now coming into being might, as Mr. Churchill had suggested yesterday, attach more importance than in the past to national advance, and that there would be less risk of her being concerned in fomenting or supporting difficulties or differences in other countries.

At the same time, while Russia and the British Empire were Allies to-day, no one could say how the future would shape or what changes might follow when the war was over in relations between Russia and other countries. He could not himself forget the immense pains which Canada and the Empire had taken with Japan and Germany before the war to make those countries feel that we were anxious only for the best and happiest of relations with them, and for the development of international friendliness. He had himself visited Germany, and he had been at pains then to reassure the political leaders in that country on that point, though he had warned them at the same time that if war did come, they could be certain that Canada would be solid, depending, of course, on the cause of the war, with the rest of the Empire, and that if war came as the result of unprovoked aggression by Germany or Japan, there was nothing that would hold her back. In the case of Japan, the Canadian Government had indeed been positively embarrassed by the criticisms which it had had to face from the Opposition in Parliament of its policy in allowing supplies of metal to go to Japan, though that policy was, in fact, one which was guided by advice from the United Kingdom, and which the Dominion had readily adopted in the light of that advice. That instance was a good example of the anxiety which the Canadian Government had shown to keep in line with the attitude of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and to make the Japanese feel that Canada would take no antagonistic step.

Yet, despite all that had been done, the war had broken out, and Germany and Japan had followed the line that they had. He felt that it was essential, in the light of this experience, that we should be extremely circumspect over the future. We must do our utmost to maintain and develop friendly relations. But we could not wisely overlook the risk of a change in the attitude of individual countries. In the case of Russia, he trusted that we would view with great circumspection all that came from that source, though he was sure that the policy to which we were all working, of sparing no effort to develop a policy of inclusion rather than of exclusion, and to promote world peace by world co-operation, was the right one. It was possibly of some significance that while the Soviet Legation had been scrupulously careful in avoiding all relations with the Communists, a Communist had been returned to the Canadian House of Commons in the last bye-election in Montreal City. It was impossible to say that a Communist under-current might not exist in certain quarters, and though everything possible might be done to circumscribe that influence, and though we might feel that it was being circumscribed, it was there, and its existence could not be overlooked. Communism existed and would have to be watched. Watched to see that it did not grow, and to make sure that Communist sporadic activities, scattered as they might be, were not in fact all part of the general policy of some world organisation.

France.

He had been very glad to hear Mr. Eden's recent statement regarding the recognition and the authority of the French Committee of National Liberation,[31] and he was very happy that Mr. Hull had made the statement in this connection that he had.[32] Canada had, after all, a very substantial French element in her population. The feeling of that element towards continental France might not be quite the same as the feeling of that part of the Canadian population which were of British stock towards the British Isles. But it would never be overlooked that Canada could not be governed as a united country if that problem was not given its full weight. He thought that there was a risk that, when certain questions were under consideration, it might not always be appreciated that Canada contained a minority of French descent and predominantly Roman Catholic in religion, and a majority of English-speaking peoples predominantly Protestant. The importance of the problem which that presented could be tested by an issue such as conscription. The French element in the population was apt to be less well placed in military matters than the English-speaking element. Up to the present there had not been the shipping available to carry the numbers of men who had volunteered for service in any part of the world or the munitions that were available for transport. He had no doubt whatever that the consistent policy of the Canadian Government that there should be a united Canada was a policy which had worked in the best interests of the United Commonwealth. Given this background, he had been very glad to hear Mr. Churchill say yesterday that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom recognised the need for a strong France and were determined to do all they could to bring that about. That was a statement that would please the people of Canada, and the Canadian Government would do all they could to make their contribution to the achievement of that ideal.

China.

In considering the question of China, he thought we ought not to overlook, and he was speaking here especially of opinion in the United States, that years ago, when the Anglo-Japanese Alliance was in being, there had been a disposition in certain quarters in the United States to feel that the United Kingdom had lined up with the Japanese; and the existence of that Alliance had, he felt, been for years a factor in making opinion in the United States concerned to develop, still further than might otherwise have been the case, relations with China. The people of Canada were inevitably to some extent influenced by United States opinion, and in their relations with China and with other countries they had to keep in mind the relations of those countries with, and the attitude towards them of, the United States. Policy in Canada did not necessarily follow United States policy. But it was obvious that the Government of Canada could not wisely overlook that Canadian opinion was inevitably materially influenced in certain respects by opinion in the United States. That process was not one-sided. He had little doubt that valuable influence was exercised on opinion in the United States by opinion in Canada, which could sometimes interpret the opinion of Great Britain. But the closeness of Canadian relations with the United States must mean that the Canadian Government had at all times to keep in mind its relations with its immediate neighbour. In the same way, just as, in London it was natural that developments on the continent of Europe should be of immediate significance to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, so in Canada the reactions and attitude of their immediate neighbour had to be borne in mind. That was all the more so now that the world, thanks to the development of air power, was so continually contracting. Russia was very close geographically to Canada, and it should not be overlooked that the United States route to the Orient, whether for military or for peaceful purposes, was along a chain of airfields used alike by the United States and by Canada. The United States' possession of Alaska and Canadian possession of the Yukon, all helped to knit these countries together in the problems they had to consider, and Canada could not therefore, in decisions that she took, wisely fail to take into account her relations with these neighbouring countries.

The contraction of the world brought Canada also into immediate relations with the problems of Australia and New Zealand in the Pacific. Canada realised full well that she was a Pacific Power on the West, as she was an Atlantic Power to the East. Canada intended to do her full part in the Pacific struggle. In what way could be worked out later. She was determined to see the war to a finish not in Europe alone but in the Orient; to fight to the finish; and, throughout, to see her relations with her sister Dominions kept as close as they possibly could be. He might summarise the Canadian outlook as being one of general goodwill towards all like-minded countries, and of anxiety to have continuous close and friendly relations with them, and to aim at inclusive rather than exclusive policies and the achievement of as wide a measure of co-operation as it was possible to have.[33]

MOST IMMEDIATE. MOST SECRET. Following for Ralston from the Prime Minister, Begins: Meetings of Prime Ministers are expected to conclude tomorrow morning with formal session from which a brief statement will be issued under the signatures of the participating Prime Ministers. I shall cable you the text of this statement after it has been agreed at this afternoon's meeting, and will advise you about the arrangements for its release[34].

I am planning to visit Army and Air Force units during the remaining days of this week and hope to be back in Ottawa by the end of the week.

The meetings generally have been useful and non-controversial. No specific proposals have been put forward for modification of present machinery of procedures of Commonwealth consultation. Preliminary discussion of proposals for world security organisation have, I believe, been valuable and have helped to make clear the impracticability of taking the Commonwealth as a unit with a single foreign policy. Discussions on questions of international, economic and monetary policy were muddled and quite inconclusive. Discussion on civil aviation, shipping, migration were brief and ended in each case with recognition that the Government should continue to explore possibilities of joint action where desirable through usual channels.

I should like to add my most sincere congratulations on the magnificent response of the Canadian people to the Victory Loan. Ends.

IMMIGRATION

TELEGRAM 766 Ottawa, April 28, 1944

SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister from Heeney and Wrong, Begins: War Committee considered on April 26th postwar migration policy and decided that they could not go beyond decisions of April 12th, when it was agreed:

(1) to treat dependents of Canadian servicemen overseas as Canadian nationals; and

(2) to admit United Kingdom service personnel married to Canadian nationals with immigrant status if reciprocal treatment were accorded by United Kingdom to Canadians.

As to (1), it was agreed that if practicable medical certificate showing results of a recent physical examination should be required before document of identity was issued overseas certifying holder to be a dependent of Canadian serviceman. This was proposed solely on grounds of public health, so that public health authorities in Canada would secure notice of arrival of dependents with communicable diseases. Admission would not be refused on medical grounds.

It was decided to inform you that War Committee was not disposed to have Canada agree, at present, to participation in any cooperative scheme for assisted immigration within the Commonwealth or to granting preferential treatment to United Kingdom servicemen, even those who were serving or had served in Canada (apart from any with Canadian wives). The main ground for refusing any preference to United Kingdom personnel with Canadian service was that special treatment for this group would lead to demands for concession to them of Canadian scale of pensions and demobilization benefits. It was felt, therefore, that they would have to take their chance of securing entry as immigrants in the normal manner so that there would be no basis for a claim that the Canadian Government had specially encouraged them to establish themselves here and were therefore under a special obligation to them. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX

MR. MACKENZIE KING thanked Mr. Bevin for his extremely interesting account of the plans, which had obviously been prepared with such care and forethought. He said that the Canadian Government, whose officials had been in close touch with the United Kingdom authorities, were working on parallel lines and had reached very much the same conclusions. As regards the possibility to which Mr. Bevin had referred of the settlement in the Dominions of demobilised United Kingdom personnel, he feared that public opinion in Canada, at any rate, would be difficult to convince. Until men demobilised from Canadian forces had all been re-established in civilian employment, the arrival in the country of immigrants on any large scale might be misunderstood.

2. Migration.

MR. ATTLEE invited Lord Cranborne to make a statement regarding migration.

LORD CRANBORNE said that Mr. Bevin's statement about the United Kingdom Government's demobilisation plans had covered the whole field of transference of the people of the United Kingdom back from war to peace. Mr. Bevin had also touched on one particular aspect of special interest to the Dominions — namely, the settlement in the Dominions of demobilised members of the United Kingdom Forces. Lord Cranborne said he wished to speak about the problems of migration rather more generally. After the vast issues with which the meeting had been dealing during the week, this subject might appear a somewhat limited topic. But he believed that it was important that discussion of it should take place and that some progress should, if possible, be made during the present series of meetings. It appeared to him that we were faced with a new situation and new possibilities in this sphere. The prospects of migration from this country to the Dominions had gradually deteriorated in the last fifty years. It was the fashion now to say that the impulse to migrate was generally of romantic origin and sprang from a spirit of adventure. That may have been true in a few cases, but he believed that as a general proposition it was untrue. The main motives which had led men to migrate were poor conditions at home, the pinch of extreme poverty in the days when there was no machinery for its alleviation, and the wide difference between the opportunities that offered at home and in the newer countries of the world. But gradually this incentive had become less so far as this country was concerned. Standards of wages had been raised, social services improved, the risks of life reduced. As a result, the great majority of people in this country, who were conservative by nature, if not in politics, tended more and more to prefer to stay at home and not run the risks of starting entirely afresh. It had looked as if the great period of inter-Commonwealth migration was over. But it so happened that in the last four years a new state of circumstances had arisen favourable to the stimulation of migration. As a result of the war, a large number of people had been uprooted from their homes, the continuity of their lives had been broken and their minds were receptive to the possibilities of establishing themselves elsewhere. Considerable numbers of young people, in the course of their training or on their way to or from the various theatres of war, had passed through one or other of the Dominions and liked what they saw there very much. The minds of these young people were turning to the possibility of making their lives in these pleasant places. He had had evidence of this from many sources. In a recent letter to him, Lord Moyne[35] had stressed the widespread interest of the troops in the Middle East in the possibilities of migration to the Dominions and there was an urgent demand for information on this subject. But this was a temporary phase as a result of the unsettling effects of war. As soon as these people had returned to this country, settled down and taken up jobs — and there would be plenty of opportunities for employment — they would lose the desire to move. The opportunity of establishing them overseas, if lost, might not recur. He did not know whether the Dominions wanted migrants from the United Kingdom. The matter was one entirely for them, but, if they did, he would suggest they should strike now while the iron was hot. The two years after the cessation of hostilities would be the psychological moment. After that the possibilities of obtaining migrants would not be so good. The United Kingdom authorities were at present deluged with enquiries, both in Parliament and outside, about the Government policy towards migration, and had been unable to give any information. Over a year ago, he had sent a despatch to Dominion Governments giving the main headings of the problem and seeking their views.[36] So far, no definite indication of the Dominion Governments' views had been received. He did not complain about this, as the Dominion Governments were faced with the same demobilisation problems as the United Kingdom. Moreover, they were no doubt uncertain about the post-war economic situation and the prospects of employment in their own countries. But he felt that it was urgently necessary to look, if not at the long-term arrangements, at least at the immediate problem arising on demobilisation and decide where we stood. Clearly, the question required considerable preliminary study. Migration imposed a double obligation, on the country which sent the migrant and on the country which received the migrant. There must be some assurance, before the individual set out, that he would find suitable employment when he arrived. Any serious failure to do so would prejudice the flow of future migrants and cause distress and friction on both sides.

This raised the question what type of men and women were required; did the Dominions want industrial or agricultural types or both? Another problem of considerable importance was the bearing of migration on social security arrangements. The important point was to avoid a gap without security while the individual transferred from one scheme to another. The United Kingdom authorities were already looking into this matter for their part, but it was essentially one for joint expert examination. He understood that Mr. Bevin, who had long experience of this type of problem, thought it not insoluble. He did not wish to suggest that the Prime Ministers should tackle such questions in detail at the present series of meetings, but he would like, if possible, to make some progress on the subject. He would suggest, with all diffidence, that the Prime Ministers might agree that further discussions should take place on the official level as soon as they could conveniently be arranged, with the object of formulating practicable arrangements, on the understanding that these arrangements were for the consideration of Governments and that no Government was thereby committed. As he had said, this question was one even more for Dominion Governments than for the United Kingdom. If these young people did not leave this country the United Kingdom authorities would not be broken-hearted. The birth-rate in the United Kingdom was falling and it was arguable that we could not afford to lose good young men and women in any large numbers. But if they wanted to go and the Dominions were ready to take them, he felt that it would surely be wrong to discourage them. Moreover, the interchange of British blood between one part of the Commonwealth and another must tend to strengthen the whole and to multiply the links that bound it together. It was in that spirit that he raised the subject and he would be very glad to hear the views of the Prime Ministers, particularly on the question what answer could be given to enquiries from the public in the United Kingdom in the near future.

MR. BEVIN said that in the past unemployment had made present in everyone's mind the necessity of finding a solution by creating employment or seeking it elsewhere. That had been an incentive to migration. But, if plans for full employment in the United Kingdom in the post-war period were successful, that incentive would vanish. A new factor which, in his opinion, had arisen was defence, a subject so very present in our minds at present. The character of war had changed and new weapons and training methods called for greater facilities than could be provided in the United Kingdom and he had been revolving in his mind the possibility of training British forces overseas in areas where there were not the same limitations of space. He felt that such a plan would assuredly stimulate migration, bind closer the links between the United Kingdom and the Dominions and do much to promote the common understanding and knowledge of one another's problems. Upon completion of a training period or period of service in a Dominion, a young soldier might be allowed to settle there permanently, whilst remaining on the United Kingdom reserve or joining a Dominion reserve. Under such a scheme the British Commonwealth would be assured of a trained reserve of men in each of the countries which comprised it. Opportunity should also offer simultaneously for the development of industrial potential for defence purposes in the different parts of the Commonwealth, and provide an impetus to inter-Commonwealth trade. As regards social security contributions and benefits, he would suggest that the simplest possible solution should be sought. From his experience in the past, he thought that the most practicable arrangement would be for the United Kingdom to continue to bear a man on the United Kingdom scheme, to which he had contributed, for an agreed number of months, whereafter he could be transferred to the Dominion scheme. It should not be a serious deterrent that the benefits were not the same in each country.

MR. MACKENZIE KING thanked Lord Cranborne for his statement. He thought that one of the principal motives in the past for migration had been the hope of parents that they would secure better opportunities for their children in a new country, and that, in the case of migrants from countries on the continent of Europe, they would escape the perpetual threat of war. In the United Kingdom there had been perhaps, too, some desire to get away from a certain measure of class distinction. He realised that this no longer held good. Nowadays young people tended more and more to work out their own future for themselves. They were not afraid to take risks and he had no doubt that they would wish to migrate in large numbers if allowed entry into the Dominions. Speaking personally, he did not think there would be any restrictions imposed in Canada on the entry of migrants from British stock, if they were in a position to look after themselves and not become a charge upon public funds. But one of the main fears in people's minds was the recurrence of a post-war depression and unemployment. For this reason, despite Canada's need to populate her vast territories, he feared that it would be difficult to secure wholehearted public backing for immigration on a large scale in the immediate post-war period. Until local problems of re-establishment of demobilised personnel in industry had been solved, any large flow of migrants might cause friction. A minor point which he thought should be watched was the trouble which had arisen in the past from the activities of transportation companies who tended to encourage migration for the sake of their own immediate profits. He was entirely agreeable to the suggestion that the problems involved, including the question of Government-assisted migration generally, should be examined between officials on the understanding that no Government was thereby committed. As regards Mr. Bevin's suggestion, he doubted whether any scheme for migration which was designed primarily to achieve military purposes would be favourably received.

He had prepared a document setting out the position as regards his Government, which had not yet had an opportunity of making more than a very preliminary study of post-war economic and social problems. [This appears as Appendix I.]

An interesting point was that since the Dominion of Canada had been established in 1867, the number of emigrants from Canada to the United States had approximately equalled the number of immigrants into Canada from elsewhere. The flow into the United States generally occurred during periods of depression, when people were attracted by the greater possibilities of trade in that country, which was probably the largest area of free trade in the world.

APPENDIX I.

Migration.

Note by Mr. Mackenzie King.

The Canadian Government has not yet been able to give any very serious consideration to questions of post-war immigration policy. We have only been able to spare very modest and limited staff for the preliminary study of post-war economic and social policy and in the list of questions which they have been asked to report immigration policy has not been given very high priority. In the circumstances, I cannot usefully attempt to forecast what the position of the Canadian Government will be with respect to immigration after the war.

The task of demobilisation of service personnel and their return to useful civilian employment will be a formidable one in every country and will be probably a slower process than we expect. There are 700,000 men and women in the armed forces of Canada and rather more in civilian war industries who will have to be absorbed again into the productive economy of the country. Plans for demobilisation of service personnel have been pretty well worked out and, I think, are familiar to the competent departments of the other Governments represented at this meeting, who are working on the same problems. On the civilian side, plans for industrial reconversion and transfer of employment are less fully worked out.

The speed and success of such plans for returning people from service and war industries to civilian employment will obviously have a great bearing on any Government's attitude towards immigration proposals during the transitional period after the war. Similarly, our attitude towards migration questions is bound to be influenced very greatly by the co-operation we can get from other countries in pursuing an expansionist economic and commercial policy after the war. If we can all work together toward the achievement of full employment and larger real incomes in the framework of a multilateral economic policy which will give larger export opportunities for our more efficient industries we can, I think, count on relaxation of the protective attitudes which incline some elements of our country to view with suspicion plans for encouraging the entry of new workers.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 1059 London, July 25, 1944

CONFIDENTIAL. Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: My telegram of April 18th [19th], Circular D. 578,† post-war migration.

You will remember that in the course of discussion of this subject at the recent meeting of the Prime Ministers I gave a general indication of the attitude of the United Kingdom Government to the effect that, while from the purely United Kingdom point of view we were not anxious to lose good young men and women in any large numbers, we felt that in the general interests of the British Commonwealth it would be advantageous that there should be an interchange of population and that, therefore, for our part, we should not wish to discourage those who wished to leave this country to settle overseas. I said, however, that the question was one more for the Dominion Governments than for the United Kingdom and that any progress in the matter was dependent on whether they were prepared to co-operate with the United Kingdom in organised migration arrangements. I suggested, therefore, that it would be of value to all the Governments of the Commonwealth if discussions were to take place here on the official level between United Kingdom and Dominion representatives as soon as they could conveniently be arranged, with the object of formulating any practicable arrangements in regard to migration, including the difficult question of transferability of social security benefits. This suggestion was, of course, on the understanding that any schemes that might emerge from such discussions would be for the consideration of Governments and that no Governments would thereby be committed. I understood that it was the general view of the meeting that this suggestion should prove acceptable.

We should be glad to learn whether Dominion Governments are agreeable to official discussions on the lines proposed now being arranged. In that case, would you let me know who your representative would be and when he would be available. Date of discussions would, of course, depend on this.

As I said at the meeting of the Prime Ministers, the United Kingdom authorities are at present deluged with enquiries as to the prospects of migration with particular reference to position of ex-service personnel on demobilisation. From this point of view it would be very helpful to us if an early decision could be reached as regards the suggested discussions. Moreover, with the continued favourable progress of the war the need for an early decision as to the grant of special facilities to ex-service personnel on demobilisation may at any time become more urgent. Ends.

TELEGRAM 189 Ottawa, September 30, 1944

My telegram No. 155 September 1st,† proposed discussions of post-war immigration.

Canadian Government is agreeable to official discussions on the lines proposed in your Circular D. 1059, July 25th, as soon as may be conveniently arranged. It is hoped to let you know shortly names of Canadian representatives.

As far as Canadian participation is concerned, the scope of the exploratory discussions will be set by the statement of our Prime Minister at the recent meeting in London. Within these limits the talks might cover the following points: —

a) the provision of reliable information to prospective emigrants, including warnings that it may be particularly difficult to establish themselves in Canada during the period of military demobilization and industrial reconversion and that immigrants, even if ex-service men, would not be eligible for the benefits extended to Canadian soldiers on demobilization;

b) the elimination of propaganda by interested parties;

c) facilities (short of financial assistance) with respect to:

i) securing transportation;

ii) converting sterling into Canadian dollars;

iii) transferring social security benefits;

iv) transferring of British demobilization benefits and their transformation into the form most likely to be of benefit to the recipients in Canada;

v) the consideration by the United Kingdom authorities of a plan to enable emigrants to Canada to encash in Canada compulsory savings vouchers and British War Savings Certificates as these fall due.

We should appreciate any information as to when it is expected that the meeting can be held.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 1845 London, December 22, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL. My telegram July 25th. Post-war migration. We have considered position further in light of replies received from Dominion Governments to my telegram of July 25th and think that time has now come when it would be useful to convene the proposed meeting of officials.

We accordingly suggest that meeting should begin on Thursday, 1st February, and should be glad to learn whether that date would be convenient so far as your representatives are concerned.

We propose that Sir Patrick Duff, lately Deputy High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Canada, should be the Chief United Kingdom representative, assisted by representatives of the Dominions Office and Ministry of Labour and National Service.

TELEGRAM 222 London, December 22, 1944

My telegram of today, Circular D. 1845. Migration. We agree that the particular questions set out in your telegram No. 189 of September 30th should be considered at the proposed meeting. We should, however, prefer that scope of discussions should not be definitely limited to these particular items but should be wide enough to cover general discussion as to the prospects of migration from this country to the Dominions.

On the assumption that the proposed date is acceptable, should be glad to learn as soon as possible whom you will appoint to represent Canada.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

[Ottawa,] December 30, 1944

I am enclosing a note, prepared for your consideration, on the agenda of the meeting of officials to discuss migration questions, which the United Kingdom now proposes should be held in London on February 1st. (See Dominions Office telegrams Circular D. 1845 and No. 222 of December 22nd.) I am also attaching a draft reply to the United Kingdom[37], prepared on the assumption that the Government approves of Canadian participation on the basis suggested.

The meeting proposed would be exploratory, on the official level, and its consideration of migration questions would be within the limits laid down at the Prime Ministers' meetings in London in May last. Some of the questions which it is proposed the meeting should consider have a certain urgency, particularly those which would affect plans for the demobilization of Service personnel. There is, therefore, a certain case for having such a meeting at a fairly early date.

There are, however, undoubtedly some political implications to Canadian participation in such talks at this time. There would, of course, be another set of political implications to keep in mind if the other Commonwealth countries went ahead with talks on migration policy in which Canada did not take part. On balance, I would be inclined to suggest postponement of the meeting until say June. This might be justified by the retardation of the military timetable, which will undoubtedly postpone problems of demobilization and resumption of migration for a good many months to come.

If you think we should try to get the meeting put off, the best course might be to have a word with Malcolm MacDonald on the subject.

MIGRATION

In Circular D. 1845 of December 22nd the Dominions Office has proposed Thursday, February 1st, as the date for the commencement of discussions between officials of the United Kingdom and the Dominions concerning post-war migration. This meeting of officials was agreed to in principle in London in May of this year and was definitely accepted by Canada in telegram No. 189 of September 30th. This telegram limited the scope of the exploratory discussions in accordance with the statement which you made in London in May and suggested some points of detail which should receive attention. A copy of this telegram is attached.[38]

[37]Pour la réponse telle qu'envoyée, voir le document 773.

In telegram No. 222 of December 22nd the Dominions Office has agreed that these points should be discussed but has asked that the discussions should not be definitely limited to these particular items but should be wide enough to cover general discussion as to the prospects of migration from the United Kingdom to the Dominions.

A valid distinction can be drawn between the questions incidental to the minor movement of population which is likely to accompany or follow immediately after demobilization and the prospects of migration on a larger scale over a considerable period of time. The topics suggested in our telegram of September 30th fall within the first of these two categories. They are points on which decisions must be made and action taken in order to meet the reasonable enquiries for information of persons fully qualified to enter under our existing law who may wish to move from the United Kingdom to Canada at the time of demobilization or shortly afterwards. There is a very strong case for a discussion of these points at the official level with a view to avoiding cases of individual hardship and a multiplicity of enquiries from people who are puzzled as to the action which they should take.

In addition to the topics mentioned in our telegram of September 30th, it should be possible to say something on the subject of the eligibility of immigrants from the United Kingdom for family allowances. This topic is closely allied with the transference of social security benefits. The Family Allowances Act of 1944, by its definition of "child", requires a residence of three years. It is suggested that what may be an appropriate safeguard against migration which is not of a bona fide character may operate harshly and against the interests of Canada in the case of migrants who have demonstrated their good faith by transferring their social service benefits from their country of origin to Canada. Without at any time becoming a public charge, these immigrants are likely to find that during the first three years of residence in Canada their employment is less regular and their incomes smaller than at any other time. This means that their children will be more likely than at any other time to be inadequately supplied with food, clothing and shelter. Yet these children are likely to be future citizens of Canada and the Canadian taxpayer has as much interest in seeing that they are properly nourished as in the case of any other children. If then it were possible, in connection with the proposals for the transfer of social security benefits, to indicate that Canada would consider amending the Family Allowances Act, it would be a gesture of cordiality and good-will in no way at variance with Canadian interests.

[38]Voir le document 770./See Document 770.

The second type of question is very difficult to deal with at the present time. Rightly or wrongly there is still a widespread fear of mass unemployment and a widespread demand that returned soldiers should be assured of employment before any comprehensive immigration policy is considered. Even at an official level the question of post-war migration on a substantial scale could not usefully be considered without greater knowledge than we now possess of the reconstruction policies of the countries concerned and of their commercial policies. Without this knowledge it is impossible to predict with confidence the economic structure of the countries or their capacity to furnish employment.

A suggested reply on these lines to the Dominions Office telegram No. 222 is attached.

TELEGRAM 1 Ottawa, January 2, 1945

Your Circular D. 1845 and your telegram No. 222 of December 22nd, migration. In the view of the Canadian Government it would be most desirable to postpone the proposed meeting of officials until June. The particular questions set out in our telegram of September 30th were designed to include the points which require action or decision in order to deal with the migration which is likely to be incidental to settling down in the period immediately following the cessation of hostilities. The progress of the war has not been so rapid as to make it at all likely that there could be any movement of civilian population before that date and it is likely that by June we should be able to foresee more clearly than at present the conditions under which demobilization is likely to take place. In June we should be glad to discuss, with a view to action, any points additional to those mentioned in the telegram of September 30th which are incidental to the movement of civilian population in the period immediately following demobilization.

We are doubtful of the expediency of discussing in the near future the prospects of migration from the United Kingdom to the Dominions. This discussion would complicate the particular questions already mentioned which will become urgent at the close of the war. It would also raise issues which cannot be thoroughly discussed with a view to decisions without more knowledge of the general reconstruction policy in the United Kingdom and the Dominions, of the prospects of full employment being achieved and of the general trade policies designed to maintain full employment on the basis consistent with the benefits of international specialization than is available at the present time. As long as fears of post-war unemployment have not been allayed, they are likely to lead to very restrictive decisions. It is felt, therefore, that there can be no possible disadvantage in postponing such a discussion until June, although it is doubtful if even then it can be successfully undertaken.

IMPORTANT. Your telegram of 2nd January, No. 1, migration.

We appreciate the considerations which you urge in favour of postponing proposed official talks on migration. On the other hand, we are impressed very strongly by difficulties of postponing all consideration of this question. You will, we feel sure, understand the very strong feeling which exists in this country that some progress should be made before the end of the war, in order that service men and others may know where they stand.

It will be recalled that this question was first raised by us some two years ago when, by the time of the Prime Minister's meeting last May, it had been found impossible to reach definite conclusions by correspondence, we suggested that an exploratory meeting between officials might usefully help to clear some of the ground. We had not contemplated and certainly do not now that any prior announcement of such a meeting need be made, but had hoped that such talks would result in some definite statement of whatever nature, to be made in terms which would, of course, be agreed between the various Governments. This would place us in a stronger position in dealing with the undoubted criticism which we here shall meet in Parliament that no action has been taken by the United Kingdom Government in this matter. The other Governments have agreed to the proposed meeting next month, and we hope, therefore, that on reconsideration Canadian Government will also be prepared to be represented.

Commonwealth migration discussions

6. THE PRIME MINISTER reported that it was now intended that a meeting be held in London in February with particular relation to postwar migration of ex-Servicemen within the Empire.

The U.K. High Commissioner had been informed that the Canadian government would be unable to take part. The officials who would represent Canada could not be spared from other urgent war tasks; the repatriation and re-establishment of Canadian ex-Servicemen and the re-establishment of large numbers of war workers would have to take priority. It would, therefore, be impossible for the government to give realistic consideration now to possible plans for the movement of other classes of persons.

Mr. MacDonald had been told that, at a later stage, Canada would be willing to consider the steps which should be taken to facilitate the movement of persons from one country to another and would be glad to enter into discussions with U.K. authorities, as early as the war situation might make this practicable and fruitful.

A message to this effect was being sent to the U.K. government, since it was desired that an early statement on the matter be made in the British House of Commons.

(External Affairs draft statement† delivered to the U.K. High Commissioner, Jan. 15, 1945.)

7. THE WAR COMMITTEE noted with approval the Prime Minister's report.

POST-WAR IMMIGRATION POLICY

On April 26th, 1944, when the War Committee last considered post-war immigration policy, they decided that they could not then go beyond their earlier decisions: (1) to treat dependents of Canadian servicemen overseas as Canadian nationals; and (2) to admit United Kingdom service personnel married to Canadian nationals with immigrant status if reciprocal treatment were accorded by the United Kingdom to Canadians.

In my memorandum of January 17th of this year†, approved by War Committee and given to the United Kingdom High Commissioner, it was stated that the Canadian Government would "gladly enter into discussions with the United Kingdom authorities on these matters as early as the war situation may make this practicable and fruitful." It was then suggested that June would be a convenient time for these discussions.

As matters stand there is no likelihood of any movement of settlers from the United Kingdom or elsewhere for at least eighteen months or two years. The shipping situation in itself would prevent any such movement. Our offices in the United Kingdom are, however, bound to receive thousands, perhaps tens of thousands, of enquiries during the next months from persons 'thinking' about emigration as one of a dozen possible things to do after demobilization. I think it is important to have plain answers available for such enquirers — answers which would put people in possession of facts about travel difficulties, housing conditions, employment prospects in particular trades and areas, living costs, etc. With this object in mind I think it would be useful to have Angus, who will be in London next month for the UNRRA meeting, explore the position informally with the United Kingdom Departments which are always pressing us for information about immigration policy which we cannot supply.

Questions that might be looked into include:

(a) the provision of reliable information to prospective emigrants, including warnings that it may be particularly difficult to establish themselves in Canada during the period of military demobilization and industrial reconversion, and that immigrants, even if ex-service men, would not be eligible for the benefits extended to Canadian soldiers on demobilization;

(b) the elimination of propaganda by interested parties;

(c) facilities (short of financial assistance) with respect to:

i) securing transportation;

ii) converting sterling into Canadian dollars;

iii) transferring social security benefits;

iv) transferring of British demobilization benefits and their transformation into the form most likely to be of benefit to the recipients in Canada;

v) the consideration by the United Kingdom authorities of a plan to enable emigrants to Canada to encash in Canada compulsory savings vouchers and British War Savings Certificates as these fall due.

IMMIGRATION

1. While I was in London I had some conversations at the Dominions Office with Sir John Stephenson and a group of officials which he assembled. A record of the conversations† is being cleared with the officials concerned and will no doubt reach us in due course.

2. My first objective was to make it absolutely clear that we were not concerned with an immigration policy. We were considering some action which might be taken to make the path smooth for such migrants as were allowed to proceed in accordance with the policies of the two countries. These arrangements could, with advantage, be continued whether migration were encouraged or restricted. If it is wished to discourage immigration there are far better and more effective methods available than that of making the lot of the individual migrant hard.

3. The greatest difficulty confronting migrants at the present time concerns the transfer of funds. On this point a very satisfactory arrangement has, I believe, been made by the Foreign Exchange Control Board, but when I was in London this had not actually been put into operation by the banks.

4. A second important point concerns the position of the migrant under social security legislation. I suggested that it would be desirable for migrants likely to engage in insurable occupations in Canada to buy themselves into the Canadian Unemployment Insurance scheme, either from funds arising from service gratuities or from any payment which could be made available by the British Unemployment Insurance authorities. A third possibility is for them to use their own savings if this course were permitted by the Canadian insurance authorities.

5. I was told that it would require legislation to enable British Unemployment Insurance funds to be used in this way and some doubt was expressed as to whether someone withdrawing from the plan in Britain really had anything standing to his credit. One argument was that his insurance premiums had covered him during a certain period, just as fire insurance premiums do, but gave him no equity at the end of that period. Another view was that the risk carried by the insurance scheme diminished with the migration of some of the insured. In general, I think the situation is sufficiently hopeful to justify direct conversations on this topic between the British and Canadian officials concerned with a view to fairly comprehensive agreement.

6. I am very strongly of the opinion that in the case of bona fide immigrants, the Canadian system of children's allowances should apply without a delay of three years as at present provided in our legislation. My reasons have nothing to do with encouraging immigration and nothing to do with making a bargain with the United Kingdom. They arise from the simple calculation that we have nothing to gain by exposing to special risks of malnutritiion, underhousing, inadequate clothing or inadequate education, the children of immigrants who, in the natural course of events, will be the future citizens of Canada. We must, of course, ensure that we are dealing with bona fide migrants and it seems to me that a transfer of Unemployment Insurance benefits would provide a complete test of sincerity on the part of the migrant. It may be worth noting in this connection that an immigrant wealthy enough to pay income tax does not have to wait three years before claiming income tax exemption in respect of his dependents. Why should a poorer immigrant have to wait before receiving an analogous benefit? I strongly recommend that the Minister of National Health and Welfare should be asked if his Department would be prepared to recommend action on the lines suggested in the event of an agreement being reached concerning Unemployment Insurance.

7. As a matter of long-range policy, the British authorities welcomed our suggestion that the Department of Labour should give periodic and authentic information concerning employment conditions in Canada and that, if labour in special categories cannot be found in Canada, a request might be made to the British labour exchanges to provide assistance. These measures would do much to counteract propaganda by transportation companies interested merely in the volume of migration.

8. The British authorities were anxious that there should be some organization in Canada to which a migrant could turn for advice. I expressed some doubt on this point because it is one thing to give information and another thing to give advice. In giving advice one is bound to be held to some extent responsible if the advice turns out to be bad. In giving information there is no responsibility involved as to the use which may be made of the information by the man who receives it.

9. It may well appear that a very limited field has been covered by conversations and by the suggestions which I have made. I do not think that it is possible to do more at the present time before any immigration policy is settled, but I do think that prompt action at the present time can save a good deal of undeserved hardship to individuals and can lay a sound basis for future developments.[40]

2. Defence Co-operation within the British Commonwealth.

MR. ATTLEE asked Lord Cranborne to open the discussion.

LORD CRANBORNE said that defence co-operation within the British Commonwealth was closely linked with the subject of a world security system, upon which interesting and valuable discussions had already been held. Such a world system, if it were to be successful, must have three facets — political, economic and military. The political aspect had been sketched out in the Papers put before the Conference by Mr. Eden, and he did not propose to revert to it. It was sufficient to say that the main reason for the failure of the League of Nations was that it had not behind it the sanction of force, so that when its authority was challenged it was unable to meet the challenge. The World Security Organisation must have teeth, and there had already been some discussion on how these teeth should be provided.

Mr. Eden had expressed the idea of a Military Staff attached to the World Council, to draw up plans for preventing aggression, and had explained the reasons in favour of the earmarking by the various member States of certain forces for use in certain areas at the demand of the World Council. If that conception was generally accepted, it immediately raised the question of the part which the nations of the British Commonwealth might have to play in providing these forces. Empire Governments had agreed with the proposal that the main responsibility for the preservation of peace, and for the provision of military forces, would rest on the four Great Powers — the United States, Russia, China and the nations of the British Commonwealth — freely acting in association. It might indeed be said that there would be only three Great Powers, as China for this purpose might be considered a big country rather than a Great Power. In any case, whether or not there were to be regional organisations within the world system, the conception of the four-Power Pact remained unchanged. The nations of the British Commonwealth would remain one of the main props of the organisation. The question was, how could our contribution be made most effective?

The World Council must be able to call upon our whole resources if required, and close consultation would be essential if such resources were to be made available. There was also the possibility that the new world system might fail. All would hope that this melancholy thought would not come to pass; but one could not ignore the possibility, and close collaboration within the British Commonwealth would then be more essential than ever.

It might therefore be assumed that, whether the new World Security Organisation succeeded or failed, close consultation between the members of the British Commonwealth, and close co-ordination of their military forces would remain of the first importance. One must ask whether the present system was perfect, or whether it could be improved. Up to the outbreak of war, the main organ of consultation had been the Imperial Conference, which was held with fair regularity every few years. Between Conferences, consultation was maintained by various means, such as occasional visits of Dominion representatives to the United Kingdom, the attendance of Dominion High Commissioners or other representatives at the meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence in London, and the regular interchange of Military Officers. In addition, the standard system of organisation, training and equipment throughout the forces of the Empire was a factor of the highest importance in correlating thought and action. Was this the best that could be done, or were other measures possible? He fully realised that it was difficult to discuss Imperial defence in isolation. It was inextricably linked with foreign policy. Obviously, no Government in the Commonwealth would be willing to undertake defence commitments, unless satisfied as to the circumstances in which it might be called upon to implement them.

It was equally clear that it might be politically impossible to come to final decisions on peace or war before the event. As Mr. Curtin had rightly pointed out, it was not the Governments alone that determined matters of peace or war but the electorates of the various countries. But subject to these essential considerations, could we improve the methods of collaboration? It was not his intention to dogmatise in any way, but to put forward certain lines of thought which might be worth consideration: —

(a) Assuming that the Imperial Conference remained the main organ of consultation between the nations of the Commonwealth, would it be possible to give some degree of continuity to its proceedings by establishing a standing committee to deal with strategy and other aspects of defence.

(b) Alternatively, or perhaps in addition, there might be periodic meetings at regular intervals between Defence Ministers and Chiefs of Staff in London or elsewhere. These might possibly be preliminary to meetings of the World Council.

(c) There might be an extended system for the interchange of military staffs. This would be particularly valuable if, as the result of definite obligations under a world security system, the preparation of joint plans became a practical possibility.

(d) There might be a considerable expansion of the training of United Kingdom and Dominion officers in the principles of Imperial Defence. This would involve an expanded conception of the Imperial Defence College.

(e) Study might be given to the co-ordination of industrial potential throughout the Commonwealth and Empire. This was a matter which had not been given as much attention heretofore as it deserved, but which had emerged as a new factor of vital importance during the present war, when the various parts of the Empire had supplied others with great quantities of war materials. Much experience had been gained which was extremely valuable, and it would be a pity if in another emergency we had to start all over again at the beginning. It was for consideration whether an expert body might not be set up in the near future to consider this aspect.

(f) It would no doubt be agreed that the organisation, equipment and training of forces on a common model throughout the Commonwealth should continue as before.

Continuing, LORD CRANBORNE said that the proposals which he had outlined above were not specific, but were thrown out for the consideration of Prime Ministers as possible lines upon which improvement in the present machinery for consultation and co-ordination might be directed. It might be thought desirable to have them technically examined. Some of them might be considered impracticable, others might be thought politically inexpedient. We should, however, be under an obligation to do all in our power to make the new system of world security a success, and he felt that we should do everything possible to improve the machinery of consultation so that when the day came the British Commonwealth would not be found wanting.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the statement made by Lord Cranborne would be of great value as a basis for consideration of this matter by his Cabinet in Canada. He was not in a position to express any opinion upon it until he had had an opportunity of discussing it with his colleagues. He could hardly say anything useful upon the various suggestions thrown out unless he could back his remarks with a commitment, and this he could not do unless he was in a position to carry the Canadian Parliament with him. Furthermore, he considered that these were questions upon which decisions could not be reached while war was in progress. As soon as it was over the situation could be considered.

MR. CURTIN said that the subject under discussion was one which had presented itself in an acute form during the present war. The Australian Government had felt obliged at one stage to ask that their views should be given due consideration by the bodies responsible for taking the great decisions on the conduct of the war. During the present Conference Mr. Churchill had made it clear on more than one occasion that he felt that the Empire would carry much greater weight if it spoke as one. We were contemplating a future in which a world security organisation would be set up. The British Commonwealth and Empire would have much greater influence in such an organisation than would the United Kingdom divorced from the Dominions. The Australian Government would certainly give careful consideration to each of the proposals put forward by Lord Cranborne, some of which were in some degree already operating. They had found it necessary to ask for an opportunity to be heard in London when decisions affecting Australia were being formed. Their object was to ensure that the Australian arguments would be carefully weighed, and that decisions should be taken after they had been heard. If the decision went against the views of the Australian Government they would be perfectly agreeable because they would know that the arguments on the other side had been judged overriding. These questions were of such importance that he had thought it right to prepare a statement embodying his views.

Mr. Curtin then read to the Conference the statement, a copy of which is at Annex I.†

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that while there was much in Mr. Curtin's statement with which he was in agreement, the questions raised would have to be carefully considered along with the whole range of matters connected with world security. All these would be fully examined by his Cabinet. He heartily endorsed Mr. Curtin's remarks† about Lord Cranborne, in which he would also include Mr. Eden. Both had been most understanding of the problems of Canada, and he had great confidence in their outlook and wisdom. He would also like to pay a tribute to Mr. MacDonald who, as High Commissioner in Canada, had proved exceptionally helpful, and whom he consulted on many occasions almost as if he were a member of the Canadian Cabinet. He was in full sympathy with the idea of monthly meetings between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and Dominion High Commissioners. A reciprocal arrangement was already in operation, as, in his joint capacity as Prime Minister and as Minister of External Affairs, he frequently held consultations with the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom.

LORD CRANBORNE said that the Conference had now heard a number of very interesting proposals on the subject under discussion. Obviously these could not be taken further at the present Conference, but he hoped that when the Prime Ministers had had an opportunity of consulting their Cabinets it might be possible to set up a technical committee to examine the various proposals which had been made. So much general agreement had been displayed at the Conference that, if any development of machinery could assist in carrying matters further, he felt it would be a pity not to proceed with it.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he would certainly have to consult his colleagues on the many important matters which had been brought forward. It was essential that he should be able to return to Canada without having committed his Government in any way upon these questions, and his Service Advisers would undoubtedly feel that their views should be taken by the Government. He would undertake, however, to examine without delay all proposals which had come before the Conference.

The conclusions of THE CONFERENCE were as follows: —

(a) There was general agreement with the proposal put forward by the Prime Minister of Australia, that there should be monthly meetings at which the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom would meet the High Commissioners of the Dominions and the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, to give an opportunity for the Prime Minister to give a review of the current situation and problems, and for the Dominion High Commissioners to raise any questions which they considered should be the subject of consultation with the Dominions.

(b) The Dominion Prime Ministers undertook to consult their Governments, and subsequently to communicate with the United Kingdom Government, on the various proposals put forward in discussion for the improvement of defence co-operation within the Commonwealth, and as to whether a small technical committee, representative of the United Kingdom and of the Dominions, should be set up to examine further any of these proposals.

SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: You will remember that at the 14th Meeting of Prime Ministers held on May 15th a discussion took place regarding the machinery of co-operation within the British Commonwealth. On behalf of the United Kingdom Government I put forward certain suggestions for consideration as to co-operation in the sphere of defence. Mr. Curtin also made some proposals set out more fully in a Paper reproduced in Memorandum One† to the Ministers of the Meeting as to the general machinery for co-operation. It was agreed that consideration should be given to the setting up of a small Technical Committee representative of the United Kingdom and the Dominions to examine these proposals.

2. We have now been able to give further consideration to this matter and it seems to us that it might be difficult to arrange immediately for a special meeting to consider the more general aspects of the questions raised, since the senior officers who would be needed for the purpose could probably be ill-spared at the present moment. Moreover, some of the suggestions can be, and are being, put into effect while others, e.g. the suggestion for a regular meeting of Ministers concerned with external affairs which hardly lend themselves to discussion on the official level, could be discussed separately. There are, however, certain more detailed questions connected with the defence aspects as to which in our view it should be possible to make progress by discussions between technical officers. We should like to suggest, therefore, for your consideration that there should be joint discussions here of certain defence matters, e.g. those set out under (a) (c) (d) and (f) in the record of my statement at the 14th Meeting of Prime Ministers. The object would be to examine the ideas in detail and prepare a report for consideration of the respective Governments.

3. We should be glad to learn whether this proposal commends itself to you. If so you would no doubt wish to consider whether your military liaison officers, at present in this country, could represent you or whether you would wish to send officers specially to this country for the purpose and if so when they would be available.[41] Ends.

I attach a draft reply[42] to Dominions Office telegram D. 1195 concerning post-war defence discussions in London and also a covering memorandum for the Prime Minister. At first I was inclined to think that we should delay our answer but on reflection I think it desirable that we should turn down the suggestion for a meeting in London at once so that our answer will be in before possible acceptances arrive from other Dominion Governments. If you agree with this, it would be desirable that the P.M. should authorize the despatch of this telegram or something like it to-day or tomorrow.

Note that no distribution has been given to the D.O. telegram except to the Prime Minister. I have shown it to Mr. Heeney. I think that if the Prime Minister does not wish to consult the War Committee the telegram might be sent to the Defence Ministers together with a copy of the reply.[43]

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa,] August 29, 1944

I enclose for your consideration a draft reply to Dominions Office telegram D. 1195 of August 24th suggesting an early meeting of technical officers to discuss some of Lord Cranborne's proposals for cooperation in defence matters in the Commonwealth. I feel pretty certain that such a meeting at the present time would be abortive. I suspect that the prospect of a fairly early election in the United Kingdom has something to do with their desire to show zeal in the cause of Imperial defence.

You will note that this draft has been prepared for repetition to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. I think it likely that the Australian Government may press for a meeting as proposed and may be put out by a negative attitude on our part. New Zealand might go along with them in this. It is hard to say what General Smuts' reaction would be but I doubt that fundamentally he would favour the idea.

As for the substance of Cranborne's proposals, they came before the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems recently and were referred to the Working Committee for the Preparation of Papers. A draft report is now under way in the Working Committee but will not be ready for presentation for a few weeks. In the discussions in the Committee the point of view has been expressed that it is premature to formulate recommendations on these suggestions before we know more about the military obligations involved in membership of the new security organization and about post-war defence relations between the United States and the United Kingdom.

The four suggestions which Cranborne in his telegram regards as ripe for preliminary Commonwealth discussions were reported as follows in the minutes of the Meeting of Prime Ministers:

(a) Assuming that the Imperial Conference remained the main organ of consultation between the nations of the Commonwealth, would it be possible to give some degree of continuity to its proceedings by establishing a standing committee to deal with strategy and other aspects of defence.

(c) There might be an extended system for the interchange of military staffs. This would be particularly valuable if, as the result of definite obligations under a world security system, the preparation of joint plans became a practical possibility.

(d) There might be a considerable expansion of the training of U.K. and Dominion officers in the principles of Imperial Defence. This would involve an expanded conception of the Imperial Defence College.

(f) It would no doubt be agreed that the organization, equipment and training of forces on a common model throughout the Commonwealth should continue as before.

SECRET

Following from the Prime Minister, Begins: Your telegram Circular D. 1195 of August 24th.

You will recall that after you had put forward at the 14th Meeting of Prime Ministers your suggestions for cooperation in the sphere of defence, I observed that these were questions upon which I considered that decisions could not be reached while the war was in progress. I am still of that opinion and feel that the time has not yet arrived at which official discussions can usefully be undertaken. Some preliminary study has been given in Ottawa to the four proposals which in your view might now be examined in detail at a meeting of technical officers. The progress so far made indicates that, before we can advance towards decisions on post-war cooperation within the British Commonwealth on defence questions, more must be known of the nature of the new world security organization and of the methods of military cooperation to be pursued during the armistice period. Ends.

SECRET [Ottawa,] January 29, 1945

C.P.H.P. (45) Report 8 (Draft 1)

POST-WAR CANADIAN DEFENCE RELATIONS WITH THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

SUMMARY

PART I

In Part I a brief examination is made of the general political and strategic framework within which the relationship in questions of defence between Canada and the British Commonwealth is likely to operate after the war. This can be briefly stated:—

(i) Canada's relationship in matters of defence lies with the United Kingdom rather than with the Commonwealth as a whole. (para. 1)

(ii) It is virtually certain that if Canada should become involved in another major war the United Kingdom would also be involved. The probability of joint operations with the forces of the United Kingdom in the event of war creates a strong case for maintaining close connection in peacetime in matters such as defence planning, military organization, methods of training, design of weapons and planning of industrial mobilization. (para. 2)

(iii) As the principal hope of maintaining peace lies in the establishment of an effective world security organization, Canadian military defence arrangements with the United Kingdom should be consistent with the principles of any such organization. (para. 3)

(iv) It is reasonable that Canada, in view of her special association with the United Kingdom and her long experience in co-operation with the armed forces of that country, should make her contribution to any world security organization in conjunction with those forces. (para. 4)

(v) Even under a world security organization, member states will take measures of reinsurance in the event of failure, Canada's reinsurance should take the form of defence arrangements with the United Kingdom and the United States, as well as maintenance of adequate Canadian military establishments. (para. 5)

(vi) Should no effective world security organization materialize, the United Kingdom will have to rely on alliances with other countries. In this event, Canada's position will be greatly influenced by the position of the United States. Canada should strengthen her defence arrangements with the United Kingdom without necessarily becoming directly associated with any European system of alliances. (paras. 6-8)

General Conclusions of Part I

The general conclusion is reached in Part I that whether or not an effective world security organization exists, Canada should maintain close defence arrangements with the United Kingdom; and should provide for the probability that in any major operations undertaken by Canadian forces they will operate jointly with the United Kingdom. (para. 9)

It is recognized, however, that in conformity with the policy that the Parliament of Canada should decide on any declaration of war, no advance commitment can be given to the United Kingdom without parliamentary assent that Canada will engage in any general war should the United Kingdom be involved. (para. 10)

PART II

In Part II certain proposals made by Lord Cranborne at the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in London on May 15th, 1944, are examined, and the conclusions reached may be summarized as follows:—

Proposal A. (A Standing Committee on Strategy and Defence) It is considered that no such Committee is required as ordinary peacetime machinery should normally suffice. (paras. 12-13)

Proposal B. (Periodic meetings at regular intervals of Commonwealth Defence Ministers and Chiefs of staff) — It is considered that regular meetings of the Chiefs of Staff of the Commonwealth do not appear to be necessary. (paras. 14-15)

Proposal C. (Extended system for the interchange of staff officers) — The interchange of Staff and Unit Officers on an extended scale is considered desirable; (paras. 16-19)

Proposal D. (Training in principles of Imperial Defence and Imperial Defence College) — It is considered desirable that senior Canadian officers should continue to attend the Imperial Defence College, if possible with an increased Canadian quota; (paras. 20-22)

Proposal E. (Co-ordination of industrial potential) — Such co-ordination between Canada and the United Kingdom is considered desirable in view of the probability of joint operations between Canadian and United Kingdom forces in the event of war; likewise liaison in scientific and technical research should be continued. (paras. 23-27)

Proposal F. (Common model of organization, equipment and training) — It is considered that Canada should continue to employ the United Kingdom model of organization, equipment and training. This should not preclude the development by Canada of its own or the adoption of individual items of United States equipment. (paras. 28-35)

SECRET January 29, 1945.

POST-WAR CANADIAN DEFENCE RELATIONS WITH THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

PART I

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. In the consideration of Canadian defence policy in relation to the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth, it is necessary to proceed from the principle that Canada's security depends on the maintenance of peaceful conditions in other parts of the world generally, as much as on provision against any direct threat to Canadian territory itself. This interest in the preservation of peace is shared by all members of the Commonwealth alike. There is, however, a marked difference with regard to the Commonwealth, arising out of location and different strategic problems. Canada and the United Kingdom, on the other hand, have a particular community of regional interest. It follows that apart from Canada's general interest in world security, which should be pursued through a world security organization, Canada's defence relationship lies more directly with the United Kingdom than with the Commonwealth as a whole.

2. It is virtually certain that if Canada should become involved in another major war, the United Kingdom would also be involved. It is probable that in such an event Canadian forces would operate once more in conjunction with the forces of the United Kingdom, though not necessarily to the exclusion of joint operations with the forces of the United States. This probability in itself, therefore, creates a strong case for maintaining close connections in peace times with the United Kingdom in matters such as defence planning, military organization, methods of training, design of weapons and the planning of industrial mobilization. This would in no way be inconsistent with joint Canadian-United States defence planning, as recommended in "Post-war Canadian Defence Relationship with the United States: General Considerations"; (C.P.H.P. (44) Report 5 (Final-Second Revision).[45] Indeed, from the point of view of Canadian security the one is a necessary complement to the other.

Assuming the Existence of an Effective World Security Organization

3. As the principal hope of maintaining peace lies in the establishment and maintenance of an effective world security organization with military plans and with forces earmarked for the enforcement of security, Canadian military arrangements should be related to any such organization. Canada's post-war defence relations with the United Kingdom, therefore, should develop within this framework and in a form consistent with Canada's obligations to a security organization.

[45]Voir le document 978./See Document 978.

4. Present proposals for the establishment of a world security organization indicate that the United Kingdom, U.S. and U.S.S.R. will bear the major burden of keeping the peace. In accordance with the general policy that all the members of the organization should contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, Canada would be expected to undertake to make forces, facilities and assistance available to the organization by specific agreement, and to maintain a certain level of military preparedness to this end, as well as to provide for her own direct defence. It is reasonable that Canada, in view of her special association with the United Kingdom and her long experience in co-operation with the Armed Forces of that country should make her contribution to a world security organization in conjunction with those forces.

5. Even under a world security organization the member states will seek reinsurance by alliances and by maintaining a high degree of military preparedness; the Anglo-Soviet and Franco-Soviet alliances indicate this trend. Canada will likewise require appropriate measures of reinsurance. These should take the form of defence arrangememts with the United Kingdom and with the United States, as well as the maintenance of adequate Canadian military establishments. Canada would probably not be a party to European alliances entered into by the United Kingdom, but would nevertheless be regarded by the United Kingdom as a probable source of additional strength in the event of another general war.

Assuming the lack of an Effective World Security Organization

6. Should no effective form of world security organization materialize, the remaining hope of peace and security will rest in alliances and a high degree of readiness for war. In the absence of any central controlling organization and of a general plan of security, Canada will have to provide for her security as best she can from her own resources, and through the development of defence arrangements with both the United Kingdom and the United States.

7. As the United Kingdom would be compelled to rely on alliances with other countries, Canada's position would be greatly influenced by that of the United States. The United States might possibly be willing to make an outright military alliance with the United Kingdom in peace time. This is, however, unlikely, but the United States might undertake plans with the United Kingdom for the effective co-ordination of their military potential in the event of war. In any case it would be to Canada's interest to become actively associated with such arrangements.

8. On the other hand, the United States may choose to withdraw from co-operation with the United Kingdom and adopt an isolationist policy restricting its commitments to hemisphere defence. Such isolationism would constitute an invitation to aggression. It would represent a complete breakdown of any system of general security founded upon alliances between the Great Powers. Moreover, such a policy would, in all probability, lead to demands from the United States for the maintenance in Canada of defences for continental security on a scale higher than that considered necessary for the defence of purely Canadian interests. Under such conditions, however, no scale of hemisphere defence could, in itself, ensure the security of Canadian interests, particularly those overseas. It would, therefore, be to the advantage of Canada to strengthen her defence relations with the United Kingdom without necessarily becoming directly associated with any European system of alliances.

9. The general conclusion is reached in Part I that whether or not an effective world security organization exists, Canada should maintain close defence arrangements with the United Kingdom; and should provide for the probability that in any major operations undertaken by Canadian forces they will operate jointly with the United Kingdom.

10. It is recognized, however, that in conformity with the policy that the Parliament of Canada should decide on any declaration of war, no advance commitment can be given to the United Kingdom without Parliamentary assent that Canada will engage in any general war should the United Kingdom be involved.

PART II

Proposals made by Lord Cranborne at the Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in London, May 15th, 1944

11. In Part II certain proposals made by Lord Cranborne are examined in the light of the above conclusions.

Proposal A

"Assuming that the Imperial Conference remained the main organ of consultation between the nations of the Commonwealth, would it be possible to give some degree of continuity to its proceedings by establishing a standing committee to deal with strategy and other aspects of defence."

12. Whether or not the Imperial Conference is continued after the war in its present form, the question of the establishment of a standing committee on strategy and related problems needs to be considered in the wider context of world security. Under a world security organization, such a standing committee might be regarded as an indication of lack of confidence in the international arrangements; it might give the impression that a power bloc is being created, and might stimulate or serve as a pretext for the creation of counter-blocs by other states. In any case, ordinary peacetime arrangements should normally suffice to provide for the necessary degree of consultation between Canada and the United Kingdom on problems of strategy and defence.

13. If no world security organization exists, the desirability or otherwise of establishing such a standing committee would depend on the effectiveness of existing machinery to meet the need for closer consultation. If the required co-ordination were not being achieved some such machinery would be advisable, provided, of course, it remained consultative in form. It is considered, however, that a high degree of co-ordination is possible within the normal peacetime machinery and that no such standing committee will be necessary.

Proposal B

"Alternatively, or perhaps in addition, there might be periodic meetings at regular intervals between Defence Ministers and Chiefs of Staff in London or elsewhere. These might possibly be preliminary to meetings of the World Council."

14. In Part I it was indicated that either with or without the existence of a world security organization, Canadian forces will probably operate in conjunction with the forces of the United Kingdom in any future war. To this end, joint planning will be necessary. This could normally be done through the usual service channels, but it is considered that regular meetings between the Chiefs of Staff of Canada and the United Kingdom would further such planning. If questions of major importance were under consideration, it might occasionally be desirable that the Defence Ministers of the two countries should participate. Regular joint meetings of the Chiefs of Staff of all countries of the Commonwealth, however, hardly appear necessary.

15. The holding of meetings of Commonwealth Defence Ministers and Chiefs of Staff preliminary to meetings of the World Council might be interpreted as implying the formation of a Commonwealth bloc. This would have the effect of encouraging groupings of a similar nature which would be inimical to the interests of the organization as a whole.

Proposal C

"There might be an extended system for the interchange of Military Staffs. This would be particularly valuable if, as the result of definite obligations under a world security system, the preparation of joint plans became a practical possibility."

16. In considering this question it is assumed that the reference to Military Staffs relates to the interchange of individuals rather than organizations. This would be a continuation of past practice between Canada and the United Kingdom. If, as previously indicated, Canadian forces are likely to operate with forces of the United Kingdom whether or not there is an effective world security organization, such interchange would be essential.

17. This would be particularly in Canada's interest, as United Kingdom staff officers on loan to Canada would make their specialized knowledge available, while Canadian staff officers loaned to the United Kingdom would gain broader experience in staff work than would be possible in Canada. Moreover the system should be extended to provide for the increased requirement for more staff officers and also for staff officers with technical training of a kind not available in Canada. The interchange of unit officers should also be continued on an extended scale as the same reasons apply.

18. Such interchange should not exclude arrangements with the United States and possibly other countries from time to time. Consideration should also be given to the possibility of the interchange of officers between Canada and other countries of the Commonwealth. For example, it has proved of advantage to Canada to have officers study in Australia the type of warfare peculiar to that region.

19. Apart from the above advantages the benefits gained by personal contacts between the officers concerned could hardly be overemphasized.

Proposal D

"There might be a considerable expansion of the training of United Kingdom and Dominions Officers in the principles of Imperial defence. This would involve an expanded conception of the Imperial Defence College."

20. The answer to this question is predicated upon the definition given to the term "Imperial Defence". The "principles of Imperial defence" are understood to refer to studies of warfare and strategy in relation to the various countries of the British Empire and Commonwealth, rather than to the means of providing an overall defence plan for these territories; other strategic problems would doubtless also be studied. Such studies would be most valuable in the training of senior officers, both military and civil, in the broader aspects of strategy and defence problems.

21. Attendance of senior officers at the Imperial Defence College in the past proved invaluable in affording an opportunity not otherwise available to Canada, whereby high ranking officers of all Services worked together on broad strategic problems. In view of the foregoing and of the total nature of modern war, attendance of senior officers at the Imperial Defence College (or its equivalent) should be continued and favourable consideration should be given to obtaining an increase in the Canadian quota and to the inclusion of officers of civil departments.

22. The "expanded conception of the Imperial Defence College" referred to by Lord Cranborne requires elucidation before any comments can be made.

Proposal E

"Study might be given to the co-ordination of industrial potential throughout the Commonwealth and Empire . . . Much experience has been gained which is extremely valuable and it would be a pity if in another emergency we should have to start all over again at the beginning. It was for consideration whether an expert body might not be set up in the near future to consider this aspect."

23. Because of the probability of joint action with the United Kingdom in the event of war, any peacetime arrangements to co-ordinate industrial potential between Canada and the United Kingdom would be desirable. A high degree of co-ordination has been achieved in this war, and the opportunity should be taken to continue these efforts into the peace. This co-ordination should include planning for production in the event of war, and should also take into account the maintenance of sufficient peacetime production to provide test models and reserves of equipment to meet the requirements of the armed forces on the outbreak of war until full wartime production can be put into operation. In addition, dies and gauges of new models of equipment and modifications should be maintained on a scale sufficient to permit immediate wartime production.

24. A high degree of co-operation in scientific and technical research and development has been achieved by the United Kingdom and Canada to the benefit of both countries during the present war. Close liaison has been established both through the appointment of special Scientific Liaison Officers to the staffs of the High Commissioner in London and Ottawa and the Armed Services. The continuation of this liaison should be an essential part of co-operation for defence between the two countries after the war, but it is likely to be more fruitful if Canada maintain her own development at a high level of activity and efficiency.

25. Flying bombs and rocket projectiles and the increase in the power of the heavy bomber, have made the United Kingdom more vulnerable to bombardment. The nature of these weapons demands large areas relatively safe from bombardment, both for experimental purposes and for actual production. These can be provided by Canada. The establishment of such facilities in Canada — in co-operation with the United Kingdom — would tend to make Canada more self-supporting in wartime.

26. In view of its new vulnerability the United Kingdom may possibly desire to establish or to assist in the establishment of other types of armament production in Canada. The acceptance of this principle would contribute to the maintenance of an industry essential to the conduct of the war, but it is considered that the implications of the problem might have to be further examined in relation to Canadian neutrality.

27. It should be emphasized that this close industrial and scientific co-ordination should not necessarily be exclusively confined to the United Kingdom. The closest cooperation has existed with the United States in these matters and every effort should be made to continue this into the peace.

Proposal F

"It would, no doubt, be agreed that the organization, equipment and training of forces on a common model throughout the Commonwealth should continue as before."

28. With regard to the form or model of organization, training and equipment of the Canadian forces, four possible courses merit consideration:—

(a) Continued acceptance of the British model;

(b) Substitution of the United States model;

(c) Development of a distinctive Canadian model;

(d) A combination of the above.

29. The principal criteria for the selection of the model of organization, training and equipment must be the probable function of the Armed Forces, and also availability and quality in the case of equipment and training. While it is evident that organization, training and equipment are closely inter-related, it is proposed to examine the question of equipment first.

30. It is, perhaps, conceivable that Canada could develop her own distinctive equipment: on the other hand, acting entirely alone, Canada would not have either the productive power or the range of industrial and scientific techniques comparable with either the United Kingdom or the United States that would enable Canada to develop a really effective fighting force. The choice, therefore, lies between United Kingdom and United States models, or a combined form as in (d) above.

31. If the United States model were selected, it is possible that in wartime the equipment would be more readily available in view of the industrial potential and proximity of the United States. However, such a course would be open to several objections:—

(a) It would involve dependence upon the United States for supply of equipment. This would seriously hamper the maintenance of a nucleus of a Canadian armament industry in peacetime;

(b) In wartime the availability of those supplies would by no means be assured. For example, a belligerent United States might be unable to spare the desired amount from her own resources; or a neutral United States might be unwilling to provide munitions to a belligerent Canada;

(c) It is unlikely that Canada would have full and free access to technical research and up-to-date equipment in the United States in peacetime;

(d) Dissimilarity between Canadian and United Kingdom equipment would seriously hamper the efficiency of joint operations of Canadian and United Kingdom forces.

32. If the British model were selected it would probably be difficult to obtain supplies from the United Kingdom in wartime. On the other hand, in view of the new vulnerability of the United Kingdom to air attack, it is possible that Canada may be asked in peacetime to provide for the production within her own territory of certain armaments required by both countries in wartime. While such production is desirable in principle it might give rise to difficulties in the event that Canada desired to remain neutral if the United Kingdom were at war.

33. It would appear, therefore, that there is no ideal solution of the problem. The best course seems to be to continue to employ the United Kingdom model. This, however, should not prevent Canada from developing her own equipment with a view to its adoption by the United Kingdom; nor should it prevent Canada from adopting individual items of United States equipment which prove superior in quality or appropriate to Canadian use. Special cognizance would need to be taken of the possibility of using United States Coast artillery equipment and of the R.C.A.F.'s possible need for United States equipment. In this war Canada has already obtained considerable advantage from the great productive resources of the United States aircraft industry; reliance on the United States for this type of equipment may, from considerations of economy and availability of supply, be further developed in the future.

34. Great progress has been made during the present war towards the assimilation of British and United States equipment, though methods of military organization and training have remained dissimilar. If this process should continue Canada's problem would be immensely simplified especially as Canadian industry is generally based on United States engineering standards; but it cannot be assumed that such will be the case.

35. With regard to organization and training, the employment of a similar model is essential if the forces of Canada and the United Kingdom are to work together efficiently. This would be a continuation of past practice. It would mean, moreover, that the results of development in military organization and training would continue to be made freely available to Canada.

Post-War Canadian Defence Relations with the British Commonwealth

In opening the discussion of Draft 1 of the paper C.P.H.P. (45) Report 8, January 29th, submitted by the P.H.P Joint Drafting Group, the Chairman said that this was a difficult question which raised a wide range of political and strategic questions. It was essential, therefore, that the Working Committee should be careful that any paper submitted should bear the mark of having been carefully thought out and should avoid obscurity of language, particularly in regard to recommendations.

The Chairman recalled the background of this paper. Certain proposals had been put forward by Lord Cranborne at a meeting of the Prime Ministers in London in May, 1944, at one of the last meetings. No prior notice had been given, and the Prime Ministers had reserved their opinions, saying that the question would be given careful consideration. In August, 1944, the question was raised again by the United Kingdom Government in a telegram suggesting that certain of the questions might be discussed between technical officers in London. The particular matters suggested were the questions of a Standing Committee; the interchange of military staffs, the co-ordination of industrial potential; and a common model of organization, equipment and training. For various reasons this suggestion had not been accepted by the Canadian, South African and New Zealand Governments, and it had been agreed that consideration of these proposals should be deferred. However, it was important that the Canadian Government's policy on these questions should be considered without delay, and this paper was intended to make recommendations on the attitude to be adopted towards the United Kingdom's proposals.

As regards the form of the paper, it was agreed that it was necessary to have an introductory general statement of the strategic and political framework, within which the proposals would need to be considered.

As regards the content, the Chairman said that the paper would require considerable revision, particularly to ensure that the recommendations were clearly stated. It was agreed that the first part of the paper should be read paragraph by paragraph.

It was pointed out that the use of the term "Canada's security" in the first sentence failed to make a distinction between involvement of Canada in a general war and security from invasion. General Pope pointed out that the appreciation of the risk of attack made by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff had never gone beyond the possibility of a raid. This could not be regarded as a threat to Canadian security. It was, therefore, more a question of the general interest and welfare of Canada, which depended on peaceful conditions in other parts of the world generally. Lt. Col. Smith said that the intention had been to stress the need of basing Canadian army policy on providing for an Expeditionary Force for service overseas, rather than for direct defence at home. In the second sentence from the last, reference was made to the community of regional interest between Canada and the United Kingdom. This required some explanation.

In paragraph two, the statement in the second sentence that the Canadian forces, in the event of war, would operate once more in conjunction with the forces of the United Kingdom, brought forth the comment that, particularly in relation to possible operations in the Pacific, it could not be assumed that Canadian forces would necessarily operate with the forces of the United Kingdom. In the third sentence the use of the term "defence planning" was an example of the kind of obscurity which the Chairman suggested should be avoided, as it covered anything from a complete alliance to occasional staff talks.

In paragraph three the Chairman pointed out that the proposals for world security organization were not sufficiently advanced to say that the organization would have "military plans." It was agreed, therefore, to omit this reference.

In paragraph four, in the first sentence, it was agreed to add "the Great Powers and especially" in the second line. As regards the last sentence, the same objections applied as to paragraph two, namely, that it could not be assumed that in any possible military operations undertaken by Canada under a world security organization, Canadian forces would necessarily operate with the forces of the United Kingdom.

As regards paragraph five, the Chairman suggested that examination of the question of "reinsurance" was not appropriate to the part of the paper which was based on the assumption that an effective world security organization would be set up, and it was agreed that a complete revision of this paragraph would be necessary.

Paragraph 6, 7 and 8 dealing with the position which would follow, assuming the lack of an effective world security organization, it was agreed, would also require revision. As regards the conclusion, paragraph 9, it was pointed out that the use of the term "defence arrangements with the United Kingdom" would require clarification to indicate more exactly the type of relationship intended between Canada and the United Kingdom in matters of defence.

In conclusion, it was agreed that the paper would be redrafted in the light of the discussion.[46]

TOP SECRET

British PHP staff have prepared draft staff study, purely exploratory in character and not intended for executive action in security of British Empire in period 1955/60, summarising previous regional security studies and have invited CJSM to send observer to attend meeting on 6th June with PHP staff and other Dominion representatives to receive British comments on this paper. Commander Todd has been nominated to represent CJSM.

2. Paper recommends that British Imperial strategy should be designed with due regard for

(A) Possibility of war with USSR.

(B) Need to insure against resurgence of Germany and Japan.

(C) Possibility of armed conflict with minor powers.

(D) Maintenance of internal security.

---

[46]Pour en savoir davantage sur ce document, voir les documents 12, 13.
For further discussion of this paper, see Documents 12, 13.

(E) Obligation to place armed forces at disposal of world organisation.

3. While it is considered improbable that USSR will follow aggressive policy PHP staff as military advisors consider that common prudence requires them not to neglect this possibility.

4. The views of PHP staff on Dominion collaboration in Imperial defence are:

(A) No longer possible for UK to carry so large a proportion of responsibility for defence of Empire interests and essential each Dominion assumes equitable share.

(B) Unless armed forces of UK and Dominions are integrated in peace for defence of Empire as a whole, Empire will no longer enjoy status of a great power.

(C) Dominions should be given larger voice in shaping of imperial foreign and defence policy.

(D) Organisation, equipment and training of Dominion and UK forces should be on common model.

(E) Strategic reserves of Imperial forces wherever located such as Middle East should include Dominion contingents.

(F) Imperial security cannot be assumed unless plans can be made in assumption that Empire Governments including Dominions will accept firm, repetition firm, commitments to make available in event of major war their resources in manpower, material and money to be used wherever requirements of overall Imperial strategy dictate.

(G) Subject to above overriding requirements all Dominions should undertake defence against minor aggression and maintenance of internal security of their own territories and mandates.

(H) Canada in particular should afford to Newfoundland assistance necessary for her defence, should contribute to protection of Atlantic communications, to security of Northern Pacific, to garrisoning of British possessions in West Indies and should also participate in measures to ensure control of Germany and Japan.

5. While Canadian representative is attending meeting as observer only it would be of assistance if unofficial, repetition unofficial, comments of Canadian PHP organisation on foregoing proposals could be signalled for his information prior to meeting.

TOP SECRET AND IMPORTANT. For CJSM London from CSC Ottawa. Your CJSM 39.

PARA ONE. Because of the San Francisco conference and the forthcoming elections, it is not possible at this time to secure unofficial comments of PHP committee or of Government on the proposals of the British PHP staff paper on security of British Empire in period 1955-60.

PARA TWO. We have no objection to Todd attending the meeting of 5 June in capacity of observer but he should of course not repeat not express any views which may be taken as representing those of the Chiefs of Staff or any official Canadian attitude.

PARA THREE. At first sight the outline of the proposals as set forth in your signal indicates that certain of them deal with political matters of the highest policy and in our opinion some would almost certainly be unacceptable to the Canadian Government. We suggest therefore that introducing these questions at this time even in staff discussions might in the long run prejudice the attainment of the best results.

PARA FOUR. It might also be observed that the proposals for imperial defence seem to go beyond those put forward by Lord Cranborne at the Prime Ministers' Conference last year, on which occasion the Prime Minister fully reserved the Canadian position for study. While some preliminary consideration has been given to the Cranborne proposals by the PHP committee, the matter has been postponed until after the San Francisco Conference. It would therefore be helpful to have full report[47] on the discussions of the British PHP staff proposals.

Mémorandum du représentant principal de l'armée canadienne, CPCAD

Memorandum by Senior Canadian Army Member, PJBD

SECRET Ottawa, August 2, 1945

At our meeting last week I light-heartedly undertook to think over the "Cranborne" proposals of May, 1944, and to let you have a paper outlining my views as to how some day the ball might be returned either to or at London. Today, I must frankly admit that I find myself confronted with somewhat of a teaser.

---

[47]Non trouvé./Not located.

It is not because I find the answers to Lord Cranborne's points at all difficult. Indeed, to me, they are as plain as the nose on a man's face. My perplexity arises from the fact that, as always, the British case is stated from such a high moral plane that those who find themselves constrained to take a contrary view find themselves in the invidious position of one who is in the act of letting the side down.

This British habit of investing their policies with such a cloak of sanctity reminds me of Professor Banse's amusing dictum, "They say Christ, but they mean cotton." We must find a line of approach that will by-pass this handicap and that, not the solution, is the real problem.

Another difficulty arises from the fact that in the Cranborne thesis, fact and fancy are almost inextricably intermingled. It is a simple enough matter to deal with a line or argument which is logically developed but with which one does not agree either as to premise or conclusion. When, however, the argument is both objective in parts and patently subjective in others, it is puzzling to decide just how to bring the debate back solidly on to the rails.

In illustration, Cranborne starts off by saying that defence co-operation within the British Commonwealth is closely linked with the subject of a world security system, with which statement of fact none of us is likely to disagree. He then refers to Eden's idea of earmarking certain forces for use in certain areas at the command of the World (Security) Council. (It is interesting to meet this allusion to Regional Arrangements several months before Dumbarton Oaks.) From here he proceeds to the proposition, with which we can have no quarrel, that the main responsibility for the preservation of peace rests on the four Great Powers. But it is at this point that, in quite an effortless way, he passes from hard ground into the realms of fancy. He lists these Great Powers as the U.S.A., Russia, China and the Nations of the British Commonwealth — freely acting in association, to which grouping I am sure we must demur. Calmly and as a self-evident fact he states that, whether or not there are to be regional organizations within the world system, the Nations of the British Commonwealth will remain one of the main props of the organization. The question in his mind is how our contribution can be made most effective, etc., etc. Shades of San Francisco!

This is the nub of the question to which we must address ourselves. Fortunately Lord Cranborne has in some measure touched upon the essential factors that completely undermine his central and centralist stand. No Government in the Commonwealth, he recognizes, would be willing to undertake defence commitments, unless satisfied as to the circumstances to which it might be called upon to implement them. It is equally clear to him that it might be politically impossible to come to final decisions on peace and war before the event and he quotes the late Mr. Curtin, with evident approval, that it is not the Governments alone that determine matters of peace or war, but the electorates of the various countries. In so saying he admits the existence of the very real obstacle that seriously blocks any advance down the central way he had previously defined.

Before attempting to puzzle out a way of dealing with the British thesis, this appreciation of the intra-Imperial relationship should, I think, endeavour to think out an aspect of the question to which at times Mr. Wrong has referred. It is, if I have understood it correctly, that our cautious stand over the years of refraining from seeking to play a part in the formulation of Commonwealth, or rather United Kingdom policy, places us in the unenviable position of being drawn into Great Wars without our being able to do much, if anything, about it.

I wonder if this disability is one we can overcome, even in a measure. Is it not one to which all but the Great Powers are subject? It is precisely the position of the Low Countries which have been fought over for centuries without being able to do much about it. In 1936, Belgium having had demonstrated to her in the spring of that year the worthlessness of Locarno, and distrustful of a recent French swing to the Left, withdrew from what remained of that ill-fated pact, and sought sanctuary in a form of Nineteenth Century neutrality. This action was purely negative. It was also quite ineffective. But the point is that at the time it seemed to be about the only course open to her. Many other countries seem to be in much the same predicament.

As one looks back over the years I wonder if the United Kingdom's response to Sir Wilfred Laurier's plea of "Call us to your Councils" has not merely been with the object of committing us before the event. So far as I can remember, Britain has often wished to be able to say that she had our support in the line she was taking but when the chips were down she acted quite properly, or so I think, as her own interests dictated. She was the one who would suffer attack — our homes and fields would not be in jeopardy. How Canada could possibly effectively contribute say, to the solution of European problems, I am sure I do not see. (I shall try to deal with this point a little lower down.) In any event we are not being afforded much of an opportunity of doing so at the present time. Apparently the three Great Powers, to recall an Asquithian phrase, look upon this grave responsibility as one which "cannot be shared".

On the other hand, a partial remedy to our position of comparative helplessness may derive from the Regional Arrangements under the aegis of the Security Council, to which we may become a party. When we enter into a North American regional arrangement might it be possible for us to have some influence in the formulation of United States foreign policy such as might lead to war with a country capable of taking military action against this continent? The hope, I fear, is slim.

Again, should we receive and accept an invitation to join a Pacific or North Pacific security pact, might we not properly expect to be able to contribute our ideas as to how that portion of the world is to be governed?

I suppose that Europe (including Russia) will continue to be the world's potential storm centre. Our commitments thereto, if any, will I suppose depend on what may be worked out in Security Council. Will an Atlantic Community come about? All this incidentally brings one back to Lord Cranborne's first postulate, namely, that defence co-operation within the British Commonwealth is closely linked with the subject of a world security system. Should we become party to such an arrangement then perhaps we might find ourselves in a position to have some say as to policy. Perhaps the regional Military Staff Committee might work in the shadow of a Conference of Foreign Ministers of the countries concerned.

I fear the immediately foregoing is somewhat visionary. Actually, I cannot for a moment imagine that we could have influenced the United Kingdom against the Munich surrender of 1938, or against her decision to go to war over the Polish issue in 1939. As a consequence, for a number of reasons we find ourselves hoping that the United Kingdom will so conduct her policy as to avoid the outbreak of a major war, and principally because of the thought that as it was to our direct interest to come to her aid twice in a generation so it will probably be again a third time. That we cannot do much to influence her is just one of the disabilities of not being a Great Power. And even if we were, it is not certain that our position would be otherwise. The United States is certainly of that rank and she has literally been dragged into two wars. She could see them coming but there does not appear to have been much she could do about it. Can Ottawa reasonably hope for a more effective voice than Washington? As regards Canada, the United Kingdom will always be glad of our support. On the other hand, I have a feeling that they feel they know a good deal more about Europe than we do and that consequently they would not be disposed to alter direction at our instance. And can you imagine a Canadian Government today being prepared to come down hard in favour of or against the Oder-Neisse frontier for Poland and saying that it was prepared to back up that stand either now or in the future? I am afraid that I am unable to do so. In these circumstances my conclusion is that our cautious wait-and-see policy over the years has not been unsound.

If this is so, we must tackle Cranborne or his successor in some other way. Any sort of an Apologia I should rule out. For one reason it would never sink in. Another is that I have no predilection for fighting battles that were fought and won long ago. All this would sound too much like playing over still once again a worn-out sold gramophone record of 30 years ago. It would seem to me perfectly clear that any British statesman must instinctively know in the marrow of his bones that Canada, to take the example of one dominion, is not going to participate in a war to settle a dispute over the frontiers of Iraq, or to preserve the Indian Ocean as a British lake, much less to enable a British general in India to report "Peccavi". Consequently, if in the space of a few lines Cranborne was able to soar from hard earth airily into the clouds, we, I think, should be quite capable of reversing the process.

Were I required to draft a speech or a telegram in reply, I should begin by saying that the Canadian Government entirely agreed that the question of defence co-operation within the British Commonwealth was closely linked with the security arrangements it could now be expected would be initiated by the proposed Security Council. Thus, it would be necessary first to know the nature and scope of the regional agreements to which the several dominions might respectively be invited to join, as well as such additional forces, if any, they might be invited to place at the disposal of the Security Council. In these circumstances, until the United Nations organization had been duly set up and had begun to function it was not possible to examine the question of Commonwealth defence co-operation, either comprehensively or with any degree of finality.

On the other hand, pending these developments there were certain points in Lord Cranborne's statement to the meeting of Prime Ministers in May, 1944, which could be discussed at the present juncture. It seems open to question if the nations of the British Commonwealth — freely acting in association — (to use Lord Cranborne's words) rather than the United Kingdom and her dependent Empire, is really the Great Power on whom, together with the U.S.A., Russia and China, the main responsibility for the preservation of peace depends. Lord Cranborne himself seemed to be not unaware of this when later in his speech he foresaw that it might be politically impossible to come to final decisions on peace and war before the event, for it was not the Governments that determined these matters but the electorates of the various countries.

With the latter view the Canadian Government entirely agree, and it can be taken that the Canadian people would not be prepared to accept commitments in respect of such matters as the defence of British interests in the Eastern Mediterranean, the Middle East or the Indian Ocean. It was precisely because of this reluctance on the part of the Canadian people that during the course of the present war the Canadian Government have been disinclined to authorize the employment of their forces in the Balkans and Near East and why they have restricted their use in the War against Japan to the Central and North Pacific Theatres.

On the other hand, as the record of two great wars has made clear, the Canadian people have, on the occasion of the emergency arising, quickly realized that the security of the United Kingdom was a vital interest and in consequence they have left nothing undone to avert such a catastrophe. Nor is there any reason to believe that they would act otherwise during the course of the next generation.

In the light of these considerations of a general nature the views of the Canadian Government on the specific points (a) to (f) put forward by Lord Cranborne are as stated hereunder:

(a) We agree that the Conference of Prime Ministers should remain the main organ of consultation between the nations of the Commonwealth. On the other hand, we do not see that any useful purpose would be served by establishing a standing committee to deal with strategy and other aspects of defence. In our view, our day to day liaison on the political and Service levels appears adequate to serve the purpose in view. We presume that the Committee of Imperial Defence (or some such similar body) will be revived at the close of the war against Japan, to which such Dominions as may feel the need for further consultation may freely have recourse.

(b) It would appear that meetings of Defence (and other Ministers) and Chiefs of Staff in London or elsewhere, preliminary to periodic special meetings of the Security Council might prove feasible.

(c) We favour the continuation of the system of interchange of staff and regimental officers, which has proved so valuable over the last thirty years and more.

(d) During the period between the wars, Canada always had a very considerable number of Service officers taking courses of all natures in the United Kingdom. While it seems probable that in the post-war period our resources may be such as to enable us to undertake a greater proportion of the elementary training of officers at home, we would be prepared, and indeed would desire to continue the policy of training regimental and staff officers in the United Kingdom.

(e) We are of opinion that much would be gained by the co-ordination of the industrial potential throughout the Commonwealth and Empire and, as well, the United States. The subject is vast and requires careful study.

(f) As a general principle we agree that the organization, equipment and training of forces on a common model throughout the Commonwealth should continue as before, subject, as in the past, to such changes or deviations that our local circumstances may indicate to be desirable. In this connection we feel it to be very desirable that as great a measure of standardization of Commonwealth and United States organization, equipment and training, as is possible would be to the advantage of us all and should earnestly be sought.

"Them", as the Western politician proclaimed from the hustings many years ago, "Them's my sentiments." I shall not add as he did somewhat hastily when he saw that they were not going down any too well, "but they can be changed."

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D 1392 London, September 16, 1944

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. United States Ambassador has informed Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, semi-officially, that he has received message from United States Secretary of State that State Department feel that time has come to give thought to negotiations on telecommunications matters with a view to settling all outstanding questions, such as right to set up direct radiotelegraph and radiotelephone circuit between United States and points in British Empire, and agreement on low uniform telecommunication rates — covering all communications between places in United States and places within British Commonwealth, with special attention to press rates and to re-allocation of certain United States and British cables. State Department would like to hold negotiations this autumn and suggest October. If this considered too early for negotiations of final nature, they hope that at least preliminary conversations could be held then at which problems to be solved could be outlined and agenda for subsequent negotiations prepared. In these talks it is presumed that the Dominions and India would participate along with the United Kingdom.

2. Our feeling is that from the general point of view of relations with United States of America, it would be desirable to accept this invitation, but that it would not, in fact, be practicable to open discussions of the kind suggested until there has been further progress in enquiries into arrangements for future telecommunications organisation within the Commonwealth, with special reference to proposals submitted by Commonwealth Communications Council. We should accordingly propose to reply to following effect, Begins:

We welcome United States initiative and have always been conscious that negotiations with United States Government would be desirable as soon as possible. We have borne this in mind in connection with enquiries which, as State Department are aware, are being made into organisation of telecommunication service of British Commonwealth. These are far from complete and there is no prospect of completion by October. Moreover, as Ambassador's letter recognises, Governments of Dominions and India are equally concerned and time will be required for necessary preliminary discussions with these Governments. We should not, therefore, be ready to begin negotiations with United States Government of final character until next year, but we should do our best to be ready to begin negotiations early in new year with possibly, if United States Government thought this of advantage, a preliminary discussion in London before end of this year for purpose of preparing agenda. Ends.

3. We are anxious to return reply to United States as soon as possible and we should accordingly be grateful for very early intimation whether Dominion Governments would agree with line proposed above.

SECRET [Ottawa,] September 18, 1944

RECOMMENDATIONS OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE:—
CANADIAN POLICY IN EXTERNAL COMMUNICATIONS

INTRODUCTION

1. (a) The Canadian Government has been asked by the Commonwealth Communications Council, an advisory body on telecommunications policy composed of representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, India and the Colonies under the Chairmanship of Sir Campbell Stuart, to state its views on the proposed reorganization of telecommunications, which for the past fifteen years have been operated by Cable and Wireless Limited under modified supervision by the Commonwealth Governments.

(b) This question was referred to the Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy, established by Cabinet War Committee in May, 1944, and composed of representatives from the Departments of External Affairs, Finance, National Defence (Army), National Defence for Air, National Defence for Naval Services, Post Office and Transport. The Committee has held several meetings to discuss the problem and has had the benefit of a meeting with Sir Campbell Stuart, in which he outlined the factors that led to the proposed reorganization and indicated some of the problems to be faced in the future. Based on these discussions, the Committee wishes to submit the following interim report which might serve as a basis for the Government's reply to the Commonwealth Communications Council.

NATURE OF THE PROBLEM

2. (a) In 1929, after an Imperial Conference on cables and wireless, it was decided to approve of the creation of a new private company in the United Kingdom, Cable and Wireless Limited, which should operate the external telecommunications systems of the Commonwealth, subject to supervision by an Imperial Communications Advisory Committee. This Committee had powers of veto on the increase of rates, withdrawal of special reduced rates, discontinuance of services, sale of assets used by communications within the British Empire, supervision of accounts, and weighing of the relative merits of strategic requirements against the interest of the public in low cost communications. Cable and Wireless Limited purchased government-owned cables such as the Pacific Cable in which Canada had a five-eighteenth interest. In this country, Cable and Wireless Limited held a controlling interest in an associate company, Canadian Marconi. Elsewhere in the Commonwealth, Cable and Wireless Limited either owned, had a considerable interest in, or negotiated working agreements with the telecommunications companies. In short, for the past fifteen years, Cable and Wireless Limited has been the "chosen instrument" for the execution of telecommunications policy of the Commonwealth Governments.

(b) Pre-War Problems. In the decade before the war, because of loss of revenue during depression years and its over-capitalization, the financial returns to Cable and Wireless Limited did not reach expectations. These difficulties raised the question of the extent to which the Company should be assisted by the governments in maintaining strategic cables. The question was met in 1937 by an agreement which stabilized the situation for a period of five years. The Company evolved a preferential rate structure, approved at the Imperial Rates Conference of 1937, which heavily favoured Commonwealth interests. It was designed to give London the predominant role in the control of the circulation of news and commercial messages. Subsequently, the Company was strongly opposed to any suggestion which would lead to the opening of direct services between Australia and the United States in which private United States companies were anxious to acquire an interest. In this period, Canadian policy was based upon a desire to avoid the possible difficulties which might be created by the appearance of an Imperial monopoly of telecommunications services. The Canadian Government was also opposed to the idea of treating the Commonwealth as a single strategic unit in the field of telecommunications. For that reason, Canada disclaimed any collective responsibility for the maintenance of strategic cables, while indicating a willingness to discuss on its merit questions relating to strategic cables terminating in Canada.

(c) War Problems. The present war greatly increased the volume of traffic in telecommunications and emphasized their great strategic importance as papers submitted to the Commonwealth Communications Council by the Joint Communications Board of the United Kingdom emphasized. It also made necessary acquiescence in the request of the United States that direct wireless circuits should be opened between that country and various parts of the Commonwealth. This request was opposed as long as possible by Cable and Wireless Limited, which eventually consented to the opening of the circuits, only on the understanding that they should terminate six months after the conclusion of hostilities. Cable and Wireless Limited also refused any modifications of the 1937 rates structure designed to reduce the cost of United States traffic on the new circuits. Such a reduction was requested by the United States Government and had been approved by the Commonwealth Governments at the Commonwealth Telegraph Conference held in Australia in 1942. It was on this occasion that the United Kingdom Government described the attitude of Cable and Wireless Limited as "distinctly unhelpful".

At the Australian Conference it was decided to reorganize the Imperial Communications Advisory Committee, which became the Commonwealth Communications Council and was henceforth to consist of delegates who resided in the countries which they represented. The Chairman should represent no country; Sir Campbell Stuart, previously Chairman of the Imperial Communications Advisory Committee, was selected for that post. The new Chairman met in London in April and May, 1944, with Mr. W. A. Rush of the Department of Transport as Canadian representative, while Colonel Laurie acted as observer for the Armed Services. To the Commonwealth Communications Council the Governments of Australia and New Zealand, which had been particularly exasperated by the policies of Cable and Wireless Limited, submitted a plan for the reorganization of telecommunications known as the Anzac Scheme, which was endorsed by the Commonwealth Communications Council and submitted to the various governments for approval in principle.

(d) The Anzac Scheme. The scheme was based on a conception described as one "which provides for functional unity while enhancing local autonomy." Its basic feature was the disappearance of a Cable and Wireless Limited and its replacement by a series of nationally owned public utility companies. Under the scheme, without any exchange of funds, the United Kingdom would allot 25% of its stock in the new United Kingdom company in equal shares between the five Commonwealth governments. The United Kingdom corporation would then have six directors nominated by the United Kingdom, and one from each of the Commonwealth governments. Similarly, each of the other governments would transfer 25% of its corporation stock to the United Kingdom which would be represented by one director on each governing body. The Commonwealth Communications Council would remain as a general Advisory Body on Policy. Although the plan is not specific on this point, it would appear that the Commonwealth governments, as well as the United Kingdom Government, "would be expected to bear their full share of the responsibility for the maintenance of cables by the United Kingdom Corporation."

FACTORS AFFECTING CANADIAN POLICY

3. (a) Necessity of Reorganization. It is clear that some such plan as proposed by the Commonwealth Communications Council must be adopted since Cable and Wireless Limited has definitely stated that it cannot operate successfully if the wireless circuits established between the United States and the various Commonwealth countries should be in operation after the war. The United States has asked for the retention of these circuits and no Commonwealth Government has expressed opposition.

(b) United States Policy. It is also clear that any plan of reorganization must take into account the views both of the United States Government and the American public, which has commenced to take an interest in this question. The market discrepancy between intra-Commonwealth rates and American rates to Commonwealth countries has provoked considerable adverse comment. The United States Senate recently appointed a Committee to investigate international communications. Both the Republican and the Democratic Parties in their national platforms made references to the need for greater freedom of communications. The Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, Mr. Fly, has stressed several times his belief that the existing international system of telecommunications requires considerable reform. It also appears that the United States Government and the United States private companies have been antagonized by the failure of recent negotiations of United States companies with Cable and Wireless Limited. To judge from reports recently received from Washington, the United States Government may look with favour upon the reorganization since it marks the end of Cable and Wireless Limited, but might require re-assurance that the reorganization does not mean a consolidation of Imperial communications along monopolistic lines.

(c) Strategic Considerations. Maintenance of an adequate network of telecommunications for security purposes has been considered important by the Chiefs of Staff Committee, who are of the opinion that Canada has a material interest in the maintenance of an integrated system of communications between the various parts of the Commonwealth, and with all possible theatres of war in which Canadian forces might be employed. It is also thought advisable that Canada's telecommunications policy should be adaptable to the needs of an international security organization such as is now being planned. From these considerations it would appear that Canada has a strategic interest in the maintenance of Communications within the Commonwealth, but that it should work as well for the development of a world security system of telecommunications linked with a world security organization.

(d) Technical Considerations. The proposed reorganization under the Anzac Scheme may also help in strengthening the technical efficiency of Imperial communications. There have been complaints as to the degree of research carried on either by Cable and Wireless Limited or by its subsidiary companies in the Dominions. Some experts believe that the marked development in the efficiency of wireless services caused by the war may lead to considerable changes in the relative importance of cables and wireless for communications purposes. Others are inclined to argue that the developments in research upon cables in recent years may help to offset the improvements in wireless. New developments of airmail services, facsimile and telephone also point to the difficulties that may be encountered in what must be a highly competitive field. Much of recent United States development has been in the extension and improvement of wireless communications. These developments may place the United States Companies at an advantage as compared to the new Commonwealth Companies who will be required to maintain the existing cable facilities. It is not yet clear to what extent in the reorganization contemplated of United States services, cables now operated by United States private companies will be maintained.

(e) Financial Considerations. The financial burden to be assumed by Canada would involve the purchase of the radio external communication facilities of Canadian Marconi Limited, the approximate value of which has been estimated at $2,500,000. As compared to other Commonwealth countries, Canada is in an advantageous position in that the license arrangements for Canadian Marconi are on an annual basis which makes possible its termination on short notice. Canada may also be called upon for reasons described in preceding paragraphs to make a contribution to the maintenance of the existing cables, which are now owned by Cable and Wireless Limited. The valuation placed by Cable and Wireless Limited upon their assets is an artificial one arising out of the enormous expansion of traffic created by the war. It is understood that the British Government intends to arrange for a careful investigation of the financial position of the parent company. It should be noted that the contribution to the cost of the maintenance of cables in general involves a change of financial policy from that previously maintained by Canada. The financial position may also be complicated by the question of rates. The United States Government has asked for a revision of existing rates and a reply has been postponed because of the opposition of Cable and Wireless Limited. It remains to be seen whether or not a lowering of rates would have a favourable effect upon the financial operations of the new companies.

(f) Press Considerations. In the reorganization of telecommunications, the various Commonwealth Governments will have to consider the position of the press in its demand for more efficient arrangements for the speedy transmission and dissemination of news. In the past, Cable and Wireless Limited have been subject to complaints not only from United States press services but also from Reuters, the leading British news agency. It is possible that the problem of press rates can be separated from the general rate question. This topic is of particular importance to Canada because of the close connection of Canadian newspapers with United States newsgathering facilities. It is likely that progress can be made in this field when the new national companies have been established.

RECOMMENDATIONS[48]

4. (a) That the Canadian Government inform the Commonwealth Communications Council that it is prepared to support, in principle, the nationalization of telecommunications services by each member of the Commonwealth as suggested in the Anzac Scheme. At the same time it reserves for further consideration the question of linking the new national corporations together by an exchange of stock and interlocking directorates. It also reserves for further consideration the extent of the contribution which Canada might be called upon to make to the operation of a general cable system and the manner in which that contribution might be made.

(b) That the Canadian Government suggest to the United Kingdom Government that exploratory conversations be opened with the United States, in which all the Commonwealth governments interested in the reorganization of telecommunications should be invited to participate.

(i) These conversations should be opened to explore the possibility of some measure of co-ordination between the Commonwealth and the United States systems of telecommunications. Since these systems include approximately 80% of the world's telecommunications service, it is obvious that much would be gained by effective co-operation between them. These conversations might also serve to dispel a possible United States suspicion of a new monopoly and could be carried on during the process of nationalizing the various communications companies. It is possible that this process of reform might be taken by the United States as a proof of an intention of putting our own house in order while pursuing negotiations for a world wide system of telecommunications. These conversations might also be valuable in clearing up the question of competitive rates. Since the Commonwealth Communications Council is not to meet again until March 1, 1945, it would seem advisable that the conversations should be concluded before that date in order that the Council may be in a position to take action.

[48]Approuvées par le Comité de guerre le 27 septembre 1944.
Approved by War Committee, September 27, 1944.

(c) That the Canadian Government express its approval in principle for the creation of a world communications authority as part of the new international organization after the war.

(i) Such an authority would be at least necessary as a clearing house for world communications problems that will inevitably arise. It may possibly be endowed with further powers of a regulatory or administrative character.

TELEGRAM 192 Ottawa, September 30, 1944

SECRET. Your secret telegram Circular D. 1392 of September 16, 1944. Proposed conference with United States on telecommunications matters.

We agree that conversations with the United States should commence as soon as possible in which all Commonwealth Governments represented on the Commonwealth Communications Council should participate. For this reason we should be glad to take part in the preliminary discussions that you suggest might be held before the end of this year for the purpose of preparing an Agenda.

At the same time we realize that other Commonwealth Governments may find it inconvenient to send representatives to London for an Agenda Conference at the time proposed and subsequently for another meeting with the United States and for the Commonwealth Communications Council meeting in March. We suggest for consideration that it might be possible to arrange by correspondence and by cables between the United States and the Commonwealth Governments the various items on the Agenda in order to avoid the necessity of two conferences with the United States and in order to advance the date of the conference which the United States has requested.

If your Government and the other Commonwealth Governments are in agreement we would favour informing the United States Government at once that the Commonwealth Governments are favourable to the maintenance after the war of existing direct wireless circuits between the United States and the various parts of the Commonwealth. Since all of our Governments through their representatives at the Commonwealth Communications Council have already expressed themselves in favour of this policy, we see no reason why this information should not be communicated to the United States Government forthwith and feel that its release might help to create a favourable atmosphere for the discussions on more controversial topics.

We are informing the Commonwealth Communications Council that we are prepared to support in principle the nationalisation of telecommunications services by each member of the Commonwealth as suggested in the Anzac scheme, while reserving for further consideration the nature of the relationships to be established between the new national corporations and the question of sharing financial responsibility for the maintenance of cables.

We are also informing the Commonwealth Communications Council that we approve in principle the creation of a World Communications Authority as part of the General International Organisation to be set up after the war.

TELEGRAM 184 London, October 11, 1944

SECRET. Your telegram of 30th August, [September] No. 192. We are glad to note that Canadian Government are agreeable to conversations with the United States on telecommunication matters and to preliminary discussions for the purpose of preparing an agenda. Suggestion that there should be a meeting for latter purpose was included in draft reply to United States State Department, set out in my telegram Circular D. 1392,[49] to meet what are understood to be the wishes of the United States authorities and we should be reluctant to take the initiative in suggesting that correspondence should be substituted for a meeting.

2. As regards possibility of a communication to the United States Government as to future of the direct wireless circuits opened during the war between the United States and certain parts of the Commonwealth, this is of course primarily a matter for the Governments of the Dominions with which these circuits were opened. Certain Colonial Governments also are involved. We are, accordingly, sending Governments of Dominions by mail copies of this correspondence.† For our part, we doubt the advisability of informing the United States at this stage that direct wireless circuits will be maintained after the war. The United States Ambassador's communication to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs did not lay special emphasis on the question of direct circuits and clearly does not expect any statement to be made at this stage, and further we should deprecate making concessions to the United States before even an agenda is framed for discussions. All other Dominion Governments and Government of India have concurred in terms of proposed reply which we are anxious to communicate as soon as possible to the State Department.

3. In the circumstances, we are now despatching reply in form proposed in my telegram Circular D. 1392 and we will send you copy† in due course.

Mémorandum du secrétaire,
le Comité interministériel sur la politique des télécommunications, au Comité de guerre du Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary,
Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy, to Cabinet War Committee

SECRET [Ottawa,] February 26, 1945

1. At the Cabinet War Committee meeting on September 27th, 1944, a recommendation to the following effect from the Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy was approved:

"that the government accept in principle the nationalization of telecommunications by each member country of the Commonwealth advanced by Australia and New Zealand, reserving, however, for further consideration, the nature of the relationships to be established between the new national corporations and the question of sharing financial responsibility for maintenance of cables."

This recommendation was accordingly submitted to the Commonwealth Communications Council.

2. Three months later the United Kingdom Government informed the other partner governments that the United Kingdom War Cabinet saw certain practical difficulties in the existing scheme. It had, therefore, decided to:

"send an emissary of the highest standing to each of the Dominions, India, and Southern Rhodesia, to discuss alternative possibilities with the Governments concerned."

Lord Reith was appointed to head the United Kingdom mission, and commenced his tour at the middle of January. Lord Reith has now completed his conversations with the Governments of Australia, New Zealand and India, and expects to conclude his discussions with the Governments of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia, and reach Canada about the middle of March. Following his discussions in Canada, it is proposed to hold a Commonwealth Communications Conference in the United Kingdom at an early date to work out full details of the scheme which may emerge from his successive conversations.

3. The Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand have telegraphed the Canadian Government the substance of Lord Reith's proposals to them, with which they are in general agreement. The Government of India has also agreed with minor reservations. From these telegrams, it appears that Lord Reith originally proposed a —

"single public utility corporation based on one in which all telecommunications assets throughout the Commonwealth and Empire would be vested, and in which the Dominions and India would acquire shareholdings corresponding to the values of the assets which they would acquire in territories and transfer to the London corporation."

This proposal was unacceptable to the Australian Government which has, however, agreed to what has been described as an extension of the Anzac Scheme. In the new scheme, the Commonwealth Communications Council, at present a purely advisory body, is to become:—

"an incorporated central body — charged with very important responsibilities."

4. The Central Body will have the same composition as the Commonwealth Communications Council, i.e., an independent chairman, approved by the partner governments, and one representative from each of the partner governments and for the colonies. Except where unanimity has not been obtained upon a matter of governmental policy, the Central Body functions very much like the board of directors of a commercial company. The representative of any partner government may claim any topic under discussion to be a matter of governmental policy. When unanimity has not been obtained the Central Body forwards a report and recommendation to the partner governments. The Body's powers include:—

(a) all the powers and duties vested in the Commonwealth Communications Council;

(b) formulation and direction of the execution of the joint telecommunications policy of the partner governments, including the fixing of rates;

(c) co-ordination of the development of the cable and wireless system and approval of all extensions to and alterations of telecommunications systems within its purview;

(d) conduct of negotiations with telecommunications interests on behalf of the partner governments;

(e) advice to the partner governments on telecommunication matters affecting defence, foreign relations, or any other matter that may be referred;

(f) assessment of the proportion of the annual costs of cable maintenance which should be borne by the several corporations;

(g) supervision of the Empire telecommunications system within the region of each local corporation;

(h) apportionment of the net receipts of each local corporation; and,

(i) inspection of the budget, accounts and programme of capital expenditures of each local corporation. The major projects involving capital expenditures by more than one corporation are to be subject to recommendation to the partner governments.

5. The general trend of these and similar provisions is to create a Commonwealth agency with very broad powers over individual parts of the Commonwealth. In so doing, it departs from the original purpose of the Anzac Scheme which was described as providing for "functional unity while enhancing local autonomy."

6. If the Canadian Government does not approve this policy, it is felt that those Commonwealth governments which have already expressed their views and approval should be apprised of the fact. It would also appear essential that the views of the Canadian government should be crystallized before Lord Reith's mission arrives for the discussions previously described. Since no government favours the retention of Cable and Wireless Limited, it would appear that the Canadian government must either approve of the Reith plan in principle or support the creation of an individual Canadian publicly owned corporation to operate external telecommunication facilities with other countries. Such a company should be ready to co-operate as far as possible with whatever other type of Commonwealth telecommunication corporation may emerge, but not to the point of surrendering its autonomy in the manner envisaged by the Reith proposals.

7. The Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy therefore requests direction from the Cabinet War Committee as to its views on the following alternatives:—

(a) acceptance of the Reith proposals for a new centralized Commonwealth communications company based at London but with subsidiary local corporations in the various Commonwealth countries; or,

(b) creation of a Canadian publicly-owned telecommunications company, operating external communications and prepared to co-operate as fully as possible with whatever Commonwealth company may be created. Such co-operation should not impair in any essential degree its autonomy.

Under the latter scheme, it is envisaged that the Commonwealth Communications Council would be retained and its powers somewhat amplified.[50]

SECRET Ottawa, March 2, 1945

Dear Mr. MacDonald:

I wish to refer to your secret letter to the Prime Minister of December 23, 1944†, informing him of the proposed visit of Lord Reith to the partner governments of the Commonwealth concerned with the re-organization of telecommunications services.

Since your letter, we have received telegrams† from the Governments of Australia, New Zealand, India, and Southern Rhodesia, describing their conversations with the Reith Mission on this topic. We understand that Lord Reith and his party are now engaged in similar discussions with the South African Government and will arrive in Ottawa for the same purpose about the middle of March. The tenor of the telegrams received to date indicates approval of a more centralized plan for re-organization than was envisaged in the CCC proposals of almost a year ago. We feel that the powers of the proposed Central Body, as outlined in the Australian discussions, encroach to such an extent on the powers of the nationally owned corporations as to render their local autonomy of minor importance.

As you are aware, the Canadian Government informed the Commonwealth Communications Council last September that it was prepared to accept in principle the nationalization of telecommunications by each member country of the Commonwealth, while reserving for future consideration the nature of the relationships to be established between the new national corporations and the question of sharing the financial responsibility for the maintenance of cables. We are still of that opinion and are not prepared to subordinate a Canadian publicly-owned telecommunications corporation to the type of centralized control described above. We favour the retention of the existing Commonwealth Communications Council and are willing to examine proposals for increasing its usefulness to the partner governments.

We feel that the United Kingdom Government should be generally informed of our position before our discussions with Lord Reith, to which we are looking forward to with great interest, get under way.

Yours sincerely,

N. A. ROBERTSON.

SECRET Ottawa, March 16, 1945

Dear Lord Reith:

I regret that my enforced absence from Ottawa has prevented me from participating in conversations with you and your colleagues concerning the reorganization of the Commonwealth telecommunications services.

Based upon the discussions which my colleagues have had with your Mission, and upon their examination in the Cabinet, I think I might describe the position of the Canadian government as follows:

As we informed the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Canada, in our letter of March 2nd, we are prepared to create a publicly-owned company in Canada, to operate external communications and to co-operate with Commonwealth and other telecommunications bodies. We would, of course, assume full financial responsibility for this company.

As a consequence of the information given to us by you in these discussions, we are also prepared to co-operate in the creation of a Commonwealth body on the lines suggested in the Canberra paper,† but with the modifications proposed by Field Marshal Smuts in his letter to you of 5th March, 1945,† which makes it clear that the central body shall be consultative.

I have also two additional qualifications to make arising out of the particular circumstances of Canada:

(1) As was explained in our discussions with your Mission, the Canadian interest in Commonwealth telecommunications questions is not of the same order of magnitude as that of some of the other countries of the Commonwealth; in particular, the field of co-operation between Canada and the United States in communications bulks large in proportion to our overseas communications. For that reason, in any discussion of allocation of costs and maintenance of the Commonwealth telecommunications system, the Canadian government will wish to reserve its position until further details have been obtained.

(2) In our discussions with your Mission, it became clear that negotiations with the United States, in which all Commonwealth governments may be concerned, on such topics as direct circuits and rate structures, would be desirable at the earliest possible date. The Canadian government could not take any action, at this stage or in subsequent discussions with the Commonwealth governments in London in respect of the Commonwealth telecommunications system which might prejudice our common interest in reaching, if possible, broader international agreements in this field and, in particular, in securing satisfactory measures of co-operation with the United States. We feel that the London conference should consider not only the form and functions of the central body, but also the manner and timing of the forthcoming negotiations with the United States of America and the policy to be adopted therein.

May I express, on behalf of the Canadian government, our appreciation for the manner in which you and your colleagues have presented the problems of Commonwealth telecommunications and assure you that the Canadian government for its part will continue to co-operate in seeking a solution for them.

Yours sincerely,
W. L. MACKENZIE KING

Mémorandum du secrétaire, le Comité interministériel sur la politique des télécommunications, au Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary, Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy, to Cabinet

[March, 1945]

COMMONWEALTH TELECOMMUNICATIONS; CANADIAN POLICY

Introduction

1. This memorandum deals with the reorganization of Commonwealth telecommunications, a matter which is to be discussed at a Conference to be held in London commencing July 16th, and seeks direction on question of Canadian policy in connection therewith.

Summary of Recent Developments

2. Questions related to the reorganization of the system have been under review by the partner governments since the Commonwealth Communications Council, at its meeting in May, 1944, recommended to the partner governments the adoption, in principle, of the "Anzac Scheme" which involved the supersession of Cable and Wireless Limited by a series of nationally owned public utility corporations. This scheme was put forward as one which provided for functional unity while enhancing local autonomy.

3. The Cabinet War Committee at their meeting of September 27th, 1944, considered the proposed scheme in the light of a report by the Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy and agreed: "that the government accept in principle the nationalization of telecommunications by each member country of the Commonwealth advanced by Australia and New Zealand, reserving, however, for further consideration, the nature of the relationships to be established between the new national corporations and the question of sharing financial responsibility for maintenance of cables.'

4. The proposed scheme was also accepted in principle by various other Dominion governments but the United Kingdom government were of the opinion that it did not appear to give the necessary degree of central co-ordination. It therefore arranged for a United Kingdom delegation, headed by Lord Reith, to visit the governments concerned with a view to discussing alternative possibilities.

5. This led to the preparation in Australia of a revised scheme, known as the Canberra Proposals, which was claimed to be an extension of the Anzac Scheme but which, in effect, centralized control of the Commonwealth system to a greater degree than had been envisaged in the earlier plans. The governments of Australia, New Zealand, India and Southern Rhodesia indicated agreement to the new proposals, subject to minor modifications. On the other hand, South Africa, while promising full co-operation, stipulated that the central agency should function on a consultative rather than directive basis.

6. Details of the new proposals were submitted in a report by the Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy[51] to the Cabinet War Committee for consideration at their meeting of February 28th before the arrival of Lord Reith's party in Ottawa. The War Committee then decided that "the Reith proposals for a new centralized Commonwealth Communications Company were not acceptable, and approved in principle the alternative suggested in the Committee's report, viz, the creation of a Canadian publicly-owned company to co-operate with Commnwealth and other telecommunications bodies." It was also agreed that the Commonwealth Communications Council might be retained perhaps with amplified powers. The United Kingdom and other Commonwealth governments were informed of these views.

7. Following the conversations which were held with the United Kingdom Delegation in March, the Canadian position was stated in a letter from the Prime Minister to Lord Reith. This notified the Government's willingness to create a publicly-owned telecommunications company in Canada and stated that we were also prepared to co-operate in the creation of a Commonwealth Body on the lines suggested in the Canberra paper, but with the modification proposed by Field Marshal Smuts which makes it clear that the central body shall be consultative. This letter stated further than in any discussion of allocation of costs and maintenance of the Commonwealth telecommunications system, the Canadian government would wish to reserve its position until further details had been obtained.

Description of Lord Reith's proposals

8. In Lord Reith's report to the United Kingdom government, he concluded that dissatisfactions with the existing system could not be ignored and recommended that the Canberra proposals, adjusted to meet South African and Canadian reservations, be recognized as a basis for the reorganization. A further recommendation of some interest related to the disposition of oceanic assets (as distinct from territorial assets and including cables and some wireless facilities such as relay stations). In this connection he suggested that the question of placing them under the operating control of the central body be explored. The documents† for the forthcoming conference have been prepared by Lord Reith along these lines and the policies recommended therein are for consideration of all the partner governments, including that of the United Kingdom. The main principles upon which agreement will first be sought are:

(a) Practicability of the Canberra proposals, modified to meet South African and Canadian requirements.

This involves the establishment of local bodies to own, maintain and operate assets situated in the territory of each partner government, and the creation of a new central body to replace the existing Commonwealth Communications Coundil — this central body to possess consultative powers plus any administrative powers which might be given to it in connection with the control and operation of oceanic assets.

(b) The feasibility of separating oceanic assets from territorial assets and placing those under the operating control of the central body.

This scheme was developed sometime later than the Canberra proposals which envisaged the U.K. corporation operating those oceanic assets which were not acquired and operated by the local bodies.

(c) Attitude to the United States.

On this subject the documents suggest that "the objective should be complete collaboration with the United States and . . . . . aim ultimately at the full acceptance by the United States of America, in common with other foreign countries and the nations of the British Commonwealth, of international obligations in the sphere of telecommunications to be defined by agreement at a post-war international conference, including adherence by the United States to all the International Regulations. Further it is contemplated that preliminary collaboration should take place . . . . . with a view to facilitating smooth working, and the abolition of friction due to competitive rate cutting, etc."

9. The main problem confronting the Canadian government is the attitude to be adopted on the second principle, i.e. that dealing with the transfer of oceanic assets to the new proposed central body. The grounds for the transfer, in Lord Reith's opinion, are that otherwise the United Kingdom corporation would be so much stronger than the other partner governments as to throw out of balance the Commonwealth organization. In this connection, Lord Reith states:

(a) acceptance of the plan would permit the partner governments to "acquire full share in the control of the telecommunications system . . . . . in a way involving no compromise with sovereign rights;

(b) "it is no part of the plan that the control of the public undertaking should be related to the amount of stock held by the various governments in the undertaking."

10. If the partner governments agree to the transfer of oceanic assets to the central body, it would be entrusted with their administration. Its powers would accordingly include such functions as,—

(a) "to maintain, develop and operate the telecommunication assets and services of the Corporation in the best interests of our Commonwealth and Empire;

(b) "to carry on the business of telegraphy (including wireless telegraphy, telephony and television) in any and every form."

11. The other powers of the corporation are outlined below. They are mainly of a consultative nature and have been obviously carefully written so as to meet the wishes of South Africa and ourselves.

(a) "At the request of our partner governments and local telecommunications bodies to conduct negotiations with foreign telecommunication interests on their behalf;

(b) to promote and conduct research in telecommunication matters;

(c) to make recommendations to our partner governments and to local telecommunication bodies on the following matters:

(i) the formulation and execution of the joint telecommunication policy of our partner governments, including the fixing of rates, (terminal, transit and parcours proportions);

(ii) co-ordination of the development of cable and wireless systems of our Commonwealth and Empire;

(iii) extensions to and alterations of the telecommunication systems within our Commonwealth and Empire;

(iv) the provision and, where appropriate, the apportionment among local telecommunication bodies, of capital expenditure on projects;

(v) telecommunication matters affecting the defence or the foreign relations of our Commonwealth and Empire or any part thereof;

(vi) co-ordination of research in telecommunication matters conducted by local telecommunication bodies;

(vii) the exchange of personnel between the Corporation and local telecommunications bodies;

(viii) any other telecommunication matter which may be referred to the Corporation by any of our partner governments or by any local telecommunication body."

Canadian Policy

12. In considering the Reith proposals, there appear to be two main courses open to the Candian Government:

(a) To participate in a reorganization based on the Canberra Proposals — modified to meet South African and Canadian views — but to not support Lord Reith's plan for the disposition of oceanic assets.

Canada has already indicated its willingness to co-operate in the creation of a Commonwealth body having consultative powers. Should this course be accepted the local bodies in the Dominions would own their territorial assets and such oceanic assets as they might acquire. The U.K. corporation, on the other hand, would own its territorial assets and such oceanic assets as were not acquired by the other partner governments. The U.K. corporation would thus be very much stronger than the other local bodies and would, by virtue of its greater interest, dominate the central body. While this in itself is not objectionable, this type of organization with a central body having only consultative functions, is more loosely knit than the other alternative and might have disadvantages from an operating viewpoint, as experts have frequently argued that the system should be considered as a whole and that cable and wireless networks cannot be operated as efficiently independently.

If central administration of oceanic assets is completely ruled out the best solution would seem to be their ownership and administration on a regional basis. By such a plan each local body would follow the course its national interest dictates — viz, either sole ownership of a particular group of oceanic assets or participation with other public corporations in regional arrangements. On such a basis the Canadian corporation might, for example, co-operate, in the Atlantic region, with the United Kingdom corporation and, in the Pacific, with the Australian corporation.

It might be noted that if the Reith proposals for administration of oceanic assets were acceptable to the other partner governments they might bring the scheme into operation with Canada's participation in the central body limited to consultative questions. In these circumstances it might prove difficult to convince other governments and telecommunication interests that Canada's participation was so limited. It is, therefore, probable that whatever political disadvantages were inherent in full participation would to a large degree remain.

(b) To participate in a reorganization, based on the Canberra proposals as modified, and in the establishment of a central body charged with the operation of oceanic assets.

The acceptance of Lord Reith's plan for the disposition of oceanic assets would result in the maintenance of a fully integrated system but would, on the other hand, have the disadvantage of creating a Commonwealth system under central control.

Under the present system, that is one in which a United Kingdom private corporation operating with the approval of the various Commonwealth governments as their chosen instrument in telecommunications, but with modified supervision by an Advisory Committee in which each government is represented, experience has shown,—

(i) that the Company has not always been successful in negotiating tactfully with U.S. telecommunication authorities; and,

(ii) that when the U.S. authorities have entered into negotiations with U.K. authorities they have been informed that any changes must be discussed with the other Commonwealth governments as well.

Thus, indirectly at least, the partner governments might have acquired some share of criticism for the policies of Cable and Wireless Limited.

In the new scheme the partner governments would have a greater voice in the formulation of policy since they would be represented on the central body which operates oceanic assets. At the same time their national corporations would be in existence as independent co-operative units in central scheme. It was this feature of the Anzac plan which drew favourable comment from U.S. authorities.

It should also be noted that each Dominion government would be free to determine how great its financial participation in oceanic assets would be without its voice in policy being legally related to the extent of that participation.

Conclusions

13. The Interdepartmental Committee have reviewed these various factors and their conclusions are as follows:—

(a) that the idea of a Commonwealth system under control of a body situated in London is less acceptable than a more loosely knit organization;

(b) that from an administrative point of view, the Reith proposals offer one solution for the disposition of oceanic assets;

(c) that either the regional scheme or the Reith proposals would be an improvement over the existing situation insofar as the conduct of negotiations with the U.S.A. and other foreign countries was concerned; and,

(d) that, under the Reith proposals, Canada's special relationship with the U.S.A. would be dependent on the adoption by the central body of a fully co-operative and progressive policy towards that country.

Recommendations

14. The Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy accordingly recommends approval in principle of the following policy for the guidance of the Canadian delegates to the Commonwealth Conference: —

(a) that Canada reaffirm its willingness to create a publicly-owned Canadian corporation to acquire and operate such external telecommunication facilities within Canada as may be required;

(b) that the Canadian delegates to the conference be instructed to suggest that oceanic assets be administered on a regional basis and that the central body remain purely consultative; — this would mean the adoption of policy whereby each partner government would be free to act at its discretion in respect of acquisition and operation of oceanic assets and to negotiate on telecommunication matters with any other country;

(c) that if the Canadian proposals are not acceptable and the Reith proposals commend themselves to the majority of countries represented at the conference, the delegates be given guidance by the Cabinet as to which of the following courses should be pursued, —

(i) acceptance of the plan for the operation of oceanic assets by the central body with Canada's financial interest limited to its appropriate share of the oceanic facilities which terminate in Canada;

(ii) non-participation in a central body administering oceanic assets but willingness to negotiate regional arrangements with that body or with any Commonwealth government.

Dear Mr. Howe,

I attach for your information a copy of the Minutes of the 5th Meeting of the Cabinet Committee on Reconstruction held July 5th, 1945.† May I draw your attention to the following items:

IX. Telecommunications Policy.

The Committee noted the report from the Inter-departmental Committee on Telecommunications outlining possibilities regarding policy for the guidance of Canadian representatives to the Commonwealth Telecommunication Conference to be held in London, commencing July 16th and agreed that Canadian delegates be instructed

(i) that they should reaffirm the policy outlined in the Prime Minister's letter dated March 13th [15th], 1945, to Lord Reith to the effect that the government was prepared to create a publicly-owned company in Canada to operate external communications facilities within Canada, and to cooperate with other telecommunication bodies; that Canada was also prepared to cooperate in the creation of a Commonwealth body possessing the powers of the existing Commonwealth Communications Council and remaining primarily consultative in nature, and

(ii) that Canada was not prepared at the present time to become a member of any central authority owning and operating oceanic assets or telecommunications facilities, nor to acquire any oceanic assets.

Yours sincerely,

[Ottawa], July 6, 1945

Dear Mr. Howe,

We have recently been advised, through unofficial channels, of the views of the Directors of Cable and Wireless Limited on the Reith proposals for the reorganization of the Commonwealth Telecommunications System. These are briefly described below with some comments on those features which appear to be of most interest from the Canadian standpoint.

The Directors expressed themselves as being strongly opposed to the nationalization proposals since, in their opinion, it would inevitably lead to parallel action in foreign countries, with resultant loss of the company's foreign concessions. This they considered dangerous from a strategic point of view. They also regard nationalization as quite impractical.

The Directors, if they were asked for suggestions, say that they would recommend a continuation of the present setup, which they claim through foresight and efficiency has stood up to the phenomenal strain imposed by wartime conditions. They think that the idea which should be striven for is to achieve even greater unity in Commonwealth communications and are convinced that this could best be done by the present companies agreeing to pool their traffic receipts and then drawing out from that pool an agreed percentage, based on past experience for a given period. This, in their opinion, would have the effect of encouraging the Dominion companies to put as much into the pool as they could in order to increase their withdrawals therefrom. A meeting of the partners to the pool would take place annually. In their view, the adoption of such a scheme would enable companies to conserve their complete autonomy and sovereign rights, and would have the further advantage that it would give to both governments and companies a new and far greater interest and share in the policy of the Commonwealth systems as a whole. Having brought this into effect, the Directors envisage an extension of the pool to admit foreign interests.

Another feature of their proposals is their expressed willingness to extend the Empire flat rate to Empire/foreign and foreign/foreign traffic. While this rate would, in the first instance, have to be higher than the Empire rate, the company would propose to set aside a fixed sum annually to reduce the rates on these classes of traffic until they coincided with the Empire rate. In this way a world flat rate would, ultimately, be attained.

These views, as described above, are of interest for the following reasons,

(a) Agreement is implied but not directly stated to the continued operation of the direct circuits which have been established as a wartime measure between the United States and various parts of the Commonwealth. We feel this aspect of their proposals needs clarification in the London discussions. Their policy seems to be that these circuits would be allowed to function but that their use would be discouraged since it would be in the interests of the various companies to use facilities of the Empire system.

(b) The views, as now expressed, indicate that Cable and Wireless Limited, as presently organized, believe they could operate profitably in the post-war period. This view is directly opposed to that expressed previously by the company when they claimed that the continued operation of the direct circuits would spell the ruination of their company.

(c) Under these proposals external facilities in the Dominion territories could be nationalized or not without affecting the relationship between the various corporations and Cable and Wireless Limited. It would therefore be a matter for later decision as to which course would be followed in Canada.

In the light of the decisions taken by the Cabinet Committee on Reconstruction at their meeting of July 5th, it would appear that these proposals might not be unacceptable to Canada. It would, however, be very helpful to the delegates to the forthcoming conference to have your views, particularly on the attitude that might be adopted by Canada towards the retention of Cable and Wireless Limited and the establishment of a central revenue pool.

Yours sincerely,

EVAN W. T. GILL

Ottawa, July 14, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson:

I have letter of July 6th signed by the Chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy.

The views of the Directors of Cable and Wireless Limited on the Reith proposals should, I think, commend themselves to the Government of Canada. I have felt throughout these discussions that the proposals of Lord Reith would weaken the management of the Empire Telecommunications System without effecting any great benefit.

Canada has obtained satisfactory service from Cable & Wireless Limited. Our relations with Marconi, Canadian associate of Cable & Wireless, have been satisfactory. There is something to be said for maintaining the present arrangement.

Canada has no desire to block any plan put forward by the United Kingdom in agreement with our sister Dominions and the Colonies, and for that reason alone, we agreed to nationalize the communications section of Marconi, in order to conform with the pattern agreement. We did this reluctantly, and at the same time we expressed the view that Canada did not wish to be responsible for the management of the Telecommunications System as a whole. The new suggestion that Canada shall acquire ownership or partnership in ownership of Trans-Atlantic or Trans-Pacific Cables is one that we are unwilling to consider.

Our only objection to the Cable and Wireless situation is the reluctance to discuss with the United States a common policy that will govern trans-ocean communications. It seems to me that the conference about to be held should press the need for an international understanding. It is obvious that the U.S. is offended at the unwillingness of the U.K. to enter into discussions, and that recent actions detrimental to the operating position of Cable and Wireless is the outcome of that feeling.

I see nothing to which Canada can object in the suggestion that traffic receipts be pooled and drawn out from the pool on an agreed percentage based on past experience for a given period.

I trust that the Canadian delegates to the Conference will be advised of Canada's viewpoint, which in my opinion is expressed above.

Yours sincerely,

C. D. HOWE

Rapport de la délégation, la Conférence du Commonwealth sur les télécommunications

Report of Delegation to Commonwealth Telecommunications Conference

SECRET [London,] August 17, 1945

REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TO COMMONWEALTH TELECOMMUNICATIONS CONFERENCE IN LONDON, JULY 16TH TO AUGUST 3RD, 1945

1. This Conference, under the Chairmanship of Lord Reith, which was attended by representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India and Southern Rhodesia,[52] and an observer from Burma, was concerned with two main proposals, one dealing with the re-organization of the Commonwealth telecommunications services and the other with the telecommunications policy towards the United States.

2. The proposals presented for re-organization of Commonwealth telecommuncations services were those advanced by Lord Reith after his discussions with the various Partner Governments earlier in the year. They involved:

(i) The nationalization of Cable and Wireless Ltd. and its subsidiary companies.

(ii) The replacement of the Commonwealth Communications Council by a central body with considerably greater powers.

(iii) The establishment of an Oceanic Assets corporation to be administered by the central body and to operate telecommunications facilities not within the territorial limits of the Partner Governments.

3. The questions to be discussed by representatives of the Commonwealth countries with the United States authorities were outlined in a paper prepared for the Conference by the United Kingdom Foreign Office† and were based upon informal discussions between the United States and the United Kingdom authorities in the spring of 1945.

4. Before leaving for London, the Canadian delegates were instructed by the Cabinet Committee on Reconstruction as follows:

(i) that Canada was not prepared at the present time to become a member of any central authority owning and operating Oceanic Assets;

(ii) that Canada was not prepared at the present time to acquire any Oceanic Assets;

(iii) that Canada was prepared to create a publicly owned Company to operate external telecommunications facilities within Canada and to cooperate with other telecommunications bodies;

(iv) that Canada was prepared to cooperate in the creation of a Commonwealth body possessing the powers of the existing CCC and remaining primarily consultative in nature.

5. On the United States questions, no definite instructions were given, but it was understood that the Canadian delegation should press for a meeting as promptly as possible with the United States in order to settle as many as possible of the existing difficulties.

6. The delegates were also informed early in the proceedings of the Conference that the Canadian Government was quite prepared to retain its existing relationship with Cable and Wireless Ltd. and Canadian Marconi Co., and had no objection to some pooling arrangements being worked out along the lines described in the unofficial reports outlining the proposals the Company was expected to make.

7. After the formal opening of the Conference, it was decided that a Committee of Heads of Delegations should examine the Oceanic Assets scheme. When it became clear in these discussions that Canada and South Africa could not accept it, the other delegations were of the unanimous opinion that it should be abandoned rather than establish a new organization in which all the Partner Governments did not equally participate. This decision was endorsed by the Conference as a whole.

8. The Heads of Delegations then considered whether, in view of the Canadian and South African reservations, a practical scheme could be worked out on the basis of the Canberra proposals. As it was their unanimous view that this was possible the proposals were referred to a Constitutional Committee for detailed study and recommendations.

9. Before this Committee undertook the task, it was decided that Cable and Wireless Ltd., and its associated companies, should be given an opportunity to express their views on the Oceanic Assets and Canberra Proposals. Three sessions of the full Conference were used for this purpose and the Companies expressed appreciation for the careful consideration of their views. In brief, the Companies objected to both proposals and queried the need for change, apart from some modifications in the organization of the Commonwealth Communications Council and the adoption of new policies for the reduction of rates and the pooling of revenues (Appendix B of Report).† The Companies also argued that nationalization in the Commonwealth might lead to a parallel policy in such countries as Egypt and Portugal to the detriment of the Commonwealth services. In the opinion of the delegates, the Companies proposals did not offer any material prospect for improving relations with the United States with whom their policies in the past had caused resentment. Complying with the Government's wishes, the Canadian delegates recorded their satisfaction with their existing relationship with Cable and Wireless Ltd. and Canadian Marconi Company, but stressed the importance of United States relations and the need for concessions on such questions as direct wireless circuits and rates.

10. Following the discussions with the Companies, the Conference broke up into Committees on Constitution, Technics, International Organization, Rates, Finance, and Relations with the United States (the last named Committee being under the Chairmanship of Mr. Massey).

11. In the Constitutional Committee the wishes of the Canadian and South African delegates on the powers of the proposed new Central Body were fully met. (See paragraph 25 of the Report.) An over-all agreement was drafted for the approval by legislation, if necessary, by all Partner Governments. (See Appendix F of the Report.)

12. In the Finance Committee, the financial aspects of the Canberra Proposals were analyzed in detail. (See Appendix E of the Report.) These fell into two main problems — those arising in connection with the nationalization process and those relating to the operation and maintenance of the system. Discussion on the first problem led to recommendations that:

(a) Cable and Wireless Ltd., the operating company, and not Cable and Wireless (holding) Ltd., should be acquired;

(b) the Company should be acquired by purchase of the shares rather than of the undertaking, and the basis valuation should be its value as a going concern; and

(c) the price paid by the U.K. and other Partner Governments should be taken as the capitalization of the various National Bodies.

13. On the question of operating arrangements, several methods of allocating maintenance charges were reviewed. These included arrangements of the joint purse type and a division of parcours on a basis mutually agreed. Either of these alternatives were considered to be highly complicated. The question as to whether cable maintenance charges could be based on individual cables was also raised but the delegates felt that any such arrangement would have to be on a fixed charge basis which was neither accurate nor equitable in its incidence.

14. It was decided therefore that the best solution lay in the establishment of a central fund into which net revenues of the National Bodies would be paid. This fund would be used to finance the Central Body and to meet any deficiency of the U.K. Body up to the total cost of cable maintenance. The responsibility of each National Body in defraying these expenses would be in the same proportion as their originating traffic bears to total traffic of the system. Balances to the credit of any National Body after these charges had been met, would then be rebated to them. In view of the instructions given the Canadian delegates our position with regard to these proposals was reserved. It should be noted, however, that the U.K. have agreed to contribute the net revenues from their European telegraph and telephone traffics which comes under the Post Office Department. As this amount was £400,000 in 1938, such an arrangement will reduce the likelihood of a deficit.

15. Under the financial arrangements proposed, revenue from land line services between contiguous countries and Government services such as Ship to Shore, civil aviation and meteorological would be excluded but revenue from other external telecommunication services both telegraph and telephone should be regarded within the scope of the Central Fund. (Revenue from Canada — Newfoundland telephone traffic, not at present included in the Companies Joint Purse agreements would, under the new scheme, be considered as revenue for purposes of the arrangements governing payments to the Central Fund.)

16. In the Conference Report net revenue is defined as being gross revenue less normal operating and administrative charges (including 3% interest on invested capital), and out payments for terminal and transit charges but before Corporation and profit taxes. In practice, the originator of message would initially retain a much higher percentage of the toll charge than has been the case in the past. Whereas the Canadian Marconi Company retains 37% now and pays 63% to Cable & Wireless Ltd. as the proportion due for transmitting the message over the system, in the future the Canadian National Body would normally retain the full amount less terminal (and in some cases transit) charges.

17. The Committee on Rates, Technics, and International Organization were on occasion attended by the Company representatives. Their reports are in general not controversial in character except on the question of rates, where it was unanimously felt that the views of Cable and Wireless Ltd. and its associates would be much less acceptable to the United States than those under consideration by the Conference.

18. The Committee on Relations with the United States endorsed a recommendation to the Partner Governments that they should agree to attend a conference on Commonwealth-United States matters in Bermuda about November 15. (It had been previously ascertained that the place and time for the conference would be acceptable to the United States.) They outlined an Agenda for such talks (see paragraph 55 of the Report) and made suggestions as to the concessions which Partner Governments might make on various items on the Agenda. (See paragraphs 55, 58, 64, 65, 66 and 69 to 83 of the Report.)

19. During the Conference meetings, a new Government came into office in the United Kingdom, committed to an extensive programme of the nationalization for coal, banking and heavy industries, but not including any reference to telecommunications. As a consequence, it was realized that the nationalization of telecommunications might not have a high priority on the legislative programme of the new Government. It was also felt that the more conciliatory attitude shown by the Companies, the possible complications arising from the foreign concessions problem, and the inevitable delays before nationalization could be complete, made advisable the drafting of a supplementary agreement between the Partner Governments to cover the interim period before full nationalization could be achieved. Such an agreement is outlined in Appendix G of the Report and is for early consideration by the Partner Governments. It is designed to increase the powers of the Partner Governments over Cable and Wireless Ltd. and associated companies, and to give the present Commonwealth Communications Council as many powers as are feasible of the proposed new Commonwealth Telecommunications Board. During the interim period, the United Kingdom representatives will negotiate with Cable and Wireless Ltd. to see if the advent of a Labour Government will not make the Company more prepared to accept an offer to purchase it as a going concern without recourse to legislation and arbitration.

20. The Canadian Government is therefore asked:

(i) to approve as speedily as possible the supplementary agreement outlined in Appendix G of the Report;

(ii) to agree to the acceptance of the overall agreement outlined in Appendix F when Cable and Wireless Ltd. has accepted nationalization; and

(iii) to study the Agenda for the Bermuda Conference to which Canada will be invited and about which further exchanges of opinion will take place between the Partner Governments.

In that connection, the Government should consider the possibility of renouncing its present preferential rate for government telegrams. Such a rate is not available by the United States Government and this "discrimination" is resented. If the preference were abolished by the Partner Governments, the extra amount of revenue secured by Cable and Wireless Ltd. would be immediately applied to a reduction of the new world flat rate which it is prepared to introduce. The Companies estimated that the rate would then be reduced from 2 s. to 1-10 pence and such a cut would reduce the gap between the world flat rate and the present Imperial rate of 1-3 pence. The delegates of the United Kingdom, South Africa, and India recommended the abolition of the preferential rate. The delegates of Australia, New Zealand, Burma, and Southern Rhodesia are willing to submit the proposal to their governments, but are somewhat reluctant to accord this concession to a private company. The Canadian delegation feels that the Government might declare its willingness to concur in the abolition if other Partner Governments are prepared to do so.

21. The Canadian delegation wishes to record its appreciation of the excellent preparations made for the working of the Conference and the efficiency displayed by the Secretariat. The hospitality given by the United Kingdom to the delegates from the Partner Governments could not have been more generous or thoughtful.

proposed discussions next month at Bermuda with the United States Government so that United States may appreciate status of Cable and Wireless Limited in relation to these discussions. As time is so short, we have, therefore, been considering here adoption of more permanent arrangements as regards chairmanship of Commonwealth Communications Council on assumption that Commonwealth Governments agree with proposals in Conference report.

We now, therefore, propose that Lord Reith should be appointed Chairman of Commonwealth Communications Council with a view later to his appointment as Chairman of projected Commonwealth Telecommunications Board. Lord Reith is prepared to accept appointment if this is the unanimous desire of partner Governments. Matter was discussed by the heads of delegations at close of Commonwealth Telecommunications Conference and it appeared that his appointment would be universally welcomed. COMMONWEALTH COMMUNICATIONS; CANADIAN POLICY

18. THE SECRETARY submitted a report from the Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy.

The Commonwealth Telecommunications Conference, which had met in London in July, 1945, had recommended the nationalization of Cable and Wireless Limited and its subsidiary companies, the replacement of the Commonwealth Communications Council by a new Commonwealth Telecommunications Board (with wider powers but primarily consultative in nature) and a special interim arrangement to cover the period necessary to complete re-organization.

The Conference had also recommended that a Commonwealth-U.S. Telecommunications Conference be held in November in Bermuda. This had now been arranged.

The Interdepartmental Committee recommended:

(a) that consideration of the main proposals relating chiefly to operating and financial aspects of the reorganization be left in abeyance for the time being;

(b) that the government re-affirm willingness to nationalize external telecommunication facilities and agree to subscribe to the supplementary agreement between partner governments to cover the interim period; and

(c) that the government agree to participate in the Commonwealth-U.S. Conference, scheduled to take place at Bermuda in mid-November.

Copies of the report had been circulated.

(Report of Interdepartmental Committee and Appendix "A", Oct. 11, 1945 — Cabinet Document 89).†

19. THE CABINET, after discussion, approved the recommendations contained in the report submitted by the Interdepartmental Committee, it being understood that the composition of the Canadian delegation to the Conference be agreed between the Minister of Reconstruction and the Department of External Affairs.

SECRET [Ottawa] November 2, 1945

U.S.-COMMONWEALTH TELECOMMUNICATIONS CONFERENCE;
CANADIAN POLICY

1. The Cabinet, at their meeting of October 17th, agreed that the Canadian government, as a preliminary step in the reorganization of Commonwealth telecommunications, should subscribe to an interim agreement extending the functions of Commonwealth Communications Council. Notification has been received of parallel action on the part of all the partner governments except Australia, but there is every reason to suppose that they also will agree. Thus the implementation by Commonwealth interests of any agreement reached in the forthcoming U.S.-Commonwealth talks will be greatly facilitated.

2. The Cabinet also agreed at their meeting of October 17th that Canada should participate in the U.S.-Commonwealth Conference which is scheduled to be held in Bermuda commencing November 19th. While Canada is not as directly concerned as the other Commonwealth governments in the outcome of these questions, it is very much in the Canadian interest to further an amicable settlement of the various problems in order that uncontrolled competition and rate wars may not be the result of disagreement and the friendly relations existing between the Commonwealth and the United States be correspondingly affected.

3. The policy to be adopted towards the U.S. was a major topic of discussion at the Commonwealth Telecommunications Conference held last summer and the attitude that the partner governments might take on the various questions formed the subject of recommendations in that report. The Interdepartmental Committee on Telecommunications Policy have considered the relevant section of the report and now submit the following comments and recommendations regarding the two major subjects upon which the Canadian delegation should be instructed: i.e., rates and the future policy with respect to direct circuits.

Rates

4. The problem of fixing rates to be charged for telegrams and cables has many ramifications. They include the determination of the basis of charging and accounting that should be advocated; the levels at which rates should be fixed; the rates that should be applicable to messages for governments and the press; and measures to simplify the rates structure by the unification of code and plain language tariffs; and the possible elimination of supplementary rates.

5. The main question, however, arises from the existence of an Empire preference providing, in many cases, lower rates within the Commonwealth than are available to other states. The other Commonwealth members will, no doubt, be prepared to narrow the gap but, in our opinion, will not be ready to commit themselves to its ultimate abolition. A 20% tolerance between Commonwealth and foreign traffic rates, it has been suggested, might be acceptable to U.S. authorities, but we are inclined to doubt the accuracy of this conjecture in view of statements appearing in the U.S. press.

6. The Committee is of the opinion that Canada's interest would best be served by the establishment of a low world flat rate and for that reason, the Canadian delegation should be authorized to advocate the reduction of the Empire preference or even its extension to other countries, and that to attain the end in view, we should also be willing to forego the special rates which are now in effect. This might mean the abandonment of the half rate for government messages, but, in the Committee's opinion, such a step would not involve a great financial sacrifice if external Communications are being operated, as is the intention, by a government-owned company.

7. Another aspect of the problem is the press rate which, during the war, has been *1*d a word, a level which is reported to be quite uneconomical and which the U.S. companies have charged is, in effect, subsidized. Present proposals are that U.S. and Commonwealth agree that it be advanced to its pre-war rate of 2¼d or 4¢ as a step towards the adoption of a world rate. Here again, Canada's interest is more in having agreement reached on the matter rather than in advocating any definite rate and we believe that some compromise might be effected within the range given above.

8. Accordingly, on the rates question, the Committee suggests that the delegates be instructed as follows:

(a) that it be recognized that Canada's interest is in the attainment of a low world flat rate and that the Canadian delegates should support measures designed to bring this about;

(b) that in order to further the objective of a low world flat rate, the Canadian government is prepared to agree to the narrowing and possible elimination of the Empire preference, the unification of code and ordinary rates, the simplification of subsidiary rates and the elimination of special government rates;

(c) that the adoption by the U.S. and Commonwealth of a uniform press rate be supported as a step towards a world rate with provisions by which newspaper organizations could, if they so wished, lease private wires or private time for their own purposes; and

(d) that the adoption of a system of charging and accounting on the sterling dollar basis be supported.

Direct Circuits

9. This question arises from the establishment, during the war, of direct wireless circuits between the U.S.A. and certain Commonwealth countries such as Australia, New Zealand and India. Since Canada has no such circuits, interest is therefore chiefly in the criteria which are proposed to govern, in the future, the establishment or retention of direct circuits.

10. On this matter, the Committee found themselves in general agreement with the recommendations in the Commonwealth Telecommunications report and recommend that the following policy be accepted by the Canadian government and thus serve as a guide to the Canadian delegates:

(a) partner governments wishing to open any new direct circuit should, in future, only do so after reference to and consultation with the Commonwealth Communication Council or its successor body; as

(b) except in the case of over-riding political necessity, which is recognized as being a matter for decision by each partner government, direct circuits should, in future, be justified on a basis of terminal traffic and service needs;

(c) the routing of transit traffic over direct circuits to foreign countries should be resisted as far as possible; and

(d) such concessions as partner governments might decide to make to the United States within the limits of the above formulae should only be made as part of a general settlement between the Commonwealth and the United States on telecommunication matters[56]

DESPATCH Ottawa, December 13, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to submit the following report on the proceedings of the Bermuda Telecommunications Conference held at the Belmont Manor Hotel in Bermuda between November 22 and December 4, 1945.

1. This Conference was convened for the purpose of discussing and settling, if possible, outstanding issues in the field of telecommunications policy which had arisen between the United States and the Governments of the British Commonwealth. It was attended by delegations from the United States, the United Kingdom (which also acted for Southern Rhodesia), Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India. The United States delegation of nineteen was headed by the Honourable James Clement Dunn, Assistant Secretary of State, who acted as Chairman of the Conference, and included the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, the Director of the Office of Transport Communications Policy of the Department of State, the Senior Communications Officers of the Army and Navy, and representatives of the Department of Commerce and the Treasury. The United Kingdom delegation of fourteen, including advisers, was headed by Sir Raymond Birchall, Deputy Director General of the Post Office, and included representatives of the Post Office, Treasury, Foreign Office, Bank of England and the Armed Services. The Australian delegation was headed by Mr. S. H. Witt, Chief of Research in the Postmaster General's Department, the New Zealand by Mr. P. N. Cryer, Deputy Director General, Post and Telegraphs, the South African by Mr. E. C. Smith, Under-Secretary of Telecommunications, and the Indian delegation by Sir Gurunath Bewoor, Secretary, Posts and Air Department. The majority of the Commonwealth delegates had participated in the Commonwealth discussions of last July. The Commonwealth Communications Council was represented by its Acting Chairman, Sir Claude Hollis.

2. As authorized by the Cabinet the Canadian delegation consisted of the following:

Mr. F. H. Soward, Department of External Affairs . . . Chairman.
Mr. W. A. Rush, Controller of Radio, Department of Transport.
Mr. W. E. Connelly, Department of Transport.
Mr. C. J. Acton, Department of Transport.
Colonel W. L. Laurie, Department of National Defence.

G/C C. J. Campbell, Department of Reconstruction.
Lt. Col. E. W. T. Gill, Privy Council Secretariat.

Messrs. Soward and Rush were authorized to sign any agreements which might be reached at the Conference, subject to ratification or approval by the Canadian Government.

3. In addition to the official delegations, the Conference was open to representatives of private communications companies. No less than seventeen representatives were present from American corporations which included — American Cable and Radio, Western Union Telegraph, Radio Corporation of America, R.C.A. Communications Incorporated, Radio Marine Corporation of America, Press Wireless Inc., American Telephone and Telegraph, Tropical Radio Telegraphs, Associated Press, and United Press. The British Commonwealth private companies included — Cable and Wireless Limited, Amalgamated Wireless (Australasia) Limited, Canadian Marconi, Canadian National Telegraphs and Canadian Pacific Telegraphs. Representatives of the companies attended the Conference in the capacity of observers. Excepting such sessions of the Conference or Committees as were declared executive sessions, they were free to attend any meetings of the Conference or its Committees. They were likewise available for consultation by the delegations of their respective countries. By general consent, this innovation, so far as the British Commonwealth was concerned, in conference procedure was most useful.

4. The Agenda for the Conference had been the subject of United States and United Kingdom conversations in London last Spring, and had also been carefully studied by the British Commonwealth delegates at the Conference in London in July. A further exchange of telegrams between the participating Governments resulted in the following agreed agenda:

1. Telecommunication rates for commercial, Government and press messages and division of the tolls; treatment of press instructional messages.

2. Future of transatlantic cables, maintenance of cables, including operation of cable ships.

3. Continuance of existing and possible establishment of new direct radio telegraph or radio telephone circuits.

4. Procedure for recording any agreement reached as a result of the discussions and exchange of information on methods of securing the implementation of such agreement.

5. It had originally been intended that the Conference should also discuss allocation of radio frequencies and other topics which would be of importance for the projected World Telecommunications Conference that may be held at the close of 1946. At the request of the United States Department of State, these items were not included in the Agenda, but it was understood that informal conversations might take place at Bermuda between members of the delegations who were interested in these topics. This understanding was the basis for the relatively large representation of the United States Army and Navy at Bermuda and for the presence of members of the Armed Services from the United Kingdom and Canada. Several meetings were held on an informal basis under the Chairmanship of the Assistant Staff Engineer of the United Kingdom Post Office. No official record was made of these meetings nor was any reference to them made in the proceedings of the Conference. It is understood, however, that the meetings did produce a valuable exchange of views which, while not committing the delegations concerned to any fixed line of policy clarified their understanding of each other's position.

6. The Conference was formally opened by the Acting Governor of Bermuda on November 22. A Plenary Session then followed under the Chairmanship of the Hon. James Dunn. At this Session it was decided to set up four main committees to deal with the topics of the Agenda. These Committees were as follows:

(a) Rates and Circuits Committee. Chairman . . . Mr. F. H. Soward, (Canada).

(b) Technical Developments Committee. Chairman . . . Major General F. E. Stoner, (United Sates).

(c) Exclusive Arrangements Committee. Chairman . . . Mr. R. A. Gallop (United Kingdom).

(d) Cable Committee. Chairman . . . Rear-Admiral J. R. Redman, (United States).

(e) Drafting Committee (No formal Chairman required).

The first four Committees reported to the Conference sitting as a Committee of the whole, under the Chairmanship of Mr. Soward, which in turn submitted its report to the closing Plenary Session on Tuesday, December 4th. When required, a Committee of Heads of the Delegations met under the chairmanship of either Mr. Dunn or Mr. Soward to plan arrangements for committee meetings.

7. Because of the controversial aspects of the topics assigned to it, the Committee on Rates and Circuits was attended by almost all the delegates as well as by the company representatives. It held ten meetings between November 22 and November 30. To further its discussions, the following Sub-Committees were appointed:

(a) Traffic. Chairman Mr. W. H. Norfleet, (United States).

(b) Currency. Chairman Mr. R. J. P. Harvey, (United Kingdom).

(c) Press. Chairman Sir Gurunath Bewoor, (India).

(d) Terminal and Transit Charges. Chairman Mr. W. H. Norfleet (United States).

8. The Rates and Circuits Committee began its work by agreeing to discuss in alternate Sessions direct circuits and rates. The United States proposals on both these topics were circulated at the opening meeting (See Annex A)†. In the discussion of Radio circuits, the United Kingdom delegation stressed the importance of accepting a formula for the operation of existing ones or the creation of new circuits to prevent their indiscriminate establishment without regard to economic considerations. Their suggested formula was referred to the Sub-committee on Traffic, which subsequently reported that it found it impossible to reconcile the views of the United States and the United Kingdom on this question in view of the fact that the United States representatives were convinced that no definitive formula could be evolved for general application. The Indian delegation then put forward a more general formula which was considered more favourably by the United States. Based on the terms of this formula, the United States delegates then presented on behalf of their private companies a statement giving their views on which existing circuits should be retained or which new ones should be authorized. After considerable discussion, reinforced by two private meetings between leading members of the United States and the United Kingdom delegations, a traffic formula for direct circuits was evolved and agreement reached as to which circuits, old or new, should be permitted. The details of these arrangements may be found in Article I of the Agreement signed at Bermuda (See Annex B)†.

9. In accepting these circuits, the British Commonwealth delegations stressed the importance of limiting their use to terminal traffic, while the United States had originally requested the removal of all such limitations. A prolonged discussion and an exchange of drafts eventually resulted in the adoption of the following formula for restricting transit traffic:

"The traffic normally handled over direct radiotelegraph circuits shall be restricted to traffic originating in and destined for the countries between which the circuits are operated. This does not preclude the use of such circuits as voies de secours in emergency. Transit traffic may be handled over direct radiotelegraph circuits in any case where it is agreed that it would otherwise be subject to excessive delay."

The acceptance of this formula materially reduced the concern felt by the British Commonwealth delegations that unrestricted use of direct circuits might seriously affect the cables system of the Commonwealth.

10. Once the question of circuits had been settled, progress was rapid in reaching agreement on a rate structure. All delegations shared the opinion that existing world rates were often too high and that adjustment was necessary. British Commonwealth delegates also felt that the aim in the fixing of an economic rate should take into account the operating cost of an integrated system comprising both radio and cable facilities. In their opinion, the United States proposal of the twenty cent rate plus land-line charges was not feasible. It was decided to have the varying Proposals studied by Sub-committees on Press, Currency and Terminal and Transit Charges. Based on their recommendations, and the discussions that followed, general agreement was reached on a ceiling rate between the United States and the British Commonwealth of 30¢ (U.S.) per word for ordinary messages and 20¢ (U.S.) per word for code. It was likewise agreed that the proposed rate schedule should involve no increase in existing rates. The adoption of a ceiling rate was to be contingent upon the acceptance of uniform terminal and transit charges which for Canada as a country of extensive area would be 4¢ (U.S.) and 3⅓¢ (U.S.) respectively. These proposals paralleled those which the United Kingdom delegates had presented for the consideration of the other British Commonwealth delegations before the Conference opened. Two other proposals advanced by the Commonwealth countries were not acceptable to the United States. One recommended the abolition of reduced rates for Government messages in order to offset in part the anticipated loss of revenue from a reduction in rates. Since the United States Government felt unable to support this recommendation, it was withdrawn. The other proposal, that the Empire press rate of one penny per word should be extended to Commonwealth-U.S. traffic was regarded as uneconomic by the United States. They offered no objection to its retention by the Commonwealth but asked that the ceiling rate between the Commonwealth and the United States should be placed at 6½¢ (U.S.). If the Commonwealth wished to retain its present rates to other countries, the United States would offer no objection. The United States proposal that the rate for urgent messages should be reduced from 2 to 1½¢ times the rate for ordinary messages was not acceptable to the British Commonwealth delegations which felt that the reduction in rates justified the current urgent rate for telegrams of that category. On other questions affecting the press, the Conference recommended the provision of private channels for point to point traffic when such channels were available. The reception of multiple press address radio communications, strongly desired by United States interests, was agreed to by the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada and accepted in more restricted terms by the Delegations of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India and the Colonies. By general agreement no discussion took place on the question of the reduction of the numbers and classes of telegrams which was left for consideration at a future conference. The United States could not accept a formal agreement precluding any reduction in rates before the World Telecommunications Conference, but gave assurances that such reductions were most unlikely. This concession was welcomed by the British Commonwealth delegations who had been disturbed by the extensive rate cutting in the past six months.

11. The United States and British Commonwealth delegates were also in agreement that, so far as they were concerned, accounts and tariffs should be fixed on the basis of the United States dollar and the pound Sterling instead of on the gold franc basis which has proved unsatisfactory under present conditions. It was the view of the Conference that any nation which wished to adhere to the rates structure proposed at the Bermuda Conference should likewise be expected to accept the Sterling-Dollar Basis for accountancy purposes. No definite date was fixed for the introduction of the new rates but it was agreed that all changes should come into effect not later than April 1, 1946.

12. The Committee on Technical Developments held only two meetings. The first was largely concerned with the demonstrations of the teletypewriter system as used by both the United States Army and Navy. Demonstrations included two-way teletypewriter conversations with Tokyo, Manila and Berlin. The Committee presented a resolution recommending the study of the teletypewriter system by the International Telegraph Consultative Committee and the International Consultative Committee for Radio Communications which would be presented by the United States. It also approved of a recommendation for a meeting to be held in Washington in January 1946 to witness "demonstrations of the relative merits of distance indicators for air navigation developed by the United States operating on a thousand megacycles and by Canada operating on two hundred megacycles."

13. The Exclusive Arrangements Committee was concerned with a topic which involved directly only the United States and the United Kingdom. This problem was the exercise of monopoly rights by Cable and Wireless Limited in countries where the United States wished to acquire concessions for its private companies. In examining the general subject it was discovered, to the surprise of the United States, that an American Company had obtained similar exclusive privileges in certain Central American States. The Committee drafted a formula by which the Signatory Governments declared that they

"Shall neither support nor approve efforts by telecommunications companies subject to their respective jurisdictions to prevent or obstruct the establishment of direct circuits between the United States or British Commonwealth points and other countries, and will take such steps as may be appropriate to discourage any such efforts."

The United States and United Kingdom representatives also signed a protocol by which the United Kingdom agreed to assist the United States in securing concessions in Saudi Arabia, and Greece, where at present Cable and Wireless Limited exercise a monopoly.

14. The Cables Committee was originally intended to study the re-allocation of cables in the North Atlantic and the Caribbean. As the United States had not reached an agreed policy on this question, the Cables Committee could do little more than give a description of the existing cables which served the United States and the British Isles and recommend the continuance of existing arrangements for consultative and cooperative action. The most important feature of the report was perhaps its declaration that "Cable communications play a vital role in a coordinated telecommunications system, and that for the ultimate development of telecommunications service the existence of both radio and cables is essential." The United Kingdom, in particular, welcomed this declaration, which appeared in less clear-cut fashion in the Agreement.

15. The Drafting Committee met after the reports of the other Committees had been approved and from the nature of its work was restricted in membership. The Commonwealth delegations other than the United Kingdom, were represented only by Sir Gurunath Bewoor (India) and Lieutenant-Colonel E. W. T. Gill (Canada).

16. In summary, it may be said that the Bermuda Conference was a distinct success. The Canadian delegation has no hesitation in recommending approval by the Canadian Government of the Agreement.[57] As a result of its deliberations, with the possible exception of allocation of radio frequencies, there remain no outstanding unsolved issues in the field of telecommunications between the United States and members of the Commonwealth. The agreement on direct circuits removes from the area of discussion a vexed topic which has caused difficulties for almost fifteen years. The proposed establishment of a United States-Commonwealth ceiling rate and willingness to extend it to any other country should prove of benefit to world trade. It has been introduced without necessitating the abolition of the Empire preference which still remains with a "tolerance" of twenty percent. The fear of prolonged and uneconomic rate cutting between the United States Companies and the British Commonwealth Cable and Radio Systems has been largely dispelled. The provision for consultation on all matters coming within its purview of the Government removes most of the danger of unilateral action. So far as Canada is concerned, the chief gains arise from the improvement in the relations between the United States and the United Kingdom. Since the bulk of Canadian communications are with the United States or with the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth, Canadian users gain little by the rate reductions except for traffic to Bermuda, the West Indies, British Guiana, and British Honduras, where the rate has been cut to a shilling. On the other hand, the Canadian Government was not asked to surrender its reduced rate for government messages which it had been prepared to do in order to facilitate further reduction of rates. The Canadian Press will gain by the retention of the existing Empire Penny Press Rate which had been originally designed for the period of the war only. From the formula worked out for uniform terminal and transit charges, Canada as a country of extensive area will receive as high proportions for these charges as any country which adheres to the Agreement.

17. In closing, the Canadian delegation would wish me to record their appreciation of the hospitality extended to them by the Government and people of Bermuda and their admiration for the efficiency of the Secretariat to the Conference provided by the United Kingdom. It is a pleasure to be able to add personally that the Canadian delegates worked harmoniously and efficiently and played their full part in furthering the success of the Conference.

I have etc.

CIRCULAR TELEGRAM Ottawa, September 27, 1945

Addressed to London No. 2234, Dublin No. 26, Pretoria No. 121, Canberra No. 426, Wellington No. 55.

The Government is proposing to introduce a Canadian Citizenship Bill shortly. At the earliest opportunity copies will be sent by airmail.

2. While it is impossible to give the details of the Bill until some further drafting questions have been settled, it is likely that it will be along the following lines —

(a) Naturalization Act, Canadian Nationals Act, and some provisions in Immigration Act are likely to be repealed;

(b) The Bill will define the conditions under which one will acquire the status of a natural-born Canadian citizen. These conditions will be not less rigorous than those which determine the position of a natural-born British subject under present Canadian legislation or under British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, and, in some respects, they will be more rigorous,

(c) The Bill provides for the issuing of certificates of Canadian citizenship to persons who are not natural-born Canadian citizens, the conditions being not less rigorous than those prescribed for naturalization under existing legislation;

(d) The Bill provides for the revocation of certificates and for loss of citizenship. It is possible that status will be lost more readily and in shorter time periods than under existing legislation.

(e) Under the Bill, all Canadian citizens will be subjects of His Majesty. Speaking generally, persons who are now Canadian citizens under existing legislation will be recognized as Canadian citizens under the Bill.

(f) Persons acquiring the status of British subjects, or other national status under the laws of other parts of the British Commonwealth, will be recognized as possessing the status of a subject of His Majesty within Canada,

(g) The Bill is being drafted upon the assumption that the other parts of the British Commonwealth will give due recognition to persons who acquire the status of subjects of His Majesty and Canadian citizens under the provisions of this legislation,

(h) Provision will be made for the status of aliens;

(i) There are ancillary provisions relating to procedure, and general matters;

(j) The most striking departure from present practice is elimination of married women from the disability provisions and establishment of equality between the sexes.

3. It is desired that you should bring the general nature of this legislation to the attention of the government to which you are accredited.

TELEGRAM 2947 London, October 10, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL. Your telegram No. 2234 of September 27th, proposed Canadian Citizenship Bill.

2. Letter, in sense of your foregoing telegram, sent to Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs on 28th September.† Answer has now been received, relevant portion of which reads as follows:

"I have forwarded to the authorities here, who are chiefly interested, a copy of your letter of 28th September, about the contemplated Canadian Citizenship Bill. The proposals mentioned in your letter raise certain important questions which have been discussed at past Imperial Conferences. We should, accordingly, like to have an opportunity of considering the draft Bill or the proposals in detail with a view to possible further discussion before the Bill is introduced. We should be grateful, therefore, it you could inform the Canadian Government to this effect and arrange for us to have the above information as soon as it may be available."

3. It is assumed that you do not contemplate any discussions with United Kingdom authorities on terms of Citizenship Bill. Matter is a trifle delicate, however, and I would thus appreciate indication of nature of answer I may suitably give Lord Addison.

DESPATCH 1731 Ottawa, October 12, 1945

IMMEDIATE

Sir —

Referring to your telegram No. 2947 concerning the proposed Canadian Citizenship Bill, the Secretary of State of Canada has furnished two advance copies of the text of the Bill for the information of the United Kingdom Government. These copies are enclosed.† There will be a few changes in drafting which will not affect the substantive provisions of the Bill so that it is likely that this text will indicate the nature of the measure which will be introduced in the House of Commons.

In transmitting these prints to the United Kingdom authorities for information, it is desired that you should let them know that it will probably not be possible to defer the introduction of the Bill in the House of Commons owing to the exigencies of the Parliamentary program. The Secretary of State has intimated that he would be very glad indeed to have any observations which the United Kingdom Government may desire to make before the Bill is considered in Committee. In view of the shortness of time, you might send any observations which may be made by telegram.

In bringing the provisions of the Bill to the attention of the United Kingdom authorities, you might refer to Part IV dealing with Status of Canadian Citizens and Recognition of British Subjects, including Section 24, 25, and 26.

The United Kingdom authorities will undoubtedly agree that the Bill in its present form adequately protects all of the positions which have been the subject of discussion among the governments of the British Commonwealth from time to time.

I have etc.

Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in Great Britain

Ottawa, October 18, 1945

Dear Norman [Robertson] —

You will have seen the telegrams between Canada House and External Affairs concerning the draft Citizenship Bill indicating that there is some likelihood of the United Kingdom authorities making some representations on the Bill. The Secretary of State is concerned about the matter as it is planned to introduce the Bill in the House not later than Monday next. There would be no difficulty in meeting suggestions for minor amendments, but it would be most embarrassing to back away from the main principles of the Bill, bearing in mind the speech from the Throne.

Mr. Martin took the matter up with his colleagues in Cabinet and they are of the opinion that they should go ahead in Parliament and put the Bill through, even although there may be reasonably strong opposition from the United Kingdom authorities. They will be prepared to consider amendments designed to make the legislation more workable, but there seems to be no doubt that they will refuse serious consideration to any amendments which would strike at the heart of the principle of the Bill.

It is possible that the United Kingdom officials may be discussing this matter with you and, in that case, you will want to be fully familiar with the position.

The legislative course embodied in the Bill was, in reality, forced on the Canadian Government by the non-cooperative attitude of Downing Street at the 1937 Conference and again in the attempts to work out principles governing responsibility for protection, relief and repatriation in enemy and enemy-occupied countries.

The Bill itself maintains the common status and, in view of the maintenance of minimum standards, it is considered that it would not come within the principles of the undertaking set forth in Conclusion (2) under Nationality in the Imperial Conference Report, 1930.[58] It will be as difficult, or even more difficult, for a person to become a Canadian citizen and, consequently, a British subject than under the existing legislation. On the other hand, we shall more readily revoke the status acquired under Canadian law and it will be easier to lose the status of being a British subject.

We have always felt that it was nobody's business but our own if we choose to impose an additional requirement, e.g., our First Papers procedure as a condition precedent to acquiring the common status in Canada. Further, we have always considered that it is no business but our own if we choose to cut off the status acquired under Canadian law in a shorter period of time than can be done with a similar status acquired under the law of another part of the Commonwealth. Notwithstanding the fact that we have maintained the common status and the standards, we have circulated a summary of the Bill to all Dominions and drafts by airmail from day to day.

Personally, I think that the Bill is a good Bill which should be carried through even if representations are made. It preserves every substantial interest covered by the existing legislative position and maintains the common status. At the same time, it will settle permanently, and on a basis which is fair to all governments concerned, problems such as immigration, deportation, protection, relief and repatriation of Canadian citizens abroad, and similar questions. It will not add a single person to the British charge. At the same time, it accepts complete Canadian responsibility for groups of individuals whom the British have been urging us to accept for at least fifteen years, to my own personal knowledge.

Yours sincerely,

J. E. READ

Mémorandum
Memorandum

[Ottawa,] November 27, 1945

RE: UNITED KINGDOM REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP BILL

1. Mr. Stephen Holmes, the United Kingdom Deputy High Commissioner, called this afternoon, November 27th, to discuss certain points that had been raised by the United Kingdom authorities with regard to the Canadian Citizenship Bill.

2. Mr. Holmes said that the United Kingdom authorities felt that the Canadian Bill, with its new approach to the question of common status, represented an important departure from the principles that had thus far been in application. They referred to the agreements at the Imperial Conferences of 1930 and 1937 with regard to common status and particularly to the recommendations in favour of consultation and agreement prior to any important changes affecting the common status. The United Kingdom authorities were of the opinion that it would be desirable, if at all possible, to have a conference held to consider the proposals in the Canadian bill with a view to considering whether the Canadian requirements could be met through modification in the common definition of status of British subject or whether it might be desirable to have general adoption of the Canadian approach — that is, adoption of the principle of recognition of British status granted in another part of the Commonwealth, even though the definitions for such status might be despaired.

3. With regard to particular points with which the United Kingdom might be concerned, Mr. Holmes said he thought that they contemplated possible difficulty through the fact that under the new bill certain persons would have the status of Canadian citizens (and, as a consequence, the status of British subject) who would not be British subjects according to United Kingdom law, and that, on the other hand, certain persons might lose the status of Canadian citizen or might not have the status of Canadian citizen (and thereby of British subject) who would have such status according to United Kingdom law.

4. With regard to the 1930 and 1937 agreements, Mr. R. G. Robertson said that the view of the committee in considering the legislation here had been that the importance of consultation and agreement was particularly "if any changes are desired in the existing requirements for the common status" (1930 Conference). In preparing the bill the general principle had been to make as few departures as possible from the naturalization requirements and other definitions of status in the existing Naturalization Act. The substantive changes, under the new act, would be comparatively slight. A resumé of the proposals for the new legislation had been sent to the Canadian High Commissioners in the various countries of the Commonwealth on September 27th. No comments, or representations had been received from any of the countries other than the present ones from the United Kingdom.

5. With regard to the United Kingdom suggestion for a conference, Mr. N. A. Robertson said that he felt that there might be some danger in holding a conference on the general principles of the legislation. He pointed out that the bill had received almost unanimous approval in Canada, and that it seemed it was not likely to stir any acrimonious political discussions. However, he felt that if a conference were held to examine the general approach to the common status, it would, in effect, be a Commonwealth constitutional conference which would involve serious possibilities for political argument, and might give rise to unfortunate acrimony in the country, and between the countries of the Commonwealth. He pointed out that the situation of Canada with regard to naturalization is rather different from that of the United Kingdom. It is an "immigration country" and it had become clear that it was necessary to go further in impressing upon people entering Canada the fact that they were acquiring a particular national status in this country. This had increased importance in view of the separatist forces in Canada, and in view, also, of the fact that it lay alongside the United States. He also pointed out that in the past it had normally proved rather difficult to secure adequate progress in changes in nationality legislation through Commonwealth discussions. With regard to the Canadian approach he thought that the decisions, in principle, had been taken, and that the government would not be likely to retreat from it. Experience during the war had re-affirmed the necessity for a delineation of responsibility for particular British subjects, as between the countries of the Commonwealth. Moreover, Ireland and South Africa had also felt their desires to introduce their own nationality legislation. It seemed, therefore, that the Canadian decisions were in line with general development and with the needs as shown by experience.

In summing up the situation as he saw it, Mr. Robertson said that he felt it would be unfortunate to hold a conference; that it might give rise to acrimony, and that it would be particularly unfortunate to hold such a conference without knowing in advance what the result was likely to be, or with the expectation that it would only end in a difference of opinion and the failure to reach agreement. He thought that it would be much more preferable simply to have an exchange of views with regard to particular provisions and points of detail in the Canadian bill that might give rise to difficulty for other countries of the Commonwealth. This, he thought, might be profitable and might inevitably lead to some modification in details of the Canadian provisions.

6. Mr. Holmes said that he would submit the United Kingdom representations in writing for confirmation, and that he would report what Mr. N. A. Robertson had said, for consideration by the United Kingdom authorities.

Le haut commissaire adjoint de Grande-Bretagne au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Deputy High Commissioner of Great Britain to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, December 29, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson,

In my letter of the 29th November[59] I explained that the United Kingdom authorities were very anxious that, if possible, arrangements should be made for a conference of experts representing the various members of the British Commonwealth to discuss the position created in regard to the common status of British subjects by the Canadian Bill on Citizenship and Nationality.

The United Kingdom authorities much hope that this proposal may be acceptable to the Canadian authorities and would be grateful if the following rather more detailed statement of the position as they see it could be taken into account.

As I explained in my previous letter, the view taken in the United Kingdom is that the Bill introduces a wholly new system for determining who are British subjects and that it involves a fundamental change from the present system as agreed by successive Imperial Conferences for the purpose of maintaining the common status of British subjects throughout the Commonwealth. Hitherto each member of the Commonwealth, apart from minor differences, has had an enactment corresponding to those passed by the other members, and the principle has been observed that no member will seek to confer the common status on any class of persons without consultation and agreement with the other members. At the same time the fullest recognition has been given at Imperial Conferences to the principle that it rests with each member of the Commonwealth to determine what persons are its own citizens or nationals.

The United Kingdom authorities appreciate the advantages that might be gained by abandoning the present system and adopting the system underlying the Canadian Bill under which

(a) each member of the Commonwealth would enact legislation determining who are its citizens, such legislation being based on a definition which (as in the Canadian Bill) would correspond, broadly speaking, with the definition of British subjects in the present common code now in force throughout the Commonwealth and

(b) each member would then provide (as in the Canadian Bill) that such citizens shall be British subjects and that it will recognize as British subjects persons who are British subjects under the law of any other member of the Commonwealth.

[59]Non trouvé./Not located.

This fundamental change, if accepted generally throughout the Commonwealth, would remove a certain inconvenient rigidity in the present system and obviate delays which have been caused by the need for consultation and agreement regarding any proposed amendment of the common code. Thus the new system, though broadly based upon the main general principle at present governing the common status, would allow differences in detail between the respective citizenship laws of the members of the Commonwealth.

The adoption of the proposed Canadian system, however, would be a new and very important step, not only for the United Kingdom, but also for other members of the Commonwealth. It would become necessary to define United Kingdom citizens and to include in the definition persons belonging to the Colonies; this in itself is likely to be a somewhat difficult task.

Having regard to all these circumstances, the Government of the United Kingdom consider it important that there should be complete understanding between the members of the Commonwealth as to what the new system involves and how it would work. This, it is thought, is essential and the main purpose of the proposed conference would be to consider the general question of the principle involved in the alteration of the present legal basis of the common status. It is felt that however desirable this might be, such a step ought not to be taken by any member of the Commonwealth without general consultation with the other members. Further, as divergence in the respective citizenship laws of members of the Commonwealth would be a feature of the new system, there would be no need to reach agreement on any uniform lines as respects these citizenship laws. Moreover, the proposed conference would enable representatives to inform each other of the points of practical difficulty which have arisen in the past under the existing legislation relating to British nationality, and an exchange of experience and information in this way would be helpful to the members of the Commonwealth in framing their citizenship laws if the new system should be adopted.

Thus in the view of the United Kingdom authorities the Canadian Bill has created a new position which cannot well be left to look after itself and considerable confusion, they feel, is likely to arise if no attempt is made on the above lines to work out at a conference a plan which might make the new system an acceptable and practicable alteration to the present system. It is accordingly greatly hoped that the Canadian authorities will agree to the suggestion that the whole matter should form the subject of discussion before the next stage is reached as regards the Canadian Bill.

Yours sincerely,

STEPHEN HOLMES

Exports of cyanide to Australia.

It has been brought to the attention of the Canadian authorities that the Director of Import Procurement of the Government of Australia has refused to issue import permits for cyanide from Canada.

The result has been to halt the movement of a commodity which not only has been supplied to Australia from Canada during the war years but which forms part of the historic prewar trade between the two countries.

Will you please ask the Australian authorities to reconsider their action? If there are considerations involved of which we are unaware, the Canadian Government would welcome full discussion of them. It is the desire of the Canadian Government to approach any problems which arise in connection with trade between Canada and Australia in a spirit of facilitating expansion rather than in a spirit of enforcing contraction. In any case, if the situation should be such, notwithstanding this attitude, that some contraction in specific lines is unavoidable, the Canadian Government requests it should form the subject of discussion between the governments concerned before any action is taken.

SECRET. Your telegram No. 276 of October 13th, export of cyanide to Australia. Mr. Palmer, our Trade Commissioner in Melbourne, is familiar with the cyanide situation and I requested him to endeavour to contact Arthur Moore, Director of Division of Import Procurement, and Senator Keane, Minister for Trade and Customs, regarding importation from Canada before they left the United States (my telegram No. 383 of October 3rd).† They sailed on October 21st and Mr. Palmer unfortunately was unable to arrange an interview. Palmer is of the opinion that importation of cyanide is not so much a matter of exchange, at the moment, as of shipping space, whether from the United Kingdom or North America. Position is being reviewed by interested parties this week. Palmer is now more confident that import licences for Canada may be granted.

I did not request Palmer to take up question of principle stated in final paragraph of your telegram as it appears to be a matter of high policy with which I should normally deal.

I would like to make two observations:

(1) That general question arises out of specific case of refusing to issue import permits for cyanide from Canada, which Palmer now thinks may be changed;

(2) A discussion of trade relations between Canada and Australia might perhaps be better delayed until Senator Keane and Mr. Moore visit Ottawa some time in December.

I could, if necessary, discuss the question with Comptroller General of Customs, Mr. Kennedy, who is senior to Moore in the Department of Trade and Customs, but am reluctant to do so as Moore on return might remain in charge of import licensing. There appears to be a clash of personalities which must be handled carefully.

Please advise.

SECRET. Everything indicates a growing pressure to divert to United Kingdom purchases which Australia would ordinarily make in Canadian market. Reason given is shortage of Canadian dollars. When this country requires Canadian funds in excess of what they can procure themselves in the ordinary way, then application is made to British pool for Canadian dollars. Pool then suggests purchases be made in Britain to avoid need for Canadian dollars and only when goods are not available in British market will pool consider providing Canadian funds. As Senator Keane, Arthur Moore and Fred Palmer are all in Canada, I would suggest that the whole problem should be discussed with them.

NOTE ON DISCUSSION WITH AUSTRALIAN REPRESENTATIVES CONCERNING MUTUAL AID IN DR. CLARK'S OFFICE, DECEMBER 29, 1944

Those present at this meeting included Dr. Clark (in the chair), Mr. Moore, Director of Imports Procurement, of Australia, Mr. Dunk, of the Australian Treasury, Mr. Harry, Australian High Commissioner's Office, Mr. Woodley, of Australia, Mr. Chipchase of Australian War Supplies Procurement, Mr. Karl Fraser,[60] Mr. Oliver Master, Mr. S. MacKay-Smith,[61] Mr. English,[62] Mr. Palmer, Canadian Trade Commissioner in Australia, Mr. Angus, Mr. Pierce, and Mr. Bryce.

The next main subject discussed was Australia's commercial policy in purchasing from Canada and from the sterling area. Mr. Moore said definitely that their wartime policy had been to buy from a sterling area source rather than from a dollar source, wherever that was possible. This policy originated early in the war, when they had to consider hard, medium and soft currencies and the relative scarcity of them. He stated, however, that in fact this policy did not have the restrictive effects on trade with Canada which might be expected, because of practical difficulties outweighing this policy and in particular because sterling area sources often could not supply within the time the item that was required. It was stated that Australia had to live within its allocation of dollars. I subsequently raised the question of whether or not there was any formal allocation of dollars, and Mr. Dunk and Mr. Moore both indicated there was not, but that it was, rather, a general understanding that dollars would be conserved by import control. There was some discussion between Mr. Dunk and Mr. Moore over this application of import policy, and Dunk appeared to feel it was more effective and more necessary for exchange reasons than Moore suggested. The gist of the discussion appeared to be, however, that there was as yet little actual disadvantage to Canada arising from this policy of favouring sterling area sources of supply, because there was very little competition at present in making supplies available. It was bought out that Australia felt it was necessary to conserve the sterling area's supply of dollars for the post-war period.

Mr. Moore stated that Australia would modify her policy of buying from the sterling area in preference to buying from Canada in those cases where the circumstances were such that this policy was proving embarrassing to Canada. Mr. Moore gave this assurance on a number of occasions during the discussion, and in several forms, in some of which, at least, he qualified it by indicating that it would apply "on minor items at least" or "unless very large sums were involved." He asked to be informed of any items where this policy was embarrassing to Canada, and said that he would be prepared to consider them immediately. During the discussion it was brought out that only one or two items had actually existed where this policy had caused embarrassment in Canada. The outstanding case had been cyanide, but in that instance import permits had been granted after representations made by Canada. During the discussion it was indicated that the United Kingdom since early in the war had been urging Australia to apply this policy of conserving dollar exchange by buying wherever possible within the sterling area.

Dr. Clark inquired why Australia felt this policy was necessary if Canada was prepared to provide Mutual Aid to the extent of the Australian deficit in trade with Canada. He noted that this had been the objective of Canadian Mutual Aid policy, although he could not yet say that it would be possible to follow it next year. This matter was discussed for a time, although there appeared to be some misunderstanding, particularly in view of the difficulties that existed in providing to Australia as Mutual Aid goods equal in value to the amount of her deficit with Canada. These difficulties have arisen because of the nature of Australian requirements and the difficulty of bringing them within the classes of goods and transactions considered eligible for Mutual Aid. In the course of this discussion, it was indicated that Australia's probable receipts of Canadian dollars this year are expected to amount in all to about $17 million. (This figure appears high, although it was not challenged at the time. The Australian forecast, dated 9th September, for the current fiscal year is $14 million, and the estimated receipts in the first half of the year, which is normally the larger half, amount to $7.2 million.)

High Commissioner in Australia
to Secretary of State for External Affairs

DESPATCH 270 Canberra, June 4, 1945

Sir:

When I came to Australia at the end of 1942 I found Canada's stock in this country was at a rather low ebb. The Australian Government and press had been disappointed that, when this country was seriously menaced with invasion for the first time in its history, Canada, a sister Dominion, enjoying relative security, failed to send even a token force to assist in defence. The fact that Canada had been committed to the war in Europe for two years and that our whole effort was directed that way, failed to weigh heavily during the near panic that prevailed when Japanese troops rested on Australia's doorstep. When help did come, it came from the United States, and many Australians to this day feel badly that the British Commonwealth as a whole was not able to send assistance and the main burden of support fell on a non-British Commonwealth country. Australians recognized that Canada was doing an important job in Europe, but to them, the Pacific War naturally loomed larger than that being fought thousands of miles away. Thanks to the splendid feats of the Canadian forces in Europe and due partly also to energetic information activity, Australia's resentment against Canada had faded pretty well by the time the war in Europe had ended. Generally there was satisfaction in the public mind that Canada could not have adopted any other course than that which she did pursue.

2. Now that the war in Europe is over, Australians again are giving consideration to Canada's position in relation to the war against Japan. What we do in this war is associated here in the public mind as being aid to Australia in her fight against Japan, rather than as Canada's direct contribution to the Pacific War on her own behalf. I am afraid there is nothing we can do here to alter this line of thought which has been bred from conditions which prevailed after Pearl Harbour, when Canada was criticised for failing to come to the aid of a sorely pressed sister Dominion.

3. I fear that there is danger of a strong feeling against Canada being re-born in Australia unless we are able to convince Australians that Canada is making an adequate contribution to the War in the Pacific. First hints of this feeling are being seen in Australian press despatches from abroad concerning Canada's plans for rapid demobilization and the lifting of war controls. These press messages emphasize an alleged drift by Canada away from war conditions rather than stressing the contribution Canada intends to make to the Pacific War. It is most unfortunate that the stress is in this order instead of in the reverse. An example was the announcement in today's paper of plans for the reduction in the manpower of the Canadian Air Force from 160,000 to 100,000, the emphasis upon the reduction in strength, rather than on the fact that Canada plans to maintain a large air force for the war against Japan.

4. To explain fully the Australian background please let me review a few facts. Canada and Australia entered the war within a few days of one another. Our forces went to England en route to France. Australian forces went to the Middle East. For a long time the Canadians did not see action in large numbers. During that period the Australians were fighting gallantly in North Africa, Greece, Crete, Syria, etc. Then came Pearl Harbour and the Japanese onrush towards Australia. Australian forces were withdrawn from the European theatre and bore the brunt of land warfare against Japan in New Guinea, while American forces were built up in Australia. Then the Americans undertook the larger share of the campaign. Meantime, Australia had mobilized and put into uniform more men in proportion to population than practically any other nation. The Australian Government apparently feels that sometime these forces will be needed and they have been maintained with consequent hardship to Australia as a result of manpower and supply shortages. For the last year the Australian forces have had little to do, but they are being maintained with little reduction in strength. The point I wish to make is that Australia has been fully mobilized for nearly six years now, and for most of this period the country has suffered hardships more pressing than those suffered by Canada at any stage of the war. The end of the war in Europe of necessity brings relief to the countries fighting mainly in that theatre. It would be an impossibility to use all our forces in Europe against Japan. There must as a consequence be partial demobilization and a partial conversion of war industry to civilian purposes in the Allied countries concerned. Canada is one of the fortunate nations in this category. Australia on the other hand feels it cannot permit large-scale demobilization or a sweeping release of war controls until Japan is defeated.

5. It is inevitable that comparisons should be made between what Canada is doing in these fields and what Australia is doing. Remember that Australians are able to point out that Canada is a Pacific country and is as much interested in the defeat of Japan as is Australia. Thus, it is almost inevitable that Canada will be criticized in regard to her war effort in the Pacific if she shifts from full mobilization while Australia maintains that status. Although much goodwill toward Canada has developed in Australia in recent times, Australians are bound to feel that we are not doing our share in the Pacific, unless they are informed fully on conditions, circumstances and facts. Underlying Australia's attitude towards Canada is a strong feeling that Canada is not interested deeply in the Pacific and Australians are able to advance many persuasive arguments to this effect. Intelligent Australians feel that the future of the world is seriously connected with developments in the Pacific and they would like to see Canada, as a sister Dominion, indicating greater interest in Pacific affairs.

6. It seems to me to be most important that Australia should be convinced that Canada is playing an adequate role in the Pacific. It should be remembered that Australia is the seat of administration for the Netherlands East Indies and N.E.I. authorities in Australia naturally are influenced by information circulated within Australia. Therefore the governing authorities for this important part of the Pacific are concentrated here and are anxious to receive information about Canada's plans for the Pacific. If Canada intends to play an important role in the Pacific in future much good ground work can be laid within Australia.

7. When Canadian forces are sent out to the Pacific, their progress should be publicized as much as possible. If Canada is to have sixty ships associated with the British Navy as has been announced, efforts should be made to have Naval censorship in Australian ports relaxed. The Royal Navy has built up a large publicity organization within Australia and I am told that the Royal Navy is being much more free with information on its activities in Australia than it was at home. Our Air Force will, I expect, be based in India, Ceylon, Burma, etc. All these countries are far removed from Australia but we should none the less try to get as much publicity as possible within Australia about its size, location and activities. Presumably our main Army forces also will be far removed from Australia. Again we should publicize it here as much as possible. After the invasion of Europe, Australian papers published large numbers of pictures issued by the Canadian Army and circulated by this Office. A regular supply of army pictures should be maintained.

8. Since it appears that the main army and air forces will be considerably removed from Australia, it is going to be difficult to make Australians realize that Canada is in the Pacific in strength. We will do our best at this end. We will require active assistance of the Public relations men of the three services, who will find us always anxious to help and advise them in any way possible. In this connection, we are hopeful that Col. R. S. Malone, the Director of Army Public Relations will be able to visit Australia in the near future. I hope to see The Canadian Press well represented in the Pacific, so that Canadian stories may be picked up by Australian agencies abroad and be published here, as was done during the war in Europe.

9. Here are some suggestions which I would like to have considered in Ottawa for maintaining Canadian prestige in Australia:

(a) A leading Cabinet Minister, possibly the Prime Minister, the Minister for National Defence, or the Minister for Air, or Navy, should come to Australia and should speak freely here. Since the outbreak of war, no leading Canadian political figure has come to Australia, whereas most of the leading Australians have visited Ottawa.

(b) High ranking officers of the Canadian forces should come to Australia. I am hopeful this will occur in due course as a routine development.

(c) Leading Canadian scientists, particularly in the field of wartime agriculture, should come here. I could arrange for invitations to be extended.

(d) Better and freer air facilities for Canadians should be arranged via the RAFTC[63] between Montreal and Sydney. If the problem of air transport were simplified, it would be easy for important Canadians to come to Australia for short periods. Excellent work has been done for Canada since my arrival by the visits of the Canadian Press and Parliamentary Delegations and an outstanding goodwill job has been done by Sir Ernest MacMillan.[64] Australians are very hospitable people and due geographically to their isolation, they extend warm welcomes to distinguished visitors. We have built up effective facilities for introducing Canadian visitors to the Australian public.

(e) A Canadian photographer should be located in Australia without further delay, so that the members of the Canadian forces already in Australia could be publicized pictorially. We have had considerable successes already in this direction but have been sorely handicapped by lack of a photographer. Such a man could be attached to the Military Attaché's Office and could work under direction of the Press Attaché.

(f) More frequent statements on Mutual Aid to Australia should be made in Ottawa. Practically the only publicity on this subject within Australia has emanated from our Office rather than from Ottawa, whereas publicity on United States Lease-lend has emanated almost entirely from Washington.

10. Finally, I feel there should be more public statements by leading Canadians about Canada's interest in the Pacific. At present Canada's name is rarely mentioned among those countries rated as Pacific powers. When statements on Pacific policy are made in Ottawa, action should be taken by the Wartime Information Board to have them transmitted, if possible, by Australian Associated Press from New York. We can issue them here but more effective coverage is given by the papers if they are cabled from New York.

11. May I conclude by reporting my strong feeling that Canada may have to recover a lot of ground in Australia in the next twenty years unless something is done at this time.

I have etc.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] February 18, 1944

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

On January 12th I sent you a note† about the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission. The United Kingdom Government had enquired whether Canada would like to be invited to be represented at the first of a proposed series of West Indian conferences dealing with aspects of social and economic problems of the West Indies. The other government departments whom we consulted about this invitation were inclined to favour acceptance. I felt that though our economic interest in the West Indies market was important, full participation in the Conference might be construed as evidence of a livelier and more positive interest in West Indian problems than the Government was likely to wish to show.[65]

We have now had a further letter from the United Kingdom High Commissioner,† assuming, I think correctly from the fact that we did not answer the first enquiry,† that Canada did not wish to participate as a partner member in the West Indian Conference, and enquiring whether in the circumstances we would like to be represented by an observer who could report on aspects of the proceedings of the Conference likely to be of interest to this country. I think this is a more reasonable proposition, and if you approve,[66] would recommend that one of the Canadian Trade Commissioners stationed in the West Indies be authorized to attend as an observer on behalf of the Government of Canada, the Conference to be held in the Barbados in the second half of March.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa,] June 14, 1944

MINUTES OF AN INTERDEPARTMENTAL DISCUSSION ON CANADIAN POLICY WITH REGARD TO THE ANGLO-AMERICAN CARIBBEAN COMMISSION AND THE FUTURE OF WEST INDIAN TRADE, HELD IN ROOM 123, EAST BLOCK, AT 11:30 A.M. ON WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14

Present:

Mr. H. L. Keenleyside (Chairman)

Barton (Agriculture)
Bawden (Canadian Shipping Board)
Cheney (Trade & Commerce)
Hodgins (Agriculture)
Jobbins (Wartime Prices and Trade Board)

Wrong (External Affairs)

Mr. G. A. Newman, who attended the first West Indian Conference held under the auspices of the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission, commented briefly upon the Conference Report† which had previously been circulated to the departments. In his opinion the Conference was regarded in United States circles, especially by the United States Co-Chairman of the Conference, Mr. Taussig, as a means for promoting trade in the Caribbean region mainly for the benefit of Puerto Rico, which was becoming more industrialized. For that reason, in spite of an agenda of a wider character, the prospects for inter-island trade were kept constantly in the foreground. It was planned to convene a second conference in a year's time in Puerto Rico at which the chief topics would be trade and transportation. Mr. Newman felt that Canadian trade in the West Indies might suffer from the emphasis on inter-island trade. He believed that Canada should attain membership in the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission as a means of influencing policy at the top level, offsetting the drive for American trade and keeping Canada well in the foreground in the eyes of the British West Indians. He felt that such membership should be secured before the next conference meeting in Puerto Rico.

Other speakers expressed skepticism as to the importance of the work done by the Commission and shared Mr. Newman's doubt as to the motives of the United States Co-Chairman. It was pointed out that there were political implications to membership in the Commission which need careful study. In view of the anomalous position of Canada as a non-colonial power participating in the Caribbean area on equal terms with such colonial powers as the United Kingdom and the United States, it was suggested that membership in the Commission might be held in abeyance until the role of the Commission had been clarified and until it was more clearly understood whether such a Commission would be used effectively in the postwar world for humanitarian and social purposes.

The meeting also discussed at some length trade alignments in the Caribbean region as affected by the United States tariff policy and by the respective preferences extended by the United Kingdom and Canada. The fact that Canada gave a preference of approximately 90(per one hundred pounds of West Indian sugar had been of enormous importance to the West Indies. Their business men were disturbed at the prospect of this preference being lost through postwar re-adjustments of existing tariff policies. It was pointed out that although Canada had given notice of terminating the Canada-West Indian Agreement[67] on the eve of the war, this notice was not to take effect until the termination of the war and in the meantime British West Indian sugar had been guaranteed a Canadian market until 1946. Other speakers commented that the Canadian trade had also considerably expanded in the West Indies during the war and that there were now approximately one thousand firms interested in the West Indian market.

Mr. Robertson suggested that Canadian observers at the coming conference of West Indian Chambers of Commerce should avoid the appearance of expressing official views on Canadian economic policy and should not offer any forecast as to the nature of a revised Canada-West Indian Agreement. It was agreed that in the near future a small Committee should be set up to examine statistical data upon the economic relations of Canada to the West Indies and to draft a report upon policy for submission to the government.

The meeting then adjourned at 12:45 p.m.

Two memoranda† were tabled at the meeting; one, prepared in the Department of Trade and Commerce, discusses Canadian trade with the British West Indies, its value to Canada and its costs, in lost sugar revenue, in shipping expenditures and the possibility of some hidden costs such as the loss of trade in the other West Indies, in fish, for example, consequent on the preference accorded to the B.W.I.; the second prepared by the Canadian Shipping Board, deals with the cost of shipping services between Canada and the B.W.I. and suggests some changes in the shipping services to the B.W.I.

MR. FRASER stated that since the Treaty was made in 1926,[68] Canada had lost some ground, in flour to Australia, in butter to New Zealand, in fish to Newfoundland, in condensed milk to the U.K. The war had inflated Canadian trade with the B.W.I. who now had an adverse balance with Canada; pre-war trade balanced more evenly so that the B.W.I. obtained from their sales to Canada the necessary Canadian dollars to pay for their purchases. It was likely that some of the increase in trade with Canada would be maintained, as colonial administration and economic developments in the islands both fostered an increase in the standard of living there. The agreement runs from year to year, subject to six months' notice. As conditions have changed, some revision is desirable, Mr. Fraser thought that the W.I. are pleased with the Agreement and wish to renew it in the present form substantially; however, it is important that some indication of Canadian policy be given to the W.I. at an early date.

MR. MAJOR pointed to the developing strength of U.S. competition — as indicated in the activities of the U.S. section of the Anglo-Caribbean Commission. Canada has taken over some of the U.K. trade with the Islands during the war; Canadian products are better known now in the Islands and a large number of firms have become interested in the trade. The Agreement is vital to the maintenance of this Canadian trade.

MR. TEAKLE stressed the close relationship of shipping services and preferences: he favoured renewing the agreement, but with a number of changes, in shipping schedules, in the rates between different ports; a closer link between trade and the flag; increases in W.I. contribution to the shipping services and some guarantees of the shipping trade, particularly in bananas.

MR. CALLAGHAN indicated that the agreement was obsolete in its present terms and would have to be revamped if a new one was contemplated. On very few items is the normal British preference exceeded.

MR. MACKINTOSH dealt with the wider aspects of the commercial policy which is now under discussion and indicated the difficulty of tight agreements in the light of this policy.

IT WAS AGREED that it was important to go over the agreement in detail, to see the changes which should be proposed in the commodities and rates in negotiations with the Islands, even though it is not as yet possible to decide what overall commercial policy considerations should be assumed as a basis for these negotiations. The Department of External Affairs undertook to approach the interested departments with a view to the formation of a committee to do this work.

Rapport du Comité interministériel
Report by Interdepartmental Committee

Ottawa, May 1945

A Study of All Articles
Pertaining to Exports to the British West Indies and Subsidized Steamship Services

REVISION OF CANADA-BRITISH WEST INDIES AGREEMENT, 1925

The terms of reference of the Interdepartmental Committee on the Canada-British West Indies Trade Agreement, 1925, read as follows:

"To study the present treaty item by item with a view to recommending changes in it, this Committee to work on the assumption it may have to be revised in the light of general commercial policy, that this treaty be replaced by one of a similar nature."

Resulting from the first meeting of the Committee, the Commercial Relations Division of the Department of Trade and Commerce undertook to report on all articles pertaining to exports and dealing with preferences on Canadian exports to the British West Indies. It was also agreed that, in collaboration with the Steamship Subsidies Division, the Commercial Relations Division would report upon Articles IX-XVIII under Part II of the Agreement dealing with steamship services from Canada to the British West Indies.

Study Dealing with Preferences on Canadian Exports to the British West Indies

There are 17 separate tariff schedules in the British West Indies, all of the islands included in the Agreement having their own schedules which are not always related to each other. This, therefore, meant that individual commodities had to be dealt with island by island and studied, not only with regard to the 1925 agreement, but also keeping in mind commitments under the Canada-United Kingdom and the United Kingdom-United States Trade Agreements.[69]

Following considerable detailed work by the Commercial Relations Division, a Trade and Commerce informal committee was established consisting of these officials:

Douglas Cole,	Acting Director, Commercial Relations Division,	CHAIRMAN
C. M. Croft	Director, Commercial Intelligence Service,
G. D. Mallory,	Chief, Metals and Chemicals Division,
T. G. Major,	Chief, Foods Division,
J. H. English,	Director, Export Planning Division,
F. E. Bawden,	Director, Steamship Subsidies Division,
G. C. Cooper,	Acting Chief, Foreign Tariffs Division,
D. R. Annett,	Commercial Relations Division,	SECRETARY.

This Committee, which included leading officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce directly concerned with Canadian relations with the British West Indies, was given the opportunity of considering item by item the various suggested revisions for the individual islands. The Committee proved exceedingly useful for the reason that during the present war, Canadian exports to the British West Indies have increased very materially under wartime allocations, and this provided the opportunity for the Commodity Chiefs to make suggestions respecting wartime trade which might have an opportunity of continuing in the postwar period. It likewise gave an opportunity for a final consideration as to the treatment of innumerable commodities in a new agreement. In addition, the heads of the Commodity Divisions, as well as Mr. Bates of the Department of Fisheries, were consulted with regard to individual items of controversial nature and we are satisfied that the revisions as contained in the attached report† indicate to a reasonably accurate degree the views of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Also incorporated in the suggested revisions are the views of the Canadian Trade Commissioners to Trinidad and Jamaica.

Taking into account the above advisory and detailed notes, revised articles† covering all phases of Canadian exports to the British West Indies were prepared and are attached to this report.

Steamship Services

Following consultations between Messrs. Cole and Bawden, Mr. R. B. Teakle of the Canadian National Steamships, Montreal, was consulted in respect to the steamship provisions of the Agreement and his opinion was asked on the major changes. Following his reply, independent revised articles were drawn up by the Commercial Relations Division and the Trade Routes and Steamship Subsidies Division, from which final drafts were prepared after further consultation with Mr. Teakle. The resulting suggested alterations† are enclosed with this report.

In view of Mr. Chester Payne[70] having been secretary of the 1925 Canadian delegation, he was interviewed with regard to certain articles in the Agreement. Purely as a guide to future Canadian negotiators and not as a criticism of those who participated in early trade agreements, Mr. Payne kindly volunteered the following confidential information relating to the three successive treaties with the British West Indies.

"Tariff Relations Prior to 1912

"In 1892 Sir George Foster, as Minister of Finance, visited British West Indies with a view to facilitating reciprocal trade. There is no available record of the negotiations and nothing definite developed until 1897 when, after the British Preferential tariff came into effect in Canada, the benefits of that tariff were extended in the following year to the British West Indies.

"In 1908 it was decided that the matter should be placed before the Imperial authorities, who provided for a Conference in 1909, and the result of that Conference was the endorsation of the principle that reciprocal trade should be arranged between Canada and the British West Indian Colonies who desired to enter into such an agreement. It was not until three years later that this arrangement was effected.

"Conference of 1912

"Sir George Foster was almost entirely responsible for the calling of this Conference and insofar as Canada was concerned, it was a single handed effort. The Canadian delegates were, in addition to Sir George, Hon. J. W. Reid, Minister of Customs, and Sir Thomas White, Minister of Finance. The deliberations took place concurrently with the session of Parliament, with the result that during most of the sittings Sir George Foster carried the burden.

"The West Indian Colonies represented were Trinidad, British Guiana, Barbados, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Antigua, St. Kitts, Dominica and Montserrat. By the trade agreement which followed, Canada obtained preferential rates of four-fifths of the General tariff on exports to the British West Indies in exchange for corresponding reductions on certain West Indian products entering Canada.

"At that time Canada was subsidizing Messrs. Pickford and Black, Halifax, to operate a steamship service to certain West Indian ports. While there was a brief discussion on transportation, the only reference thereto in the agreement was the provision that in all contracts entered into with steamships subsidized by the Dominion, plying between ports in Canada and ports in the Colonies, there should be an effective control of rates of freight.

"Conference of 1920

"The Trade Agreement of 1912 was to run for ten years. The preferences in operation had given such a distinct impetus to trade between Canada and those West Indian Colonies which were signatories to the Agreement, that Sir George Foster, after informal communication with the administrations of all the Colonies and the Colonial Secretary, recommended to the Government that the time was opportune for another conference looking to the inclusion of all the West Indian Colonies.

"The first object, of course, was to obtain the greatest benefit through new reciprocal arrangements, but of primary importance was the question of transport and cable communications. In 1913 the Canadian Government subsidized the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company under a five year contract and this was continued for varying periods. The service, however, was not adequate, in that the vessels were old and slow and only served the Eastern group, that is, Bermuda down to British Guiana.

"The Canadian delegation to the Conference of 1920 comprised Sir George Foster, Chairman of the Conference, Sir Henry Drayton, Minister of Finance, Hon. M. Burrell, Minister of Customs, and Hon. H. H. Ballantyne, Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Every West Indian Colony was represented for the first time.

"The outcome was a second agreement, broader both as to the extent of preferences exchanged and the number of West Indian signatories and as to the most important development, the promise of Canada to arrange for a mail, passenger and freight steamship service, sailing weekly to the Islands of the Eastern Group and another service to sail from Canadian ports as freight conditions required to the Bahamas, Jamaica and British Honduras.

"Conference of 1925

"The Trade Agreement of 1920 came into effect on June 1st, 1922, with respect to Jamaica and on September 1st, 1921, insofar as the other Colonies were concerned. Ordinarily it would have continued to run for ten years but it had become imperative that something should be done to settle the question of transportation, both on the Eastern and Western routes, as provided for by the Agreement of 1920. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, under subsidy, had been serving the Eastern Group, and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine the Western Group. Neither service had been satisfactory.

"The Conference of 1925 was called mainly to solve the problem of steamship communication. Jamaican producers of bananas, for instance, were at the mercy of the United Fruit Company and the spread between prices paid to the grower and those paid by the Canadian consumer showed that the profits in the business were going to the middleman in the United States.

"When the fervor attending the consummation of this Agreement had subsided, it soon became apparent that the West Indian delegates had exhibited much greater astuteness than the Canadian representatives insofar as ultimate benefits to be enjoyed by the various participants was concerned. Canada has had a traditional interest in trade with the West Indies, as presenting the most obvious market for Canadian exports, with the exception of that of Great Britain and the United States, and this last treaty was the culmination of successive efforts to improve the trade interchanges.

"The origin of the treaty was, however, possibly more political than economic. Following the War there was a general impression that the United States was casting covetous glances at the West Indian Islands and colour to that view was given by the purchase in 1917 by the United States of the Virgin Islands, or the Danish West Indies, as they were known. It was frequently intimated prior to the Conference of 1920 that unless Canada did something to hold the West Indies in the Empire, they would be lost.

"The West Indian Delegates were impelled by their successes in previous conferences to conclude a treaty and in addition to their natural desire to trade with Canada and the Empire, there was the realization that the expansion of Canadian overseas trade with British and foreign countries, notably Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, South America and Japan, had much reduced their commercial importance to Canada. The Dominion delegates for their part, even with the high cost of implementing the promise of better steamship communications in the Treaty of 1920, were still actuated by the motive of doing everything possible to keep the West Indies within the Empire.

"A rather extraordinary incident occurred during the 1925 sittings. One morning when Mr. Robb, the Chairman, had gone into the corridor for a few minutes' recess he encountered Sir George Foster. He suggested that Sir George's views, though they must be given unofficially, would be of benefit to the Conference. The records were suspended and Sir George spoke for nearly an hour. In one sentence what he really urged was that the Government must not look too closely at the bookkeeping aspect of the proposition but be prepared to make sacrifices such as would be involved in the maintenance of up-to-date steamship services and that Canada as a whole would be behind such a move. There can be no doubt that his views had a marked influence on the deliberations which followed and lessened the tendency on the part of the Canadian delegates to bargain more keenly.

"How West Indies Bested Canada

"As regards the preferences by Canada, there is now no doubt that the West Indian delegates were much the better negotiators. They freely granted increased preferences on commodities for which Canada had already acquired the bulk of the trade and while they might not have opposed, they certainly did not suggest giving preferences on commodities in regard to which the United Kingdom was an important exporter. In the case of Trinidad, for instance, Canada granted special preferences on cocoa, sugar, rum and bitters, which products represented about 50% of her whole export trade. The ratio of privileged export in favour of Trinidad worked out at 3½to 1. As for Jamaica the preferences granted to Canada represented only 15½% of the Dominions' total export trade, and the ratio preferences in favour of Jamaica was nearly 5 to 1. This latter ratio is about the same for the remaining islands.

"As another illustration, take the flour trade, of which Canada held about 90%. The increased preference did not help Canada materially, in that the balance of the trade was in cheaper grades of flour, which the Dominion does not export. This was also true to only a lesser degree as regards Trinidad's import of milk products. Even a better illustration is the preference on boots and shoes granted by the West Indies in a market where four-fifths of the population go barefoot. The truth of these observations can no doubt be verified by a statistical analysis.

"Lack of Preparation on Canada's Part

"There were two reasons why the Canadian delegates did not show to advantage with the West Indian representatives. The first was inadequate preparation. For the first two conferences there was little preliminary preparation other than trade statistics and certainly there was no general invitation given to Canadian exporters to express their views, except possibly the chocolate manufacturers.

"Prior to the 1925 Conference a small committee of departmental officers was formed to assist Sir Herbert Marler in the preparation of Canada's case and considering the nature of his task, he made a most excellent showing. But the dominating factor insofar as Canadian interests were concerned, was Mr. Russell, Commissioner of Tariffs in the Department of Finance, who was concerned chiefly with revenue. The Canadian sugar refiners, of course, were on the alert and made representations but there is no evidence of any representations from individual firms.

"The time of year in which all these conferences were held was also against the Canadian delegates. In every instance the House was in session. During the Conference of 1925 the situation at times was almost hopeless. The session was drawing to an end, an election was in prospect and of the six Ministers and six Members of Parliament who formed the Canadian group, it is doubtful if more than four of [or] five were ever in attendance at one time, while several never attended a single sitting. Furthermore, not only was Mr. Robb, the Chairman, as Minister of Finance, frequently called upon to absent himself, but there were occasions when the entire proceedings had to be interrupted while the Canadian group answered the division bell.

"The personnel of the West Indian delegation was infinitely superior as regards accurate knowledge of all that was involved. Every island was represented primarily by a trained Government official of many years' experience and in several instances by an advisor as well, who was a practical business man. The result was that the West Indian delegates had an expert and intricate knowledge of the points to be considered, whereas Sir Herbert Marler, who was called upon to state the Canadian case, had only departmental officers upon whose advice to rely and had practically no contact with Canadian exporters.

"In that connection it seems inexplicable that our Trade Commissioners in the West Indies were not attached to any of these conferences as advisers, or at least called upon to submit their views as to what Canada should ask for in the way of preferences, as also what to expect the West Indies to ask. In 1925 we were represented in the West Indies by two particularly capable officers, namely, G. R. Stevens in Jamaica and H. R. Poussette, formerly Director of the Commercial Intelligence Service in Trinidad. Both were thoroughly familiar with their territories. These men were on the spot, in daily conversation with the Government officials and business men to represent the British West Indies, and, consequently, knew every angle of the problems involved. Support of this view was afforded during the visit of a delegation from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, which toured the West Indies in 1922. The abolition by Canada of the Dutch standard, a colour test adhered to by the Canadian Government, which keeps out the higher grades of West Indian sugars, has from the first been advocated in the strongest possible way by the West Indies. At a public meeting in Kingston a direct attack on the Canadian Government for maintaining this standard was made by one of the most prominent business men in Jamaica. Mr. Stevens, mentioned above, who was called upon to deal with this criticism, completely routed the West Indian advocate. It might be mentioned that in 1929 the West Indies decided to appoint a Trade Commissioner to represent their interests in Canada and asked the Canadian Government for the loan for three years of a Canadian Trade Commissioner in the West Indies.

"Possibly the main reason, however, for Canada not obtaining wider preferences was that the vital factor in all trade negotiations was ignored, namely, holding back something which could be used for further bargaining. Canada granted so much to the West Indies that she had nothing left to offer. It is only recently that our trade agreements with the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and many foreign countries has made the West Indies realize that unless when the treaty is revised they can hold what they obtained in 1925, they will be in a bad way indeed."

Some Aspects of Canada-British West Indies Trade Relations

Canada has traditionally looked to the many component parts of the British Empire for her export trade and it has been to the interest of Great Britain and Canada alike that there should be no discrimination between different parts of the Empire, owing to the very serious effect which would result in the Commonwealth.

Therefore, Canada, in common with Great Britain, has had a real interest in maintaining the principle of non-discrimination between countries in the British Commonwealth, even though in the case of certain commodities it would have been to Canada's advantage to have lower duties in certain Empire markets than other Empire sources of supply.

An examination of pre-war trade between Canada, the West Indies and Newfoundland in recent pre-war years indicates the very considerable degree to which the triangulation of trade was complementary with the exception of one commodity — codfish.

An examination of the value of trade for the years 1936 to 1938 clearly shows a clockwise movement of trade insofar as balance of exports over imports is concerned. Thus, Canada averaged over $8,000,000 of exports per annum to Newfoundland as against $2,200,000 of imports. Similarly, Newfoundland exported to the British West Indies an average of $860,000 as against imports of $220,000 and the final portion of the triangle is indicated by exports of $17,000,000 per annum from the British West Indies to Canada, as compared with $12,000,000 of imports into the British West Indies from Canada.

The Canada-British West Indies, 1925, Agreement was fairly satisfactory, but the Maritime Provinces have always felt that by transferring Canada's imports of raw sugar from Cuba and San Domingo to Empire sources, important markets for Maritime fish and potatoes were lost. It can be shown that during the five fiscal years immediately preceding the granting of sugar preferences, i.e. 1922-1926 inclusive, Canada imported 36 per cent of her raw sugar from Empire and 64 per cent from non-Empire countries. This ratio was more than reversed during the next twelve years to 84 from Empire and 16 per cent from non-Empire countries. In fact, during the last three years before the war the Empire proportion rose to such a point that non-Empire produced sugar was almost excluded.

The Maritime Provinces, therefore, feel that the increase in Empire preferences had the effect of transferring Canada's sugar purchases from relatively low-cost producing areas to high-cost producing areas; there was a result of heavy loss in national revenue to Canada and one of the net results was a considerable loss of exports of Canadian fish and potatoes and even some flour from the Agreement.

The cost of Canada's trade with the West Indies has been considerable in terms of steamship deficits and loss of Government revenue on sugar. It may be unfair to balance Canadian exports to the British West Indies against costs of steamship subsidies and lost sugar revenues, but it should be pointed out that against the value of total Canadian exports to the West Indies in 1939 of $15,000,000, there was contracted a Canadian National Steamship deficit of $324,000 plus an approximate loss in revenue on sugar of $8,495,000.

The following changes might therefore be considered when the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement is in prospect.

1. A modification of the Canadian preference on imports of raw sugar. — It may be naive to hope that by a reduction of the present preference a larger volume of imports of sugar from Cuba and the Dominican Republic might be possible without upsetting the equilibrium of the triangulating Newfoundland-British West Indies-Canadian trade. It is not likely that imports of sugar from these sources would be stimulated without creating Empire quota on raw sugar imports into Canada, for as a rule tariff changes of any magnitude generally result in either no change or complete change of sources of supply.

2. Increased British West Indies and Canadian contribution to cost of steamship services. — It may be impractical to suggest that a portion of the revenues saved from an increase in import duties on sugar might be allocated to subsidize steamship services to the British West Indies, but certainly greater operating deficits may be expected if the rates are to be competitive with corresponding rates from Iceland, Norway and Newfoundland for shipments of fish. One of the complaints of the Maritime Provinces has been that Newfoundland fish has enjoyed lower rates from Halifax to British West Indies, compared with Canadian fish, for the reason that the rates from Newfoundland to British West Indies were quite low, and it was necessary to reduce the rate on Newfoundland fish in order to compete.

It is becoming apparent that Canada will not be able to approach the revision of the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement expecting wider preference margins. In fact some modification of the preference is not unlikely. This means that emphasis will need to be placed on getting Canadian goods to consumers in the West Indies at competitive prices but with less reliance on favorable tariff manipulation.

As a supplier of the British West Indies, Canada has never been in a stronger position than today. Over 1000 firms are shipping to the Colonies at present, most of them for the first time. Conditions must be created which will permit these recent relations with the British West Indies to endure and prosper if Canada is to enjoy a larger share of the trade than that held in prewar years.

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in United States

DESPATCH 950 Ottawa, August 6, 1945

SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that Sydney Caine of the Economic Division of the Colonial Office visited us last week. His discussions with us are summarized below.

2. General Economic Policy toward the West Indies.

Caine said that he had discussed with the U.S. State Department the general question of economic policy toward the West Indies and that the State Department and the Colonial Office were in agreement on the following points,

(a) That the proposal for a regional union of the Caribbean area should be discarded although a customs union of the British West Indies was regarded as feasible.

(b) That a policy of self-sufficiency for the islands was impractical. Caine said that it was his opinion that such a policy would mean that half of the population would starve. It was agreed that a moderate amount of diversification was feasible but that it should be limited to fields in which the islands were not at a competitive disadvantage. The welfare of the islands depended upon world trade and no action should be taken in the islands which would discourage expanding trade.

3. A difference of opinion had arisen between the United States and the United Kingdom as to whether prices and markets for food products should be guaranteed in the islands. The United States was opposed to any such guarantee and the United Kingdom in favour for non-competitive essentials. Caine said that a compromise was reached and it was agreed that any such problem should be dealt with ad hoc.

4. Anglo-American Caribbean Commission.

Caine advised us of the intention to expand the membership of the Commission to four members on each side, two[71] members on each side to be appointed by the islands from residents. This change he expected to be made shortly. Under consideration as a later development is the possibility of expanding the membership of the Commission to include France and the Netherlands. He indicated that there was a seat open on the Commission for Canada, and he was told that we were not yet ready to consider joining. His opinion on the work of the Commission was that it had provided a useful safety-valve through which United States opinion could escape and that it had done good work in dealing with emergency supply problems and cultural development, but he did not hold that it would be of any considerable use in the field of trade and economics.

5. Caine was very pleased with his Washington talks and particularly at the stand taken to moderate the resolutions passed at the last West Indies Conference. We told him that the Canadian view was substantially the same as that now held in Washington and London.

6. Canadian-West Indies Trade Agreement.

Caine said that the British West Indies were anxious to have the Agreement renewed. He shared, however, our view, which was clearly expressed to him, that discussions could not be begun now between Canada and the West Indies while commercial policy discussions between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada had still such a long way to go. He agreed that neither the United Kingdom nor Canada could or would deal with preferences at this time.

7. Caine felt that the Colonial Office would probably not urge a tariff for revenue on necessities as had been done in the last discussions. He felt that the development and use of income tax on the island would permit the Colonial Office to change its views.

8. In the course of his talks Caine said that the State Department had prepared a report on policy toward the Caribbean area which had gone to the President and been approved. I don't know whether this report could be made available to us but, if you could obtain a copy, we would be interested. He mentioned one other report which he said was available and which we would like you to forward to us if you can obtain it — a report of the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission on tourist trade in the West Indies.

CANADA-WEST INDIES STEAMSHIP SERVICE; FUTURE POLICY

3. THE MINISTER OF TRANSPORT raised the question of the re-establishment of the Canadian National Steamship service to the West Indies upon which an early decision was desired.

The service had valuable potentialities in respect of both passenger traffic and general trade between Canada and the Islands. Re-establishment of the service on an adequate basis would require replacement of vessels. It would take at least two years to build the type of vessel required.

The net financial loss of the Company over a sixteen year period of operation would be approximately $3,175,000, if the physical assets were liquidated.

The re-establishment of the service was closely related to the renewal of the trade agreement with the West Indies and the maintenance of imperial preference.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Department of Transport note, August 10, 1945 — Cabinet Document No. 37).†

4. THE CABINET, after discussion, agreed that the question of the re-establishment of Canadian steamship service to the West Indies be referred to the External Trade Advisory Committee for consideration and report, it being understood that, for the occasion, a representative of the Department of Transport be added to the Committee.

SHIPPING POLICY; RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL (WEST INDIES) STEAMSHIPS LIMITED SERVICES

8. THE SECRETARY, referring to the discussion at the meeting of August 23rd, submitted a report, copies of which had been circulated, from the External Trade Advisory Committee.

Three cargo ships were now being constructed by Wartime Shipbuilding Limited to meet the requirements of the West Indies Service. Passenger service, however, could not be restored without additional new construction totalling at least $10 million.

In view of the present situation with respect to policy generally and the future of preferences in particular, the Committee recommended that no steps which would involve purchase of vessels be taken, at this time, to restore the passenger service to the West Indies unless Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited could justify such action on commercial grounds, independent of any trade agreement.

(External Trade Advisory Committee memorandum, Sept. 29, 1945 — Cabinet Document 73).†

9. THE CABINET, after discussion, approved the recommendations contained in the report submitted, it being understood that three cargo vessels at present being constructed by Wartime Shipbuilding Limited would be made available to the Company to meet the requirements in the West Indies trade.

Ottawa, September 20, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I am sending you herewith an aide memoire which was left with Mr. Bryce of this Department yesterday by Mr. Williams of the United Kingdom High Commissioner's office, concerning purchases of agricultural machinery by the Government of Eire. You will note that the purpose of the memorandum is to explain that when the Government of Eire approached the United Kingdom authorities to obtain their approval of certain purchases of agricultural machinery in Canada, the United Kingdom authorities requested them to reduce such purchases and did so primarily in order to save Canadian dollar exchange "in accordance with repeated requests from the Canadian Finance Department that they should eliminate all unnecessary expenditure in Canada."

It is true that we have on a number of occasions suggested to the United Kingdom Treasury that, in view of the very large deficit of Canadian dollars which could not be fully met this year at least by amounts available in the Mutual Aid Appropriation, it was desirable for them to scrutinize very carefully their war orders in Canada in order to squeeze out any possible water in them. I had felt that orders originally placed might have been forgotten when the need for them no longer existed and we have found as you know occasional instances of this sort of thing. So far as I remember I have never suggested cutting down the purchase of non-war goods in Canada, and it is also true that the financial situation has now been considerably improved by the various measures which have been agreed upon with the United Kingdom to assist them in meeting their Canadian dollar deficit.[72]

Nevertheless, I think that British authorities have been sharpening their pencils in order to avoid the necessity of additional borrowing before the end of Stage Two, and increasingly I fear we may find additional illustrations of British attempts to cut down British or sterling area imports from Canada and diversion of purchases to other countries. Some of these may cause political difficulty in Canada and I think we should give some consideration to the adoption of a consistent attitude or policy towards them.

In regard to the particular case in hand, I assume that the supply situation in respect of agricultural implements in Canada is now fairly tight but Canadian producers of agricultural implements may protest the possible permanent loss of the Irish market. I do not know how important our trade interest is in this case or how likely we are to receive repercussions. I would be glad to receive from you any views you may care to express and any suggestions for dealing with the aide mémoire. Perhaps indeed it is External Affairs which should assume the responsibility of making a reply.

PURCHASES OF AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY BY THE GOVERNMENT OF EIRE

In February last Government of Eire asked the United Kingdom to supply certain quantities of agricultural machinery needed in 1944. After due considerations they were informed of the quantities of machinery, amounting to the bulk of their requests, which it was possible to let them have.

2. In screening Eire's requirements the U.K. authorities had assumed that the February demands represented her desires for all sources. Eire has however now informed the United Kingdom that in March last she furnished at the request of the Canadian authorities an estimate of her requirements of agricultural machinery from Canada for the year July, 1944, to June, 1945. No reply is said yet to have been received from the Canadian authorities, but Eire now states that McGee's Stores Ltd., Ardee, have placed an order with the Cockshutt Plow Co., Ontario, for 250 two-furrow tractor ploughs, 50 three-furrow tractor ploughs, 100 disc harrows, 350 binders and 40 4′6 mowers. The Eire High Commissioner in Canada is said to be supporting the application for export licences.

3. The Eire authorities have now been informed through the Canadian Trade Commissioner Dublin that the approval of the U.K. Ministry of Agriculture is required before the Cockshutt Plow Co. can complete the order. They have accordingly approached the Ministry of Agriculture for approval for the release of the machinery on order and "any other quantities which the Canadian Government may later decide to make available."

4. The U.K. authorities are replying to this request expressing some surprise that the February demand was not a complete statement of Eire's requirements from all sources for the year 1944-45 and asking for such a complete statement. Given this information, the U.K. will be able to supply Eire with all the agricultural machinery she can from the U.K. in future without being placed in the embarrassing position of diverting to the U.K. orders already placed in Canada. As regards the request referred to in the preceding paragraph, the Eire authorities are being informed that the U.K. authorities can supply the 100 disc harrows and 40 mowers from the United Kingdom and, that they agree to the diversion to Eire's use of 200 two-furrow tractor ploughs under manufacture in Eire from materials supplied from the U.K. and intend[ed] for export here and that the U.K. will supply materials for the manufacture of the balance of 50 two-furrow tractor ploughs in Eire. As regards the three-furrow ploughs and the binders, which cannot be supplied from the U.K., the Eire authorities are being told that the U.K. authorities are prepared to support the order placed in Canada, provided that it will in no way prejudice orders being placed on behalf of the U.K. for the same period.

5. In taking above line the U.K. authorities are actuated solely by the desire to conserve Canadian dollars in accordance with repeated requests from the Canadian Finance Department that they should eliminate all unnecessary expenditure in Canada. The U.K. authorities feel, however, that their decision may not be very welcome to the Canadian Trade Departments and they are therefore anxious to explain position to Department of Finance so as to forestall any criticism that their motives have been to secure trade advantages for themselves.

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner of Great Britain

No. 57 Ottawa, October 11, 1944

Sir:

Your aide mémoire of September, 1944, concerning the purchase of agricultural implements by Eire, has been passed by the Department of Finance to this Department for consideration and reply after consultation with other interested Departments.

The initiative of the United Kingdom in explaining the action taken by their authorities in this matter is appreciated, because such action in the absence of an explanation might have given rise to misunderstanding and concern on the Canadian side.

The specific case calls for no discussion since the Canadian authorities have recognized that exigencies of war make it desirable that a control be exercised in the U.K. over purchases by Eire of agricultural implements which are still in short supply and entail the use of critical materials in their manufacture and of shipping in their delivery.

We would be concerned, however, if this control were used to divert trade from Canadian exports to U.K. exports of products which had been normal and natural Canadian exports to Eire, with the intention of reducing expenditures of Canadian dollars. This appears to us a use of international controls for a purpose that was not intended. If such controls are to be used for this purpose, there should, it is felt, be an opportunity for consultation with those countries whose exports are to be restricted.

While in discussions the Department of Finance did ask the United Kingdom to review its war programs to eliminate any unnecessary items, financial considerations were not urged in respect of non-war goods which made up our historic trade with the sterling area. The Canadian Government would be disturbed if the U.K. were left with the impression on account of financial difficulties which were experienced during the past fiscal year, but which have since been eased by measures adopted by the Canadian Government, that the Canadian Government were prepared to accept unilateral discrimination against exports from Canada on an exchange ground.

It is the desire of the Canadian Government to approach any problems which arise in connection with trade between Canada and the sterling area, including currency problems, in a spirit of facilitating expansion rather than in a spirit of enforcing contraction. In any case, if the situation should be such, notwithstanding this attitude, that some contraction in specific lines is unavoidable, the Canadian authorities desire that it should form the subject of discussion between the governments concerned before any action is taken.

DESPATCH 1388 Ottawa, November 1, 1944

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir:

The External Trade Advisory Committee, which was recently organized, has endeavoured to make some rough forecast of the post-war pattern of Canada's external trade on which the nature of our post-war economy will largely depend.

2. Our prewar reliance on markets in the sterling area was heavy and some evidence is appearing which suggests that our trade with that area may be in jeopardy. It will be of great assistance to the External Trade Advisory [73]Des dépêches semblables furent envoyées aux hauts commissaires dans les autres pays du Commonwealth.

Identical despatches were sent to the High Commissioners in other Commonwealth countries.

Committee if, after considering the instances which follow, you will inform us of any indications which may have come to your attention.

3. The following instances illustrate diversion of trade from Canada to the sterling area:

(a) The U.K. authorities have advised us that they have refused on financial grounds to authorize the procurement by Eire in Canada of certain specified agricultural implements. The United Kingdom has instead facilitated manufacture in Eire and is supplying some from U.K. production;

(b) The U.K. authorities have indicated to the West Indian authorities the desirability of curtailing dollar expenditures;

(c) The Director of Import Procurement of the Government of Australia stopped the issuance of permits for the import of cyanide from Canada. Canada supplied cyanide to Australia not only during the war years but prewar as well. The stoppage, now in prospect of being lifted, has been attributed both to a dollar shortage and to shipping difficulties.

We are not always able to determine with certainty the cause of the diversion. In some cases we know it to be shortage of Canadian dollars; in others the considerations may be those of shipping or over-supply.

4. While from the British point of view the tendency towards diversion is not unnatural, aware as the British are of their heavy war purchases in Canada and of the limit on Mutual Aid, nevertheless, we cannot accept diversion of trade as inevitably the answer to their difficulties until we have explored every other possibility with them in the hope of finding some arrangement that will meet the legitimate requirements of both countries. We are at a stage where it is difficult to foresee the solution of the problem but it will be most helpful if you can inform us of any evidence of the loss to Canada of trade which we enjoyed in prewar years or of threats to such trade as we might reasonably expect if the currency difficulties were not present. We should distinguish between the diversion of trade and the loss of trade occasioned by the practice of self-denial by countries of the sterling area. While any loss of trade to Canada is unpalatable, we must be sympathetic with any self-imposed policy of denial which a country sees fit to adopt in an endeavour to improve its financial position. In the case of diversion, however, the country forgoes nothing; it merely changes its source of supply. While we cannot hope for assured markets, we must endeavour to safeguard our right of competitive access to Empire markets.

5. We attach copy of telegram No. 276 of October 13th, to the High Commissioner for Canada in Australia,[74] on the subject of cyanide; and of our despatch No. 57 of October 11th, to the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Canada, on the matter of agricultural implements. These may serve as a guide to the attitude which we are adopting until we can obtain, with your assistance, a clearer appreciation of the problem's magnitude, and until we can come closer to solving the fundamental problem of the post-war relationship of the sterling and dollar areas.

DESPATCH A. 661 London, November 17, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge your despatch No. 1388 regarding Canada's post-war export trade.

2. Concerning the diversion of orders from Canada to the sterling area of traditional Canadian exports, no cases similar to the three which you report have come to our attention although they may have occurred. It is assumed that what you have particularly in mind is the replacement of normal Canadian imports into parts of the sterling area, (other than the United Kingdom) by United Kingdom supplies.

3. There has, however, been a development in connection with the supply of Canadian agricultural machinery to Eire which may be noted in view of the observations contained in your letter of October 11th to the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Ottawa. The Trade Commissioner in Dublin reported a short time ago that the prospective Irish importers had also placed an order with a Canadian manufacturer for 15 tons of spare parts but that this order could not be undertaken without the approval of the United Kingdom Authorities. The Dominions Office were approached and in a few hours — without any formal exchange of letters — the necessary authority was granted. The circumstances suggest that the United Kingdom Departments concerned fully appreciate the force of your representations.

4. We have no knowledge of the attitude or practices of countries (other than the United Kingdom) comprised in the sterling group. Presumably these countries follow the same policy as the United Kingdom, i.e., they control imports by a system of licensing, and in its administration experience the same difficulties as the United Kingdom in relation to dollar transactions. To what extent the policies of the different components of the sterling area are deliberately concerted, if at all, is not known to this office.

5. With regard to example (c) it is probable that the decision to stop Australian imports of cyanide from Canada was made by the Commonwealth and not at the instigation of the United Kingdom Government. The reason for the Australian authorities' action may have been either the shortage of dollars, or a desire to reduce their sterling balances, or a mixture of both; but it may be assumed that any attempt upon the part of the United Kingdom authorities to influence the decision of the Australian Government would be resented.

6. I agree with the conclusion expressed in your second paragraph that the future of Canadian exports to the sterling area is uncertain. Presumably the situation will be explored with the appropriate United Kingdom and/or other authorities when further discussions on commercial or financial policy take place.

7. Decisions on post-war trade policy are, as you are aware, to a large degree political and it is doubtful whether any binding arrangements will be possible until a General Election (already 5 years overdue) has been held in this country. According to a recent statement by the Prime Minister the present Parliament will be dissolved shortly after the end of the war in Europe. Until then it is quite likely that major issues, apart from those pertaining to the war, will be avoided.

8. As you are aware, some discussions on future commercial policy have already taken place between United Kingdom and Canadian officials.[75] Certain conclusions have been arrived at which are subject, of course, to further study and review by Governments but no policy has yet been formulated. It is hoped that further consideration will be given by the Canadian and United Kingdom authorities to questions affecting the probable future of Canadian export trade to the United Kingdom, but any discussions along that line will no doubt have to be paralleled with discussions on trade in the reverse direction.

9. In this connection I would direct your attention to Paper 1237, File A.R. 1061/1, "The Minutes of External Trade Advisory Committee,"† held in Ottawa, September 12th, 1944, Section 4, page 4 deals with "The United Kingdom Financial Position," and refers to a recent visit by United Kingdom Treasury officials. The second paragraph amended in Appendix II of the following paper, No. 1255,† reads "The British are hoping to avoid any further increase in their indebtedness outside the sterling area during the remainder of the war, and are most anxious to avoid any further substantial decline in their foreign exchange reserves. They have indicated that they expect to borrow from Canada and the United States during the transitional years immediately following the end of hostilities, but only in limited amounts and at low rates of interest."

10. I am inclined to think that the difficulties confronting Canadian export trade to the sterling area are too deep-seated to be measurably relieved by palliatives which ignore the fundamental problems:

(1) the shortage of Canadian dollars available to countries in the sterling area, and

(2) the liquidation of sterling balances accumulated in London.

[75]Voir les document 41-4, 46./See Documents 41-4, 46.

11. It is generally assumed that the United Kingdom will have to regulate imports (as regards both volume and character), by the continuance of the present system of licensing, for some time after the war in the light of her needs and capacity to pay; while at the same time pushing her exports to the fullest extent. The United Kingdom will doubtless enforce a system of priorities to ensure that imports requisite to maintain the minimum standard of life for the whole community and to meet the needs of essential industries take precedence over less essential imports. Broadly speaking this means that primary foodstuffs and raw materials must come first. So long as import capacity is restricted by an insufficiency of exports the necessary selection of imports cannot be attained by the competitive choice of a free market.

12. In these conditions it might be useful for the Canadian authorities to decide which exports come within the category of "traditional" upon behalf of which special claims might be considered. Information on this point would doubtless be valuable to the United Kingdom authorities as well as other sterling area Governments, in their natural endeavour to meet Canadian wishes and to cause the minimum disturbance to Canadian economy.

13. It is difficult to be optimistic about the quick recovery of United Kingdom export trade and its ability to earn dollar and other overseas currencies to an adequate degree. (In this connection it should be remembered that markets which were steady and expanding outlets for United Kingdom exports before the war have since developed a productive capacity of their own.) The statistics of exports recently released show that on a volume basis exports have decreased to 30% of the prewar total; whereas it is said to be necessary to raise the level to at least 150% of pre-war exports by volume if prewar standards of living are to be maintained. The gap to be bridged is thus alarmingly wide. To achieve satisfactory recovery present exports have to be multiplied by five.

14. Side by side with the necessity of earning dollars is the desire to liquidate or considerably reduce sterling balances accumulated in London. This, however, is not a United Kingdom problem only. In a recent speech the Government of the Bank of England said "If, in the early years too large a proportion of value of United Kingdom exports and services went in liquidation of these debts then there would be that much less with which to balance the current exports of creditor countries and the rest of the world."

15. All countries will be faced with internal economic problems of the first magnitude in the immediate post-war period and each will give priority to maintaining the highest degree of employment at home. This situation will create problems tending to create disequilibrium between the dollar and sterling groups and it will only be by a close study and full exchange of information between each area that equitable solutions will be found.

16. In pre-war days Canada disposed of her net sterling credits in the United Kingdom (current account of goods, gold and services which for the period 1926-37 amounted to an average of $108,000,000) largely through the international financial position of the United Kingdom in relation to United States dollars. In the post-war period the United Kingdom will emerge as a debtor nation and consequently Canada's trade with the sterling group must be patterned differently.

17. As regards your paragraph 4, the weakness of the United Kingdom's export situation should not be lost sight of in the formulation of policy. Cases have been reported where the United Kingdom has ceased to purchase from Canada essential goods which were short at the outbreak of war and supplies of which have been subsequently developed in the sterling area but none of these can be included among Canada's historical exports to the United Kingdom. At the same time enquiries are still being received for new Canadian products, e.g. the Ministry of Supply informed us the other day that they were prepared to purchase cholesterol from Canada. While your conclusions with regard to the immediate loss which would accrue to Canada from any diversion of trade is appreciated, insofar as a change of source of supply might contribute to the general economy of the United Kingdom and improve its general prosperity and purchasing power, the results would ultimately be beneficial to all countries including Canada. In other words, the restoration of the United Kingdom to its former position as a major world trading unit is an objective of great importance. This would, in the words of your despatch to the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom "facilitate expansion and not enforce contraction." The figures quoted show the seriousness of the country's economic situation as the result of its "single-minded prosecution of the war."

Mémorandum d'une discussion avec des représentants britanniques

Memorandum of Discussion with British Representatives

Ottawa, November 22, 1945

DISCUSSION WITH BRITISH REPRESENTATIVES ON RESTRICTION OF IMPORTS INTO THE STERLING AREA

These notes record a conversation held in the West Block at 10:30 on the morning of Thursday, November 22nd, between the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce and Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, British High Commissioner in Canada, the others present being Mr. A. M. Wiseman, British Trade Commissioner, Mr. Gordon Munro, Economic Adviser, and Mr. Bell, also of Mr. MacDonald's staff, and Mr. H. R. Kemp of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

MR. MACDONALD opened the conversation with a reference to numerous reports and complaints with regard to restrictions on imports from Canada into the sterling area. He said that he was aware that these complaints were coming in to the Department of Trade and Commerce, his own office, Boards of Trade and other places, that the matter was becoming more and more known to the general public, that it was inevitably creating dissatisfaction and hostility in Canada which are likely to have an adverse effect upon future relationships and discussions of commercial and financial questions between the two countries, and that the whole thing had been particularly brought into the limelight by the statement made by Mr. Attlee to the press on Monday, November 19th. Mr. Attlee had stated on that occasion that it was not true that it was the policy of the United Kingdom Government to serve notice upon Canadian manufacturers that if they wished to do business in Great Britain or the sterling area it would be necessary for them to carry on their manufacturing operations in the United Kingdom. Mr. MacDonald felt that it was desirable that some kind of public statement should be made that would explain the true position to the Canadian public and prevent the accumulation of dissatisfaction in this country. It is, however, impossible to say what the policy of the United Kingdom Government is or will be until after the agreement has been concluded with the United States, and the United Kingdom knows in what position it will be.

MR. MACKENZIE agreed that there was a rapidly increasing volume of complaints from Canadian manufacturers about this situation. This department alone has more than 60 complaints on file at the moment relating to a wide range of articles and parts of the sterling area, and new letters on the subject are coming in daily at an increased rate. The appearance of several lengthy articles in the current issue of the Financial Post is likely to intensify public interest in the matter, and it is very likely that questions may be asked on the subject in Parliament when the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce come up within the next few days. He did not feel that it would be possible to allay public dissatisfaction in the matter by even a carefully prepared statement couched in generalities, so long as import permits continue to be refused for a wide variety of products. Only the actual resumption of permission to trade, even on a token shipment basis, would adequately meet the criticism.

MR. MACKENZIE said that we could understand and sympathize with austerity, but some of the instances in which import permits had been refused had the appearance of protection under the cloak of austerity. The exclusion of Canadian newsprint meant that wood pulp had to be imported from Canada or some other hard currency area and converted into newsprint in the United Kingdom without much, if any, saving of dollars. (Mr. Wiseman observed that the limitation in the size of British newspapers should be an answer in that case.) It would be austerity to limit the sales of farm machinery, but the United Kingdom authorities were not doing this but merely taking steps to see that it is produced in the United Kingdom. Similarly in excluding Quaker Oats they are not limiting the consumption of the product, but are going to use labour, coal, machinery, etc. to produce the same article in the United Kingdom and at a higher cost than in Canada, (MR. WISEMAN disapproved even of that on the ground that the Quaker Oat is a vitiated oat, but MR. MACDONALD felt that if the Briton wanted Quaker Oats it would be pretty hard to persuade or compel him to accept some other kind of porridge.) MR. MACDONALD thought that the British authorities might feel that a given article was essential if it could be bought for sterling but nonessential if it could be acquired only in exchange for dollars.

MR. MACKENZIE pointed out that out of average prewar imports into the United Kingdom from Canada amounting to some $350 million, by far the greatest part consisted of foods and raw materials such as lumber, minerals, fish, etc., essential for Great Britain, and that the category of miscellaneous manufacturers did not account for more than about $50 million a year. He suggested that the British authorities, in spite of financial difficulties, would be well advised, in the interest of continuing good relations between the two countries, to set up some plan under which at least a minimum quota of x per cent of pre-war imports in these categories should be allowed entrance into the United Kingdom. Even if the quota amounted to 35 to 50 per cent of pre-war imports, the amount of dollars involved would not be excessively large, and it was quite possible that we should be providing them in any event. Fifty or sixty millions should take care of the whole sterling area. Failing some such arrangement, we should be exposed to criticism from a multitude of small enterprises collectively exercising a strong influence on public opinion in this country.

MR. MACDONALD felt that it would be very difficult to obtain treasury approval in the United Kingdom for any such scheme. He felt that the Cabinet had very strongly determined to exclude from the United Kingdom anything from the dollar area that could not be regarded as essential. It would not do very much good to telegraph them in this connection because the reply would simply come back "We do not have the dollars." The only way in which the treasury department could be moved would be by representations from the Board of Trade and Dominions Office. Developments of yesterday[76] indicated it is extremely unlikely that Lord Keynes will be able to visit Ottawa at all on the present occasion. There was a possibility that his associate, Mr. R. H. Brand, might come, and Mr. MacDonald had also been endeavouring to persuade Sir Percivale Liesching[77] to come to Canada. He proposed to make further efforts to induce Liesching to come, not with the expectation that Liesching would be able to make any undertaking on behalf of the British Government, for he had no power to do so, but rather in order that he might become acquainted by personal observation and conversations with the trend of public opinion in Canada on this matter so that he might personally report it to the British government on his return to the United Kingdom about the end of November.

The most successful development, MR. MACDONALD felt, would be if it were possible for the commercial and financial conversations between the United Kingdom and Canada to take place quickly, but this appeared to be out of the question. It now appeared as if agreement with the United States could not be completed through all stages before January or February, and the conversations with Canada would have to wait until after that time.

In the meantime, if nothing was done, there would be a continued deterioration in the state of public opinion in Canada. He was quite aware that if the United Kingdom ultimately decided that it could not import a variety of things from Canada, the tendency would be for the Canadians to say that they would have to lessen the amount of dollars to be placed at the disposal of the United Kingdom.

MR. MACKENZIE emphasized the fact that it was impossible for the Canadian government to hold the matter in suspense for two or three months. Letters and questions are coming in every day and must be dealt with in some way.

MR. MACDONALD also raised the question whether the exclusion of Canadian products from the United Kingdom if continued was not bound to have an adverse effect upon British exports. Mr. Mackenzie cited as a possible example the case of the Canada Cycle and Motor Company, which had in the past carried on business in exporting skates to the United Kingdom and importing bicycles from that source. Now that the United Kingdom authorities have prohibited the importation of skates from Canada, will such a company continue to import bicycles?

MR. MACDONALD was asked the specific question what reply the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be able to make in the House of Commons if asked about this matter during the next few days when the estimates come up. Would it be permissible for him to say that efforts were being made to arrange for a consultation with British officials at the conclusion of the Washington talks? MR. MACDONALD said that the Minister could of course make such a statement, and it would be true but he did not think it would meet the difficulties. If the Minister announced to the public that the whole matter was to be discussed with Sir Percivale Liesching in a few days, and Liesching then arrived, the press and the public would immediately begin to ask what agreement had been reached, and in the absence of any agreement, the position would be worse than ever. He felt that about all the Minister could say would be that the Washington conversations were not yet completed, and that it would not be possible to clear up these matters of Anglo-Canadian commercial relations before the outstanding questions with the United States had been settled.

MR. MACKENZIE quoted to the British representatives several outstanding cases. In connection with the export of abrasives from Canada to India, now prevented by the withholding of import permits, it appeared that the Indian officials were going on the assumption that such abrasives would be available from the United Kingdom without taking any trouble to find if this was in fact the case. The result might be that the Indians would simply be deprived of the merchandise in question. Reference was made to the report from New Zealand that permits had been given for the year's supply of box board to be imported from Sweden and/or the United Kingdom to the exclusion of Canada, the historical source of supply. In this instance the Canadian price quoted was 25 per cent lower than the British.[78]

Reference was also made to the Canadian leather industry, which now enjoys a quota of only 35 per cent of its prewar exports to the United Kingdom (24½ per cent if patent leather is excluded). MR. WISEMAN expressed the opinion that this was a matter covered by a special agreement.

Several matters in connection with exports to the British West Indies were also raised. Reference was made to a speech recently delivered in Jamaica and reported in a letter† received by the Department of Trade and Commerce from the Simms Company in St. John, N.B., in which the Jamaican Import Authority was quoted as putting forth the principle that nothing should be imported from Canada save essential articles, and not even these if they were available anywhere in the sterling area. MR. GORDON MUNRO immediately stated that this was wrong, and MR. WISEMAN read from the text of the agreement reached by Dr. Mackintosh and others in London last summer,[79] repeating that this represented the policy of the British government in the matter and that the report from Jamaica was inconsistent with this policy. The same view was taken by MR. MACDONALD. MR. MACKENZIE raised the question whether this agreement had not been automatically abrogated by the cessation of Mutual Aid. All three of the British representatives just mentioned, however, expressed the view that this agreement was still binding and still represented the policy of the British government. There was, of course, a possibility that this policy might have been erroneously interpreted by some of the local authorities. On being asked whether Mr. Sharp (the official from Jamaica) should be asked to visit Earnscliffe and discuss the matter during his coming visit, about Nov. 26, the British representatives immediately said that they thought this would be desirable. Reference was also made to the report from Trinidad to the effect that import permits are no longer being granted for barium sulphate, a material used for drilling oil wells, of which Canada has been supplying some 30,000 tons per year during the war, and that instead it is proposed to import the material from Greece or Brazil. MR. WISEMAN asked whether it would not be possible for the Canadian Trade Commissioner in those parts to make representations to the local authorities. It was replied that he had already made representations, and that they had informed him that they had no discretion in the matter and that it was all settled by the Petroleum Institute in London. MR. WISEMAN remarked that the Petroleum Institute does not control the import policy. It was replied that such was in any event the answer that had been reported to us.

In concluding the conversation, MR. MACDONALD stated that of course no final conclusion could be reached on this occasion, but that several things should definitely be done. Some thought should be given by the British representatives to the framing of a public statement which, without rousing false hopes, or seeming to promise concessions that could not ultimately be implemented, would explain the real situation and endeavour to satisfy public opinion. Urgent efforts should be made by them to persuade Sir Percivale Liesching that, even at the cost of considerable inconvenience, he ought to visit Ottawa and form his own impression of this situation on the spot in order to report it in Great Britain. MR. MACDONALD also thought that the attention of the authorities in London should be drawn to local misinterpretation of the agreement on essential imports in the British West Indies and India and possibly elsewhere with a view to insuring that the true interpretation was made known to the people in question.

SECRET. (Instruction to Cypher Division: Please repeat to Washington by teletype.)

United Kingdom officials, including Sir Edward Bridges,[80] Sir Percivale Liesching and Honourable R. H. Brand visited Ottawa December 8th to 10th en route to London after the conclusion of the financial and commercial negotiations in Washington.

They explained to Canadian Ministers and officials the agreement reached in Washington[81] and discussed its implications.

We agreed tentatively on the course of negotiations between us. It is expected that United Kingdom officials will visit Canada in the second half of January to negotiate a credit. The United States-United Kingdom Financial Agreement provides that the financial terms of the credit cannot be more favourable to Canada than the terms of the U.S.-U.K. loan. The negotiations will accordingly deal mainly with the size of the loan which we did not discuss with the visitors and with the exchange, import and other arrangements to be included in a financial agreement.

We also discussed with the United Kingdom officials the complaints of Canadian exporters that import licences were being refused in the sterling area for imports from Canada for a wide range of products on a variety of grounds that appeared to include protection of local industry and discrimination in favour of sterling area sources of supply. This issue had been raised in our press and in the House and is injurious to our relations with the United Kingdom. It has been arranged that the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce will leave for London within the next few weeks to discuss only the current difficulties arising out of U.K. import licensing and to seek a solution effective immediately that will keep the channels of trade open and will, we hope, ensure us a fair share of all U.K. imports on the basis of past trade. I shall send you by air mail a copy of the memorandum† given Liesching on the subject. Liesching, though out of touch with recent developments in the United Kingdom, said the question was giving his Government concern and he gave us reason to hope that our officials will receive a sympathetic hearing.

CANADIAN GIFT OF WHEAT FOR INDIA

In the attached teletype, WA-6495,† there is an enquiry from the Government of India as to whether, in view of the improved shipping situation, it would be possible for some of the unexpended balance of the famine wheat for India to be sent forward. It is pointed out that there is far from enough wheat in India to guard against a recurrence of famine conditions.

2. I understand that at a recent meeting the Mutual Aid Board decided to allow the agreement to supply wheat to India by way of Mutual Aid to lapse and to make no further shipments of the unexpended balance of the wheat. The reason was that famine conditions no longer existed and that the original gift was contingent on shipping being available to deliver the wheat in time to relieve the famine.

3. Before replying to the Indian Government, based on the decision of the Mutual Aid Board, I feel that further consideration should be given to the circumstances surrounding the transaction and to the probable consequence of a refusal by Canada to deliver the unexpended balance of wheat. I have, therefore, prepared the following rough history of the transaction.

4. On October 14th, 1943, you submitted a memorandum to the Prime Minister quoting Sir Girja Bajpai as saying that the political effect of a gift of wheat from Canada to India would be very great. Sir Girja recognized that shipping difficulties would be serious and might delay deliveries pretty materially. Your recommendation was that the wheat should be offered by the Mutual Aid Board "provided shipping can be made available." The Prime Minister annotated your recommendation on October 18th "I heartily approve".

5. P.C. 8162† gave approval in principle to the gift "provided that it may be found practicable to arrange for shipment of the wheat through Western Canadian ports." No time limit was set.

6. A telegram was despatched to the Viceroy from the Prime Minister on October 24th,[82] asking the Viceroy to make formal application for assistance under the Canadian Mutual Aid Act. The political aspect of the gift was stressed in the final sentence of the telegram: "Vital interests of the Commonwealth and of the United Nations are identified with the successful discharge of your duties and you may count on whatever cooperation and assistance Canada can give in carrying them out."

7. On October 26th the Viceroy telegraphed to the Prime Minister: "Accept your most generous offer with deep gratitude" and thanked him for his offer to cooperate.

8. On October 28th the High Commissioner for Canada in Great Britain reported that the Secretary of State for India had written most appreciatively about the Canadian gift of wheat, hoping that at the right moment the donation would be given the fullest publicity. He asked, however, that no public statement should be made until the shipping difficulty can be solved.

9. In a telegram dated October 30th, the Indian Trade Commissioner in Canada assured you that "the gracious and magnanimous contribution of Canada shall ever be remembered with deepest gratitude by the Government and the people of India".

10. The draft press statements† on the file, for instance that of November 1st, refer to the shipping difficulties but do not in any way suggest that any part of the gift is to lapse if it cannot be shipped during the period of the famine or that any shipping condition attach to the gift.

11. There are many telegrams about shipping. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, for instance, telegraphed on November 4th to the Canadian Prime Minister: "Your offer is contingent, however, on shipment from the Pacific coast which I regret is impracticable". He goes on to examine shipping difficulties from eastern ports and says that publication of the offer would create a difficult position because he would have to say that no shipping was available. This would cause disappointment in India. An announcement of the gift was made in India and on November 5th the Prime Minister telegraphed to the Viceroy saying that an announcement would have to be made in Canada. It contained the sentence: "The question of shipping for the wheat presents considerable difficulties which are now under examination". Mr. Churchill expressed his gratitude for this sentence on November 6th and said "We can look into shipping at leisure and meanwhile meet the emergency by shipments on the three weeks' route from Australia". There was no suggestion at all at this period that part of the gift might lapse because of shipping difficulties.

12. On November 13th a telegram was sent from the Canadian Prime Minister to the United Kingdom Prime Minister. It contains the following sentences: "In making the gift we had in mind, in addition to the humanitarian aspects, that it would have valuable results from the standpoint of intra-imperial relations. These might well outbalance a slight delay in the movement of Canadian supplies to Australia. If our action is to be more than an empty gesture, it is essential that at least some wheat from Canada should reach India as soon as possible."

13. The High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom, who had been asked to comment on these telegrams, telegraphed on November 17th: "Mr. Churchill's telegrams seem to leave out of account the important psychological factor in the Canadian offer of wheat for India."

14. A formal request for wheat was made on December 30th by Mr. Malcolm MacDonald.[83]

15. In April of this year there was some correspondence† concerning the resale of wheat in India, which we permitted, with the suggestion that the proceeds should be used for relief. A memo to me of May 20th from Mr. Wrong† says that we have only delivered some 10% of the gift, and that it is unlikely that we shall be able to deliver more of it. This is the first suggestion on file that shipments might cease. However, on May 25th we were still enquiring from the Government of India to what port we should ship if space were available and on June 28th we regretted that it had not been possible to make any shipment of wheat subsequent to May 25th.

16. Correspondence concerning the sale of wheat to India† begins on October 14th.

17. From these excerpts from the correspondence it seems to me to be abundantly clear

(1) that there were two primary purposes in making the gift: (a) humanitarian and (b) political;

(2) that, while a good deal was said about the gift being contingent on shipping being available, no time was specified and nothing appears to have been said to the Government of India of any intention on our part to cancel the unshipped balances;

(3) that the gift was given wide publicity and the correspondence was conducted at a very high level, i.e., between Prime Minister and Prime Minister and Viceroy;

(4) that care was taken to avoid any premature announcement which might lead to the gift appearing to be illusory or which might give any pretext for detracting from its political significance.

[83]Voir aussi ibid, documents 919-29./See also ibid, Documents 919-29.

18. Now that an official enquiry has been made by the Government of India, it appears to me that we should defeat in large measure the political and psychological purposes of the gift if we were simply to reply that, as it had not been possible to ship all of the wheat and as India was now taking steps to build up a reserve, we had decided not to proceed with the gift which we ourselves had suggested. In any case, I feel that the Prime Minister has been so closely associated with the policy from its inception that he should be fully informed before any action is taken which may, in effect, defeat its purpose.

WHEAT FOR INDIA

Mr. Symon of the Indian Supply Mission in Washington called on the morning of Wednesday, November 29th, to enquire concerning the intentions of the Canadian Government with regard to the balance of the gift of wheat which was offered to India. I told Mr. Symon that this matter was receiving Ministerial consideration and that if we were to press for an answer it would almost certainly be negative. I called Mr. Symon's attention to Chapter 10 of the Report of the Canadian Mutual Aid Board of May 20, 1943 to March 31, 1944 and told him that this was the latest public announcement. The paragraph reads as follows:—

"The only supplies out of the Mutual Aid appropriation which have gone to India have been a portion of a gift of 100,000 tons of wheat, which was offered to the Government of India last winter on receipt of news of the serious famine situation in that country, especially in the Province of Bengal.

"The offer was made subject to the inevitable wartime reservation that shipping would have to be found to move the wheat and unfortunately, up to the present, it has not been possible to secure the amount of shipping required to move the entire gift over the long haul from Canada to India. Cargoes of Canadian wheat, however, have already reached India and more will be moved as the occasion arises, thus adding to the essential food reserves there."

I pointed out to Mr. Symon that a good deal of confusion had arisen because of the wheat recently purchased on the Indian account by the United Kingdom Government and by the fact that shipping space was being provided for this wheat without applying for further installments of the gift of wheat. Mr. Symon replied that the Government of the United Kingdom had probably acted without the knowledge of the Government of India, which could only buy through London and had probably simply applied to the United Kingdom for wheat. He said that he could frequently find space for some wheat in ships leaving for India and that he had reported to the Indian Government that if wheat could be acquired space could be found.[84] I asked him why he had not either applied for further shipments from Canada as against the gift or suggested to the Government of India that it should do so. His reply was that this was not part of the duty of the Supply Mission. My comment was that the Government of India, the Supply Mission and the United Kingdom Government among them had nearly, if not quite allowed the gift wheat to slip through their fingers.

Mr. Symon spoke of the political consequences of the gift lapsing and I agreed that a very strong case could be made in India by any Indian who chose to denounce Government authorities in general and to distribute the blame as suited his inclinations.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa,] December 4, 1944

WHEAT FOR INDIA

I had a talk with the Prime Minister today on this subject, based on the attached papers.

Mr. King's reaction was that the question would have to be decided by the Mutual Aid Board. He said he thought it was quite clear that the offer of a gift of wheat had been made subject to shipping facilities being made available.

I pointed out that the situation did not require that the Government of Canada should buy any wheat at the market, since the wheat proposed to be offered as a gift already belonged to the Government.

Mr. King's reply was that this was not a time when we could afford to make large gifts of wheat or anything else. (I understand that what he had in mind were the requests from the United Kingdom for substantial increases in financial accommodation.)

In the circumstances I felt that the points set out in Mr. Angus' note[85] could not be pressed further.

TELETYPE EX-4897 Ottawa, December 12, 1944

Your WA-6664 of November 27th.† Wheat for India under Mutual Aid. The Mutual Aid Board yesterday decided that the wheat moving to India from Canada should be regarded as part of the gift of 100,000 tons offered last year until this total figure is reached. Certain lots of wheat have recently been shipped to India or are in course of shipment for which cash payment has been made or arranged. As a matter of practical procedure it would be inconvenient to reopen these transactions and the Mutual Aid Board, therefore, authorized the Department of Trade and Commerce to determine the date after which wheat will again move under Mutual Aid.

2. We understand that at present Canadian wheat is going to India in fairly small lots required to complete cargoes from various ports on both coasts. You might let Sir Girja Bajpai[86] know verbally that if the movement continues until after the full 100,000 tons has been shipped under Mutual Aid it seems not likely that the Mutual Aid Board would authorize any increase in Mutual Aid wheat over this amount.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Mr. de Valera[87] sent for me this morning and, to my surprise, informed me that he had received from the American Government a note, in which the British Government concurred, requesting him to cause withdrawal of the German and Japanese missions in Dublin. I told him I had no knowledge of any such note.

[87]Eamon de Valera, Premier ministre et ministre des Affaires extérieures d'Irlande.
Eamon de Valera, Prime Minister and Minister of External Affairs of Ireland.

Mr. de Valera said that he and his Cabinet regarded note as a veiled threat and an attempt to interfere with the sovereign rights of his nation, and a political manoeuvre to precipitate it into war.

He sent for me because he thought that the Canadian Government would appreciate that the form of note in question gave him no alternative but to refuse to comply with its terms. He foresaw that in replying to it he would have to stress points which would, much to his regret, cause deterioration in the good relationship which has existed between the United States, Great Britain and Ireland. He reminded me Ireland had guaranteed to Great Britain that it would not be used as a base of attack against Great Britain, and added that he would do everything possible to see that Ireland would not be used as a centre of espionage against the United Nations.

There was no evidence which, even if he desired to do so, would justify ordering the withdrawal of the Axis representatives, and in saying so he based himself on information which he received from the Irish Secret Service working in conjunction with the British Secret Service. He thought that the delivery to him of formal notes instead of more or less informal verbal representations which have hitherto been made by American Minister and British representative was alarming and significant.

He suggested that through the friendly intervention of Canada the notes might be withdrawn. He made it clear, however, that even if verbal representation were substituted for formal notes he would not do away with Axis missions but would give assurances that he would take any measures which might be suggested to eliminate any possible espionage.

Suggest you secure copy of note from Washington and let me know if your good offices will be available in the matter.

Dominions Office telegram D. 277 of February 23rd† and Mr. Kearney's telegram from Dublin, No. 12 of February 24th, relate to a formal approach made by the United States Minister in Dublin on instructions from Washington on February 21st requesting the Irish Government to expel German and Japanese representatives from Dublin. Mr. de Valera has suggested to Mr. Kearney that we should seek to secure the withdrawal of the U.S. note and of the supporting note presented on the following day by the United Kingdom representative in Dublin. This is a curious suggestion which I think we cannot entertain and I enclose a draft telegram to Mr. Kearney† in this sense.

The cause of Mr. de Valera's anger seems to arise from the formality of the approach and not from its substance. Why these particular tactics were adopted in bringing pressure to bear on Ireland is not clear. It may be that they wished in Washington to compel de Valera to go formally on record as refusing this gesture of support. There may have been some domestic political motive in the United States. The British in any case cannot have been sorry to see the U.S. taking the lead in squeezing Ireland. It is not a comfortable situation for de Valera, but even if we felt confident that we could help him out of it I consider that we should not try to do so.

Mr. Garner, who is in charge of Earnscliffe in Mr. Malcolm MacDonald's absence and Sir Patrick Duff's illness, called at the Department this morning with a message he had received from Lord Cranborne about the notes presented by the United Kingdom and United States representatives in Dublin, asking Mr. de Valera to bring about the withdrawal of the Axis diplomatic representatives from Ireland. The United Kingdom Government had learned from Sir John Maffey[89] that Mr. de Valera had asked the Canadian Government if it would approach the United Kingdom and United States Governments with a view to securing the withdrawal of the notes delivered to Mr. de Valera. Mr. Churchill hoped that you would not agree to Mr. De Valera's request, and, indeed, expressed the wish that Canada might see its way to associating itself with the United Kingdom and United States representations on the subject. The message pointed out that the security reasons which made the United Kingdom and United States request the withdrawal of Axis representatives from Dublin applied as much to the Canadian expeditionary force as to the British and American formations.

Wrong and I told him we would convey this message to you and let him know, probably later in the day, what action, if any, you thought you should take in the matter. We pointed out that the Canadian Government had not been consulted about this new approach to the Irish Government, and had only been informed of it after it had taken place. In the circumstances, I thought it extremely unlikely that the Canadian Government would be prepared to consider associating itself, formally and belatedly, in the way Mr. Churchill had suggested. We would be very glad to see the Irish Government compel the withdrawal of Axis diplomatic representatives from Dublin, but the measures taken did not seem very well designed to achieve the end in view. Even in the case of Argentina, the United States had gone to some pains to present a dossier of evidence of subversive activities carried on by Axis diplomatic agents, and the United Kingdom had completed the case by arresting an Argentine consular employee who had been proved to be an Axis agent. These were new facts which enabled the Argentine Government to alter its policy toward the Axis while maintaining the appearance of acting as a free agent. We had not seen the text of the British and American notes, but understood that they did not go out of their way to give Mr. de Valera a plausible public occasion for modifying his policy.

In the circumstances, I think it was a mistake in judgment for the United Kingdom and United States Governments to present formal notes on this subject to the Irish Government at this time, but I do not think we could act as Mr. de Valera's intermediary in attempting to bring about their withdrawal. It is clear from his conversation with Mr. Kearney that, though he objects, understandably and very strongly, to the form which Anglo-American pressure has taken, he would, in fact, have been just as obdurate if the approach had been indirect and informal. I think we could agree to intervene in an effort to secure the withdrawal of the notes if there were any chance of the Irish Government expelling the Axis missions of their own motion, but of this there seems to be no present prospect.[90]

High Commissioner in Ireland
to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM 13 Dublin, February 25, 1944

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Supplementing my telegram No. 12 of February 23rd, following is chronological outline of what occurred.

On February 23rd Secretary (of State) [sic] for External Affairs informed me that Mr. de Valera would like to see me very urgently. I went to him immediately. He seemed to assume that the contents of notes from United States and Great Britain as well as procedure adopted meant that Ireland's territory was going to be violated.

He explained at length, and with great emotion, that his country was prepared to fight invasion from any quarter, and resist interference of sovereign rights of Ireland by any nation, and even though outcome against her by the United States of America and Great Britain was forlorn news, Ireland, he said, would fight to the last man. I told him that although I was unaware of notes or their contents I felt quite sure that he was misinterpreting them, and that the United States of America and Great Britain, anticipating European invasion, were no doubt simply taking all precautions to protect their troops from possible or likely espionage. I added that in my opinion thought of invading Ireland did not enter their mind. His remarks covered innumerable aspects of Ireland's position and I used every opening to impress upon him desirability of further tangible evidence of friendship of his Government. He concluded by asking me to inform the Canadian Government of his rejection of the terms of notes and expressed hope and belief that my Government would show understanding of situation. I told him that having no knowledge of the facts I felt at a disadvantage discussing matter and might wish to pursue it later on.

I then saw Sir John Maffey whose explanation as to why I had no previous knowledge of the notes was: "All the Dominions had been notified of the intention of the United States of America and Great Britain to send notes to the Irish Government and until you hear direct from your Government I had no authority to inform you that notes had been sent or of the contents."

I learned that he and Mr. Gray[91] had personally delivered their notes separately a day or two previously and had been informed by de Valera that he did not intend to comply.

I saw Mr. de Valera again in the afternoon and repeated a suggestion I had made to him in the morning, namely that Germany by landing parachutists in Ireland gave him justification of his own to bring about withdrawal of German representatives, even were such landings inconclusive with regard to Japanese representations.

[91]David Gray, ministre des États-Unis en Irlande.
David Gray, United States Minister in Ireland.

He replied notes made such a course all the more difficult. He said that if chief purpose of United Nations was to guard against espionage they would not have departed from the ordinary mode of communication, but would have sought by private negotiations to find additional means to guard against espionage and would have found him most cooperative. The formal notes put an entirely different complexion on the matter, making an impression which had to be dealt with publicly. He took exception particularly to words in American note "absolute minimum". He would be obliged, he said, to call public or secret session of Dail to hear notes and his reply. Quite evidently his reply will be refusal coupled with exhortation to Irish not to yield in face of veiled threats and he will probably hold army ready to resist invasion. He said he foresaw regretfully that a press campaign would be launched against Ireland abroad, and that feeling would replace friendly cooperation which exists, and particularly as between British and Irish armies and air force. He considered it would be in mutual interest of Ireland and the United Nations if, through intervention of a friendly nation, notes were withdrawn. He suggested Canada assume the task and asked me to put his request before my Government.

I think Mr. de Valera is reading into notes implications which are not warranted by context, but I fear that he will make most Irishmen view them as he does. Undoubtedly he intends to raise the cry of compulsion.

Under the existing circumstances I fail to see how you would be justified in suggesting that notes be withdrawn. I think, however, you might consider suggesting that they be made secret.

Secrecy as opposed to publicity may meet most or at least enough of Mr. de Valera's difficulties and on balance, I think, secrecy at this critical time cannot[92] be more advantageous to Great Britain and the United States than publicity. Even if my suggestion or such other as may occur to you does not satisfy Mr. de Valera, it will at least serve as evidence of your goodwill and desire to be of assistance.

Mr. de Valera, I think, appreciates that he has set you a difficult task.

He is anxiously awaiting your response. There is an obvious tension in Government circles at the moment.

[Ottawa,] February 25, 1944

Since preparing the attached memorandum[93] and draft reply to Kearney,† we have received his further detailed report of his interview with de Valera. It was obviously a difficult interview, and I think Kearney conducted himself very wisely.

I am sure de Valera's fears that some ulterior motive underlay the United States-United Kingdom initiative are groundless. I cannot, at this stage of the war, see any military objective which would begin to justify the occupation of an unfriendly Ireland.

I would say rather that the United Kingdom and the United States now feel in a position to put pressure on the remaining neutrals to complete the isolation of the Axis countries, and perhaps shorten the war. The diplomatic pressure presently being put upon Argentina, Sweden, Portugal, Spain and Turkey probably provides a clue to this latest United Kingdom-United States approach to the Irish Government. De Valera's fear that it is a prelude to invasion seems to be grotesque.

I agree with Kearney that we should not endeavour to secure the withdrawal of the United States and United Kingdom notes, but I think there is a good deal of merit in his suggestion that we might urge the United Kingdom and the United States to keep secret the fact that they have made an unsuccessful diplomatic approach to the Irish Government. I cannot see any advantage whatever in giving publicity to an unsuccessful diplomatic manoeuvre from which none of the Governments concerned can get any glory.

TELEGRAM 4 Ottawa, February 25, 1944

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Your telegram No. 12 of February 24th. We were only informed on February 23rd by the Dominions Office that a formal approach looking to the withdrawal of Axis Missions had been made to the Irish Government by the United States Minister on February 21st and had been supported by the United Kingdom representative on the following day. We thus had no opportunity of commenting in advance of the event. If we had been consulted, we might have urged the adoption of less direct and formal methods.

2. As Mr. de Valera knows it has long been the earnest hope of the Canadian Government that the Irish Government would, in their own time and of their own motion, come to share our conviction that the permanent interests of the Irish people are identified with the victory of the United Nations. We have welcomed each indication of Irish sympathy and support and we keep alive the hope that sooner or later Ireland will feel able to make some more direct contribution to the winning of this war. In this spirt we would naturally be very glad to see Axis Missions removed from Dublin and are thus in full sympathy with the object of the approach which the United States and United Kingdom have made.

3. The question which Mr. de Valera has raised with you is not one in which we can intervene at this stage without risk of misunderstanding. Even if the notes were withdrawn such harm as has been done would not be undone.

4. We have a good deal of sympathy with Mr. de Valera's objections to the form and timing of the United States-United Kingdom approach but having in mind the major issues involved we cannot help feeling that he would be well advised to comply with this request. We should be glad to intervene to secure the withdrawal of the notes if there were any assurance that such a step would make it easier for Ireland to expel the Axis Missions, and come clearly over to our side. Since he has said to you that he is not prepared to do this, I do not think we would be justified in making an issue over the question of the way in which the views of the United States and United Kingdom Governments were brought to his notice.

Mémorandum du Premier ministre
Memorandum by Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] February 27, 1944

RE: UNITED STATES AND UNITED KINGDOM NOTES TO THE GOVERNMENT OF EIRE RE GERMAN AND JAPANESE MISSIONS

At noon, Mr. Hearne, the Irish High Commissioner, phoned to ask if he could come and see me personally. I told him Mr. Robertson had spoken to me of his desire to see me, and that I would be pleased to see him at any time, and suggested his coming within the next quarter of an hour. Mr. Hearne arrived about 10 minutes past 12, and we conversed in my library until 1:30.

Mr. Hearne opened the conversation by telling me that one of his colleagues from the United States had come to him to Ottawa with a message from Mr. de Valera, outlining what had taken place with respect to the U.S. and U.K. notes. Mr. de Valera had not wished to take up the matter by official communications direct with the Canadian government through the Irish High Commissioner in Canada.

Before stating specifically what he wanted to speak about, Hearne began to outline the little thanks which the Irish had received for what they had done and were seeking to do by way of co-operation in the war, and went over at length the grounds which gave rise to their suspicion of Britain. He inferred that what was commonly a note from the U.S. in reality was something which had been inspired by the U.K.

I took issue with him immediately on this, going the length of indicating to him what had been said to us in the first communication received about the matter, which was one from the U.K.[†] telling us of their having been asked by the U.S. to support them in the note which the U.S. was sending to the Irish government.

Hearne continued at length about the methods the British had of doing things, and the whole tenor of the early part of his conversation was that there was really back of the note some carefully worked out policy, which meant dictation by Great Powers to a small country, and that no matter what the cost, Eire would not yield to dictation of the kind — certainly not in the light of the war today being one to maintain freedom against oppression.

I told Hearne that I thought he was quite wrong, and that if Mr. de Valera held similar views, he was quite wrong in believing that there was any objective in the notes other than what appeared on the face of them. That I believed the United States were greatly concerned about the coming invasion of Europe and were seeking to take every possible step to protect their own troops. That, as I saw the situation, anything might happen at the time of invasion: there would be bombarding of British harbours, of London, etc., on a scale never thought of; aerial fighting in the skies; there might even be a state of confusion which would result in the Allied forces unwittingly finding themselves drawn into conflict here and there with each other. That, in the midst of confusion of the kind, the enemy might easily be supplied with information from sources that seemed harmless enough at other times. That the only wise thing was to avoid possible dangers, at all costs, and take account of every contingency. That, behind the notes there should be some desire to bring Eire into the war was, I believed, wholly without any foundation. I said I could understand de Valera wondering why the United States request should have been preferred in writing, in formal notes, rather than by verbal representations in the first instance. I had been asking myself what the reason for that could be. I had concluded, and I thought quite rightly, it was because of the great importance which the U.S. government attached to seeing that their forces were protected in every possible way. To leave matters to verbal representation might create differences of view later on as to what really had been said. Apart from this, however, I felt that the notes were preferred, in part as a matter of emphasis, and in part as a matter of record. Should present fears prove to be justified, it was most important that the United States be able to show that they had foreseen the dangers clearly and had gone as far as they possibly could in seeking to avoid them. So far as there being any policy by way of drawing Eire into the war was concerned, I felt that if such was the case we in Canada would most certainly have had some knowledge of a move of the kind. Also, were there any deep laid policy with respect to what further moves would follow, if the Irish would not meet the request, particularly in the nature of open coercion, we would most certainly have heard something before this about conditions which necessitated such a course. The whole matter had only come to our attention after the notes themselves had been presented.

Before the conversation was over, Hearne seemed to change his attitude, based on suspicion, as to some sinister act of Britain being behind the note, on [to] a direct attitude of antagonism towards the President of the United States. I was greatly surprised at this. He spoke of the U.S. never having thanked the Irish for what they were doing to help — possibly they would have got more thanks if they had done less. How deep his feeling in the matter was, was apparent from his saying to me that when I had presented him to the President at the time of the latter's visit to Ottawa, the President had been particularly short with him. I said to Hearne that it was absurd to say that. I had presented all the diplomats and I noticed in each instance the President was similar in manner and what he said. Hearne intimated that in the coming presidential elections he thought consideration might be given to what might be done with the Irish vote, saying that they had all been closely following the President's attitude toward the Irish.

Hearne, in beginning his conversation, had spoken of how exasperated he had felt upon reading the U.S. note. He used language which made it appear that the whole note had been a threat of a kind which might have to be met by open resistance. I had not, up to that moment, read the note myself, not having observed that it was attached to the file which Robertson had sent to Laurier House last night. I mentioned this fact to Hearne, and asked him to allow me to read the note through, which I did out loud. I then said to him frankly I could not see, in what was there expressed, just reason for his fears. It only confirmed my view that the United States wished to make perfectly clear how important it was that no step should be omitted which would leave American forces open to dangers which otherwise might have been avoided, and felt that the danger was so great it was important to have the matter emphasized in a note.

Hearne asked what would the next step be if Eire refused to take the course suggested. I said I could not say, but that I felt there would be disappointment naturally; that, could the step be taken, it would be warmly welcomed, not only by the United States and the United Kingdom, but by ourselves and I felt other of the Allies. That there was a long future ahead of all of us after the war was over and that any and every step in the way of co-operation now would be remembered to the good; but failure to co-operate on anything which might lead to possible disaster or to serious ill consequence, would not easily be forgotten. I said I personally would greatly welcome the Irish Government taking the course suggested. Something was said by Hearne as to whether this would not be equivalent to a declaration of war against Germany. I said, far from it; that the breaking off of diplomatic relations did not necessarily mean a declaration of war. They might be broken off for different purposes. Hearne said he knew there were distinctions in text books on the matter, but he did not know that actions would be so viewed by other countries when taken.

I again stressed the point that if there had been some far-reaching policy already worked out on this matter our government would certainly have received some intimation of the need and reasons for it. I would have expected that we would have been informed of these matters through the British Government. I did not feel that we would necessarily be informed by the U.S. Government, but certainly we had not been informed of anything of the kind by either of them.

Hearne next brought up what had taken place with our High Commissioner, Mr. Kearney. I told Hearne I thought Kearney had viewed the matter correctly and had expressed what was in accord with our view. I did not think that Canada would be justified in asking for a withdrawal of the notes. He asked me if he could say to Mr. de Valera that I did not think there was a far-reaching policy back of the presentation of the notes. I said certainly he could give that as my view, and also that I felt it would be unwise to have publicity given to the notes — unwise alike for all parties concerned.

Before Hearne left, I enlarged on this, pointing out that one never knew what conditions might result from disclosures, and that one could take it as a general rule that what a man was able to prevent of ill in public affairs was almost certain, in the long run, to be much more important than anything which he might be able to accomplish. I cited to Hearne, as a case in point, the attitude of our government towards disclosure on the McNaughton matter. I said we would like to make disclosures, but who could say what consequences might result therefrom. For that reason we were content to let the record lie and speak for itself later on.

Hearne repeated several times that he was quite prepared to give assurances that his government was equal to preventing any kind of espionage and would see that it was effectively prevented. He came back to the question as to what would happen if they replied refusing what had been proposed. I said I could not of course say anything as to that. Much might depend on the wording of the communication sent in reply; also whether matters were kept secret or made public. I said that the matter might probably rest at that point and [be] brought up again later on, in the event of something in the interval justifying that step. Hearne at once said that if time were granted in this way they might be able to gain an advantage. I said I thought he was altogether wrong in assuming that there was any intention of seeking to draw the Irish nation into the war; that my view was it would be much better to take the notes at their face value, not assume some sinister design. He said he thought Mr. de Valera would be much influenced by what I might say. I told him that I had given my view quite frankly. He then asked if he might say that I would like to be kept informed of any further developments and would I be willing to help in any way. I said that I had no desire of being drawn into the matter beyond that of trying to help to clarify the situation and, naturally, would be gratified receiving any word which the Irish Government would wish to send, but that I would not wish, so to speak, to attempt to intervene in a matter which was one between the government of the United States and the government of Eire, or the British government and the government of Eire. Hearne said he did not think the British government would pay attention to any other part of the Commonwealth other than Canada, that none of the others counted for much in their eyes.

I made no promise as to our taking any further step of any kind. That so far as the President was concerned, I was inclined to remove distrust as to movers behind the note and to the wisdom of having what had taken place kept secret. I did not see that if the notes were intended for purposes of anything by record it could be expected that they would be withdrawn.

Hearne was most profuse in his thanks. Said he would prepare something today, which he would show to Robertson before it was sent off so that nothing would be said in his message which would lead to misunderstanding of the position.

In speaking of the U.S. note, Hearne dwelt particularly upon the significance of the words: "an absolute minimum", and also the words: "that time is of extreme importance." I replied to the first by saying it had reference wholly to security, and to the second saying that, as he knew, we were on the eve of an invasion — how soon or how long deferred it might be we could not say but certainly too much in the way of precaution could not be taken.

I might add that in the course of the conversation Hearne told of occasions on which the Irish government had sought to help the Allies, citing such instances as allowing Canadian and other allied planes, which had landed in Eire, their occupants to be released, whereas Germans had been interned; measures taken to allow British secret police to cooperate with Irish secret police; spoke a good deal about the neutrality of the ports and of their undertaking in that regard having been carried out, etc., etc.

TELEGRAM 14 Dublin, February 28, 1944

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Your telegrams Nos. 4 and 5 of February 25th arrived together.

2. I verbally communicated their substance to Mr. de Valera. He said that he was favourably impressed by tone of your views; appreciated your difficulty of intervening and was grateful for your remarks regarding publicity. He still has fears on possible use of armed force but took comfort from the fact that you approve previous assurances I had given him in this regard.

3. The tension of the situation insofar as he is concerned personally has eased but danger of flare-up has not yet been averted.

4. Following delivery of original notes de Valera cancelled army leaves and ordered troops to stand by. Irish troops are on manoeuvres and wild rumours to the effect that Americans have crossed the border are current.

5. A public speech made by de Valera yesterday at Cavan should help to dispel such rumours. True, he mentioned ever present war danger to Eire but he devoted as much time to such topics as party system of Government, neutrality, and milk prices. Although the Irish Times and Irish Independent in reporting his speech this morning featured the war danger, significantly enough de Valera's paper, The Irish Press, gives no prominence to that part of the speech.

6. Relations between de Valera and Mr. Gray have not been too happy. Sir John Maffey seems anxious that because of unique relations I keep in close touch with de Valera and act as "lighting rod-role" in this matter.

7. I told de Valera I would inform Maffey and Gray of your views regarding publicity. Maffey agrees that it is desirable to avoid publicity. Gray away for a few days. I will see him on his return. De Valera is in a quandary with regard to publicity. He may be questioned in Parliament regarding rumours of American crisis and asked to produce correspondence. He thought that withdrawal of notes would provide the answer. I suggested that he might delay confirming his verbal refusal in writing and parry questions by saying that he had received a written communication which required answer in writing and until this had been done he could not answer any questions. He mentioned possibility of calling in the leaders of the opposition.

8. Would appreciate your comments and direction.

2. Yesterday in Dail Mr. de Valera availed himself of the opportunity to set at rest wild and widespread current rumours stating:

"Speaking of rumours I want to say that I have been told there is a good deal of public uneasiness at the moment and I simply want to say that there is no need for that uneasiness."

3. De Valera has had reassurances from the United States Government that there are no sanctions attached to recent note beyond that of American motives of anxiety lest their soldier sons suffer from result of enemy espionage in Ireland.

4. Mr. Gray also informed de Valera that in so far as the United States is concerned note would receive no publicity.

5. In interview today de Valera told me that he intended to modify original antithesis of his reply. He thought, however, American note unnecessarily hurtful directly, and inferentially misrepresented Irish attitude and this he intended to point out in his reply. I asked him if in his reply he would give assurances of co-operation short of involving Ireland in the war. He said "I will". I expect his reply will be delivered tomorrow.

6. De Valera remarked that although he and I had spoken plainly to each other in the last few days we had done so understandingly, and he expressed appreciation of the interest shown by the Canadian Government and our contribution in keeping things on an even keel.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa,] March 14, 1944

Re: Ireland

Mr. Atherton called upon me in person and left the attached statement in writing (which was without date or signature) as conveying an expression of thanks which the Secretary of State of the United States wished to have given to me. The Ambassador supplemented the communication by saying that the State Department would be very pleased if our government would see that the statement which refers to Mr. Kearney's attitude and assistance were passed on to Mr. Kearney.

In conversation, I told Mr. Atherton that the feeling which I thought Mr. de Valera took exception to in part, was the manner or approach to the Irish government, namely, the presentation of formal notes without an informal personal word in advance. Mr. Atherton, in reply, gave it as his view that Mr. de Valera was anxious to make a political issue out of the question. His stock was going down and he really wanted publicity on the matter of presentation of notes to help him politically.

I asked Mr. Atherton where or how he thought the matter was likely to end. His reply was that he thought the President's remarks as to a wish that Ireland might be represented at the peace table would probably afford a means of working out the situation.

The American Minister in Dublin has informed the Department of State of Prime Minister de Valera's approach to the Canadian High Commissioner in Dublin following the American request to the Irish Government for the removal of Axis representatives. Mr. Kearney's attitude and assistance on this occasion was most helpful and the American Government desires to express its appreciation for this assistance. The American Government likewise wishes to express its appreciation for the position taken by the Canadian Government in this whole matter, and for the unequivocal statement of the Prime Minister in Parliament on March 13th.

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] March 15, 1944

You may wish to say something about developments in the Irish situation in the War Committee this afternoon.

We were neither informed nor consulted by the United Kingdom Government about the original decision to approach the Irish Government with a formal request for the expulsion of the Axis Missions. The only communications we have had from the United Kingdom Government on the subject were a circular telegram† the day following the presentation of the United Kingdom note, advising us of the steps which had been taken, and two days later an informal enquiry through Earnscliffe as to whether the Canadian Government would be prepared to follow up the United Kingdom-United States approach with a similar note to the Irish Government. This enquiry was addressed to the Canadian Government after the United Kingdom had learned that the Irish Government had asked if we could use our good offices to secure the withdrawal of the original notes.

We have had no word beyond what has appeared in the press about the United Kingdom's decision to stop travel between Great Britain and Ireland, and no indication as to what further punitive measures may be under consideration in London or Washington. It seems to me that regardless of what we may think about the wisdom or unwisdom of the policy which is developing toward Ireland, the subject is one of the highest Commonwealth concern, on which there should be full consultation. As a matter of fact Eire is still a member of the British Commonwealth and presumably it can leave the Commonwealth if it chooses to do so just as it has been free to remain neutral if it wished to do so. It cannot, however, be expelled from the Commonwealth by the United Kingdom acting alone any more than India could be admitted to the Commonwealth by the United Kingdom acting alone and without consultation with the other members of the Commonwealth.

My own feeling is that we would be justified in protesting pretty sharply to the United Kingdom, first, about the complete lack of consultation on a question of this order of importance, and secondly, about the unwisdom in the common interest of the action that had actually been taken.

IRELAND; U.S. AND U.K. REPRESENTATIONS

3. THE PRIME MINISTER drew attention to the U.S.-U.K. approach to the Irish government regarding the expulsion of Axis diplomatic missions and reported that the Canadian government had neither been consulted regarding the original decision nor informed until after the event.

Regardless of the merits of the policy adopted in respect of Ireland, this was a matter of great concern to the Commonwealth and one on which there should be adequate consultation. In the circumstances, it might be desirable to draw the attention of the U.K. government to the need for Commonwealth consultation and to Canadian misgivings about the wisdom of the action that had been taken.

(Memorandum, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Prime Minister, Mar.15, 1944.)

4. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion agreed that a communication along the lines indicated by the Prime Minister be forwarded to the U.K. government, it being understood that the question of lack of consultation be kept separate from the question of the substantive merits of the policy involved.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 383 London, March 15, 1944

MOST SECRET. My telegram Circular D. 277 of February 23rd.† Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: You will, no doubt, have seen press reports of restrictions imposed by us on travel between Great Britain and Ireland (including both Eire and Northern Ireland). Position is that for some little time we have, at the instance of the military authorities concerned, had under examination what measures could be taken to provide increased security in connection with future operations from this country. These naturally included special measures in relation to Ireland in view of the possibility of leakage from there. The imposition of restrictions on travel which in substance is a reversion to the restrictions imposed in June, 1940, and then maintained for some months, was one of a number of precautions which have been and are still being considered. Owing to a leakage here that restrictions were about to be imposed on travel between Great Britain and Ireland, we found it necessary to take an immediate decision on this point and make an announcement at short notice. The press has inevitably connected our announcement on Monday with the publication of Mr. de Valera's note rejecting the recent approach by the United States for the removal of Axis representatives from Dublin. It will, however, be seen from the above that consideration of these two matters was proceeding independently.

It has been made clear in our announcement regarding travel restrictions that these are imposed for military reasons and will not be kept on longer than the particular situation which we contemplate requires. The same will apply to other measures which we may find it necessary to take, e.g., in regard to the diversion of shipping and closer control of telephonic communications. Ends.

TELEGRAM 43 Ottawa, March 20, 1944

IMPORTANT. MOST SECRET. Your telegram Circular D. 383 of March 15th. We are glad to learn that the restrictions imposed on travel to Ireland did not arise directly from the attempt to secure the expulsion of Axis representatives from Dublin, but had been in preparation for some time as additional security measures. We appreciate the need for all precautions. Might it not ease the position if an explanation were made to Mr. de Valera of the origin and purpose of these restrictions along the lines of your telegram? Otherwise he will undoubtedly interpret them (as we were inclined to interpret them before receipt of your telegram) as part of a policy of progressive pressure against Ireland which began with the presentation of the United States note on February 21st.

2. In general it seems to us that the recent developments concerning Ireland are matters of high concern to all the members of the Commonwealth. We were not consulted in advance of the attempt to secure the removal of Axis representatives nor were we informed of your intentions respecting travel restrictions. We note that these restrictions were described by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons on March 14th as "the first step in a policy designed to isolate Great Britain from Southern Ireland" during the critical period. If later steps are limited to actions necessary to prevent leakage of military information the Irish Government should have no reasonable cause for complaint as long as fear of ulterior political motives is not present in their minds.

3. This fear, however, undoubtedly prevails and what is done now may affect the position of Ireland in relation to the rest of the Commonwealth for many years to come. If Ireland is moved to leave the Commonwealth that is a matter of serious moment to us. We assume that you agree that no question of the expulsion of Ireland from the Commonwealth can arise except as the result of a decision reached by all the Commonwealth Governments.

4. We wish therefore to emphasize that we are concerned over the position that has arisen. We have felt from the first that the approach looking to the removal of the Axis representatives was not made in the form best designed to achieve its object, but we at once did what we could to persuade the Irish Government to comply. We have also publicly supported the action taken. We hope that there will be full consultation before any further steps are taken which are likely to have repercussions on the position of Ireland in the Commonwealth.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Dear Mr. Hearne,

May I refer to the discussions yesterday in Mr. Robertson's office, concerning the position of Irish citizens resident in Canada under the Canadian Selective Service Mobilization Regulations. It was understood that I should write a personal and confidential letter to you with regard to the action which we have taken.

We have given the most careful consideration to the possibility of drafting an amendment dealing with the position of Irish citizens, which would not be in conflict with existing Canadian statute law or inconsistent with our regulations applicable to nationals of other countries. After making several efforts, and being confronted with what appeared to be insuperable difficulties, we have been compelled to abandon the attempt to meet the Irish situation by a formal revision of the regulations. For obvious reasons it would be impossible to provide for a fundamental revision of our statutes dealing with various aspects of national status. Without such a revision it would be impossible to revise our regulations along the lines which you suggested.

It was therefore necessary to arrange for the deferment of the application of compulsory military training and service to Irish citizens in Canada, provided that —

(a) the person is able to establish the fact of Irish citizenship, e.g. by production of a certificate from the High Commissioner for Ireland or the presentation of an Irish passport;

(b) the person is not a Canadian national. (In other words, he would need to prove that he had not been born in Canada and that he had not lived in Canada for five years or more.)

Under this procedure all cases of designated Irish citizens who are called under the Mobilization Regulations will be referred to the Department of External Affairs. The Department will then, after full investigation, decide whether or not any particular designated Irish citizen meets the conditions set out above and, in proper cases, an application for postponement will be sent to the appropriate Divisional Registrar for consideration by the Mobilization Board of the division concerned.

This will meet, in a practical way, the difficulty which has been confronting your Government, although I fully appreciate that it does not bring about the desired amendment of the regulations themselves.

Yours sincerely,

J. E. READ

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Dear Mr. Read,

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your personal and confidential letter No. 715-F-6-40 of the 24th March which reached me on the 28th.

2. I wish to express to you our sincere thanks for the very careful and sympathetic consideration which the Department of External Affairs has given to the question of the exemption of Irish citizens, as nationals of a neutral country, from compulsory service in Canadian armed forces.

3. It is noted from your letter that, while you have found it impossible to meet the situation by a formal revision of the Selective Service Mobilization Regulations, you have, nevertheless, been able to devise appropriate administrative measures for the exemption, in practice, of Irish citizens who are not Canadian nationals by birth or residence in this country.

4. It is assumed that the practical measures outlined in your letter will safeguard the position of those Irish citizens who, prior to the date of your letter, had claimed exemption or had raised the question of their status with a view to making a claim for exemption, and who were not Canadian nationals at the time at which the claim was made or the question of status raised. The arrangement proposed is, therefore, understood in the sense that it will make provision to secure that the claims of those Irish citizens will not be defeated by the lapse of time (pending a decision on the question of policy) since their claims were made or the question of their status raised. With regard to the application of the arrangement to those cases it is suggested that a claim for exemption, or a query as to status, addressed to the Selective Service authorities, or communicated to your Department or to this Mission, would, in the absence of any previous machinery, be sufficient to bring them within its scope.

5. I am now permitted to inform you that, in the absence of a formal revision of the Selective Service Mobilization regulations the arrangement outlined in your letter of the 24th March is satisfactory to us subject to the understanding stated in paragraph 4 hereof.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN J. HEARNE

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 24, 1944

Dear Mr. Hearne:

May I refer to your personal and confidential letter No. 344/25-23/13 of April 3, 1944.

I am pleased to hear that the arrangement respecting the application of Canadian Selective Service Mobilization Regulations to Irish citizens as outlined in my letter of March 24, 1944 is satisfactory to your Government.

With reference to the point raised in paragraph 4 of your letter under reference, I believe that no real difficulty will arise. I am advised that in cases currently before the Mobilization authorities which have not been disposed of pending the establishment of the administrative arrangement, the date of the call-up under our Mobilization Regulations is the decisive date in determining their applicability to citizens of Ireland, and not the date of the actual decision after objection and investigation.

Consequently, if, in such undisposed cases, it is found after investigation that the applicant for deferment meets conditions (a) and (b) set out in my letter of March 24 as of the date he received his call, the application for postponement will be made to the appropriate Mobilization Board on his behalf, regardless of the fact that, in the meantime, he may have become a Canadian national under our law by reason of the fact that the five years' residence has then been established. The same considerations will, of course, apply to new cases currently arising.

Under these circumstances, I think you will agree that in the administration of the Mobilization Regulations, the position of such Irish citizens is adequately safeguarded.

Yours sincerely,

J. E. READ

Memorandum by Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] September 19, 1944

During the Prime Ministers' meetings in London in May I had some conversation with Sir Eric Machtig.[96]. He was not disposed to dissent from the general position taken in our telegram to the Dominions Office No. 43 of March 20. The Dominions Office has not been very happy about the handling of Irish relations in February and March, but they thought that the crisis was comfortably passed and that it had left Anglo-Irish relatons better than they had been before. So far as the United Kingdom was concerned, the only issue then outstanding was the continued detention in internment of some 8 R.A.F. personnel who had been forced down in Ireland. These 8 were all that were left out of some 140 Commonwealth air crew who had at one time or other been interned by the Irish Government and were at that time (in May) being held by de Valera as a visible "token" of his policy of neutrality. The United Kingdom were working very hard to bring about their release and shortly after our visit to London succeeded in doing so.

Machtig asked me if we were likely to insist on receiving a reply to our telegram under reference. I told him I did not think an answer was necessary. The immediate cause of dispute had been disposed of and we had made our point of view plain to the other countries of the Commonwealth. Matters might therefore be left as they were.

DESPATCH 151 Dublin, November 27, 1944

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,—

I have the honour to acknowledge your air mail despatch No. 101 of November 1, 1944[97] relative to Canada's post-war external trade in sterling areas.

2. In regard to your request for "any evidence of the loss to Canada of trade which we enjoyed in prewar years or of threats to such trade as we might reasonably expect if the currency difficulties were not present" — briefly, my reply is as follows:—

3. Prior to the war, Canada's main exports to Ireland were wheat, newsprint, and timber. Insofar as I can see, not reckoning on exchange difficulties, the post-war Irish market for Canadian wheat will remain at about the same level as the pre-war market, and a substantially increased market may reasonably be looked for with respect to newsprint and timber. In addition, there should be an unprecedented demand in Ireland for machinery of all kinds, much of which I think Canada might supply if she so desires.

4. As an aid in solving the post-war relationship of sterling and dollar areas, insofar as Ireland is concerned I suggest for your consideration that Canada should advance long-term credits to Ireland for the purchase of Canadian goods direct, and not through Great Britain as an intermediary. By development and concentration on sending exports to the non-sterling areas, Ireland might in time be able to acquire sufficient exchange to repay in Canadian dollars, at least partially, if not in toto, the advances thus made.

5. I have sounded out the attitude of the Irish Government on the subject matter in question, and attached hereto you will find a memorandum† dealing more fully with the questions raised in your despatch. I have delayed sending this despatch with the memorandum attached, pending the receipt from the Irish Government of trade statistics† for the war years, which have heretofore been secret, but which they have agreed to furnish to me. The statistics in question have not yet come to hand, and I have decided not to delay this despatch any longer on their account.

6. In paragraph 20 of my memorandum I also refer as being attached an appraisal† of the situation by our Canadian Government Trade Commissioner, Mr. McColl, which includes a description of possible exports. As Mr. McColl's observations are dependent in some measure on the statistics not yet available, I am unable to forward them herewith, but shall do so as quickly as possible.

7. I observe from your despatch that you have been in communication with Honourable Mr. Massey in connection with post-war trade in Great Britain, and I am sending him a copy of this despatch together with my memorandum.

1. In the course of this afternoon's meeting at the Dominions Office, there was an important disclosure regarding the policy of the new Government towards Ireland.

2. Addison revealed that the Cabinet had approved a memorandum he had submitted recommending a policy of "friendship without ostentation". He said that Dulanty[98] had come to see him with the explanation that someone must break the ice and he was prepared to do it. He indicated that the Irish Government was interested in getting back into the circle of Commonwealth consultation and communication. Addison made it clear to us that he was anxious to be co-operative with the Irish, and the Government was considering inviting Irish participation in Commonwealth discussions of telecommunications and possibly civil aviation.

3. The South African High Commissioner revealed that Dulanty had also come to see him and had spoken in the same vein indicating that he was expressing de Valera's wishes. Dulanty spoke of the Irish desire to let bygones be bygones. He also suggested that he would like to attend the High Commissioners' meetings. Nicholls thought it might be desirable to prepare the public mind to accept rapprochement by letting it be known that the Irish High Commissioner was attending these meetings.

4. Evatt indicated that Australia would favour these proposals to bring Ireland back into the association.

5. There was general recognition, stressed by Addison, that the matter would have to be handled quietly and tactfully because public opinion on both sides would need education. Nicholls[99] suggested that South Africa or the other Dominions might make some suitable statements to prepare the way as there was not in their countries the bitterness towards Ireland which existed in the United Kingdom. Addison expressed his gratitude for this suggestion.

6. Addison expressed the desire to talk this matter over with the Commonwealth representatives at an early opportunity. He promised to give us copies of his memorandum to the Cabinet† which I shall forward to you. As this meeting may be called soon, I should be grateful for your instructions as to the attitude which I should take.

1. We are glad to hear of Irish approach and of Addison's policy, approved by the Cabinet, of friendship without ostentation. We would like to see this path followed as rapidly as public opinion in the United Kingdom will permit. We do not anticipate that there will be any serious criticism of such a policy in Canada.

2. The Irish Government doubtless is feeling rather friendless in the difficult world of today and we gather that they are increasingly conscious that their position during the war has greatly diminished their importance, both inside and outside the Commonwealth.

3. You may inform Addison that we would welcome the re-admission of Ireland to the Commonwealth circle and generally endorse his point of view. Since it is most desirable that there should be as little public controversy as possible on this question, we feel that the United Kingdom should be the chief judge of how fast progress can be made in this direction without arousing domestic opposition. If it is felt that a personal message from me to de Valera would be of value, I should be glad to give consideration to its despatch.

Your telegram No. 50 of May 1st re double taxation agreement. Draft agreement submitted by New Zealand Government[100] in connection with granting of reciprocal exemption from income tax has been examined by Department of National Revenue and in their opinion the draft forms satisfactory basis for discussion between the two countries.

It would be preferable from our point of view to use the term "chargeable by (repeat by) the Dominion" in Articles 2 and 4 rather than "in (repeat in) the Dominion." The latter wording would be wide enough to include any taxes which may be administered by the Provinces of the Dominion, and the Dominion in entering into any Agreement with New Zealand could not bind the Provinces in respect of any taxes imposed by Provincial Legislation.[101] While for duration of war the Dominion is collecting all income taxes imposed on individuals and the Provinces have vacated this field temporarily, there are certain corporate taxes still being imposed and collected by the Provinces.

Copies of an Office Consolidation of our Income Tax Law† and pamphlet setting out conditions affecting carrying on of business in Canada† are going to you by air mail. This will doubtless be of assistance to New Zealand Government when considering provisions of Income War Tax Act.

Government consider that as Agreement binds Dominion Governments but not Provincial Governments, the reciprocal nature of the Agreement may be affected if any Provincial Government should recommence to impose and collect income tax after the end of the war, and ask whether it may be considered advisable to terminate Agreement under Clause 6 in such an event. (Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreement Act, 1942, was shown to competent officials in this connection.)

(2) New Zealand Government would also appreciate advice of the Canadian Government with regard to nature of "certain corporate taxes" at present being imposed by the Provinces. They assume "such taxes are in the nature of annual license fee for permission to trade and are not true income taxes and that such corporate taxes may not have affected persons who are entitled to exemption in Canada under the Agreement — namely persons resident in New Zealand and not in Canada and not having any branch or management in Canada but merely trading in Canada through agents."

(3) New Zealand Government assume, as no comment has been made upon alteration in Articles 1, 2, 3 and 4, with regard to commencement of operation of Agreement, the Canadian Government agrees with alterations, and in particular with wording "in respect to 1943 taxation period" in Articles 2 and 4. (There are 2 texts of New Zealand amended proposals on file identical except for year in Article 2 and 4. There is doubt as to whether copies forwarded to you with my despatch No. 199 of August 19th, 1943, read "1943" or "1944" taxation period. The New Zealand Government understands "1943 taxation period" in Canada most closely corresponds to "year of assessment commencing April 1st, 1943" in New Zealand.)

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

DESPATCH 124 Ottawa, October 10, 1944

Sir,—

I have the honour to refer to your telegram No. 52 of May 29th, 1944, regarding the proposed agreement between Canada and New Zealand for the avoidance of double taxation.

2. The Canadian authorities consider that the scope of the proposed agreement must be confined to the field of Federal income taxes and not extended to include or be affected by the right of provincial or state jurisdictions, which are sub-divisions of the Federal governments, to impose provincial or state income tax legislation within their proper competence. The provincial governments of Canada have vacated the income tax field only for the duration of the war. When hostilities have ended, the agreement under which these governments temporarily ceased to impose and collect income taxes, both personal and corporate, will be terminated. There is no doubt that the provincial authorities will be anxious to have their source of revenue from income taxes reinstated as soon as possible after the defeat of the enemy, and that they would resist any attempt to fetter their freedom of action by international agreement.

3. It is regretted that it is not possible to specify and to describe the "certain corporate taxes" at present being imposed by the provinces of Canada. Some of these taxes are undoubtedly in the nature of annual licence fees for permission to trade and are therefore not true income taxes, but complete information could not be given without careful examination of all the Canadian provincial legislation regarding taxation. These provincial taxes cannot be brought within the scope of the proposed agreement.

4. The copy of the draft agreement received by the Department of National Revenue (Taxation) refers in Articles 2 and 4 to "the 1944 taxation period." If the following reasoning is correct, then the 1944 taxation period in Canada would correspond roughly to "the year of assessment commencing on April 1st, 1943" in New Zealand.

a) It appears to us that if Articles 2 and 4 were changed to read "the 1943 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein" it would mean that if a New Zealand taxpayer operating in Canada and subject to tax in Canada had a fiscal period ending January 31st, 1943, he would be exempt from Canadian income tax for that period although eleven months of his twelve-month fiscal period were back in the year 1942, and only one month was in 1943. This would be giving the New Zealand taxpayer a whole year's advantage over the reciprocal relief to be extended to a Canadian taxpayer by the New Zealand Government under Articles 1 and 3, as the Canadian taxpayer would only obtain relief for a year of assessment commencing on April 1st, 1943, which presumably would be a year of assessment of the business between April 1st, 1943 and March 31st, 1944.

b) It may be that a Canadian taxpayer operating in New Zealand, even though his fiscal period ends June 30th, 1943, would be required to file his income tax return with the New Zealand Government for a period from April 1st, 1943, to March 31st, 1944, and if this is the case it would seem that the figures 1944 in Articles 2 and 4 should not be changed to 1943.

c) As Articles 2 and 4 stand in the copy of the draft agreement examined by the Department of National Revenue (Taxation) the phrase "the 1944 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein" apparently means that any corporation whose fiscal period ends at any time between January 1st, 1944 and December 31st, 1944 would be covered so that a corporation whose fiscal period ended on January 15th, 1944 would obtain exemption although eleven and one-half months of its 1944 fiscal period extended back into the calendar year 1943.

5. I should appreciate it if you would discuss these questions with the New Zealand authorities. If you find that the New Zealand Government is substantially in accord with the Canadian position, you might inform them that we should be very grateful if a revised text could be prepared in order to expedite the conclusion of the agreement.

I have etc.

DESPATCH 200 Wellington, December 11, 1944

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

With reference to your despatch No. 136 of November 1st[102] regarding to the threat to Canadian trade in the sterling area owing to the lack of dollar exchange, I have the honour to inform you that I shall be glad to report on specific cases that may come to my attention.

2. Canadian trade with New Zealand, since my arrival here, has suffered from the fact that New Zealand has considered that she has had to conserve her dollar exchange. The whole policy of import restriction is based very largely on the assumption that New Zealand purchases abroad not only must be controlled but also must, as far as possible, be restricted to the sterling area. The Minister of Finance, the Hon. Walter Nash, has, on numerous occasions, pointed out to me that since the United Kingdom is New Zealand's chief export market she must always be given the first opportunity of supplying New Zealand requirements. I see no possibility of the present government altering this policy.

3. For instance, the awarding of contracts for the supply of hydro-electric equipment, which I understand will be considered in the next month or six weeks, will, I believe, be determined not from the standpoint of technical superiority or of price but very largely from the standpoint of whether the United Kingdom can supply this equipment in time. I am convinced that the technical people in New Zealand consider Canadian equipment far superior to British equipment. As I pointed out in my despatch No. 47 of February 17th,† if the contracts were to be awarded purely on technical merits, either Canadian or Swedish tenders would be accepted in preference to British tenders.

4. I fully agree that "we cannot accept diversion of trade as inevitable," but on the other hand it will be necessary, so far as New Zealand is concerned "to explore every possibility with them in the hope of finding some arrangement that will meet the legitimate requirements of both countries." Nevertheless, it will be necessary that this exploration should be made if Canadian exports to New Zealand are not to be limited very largely by the amount of our imports from New Zealand. One of the difficulties that Canada will face, should it be found possible to take more imports from New Zealand will be that they may not be available since the United Kingdom has already contracted to take dairy produce from New Zealand until 1948 and the total wool clip until one year after the war.

5. An editorial in The New Zealand Herald is fairly typical of public opinion here as regards trade within the sterling block. Referring to British export trade and the lump sum payments referred to in my telegram No. 67 of August 9th,† it states; "Her great hope is to rebuild her export trade to its former dimensions and then increase it by half. New Zealand should do all she can to second that effort. First the Government should pledge the country to spend every penny of the lump sums in Britain. Next it should not try to negotiate the sterling earnings of New Zealand produce for foreign currencies, but devote them instead to purchases within the sterling area. By following this trade policy we shall be helping ourselves by helping our best customer. That is sound business and it combines with sentiment and justice for, as Sir Harry Batterbee told Dunedin Rotarians the other day, 'It would be extremely unfortunate if England were to lose her markets abroad after she has put all her efforts into the war.' "

6. We may not like the United Kingdom High Commissioner's appeal to sentiment in the furtherance of British trade but it is very difficult to combat in view of the appeal it makes to the people of New Zealand. Australia, on the other hand, takes every opportunity offered by her membership in the sterling block to advance her trade. "Anzac" and what it stands for, as well as the recent Australian-New Zealand Agreement are also being appealed to for the furtherance of trade relations of the two countries.

7. Canada's position is not, however, as unfavourable as it might seem for in the past New Zealanders have been very well satisfied with their imports from Canada. There is likely to be sufficient effective demand to secure for us a fair share of New Zealand's trade but we will need to be watchful of New Zealand's selective import policy being used to discriminate against Canadian trade. Our recent Mutual Aid Agreement[103] has created a lot of good feeling in New Zealand and will more or less offset some of the advantages of our chief competitors.

I have etc.,

DESPATCH 20 Wellington, February 22, 1945

Sir,

With reference to my despatch No. 9 of February 8th† regarding taxation of non-resident traders, I have just received a letter over the signature of the Prime Minister, the Rt. Hon. Peter Fraser, stating:

2. "I have the honour to refer to your letter of the 13th November 1944,† with regard to the proposed Agreement between New Zealand and Canada for the avoidance of double taxation.

3. "It is clearly understood that the Agreement relates only to federal taxes and not to taxes imposed by the provincial governments, and in the event of the provinces resuming the function of imposing taxes, His Majesty's Government in New Zealand may consider it desirable to terminate the Agreement in respect of any province by giving six months notice in accordance with Article 6. Prompt advice from your Government of the resumption by any province of the right to impose income taxation would be appreciated.

4. "With regard to the corporation taxes imposed by the various provincial governments it would appear that, in general, such taxes are similar in nature to the license fees imposed by the New Zealand Government, and it is proposed to conclude the proposed Agreement notwithstanding the existence of such taxes.

5. "With regard to the comments relating to the appropriate date to be inserted in Articles 2 and 4 of the proposed Agreement, it appears that your Government is under a misapprehension as to the date from which Articles 1 and 3 of such Agreement, relating to the exemption from taxation granted by the New Zealand Government, commence to operate. These Articles apply for the year of assessment commencing on 1st April, 1943, and therefore operate to exempt income derived during the preceding income year commencing on 1st April 1942 and ending on 31st March, 1943. Where a taxpayer furnishes returns of income for a financial year ending on a balance date other than 31st March, the income derived during such financial year is, according to New Zealand law, deemed to be derived during the income year ended on 31st March nearest to such balance date. It follows that returns furnished for a financial year ending on any date between 1st October, 1942, and 30th September, 1943, (and therefore commencing on any date between 2nd October 1941 and 1st October 1942) will be deemed to be returns of income for the income year ended 31st March, 1943, and such income will be exempt from taxation accordingly.

6. "If the words 'the 1943 taxation period' are inserted in Articles 2 and 4 of the proposed Agreement the exemption conferred by the Canadian Government will operate in respect of the income included in the returns for any year ending on a date between 1st January, 1943, and 31st December, 1943, (and therefore commencing on a date between 2nd January, 1942 and 1st January, 1943). It is apparent, therefore, that the exemption granted by the New Zealand Government may operate in respect of income derived on or after 2nd October, 1941, in cases where a taxpayer's balance date is on 1st October, whereas the exemption granted by the Canadian Government cannot operate in respect of income derived prior to 2nd January 1942.

7. "It accordingly appears that the words 'the 1944 taxation period' appearing in the draft Agreement already forwarded should be deleted and the words 'the 1943 taxation period' substituted therefor. As this is the only alteration which it is considered necessary to make in the terms of the draft Agreement submitted, it is not proposed to forward a revised draft Agreement."

8. When I discussed the matter with the Minister of Finance, the Hon. Walter Nash, he pointed out that in order to render the proposed agreement as nearly reciprocal as possible and to avoid expense in administration by requesting traders to make unnecessary apportionments when furnishing returns, it had been considered advisable to substitute the words "1943 taxation period" for the words "1944 taxation period" in Articles 2 and 4.

9. The reason for this, he explained, was that under New Zealand taxation law, returns furnished to March 31st, 1943, are assessed in the assessment year ending March 31st, 1944, the tax normally being due and payable in February, 1944. Returns furnished for the year ending March 31st, 1943, however, include all accounting periods ending from October 1st, 1942, to September 30th, 1943, which accordingly include all income earned to those cases back as far as October 2nd, 1941.

10. He considered that it would readily be seen that the necessary apportionments and amendment of accounts would lead to additional expense and also to confusion, which he wished to avoid. He hoped, therefore, that this explanation would enable the distinction between the two taxing statutes to be more readily appreciated.

11. You will observe that the Government of New Zealand is ready to conclude the Agreement notwithstanding the possibility that provincial taxation may, to some extent, impose taxation at variance with the general tenor of the agreement, and that in such event they would only consider denouncing it as regards the Province concerned.

12. In my conversations with the Minister of Finance and the taxation authorities, they are still of the opinion that the substitution of the words "1943 taxation period" for the words "1944 taxation period" would assure the most equitable arrangement. As they are convinced that New Zealand would be conceding more under the Agreement than Canada because of their taxation procedure and as very small sums are, or are likely to be involved, I would strongly urge that the Agreement be concluded on the basis proposed in the letter from the New Zealand Prime Minister.

Déclaration de la Sun Life Assurance Company
Statement by Sun Life Assurance Company

February 5, 1944

DEPOSIT OF SECURITIES IN OTTAWA
WITH SOUTH AFRICAN GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVE IN CANADA
BY THE SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

A new South African Insurance Act was passed in 1943. The Act had been declared "effective" as from April 1, 1944.

In general this Act controls the operations of all insurance companies in South Africa and, amongst other things, requires certain investments to be made in South Africa and also requires, under certain circumstances, a deposit of securities to be made outside South Africa.

The question in which the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada is immediately interested relates to the question of deposit outside of the Union, involving an amount of approximately $7,500,000.

The following is the relevant section of the Act, so far as deposit is concerned:

"17(1). After the expiration of a period of six months as from the commencement of this Act, every registered insurer shall hold and keep within the Union, in respect of the insurance business which he carries on in the Union, assets of a value not less than the amount of all his liabilities in respect of that business: Provided that, during a period of five years and six months as from the commencement of this Act, any securities belonging to a registered insurer who immediately before the commencement of this Act was carrying on insurance business in the Union, which he has deposited or may deposit, with the Union's High Commissioner in London, or may deposit with the Union's High Commissioners in Australia, Canada or New Zealand, if such High Commissioners should be appointed, shall be deemed, for the purposes of this subsection, to be held by the insurer in the Union: Provided further that, during the said period, such insurer shall not transfer any assets from the Union for the purpose of deposit as aforesaid."

Last summer, on receipt of the text of the new Act from South Africa, we had assumed that we could make a deposit of securities, if we wished, with the Union Government's Representative in Ottawa. We had noted that he is technically styled "Accredited Representative", but had been given to understand, both by officials of the Department of External Affairs, as well as by Mr. de Waal Meyer himself, that he was, for all practical purposes, a High Commissioner, and that such purposes could be expected to include the sort of deposit referred to in the above quoted Section of the South African Act.

In December, 1943, however, we received advice from Mr. de Waal Meyer, to the effect that he had, on his own initiatve , communicated last summer with the Union Government in Pretoria on this point, drawing to their attention, we believe, certain statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Hofmeyr) in the Assembly Debates of April 9, 1943 (pages 5130 and 5132), in which the Finance Minister stated that he was prepared to amend Section 17(1) of the Act to include the words "or may deposit with the Union High Commissioner in Australia, Canada or New Zealand, if such High Commissioner should be appointed" — these words at that time not being then included in the Insurance Bill. Apparently Mr. de Waal Meyer's point of view was that the Finance Minister had made an incorrect reference in the Debates by implying that there was not, in effect, a High Commissioner in Canada. Mr. Meyer appeared to be concerned that references in the Assembly Debates should be more accurately expressed. At any rate, his communications were made purely on his own initiative, and without any request, or even suggestion, from us that he should do so.

In December last, we received a letter (attached) from Mr. Meyer,† which we acknowledged in due course (also attached).† This left us with the alternative of either making a deposit with the Union High Commissioner in London, or of sending non-Union securities to South Africa. The latter action would also conform to the requirements of the Law, which is satisfied either with the physical maintenance of assets in South Africa or with formal deposit in the event of assets being maintained outside of the Union.

The companies affected by the South African Insurance Act include a number of British companies who, for various reasons of their own, partly arising from legal conditions prevailing in England, have indicated a reluctance to make any deposit which is in the nature of a trust. However, when it became apparent that we could not, for the present, make the deposit in Ottawa, in spite of the provisions referring to a High Commissioner in Canada, contained in Section 17(1), we inclined to prefer making a deposit in London, rather than send non-Union securities to South Africa, which would be both exceedingly expensive (even in the case of registered securities) and unsatisfactory from many points of view, e.g., the fact that the securities would be several thousand miles away from the market in which dealings would take place should the Company wish to effect substitutions in the deposit.

At this point, about two weeks ago, we received from the Registrar of Insurance in South Africa, a proposed agreement covering any securities to be deposited with the Union's High Commissioner in London. Our lawyers find that this proposed agreement is completely unsatisfactory on various counts. It fails to safeguard either the Sun Life or its policyholders adequately, and it shows no adequate understanding of the practical requirements needed in any deposit agreement involving securities.

The Law requires that this deposit has to be effected by October 1st, i.e., within six months of the effective date. It will be virtually impossible, owing to shortage of time and slowness of communication, to complete the rather detailed and intricate negotiations with the Registrar in Pretoria, which would be required before there was any chance of a satisfactory agreement being arrived at. The situation, so far as the London deposit is concerned, is complicated by the attitude of the British companies and what appears to be a fact, namely the desire of the Registrar in Pretoria to have a single form of agreement used by all companies making a deposit in London. Further, it is quite conceivable that the British companies, because of their special attitude towards deposit, may prefer to send securities to South Africa to be held there. On the other hand, for the reasons already mentioned, this would be most unsatisfactory for the Sun Life.

The whole problem can be solved, from our point of view, if the present "Accredited Representative" can come to be regarded by the South African Government as a High Commissioner, for the purposes of Section 17(1) of the Insurance Act, or perhaps be restyled "High Commissioner".

Of course it would still remain for the Sun Life to negotiate a deposit agreement satisfactory to the Registrar in Pretoria, but this should be more easy to accomplish than in the case of the proposed agreement for London for two reasons: firstly, that it would be a direct operation between the Sun Life and the Registrar without the complication of considering the differing attitudes of United Kingdom companies;[105] and secondly, that in Canada we could make, and would be prepared to make, a trust agreement covering these securities which would give the South African Government much better legal protection than they would receive from the type of agreement which they have already actually proposed for London.

Even if the negotiations for this agreement involved more delay than we expect, due to difficulties that might be created by the Registrar in Pretoria, Section 66 of the South African Insurance Act provides that —

"When an insurer is obliged, in terms of any provision of this Act, to perform any act within a specified period, the Registrar may, at the request of the insurer concerned, in any particular case, extend that period from time to time."

Cape Town, May 4, 1944

Dear Mr. Pohl,

Since the date of my conference with you on April the 24th, with respect to the Insurance Act, 1943, I have obtained some further information from Canada.

I called your attention to the fact that under Section 17(1) of the Act, the deposit of securities may be made with the Union's High Commissioner in Canada, but that at the present time, the title of your representative in Canada is "Accredited Representative". Under the proper construction of the Act, I do not think that it will be possible for the Sun Life Insurance Company, and the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company, which are the two Canadian companies operating in South Africa, to deposit securities in Canada, and the deposit will, therefore, have to be made, either in London with the High Commissioner there, or the securities will have to be forwarded to South Africa.

For the reasons which I mentioned to you in our conference, the deposit of securities in London is objectionable, and the forwarding of insurance is so excessive, that it is practically prohibitive. For example, the cost of insuring $7½ million of registered securities destined for South Africa, would amount to approximately $123,000 as against the peace time cost of $6,000.

It would therefore be appreciated by my Government if an amendment could be made to section 17 of the Act, which would authorize the Minister of Finance to nominate the representative of the Union Government in Canada, by whatever name he may be styled, as a depository in connection with Canadian Life Insurance Companies.

Sir,

With further reference to your letter of the 4th, May, 1944, relative to the South African Insurance Act, 1943, I have the honour to inform you that the competent Union authorities have decided to amend the above Act but it will, however, not be possible to proceed with this amendment until the next session of Parliament. In the meanwhile steps will be taken to prevent embarrassment to Canadian companies, pending an opportunity to lay the proposed amendment before Parliament, by extending the period within which deposits have to be made. DESPATCH 265 Pretoria, December 11, 1944

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 153 of November 1st[106] in which you enquire on behalf of the External Trade Advisory Committee if there has been any evidence of attempts to divert trade with this country from Canada to the sterling area.

2. When restrictions on imports into the Union were first introduced in September, 1941, they were openly discriminatory against Canada and other non-sterling countries. A list of commodities was gazetted, the importation of which were prohibited if of non-sterling area origin. Before that time the British authorities exerted considerable pressure on the South African Government to adopt such restrictions, and afterwards they were active in diverting trade from Canadian to United Kingdom channels. The British Trade

[106]Voir le document 826./See Document 826.

Commissioner, who incidentally is still here, was very busy in this connection. With the passing of time, however, and increasing shipping and raw material difficulties, United Kingdom exporters found themselves, to an increasing extent, unable to supply, and with the increase of export and import restrictions in all countries the discrimination which had existed was gradually abandoned.

3. In commercial circles it was often alleged that Britain was continuing to offer goods for export which had long since ceased to be obtainable from Canada or the United States, owing to their being required for the war effort. In other words, the inference was that the British were trying to keep their trade alive to a greater extent than we did, and for quite a while there was a lot of use of the slogan "Britain Delivers the Goods", "Business as Usual", and so on. This, of course, was not direct diversion but it is allied to the subject and I mention it in passing.

4. In any event, we have had no complaints on the question of diversion for about two years, and fairly exhaustive enquiries which were made following the receipt of your despatch, have failed to unearth anything of importance.

5. British interests are taking a keen interest in their postwar trading position in this country, which was one of their leading markets. So far, however, they appear to be making sentimental appeals rather than to be working on the basis of an alleged shortage of Canadian dollars or of shipping facilities. It has recently been alleged by a member of the British Parliamentary delegation who visited the Union a few months ago, that British trade has been diverted to the United States.

6. The Canadian Trade Commissioner in Johannesburg, who is in close direct touch with the commercial community, has been asked for an expression of opinion on this subject. He advises that while he has come across no large scale attempts, there have been a number of small cases which might indicate that the principle has not been completely abandoned. He has written in this connection as follows:—

"There is, in my experience, no positive indication of attempts to divert trade in South Africa from Canada to the United Kingdom, but there are a number of little facts which might support a view that such attempts have or are being made.

At the beginning of the year my Department advised that we could offer one million yards of woollen piece goods to South Africa; before any finalization was reached, my Department informed me that this offer had been withdrawn at the request of the United Kingdom authorities.

Early in the year, when I was in frequent contact with the Controller of Iron and Steel regarding the desirability of accepting offers then being made from Canada, at one meeting the then Deputy Director-General of Supplies, produced a substantial report on steel supplies in the United Nations which had sections dealing with the production of steel in the United Kingdom, the United States, India, Australia and South Africa. There was no section on Canada. That report, I understand, was prepared by a representative of the Steel Control in the United Kingdom together with a representative of steel production in the United States.

Three months or so ago while discussing supplies of drugs and medicines with the Controller of Medical Requisites, he informed me that he had received a very complete report on the supply position in the United Kingdom, the United States, and possibly elsewhere, but that report made no mention of Canada as a possible source of supply.

There is, too, the fact that, especially earlier in the year, South African Controllers as a whole were instructed by the Director-General of Supplies that imports must be referred to Combined Boards in London. This caused some difficulties as, for example, when the agent for a Canadian manufacturer of aluminium powder informed me that his customers applying for import permits for about a total of 39 tons (of considerable value) were informed by the new Controller of Non-Ferrous Materials that their product could not be imported from Canada and must be purchased in the United Kingdom. I was successful in drawing the attention of the Controller to the fact that the ruling he was applying was applicable only to materials for military purposes.

The above are merely minor incidents which in themselves have no definite value but which, taken as a whole, might readily cause one to suspect that they form part of a concerted plan. Obviously, however, that is merely a suspicion.

Concerning business with the British Colonies in Central Africa, I have encountered difficulties from time to time in persuading the authorities to programme on Canada (e.g. agricultural implements for Northern Rhodesia) but those difficulties have, in the main, been overcome and reasonable proportions of business have frequently been programmed on Canada.

I have certainly found no disinclination whatsoever, on the part of the South African Controllers and similar authorities with whom I maintain contact, to give Canada and Canadian producers every opportunity to make offers. I do not refer to such obvious instances as the Paper Control which turns to Canada for a great part of the supplies required in the Union, though relations with that Control are very happy indeed. I have in mind more particularly the Textile Control. On each occasion when I have asked whether they would be prepared to programme on Canada for any particular type of goods they have invariably replied asking how much we can supply, and they will willingly include it in the programme. This, to some extent, negatives the points mentioned above and on that theme I should call your attention to the fact that the Steel Control in recent months has been willing to accept practically all offers from Canada but those offers have mainly been limited to pipe.

All in all, while at times I have been suspicious, I have no definite proof nor experience which would indicate that the United Kingdom authorities are making any serious attempt to divert South African trade from Canada to the United Kingdom."

7. In connection with the broad question of the diversion of trade to the United Kingdom, the domestic political background in the Union must also not be lost sight of. Since the Prime Minister's London speech of last November when he spoke of an impoverished Britain after the war, the Nationalist press and political leaders have been warning the Government that this country must not be thrown open to a flood of British goods.

8. When speaking thus they are, of course, thinking about South African industry and production. Nevertheless, their economic policy favours doing business with everyone and is opposed to preference to anyone, particularly to the United Kingdom, for which reason I am doubtful if the Government would take any step which would make it evident that trade was deliberately being switched from other countries to Great Britain.

9. Before closing, and for whatever it may be worth, I will mention that when making enquiries on the subject, the head of the economic and commercial division of the Department of External Affairs volunteered the information that we should watch our market in this country for automotive products. Before the war automobile parts used to be one of our leading exports to South Africa, and he implied that something was pending which might prejudice that business.

10. Whether there is a connection or not I do not know, but Lord Nuffield[107] has been here in the Union for the past few weeks looking into the prospects for selling British cars after the war. On the other hand, as most of our parts are assembled here by what is considered a domestic industry, it is difficult to see how we can be harmed, unless the United Kingdom competitors are able to offer something more attractive to individual purchasers which, on the whole, they were not able to do prior to 1940.

11. We will keep this whole subject in mind and if there are any developments you will be advised accordingly. In the meantime, the answer to your enquiry is, as indicated, largely negative.

UNITED STATES POLICY TOWARDS CANADA

Is the United States unduly aggressive?

Concern has been expressed by some Canadians that Canada may be in danger of becoming for practical purposes an adjunct of the United States without the formalities of annexation, and that in its relations with us the United States is becoming more insistent on getting its own way than is consistent with good relations between neighbouring countries. This feeling is reflected in the circulation of such stories as that of the United States Army telephone operator in the Canadian Northwest who is supposed to answer all calls, "United States Army of Occupation." To what extent have good relations between the two countries deteriorated under the pressure of war conditions?

Successful wartime collaboration.

It must first be emphasized that despite irritants which have crept in, which will be dealt with later, the record of collaboration between Canada and the United States has been one of which both countries can be proud. In August, 1940, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence was set up and in April, 1941, the Hyde Park Agreement was announced.[1] There followed a close degree of consultation and coordination in the fields of both military effort and civilian production. Representatives of Munitions and Supply and the Wartime Prices and Trade Board established direct contact with their opposite numbers in

[1]Voir le volume 8, documents 93, 191./See Volume 8, Documents 93, 191.

Washington and were on the whole successful (with inevitable minor disagreements) in working out satisfactory arrangements for pooling the resources of the two countries for war production and civilian supply. Shipping, export control, economic warfare, censorship and various other fields have been characterized by close collaboration and fairly harmonious relations. The various joint wartime Canada-United States bodies such as the Joint Economic Committees and the Joint War Production Committee performed useful functions in working out these satisfactory arrangements.

Sources of Friction.

However, there is another side to the picture. There is in the United States some adherence to the view that participation in the war is a favour which the United States is conferring on humanity and which carries with it the right to run things their own way. Put in a slightly different form this is the feeling, expressed by the Washington Times-Herald, that the United States is in danger of losing its shirt to a pack of grasping allies and must insist on being reimbursed for its contributions. There is also the belief that "the American way" is by definition the best way. This outlook reinforces the natural desire of every country to protect and further its own interests. The result is a tendency to overlook the rights and feelings of smaller countries and an unwillingness to compromise when United States claims are contested by other nations. Every nation that has dealings with the United States has found this to be true; Latin America, Australasia and the Middle East are three widely separated areas that can be cited. Since Canada has closer relations with the United States than any other country, it would be surprising if we were not affected by those tendencies.

Pre-war relations.

In the pre-war period Canada had exceptionally good relations with the United States based on frankness and mutual understanding. Happily, there was an absence of the rather patronizing paternalism which is part of the Good Neighbour Policy. The State Department took special care to preserve these good relations, presumably because the interests of the United States were much better protected in this way than they could ever be by any policy savouring of domination which would arouse resentment in Canada. For this the credit goes largely to the European Division of the State Department which possessed excellent knowledge and understanding of Canadian conditions.

Reasons for changes.

The following seem to be the principal reasons for a somewhat brusquer tone on the part of the United States:

(1) Elements in the Administration in Washington are very set on getting their own way. Whereas in the past the European Division of the State Department were able to eliminate many of the tactless proposals put forward by other branches of the government, they are at present either unwilling or unable to do so. It is probably more inability than unwillingness, for the State Department's star has paled in comparison to the brighter gleams of the services and some of the special wartime agencies. Moreover, our relations with the State Department cover a relatively wider area then they did in peacetime, and other divisions of the department are not always prepared to give the same consideration to Canadian views as the European Division.

(2) The Army and Navy are in a strong position. They dislike the civil departments and the State Department in particular and they are reluctant to discuss questions frankly with the State Department. They have easy access to the President as Commander-in-Chief and they are making the most of their opportunity.

(3) Civil wartime agencies such as the Foreign Economic Administration and the War Production Board are to a large extent staffed either by people who have never had occasion to think in international terms or by the go-getter type of businessman who regards with impatience the feelings of other countries. A certain forthrightness, if not bluntness, is apt to characterize the behaviour of these wartime agencies.

(4) Public opinion in the United States is frequently clamourous as a result of domestic political conflicts and elements in the Administration are prone at times to plead the necessity of a particular course of action on the ground that trouble would arise in Congress if anything else were done. This at times is pushed almost to the point of political blackmail.

Examples.

The most recent examples of what might be termed lack of consideration on the part of the United States are briefly summarized:

(1) Argentina

The United States did not consult us about the question of withdrawing diplomatic representatives from Argentina and applying various sanctions. Our information here came via London although in planning a move of this kind towards another Western Hemisphere country it would have been only courteous of the United States to have shared their information with us with a view to working out parallel policies. An embarrassing situation could have arisen if Canada and the United States had adopted divergent policies. This is not the first time that the United States has indicated an unwillingness to keep Canada from becoming too interested or active in Latin American affairs. Washington's successful blocking of invitations to Canada to join the Pan American Union in 1942 is the outstanding example.

(2) Purchase of wheat.

There was a dispute recently over the price of wheat which the United States government wished to buy from Canada. During the course of this the United States Embassy telephoned a rather abrupt message to the Acting Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce to the effect that if we did not sell the wheat at the low price demanded by the United States, they would be forced to announce publicly that because of Canada's decision the United States would have to cut down on wheat shipments to the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R. When our Embassy in Washington commented to Mr. Hickerson of the State Department on the unsuitability of such tactics he was not familiar with the case though he subsequently attempted to defend his government's action. It is probable that if the European Division had been handling this question the blunder would not have occurred.

(3) Border crossing regulations.

Late in 1943, discussions were held between Canadian and United States officials with regard to the possibility of eliminating some of the tedious formalities imposed by the United States authorities on Canadians wishing to enter the United States. Subsequently, the State Department announced that it would put a new procedure into force immediately. When External Affairs suggested that it would be desirable to go over the new regulations in draft with a view to discussing any debatable points that might arise, the State Department refused and insisted on inaugurating the new procedure without giving us an opportunity even to make suggestions. The responsibility for this unwillingness to consult lies with the Visa Division of the State Department which has shown a similar attitude in the past. In 1940 the Visa Division succeeded in putting through its plan requiring passports and visas from Canadian visitors without allowing the European Division (to say nothing of the Canadian government) to hear of it until Presidential approval had been obtained.

(4) A Canadian company, Dominion Magnesium Limited, which, with the financial assistance of the Canadian government, had discovered a new and important way of making magnesium, entered into negotiations with Defence Plan Corporation, an agency of the United States government, which was anxious to obtain the rights to the new process for war purposes. Officials of the company believed that oral agreement had been reached on the payment which the United States government would make both during and after the war. However, Defence Plan Corporation repudiated the agreement, nevertheless continuing to use Dominion Magnesium's discoveries in a number of plants in the United States and have offered terms which both Dominion Magnesium and External Affairs regard as ridiculously low. The Canadian government made its first representations to the United States government in the summer of 1942 but a year and half have passed with only the most unsatisfactory replies having been received from the State Department. This is a case where a wartime agency is taking an unreasonable line and where the State Deprtment is unwilling or unable to do anything.

(5) Postwar rights in defence projects.

There is a good deal of feeling in Administration circles in Washington, as well as in the press, that the United States should have continuing postwar rights in defence projects such as airfields which have been built in foreign countries with United States funds. The Canadian government has already recognized the possibilities of friction contained in this attitude by deciding to pay for all permanent construction work on airways in Northwestern Canada.

(6) Export control

After prolonged discussion Canada and the United States together adopted a "decentralization plan" for exports to Latin America,[2] the purpose of which was to give the Latin American governments an opportunity to put forward their recommendations with regard to imports from North America. Because of short supply and shortage of shipping only a limited amount of goods can be shipped from North America and it was felt that the Latin American governments should be responsible for indicating which particular goods they felt were essential to the economies of their countries.

Canadian experience with this plan has not been particularly happy as the United States government has made a number of departures from it without telling us in advance. For example, the State Department applied a new set of rules to Bolivia without consulting the Canadian authorities and a number of other exceptions to the procedure were made which had the result of placing Canadian exporters at a disadvantage.

We eventually proposed the winding up of the scheme since the shipping situation had improved and shortage of shipping had been the principal reason for the plan in the first place. The United States replied to our suggestion by saying that they felt the plan should be retained as a measure of exchange control.[3] No Canadian authority, including the Foreign Exchange Control Board, could see any merit in this argument. The discussions are still continuing but this summary is sufficient to indicate a rather unsatisfactory lack of frankness on the part of the United States authorities which can perhaps be ascribed to the fact that the problem concerns Latin America where the United States prefers to have a pretty free hand. It can also be ascribed to the habits of wartime agencies.

Canadian Behaviour.

There is an important point which must be remembered in considering this evidence of failure on the part of the United States to consult us as much as we would like. Seen through United States eyes some of Canada's actions must raise doubts as to our friendliness, frankness or ability to resolve our own interdepartmental difficulties. In the case of the Maine woodsmen our action evidently appeared deliberately provocative when in effect we replied to United States representations by a statement in the House of Commons.[4] Again our decision to pay for the Northwest Airways[5] had some of the characteristics of an ultimatum about it. Other instances could probably be found in which, because we wanted to strengthen our case vis-à-vis the United States, we have announced decisions without prior consultation. Given a powerful and at times a pushful neighbour this is probably inevitable, but in criticizing the United States we must consider how our actions look to an observer in the State Department.

Conclusion.

There can be no doubt that the United States has become a more difficult country to deal with as a result of wartime developments and may well be harder to deal with as time goes on, particularly if a Republican Administration is elected in November. Every country in the world must be prepared for energetic, aggressive and at times inconsiderate policies on the part of the Administration in Washington and as close neighbours we may see more of this than most other people. On the other hand, we have been fairly successful in protecting Canadian interests up to the present and there is no reason why we should not continue to do so if we are firm and reasonable when we have a good case. In the long run it would be unwise to take vigorous exception to instances of aggressiveness which are unimportant in themselves although these will undoubtedly occur. We should be prepared, however, to take a firm stand on important issues and when once the government has reached a decision we should make every effort to secure the concurrence of the United States government in that decision. If this is true it follows that the government should be advised to take a strong line only when the issue is important and we have a good case.

[R. M. MACDONNELL]

Le ministre, l'ambassade aux États-Unis au premier secrétaire
Minister in United States to First Secretary

CONFIDENTIAL Washington, March 21, 1944

Dear Mr. Macdonnell:

I was very interested in receiving your letter of February 29th,† with the copy of a memorandum prepared in the Department on whether the United States policy toward Canada is becoming unduly aggressive and whether we should do anything about it.

I got the feeling in reading this memorandum that in the approach to the question, "Is the United States unduly aggressive?" there is rather greater effort to answer in the affirmative than in the negative; a feeling, however, that the last paragraph modified to a considerable extent. This approach would, I think, be natural enough, because it is the irritations, the things that we have to complain about, that make the greatest impression on us and may tend to throw the general picture out of balance. It is true that the memorandum begins with a paragraph on "Successful Wartime Collaboration", but from then on, until the last paragraph, it concerns itself largely with the reverse side of the picture, giving numerous and detailed examples to show that we are being "pushed about" by the United States. I would certainly be the last person in the world to deny that this happens. I would go further and say that under the "pressure of war conditions" it is happening more often now than before 1939. The next year will probably see a further deterioration (though "deterioration" is, I think, a bad word in that it gives a sense of permanency).

This is to be expected, both because of the impending elections and all that they mean in the conduct of government here and in the approach of victory against the enemy. A common danger is a great incentive to good manners. (I have never seen people so nice to each other as they were during the Blitz in London.) But that common danger is now receding, and some of the good manners will recede with it. Another thing which we have to take into account in our approach to this question is a wary sensitiveness on our own part, which one would expect in the relations of a small country to a great neighbour, especially when the two countries are so much alike as to make it easy to get on each other's nerves. I suppose there is no person in the world against whom a married man can develop so many grievances as his wife, but that does not necessarily mean that he thinks less highly of her than he does of the strange woman across the street! However, I think I had better abandon this particular illustration.

Whether we should protest against wrong actions on the part of the United States depends, I think, almost entirely, as you state in your last paragraph, on whether we are absolutely certain of our case and whether the damage done justifies the relief occasioned by getting the matter off one's chest. We certainly do not want to debase our coinage by too frequent protests, which people in the State Department will come to think of as unnecessary and often frivolous. This is, I think, particularly true in wartime, when nerves are frayed and tempers occasionally strained. When we are dealing with such a powerful neighbour, we have to avoid the twin dangers of subservience and truculent touchiness. We succumb to the former when we take everything lying down, and to the latter when we rush to the State Department with a note every time some Congressman makes a stupid statement about Canada, or some documentary movie about the war forgets to mention Canada. I think we have to be all the more careful these days, because the administrative machinery here, built on temporary war foundations, often functions so badly, and a lot of things are done which would never be done in a permanent, peacetime, well-ordered Civil Service. It is true, I think, that a great many of our difficulties arise out of the inexperience and, at times, ignorance, of the people brought in temporarily to take jobs in war agencies. At the same time, these very people have been of the most tremendous help to us, especially in supply and financial matters. They have hurt us a good deal in little matters, but have helped us immensely in big ones. That applies, I think, in general to the whole Government, and the increasing irritations which we are subjected to should not cause us to lose sight of that fact. I do not want to be too angelic in this matter or to suggest that we should adopt an Oxford Group attitude toward the people here. But I do not think we should be too bellicose either; especially as we ourselves often commit both sins of omission and commission in our relations with them.

You yourself cite as the main reason for the alleged change in the U.S. attitude, the increasing importance of wartime agencies and the Army and Navy. The latter provide a good example of the difficulty of coming to any sound conclusion in this whole matter. It is quite true that, as you know, the U.S. Services can at times be very exasperating in their apparent obliviousness to the prides and prejudices of others. At the same time, our Staff people here will tell you that they hardly ever make an appeal for help to senior American Army and Navy Commanders without the latter leaning over backwards to meet them.

On page 4 you give political pressures as a reason for the present change in attitude. That is something which, it seems to me, should be easily understood in Ottawa. We are influenced by domestic political difficulties in our contacts with London, and even with Washington, just as they are here. Possibly we are only saved from going as far as the Americans do by the fact that we are not cursed with their system of government.

You give several examples of what might be termed lack of consideration for Canada on the part of the United States. The first concerns the action recently contemplated against Argentina. It is true that we were not kept informed. At the same time, we should not forget that we have not considered it necessary to have anyone in the Embassy here whose main duty has been to establish real and continuous contact with the Latin American Division of the State Department. That is our fault, not theirs. Is it accurate to say that Washington successfully blocked an invitation to Canada to join the Pan American Union in 1942? If I remember rightly (I may be wrong about this), it was not membership in the Pan American Union that was involved; merely attendance at a special Conference called to concert, if possible, Pan American policy after Pearl Harbour.[6]

Your second example concerns a dispute arising out of the purchase of wheat. I do not think we should make too much of this. After all, the blame was confined to an official or two of the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa, whose tactics were certainly disavowed by the State Department when they heard of it. I am a little surprised at the statement that Mr. Hickerson attempted to defend his Government's action in this matter. He told me that Taylor's[7] tactics were indefensible. The fact that he thought that our policy was also indefensible is not a matter about which we can complain.

Similarly, with Dominion Magnesium, Limited. We have a complaint here, but we have made it, it has been received, and a settlement, which I hope will be satisfactory, is being attempted. The case certainly is not all white on one side and black on the other.

The example, "Export Control", deals with a most irritating matter, but we should not forget in our irritation over the way it was handled, that our stake in Latin American business is pretty small, and hard-pressed U.S. officials here may possibly be forgiven for occasionally forgetting about it.

No. 95 Ottawa, February 10, 1944

Sir:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note No. 160 of December 27, 1943,[8] concerning jurisdiction of offenses committed by members of the armed forces of the United States in Canada.

A copy of your note was communicated in due course to my Government and I have been directed in reply to express to you the appreciation of my Government of the cooperation of the Canadian Government in this matter. I have been directed to add, however, that in view of certain comments in your note the following observations are considered necessary to clarify my Government's position in the matter.

Paragraph six of your note states that the Canadian Government feels justified in assuming that the authorities of the United States will, in all cases, submit any person who may be surrendered under the provisions of regulation 6 to trial before a United States Military Court.

I have been directed to say that as the Canadian Government is aware, my Government considers that under international law members of its armed forces in Canada are immune from the local jurisdiction in criminal matters. Whether a member of such forces, accused of an offense, should be brought to trial before a service court of the United States and if so, the nature of the charge which should be made against him, can only be determined by the authorities of my Government in accordance with its laws. However, as a matter of courtesy my Government does not object to the procedure laid down in regulations 6 and 7, subject to the following understandings:

"Under the Articles of War (the act of Congress concerning courts-martial of the United States Army, 10 U.S. Code 1471-1593), no case can be tried by court-martial except after reference of the charges by the appropriate commanding officer to the court for trial. The 70th Article provides that no charge will be referred to a general court-martial until after a thorough and impartial investigation, at which the accused soldier has a right to be present, to cross-examine witnesses against him if they are available, and to offer evidence in his own behalf. All charges of felonies or other grave offenses against our soliders must be so investigated before they may be tried by court-martial. Less serious charges may be informally investigated in a similar manner. It may be anticipated that, in the majority of cases with which we are concerned, a prima facie case will be shown to exist, and the officer exercising court-martial jurisdiction will forthwith refer the charges for trial; but there will undoubtedly be some in which, on the ground of mistaken identity, self-defense, lack of evidence or its unconvincing character, or other good and sufficient reason, that officer will be of opinion that a prima facie case does not exist and that a trial is not justified. In such a case it is proposed that the appropriate military officer confer with the local Canadian prosecuting officer and endeavor to reach an agreement as to the proper disposition of the case. If such an agreement cannot be reached, it is suggested that the Canadian prosecuting officer refer the matter to the Attorney General of Canada for his opinion as to whether a trial should be held. Should the Attorney General, after considering the reasons why the United States military authorities think a trial should not be held, nevertheless conclude that a trial is necessary, the appropriate commanding officer will order that the trial proceed."

With reference to paragraph seven of your note, I have been directed to say that while concurrent jurisdiction would ordinarily be understood in the United States to mean that the authority first taking jurisdiction of the case would continue to exercise it, my Government has no objection to the procedure set forth in your note and it will issue appropriate instruction to its military commanders in Canada.

Concerning the comments in paragraph nine of your note, I may say that the legislation introduced in the Congress of the United States to implement the jurisdiction enjoyed by service courts of friendly foreign forces under the law of the United States, has the active support of the Department of State and it is hoped that the legislation will be enacted in the near future.[9]

I have been directed to say that my Government appreciates the suggestions contained in paragraph ten of your note and appropriate instructions will be issued to assure the cooperation of the service authorities of the United States in the matters referred to therein.

Section 2 (1) of the regulations[10] defining "member" contains a proviso that in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the regulations the word "member" means a member of the military or naval forces of the United States of America stationed in Canada or in Canada on military or naval duty, who when detained as mentioned therein, is wearing a uniform of such forces. It is assumed that this proviso was intended to remove from the operation of paragraphs 5 and 6 of the regulations, civilians attached to the armed forces of the United States in Canada. As worded, however, a member of the military personnel of the United States who is not wearing his uniform when detained appears to be excluded from the provisions of paragraphs 5 and 6 of the regulations. Although it may be improbable that a case of this kind will occur, the possibility exists and I have been directed to say that my Government could not agree that the status of a member of its armed forces is governed by whether he be in uniform.

I have the honour to state that my Government believes the prosecution of the war would be facilitated by a more speedy and effective return to military jurisdiction of members of the Armed Forces of the United States and Canada who have either deserted or are absent without leave and are located in the territory of the other country.

I have been directed to suggest, therefore, that the Canadian Government may wish to agree that the military authorities of the United States and Canada shall cooperate to the full extent provided by the respective laws and regulations of the two countries in apprehending such offenders and returning them to the custody of the appropriate authority of the government from whose military service they have deserted or are absent without leave.

Excellency,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your Excellency's Note. No. 332 of June 13, 1945, in which you inform me of your Government's belief that the prosecution of the war would be facilitated by a more speedy and effective return to military jurisdiction of members of the armed forces of the United States and Canada who have either deserted or are absent without leave and are located in the territory of the other country. Consequently, your Government suggests that the Canadian Government may wish to enter into an agreement to the effect that the military authorities of the United States and Canada shall cooperate to the full extent provided by the respective laws and regulations of the two countries in apprehending such offenders and returning them to the custody of the appropriate authority of the government from whose military service they have deserted or are absent without leave.

Before concluding such an agreement, the Canadian Government thought it advisable to make provision in Canadian law for the apprehension and return to the United States of deserters and absentees without leave from the United States Armed Forces. Suitable provision has now been made by Order in Council P.C. 6577 of Oct. 23, 1945,† two copies of which are enclosed herewith.

Although actual hostilities have now ceased, it is assumed that the general considerations which prompted the proposals put forward in your above mentioned Note remain unchanged and that it is still the desire of your Government that the proposed agreement be concluded.

I have, therefore, the honour to inform your Excellency that my Government is prepared to accept the proposals put forward. The agreement may accordingly be regarded as concluded by your Excellency's Note and this reply thereto.

"Excellency:

"I have the honour to refer to Mr. Hull's note of December 24, 1943,† acknowledging the receipt of your note No. 643, December 18, 1943[11] on the Canadian Government's decision with respect to payment for air fields and ancillary facilities in Northwestern Canada.

"The views of the interested authorities of this Government having been ascertained, I am now in a position to inform you that this Government will gladly enter into discussions with the Canadian Government on this subject and that it is prepared to do so at an early date. The construction of permanent facilities on Canadian air fields was undertaken in accordance with agreements reached between the United States and Canadian Governments through the medium of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense, as a military measure for the common defense of the North American Continent. The proposal of the Canadian Government to pay in full for such facilities is accepted as indicative of the desire of the Canadian Government to contribute their full share in meeting the common problems of mutual defense.

"It is suggested that at the forthcoming discussions it may be mutually convenient to agree upon a lump sum figure which would be subject to readjustment after the conclusion of hostilities, when full data are available. In any event the American authorities look forward to receiving a tentative agenda at the convenience of their Canadian colleagues as well as an indication of preference as to the time and place at which the discussions might be held.

Sir:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note No. 106 of September 7, 1943,[13] regarding the construction and development of various defense projects in the Canadian Northwest.

Your note was submitted to my Government for its consideration and I have now been instructed to reply as follows:

The proposals relating to the acquisition of land and buildings in connection with the construction and development of defense projects in the Canadian Northwest, as outlined in your note under acknowledgement, have been considered by the appropriate authorities of my Government. Subject to the suggestions which follow, the American Government is in accord with the terms of your note under acknowledgement and is willing to enter into an agreement to give effect thereto.

The Division Engineer at Edmonton believes that in order to expedite action a Canadian Government land acquisition office should be established at Edmonton. The establishment of such an office would not only expedite the required acquisitions but would also provide a place of direct contact for the owners from whom the acquisition is being made. For example, the United States Quartermaster Depot at Edmonton is built on a site for which rights-of-entry were secured in March, 1943, by the Division Office and as yet no arrangements have been made by the Canadian authorities for acquisition of the privately owned land. Inquiries made to the Division Office concerning the probable time of payments are referred to the proper office in Winnipeg, but the landowners still consider the United States as responsible for the acquisition and payment therefor.

In paragraph six of your note it is stated that "the right of user should be deemed to continue in the United States authorities for the duration of the war....." Inasmuch as the great majority of wartime arrangements entered into between the two Governments provide that they shall continue for the duration of the war and six months thereafter, it is suggested that your proposal be amended to include the phrase "and six months thereafter". Likewise in the same paragraph it is provided that the American Government shall "as a general principle, endeavour to restore the sites involved to their original state." It appears to the American authorities that even stated as a general principle such a commitment would not be realistic in that where buildings have been constructed and extensive improvements have been made the Canadian authorities would hardly wish or expect a restoration of the site to its original state. It is suggested, therefore, that the final sentence of paragraph six be terminated with the word "land".

While it is agreed that in certain instances disposition of installations, buildings, and other structures erected on property made available to the United States Government may appropriately be made in accordance with the principles laid down in the exchange of notes of January 27, 1943,[14] it was the intent of the two Governments at the time that this formula was adopted to make use of it only where special arrangements appropriate to the particular case in hand had not been adopted. My Government continues to prefer, wherever possible, to enter into ad hoc agreements covering specific projects and will shortly put forward several proposals to that end. It is, therefore, suggested that following the word "shall" in the penultimate sentence of paragraph six there be inserted the phrase "in the absence of special arrangements covering individual projects". Furthermore, inasmuch as the

Canada, Treaty Series, 1943, No. 2.

Canadian Government's proposals refer not only to the acquisition but also to the disposal of property, it is believed that the penultimate sentence of paragraph seven should include the words "or the disposition" following the words "the development" (of defense projects).

With regard to paragraph four of your note, Major General W. W. Foster, Special Commissioner for Defense Projects in Northwest Canada, has been given a copy of a report entitled "Land and Premises Occupied by the United States of America in connection with National Defense Construction in Northwest Canada"† which lists all property occupied by the United States forces in Northwest Canada as of January 31, 1944. The Office of the Chief of Engineers, United States War Department, has commented on this document as follows:

"On perusal of the report it will be noticed that in all cases property has been acquired by lease. The Northwest Division has made no attempt to acquire a vested interest in real estate in the Dominion of Canada, and has acquired leasehold interests for the duration of the emergency and as much as one year thereafter. The contractors have in all known instances acquired a leasehold interest for the duration, and in some cases for a longer period, and have made no known effort to purchase the fee although some of the leases do contain options to purchase. The Jesuit College property is listed at the bottom of page 23 as being acquired by the Dominion of Canada although originally purchased by the United States."

As it appears that the procedure outlined in your note is, in the main, that which has been followed by the United States Division Engineer, Northwest Division, since March, 1943, it is not anticipated that the proposed agreement will present any serious difficulties. It has been reported, however, that the Canadian authorities have taken the position that contractors may not be accorded the right to use Dominion land free of charge. Furthermore, the text of paragraph five of your note under reference suggests that there may be a divergence of viewpoint between our two Governments as regards the position of contractors with respect to land utilized by them in connection wth defense projects.

Inasmuch as cost-plus-fixed-fee contractors are, in effect, agents of the United States, and any expenditures of funds made by those contractors on the acquisition or rental of property will ultimately be reimbursed by the United States, property acquired by such contractors for utilization by them in connection with their construction work should, in the opinion of my Government, be considered as property acquired by and for the use of the United States. Under the circumstances, an indication of the views of your Government on this point will be appreciated.

Accept etc.

NORTHWEST STAGING ROUTE: U.S. PROGRAMME FOR REHABILITATION OF AERODROMES

5. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS referred to the discussions of the War Committee on March 10th, 1944, and reported that the U.S. government was not willing to include payment for the new construction requested in the over-all financial settlement terminating the Canada-U.S. financial balances agreement.

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR pointed out that the War Committee, on June 18th, 1943, had agreed that no Canadian contractors and labour be employed north of Edmonton.[15] The easing of the labour situation, however, would make it possible to modify this decision and it would be desirable for Canada to assume responsibility for that part of the U.S. request involving reconstruction and major maintenance of runways.

(Letter, Minister of National Defence for Air to Secretary, Mar. 15, 1944).†

7. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY expressed Agreement with the Minister of National Defence for Air. In view of higher U.S. costs, if Canada was to assume financial responsibility, construction should be carried out by Canadian contractors and labour.

There might, however, be one or two instances where U.S. contractors already on the scene should be used rather than bring in new contractors and equipment.

8. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the War Committee decision of June 18th, 1943, be modified to provide that, henceforth, Canadian contractors and Canadian labour be employed to the fullest extent possible in all future construction on the Northwest Staging;

(b) that the U.S. request for additional construction on the Northwest Staging be approved; and

(c) that the Canadian government assume full financial responsibility and grant all contracts for construction of a permanent nature involved in this request.

No. 105 Washington, March 20, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your note of February 24th on the subject of the Canadian Government's decision with respect to payment for airfields and facilities in Northwestern Canada.[16]

The Canadian Government believes that discussions should take place as soon as possible with a view to agreeing on the amount which will be paid to the Government of the United States. I am therefore instructed to inform you that Canadian representatives will be prepared to come to Washington as soon as may be convenient to the United States authorities to participate in these financial discussions.

The suggestion put forward in your note, that a lump sum figure might be agreed upon which would be subject to readjustment after the conclusion of hostilities, has been received with interest by the Canadian authorities. They are inclined to the view that sufficient data may now be available to make possible an agreement on expenditures up to the end of 1943 which would not require subsequent readjustment. However, the alternative methods of reaching an agreed figure can best be considered at the forthcoming discussions. These discussions, in the view of the Canadian Government, should include consideration of expenditures by the Government of the United States on airfields and permanent facilities under the following headings:

1. Northwest Staging Route
2. landing strips along the Alaska Highway
3. Mackenzie River Route; and,
4. other air facilities of a permanent nature in Northwestern Canada.

With regard to the final paragraph of your note, the Canadian Government have noted the proposal of the Government of the United States that discussions be held at the proper time relating to the postwar use on a reciprocal basis of these and other airfields. This question is part of the larger subject of the future of international air transport, on which the Canadian Government has already indicated its willingness to enter into discussions at an appropriate time with the Government of the United States.[17]

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

SECRET [Ottawa,] March 28,1944

I am enclosing copy of a letter† handed to me by the United States Minister [Ambassador] this morning, together with a covering note of our conversation, which I am sending to Mr. Power, Mr. Howe and Mr. Heeney. The United States Government is asking, as a matter of urgency, for reconsideration of the decision to take over forthwith, with Canadian contractors and Canadian labour, the construction of additional facilities on the Northwest Staging Route. Their contention is that the change-over from United States to Canadian contractors and employees will inevitably cause about two months' delay in carrying out the approved programme, and that in view of the "sudden and extraordinary activities and movements" which may be expected through Edmonton and over the Northwest Staging Route this summer, such a delay could have serious military consequences.

I told Atherton that I thought the War Committee would wish to know what these "sudden and extraordinary" movements were likely to be. The Canadian Government would have to satisfy itself that the accelerated timetable which the United States wanted was required by prospective military developments, and that it could not judge such a question without having some picture of the operations contemplated in the North Pacific area. Atherton said that last summer, before the Quebec Conference, there had been some consideration given in Washington to the desirability of inviting the closer association of Canada with the higher direction of the war in theatres where Canadian forces were engaged. He said that the response to this suggestion in the United States quarters had been quite receptive, but that difficulties had been seen by the United Kingdom which feared that any such arrangement would complicate the position of other Dominions.

[N. A. ROBERTSON]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

The United States Ambassador left me the attached letter† this morning, enquiring whether, for the reasons set forth, the Canadian Government would be willing to reconsider its decision to take over, immediately, full responsibility for additional construction required on the Northwest Staging Route.

Mr. Atherton said he understood from General Henry[18] that, in some areas, the Canadian authorities appeared to be disposed to allow United States contractors and labourers already in the field to proceed with construction. It was hoped that this policy might be extended to cover the other projects, the completion of which was urgently required.

The United States War Department had asked him to stress the operational urgency of this request, to which they attached the highest importance. The War Department recognized that the modification of present plans which their request involved might affect the Morgenthau-Ilsley arrangement,[19] regarding maximum Canadian balances of United States funds. If there were complications on this score, the War Department "would take care of the United States Treasury."

I told Mr. Atherton that his Government's request would be considered by the War Committee tomorrow. I thought they would be unwilling to modify the policy agreed upon unless there were overpowering military considerations which would make it necessary to avoid, at all costs, the possible delay of six weeks to two months involved in changing over from United States to Canadian construction. It was, perhaps, unfortunate that each previous American request for the creation of new facilities, or the enlargement of old ones, had been attended by a plea of urgency which events had not justified in every case. To make sure of sympathetic consideration of his Government's request, I thought he should be in a position to enlarge on "the sudden and extraordinary activities and movements through Edmonton and over the Northwest Staging Route" which his letter cited as the reason for asking the Canadian Government to defer action on its decision to take over responsibility for all construction work of a permanent nature. The War Committee would need to know just what military considerations were implied in this reference, so that it could decide what action Canada should take.

stipulating that all contracts for construction of a permanent nature should be granted by the Canadian government, rather than by the United States.

After examining the details of the construction programme proposed by the United States, the Department of Transport recommended that the U.S. Engineering Department be permitted to complete those portions at Whitehorse and Fort St. John, consisting for the most part of the rehabilitation of runways, and that the remainder, namely the permanent construction at Edmonton, Grande Prairie, Fort Nelson and Watson Lake, be performed by direct contract from the Department of Transport. The Department also recommended that they be permitted to make such minor modifications as might from time to time be considered desirable so as to permit the U.S.E.D. to undertake minor additional items of construction where the Department considered such action appropriate. It was estimated by the Department of Transport that the work at these four aerodromes would require an expenditure of some $4,950,000.

The Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in Northwest Canada had conferred with Transport Engineers and the U.S. Commanding General at Edmonton, and concurred in the recommendations of the Department of Transport.

(Letter, Deputy Minister of Transport, to the Secretary, March 28, 1944).†

4. THE PRIME MINISTER said that, the previous day, the U.S. Ambassador had handed to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs a letter urging that the Canadian government reconsider their decision to take over immediately full responsibility for additional construction required on the Route.

The U.S. War Department had initiated this request on grounds of operational urgency to which the highest importance was attached. They spoke of "sudden and extraordinary activities and movements through Edmonton and over the Northwest Staging Route" and represented that the transfer of construction activities to Canadian control would delay the work "not less than approximately two months."

Mr. Atherton had been unable to enlarge to any extent upon the military considerations to which such emphasis had been attached by the U.S. War Department.

(External Affairs memoranda and attached copy of letter, U.S. Ambassador to Under-Secretary of State, March 28, 1944).†

5. MR. HEENEY said that upon receipt of this communication from the U.S. Embassy, the Department of Transport had been requested to review the position and report upon their ability to undertake the required construction with the despatch necessary to meet the operational necessities urged by the U.S. War Department.

The Deputy Minister of Transport had now reported that after checking carefully the situation in respect of contractor, plant and labour, the Department's Engineering Division were prepared to assume responsibility for the rehabilitation programme (except at Whitehorse and Fort St. John) and to complete it with expedition and efficiency which would compare favourably with the performance of U.S. authorities. The Minister of Munitions and Supply approved the Department's recommendation to assume this responsibility, and negotiations for contracts and plans were already under way.

(Letter, Deputy Minister of Transport to the Secretary, March 29, 1944).†

6. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that the decision of March 15 regarding the granting of contracts by the Canadian government be re-affirmed;

(b) that the United States be permitted to complete the work at Whitehorse and Fort St. John, as recommended;

(c) that the Department of Transport be directed to press forward with the utmost despatch the programme for permanent work at Edmonton, Grande Prairie, Fort Nelson and Watson Lake;

(d) that the Department of Transport be authorized to make such modifications as may be considered desirable by their Engineers to permit additional minor items of construction to be undertaken under U.S. auspices; and,

(e) that the U.S. government be informed of the above decisions.

DESPATCH 115 Washington, May 3, 1944

Sir,

I should like to refer to your EX-1628 of April 18th† and other correspondence regarding the meeting of representatives of the United States and Canadian Governments held at Washington, April 25 and 26, 1944, to discuss the details of the Canadian Government's decision to pay for United States air installations in Canada and other installations.

2. We have prepared a draft report on this meeting and enclose three copies of it herewith. We are giving two copies to Mr. Hickerson of the State Department. Mr. Hickerson favours the idea of having a report on the meeting agreed to by the two Governments. I shall send you Mr. Hickerson's comments on the enclosed draft as soon as they are received and, in the meantime, hope to receive your comments.

3. On page 2 of the enclosed draft report, we quote extracts from the schedule to the so-called Ilsley-Morgenthau agreement of March 24, 1944. As we do not have an authoritative copy of this schedule, I would suggest that the extracts quoted in the enclosed report should be checked with particular care.

4. As stated in paragraph 18 of the enclosed draft report, it was agreed at the meeting that Mr. Hickerson of the State Department and Mr. Wershof of the Embassy should revise the draft diplomatic note which was discussed at the meeting. As soon as they have completed the work of revision, I shall send the draft to you for your approval.

Projet de rapport du deuxième secrétaire, l'ambassade aux États-Unis
Draft Report by Second Secretary, Embassy in United States

SECRET Washington, May 2, 1944

REPORT OF MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN GOVERNMENTS HELD AT WASHINGTON, APRIL 25 AND 26, 1944, TO DISCUSS THE DETAILS OF THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT'S DECISION TO PAY FOR UNITED STATES AIR INSTALLATIONS IN CANADA AND OTHER INSTALLATIONS.

Present (Here insert list)[20]

Background

1. In note No. 643 of December 18, 1943, the Canadian Legation informed the United States State Department that the Canadian Government "will not accept payment from the United States Government for the construction of any permanent facilities or improvements made by the Canadian Government on United States Government account on airfields in Northwest Canada, and will make payment to the United States Government for all construction of a permanent nature carried out by the United States Government on air routes in this area." This decision referred to the Northwest Staging Route, the air strips along the Alaska Highway, and the air strips along the Mackenzie River (which are related to the Canol Project).

2. In March, 1944, the Canadian Government decided to extend this decision to the "Crimson Route" in Northwest Canada, the airfield at Mingan, P.Q., the telephone line from Edmonton to the Alaska border, and the air installations at Goose Bay, Labrador. The Canadian Government also decided to pay for the proposed "rehabilitation" program on the Northwest Staging Route. The March decisions were part of a general financial arrangement made between the United States Secretary of the Treasury and the Canadian Minister of Finance, and were recorded ina schedule to a letter which the Minister wrote the Secretary on March 24, 1944. Following is the relevant part of this schedule:

[20]Non trouvé./Not located.

A. Measures which will reduce Canada's holdings of United States dollar balances

3. Payment for costs incurred by U.S. Army in connection with construction of permanent improvements to following airfields in Canada: (expressed in millions of U.S. dollars)

(a) Airfields on the Northwest Staging Route, landing strips along the Canol Pipe Line and other airfields, landing strips and permanent air route facilities constructed by U.S. in Northwest Canada 33.3

(b) Airfields on the Crimson Route in Central Northeast Canada 30.0

(c) Airfield at Mingan, Quebec 4.2

4. Payment for costs incurred by U.S. Army for construction of that part of the telephone line from Edmonton to Fairbanks which is in Canadian territory 9.3

(Note: These total 76.8 but this total was not shown in the schedule.)

B. Measures which will reduce Canada's future receipts of United States dollars (Extract)

2. Assumption by Canada of expenditure incurred on U.S. account for construction of permanent improvements to airfields in Canada and at Goose Bay, Labrador (including newly projected $6 million program and contracts not yet completed on Northwest Staging Route) ..... 42.1"

3. The purpose of the meeting on April 25 and 26 was to ascertain the exact cost figures involved and to list in detail the installations concerned.

April 25 Session

4. General Worsham[21] produced a document (annexed as Appendix I)† relating to the Northwest, i.e., the Staging Route, the Alaska Highway strips and the Mackenzie River strips. This document showed that the total expenditure of the United States on all of these was $41,847,063 of which $35,838,033 was for items of permanent value. The document gives a breakdown, for each base or strip on the Staging Route and the Alaska Highway, of the cost of items of permanent value.

5. The items of non-permanent value consisted of troop housing, mess facilities, officers quarters, and miscellaneous building which cost $6,009,030. These items are permanent in a legal sense because they are fastened to the ground, but they have no permanent (i.e., post-war) value. The United States Government did not consider that the Canadian Government's offer to pay for "construction of a permanent nature" applied to buildings of no post-war value.

6. In reply to questions, General Worsham said that Appendix I† included not only money already spent by the United States but also money to be spent under uncompleted contracts amounting to an estimated 7.4 million dollars. The Ilsley-Morgenthau agreement included this 7.4 million in the measures by Canada to reduce Canada's "future receipts of United States dollars;" it would have been better to include it with the items to be actually paid by Canada to the United States. In any case, it is clear that, when Canada has paid for the items of permanent value in Appendix I, she will have discharged her obligations so far as the uncompleted contracts are concerned.

7. There was also discussion of the reference in the Ilsley-Morgenthau agreement to the "newly projected $6 million program . . . on Northwest Staging Route" which Canada was to assume and pay for. It appeared that there were really two programs. The first, costing about 4.3 millions, is known as the "rehabilitation program" and Canada will pay for it in the first instance. The second, costing about 1.7 millions, is known as the "rounding out of Plan C"; this program involves buildings, mostly of non-permanent post-war value, to be built by the United States and to be paid for in the first instance by the United States. General Worsham explained that this 1.7 millions, like the uncompleted contracts, was included in Appendix I. It is clear, therefore, that Canada's obligations in respect of this 1.7 million program will be discharged when she has paid for the items of permanent value listed in Appendix I.

8. The detailed breakdown of the cost of installations of permanent value in Appendix I gave separate figures for such things as "contingencies", "capital investment", etc. Although these items are properly included as costs, the Canadian representatives felt that the Appendix would be clearer (especially when made public) if such items were not shown separately but instead were pro-rated among, and included in, the costs of concrete items such as "site grading", "hangars", etc. General Worsham offered to prepare a revision of Appendix I pursuant to this request. The revision was also to contain a brief breakdown of the costs of the Mackenzie River strips and a brief breakdown of the costs of items of non-permanent value, such breakdowns not having been put in Appendix I.

9. Colonel Mage produced a document (annexed as Appendix II)† relating to the Crimson Route in Northeast Canada and the airfield at Mingan. This document showed the costs of all installations without separating those of non-permanent value. Colonel Mage gave orally the figures for installations of permanent value.

10. On the Crimson Route, United States expenditure totalled $34,666,100, of which $27,460,330 was for items of permanent value. At Mingan, total expenditure was $4,285,200 of which $3,627,980 was for items of permanent value. The items of non-permanent value consist of troop housing and miscellaneous buildings. The United States did not expect or desire payment for such items, and intended to leave them at the end of the war for Canadian Government disposition.

11. Colonel Mage agreed to prepare a revision of Appendix II in order to have it conform to Appendix I.

April 26 Session

12. General Worsham produced a revision of Appendix I, which is annexed as Appendix III.† Appendix III consists of three schedules:

Schedule "A" shows the total costs in the Northwest, $41,847,963.

Schedule "B" summarizes and also breaks down in detail the cost of items of permanent value, $35,838,033.

Schedule "C" lists the items of non-permanent value, $6,009,030.

13. Colonel Mage produced a revision of Appendix II, which is annexed as Appendix IV.† Appendix IV consists of three schedules:

Schedule "A" shows the total cost to the United States of the Crimson Route as $34,666,100 and of Mingan as $4,285,200.

Schedule "B" summarizes and also breaks down in detail the cost of items of permanent value — $27,460,330 on the Crimson Route and $3,627,980 at Mingan.

Schedule "C" lists the items of non-permanent value — $7,205,770 on the Crimson Route and $657,220 at Mingan.

14. General Worsham produced a document (annexed as Appendix V)† showing the United States expenditure on the telephone line from Edmonton to the Alaska border as being $9,342,208, all of which was for items of permanent value.

15. The United States representatives mentioned the fact that the Ilsley-Morgenthau agreement provided for the assumption by Canada of expenditure on United States account at Goose Bay but omitted (probably accidentally) mention of $543,000 which the United States itself spent there for items of permanent value. The Canadian representatives said, subject to the approval by the Canadian Government, that Canada should repay this $543,000 to the United States in order to clear the site at Goose Bay in the same way as it is being cleared in Canada. Colonel Mage will accordingly revise Appendix IV in order to show this $543,000 expenditure.

16. To sum up, Canada will reimburse the United States for the following expenditures for items of permanent value:

	United States Dollars
Northwest Staging Route (including uncompleted contracts and projected rounding out of Plan C)	$31,311,196
Flight strips along the Alaska Highway	3,262,687
Flight strips along the Mackenzie River	1,264,150
Crimson Route in Northeast Canada	27,460,330
Airfield at Mingan, P.Q.	3,627,980
Airfield at Goose Bay	543,000
Telephone line from Edmonton to Alaska boundary	9,342,208
	$76,811,551

The Ilsley-Morgenthau agreement said that Canada should repay to the United States, for airfields in Canada and for the telephone line, 76.8 millions. It was noted with satisfaction that the grand total arrived at by the present meeting was the same as the total used in the Ilsley-Morgenthau agreement, although the breakdowns differed.

17. However, the other item shown in the Ilsley-Morgenthau agreement, namely, 42.1 million to be assumed (not repaid) by Canada will be reduced by 7.4 million for uncompleted contracts on the Northwest Staging Route and by 1.7 million for the rounding out of Plan C, for the reasons explained in paras. 6 and 7 of this report.

18. The meeting then turned to discussion of a draft note, prepared by the Canadian delegation, which might be sent by the Canadian Ambassador to the Secretary of State. A copy of the draft is annexed as Appendix VI.† The draft was acceptable in principle to the United States delegation except for paragraph 9 thereof which said:

"9. All the items mentioned in the three schedules 'A', 'B' and 'C' referred to above, whether or not of permanent value, will be relinquished to the Canadian Government within one year after the cessation of hostilities."

General Henry pointed out that most of the items are already in Canadian possession and title to the remaining items will be relinquished to Canada when the draft note is exchanged. However, to quote from the Journal of the April 12, 1944, meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence:†

"In noting this decision of the two Governments, (i.e., the decision of the Canadian Government to assume the costs of the installations), the Board observed that it relates only to the financial aspect of the facilities in question and has no bearing on existing arrangements for the maintenance operation and defense of the facilities for the duration of the war. It is the Board's understanding that the existing arrangements will remain in effect for the duration of the emergency as previously agreed upon unless modified by mutual agreement between the two Governments."

Messrs. Hickerson and Wershof were requested to revise the draft in consultation with the interested departments of the respective governments.

19. The Canadian delegation said that it was hoped that the proposed notes (and the appendices thereto) could be made public after they have been exchanged; in Canada this would take the form of tabling in the House of Commons. General Henry and Mr. Hickerson saw no difficulty in obtaining War Department consent to making public the actual notes — provided that the code phrase "Crimson Route" is deleted. However, they said that it would be more difficult to obtain consent to publish the appendices or at least Appendix IV which gives the details of the Crimson Route. Apart from the secrecy of the name, most of the airfields in this route are still on the secret list. General Henry and Mr. Hickerson said they would ask the War Department to reconsider the secrecy classification of these airfields, with a view to publishing all the appendices.

(Note: This report has been agreed to by both Governments.)

No. 47 Ottawa, May 13, 1944

Excellency —

I have the honour to refer to your note No. 110 of March 13, 1944, concerning the acquisition by the Canadian Government of land required for United States defence projects in Canada.

2. The Canadian Government is gratified to learn that, subject to certain suggestions, the United States Government is willing to enter into an agreement to give effect to the proposals made in our note No. 106 of September 7, 1943.

3. With reference to your suggestion that, in order to expedite this matter, the Canadian Government might establish a land acquisition office at Edmonton, I wish to state that the Canadian Government has appointed a land acquisition officer to be attached to the office of Major-General W. W. Foster, Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in Northwest Canada. This officer will have authority to take any action necessary to arrange for the acquisition of the land.

4. With reference to the suggestion in paragraph 5 of your note concerning right of user, the Canadian Government agrees with your suggestion that paragraph 6 of our note No. 106 be amended by adding the phrase "and six months thereafter" after the phrase "duration of the war".

5. With reference to the suggestion in paragraph 6 of your note concerning restoration of the sites to their original state, the Canadian Government agrees that it would not be practicable to request the United States authorities to restore all sites to their original state. At the same time, the Canadian Government would like to reserve the right to request restoration of the sites in individual instances. It is therefore suggested that the final sentence of paragraph 6 be terminated with the word "land" and that a new sentence be added to this paragraph as follows —

"The United States Government will not be required to restore the sites to their original state except in individual instances on request by the Canadian Government."

6. With reference to the suggestion in paragraph 6 of your note concerning disposition of installations and structures in accordance with the principles laid down in the exchange of notes of January 27, 1943, the Government of Canada agrees that, following the word "shall" in the penultimate sentence of paragraph 6, there be inserted the phrase "in the absence of special arrangements covering individual projects." The Canadian Government also agrees that the phrase "or the disposition" be inserted after the words "the development" in the penultimate sentence of paragrah 7 of our note No. 106.

7. With reference to paragraphs 8 and 9 of your note concerning land held by cost-plus contractors of the United States Government, it is our intention that the regime suggested in our note No. 106 should apply only to land held by or on behalf of the United States Government and that it should not be extended to apply to land held by independent contractors whether or not they operate on a cost-plus fixed-fee basis. It is the view of the Canadian Government that cost-plus contractors cannot be identified with the Government with which they have contracted. They are independent contractors not subject to the control of the Government excepting insofar as they are bound by contracts. If the regime were extended to cost-plus contractors, it would be logical to extend it also to ordinary contractors, for the cost of leasing land would certainly be taken into account in their contracts. If your Government wishes to discuss at further length the position of cost-plus contractors, it would be appreciated if this question might be considered as a separate matter so that the main proposals in this note and in our note No. 106 may be implemented immediately without waiting for agreement on the position of cost-plus contractors.

8. In order to expedite the transfer to the Canadian Government of property held by United States authorities, and in order to ensure that the improvements on the land do not revert to the landlords, it would be appreciated if in reply to this note the United States Government would give the Canadian Government an assurance that it will assign to the Government of Canada all leases of property held by or on behalf of the Government of the United States and acquired in Canada for defence projects.

9. I should also like to suggest that your Government designate an appropriate officer in Edmonton with authority to act on behalf of the United States Government in the arrangements for assignment to the Canadian Government of the individual leases, and to execute necessary conveyances.

10. The Canadian Government undertakes to reimburse to the United States Government the sum of all rentals which have been paid by the latter since Sept. 7, 1943, for leases of property which will be assigned to the Government of Canada under this agreement.

11. It is understood that this agreement will apply only to land, but not to acquisition by the United States authorities of office space or housing quarters comprising part of a building or an entire building without lease or other acquisition of the land on which the building is constructed.

Accept etc.

1. Your despatch No. 685, May 11,[†] payment for airfields. Hickerson of the State Department says that the draft report of the meeting is satisfactory if the following changes are made:

(a) Page 2 — The following explanatory words should be inserted in the Ilsley schedule immediately after the word "Canada": on the 6th line of the page:

(Expressed in millions of U.S. dollars)

(b) Paragraph 5 on page 3. The 2nd and 3rd sentences should be reworded thus:

"These items are permanent in a legal sense because they are fastened to the ground, but they have no permanent (i.e., post-war) value."

The closing words of the 4th sentence should read:

"Applied to buildings of no post-war value." The 5th and final sentence should be deleted; it is accurate, but the U.S. delegation really had no authority to say it; the result will be the same even with the sentence deleted.

(c) Paragraph 7 on page 4. In the 9th line the phrase "mostly of non-permanent value" should read "mostly of non-permanent post-war value."

2. If these changes are satisfactory to you, and if you have no other changes to suggest, War Department will mimeograph the report. How many copies do you wish?

3. Hickerson sees no need to mimeograph the appendices to the report of the meeting. Both sides already have all the appendices and, anyway, the vital appendices will be attached to the proposed exchange of notes.

4. With reference to paragraph 4 of my despatch No. 1115 of May 3, Hickerson and Wershof have revised the draft note for the proposed exchange of notes. I am sending a despatch regarding this.[†] Ends.

JOINT DEFENCE PROJECTS; PAYMENTS TO THE UNITED STATES FOR AIR INSTALLATIONS AND TELEPHONE LINES

5. THE SECRETARY, referring to discussions at the meeting of March 22nd, submitted a draft communication to the U.S. government to carry out the understanding reached by the Minister of Finance and the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with detailed arrangements made subsequently between Canadian and U.S. officials.

The amount which Canada undertook to assume was reduced from 42.1 million to 33 million dollars as a result of inaccurate figures produced by U.S. authorities at the time of the Ilsley-Morgenthau agreement. The total amount to be paid to the United States was 76.8 million dollars, in return for which Canada would obtain complete title to all works of permanent value at or connected with the Northwest Staging Route, the flight strips along the Alaska Highway and the Mackenzie River, the Crimson Route, the airfield at Mingan and the telephone line from Edmonton to the Alaska boundary. Canada would, in addition, acquire complete title to works of a non-permanent nature erected by the United States in connection with these air installations at a cost of 13.8 million dollars, and would have eliminated any interest or claim which the United States could put forward with regard to permanent construction at Goose Bay.

In respect of future construction, it was proposed that Canada pay for construction of a permanent nature and that decision as to "permanency" or otherwise (upon certain suggested criteria) rest with the Aerodrome Development Committee to which a representative of the Treasury should be attached, with right of reference to the War Committee.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(External Affairs memorandum, June 1, 1944, and attached draft note from Canadian Ambassador, Washington, to U.S. Secretary of State — C.W.C. document 797).†

6. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved the proposed communication to the U.S. government and agreed that future construction be dealt with in the manner recommended, on the understanding that no construction in Canada requested by the United States should be undertaken, whether for U.S. or Canadian account, without prior approval by the Canadian government.[22]

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures à l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in United States

DESPATCH 1031 Ottawa, July 14, 1944

Sir,

Consideration has been given by the Government to the problem of disposing of movable defence facilities built or provided in Canada by the Government of the United States. The matter is one of some urgency since considerable quantities of movables are awaiting disposition. It is also a difficult problem since inevitably whatever items are sold will command prices far below their original cost and criticism may arise in the United States on the ground that the United States Government is not receiving a fair return. It is obviously in the interests of both governments to avoid such criticism.

2. Under the plan recommended by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and confirmed by an exchange of notes of January 27, 1943, the United States would have the option of removing the movables from Canada or of offering them for sale to the Canadian Government or to a Province, while if the Canadian Government did not wish to purchase them the facilities could be offered for sale on the open market with the approval of the Canadian Government. No great difficulty need be anticipated in the case of materials which the Canadian Government is anxious to purchase as it may be assumed that agreements about prices will not be too hard to reach. What presents a more difficult problem is the disposal of goods which the United States Government does not want to remove and which the Canadian Government does not want to buy. In order to keep the situation under control and to avoid the possibility of the market being flooded the Canadian Government intends to dispose of all its surplus war materials through one channel, namely, Crown Assets Allocation Committee and War Assets Corporation. Sales on the open market in Canada by the United States Government would obviously conflict with this policy and must therefore be eliminated as a possible method of disposal.

3. The solution favoured by Cabinet War Committee is for the Canadian Government to act somewhat in the capacity of a sales agent for the United States Government, turning over to the latter the net proceeds of all sales. I enclose copies of Cabinet War Committee Document No. 807† which contains the recommendations of the Joint Defence Construction Projects Panel of the disposition of both immovables and movables. Cabinet War Committee have approved these recommendations in principle.

4. We are somewhat reluctant to take the initiative in formally suggesting to the United States Government that the Canadian Government act as their agent since it might be construed by critics as an attempt to enable one branch of the Canadian Government to provide other branches with used United States equipment at unreasonably low rates. We feel, however, that the scheme, based on an agreement between representatives of the two governments as to price, is equitable. Representatives of both governments in the field agree that the suggested procedure would simplify administration. You should therefore discuss the question with the State Department and see whether they would be disposed to ask us for an agreement along the lines approved by Cabinet War Committee. If so, an exchange of notes could take place.

5. A word of explanation is probably necessary regarding the rather complicated process by which the Canadian Government would acquire and dispose of movables. As a matter of policy it was first determined that use should be made of the Government's disposal machinery, namely Crown Assets Allocation Committee and War Assets Corporation. However, these bodies have no power to dispose of any item until it has been declared "surplus" by a Government agency. It was therefore recommended that the Department of Munitions and Supply should in some way acquire title to whatever movables the United States wish to dispose of and then declare these to be surplus to their requirements so that the Crown Assets Allocation Committee could deal with them.

6. I think that from the point of view of impressing public opinion in the United States our proposals should be presented in the following order:

(1) The pricing of the movables will be in accordance with principles agreed upon by representatives of both governments.

(2) The Canadian Government will endeavour to dispose of them in accordance with given priorities.

(3) The net proceeds of sale after deduction of sales expenses and after allowance being made for duties and taxes as assessed will be paid to the United States Government on a final accounting.

It is possible that the United States authorities may not be enthusiastic over the suggestion that the Department of Munitions and Supply acquire title at a nominal price of one dollar, but I hope that you can convince them that some such method is the simplest way in which United States movables can be made subject to our disposal machinery. Any other method would require an Order-in-Council or possibly new legislation, and we are not anxious to do this unless it is quite impossible to secure an agreement otherwise.

7. I shall await a report from you on the outcomes of your discussions with the State Department.

I have etc.

TELETYPE WA-4247 Washington, July 18, 1944

CONFIDENTIAL. Your despatch No. 1031 of July 14th concerning the disposal of movable defence facilities built or provided in Canada by the United States.

1. Mr. Reid discussed this problem informally yesterday afternoon with Mr. Parsons and Mr. Peterson of the State Department. The State Department will have to refer the matter to both the War Department and Mr. Crowley[23], and the problem will have to be given careful study since it may create a precedent for the disposal of surplus property in other belligerent countries.

2. Since the State Department would find it useful to have a document which they could give to the other Government agencies, we are giving the State Department a memorandum informally. The memorandum begins with the first two paragraphs of your despatch No. 1031 omitting the last eleven words of paragraph 2. The rest of the memorandum reads as follows:

"3. The problem might be met by an agreement between the Canadian and United States Governments under which

(1) The pricing of the movables would be in accordance with principles agreed upon by representatives of both Governments. (The Canadian representatives would be appointed by the Department of Munitions and Supply and the War Assets Corporation.)

(2) The Canadian Government would endeavour to dispose of the movables in accordance with given priorities.

(3) The net proceeds of sale after deduction of sales expenses and after allowance being made for duties and taxes as assessed would be paid to the United States Government on a final accounting.

(4) The movables not sold within two years of the cessation of hostilities would be declared of no value and the account closed; likewise within two years of the cessation of hostilities the United States Government would surrender or remove from Canada the remaining movable assets.

(5) The Special Commissioner for defence projects in northwest Canada would be authorized to make local arrangements for the disposal of construction works and stores of a relatively minor character which in their present condition constitute a fire hazard.

(6) The United States would refrain from renting equipment to Canadian users in Canada, except upon request, or with the permission, of the Canadian Government.

[23]Leo T. Crawley, administration économique outre-mer des États-Unis.
Leo T. Crawley, United States Foreign Economic Administration.

"4. If the United States Government were to make a proposal to the Canadian Government along these lines, the Canadian Government in its reply would state that, for adminstrative reasons, it proposes that the Department of Munitions and Supply of Canada would acquire from the United States Government the movables that the United States desires to leave in Canada at a nominal price of $1.00 against lists supplied by the United States authorities. The necessity for this procedure is that the Crown Assets Allocation Committee and the War Assets Corporation have no power to dispose of any item until it has been declared 'surplus' by the Government agency."

3. We have transmitted to the State Department orally the information given in paragraphs 3 and 4 of your despatch and the second half of paragraph 6.

4. The State Department has raised the question of the meaning of "duties and taxes as assessed" in the third subparagraph of paragraph 6 of your despatch. Does this mean that the duties and taxes will be assessed on the resale value, or on the original value? The State Department has drawn our attention to a confidential Circular A160 of March 16th, 1943,† which was presumably issued by the Customs authorities in Ottawa, and which states that no invoices of value are required for the entry of supplies for United States defence projects in Canada. The personal opinion of Mr. Parsons and Mr. Peterson is that it would be more equitable if the duties and taxes were assessed on the resale value.

5. We have accepted their suggestion that the final subparagraph of paragraph 3 of our note referring to rentals should contain after the word "request" the words "or with the permission".

6. Mr. Parsons has suggested that perhaps Mr. Hickerson might like to discuss the problem of this new agreement with the Under-Secretary during his stay in Ottawa. If there are any changes which you would like to have made in the memorandum which we are leaving with the State Department, we can give them a revised memorandum and take back from them the original memorandum.

CONFIDENTIAL. Our WA-4247 of July 18th concerning the disposal of movable defence facilities.

1. Mr. Peterson of the State Department is afraid that the suggestion that the Department of Munitions and Supply acquire title at the nominal price of $1.00 may constitute a snag. It is to be assumed that the contemplated exchange of notes would be made public. In an election year there is always danger that someone might seize on this provision and distort it.

2. In your despatch No. 1031 of July 14th you said that any other method would require an Order-in-Council or possibly new legislation. Would it be possible for you to give us a definite opinion on whether new legislation would be required? If new legislation would be required, then we might have to run the risk of a distortion of the provision on a $1.00 payment. If, however, only an Order-in-Council is required the risk might not be worth running.

3. I wonder whether Section 3, Sub-Section 1 of the Bill respecting surplus Crown assets, which refers to property in the "custody, or control, or administered by" a Government Department, would not make it possible for the United States Government to place the movables under the custody, control, or administration of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and for the Department of Munitions and Supply then to declare the movables to be surplus.

4. The State Department is putting off circulating to the War Department and Mr. Crowley's organization the memorandum which we have given them until we receive an answer from you to this enquiry. Perhaps at the same time you could let us have an answer to the question raised in paragraph 4 of our WA-4247 of July 18th. Any amendments which you might care to make to the memorandum we have given to the State Department could also be made before the memorandum is circulated.

CONFIDENTIAL. Your EX-3020 of July 20th† on the disposal of movable defence facilities built or provided in Canada by the United States. We gave Mr. Peterson of the State Department this morning the information given in your EX-3020. He is holding our memorandum until we learn of the result of your consultations with National Revenue and Munitions and Supply.

2. Mr. Peterson raised an additional point this morning which was whether it might be advisable and practicable to include in the memorandum some definition of movables. He also drew attention to the word "surrender" in subparagraph 4 of paragraph 3 of our memorandum, the text of which was sent to you under cover of our despatch No. 1768 of July 18th.† He thinks some such word as "abandon" might be more palatable. Failing that, he thinks it might be made clear to whom the movables would be surrendered. In the interests of clarity he thought it might be useful to substitute the word "movables" for "facilities", "materials" and "goods" — in lines 7, 10 and 14 respectively of paragraph 2 of the memorandum and to insert "movable" before "construction works" in subparagraph 5 of paragraph 3 of our memorandum.

3. We were in error in paragraph 1 of our WA-4247 of July 18th in stating that the question of this proposed agreement would be referred to Mr. Crowley, as well as to the War Department; it will be sent to the Acting Secretary of War and to Mr. Clayton, who is the Administrator of Surplus War Property.

IMMEDIATE. CONFIDENTIAL. Your WA-4247 and WA-4267 of July 18, disposal of movable defence facilities built or provided in Canada by the United States.

1. With regard to the question raised in paragraph 4 of your WA-4247, National Revenue agree that duties and taxes should not be assessed on the original value of the goods, but instead "on the value of the goods as appraised by officers of Customs and Excise in the condition at the time and place of disposal." They further give assurance that "our officers will use care in their appraisal and that the customs duties and taxes will not be levied on greater than a fair market value, having regard to the condition, location, and probable use of the goods."

2. With reference to paragraphs two and three of your WA-4267, it is thought that moveables could be declared surplus without the transfer of ownership taking place. The Surplus Crown Assets Act provides (Section 23) that the Governor in Council may make such orders as he may deem necessary or desirable "to confer on the committee or corporation additional powers and duties." The Governor in Council could therefore direct that the committee or the corporation, or both, should undertake the duty of disposing of property which is owned by the United States Government and which, by arrangement between the two Governments, is left in the hands of the Canadian Government for disposal.

3. Should the proposal of $1.00 sale to Munitions and Supply be found inacceptable to the United States, the alternative described in paragraph two above could be proposed, since no new legislation would be needed to carry it out.

4. Subparagraph 3 (3) of your memorandum to State Department should be amended so as to embody the substance of paragraph one above. Similarly, in the event of the $1.00 sale approach being set aside, the contents of paragraph two above should be embodied in paragraph four of your memorandum. Ends.

1. There is no objection to the changes proposed in the last eleven lines of paragraph 2 of your teletype.

2. Since the situation of movables is an urgent one it is thought that no definition of movables should be attempted at least at this stage. To try to define this term now would most probably lead us into endless discussions which would cause considerable delays in disposing of this matter. It can be taken for granted that in the great majority of cases the movable character of the goods will appear clearly so that the inconvenience consequent upon a lack of definition of movables will occur in a relatively few cases. It is thought that this inconvenience which may be dealt with later will be highly compensated by the advantages resulting from the disposing of the bulk of this matter expeditiously.

FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION

IMMEDIATE. Following for Keenleyside from Hickerson, Begins: I am quoting later on in this message a draft recommendation of post-war disposition. We have added to this draft certain new provisions respecting movables. You will recall that on July 27th your Embassy here sent us a proposal regarding the disposition of movables left in Canada by the United States. The arrangement proposed in that note† has been carefully considered by the War Department and the Surplus War Property Administration. Both of these agencies find themselves unable to agree to it. As I told you at the last meeting of the Board, I do not like the proposal on public relations grounds.

General Henry and I believe that it would be possible to deal with this whole subject in the proposed recommendation of the Board. Please regard this draft as our rough working draft and not as a definite proposal. We may well have suggested changes ourselves in its language to present at the meeting.

The draft is as follows:

The Board resumed consideration of the post-war disposition of defence projects built by the United States in Canada and adopted the following as its 33rd recommendation:

The Board reviewed the 28th recommendation, adopted January 13, 1943, and referred especially to that portion of the recommendation favouring the conclusion, whenever possible, of specific Agreements covering the post-war disposition of defence projects built by the United States in Canada.

The Board believes that, in the light of experience in connection with these specific Agreements thus far made, it would be desirable to amend the 28th recommendation in certain respects and to make it applicable, as amended hereby, to all projects, disposition of which remains unsettled. To that end Board:

1. Reaffirms the following principles of the 28th recommendation:

(a) That portion of paragraph (a) which sets forth the principle that the United States shall relinquish title within one year after the cessation of hostilities of all immovable defence installations built or provided in Canada by the Government of the United States, unless otherwise agreed by the two Governments, (the application of this principle to be subject, however, to the operation of the amended formula set forth in 2 below).

(b) That portion of paragraph (b) which provides that all movable facilities built or provided in Canada by the Government of the United States shall, within one year after the cessation of hostilities and at the option of the United States Government, be removed from Canada, unless otherwise agreed by the two Governments.

2. Recommends the adoption of the following formula as a fair and equitable method for settling the disposition of all defence projects constructed by the United States in Canada, disposition of which has not been heretofore specifically provided for:

In the case of each of the defence projects and/or equipment and supplies pertaining to the United States in Canada to which this formula shall apply, the Canadian Government and the United States Government will severally appoint one qualified appraiser whose joint duty it will be to appraise such properties, improvements, installations and facilities (including movable facilities and/or equipment and supplies pertaining to the United States in Canada where the United States has waived its option to remove them from Canada), which may comprise the project, in order to determine the fair market value thereof for which the Canadian Government will reimburse the United States Government in the light of the use or uses to which the project and/or equipment and supplies is best adaptable. If the two appraisers cannot agree on the fair market value they will select a third appraiser to determine this value. The supplies which the United States Government elects to leave in Canada in accordance with the above formula and which, because of danger of deterioration in storage or for other reasons Canada desires to handle without delay, may be turned over to the appropriate Canadian authorities on the basis determined by the report of the appraisers subject to any adjustment later agreed on between the two Governments. The appraisers' reports will be submitted to the Board for consideration in connection with a recommendation to the two Governments. Ends.

CANADA-U.S. PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE;
MEETING, SEPTEMBER 6, 1944;
THIRTY-THIRD RECOMMENDATION

16. THE SECRETARY reported that the Journal of the Board's Discussions and Decisions, covering the meeting held in Montreal on September 6th and 7th, had been submitted to the Prime Minister. In accordance with the usual practice, copies of the Journal had been sent to the Ministers of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

The Journal of this meeting contained the Thirty-third Recommendation of the Board. This Recommendation, which was intended to provide for the disposition of all U.S. defence projects not covered by specific agreements, read as follows:

Immovables

(a) The government of the United States shall, within three months from the date of the approval of this Recommendation, supply the government of Canada with a list of immovables (hereinafter referred to as facilities) which it desires to make subject to the provisions of this Recommendation.

(b) In the case of each of the facilities included in the list referred to in (a), the Canadian government and the United States government will each appoint one qualified appraiser whose joint duty it will be to appraise such facility in order to determine the fair market value thereof at the time and place of appraisal. If the two appraisers cannot agree on the fair market value, they will select a third appraiser to determine this value. The amount set by the appraisers shall be paid to the United States government by the government of Canada, provided that the foregoing paragraphs (a) and (b) shall not apply to any facilities heretofore specifically provided for;

(c) Any existing facility not included in the United States list shall, within one year after the cessation of hostilities, be relinquished, without cost, to the Crown either in the right of Canada or in the right of the Province in which the same or any part thereof lies, as may be appropriate under Canadian law.

Movables

(a) The government of the United States shall remove from Canada all those items which it desires.

(b) The Government of Canada shall arrange through the appropriate governmental agencies for the purchase from the United States of such remaining items as it desires to obtain for its own use or disposition.

(c) All other movables shall be transferred to a designated agency of the Canadian government and shall be sold or disposed of by such agency, the proceeds to be paid to the government of the United States, provided that in connection with the items referred to in paragraph (c), the United States government shall be represented by an officer designated by it for that purpose who shall have an equal voice in the setting of prices, the allocation of priorities, the assessment of legitimate sales costs and other details of the sale or other disposal of the items concerned; and provided further that any such items remaining unsold at the end of two years from the time they are transferred to the Canadian agency concerned shall either be declared of no value and the account closed or, at the option of the United States, shall be removed from Canada by the United States authorities.

(P.J.B.D. Journal, Sept. 6 and 7, 1944).†

17. MR. HEENEY drew attention to the reference made in the Journal to proposed abandonment of Camp 550, the Dawson Creek Railhead Depot, airfields on the Northeast Staging route and certain weather stations and communications systems.

18. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that the Thirty-third Recommendation of the Board be approved, on the understanding that, as there were certain facilities whose disposal would entail expenses such as custody and demolition, any expense of such a character would be taken into consideration in the final accounting;

(b) that the U.S. government's proposals to transfer to Canadian control Camp 550 and the Dawson Creek Railhead Depot be referred to the Joint Defence Construction Projects Panel for examination and report;

(c) that the U.S. government's proposal to abandon airfields on the Northeast Staging Route be referred to the Chiefs of Staff Committee for report on defence aspects, to the Air Transport Policy Committee for report on civil aspects, and to the Joint Defence Construction Projects Panel for report as to the facilities involved; and,

(d) that the U.S. government's proposal to transfer to Canadian control weather stations and Army communications systems be referred to the Interdepartmental Meteorological Committee, for study and report.

Memorandum by Wartime Assistant, Department of External Affairs

[Ottawa,] October 18, 1944

ACQUISITION OF LANDS FOR UNITED STATES DEFENCE PROJECTS IN CANADA:
SUMMARY OF DEVELOPMENTS UP TO OCTOBER 18TH, 1944.

1. In order to avoid that the United States acquire title to a great number of land properties within this country as a result of its numerous wartime activities in Canada, the Cabinet War Committee agreed on June 18th, 1943, that the Canadian Government should acquire title to lands required by the United States for the purpose of carrying out their defence projects. As a corollary to that decision the War Committee further agreed on July 7th, 1943, that all leases to property already acquired by the United States be taken over by the Canadian Government.[24]

2. On September 7th, 1943, a note was sent to the United States' Minister embodying the decisions referred to above. The note contained the following main points:

(a) In the future, the Canadian Government would acquire lands required by the United States to carry out their projects. Such lands would be made available without charge.

(b) In every case where a land was needed for a major defence project notification to that effect should be sent to the Department of External Affairs. In the case of a minor defence project, application should be made to the Canadian Special Commissioner in Edmonton.

(c) All leases (or other titles) already acquired by the United States should be transferred to the Canadian Government.

(d) The procedure of acquisition of lands by the Canadian Government would not apply to United States contractors. Also the Canadian Government would not take over leases acquired by such contractors since it was assumed that they did not acquire lands on behalf of the United States. It was also assumed that the United States did not take over leases to property originally acquired by these contractors for their own use.

(e) The right of user on properties made available by the Canadian Government would be deemed to continue for the duration of the war.

(f) Installations erected on properties made available would be disposed of in accordance with the principles laid down in the exchange of notes of January 27th, 1943, concerning the post-war disposition of United States projects.

(g) At the termination of the war the United States would endeavour to restore the sites involved to their original state.

3. On March 13, 1944, the U.S. replied to our Note of September 7, 1943. They agreed to our proposal to take over the properties subject to the following suggestions—

(1) that the Canadian Government establish a Land Acquisition Office at Edmonton to expedite acquisitions and to provide a direct contact for the owners (many of whom have been unpaid during the period of transfer);

(2) that the right of user should continue in the U.S. not only for the duration of the war but for six months thereafter (in accordance with our other wartime arrangements);

(3) that the principles laid down in the January 27th, 1943, agreement constituted only a model formula which was to be used in the absence of ad hoc arrangements, that the United States prefered to enter into such agreements on this subject and that, consequently, the formula of January 27th should only apply to installations erected on lands made available "in the absence of ad hoc agreements;"

(4) that the United States should not be obliged to restore sites to their original state since as a result of extensive improvements made on properties involved the Canadian Government would hardly wish such restoration;

(5) that leases (or other titles) acquired by cost-plus-fee contractors should be taken over by the Canadian Government since these contractors were being considered as agents of the United States.

The United States also gave an assurance that all lands acquired by the United States had been so by lease and that no attempt had been made to acquire a vested interest within the country.

4. On May 13th, 1944, a second note was sent to the United States Ambassador. In this note:

(1) The Canadian Government agreed with the suggestions contained in sub-paragraphs (1), (2) and (3) of paragraph 3 above.

(2) It was also conceded that the United States should not as a rule be obliged to restore the sites to their original state "except in individual instances on request by the Canadian Government."

(3) The Canadian Government, however, refused to identify United States cost-plus-fee contractors with their Government and consequently to apply the proposed policy to lands needed or already acquired by these contractors.

(4) It was suggested that the United States designate an Officer in Edmonton to act on their behalf concerning the acquisition of lands and transfer of leases.

(5) The Canadian Government undertook to reimburse all monies spent by the United States since September 7th, 1943, on leases transferred under the agreement.

5. No reply to our note of May 13th was received. On June 29th, the question of the leases acquired by cost-plus-fee contractors was discussed at a meeting between Privy Council and External Affairs. The conclusion was reached that this problem could be considered as being unsettled as late as May 13th, i.e. the date when we reaffirmed our position on this question, that in these circumstances it might be difficult to regard transfer of contractors' leases to the United States which had taken place before May 13th as being in contravention of the policy outlined in our first note of September, 1943, and that consequently we might be justified in taking over leases transferred up to May 13th, 1944, instead of September 7th, 1943. (EX-2716, June 29)†

6. Discussions took place at Washington between June 29th and[25] July 4th between the State Department and Squadron Leader Cooper and Mr. Reid. The following points were raised by the United States during these discussions:

(1) the proposed agreement should apply to the whole of Canada and not merely to the Northwest. (WA-3967, July 1st, 1944,† paragraph 2);

(2) on the other hand, it was intimated that the War Department may request that the agreement should not apply to facilities at Prince Rupert and Port Edward. (WA-3967, paragraph 4);

(3) the right of user of the United States on lands made available should include the right for service organisations such as U.S.O.[26] and contractors to use the facilities. (WA-3967, paragraph 6);

(4) with regard to the question of cost-plus-fee contractors (see 2 (d), 3 (5), 4 (3) above), the United States while agreeing with the policy outlined in paragraph 5 above stated that it was impracticable to retransfer to the contractors leases which had been transferred to them since May 13th, 1944, on account of some contractors having left Canada. They suggested that in the case of transfers having taken place since that date the United States Government should apply in the ordinary manner to the Canadian Government for the purpose of acquiring the land involved; (WA-3994,† paragraph 4);

(5) with regard to the question of the post-war disposition of installations, it was disclosed that the United States intended to have the recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board embodied in the exchange of notes of January 27th, 1943 replaced by a new one and that consequently any clause in the proposed agreement relating to the question should be deleted. This applied particularly to the question of the restoration of sites (see 2 (g), 3 (4), 4 (2) above), which was considered as being ancillary to the question of post-war disposition of installations; (WA-3994, July 4th, paragraph 2).

A favorable reply was given with regard to the point raised in (1) (EX-2744, July 3rd)† while a negative answer was given with regard to (2) and (3) (EX-2744). The points raised in (4) and (5) are being considered hereinafter.

7. On July 6th, 1944, a new draft† was sent informally to the United States Ambassador. This draft:

(1) embodied the substance of our original note of September 7th, 1943:

(2) together with the points conceded to the United States in our note of May 13th, 1944;

(3) it specially agreed with the United States suggestion whereby in the case of leases transferred since May 13th, the land involved would be made available to the United States by the Canadian Government in the ordinary manner. (See paragraph 6(4) above);

(4) it eliminated all references to the exchange of notes of January 27th, 1943 including the question of the restoration of sites. (See paragraph 6 (5) above.)

8. No reply was received to our draft of July 6th. On July 22nd, however, we were informed by Washington that the War Department still objected to our proposal on account of the fact that it had something to do with the agreement of January 27th, 1943, concerning the post-war disposition of defence projects.

9. The whole matter became a dead issue until October 4th, 1944, at which date we were informed that the United States War Department was about to start the assignment of leases to the Canadian Government in the Northwest area and that it was wondered whether the Canadian Government would consider amending its draft of July 6th since the United States was declaring itself ready to act with regard to one of the two main aspects of the question of acquisition of lands, i.e. the transfer of United States leases to the Canadian Government.

10. From the above considerations it can be safely concluded that:

(1) the Canadian and United States Governments have come to an agreement on all the points raised during the negotiations which have taken place in the course of the last year except with regard to the post-war disposition of the installations and the restoration of sites;

(2) that the Canadian Government has agreed with all the suggestions made by the United States except with regard to (a) the right of user of installations by the United States service organisations such as U.S.O., (b) the question whether the proposed agreeement should apply to the area of Prince Rupert and Port Edward.

With regard to (1) above it may be said that the adoption by the two countries of the 33rd Recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board should eliminate any objection on the part of the United States.

With regard to (b) it would appear in the light of the last information received that the United States are ready to accept our contention that the agreement should apply to at least the whole Northwest.

Procès-verbal d'une réunion

Minutes of Meeting

[Ottawa,] October 20, 1944

ACQUISITION OF LANDS FOR UNITED STATES DEFENCE PROJECTS IN CANADA

Record of meeting held on Friday October 20, 1944, at 10 a.m. in the conference room of the New Post Office.

1. The following members of the United States Northwest Service Command and War Department and of Canadian government departments concerned attended the meeting:

Brigadier General F. S. Strong, Jr.	United States Army
Major Robert H. Fabian	United States Army
Captain Schmeltzer	United States Army
T. L. Cory	Mines & Resources
Georges W. Payton
F. Thomas	Transport
Jacques Fortier
Wing Commander G. F. Stewart	Privy Council Office
A. G. Cooper
J. E. Read	External Affairs
Dr. H. L. Keenleyside
R. Chaput

2. The meeting was held for the purpose of discussing the question of the transfer to the Canadian Government of leases held by the United States in connection with the carrying out of their defence projects and more especially the form of lease assignment under which the transfer would take place.

3. Major Fabian submitted that it was necessary to adopt an assignment form which would not give rise and [to] legal disputes between lessors, the assignor and assignee once the transfer had taken place, and in this connection he thought it wise to mention in the form the questions appearing on page 2 of the United States draft.†

4. Mr. Read recalled that† Canada had already submitted a comprehensive draft note† on July 6 but that since then a machinery for the transfer of leases had been set up by United States and Canadian officials in the Northwest and that the question now arose whether or not the two parties could continue to use that machinery without a formal agreement on the subject being signed (or the features of this agreement inserted in the assignment form).

5. Major Fabian thought that from the legal point of view some sort of agreement would have to be signed between the two countries.

With regard to the question whether the points raised in page 2 of the United States draft should be included in the assignment form, Major Fabian thought that the transfer of leases could hardly take place without the question of the disposition of improvements being dealt with and that consequently item 3 relating to the 33rd Recommendation of the P.J.B.D. should appear in the form.

6. Assuming that some sort of agreement would have to be signed, Mr. Read stated the Canadian position on the subject as being that the question of the post-war disposition of improvements together with the other points raised in page 2 of the United States assignment form should be eliminated and instead incorporated in a separate agreement between the two countries.

7. With regard to item 3 of the U.S. form dealing with the 33rd Recommendation, Major Fabian stated that the recommendation would most probably be adopted by the United States with the Canadian proviso whereupon Dr. Keenleyside suggested that in these circumstances item 3 could easily be deleted from the form since it would be dealt with in a formal agreement concerning the 33rd Recommendation.

8. The United States representatives agreed to the suggestion and the discussion then turned to the other points raised in page 2 of the United States form. It was found that no fundamental disagreement existed between the two parties on these points.

9. This being so the United States representatives finally agreed to the suggestion that the points raised in page 2 of their draft should not appear in the assignment form and be dealt with separately and announced that they had no objection to the Canadian draft assignment form being used for the transfer.

10. A drafting committee composed of Major Fabian, Mr. Read and Squadron Leader Cooper was formed for the purpose of drafting a memorandum embodying the points concurred in by the two parties during the discussion. This committee was to proceed to its work immediately and the meeting was adjourned at 11 A.M. until 12.30 P.M. at which time the memorandum drafted by the Committee was considered and approved. The memorandum was to be sent to the State Department for consideration with a view to forming the basis of an agreement dealing with acquisition of lands and transfer of leases.[27]

DESPATCH 2845 Washington, December 21, 1944

Sir,

With reference to your EX-4652 of November 18th† concerning the disposition of defence projects built or provided in Canada by the United States, I have the honour to enclose herewith copy of the Secretary of State's note of December 20th approving the 33rd Recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and the Canadian Government's proviso to the Recommendation.[28]

I am enclosing also copy of a letter from Mr. John Hickerson† which accompanied the note and in which he raises the question of duty to be assessed on movables sold in pursuance to the 33rd Recommendation. It is the view of the United States Government that no duty should be levied on these movables.

I shall appreciate receiving your views on this matter.

exception to this is that customs duties may be imposed on direct intergovernment sales under B of the section on movables of the 33rd Recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. This, however, will not affect the amounts to be received by the United States Government. The price will be negotiated between agencies of the two Governments and if subsequently the Canadian agency which purchases the equipment is called upon to pay customs duty this is simply a matter of internal bookkeeping between Canadian Government Departments. The main point of the United States representations as we understood them was that it would be desirable to exempt all immovables and those movables which are sold through War Assets Corporation. This will be accomplished as the result of the Government's decision.

Canada-U.S. defence projects; Northwest Staging Route; U.S. facilities on airfields

12. THE SECRETARY reported that the U.S. government had requested that the Canadian government make provision for taking over U.S. facilities on the airfields on the Northwest Staging Route, including buildings, equipment and other miscellaneous facilities.

The special committee of the Cabinet on defence questions had considered the question and recommended that the R.C.A.F. be directed to take over these facilities, on an interim measure, pending decision on the eventual control of the Northwest Staging Route.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, Oct. 16, 1945 — Cabinet Document 91).†

13. THE CABINET, after discussion, agreed that, pending clarification of the eventual strategic importance of defence facilities in the Northwest and until decision could be taken as to eventual control of the Northwest Staging Route, the Department of National Defence for Air be directed to assume responsibility for U.S. facilities on airfields of the Route under appropriate conditions to be stipulated with U.S. authorities with respect to the condition of items transferred to Canadian control and retention of equipment required for the Route's operation.

2. MR. HICKERSON said that since the December meeting, General Robins and his associates in the War Department had discussed with Imperial Oil revisions of the present contract. The War Department's latest proposals were embodied in the letter of intent,† the text which had already been communicated to the Canadian Government. He asked General Robins to report on the discussions with Imperial and to outline briefly the arrangement envisaged in the letter of intent.

3. GENERAL ROBINS stated that the first proposal made to Mr. LeSueur, Vice President of Imperial Oil, was that the United States would pay the company at the present rate of $1.25 per barrel for the first 1,500,000 barrels of oil purchased. Any subsequent purchases would be at the cost of production, a reserve of 30,000,000 barrels being maintained in the Norman field for United States use. The United States would continue exploratory work in the area where rigs were already set up, on condition that half of any oil which might be discovered would be set aside as a military reserve available to the United States. The Company, however, wished to take over the exploratory work themselves and carry on with a view to commercial development if enough oil could be discovered to warrant it. They were of the opinion that commercial development was possible if a 300-400,000,000 barrel field could be proven, in which case a 10-12″ pipeline would be built to carry the crude to the seaboard for transportation to existing refineries on the Pacific Coast. In view of the Company's attitude, the War Department had modified its original proposals and suggested the arrangement outlined in the letter of intent, which was briefly:

(1) that for the duration of the war the Company would agree to deliver at least 4,000 bbls. per day at the cost of production plus a fee of 15 cents (Canadian currency) per bbl.;

(2) that immediately upon the termination of the war the Company would give the United States a continuing preferential right to purchase, for military purposes, at the above rate, 60,000,000 barrels, to be maintained by the Company as a reserve;

(3) that if the reserve was not needed for military purposes the company would have the privilege of using it for their commercial development upon payment to the United States of 50 cents per bbl. (This clause was included at the request of the Company to cover the contingency that a field of, say, only 250,000,000 barrels was discovered, in which case they would wish to be able to draw upon the reserve in order to make commercial development possible. General Robins said that, insofar as the United States Government was concerned, it would be delighted to see the oil left in the ground as a reserve against a possible future military emergency.);

(4) that the United States would turn over to the Company, free of charge, the equipment which they now have on the ground or en route to the Norman Wells field for use in exploratory work.

General Robins stated that in a letter dated January 26, 1944, the Imperial Oil Company had indicated that the letter of intent was not acceptable and that there was no use in continuing conversations until the Canadian Department of Mines and Resources had given its decision on the Company's appeal for a fundamental change in the regulations under which it is operating on its new leases in the Norman area.

In reply to a question by MR. ROBERTSON on the apparent conflict between paragraphs 5 and 7 of the letter of intent, General Robins explained that the modified contract (giving the United States the right to purchase oil at the cost of production plus 15 cents per barrel) would terminate at the end of the war, but immediately upon its termination, the Company, under paragraph 5, would sign a new contract giving the United States a preferential right to purchase up to 60,000,000 barrels at the price mentioned above.

MR. HICKERSON confirmed General Robins' statement that Imperial was very keen on taking over the exploratory work and was willing to gamble on the possibility of discovering oil in commercial quantities, if some arrangement could be worked out with the United States and with the Canadian Government. He added that the United States have stopped drilling until a new contract has been drawn up. This apparently was impossible until the Company had clarified its relations with the Department of Mines and Resources. He inquired, therefore, whether anything could yet be said about the Canadian Government's attitude.

4. MR. ROBERTSON said that the Canadian representatives have been thinking about the strategic reserve idea but that it would be necessary, in view of Canada's general responsibilities in the Northwest, to give further consideration to the questions of policy involved. If there was oil in ample quantity, it was reasonable to think that the requirements of continental defence should be the first charge. Canada was mindful of the important and essential way in which she has received oil from the United States throughout the war and of the manner in which the United States have shared their coal production. There was no disposition here to take a dog-in-the-manger attitude in respect of anything in this country which might be of value to continental defence, but we would prefer to see the Canadian Government, rather than a private company, taking the responsibility for making a resource available for continental defence. In pursuing this line of thought, he and his colleagues had been wondering if it would be possible to substitute, for the type of agreement between the United States and the Company which had been proposed by the United States, some understanding between the two governments in regard to assuring the maintenance of essential reserves. He added that Canadian views had not yet crystallized or taken definite shape. The problem had to be approached from the standpoint of defence and military strategy, and he felt that the United States could not usefully consider it in terms of financial salvage. An intergovernmental understanding would imply the assumption by the Canadian Government of a more active responsibility for the location and development of the field and for the maintenance of reserves than had been the case heretofore.

MR. HICKERSON said that the working out of an arrangement with Imperial Oil along the lines suggested would, of course, involve an intergovernmental exchange of notes. This exchange of notes would replace the original intergovernmental agreement.[30] The Canadian Government would be asked to agree, for instance, to interpose no obstacles to the exploitation of the area. The exchange of notes would also include an expression of the Canadian Government's approval of the new agreement between the United States and Imperial Oil. He wondered how a regime of active government participation such as Mr. Robertson suggested would work out in practice. In the United States the oil industry was a private development. There was no doubt that Imperial would try to induce the Canadian Government to leave the Northwestern development in private hands.

5. DR. CLARK asked how the figure of 60,000,000 barrels had been arrived at. In reply GENERAL ROBINS said that the United States will have invested some $15,000,000 in extending the Norman Wells field and on the exploratory drilling. They felt, therefore, that they should have a preferential right to at least half the oil in the Norman field. GENERAL PECKHAM added that, on the basis of the present extent of the proven field, this would amount to approximately 30,000,000 barrels. The other 30,000,000 represented liquidation of the United States interest in wildcatting. They would take an assured 30,000,000 barrels rather than gamble on further possible discoveries. He added that the 60,000,000 barrels represented $30,000,000, certainly not an unreasonably high return on an expenditure of $134,000,000. (Later in the discussion MR. HICKERSON said that the $60,000,000 figure was largely arbitrary, accidental, and bore no relation to United States expenditure on the Canol development.) In reply to a further question by Dr. Clark, GENERAL ROBINS said that the 60,000,000 barrels would be set aside as a military reserve which was not to be used commercially without the express agreement of the two governments. This did not mean, of course, that no oil could be sold to local consumers until a field of 60,000,000 barrels had been proven up. Local requirements were so small that they would not appreciably diminish the reserve for a great number of years. The reserve would be drawn upon only for military purposes in time of peace and of war.

6. MR. ROBERTSON pointed out that an arrangement with Imperial Oil of the type proposed in the letter of intent would, in a sense, give the United States power to veto developments in the Canadian northwest and might place them in a difficult and invidious political position. He felt that it should be a responsibility of the Government of Canada to decide upon the rate and kind of development of the Northwestern oil field. DR. CLARK added that the burden of carrying a 60,000,000 barrel reserve and the expense of building a pipeline large enough to permit commercial development of the field meant that Imperial Oil would need a monopoly position in the whole area. This would accentuate the political difficulty from the Canadian standpoint. GENERAL PYRON, while not prepared to go quite so far as to say that Imperial would need to have a monopoly, agreed that no oil company would take on a financial burden of such magnitude without very generous treatment in the matter of leases. DR. CLARK did not like the figure of 60,000,000 when, according to Canadian estimates, the proven field at Norman Wells was only in the neighbourhood of 58,000,000 barrels. He felt that a ratio would be safer. GENERAL ROBINS said that the War Department favoured the ratio principle, but that Imperial Oil would have none of it, since present permits gave the Canadian Government half of the field held under new leases, while the United States were proposing to take the other half.

[30]Canada, Recueil des traités, 1942, N° 23.
Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 23.

7. Reverting again to the question of responsibility for maintaining the strategic reserve, MR. ROBERTSON expressed the opinion that this was too big a question to be covered by a contractual agreement between the United States Government and a private company. MR. HICKERSON thought that this objection was not necessarily inherent in the proposed mode of settlement — the United States would sign a contract with the Company to maintain a reserve and would ask the Canadian Government, in a new intergovernmental agreement, to see that Imperial did so. Or, alternatively, the Canadian Government could exercise control through its own agreement with Imperial. He emphasized that the United States were anxious to reach an agreement with the Canadian Government and with the Company which would enable them to withdraw from the picture. The present approach represented an attempt to withdraw in a manner acceptable to the Company. They would be glad to consider any alternative proposal which the Canadian Government might care to put forward. He added that if this development was not carried out by an oil company, the alternative seemed to be one or both governments going into the oil business.

The meeting adjourned for lunch at 1 o'clock.

8. When the meeting reconvened at 3 p.m., MR. ROBERTSON pointed out that there were two important and to some extent separate aspects of the problem to be considered — the technical and the political. He suggested, therefore, in view of the limited time at the disposal of the United States representatives, that the meeting divide, with Mr. Jackson, Mr. Gibson, Group Captain Hanna, Mr. Macdonnell and the United States technical members endeavouring to clear up any questions of fact which were still outstanding, while the others met in his office to discuss the political problems involved. This suggestion was adopted, and Mr. Atherton, Mr. Hickerson, General Robins, Mr. Clark, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Heeney, Dr. Clark, Commander Edwards, Mr. Read, Wing Commander Cumyn and Mr. Reid withdrew to Mr. Robertson's office. Wing Commander Cumyn acted as secretary for this part of the meeting.

9. Report of Discussions on the Political Aspects of the Problem

MR. ROBERTSON opened the discussion by explaining that he felt the conversations were leading into issues which in themselves were of much greater importance and significance than the specific problem of renegotiating the Imperial Oil contract. Incidental to any settlement of the latter issue there might result, by inference or implication, settlement for a considerable time to come of the larger issue of the policy to be followed by Canada in the development of the entire Canadian Northwest. Both Governments would have to give very careful examination to the proposals under consideration, in the light of the probable reaction on public opinion. The Canadian Government would like to have a mutually satisfactory solution reached as soon as possible, but could not at the moment state a definite proposition which would be acceptable to it; and, further, the Canadian Government saw serious difficulties in the sort of solution which the State Department had put forward. The discussions of the Technical Committee might assist in clarifying the position and he hoped that some of the political considerations might be explored by this Committee. Because of its apparent potential as a substantial field and because of the world political significance of petroleum, he feared that the Canol development contained within itself factors which might make for friction and disturbance in the relations between the two countries. There was danger that an agreement might be made on Canol which, while settling the immediate problems, might cause mischief in the wider sphere. He felt that no good would be served by reviewing the fairness or reasonableness of the original agreement and the foresight or lack of it that was then exercised. The agreement was drawn under conditions of wartime urgency to meet a threatening strategic situation, and it was against such a background that the Canadian Government had given ready assent to what was then regarded as a strictly wartime measure.

Reverting to the United States proposals, he remarked that these appeared to resolve themselves into two propositions, one relating to defence and the other to recovery of investment. These two propositions, on the surface, at least, appeared to be incompatible and it would seem that to the extent that an effort is made by the United States Government to recover its financial outlay, the defence proposition would appear to be undermined. It was on the basis of defence that the Canadian Government had originally accepted the Canol proposals but, although the degree of assistance to the defence of the continent rendered by the development would appear to have been but marginal, nevertheless, that marginal assistance, under different circumstances, might well have proved decisive. The investment considerations were thus excluded. The Prime Minister of Canada has underlined the continuing nature of Canada-United States defence relations. It might, therefore, be possible to spell out an arrangement on Canol that would reasonably take care of the interests of continental defence.

MR. HEENEY said that he had endeavoured to approach the problem in such a way as to separate the purely military or defence considerations from those based upon commercial or investment criteria. Under the apparent necessity of presenting the overall expenditure in a more favourable light, he found it exceedingly difficult to segregate the two. He added that the policy questions involved had not as yet been considered at the ministerial level and the Canadian officials were without instructions from the Cabinet. He was more and more impressed with the importance of policy considerations affecting any Canadian decision upon suggestions put forward by United States representatives. However, if it could be accepted that the proposal in regard to strategic reserves was a bona fide one, then it should not be difficult for the Canadian Government to agree upon a reserve to be made available by the Canadian Government for continental defence when required. He was in some doubt as to the process of reasoning by which the amount of the proposed strategic reserve had been reached. It seemed unrealistic to select a figure of 60,000,000 barrels when the quantity that could be used for military purposes was, in fact, limited, and would continue to be limited for some time to come, by the size of the pipeline and the extent of the proven field. He suggested that any strategic reserve that might be created should bear a direct and realistic relationship to these physical limitations with provision, possibly, for subsequent modification to accord with future developments. The reserve would have to be under the control of the government of Canada. A strategic reserve in Canadian territory, in which the United States Government had a beneficial interest, could not on political grounds be defended in this country.

MR. HICKERSON stated that it would be the intention of the United States Government to leave the oil in the ground against a future eventuality — subject to withdrawal for peacetime military operations. It was realized that recoupment of the investment was improbable, and therefore in determining the amount of the strategic reserve, the figure had been set as high as possible. He pointed out that the reserve did not constitute outright ownership but merely an option to purchase.

MR. ROBERTSON commented that he found it difficult to visualize a situation wherein Canadian oil required for continental defence would not in any event be accessible to the United States Government irrespective of the existence of the option; indeed, it might be said that Canadian co-operation might be more readily forthcoming if there were no contractual obligation such as an option.

MR. HICKERSON agreed that from the past history of Canadian-United States relations he was satisfied that Canadian resources could be counted upon in any emergency, but unfortunately the Truman Committee had pointed to the failure of the United States Government to secure post-war rights and it was under the force of this criticism that the present approach was being made.

MR. HEENEY commented that objections on political grounds in Canada to concessions secured by the United States would be the more severe in proportion to the advantages which the United States appeared to secure.

MR. ROBERTSON introduced the further point that any claim for equitable treatment on a specific project that tended to separate from the overall war effort a sector of war activity, and attempted to strike a balance of profit and loss in favour of the individual nations participating, was fundamentally false and wrong and would lead to claims for equity in many directions; this could only raise ghosts of the debt controversies of the last war.

MR. HICKERSON stated that in a sense the difficulties of the problem had been compounded by the embarrassment resultant upon the discovery of a large amount of oil. He feared an unfavourable reaction in the United States unless his government secured an agreement indicating a financial return (an unlikely prospect) or a strategic reserve. In respect to the latter, the larger the reserve the better his government's position would be. He thought it was possible that a formula could be agreed upon which need not cause Canada any embarrassment. In explanation of the figure of 60,000,000 barrels he stated that this represented in effect the additional pool discovered as a result of exploration financed by his government. When the original contract was drawn with Imperial Oil, the Company estimated a content of 8,000,000 barrels maximum. By his government's efforts the field had been enlarged by 50,000,000 barrels or approximately the amount of the proposed strategic reserve. What could be more logical than that this increase should accrue to the government's benefit?

MR. HEENEY suggested that the illogical feature would appear to be the control of Canadian resources by anyone but the Canadian Government.

GENERAL ROBINS pointed to the difficulty imposed by the findings of the Truman Committee against further wildcatting until an agreement had been reached with the Canadian Government and the Imperial Oil Company. Meanwhile, activity was suspended and drilling rigs and crews were standing idle while expenses continued at the rate of $350,000 per annum.

MR. ROBERSTON asked whether there was any disposition in the United States to impose restrictions on the export of United States produced oil. Any such restrictions, he thought, would introduce a new and serious complication, supposing Canadian resources to be frozen in a strategic reserve controlled by the United States.

MR. HICKERSON knew of no such possibility.

MR. ROBERTSON then remarked that over the next few years the two governments might find it necessary to agree upon joint action to cope with the problem of dealing with large quantities of surplus raw materials produced for war purposes by the extractive industries of the two countries. Such action might take the form of "strategic backlogs" setting up strategic reserves of such items as base metals, synthetic rubber, etc., which would, incidentally, tend to stabilize the markets for these products. Within the framework of such a scheme it might be possible to find a solution for the problem of Canol.

DR. CLARK asked whether a solution would not be possible along such lines as the creation by Canada of a strategic reserve (the magnitude of the reserve to be determined by the Canadian Government after consultation with the Chiefs of Staff of the two countries or the Permanent Joint Board on Defence) and the assumption by Canada of responsibility for continuing the wildcatting programme, to be accompanied by a public declaration by the Canadian Government of its plans for the development of the Canadian north.

MR. HICKERSON thought there might be good possibilities for an agreement of such a nature.

GENERAL ROBINS, pursuing this thought, outlined the terms under which his government might look with favour on the assumption by the Canadian Government of responsibility for continuing the development. He would be happy to see the Canadian Government assume Imperial's position, taking over from the United States all equipment and rigs without any cash consideration, and, over and above the strategic reserve, undertaking to give the United States a fifty per cent interest in any additional oil proved through subsequent drilling. He added that United States expenditure on development totalled above $15,000,000, of which approximately $7,000,000 had been expended through Imperial and approximately $8,000,000 represented transportation expenses chargeable to production.

DR. CLARK asked whether it would be an advantage or an embarrassment to the United States Government if the Canadian Government were to assume United States exploration costs to date.

MR. HICKERSON replied that this proposal required consideration. The difficulty was that the exploration costs would look small against the total expenditure of $134,000,000.

MR. ROBERTSON suggested that it would be difficult to devise a scheme of monetary compensation that would stand up to public criticism in both countries.

GENERAL ROBINS, in response to a suggestion that the Canadian Government might purchase the equipment in the field from the United States Government, said that one difficulty was that Imperial Oil now had option to buy all equipment in the field and negotiations would have to be conducted with them.

DR. CLARK suggested that the figure of 50,000,000 barrels appeared to have some "ocular" value and, in the formula to govern creation of a strategic reserve, this figure might be employed in relation to the maximum amount to be set aside.

MR. HICKERSON suggested that 50,000,000 barrels would more properly be considered a minimum; he agreed that the figure possessed "ocular" value.

DR. CLARK suggested that the figure might be disproportionate, considering the size of the field.

GENERAL ROBINS then proposed that, in conjunction with an assumption by the Canadian Government of the drilling contract, the Canadian Government might agree to maintain 50% of the proven supply for strategic purposes.

DR. CLARK contended that this might ruin the commercial possibilities.

GENERAL ROBINS then pointed to the urgent importance of an early revision of the Imperial contract. He explained that his government was now concerned solely with the area on which their rigs were located.

MR. ROBERTSON closed the discussions by indicating that the two governments now had a better understanding of each other's problems and the Canadian Government, for its part, fully understood the urgency of the situation. Obviously, careful thought by the Canadian Government was required. As soon as the Canadian Government was ready to put forward a concrete proposal, it would let the United States Government know.

10. Report of Discussions on the Technical Aspects of the Problem

MR. JACKSON stated that, although at the December meeting it had been agreed that General Worsham should be immediately instructed to supply a geological report to General Foster, this report had not yet been received. He emphasized that it was essential for his Department to have all available information as quickly as possible. GENERAL PECKHAM promised to check with General Robins to make sure that instructions had been sent to General Worsham to release the information to General Foster.

MR. GIBSON pointed out that Dr. Hage of the Department of Mines and Resources, who had been detailed to take over Dr. Stewart's work as the Department's representative and deputy to General Foster at Norman Wells, had reported that the United States officer in charge of exploratory operations there felt that he could not allow Dr. Hage access to geological information without specific authorization from General Worsham. COLONEL GRALING thought that possibly the explanation was that the officer in question had not been officially notified of Dr. Hage's appointment. He said that he would look into the matter.

MR. JACKSON said that he had some difficulty in reconciling the figure of $17,000,000 charged to prospecting and developing new wells at Norman in the Truman Committee's Report with the $2-3,000,000 estimate given by the United States representatives at the meeting in December. GENERAL PECKHAM explained that the latter figure covered merely the cost of wildcatting. The $17,000,000 included, in addition to the costs of drilling, equipment and transportation, some $2,000,000 not yet spent. He could not at the moment furnish a detailed breakdown of the figure. COLONEL GRALING suggested that the Off Continent Field Progress Report on the Canol Project, which the Department of Mines and Resources received monthly, would prohably give a rough breakdown.

GROUP CAPTAIN HANNA pointed out that under the present contract and with only a 4″ pipeline, it would take the United States over a year after the completion of the project to secure delivery of the first 1,500,000 barrels of oil at $1.25. GENERAL PECKHAM said that this was not quite correct, since 400,000 barrels have already been purchased during the construction period.

In reply to a question by Mr. Jackson, GENERAL PECKHAM stated that he had no idea of the value of the equipment now in the field, but that General Robins could probably supply the information.

When asked whether United States equipment at Norman Wells could be made available to any other agent than Imperial Oil, GENERAL PECKHAM said that United States Army regulations permit the renting of surplus equipment. However, Imperial has the option to purchase the equipment at Norman when it is no longer required by the United States and negotiations would have to be conducted with them before it could be made available to any other party.

GROUP CAPTAIN HANNA asked whether the proposed 60,000,000 barrel reserve would be used solely for defence purposes or whether it could be used for such operations as maintenance work on the Alaska Highway. GENERAL

PECKHAM stated that the latter would come within the definition of "military purposes". GROUP CAPTAIN HANNA then suggested that if a large field was not discovered, the United States might be using up the strategic reserve for purely routine purposes. The United States representative thought that this was rather unlikely, if oil could be brought in from the United States at a lower cost than that for which it could be produced at Norman Wells.

MR. JACKSON asked whether any exploratory work had been done by the United States outside the Norman Wells area. GENERAL PYRON said that operations had been confined within a 50 mile radius of Norman Wells. GENERAL PECKHAM added that the six holes upon which drilling operations had been halted pending revision of the agreement with Imperial Oil were: Seepage Lake #1, Raider Island #1, Loon Creek #1, Loon Creek Extension #1, Mack #2 and Ray's Creek #1. In reply to a further question by Mr. Jackson, General Peckham said that the proposed new contract with Imperial would apply to the area around and adjacent to Norman Wells. It was not specified that the 60,000,000 barrels should come from the wells at Norman, and he thought that the Company hoped to be able to supply most or part of it from wells on new locations — from the promising Loon Creek structure, for instance.

MR. GIBSON inquired if any cognizance had been taken of the possibility that oil of different quality might be discovered. GENERAL PYRON said that the possibility of finding heavier oil was a risk which had to be taken in wildcatting operations in that area, although it was reasonable to suppose that fields in close proximity to Norman Wells would be fairly consistent in quality.

The United States representatives could give no estimate of the cost of maintaining the 4″ pipeline, since there was no past experience on which to base it. There was no record of a pipeline being operated for any length of time under such temperature conditions as prevail in Northwestern Canada.

10. At 4:30 p.m. the two sections of the meeting reassembled. In closing the discussion, MR. ROBERTSON stated that the Canadian representatives would have to give further consideration to the problem, and the views of the Minister would have to be obtained. As soon as the Canadian government had clarified its own position, the United States authorities would be approached with a view to resuming conversations.

The meeting adjourned at 4:45 p.m.

The Secretary to the Cabinet (Mr. Heeney).

Development in Northwest Canada (Canol); U.S. War Department; Imperial Oil Limited

1. THE SECRETARY submitted and read a memorandum prepared in the Privy Council Office in consultation with the Department of Mines and Resources and External Affairs. Copies of the memorandum were circulated.

The memoradum may be summarized as follows:

The U.S. War Department had recently advanced certain tentative proposals for the modification of existing arrangments which involved the re-negotiation of their agreements with Imperial Oil Limited.

The chief of these proposals were: that the United States continue, for the duration of the war, their agreement to purchase crude petroleum from Imperial Oil at the rate of 3,000 to 4,000 barrels per day at fixed prices; that their "wildcatting" agreement with Imperial Oil be terminated; and that a "strategic reserve" of 60,000,000 barrels be created in the area for the military use of the United States.

These proposals, and the prospect of an early discovery of oil resources of wide extent, raised large questions of Canadian government policy which related to the whole development of Northwestern Canada.

It appeared to be in the Canadian interest that the U.S. government be enabled to withdraw from their present position which contained elements which might lead to friction later on. From this point of view an attempt should be made to meet the U.S. War Department in the matter of a strategic reserve, the maintenance of such a reserve for continental defence not being inconsistent with Canadian policy.

Four tracts of oil land were involved: two of which were at present being developed by Imperial Oil. It was suggested that a reserve of 32,500,000 barrels be created on these two tracts; that on the third tract, as yet undeveloped, fifty percent of the oil, being the Canadian government's share under existing regulations, be set aside; and that an additional reserve of from ten to twenty percent of the oil discovered in the fourth tract be added to the reserve. These reserves, it was suggested, could be at the sole disposal of the Canadian government, and would be made available to the United States in accordance with Canadian government policy regarding continental defence. It might be stipulated as the objective of the Canadian government to establish a military reserve of 60,000,000 barrels or more.

An arrangement of this sort raised the whole question of future development in the Northwest and the difficult problem of the relationship of the government to the exploitation of oil resources. In this connection four possible policies had been considered:

(a) independent exploitation by private companies under government regulation;

(b) exploitation by a single private company under government regulation;

(c) exploitation by companies in which the government would hold an interest; and,

(d) direct government development.

A decision on the question of policy outlined above must ultimately be taken by the government.

At the present moment, drilling crews are standing by (on the third tract), and in regard at least to the drilling programme, U.S. authorities are pressing for a decision by the Canadian government. If it is not possible for the government to reach an early decision, without unduly committing itself in regard to the larger issues involved, the immediate situation might be met by an undertaking on the part of the government to:

(a) maintain or cause to be maintained a strategic reserve as heretofore described;

(b) assume financial responsibility for the completion of the drilling of the six wells, now temporarily suspended, on terms to be decided in due course by the Canadian government.

(Secretary's note, Feb. 16, 1944 — C.W.C. document 716).†

2. MR. HEENEY reported that, since the memorandum had been prepared, the U.S. government had indicated that they would be agreeable to an arrangement whereby the War Department would continue drilling outside the Norman field (already authorized), the Canadian government to own the wells so drilled and one-half of the oil discovered to constitute "a United States military reserve." It had been intimated that the United States would be equally agreeable to the reserve belonging to the Canadian government, subject to one-half of the oil being available for U.S. military requirements.

(External Affairs memoradum, Feb. 15, 1944).†

3. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES commented upon the memorandum submitted, and described the position of the Canadian government in relation to the U.S. undertakings, the rights of Imperial Oil Limited, and the future development of the Northwest.

Present indications were that a very large field of oil might exist throughout the Mackenzie River basin. The Canadian government could not afford to countenance the alienation of such an important national resource to a foreign country, nor allow it to pass to corporations controlled outside of Canada.

4. THE PRIME MINISTER agreed that the people of Canada would expect their government to protect the national interest in any large resources of oil which might result from the further exploration of the Canadian Northwest.

From this point of view, it appeared that government policy should be directed toward the termination of U.S. activities in these oil properties and to providing for their development under Canadian auspices.

It might be that immediate action should be taken along the lines of the final paragraphs of the memorandum submitted. The advice of the Economic Advisory Committee should be obtained on the long range questions as to the means to be adopted for the further exploitation and development of the area.

5. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS observed that the argument which was being advanced to support U.S. claims to a substantial position in the Middle Eastern oil fields, namely that U.S. oil resources had been seriously depleted for the war purposes of other United Nations, notably Great Britain, had not yet been applied to the Canol development. Access to the oil resources of the world was likely to become a serious international issue. It would be unfortunate if a Canadian oil field were to become the subject of similar contentions between Canada and the United States.

Consideration might be given in relation to present problems of exchange, under discussion between U.S. and Canadian treasuries, to the reimbursement to the United States of their costs in the Norman area upon exploration and drilling.

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE agreed that it was desirable that the United States should withdraw from the Northwest and that government policy should be directed to that end.

Any undertaking with regard to the maintenance of a "strategic reserve" in the area should, however, be very carefully scrutinized from the point of view of the extent of the obligation to the Canadian government. Possibly the United States should be allowed to continue their drilling, pending an examination of this question.

The problems involved might profitably be examined by a sub-committee composed of the Ministers of Mines and Resources, Justice and Transport, with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary. The Minister of Munitions and Supply could be consulted upon his return to Ottawa.

7. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed to the establishment of the sub-committee proposed by Mr. Ralston, with a view to its reporting and submitting recommendations at as early a date as possible.

The meeting adjourned at 1:10 p.m.

OIL DEVELOPMENT IN NORTHWEST CANADA (CANOL);
U.S. WAR DEPARTMENT; IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

24. THE SECRETARY submitted and read a report of the sub-committee appointed at the meeting of February 17th. Copies of the report were circulated.

(Report of sub-committee, Feb. 22, 1944 — C.W.C. document 721).†

25. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES pointed out that while action along the lines recommended by the sub-committee's report offered a solution of immediately pressing questions, the principal problem of policy, namely, the method to be adopted for development of the oil resources of the whole area would still remain for consideration.

26. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after consideration of the sub-committee's report and considerable discussion, agreed:

(1) that the policy of the government should be directed to facilitating the early withdrawal of the United States from activities in Northwest Canada in connection with the discovery and production of oil;

(2) (a) that the government agree to maintain or cause to be maintained, in the Canadian Northwest, for purposes of continental defence, a strategic reserve of oil to consist, in the field already proven, of 20 to 30 million barrels, and in fields to be proven, of a percentage of the oil discovered with the stated object of achieving a total reserve of 60 million barrels;

(b) that the use and extent of the said strategic reserve should be determined on the advice of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence in relation to need and total supply, it being understood that oil from the reserve made available to U.S. forces would be provided at cost, plus an appropriate fee per barrel;

(c) that, upon termination of existing U.S. agreements with Imperial Oil Limited for exploration and drilling, the government undertake responsibility for the continuance of drilling now in progress;

(d) that the arrangements set cut in (a), (b) and (c) above, should not affect the supply of oil to the U.S. War Department, for the duration of the war, as provided in existing contracts; and,

(e) that the U.S. government be informed in the sense of the foregoing paragraphs in a communication to be approved by the Ministers of Mines and Resources, National Defence, Munitions and Supply, and Justice.

THE WAR COMMITTEE also noted the further recommendation of the sub-committee that the method of future oil development in the Northwest be considered as an urgent and important matter of government policy.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 2, 1944.

Dear Mr. Heeney,

The United States Ambassador left with me this morning the enclosed note. It is a draft reply and counter-proposal to the Prime Minister's letter of February 25th† regarding the disposition of United States oil exploration and drilling activities in the Northwest Territories. In giving me this memorandum, Mr. Atherton said that his Government would like to have an opportunity of discussing, with representatives of our Government, the points on which his Government's counter-proposals differed from the plan we had put forward. He thought such discussions would be expedited if we had available a preliminary indication of the United States approach to the question. They were anxious to discuss the question at our early convenience, and would be prepared to have General Robins and Mr. Hickerson come to Ottawa whenever we were ready to talk to them. He hoped that Monday, March 6th, might prove a possible date for such a meeting.

Yours sincerely,

[N. A. ROBERTSON]

Mémorandum de l'ambassade des États-Unis

Memorandum from Embassy of United States

[Ottawa, February 29, 1944]

It is agreed that an early withdrawal of our Government from activities in Northwest Canada in connection with the discovery and production of oil should be arranged and that a strategic reserve of oil should be established in the Canadian Northwest for the purposes of continental defence. It is believed that the stated objective for this reserve should be not less than 120 million barrels.

United States agrees that the use of this strategic reserve should be determined by the Canadian Government on the advice from time to time of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence in relation to need and total supply, the portion to be allocated to United States forces to be not less than one-half thereof.

United States will terminate its existing agreements with Imperial Oil Limited for exploration and drilling in the Canadian Northwest and will transfer ownership of the building, installations, drilling and other equipment and supplies used or destined for use in such explorations and drilling to the Canadian Government and/or Imperial Oil Limited. The Canadian Government will conduct or cause to be conducted such further drilling as may be required in the Norman Wells field to make and keep the field capable of delivering at least 4 thousand barrels of oil per day to the United States Government for the duration of the present war; and will undertake the responsibility and conclude arrangements for the continuance of exploration and drilling outside the already proven field with the stated object of achieving the total reserve of 120 million barrels.

All oil withdrawn by the United States for the duration of the war under existing agreements, and thereafter from the strategic reserve, will be provided at cost plus a fee of 15¢ Canadian currency per barrel.

Either Government may make available any or all of its portion of oil in the strategic reserve to the other Government for military purposes at 50¢ Canadian currency per barrel.

As oil is discovered in areas outside the already proven area, at least 50% thereof will be placed in the strategic reserve until the total reserve of 120 million barrels is attained. Until this stated objective is reached, the United States will have a preferential right to withdraw against its portion of the reserve an amount up to 30 million barrels from the already proven area.

The Canadian Government agrees that after the United States disposes of the pipeline and refinery facilities as provided in the existing agreements:

(a) the owners and/or lessees thereof will permit the facilities to be used, on equitable terms, for the transportation and refining of the oil withdrawn from the strategic reserve for United States forces; and for the distribution of the products derived therefrom.

(b) that the owners and/or lessees of all works, installations and facilities of the Canol project shall be granted adequate enjoyment of the sites, rights of way, and riparian rights required for satisfactory utilization thereof.

(c) that the provisions of the August 14-15, 1942 exchange of notes as to the disposition of the Skagway-Whitehorse pipeline[32] shall apply also to the gasoline distribution lines to Watson Lake and Fairbanks.

OIL DEVELOPMENT IN NORTHWEST CANADA

12. THE SECRETARY, referring to the discussion at the meeting of February 22nd, reported that the War Committee's decision had not been satisfactory to the U.S. government who, in turn, had advanced certain counter-proposals which were not acceptable to Canada, since they involved a strategic reserve of 120 million barrels and a firm allocation of half that amount to the United States.

In the circumstances, further consideration had been given to the earlier proposal of the U.S. War Department for a re-negotiation of their contract with Imperial Oil Limited.

(Privy Council Office memoranda, March 8 and 9, 1944),[33]

13. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY said that the U.S. government wished to make an agreement with Imperial to obtain the supply, during the war, of 3,000 to 4,000 barrels of oil daily and to secure to the U.S. War Department the right to purchase an additional 60,000,000 barrels, if the company brought in a field of sufficient extent to justify further development and the construction of a larger pipeline.

Such an agreement would require modification by the government of the wartime regulations under which Imperial now operated and by which the government retained a fifty percent interest in new fields discovered by the Company. Such onerous conditions had been possible only because the U.S. War Department, under their agreement with Imperial, paid all the Company's costs.

Since the U.S. government now wished to withdraw from all exploratory and drilling operations, the Government should modify the regulations to provide only for the normal ten or twelve percent royalty, so as to make it possible for Imperial to go on with the program of development.

In view of the serious world shortage of oil, and particularly the constant difficulty of obtaining Canadian requirements from the United States, the government could not well adopt any policy which would prevent the continuance of development of the Northwest fields. The only practicable method of obtaining such development was to make it possible for Imperial to continue, and sanction the re-negotiation of their contract with the United States.

[33]Non trouvé./Not located.

14. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES felt that any arrangement with a private oil company which had the effect of granting monopoly rights and which involved large reduction of government interest by the revision of existing regulations would arouse serious public criticism.

Negotiations with the United States upon Canol should be related directly to all other U.S. defence expenditures in Canada with a view to effecting a general settlement which would be final and terminate U.S. interests in Northern oil development once and for all.

The matter of the re-negotiation of the U.S. contract with Imperial and the revision of the regulations was inextricably linked to the major question of the policy to be adopted by the government for the development of Northern resources.

15. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed to defer decision pending further consideration of the subject.

OIL DEVELOPMENT IN NORTHWEST CANADA (CANOL)

9. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY referred to the discussions in War Committee on March 10th, 1944, and stressed the need for an early decision.

10. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES reported that exploration of the oil field would probably take six to seven years and cost $25 millions. Subsequently, if the field should be sufficiently large to justify development, expenditures in the nature of $60 millions for the construction of a new pipeline would be required.

The speculative nature of this expenditure made Imperial Oil Limited reluctant to operate under present arrangements whereby the government received a fifty percent royalty. On the other hand, because of the short season and geographical conditions involving high costs for exploration, drilling and transportation, a satisfactory solution might be achieved by the adoption of a sliding scale of government royalty payments based upon the normal rates for such operations. At the same time, any permit for exploration would be limited to one million acres and Imperial Oil might be granted one or possibly two such permits. A recapture clause should be included to protect the position of the government in the event of any unforeseen development taking place. The obligation would also be placed upon Imperial Oil to construct a "common-carrier" pipeline if the field justified it.

11. THE PRIME MINISTER referred to the necessity for development of natural resources in a manner to serve the public interest. It appeared that, in the existing circumstances, it would be inadvisable for the government to undertake directly the exploratory work involved. The Minister of Mines and Resources had, however, referred to the possibility of developing the field through a company in which the government held a financial interest.

12. MR. HOWE pointed out that such a course might handicap the proposed development. Unless it met with early success, public opinion would be likely to question the expenditure of the large sums of government money that would be required for exploration and development.

The grant to Imperial Oil of a permit of the type indicated by Dr. Camsell would not create monopoly conditions since, if an adequate field were proven, much territory would remain for exploration and development by other companies.

13. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources be requested to submit, in the light of the discussion, for further consideration, new regulations for oil development in the Northwest;

(b) that the Secretary, in consulation with the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources, prepare a memorandum based upon the foregoing discussions; and

(c) that the United States be informed that the Canadian government was exploring the possibility of arrangements which would make it possible for the United States to re-negotiate its contracts with Imperial Oil.

2. MR. HICKERSON explained that the counter proposal put forward in Mr. Atherton's memorandum had not been approved by either the War or State Department, but was something which he and his colleagues thought could be recommended to their Departments. It was their view that it would be desirable to reach agreement in substance before embarking on any further correspondence, and for this reason the United States reply to the Canadian proposals had been sent as an informal memorandum rather than an official note or letter.

3. In the general discussion which followed, it was evident that the principal objections to the United States counter proposal, from the Canadian point of view, were (a) the objective of 120 million barrels (double the Canadian figure) set for the reserve, (b) the method of setting up the reserve — by placing in the strategic reserve at least 50% of the oil discovered in areas outside the proven field, which, it was felt, would seriously prejudice, if not altogether eliminate, the possibility of private enterprise undertaking the exploitation of the area, and (c) the implication of a continuing United States interest in the oil resources of Northwestern Canada.

4. Emphasizing that the figure of 120 millions should be considered as an objective, not as an actual reserve, MR. HICKERSON and GENERAL ROBINS explained that it had been set in order to give the United States an option to buy 60 million barrels, assuming that the strategic reserve referred to in the Prime Minister's note was a joint reserve. 60 million was the amount of the known field and also the figure suggested in the proposed new contract with Imperial Oil which had been discussed in January, and was, incidentally, comparable with the investment of the United States in the development of the Norman field. They suggested that if the Canadian figure — 60 million barrels — was retained, United States critics would immediately argue that at best the United States would not get more than 30 million barrels. MR. HEENEY countered that, in the ordinary course of operations in the North Pacific, United States requirements would be much greater than Canadian, and that, in the circumstances, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence would almost certainly recommend an allotment to the United States of a proportionate order. DR. CLARK commented that this would hardly meet the United States objection, since critics would point out that the Canadian Government was not bound to accept the recommendation of the Board. MR. HICKERSON admitted that the figure 120 million would be troublesome if the field totalled only 300 million barrels, since, if adhered to, it would make commercial development impossible. If a 500 million barrel field was discovered, it would not make much difference. In any event, with present facilities for transportation and refining, the whole scheme was hypothetical. GENERAL ROBINS suggested that an original objective of 120 million barrels be set up and the Permanent Joint Board on Defence left to modify it if the size of the field ultimately proven seemed to make this necessary.

DR. CLARK wondered whether there was any other possible basis for determining the size of the strategic reserve, for instance, the present rate of consumption in the Alaskan area. GENERAL PYRON could not give offhand an exact figure, but expressed the opinion that the requirements of the Navy in the North Pacific and of the Alaskan theatre would be in excess of 20,000 bbls. per day, the objective which had been set for the exploratory programme.

DR. CAMSELL pointed out that the larger the reserve set up, the greater the difficulty of getting private enterprise to develop the field.

MR. HEENEY explained that another difficulty from the Canadian point of view was that it could be represented to the Canadian people that the proven field is only 60 million barrels and that the amount to be allocated to the United States is therefore equal to the known resources. He foresaw great difficulty in raising the size of the reserve to 120 million barrels, with 60 millions the United States share, and in defining the nature of the right of the United States with respect to the purchase of this oil. He wondered whether some of the United States criticism could be met by deleting the word "extent" in the Canadian note and adding a proviso to the effect that the United States should have an allotment equal to at least half of the reserve. MR. HICKERSON said that the United States regarded a definite figure as essential.

5. MR. ROBERTSON stated that the features which troubled him most were the indefinite term of the arrangement and the foreign policy implications of a firm allocation to the United States of a right to buy, regardless of the circumstances. He was not sure what the long term implications would be, or would be thought to be, of an indefinite contingent assignment of this sort for strategic purposes under the aegis of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. Also, what would be the implications for the United States and Canada vis-à-vis a third power? He felt that it would be an advantage if we could get something more definite and with a time limit. He added that the ultimate responsibility for the development of the field must rest with the Canadian Government. That responsibility covered not only current use but rate of future development and extent of the reserve.

6. DR. CLARK asked whether there was any other approach which could be made. The only alternative which had occurred to him was the reimbursement of the United States for drilling costs. MR. HICKERSON said that the present approach seemed the only practicable one. He and his colleagues were not much attracted to the alternative suggested by Dr. Clark.

MR. ROBERTSON inquired whether an aggressive development policy and an assurance of no discrimination would meet United States requirements, Mr.Hickerson thought not.

7. After considerable general and inconclusive discussion the meeting adjourned to give the two delegations an opportunity to meet separately with a view to exploring the possibilities of reconciling their divergent views.

8. The meeting reconvened at 10:30 a.m. Tuesday, March 7. Opening the discussion, MR. ROBERTSON stated that the Canadian Government has not yet decided what would be the best sort of domestic development of the oil resources in the Northwest. The suggestions put forward in the Prime Minister's letter represented what it was hoped might be an interim solution which would be a definitive answer to the present United States difficulties but which would at the same time enable the Canadian Government to give further consideration to the questions of policy involved in exploitation. The letter left open what positive steps the Canadian Government would take or what instrument it would use in carrying out the undertakings which it would assume. He suggested that it might be useful to consider again briefly the various solutions which have been proposed:

(a) Maintenance of a strategic reserve by the Canadian Government

If the Canadian Government took a direct responsibility, it could only do so along the lines suggested in the Prime Minister's letter.

(c) [sic] Renegotiation of the United States contract with Imperial Oil

MR. ROBERTSON pointed out that under this scheme the wartime deliveries to the United States would be the same as contemplated in the Canadian proposal. He asked whether the United States would have been out of the development field as completely under this scheme as under the arrangements outlined in Mr. King's letter. MR. HICKERSON and GENERAL ROBINS replied in the affirmative, — the United States would be merely a purchaser of oil from Imperial.[35] Standard Oil of California would continue to operate the pipeline for the War Department. MR. ROBERTSON remarked that what was really involved, then, was an option to buy on the part of the War Department and an undertaking to sell, as and when available, on the part of the company, with no commitment beyond considerations of the market. There was no question of access or guaranteed development. He inquired whether, if such an arrangement could be worked out, the original intergovernmental agreement would stand. MR. HICKERSON replied that basically it would, with one or two minor alterations such as incorporating the feeder pipelines along the Alaska Highway in the Canol project and clarifying the position with respect to right-of-way. The new contract would also have to be approved by both governments, possibly in an exchange of notes. MR. ROBERTSON added that, if the United States made a long term contract with option to purchase, they would want some assurance of freedom from export restrictions and of freedom of delivery through existing facilities. This should probably be done through an exchange of notes which might also provide for unrestricted access to tidewater across United States territory of any pipeline required by the commercial development of the field.

MR. ROBERTSON went on to say that he thought that some of the objections to the proposed contract might be removed by stripping the language of all political significance and couching it in as nearly commercial terms as possible. GENERAL ROBINS suggested that this could be done by redrafting paragraph 5 of the letter of intent (Appendix A)† — by, for instance, deleting the phrase "for military purposes" and dropping or modifying the concluding sentence so as to meet the Canadian objection to any suggestion of United States ownership of oil in Canada. MR. AMBERG thought that the difficulty presented by the figure of 60 million barrels could be largely eliminated by setting aside 30 million barrels in the proven field and 10% of future discoveries until a total of 60 millions had been reached. After considerable discussion, paragraph 5 was redrafted as follows, as a possible basis of agreement:
