(5) That on the termination of said Contract No. W-412-ENG-52, the contractor will give to the government of the United States the continuing right to purchase for its own use and not for resale crude petroleum up to 30 million barrels from the proven field and an additional amount up to 30 million barrels from such other fields as may be proven under leases and permits now or hereafter granted by the Canadian Government, upon payment by the government of actual cost of production in accordance with standard methods of establishing such costs, plus 15 cents Canadian currency per barrel. It is understood that the additional 30 million barrels will be made available at the rate of not less than 10% of each new field proven. If such petroleum is not required by the government, the contractor may obtain release of the government's right to purchase, in whole or in part, on payment to the government of the sum of 50 cents Canadian currency per barrel.

Mr. Hickerson and General Pyron explained that the figure of 4,000 bbls. daily delivery mentioned in the proposed new contract with Imperial could be reconciled with the figure of 3,000 represented as the carrying capacity of the pipeline in the exchange of notes as follows — the flow through the pipeline could not be maintained at a uniform rate of 3,000 bbls. per day. For two months in the summer 4,000 bbls. can be delivered, while during the coldest days of winter only 2,000-2,500 bbls. will flow through the pipe. This gives an all-year-round average of roughly 3,000 bbls. per day.

COMMANDER EDWARDS and DR. CAMSELL opposed certain features of this scheme. They felt that the period of time during which the United States should have the right to purchase oil ought to be limited, for instance, to the life of the existing leases, and also that the area should be more specifically defined, say to the Mackenzie River area. They objected also to the inclusion of the provision with regard to release of the United States Government's right to purchase upon payment by the contractor of 50 cents Canadian currency per barrel. Commander Edwards was of the opinion that, while no doubt the intent of the words "under leases and permits now or hereafter granted by the Canadian Government" was intended to apply to Imperial Oil leases, it would be better if the wording were revised to mention this limitation specifically.

The United States representatives pointed out that Imperial would not accept the proposals made in the letter of intent unless and until they had secured a new agreement with the Canadian Government modifying the present arrangement which gives the government half of the fields developed under wartime permits. If renegotiation of the Imperial contract should be accepted as the most satisfactory solution, the problem to be settled is the arrangement between the Canadian Government and the company. This, as DR. CAMSELL pointed out, would also involve definition of the policy of the Canadian Government with regard to the exploitation of the area.

GENERAL ROBINS expressed the hope that the Canadian Government would come to an early decision, since his Government was anxious to proceed with negotiations for a lower purchase price for the oil at the earliest possible moment. MR. ROBERTSON said that the question would be brought to the attention of the Cabinet immediately and that he would advise the United States Government as soon as a decision had been reached. The United States representatives agreed to make no further approach to Imperial until they were informed of this decision. Meanwhile, the War Department would cancel its contract with the Noble Drilling Company at once and withdraw the crews from the field.

OIL DEVELOPMENT IN NORTHWEST CANADA (CANOL)

1. THE SECRETARY submitted a memorandum based upon the discussion at the meeting of March 15th and prepared in consultation with the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources, also a report prepared by Dr. Camsell containing proposals put forward after conversations with officials of Imperial Oil Limited. Copies of these documents had been circulated.

(Memorandum from the Secretary and the Deputy Minister — C.W.C. document 743† and memorandum from the Deputy Minister — C.W.C. document 744, March 28, 1944).†

2. THE MINISTER AND DEPUTY MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES commented on and explained the proposals set out in Dr. Camsell's memorandum for arrangements with Imperial Oil for production and development.

3. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after consideration of the report submitted, agreed that the Deputy Minister prepare, for consideration by Council, a submission containing the following conditions:

(1) With respect to the proven field (approx. 5,000 acres):

(a) to be developed as a unit operation;

(b) government's share agreed at ⅓ (20 million barrels);

(c) the company to manage the operation;

(d) the government to pay cost of producing its share plus 10% fee;

(e) the company to pay a royalty of 5% of its share of oil except such as sold to the United States during the war;

(f) the government to permit its share of oil to be drawn upon up to 10 million barrels to meet U.S. option;

(g) the company to carry on only such development as necessary to meet local and U.S. requirements while searching for other fields to prove up 300 million barrels.

(2) With respect to the area under permit outside the proven field (140,000 acres):

no government participation, the company to have the right to lease such areas as it may select; the government not to share, but in lieu thereof to be paid royalties as follows:

(a) 7½% for the first 5 years,
10% for the second 5 years,
12½% for the third 5 years,

15% for the fourth 5 years, plus 10% of the net profits, or,

(b) 5% royalty throughout, plus 20% of the company's net profits.

(3) With respect to new areas in Northwest Territories and Yukon:

new regulations to be enacted along the following lines:

(a) Exploratory permits to be granted up to two million acres for period of three years, with right to extend for further period of three years upon permittee reducing acreage by 10% in the fourth year, 15% in the fifth year and 25% the sixth year, and during same years progressively increasing its expenditures;

(b) During the first three years permittee to spend not less than 20 cents an acre;

(c) At the end of sixth year permittee will have the right to obtain leases for any of the area up to 250,000 acres;

(d) Leases would be for 21 years, renewable for further periods of 21 years;

(e) Rental on leases, 50 cents an acre first year, $1.00 thereafter, royalties to be credited on rentals over 50 cents an acre;

(f) Certain permits and leases to be grouped for the purpose of applying credits;

(g) Royalties. Two rates were suggested:

(1) 5% for the first 5 years,

7½% for the second 5 years,

10% for the third 5 years,

12½% afterwards, or,

(2) 3% the first 5 years,

5% the second 5 years,

7½% the third 5 years,

10% afterwards,

plus 10% of the net profits.

(h) The leasee or permittee would be entitled to build and operate a pipeline and for the purposes thereof to use any roads and, as well, would be entitled to a free right of way for the pipeline over Crown lands. The pipeline would be operated as a common carrier.

(i) The Government will have the right to take over all or any part of the areas leased by the Company and pay the Company the value thereof at the time they were taken over. Failing an agreement as to price, compensation to be fixed by the Exchequer Court.

No. 42 Ottawa, April 28, 1944

CONFIDENTIAL

Excellency,

With reference to previous communications concerning the extension of the fuel supply for the United States Army in Alaska and Northwestern Canada, I have the honour to transmit herewith one copy of an Order in Council (P.C. 2904) passed on April 27, 1944.† This Order authorizes the Minister of Mines and Resources to enter into a defined agreement with the Imperial Oil Company of Canada Limited and to prepare and submit for approval new petroleum and natural gas regulations for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory.

It is understood that the signature of this Order makes it possible for the United States authorities to terminate their exploratory and drilling activities in Northwestern Canada through the renegotiation of their contract with the Company in question, and that this will be done in the immediate future.

It is the intention of the Minister of Mines and Resources to make an explanatory statement in regard to these matters in the House of Commons on Monday, May 1, and I understand that the United States authorities will refrain from the publication of any pertinent material until that date.

Accept etc.

Mémorandum du secrétaire, le groupe de discussion interministériel sur les projets de défense mixtes

Memorandum by Secretary, Interdepartmental Panel on Joint Defence Projects

[Ottawa,] January 25, 1945

MEMORANDUM OF A MEETING HELD AT 3:00 P.M. ON THURSDAY, JANUARY 25TH, 1945, IN MR. MACDONNELL'S OFFICE, TO REVIEW UNITED STATES PROPOSALS FOR

when the following were present: Major General Foster, Mr. Macdonnell, Group Captain Hanna, Mr. Berry,[36] Mr. Jackson, Wing Commander Cumyn.

1. The agenda proposed by the United States is attached. It would appear that the general purposes of the United States in proposing this meeting were:

(a) to set in motion joint discussions intended to lead to a reduction of United States commitments in the Northwest as soon as practicable,

(b) to ensure that the disposition of Canol receives early attention and is not left for last moment consideration on the termination of hostilities,

(c) to set in motion a preliminary survey, which by implication would be jointly undertaken.

2. Whereas the agenda advanced by the United States contains reference to the future of the Alaska Highway and of the airfields, it would seem probable that these are being brought into the discussions for their specific bearing on Canol, as sources of a potential demand for oil products; and that it is not the intention of the United States to discuss their future, independently of their bearing upon Canol itself.

3. It was considered probable that apart from the question of ultimate disposal of the Canol facilitites, the United States would wish to discuss the diversion of a portion of the product, during wartime, into the commercial market.

4. It was noted that the Defence Board have a virtual power of veto on dismantlement, and that the final disposal was to be made as follows:

Canol —

"At the termination of hostilities the pipeline and refinery shall be valued by two valuers, of whom one shall be named by the United States and one by Canada, with power, if they disagree, to appoint an umpire. The valuation shall be based upon the then commerical value of the pipeline and the refinery, and the Canadian Government shall be given the first option to purchase at the amount of the valuation. If the option is not exercised within three months, [36]J. H. Berry, président, Comité de répartition des biens de la Couronne.

J. H. Berry, Chairman, Crown Assets Allocation Committee.

they may be offered for sale by public tender, with the amount of the valuation as the reserve price. In the event that neither the Canadian Government nor any private company desires to purchase the pipeline and refinery at the agreed price, the dispostion of both facilities shall be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence for consideration and recommendation. Additionally, it is proposed that both Governments agree that they will not themselves order or allow the dismantling of either the pipeline or the refinery, nor will they allow any company which purchases them so to do, unless and until approval for dismantlement is recommended by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence."

Supplementary pipelines —

"At the termination of the hostilities the two governments agree that at the request of either government discussions between them shall be undertaken with a view to reaching an agreement in regard to the disposition of this pipeline and of the storage and loading facilities at Prince Rupert. Additionally, it is proposed that both governments agree that they will not themselves order or allow the dismantlement of this pipeline or of the facilities mentioned, nor will they allow their dismantlement by any company which may purchase them unless and until approval for dismantlement is recommended by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence."

5. In due course, in preparation for the joint appraisal already agreed upon, the Canadian Government might wish to consider making one or other of the following arrangements:

(a) a study, by an interdepartmental committee of the various economic and engineering factors affecting the project and its future, or

(b) the employment of a firm of petroleum engineers to survey the economic and engineering aspects with a view to the production of factual information to serve as a basis for the determination of government policy.

6. It was considered that in any agreement resulting from these discussions, care should be taken to avoid commitments as to the basis of eventual evaluation, i.e. book value, capitalization of earning power, potential market value, etc.

7. Upon the assumption that the United States approach will be along the lines discussed above, and that the conversations will be largely of an exploratory nature, it was suggested that the attitude taken by the Canadian officials be as follows:

(a) to hear the United States proposals,

(b) to indicate that whilst Canada had not, so far, undertaken any studies on the future of Canol, the responsible officials would probably be prepared to recommend to the Government that an economic and engineering survey be made,

(c) that Canada would probably not wish to enter into any undertaking for a joint survey, but would wish to obtain the co-operation of the United States officials,

(d) that in all probability it would be the government's view that the present agreements should stand, providing for continued control and maintenance by United States authorities until the end of the war,

(e) that as regards the supplementary pipelines, namely those from Whitehorse to Fairbanks, Whitehorse to Watson Lake and Skagway to Whitehorse, it was noted that these would be the subject of discussion by both governments on the termination of hostilities, and the Canadian government would probably be content to let this arrangement stand, and would not feel that these lines should be made the subject of a separate disposal agreement ahead of the final arrangements for the main Canol undertaking,

(f) as regards the disposal of oil products to commercial users, the government would probably be prepared to consider arrangements for the distribution of surplus production to commercial users through such Canadian companies as the United States might wish to designate, but that in all probability it would be necessary to impose controls through the Oil Controller and provide for the payment of royalties and other revenue.

CANOL DISCUSSION

The United States Government has asked for discussions to review the whole Canol situation and they are sending a delegation to Ottawa on January 29th consisting principally of War Department representatives. The talks are being kept confidential.

We do not know whether the United States have any definite proposals to make, but there are indications that they would like to withdraw from Canol and turn it over to Canada. We shall have to consider carefully whether there is any advantage in departing from the existing agreement which calls for appraisal of the pipeline and refinery after the war at their then commercial value.

2. Opening the discussion, General Scott stated that, since the disposition of the Canol Project presents so many complex problems which will be time-consuming in their solution, the United States authorities feel that it would be desirable for the two Governments to give consideration to them now rather than wait until after the termination of hostilities, as contemplated under present agreements. Specifically, the United States Government would like (1) to obtain Canada's consent to the revision of existing agreements so as to permit the modification or termination of the operation of the Canol Project in conformity with changing military requirements; (2) to begin the formulation of an agreement upon the manner of the disposition of the Canol products distribution pipelines; and (3) to secure Canadian agreement to the acceleration of appraisal of the Project.

He then outlined the provision made in the Exchange of Notes of June 27-29, 1942, with respect to the disposition of the refinery and crude oil pipeline, and in the Exchange of Notes of August 14-15, 1942, and June 7, 1944,[37] with respect to the Skagway-Whitehorse pipeline and the gasoline distribution lines to Watson Lake and Fairbanks. In connection with the latter, he said that, in its operating contract with the United States War Department, Standard Oil of California had inadvertently been given an option to buy the products and distribution pipelines within 90 days after the termination of the contract at a price and terms to be agreed upon. For another twelve months after the expiration of this 90 day period, if the United States Government should decide to sell the pipelines to a third party, Standard Oil would have the right for 30 days to buy at the same figure. Mr. Amberg explained that this clause had been embodied in the contract by an oversight and that it was not expected that Standard Oil would insist upon exercising its option, but that if they should, the United States would regard their obligation to Canada as binding. The United States Government would resist any attempt on the part of the Company to enforce the Option. In any event, Standard Oil could do no more than seek damages and these, if proved, would be the entire responsibility of the United States. The terms in the Standard Oil contract could therefore be ignored in the intergovernmental consideration of the problem of disposition of the pipelines in question, but it was felt that the Canadian authorities should know exactly how matters stood.

General Scott then went on to explain that operation of the Canol Project was very uneconomical and could be justified only by the tight world petroleum supply situation and the tanker shortage. Should either or both of these conditions improve as a result, for instance, of the termination of hostilities in

Canada, Treaty Series, 1944, No. 16.

Europe, the future of the Project would become a matter for immediate attention. Mr. Amberg here pointed out that the War Department appropriation for Canol will expire on June 30, 1945, and it is not impossible, in view of the changing military picture in Europe and domestic political considerations, that Congress may refuse to provide funds for its continued operation, even though existing agreements provide for operation by the United States until the cessation of hostilities, which would include the Pacific War. In view of this uncertainty as to the duration of active operation of the project, the United States authorities felt that thought should be given now to the policy to be adopted upon the termination of operations. General Scott mentioned some of the factors which would have to be considered in determining this policy, such as (1) the maintenance of the air bases in the Northwest for continental defence, for regional economic development or as part of a trans-Pacific Trunk Air System, (2) the maintenance of the Alaska Highway as a measure for continental defence and for regional economic development, (3) the economic status of the Canol Project crude oil system and pipeline system products, and (4) the post-war status of the project as a public utility under private operation, a private enterprise or as a government-owned and operated utility.

General Scott pointed out that an official inspection of the installations was a prerequisite to any attempt at appraising their value. This could be much more easily accomplished while the facilities were in operation. Furthermore, the shorter the time lag between the shut-down of operations by the United States Army and the transfer to the purchaser, the smaller would be the expense of guarding and maintenance and the physical depreciation of the facilities.

He also called attention to the fact that one of the major problems of disposition will arise from the fact that the Skagway-Whitehorse pipeline is laid on the right-of-way of the White Pass and Yukon Railway and upon the return of the road to civilian management after the war, it will constitute a serious menace to the safety of railway operations. The cost of moving the pipeline to a new location near the railway right-of-way has been estimated at approximately $2,000,000. Alternatively, it might be routed along the Haines-Kluane cut-off at a cost somewhat in excess of this amount.

As an initial step in the solution of the numerous problems involved in the disposition of the Canol Project, General Scott proposed that the two Governments should agree to the immediate appointment of appraisers to evaluate the entire project as well as each of its component parts separately.

3. Commenting upon General Scott's statement of the United States position, Mr. Robertson said that there would be little disagreement about the desirability of completing a primary official inspection of the facilities while the project was in operation. This was an essential first step and basic to the final appraisal. However, appraisal in terms of the post-war commercial value of the project, as provided by existing agreements, would appear to be quite impracticable at this time when no policy decisions have been reached with respect to the various factors, enumerated by General Scott, upon which will depend the post-war demand for the products of the system. In the absence of guidance from the governments based upon such policy decisions, the appraisers would be set an almost impossible assignment. He felt, therefore, that the most sensible and perhaps the most ambitious course which could be recommended to the governments at this time would be to undertake a primary official inspection of the facilities and the preparation of an inventory and statement on maintenance costs and operating charges as an essential ingredient in subsequent consideration, but to leave appraisal in terms of post-war economic value until such time as government policy with respect to the future development of the Northwest has been decided.

4. In the discussion which followed, both in the general meeting and in the sub-committee delegated to give particular consideration to the question of appraisal, the United States representatives indicated that they attached a good deal of importance to the initial inspection being regarded as a first step in the process of appraisal. They felt that it was particularly desirable that the representatives appointed now to inspect the physical facilities should carry through to the final appraisal, not only because some duplication of effort might thereby be avoided but also because it would enable the governments to secure the services of representatives of higher calibre. They agreed that appraisal could not follow immediately upon the completion of the preliminary stock-taking but would have to wait until the governments had made the necessary policy decisions. The Canadian group, on the other hand, thought that inventory and appraisal could be two distinct and separate steps, with the results of the stock-taking being made available to the appraisers appointed to make the final evaluation. They pointed out, too, the physical difficulty of assigning individuals to a task such as this which might well extend over a very considerable period of time.

After the noon recess, the United States representatives presented a draft note† embodying the modifications in existing agreements to which the United States Government would like to have Canada's consent, namely:

(a) that the United States Government be permitted to terminate or modify operation of all facilities of the Canol Project when, in its opinion, military considerations make such a course desirable;

(b) that the products pipeline system be evaluated by the appraisers appointed for the evaluation of the crude oil system, but as an independent problem;

(c) that all the facilities of the Canol Project be valued at their commercial value as of the time of termination of operations rather than as of the time of cessation of hostilities;

(d) that the two Governments appoint representatives at an early date in order jointly to inspect the physical property, collect information and submit a preliminary report relating to evaluation as early as practicable and, if possible, prior to the termination of operations.

The Canadian representatives undertook to bring these representations immediately to the attention of the appropriate authorities of their Government and Mr. Robertson stated that he would communicate with Mr. Atherton as soon as a decision had been reached.

6. General Strong brought up the question of the use of surplus refinery products for commercial purposes and the possible utilization of the pipelines for their distribution. It was agreed that this was a matter which would have to be taken up with the Oil Controller.

Mémorandum du ministère des Affaires extérieures au Comité de guerre du Cabinet[38]

[Ottawa,] February 6, 1945

APPRAISAL OF CANOL FACILITIES

At the request of the United States Government discussions took place recently with their representatives on new arrangements that might be made with regard to the winding up of Canol operations and the appraisal of the facilities. The United States wishes to terminate the operations of this extremely uneconomic project in the near future and wants to move as rapidly as possible towards solving the problem of its future disposition. Canadian officials (representing Cabinet War Committee Secretariat and the Departments of External Affairs, Transport, Mines and Resources, National Defence Army, National Defence for Air and Reconstruction) regard the United States proposals as generally acceptable. They are agreed that it is not in the Canadian interest for the Canadian Government to take over Canol at any time or to accept the responsibility for it and they are satisfied that the United States proposals do not lead in this direction. All evidence indicates that petroleum products from the Canol pipeline and refinery will for an indefinite period cost substantially more than imported products in Northwestern Canada. The current United States proposals do not call for a decision on accepting responsibility for Canol at the present time, but it would be of assistance in future negotiations if Government policy on this point were settled.

The United States proposals are four in number:

1 — That the United States shall not be required to continue operating the pipeline and refinery until the termination of hostilities. The existing agreement provides that the United States has the right to operate until the end of hostilities but clearly Canada would not be justified in insisting on the continuation of a highly uneconomic operation. It should be made clear,

[38]Le Comité de guerre du Cabinet examina ce mémorandum le 7 février 1945 et fut d'accord
The War Committee considered this memorandum on February 7, 1945 and agreed "that a favourable reply be made to the U.S. Government's proposals and that an exchange of notes be approved accordingly."

however, that the United States will be responsible for any custody and maintenance which they regard as necessary after the termination of operations.

2 — That the distribution pipelines from Skagway to Whitehorse, Whitehorse to Watson Lake and Whitehorse to Fairbanks be evaluated by the appraisers appointed for the valuation of the crude oil system but as an independent problem. This should be satisfactory provided that the same test is applied as governs the appraisal of the crude oil system, namely, "then commercial value".

3 — That all the facilities of the Canol project shall be valued at their commercial values as of the time or times of the completion of the appraisal with appraisal beginning upon the termination of operations and completed as soon as practicable. It would be difficult for Canada to refuse this request. Existing agreements call for appraisal at the end of the war and these agreements were based on the assumption that operation would continue until the end of the war. Since, however, the United States are anxious to wind up the project, an insistence by Canada on waiting until the end of the war would involve the United States in the expenditure of money and manpower on maintaining and guarding property in idleness. In addition there would be very considerable deterioration of the property. Whether appraisal is undertaken in the near future or at the end of the war there is not likely to be a great difference in the figure reached for "then commercial value". It is probable that general economic conditions in the Northwest will be much the same at the end of the war as during 1945 and that appraisers would reach much the same conclusions. In any event, the Canadian Government has no obligation to purchase. Therefore there appear to be no strong grounds on which to object to the United States proposals, although in order to avoid having to begin the appraisal on short notice, it would be wise to agree to appraisal "as soon as practicable after the termination of operations." The Department of Reconstruction, as the agency likely to be responsible for providing the Canadian appraiser, is most anxious that a purely Canadian study of the economic factors involved should be begun at once so as to provide data for the Canadian appraisers.

4 — That there should be joint inspection of the physical property with a view to collecting information and submitting a preliminary report relating to evaluation as early as practicable and if possible prior to the termination of operations. No objection is seen to this proposal.

Dear Mr. Macdonnell:

With your letter of February 2, 1945,† you were kind enough to supply me with copies of the Minutes of the meeting which took place on Monday, January 29th, to discuss the Canol Project.

Copies of these Minutes were made available to the Army officers who participated in the discussions, and I have now been requested to suggest that the following amendments to the Minutes be made.

In paragraph five, beginning at the top of page four of the Minutes:

In the first sentence place a period after the word "consent" and strike out the word "namely" and insert:

After discussion it was decided that the United States representatives would redraft the note† in certain particulars and present it to the Canadian representatives. The redraft† thus presented embodied proposed modifications in existing agreements as follows:

Strike out subparagraphs (c) and (d) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) that all the facilities of the Canol Project be valued at their commercial values as of the time or times of the completion of the appraisal, rather than as of the time of cessation of hostilities;

(d) that appraisal of the Canol Project be initiated upon the termination of operation of the project, or a major part thereof, and completed as soon as practicable, and that the two governments appoint representatives at an early date jointly to inspect the property, collect information and submit a preliminary report relating to evaluation as early as practicable, and, if possible, prior to the termination of operations.

As the revised language appears to represent more clearly what our people desired, I hope it will be possible to correct the Minutes accordingly.

Sincerely yours,

LEWIS CLARK

Canada-U.S. Defence Projects; Canol; Termination of Operation and Appraisal

3. THE SECRETARY pointed out that the U.S. government had announced their intention of terminating the operation of Canol by June 30th next.

Under the recent exchange of notes,[39] a joint survey of the project was to be made while the facilities remained in operation and U.S. authorities now desired to institute joint appraisal procedure as soon as possible. It would be recalled that, under the original agreement, the Canadian government held an option to purchase the property at the appraised commercial value.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

4. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after considerable discussion, agreed:

(a) that U.S. authorities concerned be told, informally, that the Canadian government had no intention of exercising their option to purchase Canol, whatever valuation were fixed thereon by appraisal, and were, therefore, prepared to waive their option under the original agreement; and,

(b) that, if, nevertheless, the U.S. government desired to proceed with joint appraisal proceedings, the government agree thereto and appoint Arthur Surveyer and Company of Montreal to be the Canadian appraiser, to be assisted by such government officials as might be required for the purpose.

RESUMPTION OF CANOL DISCUSSIONS

1. Following your intimation to Mr. Atherton on March 17 that the Canadian Government had no intention of purchasing the Canol facilities and was therefore prepared to waive its option under the original agreement, the question of disposition seems to have been left in abeyance until Washington decided which agency of the United States Government would be assigned responsibility for disposal of the project. Eventually, at the end of June, the United States Government through the Embassy here presented a draft note† which would provide:

(a) that the Canadian Government waive its right to purchase the crude oil facilities;

(b) that it is therefore considered unnecessary to proceed with the joint evaluation;

(c) that the Canadian Government agree to abandon the fixing of a reserve price (which follows logically from abandonment of the joint evaluation), so that the United States Government could sell the facilities as a going concern for operation in situ at whatever price it regards as reasonable.

On July 14th Mr. English[40] was informed that these proposals were acceptable to the Canadian Government and handed a revised draft† which was designed merely to improve the language and clarify the intention of the original United States draft without making any change in substance.

2. On July 31, Mr. Lewis Clark submitted a memorandum† suggesting a new approach which would provide for the inclusion in the proposed exchange of notes of:

(a) provision for the sale of Canol for operation in place;

(b) provision for dismantlement and sale for use elsewhere in Canada in the event that there is no bid to purchase for operation in place;

Robert English, Second Secretary, Embassy of the United States.

(c) provision for sale and dismantlement for use outside Canada if alternative (b) should also prove unfeasible.

The memorandum noted that it might be found desirable to separate disposition of the refinery from disposition of the Whitehorse-Norman Wells pipeline, in which case disposition of the pipeline could be discussed at a later date. Pointing out that the matter has now become one of considerable urgency in Washington, Mr. Clark said that, if the Canadian Government should be prepared to exchange notes along the above lines, a delegation would be sent from Washington immediately to resume discussions and draft a new agreement.

3. The United States proposals were referred to the Minister of Reconstruction, the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources, and the Chairman of the Crown Assets Allocation Committee, and, in the hope of avoiding a further series of discussions on Canol, Mr. Macdonnell in transmitting the U.S. proposals suggested that it might be advisable to have the proposed new agreement also provide for the method of disposition in the event that no bidders appeared under any of the three alternatives set out above. Mr. Howe (whose letter† is, I understand, an expression of the views of Mr. Berry of Crown Assets) and Dr. Camsell have now replied, agreeing to the proposed exchange of notes but offering no suggestions as to the method of disposition should all three alternatives prove unworkable.

4. Under the circumstances, I have drafted for your consideration a letter to Mr. Clark, indicating that we have no objection to the conclusion of a new agreement and shall be prepared to discuss the matter with their representatives at any time.

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Chargé d'Affaires, Embassy of United States

No. 83 Ottawa, August 31, 1945

Sir:

Under the exchange of notes of June 27-29, 1942, the Canadian Government acquired an option to purchase the facilities of the crude oil pipeline from Norman Wells to Whitehorse and the refinery at Whitehorse at a valuation based upon the commercial value of the pipeline and refinery as agreed by valuers named by Canada and the United States. Under the exchange of notes of February 26, 1945, it was agreed that the valuation should take place within a reasonable time following notice of the termination of operation of the project or a major part thereof.

The Canadian Government has decided not to exercise the option referred to in the preceding paragraph and desires to inform the Government of the United States that it is now willing to waive that option. Under these circumstances it believes that the interest of neither country would be served by proceeding with former plans for joint valuation and that these should therefore be abandoned.

The exchange of notes of June 27-29, 1942, provided that if the Canadian Government did not exercise its option, now waived, to purchase the crude oil facilities within three months, they might be offered for sale by public tender with the amount of the valuation as the reserve price. In view of the desire of the Canadian Government not to proceed with joint valuation of the project, the Canadian Government likewise waives the provision above referred to whereby the facilities must be offered at the reserved price.

It is understood that the United States Government will at a later date submit to the Canadian Government plans for the disposition of the Canol facilities.

The Canadian Government hopes that the waivers of its rights as set forth above will be acceptable to the Government of the United States and will facilitate disposition of the Canol facilities.

Mr. Clark of the United States Embassy called on November 9th to say that the War Department was anxious to dispose of the Canol facilities at Prince Rupert. These were constructed under authority of an exchange of notes of August 14th and 15th, 1942. Permission was given to build suitable storage and loading facilities and it was provided that the two governments would discuss disposition at the termination of hostilities. It was further provided that dismantling would not be allowed unless approved by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

The War Department is thinking of proposing that the storage and loading facilities at Prince Rupert be dealt with under the 33rd recommendation.[41] Mr. Clark was asked to ascertain whether such a proposal would be likely to receive favourable consideration. the facilities appear to consist of a dock, a small warehouse, certain pumping equipment and some pipe. According to reports from the Special Commissioner's Office, the tanks which were originally constructed have been removed.

I discussed this with Wing Commander Cameron and with Mr. E.E. Thompson of Crown Assets Allocation Committee. The general view was that we should agree to this proposal, particularly since the United States was taking a generous line in turning over equipment on the Alaska Highway and the landline. Any movable items would, of course, involve the Canadian Government in no expense and it seemed reasonable to lump the immovable items with the large number of other such facilities in the Prince Rupert area. Mr. Clark indicated that the United States was not trying to secure much in the way of a monetary return but was primarily interested in getting these facilities off its hands.

I therefore told Mr. Clark that if a proposal were made to us in the sense that he had outlined, it would be likely to have a favourable reception. On the question of securing the approval of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence to dismantle them, there is no doubt that the Board would agree. Another, and simpler, method of dealing with this suggested by the State Department, is that a new exchange of notes should override the previous one and eliminate the Board's veto power.[42]

8. General Henry informed the Board that in the view of the War Department the Alaska Highway will be utilized in the future to a lesser extent by the United States, due to curtailment of activities in Northwest Canada. He informed the Board that it would appear desirable to transfer to the Canadian Government the responsibility for administration and maintenance of so much of the Highway as lies within Canada. He stated that the United States Government, having in mind the terms of the original agreement of March 17, 1942,[43] would be prepared to agree, if so desired by the Canadian Government, to share in the financial responsibility for maintenance operations until six months after the cessation of the present war. The Acting Chairman of the Canadian Section pointed out certain difficulties which would confront the Canadian Government in accepting this proposal. The problem was one which would require study by the Canadian Government and it appeared impracticable for the Board to make a recommendation at its present meeting. After discussion, the Board took note of the United States proposal and the Canadian Section undertook to consider it before the time of the next meeting.

CANADA-U.S. JOINT DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS; MAINTENANCE OF ALASKA HIGHWAY

25. THE SECRETARY, referring to the discussion at the meeting of December 16th, 1943, submitted a report from the Joint Defence Construction Projects Panel upon future maintenance of the Alaska Highway. Copies of the Panel's report had been circulated; also an explanatory memorandum.

The cost of maintenance for the intial year was estimated at $4½ million and for subsequent years at $1½ million.

Maintenance could be undertaken either by the Department of Mines and Resources or by the Department of National Defence (Royal Canadian Engineers). In spite of uncertainty as to the future value of the highway, it would be difficult for Canada to refuse to assume responsibility for maintenance, a course which would, as well, be in keeping with Canadian policy of facilitating U.S. withdrawal from defence projects in the Canadian Northwest.

Through the Canada-U.S. Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the United States had now proposed that Canada assume responsibility for maintenance and operation at an early date, costs to be borne by the U.S. government, if the Canadian government so desired, until six months after the termination of the war.

The U.S. government had abandoned the Haines out-off road without approval of the Canadian government.

(Joint Defence Construction Projects Panel report to War Committee, Sept. 1, 1944 — C.W.C. document 850;† also memorandum, Sept. 18, 1944 — C.W.C. document 861).†

26. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES expressed the opinion that it would not be prudent for the government to assume responsibility for maintenance at this stage. The postwar value of the highway had not yet been established, although there was little likelihood that it would be important either for tourist or commercial purposes. If and when Canada did assume responsibility, Mines and Resources should do the job.

27. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY expressed the view that the road would always be necessary to supply the airfields on the Northwest Staging Route, which would probably continue to be the main air route to Asia.

28. MR. HEENEY drew attention to problems of police, health and educational services along the highway. The local residents were now, in large majority, Canadian and these problems were becoming acute with the gradual withdrawal of the U.S. forces from the Northwest. The Special Commissioner had suggested that he be authorized to discuss them with the Prime Minister of British Columbia.

29. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that the U.S. government be informed that the Canadian government were not prepared, at present, to assume responsibility for the maintenance of the Alaska Highway;

(b) that the attention of the U.S. government be drawn to their abandonment of the Haines cut-off without the consent of the Canadian government; and,

(c) that the Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in Northwest Canada be directed to consult the Premier of British Columbia with respect to provision of local services in the vicinity of the Highway.

Dear Mr. Keenleyside:

At the last meeting of the Permanent Joint Board, you requested information as to whether or not United States was maintaining the Haines-Kluane Highway. The following is the reply which I have received from the War Department in this matter:

"The United States Government has not abandoned the Haines-Kluane Highway and has provided minimum maintenance for it. This Highway is considered by the War Department to be an integral part of the Alaskan Highway and, therefore, should be included in the recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, Canada-United States, that the Canadians take over maintenance of that portion of it which lies in Canada, as soon as necessary arrangements can be consummated."

I have recently had a talk with General F. S. Strong, Commanding General, Northwest Service Command, and he tells me that the Highway in question is in quite good condition except for one slide near the Alaskan border, that it is impracticable to do anything with this slide before spring, at which time if this is opened up and a crew sent over the Highway to repair the minor damage which will probably take place during the spring thaw, the highway would again be in quite good condition.

I have read General Henry's note to you of October 7th in regard to the maintenance of the Haines-Kluane Highway.

There is an implication in the War Department's reply that the Permanent Joint Board on Defence have agreed to recommend that Canada take over maintenance of the Alaska Highway. I presume that you will clarify the position at the next meeting of the Board.

General Foster has informed me that there has been considerable local agitation to keep the Haines-Kluane Highway open and it seems to me quite possible that the original intention to abandon this section, as locally reported, has been reconsidered.

Dear Mr. Howe:

As you know the United States authorities have been anxious for some considerable time to be allowed to withdraw from the Alaska Highway. With the termination of hostilities in the Pacific, this desire to be relieved of responsibility has increased and the question was raised at the meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, which took place on September 4. The following is an extract from the Journal of the Board:

"At the request of General Henry the Board considered various questions regarding the dates on which United States responsibility for maintenance of the Alaska Highway and other defence projects in Canada should terminate. It was agreed that, with respect to the Alaska Highway, the Canadian Section should bring to the attention of the Canadian Government the fact that the United States authorities wish to know as soon as possible when it would be agreeable to Canada for the United States to withdraw therefrom. The Canadian Section would endeavour to obtain a decision on this point and communicate it to the United States Section."

We can expect the United States Government to follow this matter closely and to continue to press for Canadian permission to withdraw from the Highway. It would seem desirable to reach a decision at an early date. The next meeting of the Board is on November 7 and it will place the Canadian Section in a somewhat difficult position if by that time they cannot give some indication of the views of the Canadian Government.

Copies of this letter are being sent to Mr. Heeney and Dr. Camsell.[44]

Dear Mr. Robertson:

Thanks for your letter of the 10th instant regarding United States withdrawal from the Alaska Highway project.

Now that the war is ended, it seems to me that we cannot object to United States withdrawal from this project, provided the work of the current season is completed. Obviously, we cannot take over the work under present day conditions.

During the coming winter, the Government must decide whether the Alaska Highway will be maintained permanently or whether it will be abandoned. This would seem to be a Canadian decision, in which the United States will have no voice. There is also the matter of a decision as to the auspices under which future maintenance will be carried on, assuming that the Highway is not to be abandoned.

It seems to me that this matter should be placed before Council for decision, in order that the Permanent Joint Board may be advised of the Canadian attitude prior to its meeting on November 7th.

CANADA-U.S. DEFENCE PROJECTS;
ALASKA HIGHWAY; MAINTENANCE

9. THE SECRETARY submitted a second report from the Joint Defence Construction Projects Panel concerning maintenance of the Alaska Highway upon withdrawal of the United States.

The U.S. government were pressing for an indication as to when it would be agreeable to Canada for them to relinquish responsibility for maintenance of the highway and the question would come up at the forthcoming meeting of the Pemanent Joint Board on Defence.

The departments concerned, acting through the Panel pointed out the Highway was essential to the maintenance of the aerodromes on the Northwest Staging and had both strategic and potential economic value.

Estimated annual maintenance cost was from $2 to $2.2 million, including operation of vehicle repair shops. Operations were so organized by the United States that a transfer could be carried out by appointing supervisory staff only and arranging details of finance and supply subsequently. Some 350 personnel were now employed in highway maintenance and vehicle repair. Of these the majority were Canadians.

The Panel's report concluded by recommending that Canada assume responsibility for maintenance from April 1st, 1946, the present standard being taken as a minimum and that the responsible agency (Army or Mines and Resources) be nominated at once so that plans might go forward immediately.

Copies of the Panel's report had been circulated.

(J.D.C.P.P. Report, Oct. 9, 1945 — Cabinet Document 83).†

10. MR. HEENEY pointed out that supplementary memoranda had been circulated from the Departments of Mines and Resources and National Defence setting out, respectively, the suitability of each for undertaking responsibility for the maintenance of the Highway.

11. THE CABINET, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that the U.S. government be informed that it would be agreeable to Canada for the United States to withdraw from the Alaska Highway on April 1st, 1946;

(b) that, upon withdrawal of the United States and pending further clarification of the eventual strategic importance of defence facilities in the Northwest the Department of National Defence (Army) assume responsibility for maintenance of the Highway and for operation of vehicle repair shops until such time as a decision could be taken to have responsibility assumed by civil authority (the Department of Mines and Resources);

(c) that the Army confer with the Air Force in order that personnel engaged on maintenance of the Highway might undertake appropriate maintenance operations in connection with the landlines to be operated by the R.C.A.F.; and,

(d) that the Department of Mines and Resources prepare plans for the eventual assumption of civil responsibility for maintenance of the Highway in co-operation with the Provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 19, 1945

Dear Mr.Hickerson,

At the meeting of the Board on September 4 it was agreed that with respect to the Alaska Highway the Canadian Section should bring to the attention of the Canadian Government the fact that United States authorities wish to know as soon as possible when it would be agreeable to Canada for the United States to withdraw therefrom.

I am to inform you that the Canadian Government, having considered this question, are agreeable to the United States withdrawing from the Alaska Highway on April 1, 1946. Pending further clarification of the eventual strategic importance of defence facilities in the Northwest and until the desirability has been reviewed of having responsibility assumed by civil authority, the Canadian Army will assume responsibility for maintenance of the Highway.

I would ask that this information be treated as confidential until a public announcement is made. This will probably take the form of a statement in the House of Commons,[45] about which I shall communicate with your later.

929. DEA/72-SH-40

Mémorandum du ministère des Affaires extérieures à l'ambassade des États-Unis

Memorandum by Department of External Affairs to Embassy of United States

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa,] March 17, 1944

MEMORANDUM FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS TO THE UNITED STATES EMBASSY IN OTTAWA CONCERNING THE PROPOSED OVER-ALL AGREEMENT ON THE OPERATION OF AIR SERVICES BY OR ON BEHALF OF THE ARMED FORCES OF CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

1. The United States draft of the proposed overall agreement contained in the memorandum left with the Department of External Affairs on November 24, 1943,[46] has been considered by the interested departments of the Canadian Government. The suggestions of these departments have been incorporated in the revised draft, dated March 15, 1944,† which is attached to this memorandum. The changes contained in the revised draft are discussed briefly in the following paragraphs.

[45]Le 24 octobre 1945. Canada, Chambre des communes, Débats, 1945, deuxième session, volume II, pp. 1474-76.
October 24, 1945. Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1945, Second Session, Volume II, pp. 1438-39.

2. Since it is possible that the army or navy of Canada might operate aircraft or have aircraft operated on their behalf it is suggested that the words "Armed Forces of Canada" be substituted for "Royal Canadian Air Force" wherever they occur in the proposed agreement.

3. The United States draft refers in paragraphs I, II, V and VI to aircraft operated by "American civilian personnel" or "Canadian civilian personnel". In order to make it unnecessary for the contract operators to employ only United States or Canadian citizens it would appear desirable that the words "American" and "Canadian" be deleted before the words "civilian personnel" in paragraphs I, II, V and VI.

4. A proviso has been added to paragraphs I and II making it clear that civilian services under contract with the armed forces would be restricted to the routes set forth in Part One A and Part Two A and shall not fly over military routes set forth in Part One B and Part Two B.

5. It is proposed that the definition of United States territory be broadened to include Hawaii, since the shifting of air operations to the Pacific at the conclusion of hostilities in Europe may raise practical problems concerning military air routes across the Pacific.

6. Paragraphs III and IV have been expanded to include an undertaking by both Governments to give prompt and sympathetic consideration to requests for additional routes required by changing war conditions.

7. PARAGRAPHS V AND VI — The desire of both governments is to render it impossible for the contract operators to publicize their identity. The United States Government suggests that this be done by forcing on them the complete anonymity that goes with being an integral part of the Armed Forces of the United States. To accomplish this the United States has included the following provision in the draft agreement:

"Neither the aircraft nor the civilian personnel engaged in the operation or maintenance thereof shall bear or display any identifying markings or insignia advertising or publicizing the name of any commercial airline company."

The Canadian Government suggests that the following words be added after "operation or maintenance thereof", "nor any office or other building used by the aircraft or the civilian personnel."

8. PARAGRAPH VII — The Canadian draft of the proposed overall agreement contained in the memorandum of March 16, 1943,[47] distinguished between aircraft operated by the Armed Forces of either country and aircraft operated on behalf of the Armed Forces by a commercial airline company. The second paragraph of the United States memorandum states that it is United States policy to consider these as one integrated air service with no distinction between the air services operated by civilian and military personnel. The intention of the United States draft of the proposed agreement may be that aircraft operated by commercial companies on behalf of the Armed Forces be included in the phrase "aircraft of the Armed Forces of the United States," but the wording of the draft agreement does not bear this out. Paragraph V of the United States draft specifically refers to "aircraft operated on behalf of the United States Armed Forces by American civilian personnel." It must therefore be assumed that other references in the draft to "aircraft of the Armed Forces of the United States" do not include aircraft of commercial companies. The result is that there is no restriction on commercial companies carrying passengers, goods or mail for reward or hire (see Paragraph VII which applies only to aircraft of Armed Forces). The other conditions imposed by the Canadian draft of the agreement on commercial aircraft are specifically covered by the United States note. (Paragraph V provides that they must conform to regulations, paragraph III, para. 2 restricts them from flying new routes, and paragraph V provides a sort of militarization by prohibiting commercial insignia.) This omission could be remedied by inserting in paragraph VII "operated by or on behalf of" after "aircraft" in two places in the first sentence of paragraph VII.

9. PARAGRAPH VIII — of the United States draft provides that the overall agreement is not applicable to commercial air services conducted by a commercial airline company over a route for which it holds a certificate, license or permit issued by the competent aeronautical authorities of the respective governments. In order that there may be no possibility of misunderstanding, it might be useful if the United States were to set forth in a reply to this memorandum those routes over the territory of Canada on which a United States company is operating both a commercial service under license or permit from the Canadian government and a service under contract to the Armed Forces of the United States.

10. PARAGRAPH IX provides generally that the overall agreement supersedes all previous documents which are inconsistent. The United States Government believes that in this instance general language is preferable to a specific enumeration because of the possibility of omitting from the enumeration some of the documents or parts thereof which relate to air transport and ferry services. While this point is well-taken, it would nevertheless be useful if the two governments could agree on at least a provisional list of the agreements which are being superseded by this overall agreement, which could be added to from time to time by agreement between the two governments until it is complete. The list tentatively suggested by the Canadian Government reads as follows:

(a) The exchange of notes of July 12, 13, 18, 30 and August 9, 1940,† giving blanket permission for military aircraft of the United States to make flights over specified portions of Canadian territory;

(b) The exchanges of notes of December 16, 1940, March 27, 1941, and April 18, 1941,† so far as these notes relate to aircraft;

(c) The communication of January 31, 1942,† from the Canadian Secretary of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence to the United States Secretary of the Board concerning Northeast Airlines;

(d) The letter of March 7, 1942, from the Honourable C. D. Howe to Brigadier General Robert E. Olds;[48]

(e) The exchange of notes of April 16, and April 23, 1942,† concerning American Airlines;

(f) The exchange of notes of August 13 and August 18, 1943,† concerning an aircraft ferry service between Columbus, Ohio, and Montreal;

(g) The exchange of notes of December 8, 1943 and December 10, 1943,† concerning an aircraft ferry service between Fort William and Minneapolis.

The Canadian Government suggests that the following be added to Article IX:

"and these understandings shall not be deemed to be revived on termination of this agreement."

Your WA-3622 of June 14.† Proposed agreement regarding military aviation.

Our records do not show why item (b) of paragraph 10 was included as an agreement to be superseded. Perhaps Reid can throw some light on this.

In the absence of any historical arguments we agree with the State Department that the exchange of notes providing for local notification of visits of service aircraft should be retained as it provides a quick and simple procedure which is of advantage to both countries. If it were superseded by the proposed agreement on transport services a vacuum would be left and visits would presumably have to be cleared through the diplomatic channel or take place without any legal basis. We are satisfied that the agreement on transport services is drafted in such a way as to prevent any possible (and unlikely) attempt on the part of the United States to establish a transport service through repeated use of local notification. Therefore we concur in the deletion of item (b) from the list of agreements to be regarded as supeseded.

CONFIDENTIAL. My WA-4306 of July 20th.† Proposed Agreement regarding Military Air Transport Services.

1. At the request of the State Department, Reid took part in discussions at the State Department this morning with Parsons and Walstrom, the Assistant Chief of the Aviation Division. Before giving a formal reply through their Embassy in Ottawa to our Draft of March 15th,† the State Department desired to take up with us informally their proposals for revision of the March 15th Draft.

2. They proposed the substitution of the following for Article VII of our Draft:

"No passengers, goods or mail originating at or destined to points in Canada shall be carried for reward or hire on any aircraft operated by or on behalf of the armed forces of the United States into, through or away from Canada pursuant to the provisions of Articles I and III of this Agreement. Similarly, no passengers, goods or mail originating at or destined to points in the United States, including Alaska and Hawaii, shall be carried for reward or hire on any aircraft operated by the armed forces of Canada into, through or away from the United States, including Alaska and Hawaii, pursuant to the provisions of Articles II and IV of this Agreement. The traffic of the aircraft referred to in this Article which may be carried shall be limited to passengers, goods or mail, the transportation of which is important in furtherance of the prosecution of the war."

3. The United States officials explained that the reason for this proposed change was to make it possible for United States aircraft flying over Canada to or from the United Kingdom to fill up any empty spaces with fare-paying passengers. They thought it probable that there would in the near future be a considerable demand for passage across the Atlantic from civilians who would not be entitled to free transportation on Air Transport Command planes at the expense of the United States Government and for whom there would not be enough room on the commercial services of American Export and Pan American. They therefore want to be able to carry them on Air Transport Command planes. Walstrom thought that this would put the United States on a position of equality with the United Kingdom and would provide for a more flexible and more economical operation.

4. Reid said that he would transmit this suggestion to the Canadian Government, but that his personal opinion was that it would be undesirable to propose the inclusion of such an article in the Agreement. The Agreement had been proposed by Canada sixteen months ago as a clarification and consolidation of existing agreements, and as an extension of those agreements to cover operations being conducted by the United States without authority from Canada. The United States proposal raised the entirely new and broad issue of whether Air Transport Command planes should carry fare-paying passengers. He thought that the raising of such an issue would hold up the conclusion of the Agreement which had already been held up too long. Moreover, permission by Canada for United States Transport Command planes to carry fare-paying passengers over Canada en route to the United Kingdom would be of no value to the United States unless the United States secured permission from the United Kingdom to take on and discharge such fare-paying passengers in the United Kingdom, and it would therefore be reasonable for Canada to withhold its reply until the United States had secured approval from the United Kingdom. Certainly since the United Kingdom would be directly concerned in the proposal, the Canadian Government would feel bound to consult it before replying to the United States.

5. Reid said that he himself thought that it might be necessary for the nations concerned to come to some agreement under which the Air Transport Command planes of the several nations could carry fare-paying passengers, since otherwise it might not be possible to provide the air services which would be required for civilians during the period between the conclusion of hostilities in Europe and the setting up of regular international air transport operations. This was, however, a very large question which, in his opinion, should be settled as a matter entirely separate from the conclusion of the Canada-United States Military Air Transport Agreement and preferably on a multilateral basis.

6. The American officials replied that since the United States was contemplating securing permission for its Air Transport Command services to carry fare-paying passengers, they would not want to enter into an agreement with Canada which specifically forbade them from carrying such passengers.

7. Reid replied that perhaps this point might be met if the United States in their reply to the Canadian note proposing the Agreement were to include a paragraph reading somewhat as follows:

"The Government of the United States believes that, in the light of existing circumstances and of developments which are likely to take place in the near future, it would be desirable if Air Transport Command aircraft on services other than those between Canada and the United States, including Alaska and Hawaii, should be permitted to carry fare-paying passengers. While accepting Article VII of the Agreement, in its present form, the Government of the United States desires to inform the Canadian Government that it intends shortly to propose to Canada, and to the other Governments concerned, that this be permitted."

8. Parsons, making it clear that he was acting under instructions from Mr. Berle, said that they might want to include a sentence saying that they did not recognize the principle that intermediate states should have the right to control air traffic which flies over their territory. Reid said he felt that if they were to make any such statement, it would be necessary for Canada in its reply to set forth at some length its views on international air transport policy, and particularly its belief that while it was desirable that nations should not be permitted to exercise in an anti-social way their present right to control air transit over their territories, it was equally desirable that nations should not be permitted to exercise in an anti-social way their present right to refuse commercial outlet. The abuse of the one right might, in Dr. Warner's language, be an outrageous exploitation of geography, but the abuse of the other right might be an equally outrageous exploitation of economic strength.

9. The only other amendment of consequence proposed by the United States is that the words "American or Canadian" be inserted before "civilian personnel" in Articles I and II. Clearly what they want to avoid is that an R.C.A.F. plane should be a disguised R.A.F. plane. Reid said that he could see objections in this proposal since it would mean that, if an R.C.A.F. transport squadron were transferred to operations into or over the United States, any of its personnel who were neither American nor Canadian citizens would have to be transferred out of the squadron.

10. He was confidentially informed that neither this amendment nor the one concerning Article VII had originated in the State Department. They had not indeed been contemplated until one of the other interested departments brought them forward a month ago.

11. The United States proposes the following drafting amendments:

(1) Articles V and VI

Insert in parenthesis after "civilian personnel" in the third to last line "unless also used by such civilian contractor in conjunction with authorized civil air transport services."

(2) Article VIII

Insert after "combat type aircraft" the words "or to occasional flights of transport type aircraft." The United States felt that the Article as at present framed might be inconsistent with the exchanges of notes of December 16, 1940 and March 27 and April 18, 1941, and might interfere with the occasional flights of R.C.A.F. transport planes, for example, between Ottawa and Washington.

12. I should be grateful if you would let me have your views on the amendments which have been proposed by the United States. Ends.

TELETYPE EX-3464 Ottawa, August 19, 1944

SECRET. Your WA-4595 of August 3 concerning the State Department's proposed revisions of the draft agreement on military air transport services.

Our views on the three main points raised by the State Department are as follows:

(a) Planes of the United States armed forces to be allowed to carry fare-paying passengers to points beyond Canada. This is a development which may well come about. Indeed it is possible that at a later date we may wish to propose to the United States that military air transport services be allowed to carry revenue loads. However, it is undesirable to prepare for such a development in an agreement which is for the most part intended to record and stabilize the present practice. Should there be a change in this direction a number of wartime agreements would have to be amended and we see no disadvantage in having a single agreement requiring amendment. We therefore regard it as preferable to omit any reference to this point in the present agreement. If the United States is insistent we would be prepared to deal with the matter along the lines suggested in paragraph 7 of your message under reference.

(b) Rights of intermediate states to control traffic over their territory. This is a large and controversial point. It will undoubtedly have to be discussed in the forthcoming conversations on aviation, but in our view it has no place in a limited agreement of this sort. You should therefore try to persuade the United States from pressing for its inclusion. It may be that they have achieved their aim for the moment by bringing the matter to our attention. The Department of Transport suggests that the word "control" as used here may mean the right of the intermediate state to control the nature of the traffic flying over it, i.e. the right to say whether military planes flying over the intermediate state may or may not carry fare-paying passengers. In your discussions with the State Department they may make their views clearer.

(c) Restrictions of the agreement as far as contract services are concerned to planes operated by American or Canadian civilian personnel. This is a matter on which the views of the R.C.A.F. should prevail and we have not yet heard from them. We will let you know as soon as possible.

The minor drafting amendments in paragraph 11 of your message under reference are satisfactory.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. My WA-5551 of September 25th,[†] draft Agreement on Military Air Transport Service. Parsons of the State Department telephoned this morning to say that they regret they are unable to withdraw the proposal for a new Article VII. The text of the substitute VII was given in our WA-4595 of August 3rd. The effect of the adoption of the substitute Article would be to forbid the carriage of fare-paying passengers between Canada and the United States but to enable United States aircraft flying over Canada to fill up empty space with fare-paying passengers of high priority.

2. In explanation of this proposal Mr. Parsons said that the War Department desire to secure the right immediately to fill up space on aircraft passing over Canada with high priority fare-paying passengers. They do not, therefore, feel it would be realistic to sign an Agreement now which includes a specific bar against carrying such passengers.

3. I hope you will be able to let me know soon the reply we should give to the State Department on this proposal.

TELETYPE WA-5724 Washington, October 5, 1944

IMMEDIATE. CONFIDENTIAL. My WA-5697 of October 4th, Draft Agreement on Military Air Transport Services.

1. The attitude taken by the War Department is not unnatural since they have now publicly admitted that their Air Transport Command is carrying fare-paying passengers. The memorandum which they issued last month on this subject reads as follows:

"Since its inception, the Air Transport Command has carried a relatively small number of fare-paying civilians on vital war missions to foreign points not served on commercial air transport routes. This practice, consistent with policies for all forms of travel operated by the War Department, is a necessary and non-competitive war expedient.

"The War Department emphasizes that an appropriate fare is charged only in cases where transportation cannot be properly charged to the United States Government and for passage on routes where no commercial air transportation is available."

2. Rather than conclude the Agreement in the form desired by the War Department, it might be better for us to inform the State Department that, since they have raised the new issue of the carriage of fare-paying passengers, we think it would be desirable to postpone further consideration of the Agreement until after the International Civil Aviation Conference where the whole problem of the future of the Military Air Transport Services will no doubt be considered.

3. Such a postponement would make it possible for us to discuss the problem at the British Commonwealth aviation discussions.

4. This might put us in a stronger bargaining position at the International Conference, since it will mean a continuance of the present legal position under which almost all the Military Air Transport Services which the United States is now operating into and over Canada are operating without permission from the Canadian Government. This is clear from a comparison of the list of routes given in part one A of the latest draft of the proposed Agreement with the lists contained in paragraphs 6 and 18 of our original memorandum of March 17th [16th], 1943, proposing the Agreement. Even though I think a few permissions have been given since March 16th, 1943, it would look as if probably three-quarters of the United States services are being operated without permission.

CONFIDENTIAL. Your WA-5724 of October 5. Draft agreement on military transport services.

We reached the same conclusion as the Embassy and on October 5 suggested to the departments concerned, namely, Transport and National Defence for Air, that while it is quite possible that Canada will be prepared to allow United States military services to carry fare-paying passengers to destinations beyond Canada, nevertheless it would be wise to await the outcome of the discussions at the international conference before making an agreement on the subject.

DESPATCH 201 Washington, January 27, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

In the discussions in New York on January 25 and 26 on the proposed military air transport agreement between Canada and the United States, the United States representatives said that they desired to conclude with Canada the proposed agreement in the form in which it stood as set forth in our correspondence of August to October, 1944. This would mean the acceptance of a slightly revised United States version of Article VII, the text of which was given in our WA-4595 of August 3.

2. At the meetings in New York the United States put forward this slightly revised version of Article VII, which differed from the one referred to in our WA-4595 by the addition at the end of the last sentence of the Article of the words "to relief and rehabilitation activities, and necessary to speed a return to peace-time conditions."

3. In view of the fact that we had taken the position that the United States required permission from us to carry fare-paying transit traffic over Canada, we suggested, and the United States representatives accepted, the addition after the second sentence of the proposed Article of a new sub-paragraph which will read as follows:

"Passengers, goods and mail other than those referred to above may be carried for reward or hire on the aircraft referred to in this Article."

The next sentence in the original U.S. version of Article VII, with the amendment proposed at New York, would then become the third sub-paragraph of Article VII.

4. I enclose four copies of Article VII as it would then read.† These copies are dated January 26.

5. We pointed out to the United States in New York that it was probable that the confidential appendix† to the draft agreement was out of date by now. The State Department representative, however, informed us in strict confidence that he does not want to raise with the Army and Navy the revision of the United States section of the appendix for fear that they will raise some new point which will hold up the conclusion of the agreement. His own personal opinion was that the United States Army and Navy would not like the draft of Article VII which had been proposed by the United States, but that they could be held to it since they had given consent to it many months ago, and they would be told that this was the best which the United States could get out of Canada.

6. The State Department representative said, however, that he had, of course, no objection to Canada revising its part of the appendix, and it would seem to us that the Canadian part definitely needs amplification.

7. It will be for you to determine whether it is desirable for you to clear the revised text of the agreement with Newfoundland or the United Kingdom or both. The United Kingdom has apparently still made no comments on the State Department's memorandum of last November, the text of which we gave in paragraph 2 of our WA-7029 of December 16,† and the State Department is, therefore, assuming that the United Kingdom is not going to raise an objection to the fare-paying activities of the Transport Commands.

8. I understand that Mr. Parsons of the State Department will be in Ottawa for a few days. He has with him a revised United States draft of our draft of March 15, 1944.†

9. If the new Article VII as proposed by the United States is acceptable to you, it would seem to be useful to get this agreement signed as quickly as possible before some new issue is raised.

10. While there is probably no very strong reason for keeping the appendix confidential, the State Department would prefer not to be asked to request the Army and Navy to release the appendix for publication.

Revised Article VII is acceptable to us and we are ready to conclude the agreement with the amendments proposed by the United States. We are prepared to leave the appendix in its present form and to have it remain confidential for the time being. It does not appear necessary to amplify the Canadian part of the appendix.

We suggest that the State Department instruct the United States Embassy here to conclude an exchange of notes giving them a proposed form of beginning and ending and their version of the agreed text. The revised texts could then be checked here and an agreement concluded.

We are informing the United Kingdom and Newfoundland of the terms of Article VII and are informing Newfoundland as well of the sections of Articles I and II that interest them.

Notes were exchanged at Ottawa on February 13, 1945. Canada, Treaty Series, 1945, No. 1.

The Government of Canada are now prepared to enter into an agreement with the Government of the United States establishing the basis to be adopted for the settlement of claims arising out of traffic accidents involving vehicles of the Armed Forces of Canada and vehicles of the Armed Forces of the United States in the following terms:—

(a) The agreement would cover all vehicles of the Armed Forces of the Government of Canada (hereinafter called Canadian vehicles) and all vehicles of the Armed Forces of the Government of the United States (hereinafter called United States vehicles).

(b) The agreement would apply to accidents wherever they occur which take place on or after December 7th, 1941, which have not already been disposed of; and which involve a Canadian or United States vehicle.

(c) Neither Government would make any claim against the other for any damage caused in an accident to which this agreement applies to any vehicle, stores or other property of the Government of Canada and used by the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force, or to any vehicle, stores or other property of the Government of the United States and used by the United States Army, the United States Army Air Force, the United States Navy or the United States Navy Air Force.

(d) Neither Government would make any claim against the other in respect of the death of or injury to any member or civilian employee of the Armed Forces of Canada or of the United States caused by a United States vehicle or a Canadian vehicle in an accident to which this agreement applies, provided that no claims which members or civilian employees of the Armed Forces of Canada or of the United States may have in their own right on account of injury or death, would be affected by this agreement.

2. I shall be glad if you will inform me whether the Government of the United States agree to an arrangement on this basis. If so, this note and your reply to that effect will be regarded as constituting an agreement between our two Governments which will continue in force in respect of all accidents which may occur prior to the expiration of three months from the date on which either of the two Governments gives notice to the other of its intention to terminate the agreement.

DESPATCH 682 Ottawa, May 9, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 388 of 16th February, 1944,† concerning the enquiry of the Department of State, Washington, as to whether the Canadian Government desires to limit the terms of the Agreement[50] to cover naval vessels only and if so, whether the Canadian Government is willing to apply the Agreement to such naval vessels as tankers, transports and cargo vessels. This matter involved necessary reference to, and consideration by several Government Departments.

There are special difficulties presented in this country by reason of the fact that most, if not all, of the ships involved are operating under charter and have not been requisitioned by the Government. The owners have interests which are protected by insurance, and it would be difficult to apply the "Knock for Knock" principle without their consent. If the owners consented, their position in relation to the Marine and War-Risk Underwriters might be prejudiced. The Departments concerned are inclined to the view that it might be impracticable to apply the principle to privately owned ships without making a fundamental change in the arrangements under which they have been operated during the war years.

Canada, Treaty Series, 1943, No. 12.

It would be preferable to continue the present Agreement whereby the "Knock for Knock" principle is limited to naval vessels, a definitely recognized class of ships, flying a distinctive flag and manned by crews under naval discipline and control.

The Departments concerned are still endeavouring to work out some arrangement which would make it possible to extend the scope of the Agreement to meet the United States Government's request. There is some doubt as to the meaning of the words "such naval vessels as tankers, transports and cargo vessels" and it would be desirable to clarify their meaning.

An indication as to the conditions of ownership, manning and control necessary to bring vessels within the scope of these words would be helpful in working out this problem.

It would be appreciated if you would discuss these questions with the appropriate authorities and defer, for the time being, a final reply to the State Department's enquiry.

Your despatch No. 682, May 9th, regarding collisions between United States and Canadian Naval vessels. We discussed this matter orally today with Mr. Hill of the Legal Division of the State Department. We pointed out to him the special difficulties mentioned in paragraph 2 of your despatch, and asked him to obtain information requested in the 4th and 5th paragraphs of your despatch.

2. Hill mentioned another problem which we had not previously heard about. It seems that there has been some correspondence† between the United States Naval Attaché in Ottawa and the Deputy Minister of National Defence for Air regarding a collision which took place on November 23, 1943, between an R.C.A.F. crash boat and a United States naval vessel. It appears that the Deputy Minister informed the Naval Attaché that this collision did not (not) come within the scope of the agreement of May, 1943, because the Canadian boat involved was an R.C.A.F. boat and not a Royal Canadian navy boat. Hill said that all the United States authorities involved had been going on the assumption that article 1 of the State Department's note of May 25th, 1943, was the governing article. This article talks of "vessels of war of either Government" without restricting it on the Canadian side to vessels of the Royal Canadian Navy.

3. It seems clear that there was never a meeting of minds between the two Governments regarding the kinds of vessels to be covered by the exchange of notes. The absence of such a meeting of minds resulted in a lack of precision in the notes themselves. The preamble to the State Department's note, and the Canadian Legation's note in reply, both talk about "ships of the Royal Canadian Navy." On the other hand, article 1 of the State Department's note simply talks about "vessels of war of either Government." The second ambiguity arises from the failure to define "vessels of war".

4. It seems to me that what would be most helpful at this stage is for all the Service Departments of both Governments to list the kinds of vessels operated by them and to say which kinds, in the opinion of each department concerned, should be brought within the scope of the agreement. The next step would be for the two Governments to reach a definite agreement as to the kinds of vessels to be covered. Such a definite agreement could be put in the form of an exchange of notes interpreting or supplementing the exchange of notes of May, 1943. An alternative procedure would be to cancel the May, 1943, exchange of notes and to substitute a completely new and mutually satisfactory exchange of notes. Ends.

DESPATCH 1248 Ottawa, August 30, 1944

Sir;

I have the honour to refer to your teletype WA-3148 dated May 22, 1944, and our despatch No. 682 dated May 9, 1944, regarding collisions between United States and Canadian vessels. I would appreciate knowing what progress has been made towards obtaining the information requested in paragraphs 4 and 5 of our despatch under reference.

The three Services were requested to submit lists of the kinds of vessels operated by them, and which in their opinion, should come within the scope of the agreement. The lists were submitted under the following categories:

A. Government chartered (demise or bareboat, not on time charter) or requisitioned ships operated by Navy, Army, or Air Force personnel. In this category, the owner foregoes all insurances, etc. and all risk is vested in the Canadian Government.

B. Vessels chartered or requisitioned for the use of the Navy, Army or Air Force which could be brought within the scope of the Agreement without too much difficulty; there is no Crown risk in this category. An adjustment could be effected between the owners and the Canadian Government.

C. Vessels engaged with the Armed Services but which could not be brought within the scope of the Agreement owing to the difficulty of obtaining an adjustment between the owners and the Government. Vessels in this category are entirely at the owners' risk.

I am enclosing copy of the lists submitted by the Navy and Air Force.†

The Army did not submit any list but referred to two vessels chartered from the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamship, Limited, namely S.S. Lady Nelson and S.S. Lady Rodney. In the opinion of the Army, these vessels did not come within any of the categories listed above by reason of the special character of their charter with the Canadian Government.

Your despatch of August 30th, No. 1248, concerning collisions between United States and Canadian vessels.

1. The matter was discussed orally today with Mr. Hill of the Legal Division of the State Department. I asked him whether he had been able to secure the information requested in your previous despatch No. 682, dated May 9. Following is his reply:

Vessels operated by the War Department and the Army are those —

(1) The title to which is in the United States and which are operated by the War Department;

(2) Obtained from private owners under the bareboat charter, and

(3) Made available by War Shipping Administration on a bare-boat basis for the use of the War Department and of the Army. The liability for all claims arising from the use and operation of such vessels is that of the War Department except as such liability may have been assumed by War Shipping Administration under its insurance agreement.

2. Contents of your despatch No. 1248 were brought to Mr. Hill's attention and he interpreted it as a step forward to broaden the scope of the agreement.

He told me that the Army and the Navy feel that the Canadian interpretation is too restrictive and that they are most anxious to reach a clear understanding.

3. I also gather from my conversation with Mr. Hill that a meeting in Washington of the Departments concerned of both Governments will probably be suggested as the best way to find a solution acceptable to both Governments. If the suggestion is made by the State Department, I would appreciate being informed of your views as to the advisability of such a meeting being held here.

4. While perusing the lists of the kinds of vessels operated by the three services, which is attached to your despatch No. 1248, it was noted that the R.C.A.F. list does not separate ships in different categories. Would this mean that all vessels operated by the R.C.A.F. come under Category A and should come within the scope of the agreement?[51]

I have just received a note from the State Department from which I quote the following relevant paragraphs:

"The interested agencies of this Government are desirous of having the scope of the present agreement broadened. In this connection it would be of material assistance if representatives of the appropriate agencies of the

Dear Sir:

Enclosed herewith for your information is a copy of a memorandum of Lieutenant-Commander Chipman who represented the Judge Advocate General at the Meeting in Washington on November 17th, 1944, referred to in the memorandum.

Your comments will be appreciated particularly with respect to paragraph 3 of the memorandum, observing that there is at least one case where salvage services have been rendered by Canadian Naval Vessel to Ship operated by the United States War Shipping Administration, the case in question arising out of salvage services rendered in August 1944 by H.M.C. M.L. "077" to U.S. S.S. James Miller.

A letter in identical terms has been despatched to the Deputy Minister of Transport.†

Yours very truly,

W. G. MILLS

PRECIS OF MEETING IN WASHINGTON WITH U.S. REPRESENTATIVES REGARDING EXTENSION OF KNOCK-FOR-KNOCK AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES IN RESPECT OF VESSELS OF WAR AND GOVERNMENT VESSELS

At the meeting in Washington which took place on 17th November, 1944, at which representatives of the State Department, Department of Justice, War Shipping Administration, Maritime Commission, Lease Lend, and J.A.G.[54] (both Army and Navy) were present, it was brought to the attention of the Canadian representatives that the United States desired an all-embracing Knock-for-Knock Agreement, which would include all types and categories of Government vessels, and would also extend to cases where Government cargo was being carried. It was brought to our attention that an agreement of this nature had been promulgated between the United States and the United Kingdom, but in cases where insurance existed on the vessels in question should a collision arise and the Knock-for-Knock Agreement have application, the U.S. did not take advantage of the "running down" clause in that it made no demand for compensation for the damages which its vessel had sustained, from the insurers. In consideration of the waiving of this right under the provisions of the policy, the insurers agreed that they would not exercise any right of subrogation which they might have against the vessel which had caused the damage, i.e., the British vessel. This understanding which exists between the underwriters and their respective Governments has not apparently been explored in Canada, but the U.S. representatives felt that there was no reason why a similar arrangement could not be made with any underwriters who might be the insurers of vessels registered in Canada and operating under Government supervision; more particularly, vessels operated by the Park Steamships and Canadian Government Merchant Marine vessels, etc.

2. In this connection, I felt it was advisable to contact and meet the Insurance representatives informally who would have knowledge of the Insurance factor and how the various vessels operated thereunder, and I accordingly met representatives from the Canadian National Steamships and Park Steamship Company, in Montreal. With regard to the extension of the Knock-for-Knock Agreement, they are definitely opposed to any agreement which might be put into force which has application to the category of vessels to which I have above referred; in other words, I gathered that there was no insurance placed on the Park vessels which would result in any insurance liability as a result of any collision which might be sustained, and therefore, unless the Government was prepared to become the insurer of the Park Steamships in cases of this nature, it would not be possible to include these vessels in the Agreement. Furthermore, repairs and damages, etc. which would be necessitated by reason of such a collision would, from a practical point of view, enter into the operating charges of the Company and might reflect substantially on the Company's position. Similar conditions also apply with respect to the Lady Nelson and the Lady Rodney, and I also understand that the Company has a special fund which is made available for repairs, etc., arising from collisions which the Company would not desire to use for this present purpose.

3. At the meeting in Washington, the additional question as to whether salvage claims on behalf of Canadian Naval personnel should be prosecuted against private ships registered in the United States of America was considered in view of the fact that in both the United Kingdom and the United States no claim of this category is proffered against a private ship of the other country, but in the event that salvage services are performed involving risk and hardship over and above the ordinary duties of Naval personnel, the Government of the country involved will make an award. The U.S. representatives felt that this might be the subject of an additional Knock-for-Knock Agreement, and it was determined that this question should be further explored with a view to possibly falling in line with the foregoing procedure if the circumstances and policy warrant such action.

NO. 119 Washington, April 11, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your note of February 6th, 1945,† relating to the conference held in the Department of State on November 17th, 1944, between representatives of the interested agencies of the United States Government and representatives of the Canadian Government to consider the scope of the Agreement between the United States and Canada for the waiver of claims arising as a result of collisions between vessels of war of the two countries.

I am now informed that the points which were raised by the United States representatives at the meeting referred to above have been examined by all the interested departments of the Canadian Government. Every effort has been made to find some way in which the Canadian Government could provide for the extension of the Agreement so as to include all types of vessels in which the risk of loss falls directly or indirectly upon the Government. An attempt has been made to explore the feasibility of readjustment of insurance arrangements along the lines which have been followed by the United States shipping authorities, but it has not been found possible to follow this course. The Agreement can be enlarged so as to cover, in addition to vessels of war, ships owned and operated directly by the Canadian Government as distinct from ships owned by the Canadian Government and operated by Crown companies or private enterprises. However the S/S Lady Nelson and the S/S Lady Rodney (two vessels chartered from the Canadian National Steamships Ltd.), should be expressly excluded from the Agreement since their category, by reason of the special character of their charter, is difficult to establish, and this might cause the United States Government to be misled. There is no way in which the excepted classes of ships can be brought within the scope of the Agreement without radical changes in the system of administration under which the ships are operated.

The question of salvage, while not mentioned in your note under reference, was also discussed by the interested departments of the Government, as it had been raised at the meeting held in the State Department. It was urged at that meeting that the Canadian practice should be changed so as to conform with that which is followed in the United Kingdom and in the United States, whereby no claims for salvage services rendered by one Government are made against private ships of the other country. In this matter, the United States authorities are following a long-standing practice, which obtains during war and peace. The United Kingdom authorities are able to work out a reciprocal arrangement by reason of the existence of lend-lease agreements. Lend-lease does not apply as between Canada and the United States, and it would not be possible to work out a reciprocal salvage arrangement without a fundamental change in the policy followed by the Canadian Government in dealing with salvage during war and peace. It would not be practicable to have a special arrangement limited to United States privately owned and operated ships, because such a course would give rise to complaints of discrimination, both from Canadian shipping and from shipping of other countries.

Accept etc.

Le secrétaire d'État par intérim des États-Unis à l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Acting Secretary of State of United States to Ambassador in United States

[Washington], July 26, 1945

Excellency:

I have the honor to refer to the Embassy's note no. 119 of April 11, 1945 with further regard to the extension of the scope of the agreement between the United States and Canada for the waiver of claims arising as a result of collisions between vessels of war of the two countries.

My Government has noted the offer of the Canadian Government to enlarge the agreement so as to cover, in addition to vessels of war, ships owned and operated directly by the Canadian Government and appreciates the difficulties which would be encountered by the Canadian Government in extending the agreement so as to include all types of vessels in which the risk of loss falls directly or indirectly upon the Government. However, it feels that the Embassy's note may be based in part on a misunderstanding of certain of the proposals discussed at the conference in the Department of State on November 17, 1944 between representatives of the two Governments.

Specifically it is thought that the Canadian authorities may have misunderstood the purport of the discussion with respect to salvage. This Government feels that the practice which obtains in the United States and Great Britain of not asserting salvage claims for services rendered by our public vessels, i.e., Navy and Coast Guard vessels, might well be adopted by the Canadian Government. Salvage claims have been made by Canadian Naval vessels and their personnel against vessels owned or operated by the United States Government. The claims which would be waived under the agreement proposed at the November 17 meeting are limited to claims between the respective Governments. Salvage claims by or against private interests would not be waived under the proposed arrangement.

The question of cargo claims, while not mentioned in the Embassy's note under reference, was also discussed at the meeting on November 17, 1944. The agreement proposed at that time included the waiver of claims for general average contribution by and damage to cargoes whenever such claims are ultimately payable by or to one of the contracting Governments.

It is believed that a further meeting between representatives of this Government and the Canadian Government would be useful with a view to ascertaining whether misunderstandings exist as to the nature of the proposals for an extension of the existing agreement and to explore alternative procedures for dealing with maritime claims between the United States and Canada in the event it is found to be impracticable to conclude an agreement between the two Governments for a mutual waiver of such claims. A considerable number of maritime claims between the two Governments are undisposed of and it is believed that every effort should be made to find some means to dispose of these claims and others which may arise in the future so as to avoid, if possible, having to dispose of the claims by litigation.

I shall appreciate being advised whether representatives of the Canadian Government can come to Washington for the purpose indicated and, if so, the time when it may be convenient for them to do so.

Accept etc.

Rapport d'une réunion entre des représentants des États-Unis et du Canada

Report of Meeting between Representatives of United States and Canada

RESTRICTED [Washington, c. September 19, 1945]

Report on meeting held in Washington on 19 September 1945 at 3:30 p.m. between members of Department of State and Dept. of External Affairs to discuss the enlargement of the Maritime Knock for Knock Agreement.

1. The following were present:

Green H. Hackworth	Legal Adviser, Department of State, Chairman
Raymond T. Yingling	Department of State
John Sonnet	Department of Justice, Claims Division
Edward L. Smith	Department of Justice
J. Frank Sturdey	Department of Justice
Edward A. Neiley	War Shipping Administration
J. Franklin Fort	War Shipping Administration
Commander L. R. Wood	USNR [U.S. Naval Reserve], Navy Department
Lt. Col. T. F. Mount	J.A.G.'s Office
Cdr. Myron H. Avery	USNR, J.A.G.'s Office
Mr. J. W. Kerr	Department of Transport, Ottawa
Mr. E. A. Coté	Department of External Affairs, Ottawa
Commander W. W. Chipman	J.A.G.'s Office, Ottawa
Graham Morrow	Canadian Embassy, Washington

2. In his opening remarks the Chairman indicated that the U.S. Government desired to broaden the agreement to cover all vessels owned and operated by both Governments, insofar as collisions, cargo and salvage claims are concerned.

3. Mr. Smith, of the Department of Justice, then asserted that one of the prime motives of the U.S. Government in seeking to extend the agreement was the fact that if no agreement is reached to cover all vessels, witnesses required for litigation would disappear with the breaking up of the wartime merchant marine. Later, Mr. Smith stated that, due to the American laws which place a mandatory limitation of two years on Admiralty litigation, the U.S. Government must take a decision soon as to whether they are to litigate these claims: if they must litigate because of their inability to come to an agreement with Canada, they must seek Congressional authority in the next few months for the monies required to proceed to court. Obviously, Mr. Sonnet pointed out, it is most desirable to avoid litigation.

4. Cdr. W. W. Chipman gave the background which led up to the previous agreement. From there on, Mr. Smith stated that the extension of agreement desired by the U.S. Government would cover the waiver of all Maritime claims (inclusive of cargo, salvage, etc.) for ships which are operated for the ultimate Government account. He indicated the U.S. Government had an agreement with the British and the Norwegians where the problem of underwriters came in, and the underwriters were agreeable to waiving their interests by arrangement with the Governments concerned. Mr. Smith indicated that the U.S. Government was interested in working out an agreement only where actuarial principles could be given effect in order to settle the great majority of outstanding claims; otherwise they would have to be content with an agreement of a more limited scope.

5. The question of the Park Steamship was raised and Capt. Kerr explained the set-up of Park Steamships, i.e. a Crown Company which allocates ships to Agents or Steamship Companies which in turn operate them on a managerial fee basis and as a strict commercial venture. Mr. Smith asked whether an agreement could be reached with Park Steamship Company for a settlement of claims on a Knock for Knock basis. No answer was given, but the question was raised as to the status of ships controlled by W.S.A.

6. Mr. Smith indicated that W.S.A. controlled about 4,500 ships of which maybe some 250 were on a new time charter basis which, since 1944 only, provides that the U.S. Government can waive insurance, and these ships could be considered for Government account and thus become part of an enlarged Knock for Knock agreement. No definite information was given as to the remaining ships except that this new form of agreement might be extended to cover a maximum of 600 ships.

7. Mr. Hackworth asked whether the Canadian Government would have authority to make an agreement binding Park, because of the ships being Government licensed and controlled by the Shipping Board. Capt. Kerr thought it might have this power, but the Government in the past had been guided by the advice of the Shipping Board, whose policy had been against the inclusion of the Park Steamship in such an agreement, principally because of the insurance and commercial factors involved in the handling of Park vessels.

8. Mr. Smith indicated that they found U.S. Insurance underwriters agreeable to waivers of their claims, and this might be explored in Canada. This was agreed.

9. Mr. Coté asked how many cases now stand for litigation. He was advised that between 40 to 60 such cases existed, and they involve Park vessels in all but 3 or 4 cases. The Chairman agreed to supply, on an informal basis, a list of the U.S. claims (with data) to the Canadian Government in the course of the next few days, and the Canadian group agreed to reciprocate in the next two or three weeks.

10. Mr. Coté indicated that at the present time the Canadian Government is willing to extend the present agreement to vessels owned and operated by the Canadian Government, exclusive of Park or C.N. Steamships, and to cover salvage claims where the vessels involved are of the R.C.N., on the one hand, and a ship of the U.S. Government at sole Government risk and not covered by salvage insurance, on the other hand. This offer was noted by the Chairman.

11. Mr. Coté asked to what extent the agreement could be made retroactive. The U.S. representatives thought it could not be made retroactive to 1941, but possibly it could be retroactive to 1944.

12. Mr. Hackworth reiterated that the U.S. Government was most anxious to have a Knock for Knock agreement which would include Park. If this were absolutely impossible, then a Joint Shipping Board would be accepted as a lesser evil. It could conceivably be operated as under the U.S.-British agreement, i.e., cases arising in Canadian waters to be dealt with under Canadian law, cases arising in U.S. waters to be dealt with under U.S. law. Mr. Coté was assured that a copy of the U.S.-British agreement would be made available to the Canadian Government.

13. As a talking point, Mr. Sonnet asked that the Canadian representatives tell Park that if, because of lack of agreement between Canada and U.S., cases in dispute had to be litigated, the U.S. Government would be obliged to raise the point of law that the real party at issue is the Canadian Government, and this might well bar a Park claim in a U.S. court.

14. Mr. Coté asked the Chairman if he could provide a definition of the ships which the U.S. Government was prepared to make the subject of an extended Knock for Knock agreement. The Chairman said he could provide us with a definition of public ships and with a list of merchant ships in a few days, and it was agreed that the Canadian Government would reciprocate by submitting a list of merchant ships which the Canadian Government might possibly include in an agreement. This would be without prejudice to the discussions now proceeding, and the lists would be exchanged on an informal basis.

15. Mr. Hackworth raised the point that a Knock for Knock agreement could be entered into without Congress assent, but that litigation or a Joint Shipping Board would require U.S. legislation. The Joint Shipping Board could only make recommendations and then Congress would consider the passing of judicial legislation. The U.S. representatives expressed some abhorrence for such a Board which should only be suggested as a last resort.

Conclusions & recommendations

16. That a definition of Canadian public vessels, together with a list of merchant ships which the Canadian Government might include in an extended agreement, be prepared by Capt. Kerr and Mr. Coté for transmission to the U.S. Department of State.

17. That a list of Canadian claims against U.S. Government ships be prepared by Park Steamship Company for transmission to U.S. Department of State.

18. That, upon receipt of a list of U.S. ships and claims, these be studied by Capt. Kerr and Mr. Coté with a view to calling an interdepartmental meeting to review possibility of including Park either in a Knock for Knock agreement, or in an agreement for joint arbitration as described in para. 12.

Mémorandum du ministre, l'ambassade aux États-Unis, au Cabinet

EXTENSION OF THE MARITIME KNOCK FOR KNOCK AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

For approximately one year, the United States Department of State has been anxious to extend the scope of the Exchange of Notes recorded on May 25 and May 26, 1943, between Canada and the United States, setting out an agreement for the waiver of claims arising from collisions between vessels of war.

2. At the request of the United States Department of State, a conference was held between Canadian and American representatives at the Legal Division of the Department of State in Washington on September 19, 1945. It became evident that the main question at issue related to the inclusion of ships of the Park Steamships Company Limited and of all types of vessels at the sole risk of the Canadian Government, on the one hand, and the inclusion of ships of the War Shipping Administration, on the other.

3. The United States Department of State has provided the Canadian Government with a list† of 37 claims which would be currently affected by such an agreement, and a broad examination reveals that the United States' total claim against Canada would be approximately $4,000,000, and that Canada's claim against the United States would be in the neighbourhood of $650,000. Two claims involving vessels of the Royal Canadian Navy account for $3,600,000 of the American claim. It, therefore, seems that the general claim of the United States against Park Steamships might be something of the order of $350,000, while the Park Steamships' claim against the War Shipping Administration amounts to some $600,000. The Park Steamships is very reluctant to give up its favourable position unless it is to enure to the benefit of Canada as a whole.

4. Some of the objections which are raised are the very complex and unknown effects upon maritime insurance in all its ramifications ranging from bare boat to cargo and general average insurance policies. These complications make it desirable that whatever agreement is reached with the United States should have the approval of the Underwriters before it is concluded. As far as the Department of External Affairs can ascertain, there are no insuperable difficulties in the path of entering into an enlarged Knock for Knock Agreement with the United States Government.

5. The advantages would be accrued principally to the Royal Canadian Navy, i.e., to the extent of probably some $3,600,000, but to the detriment of the Park Steamships to the extent of $250,000, plus, possibly, a part of the cost of premiums covering those ships which are the subject of a Knock for Knock Agreement and which were involved in a collision.

6. The following courses of action are open to the Canadian Government:

(a) Not to enlarge the present Agreement;

(b) To enlarge the Knock for Knock Agreement to include all ships and cargoes at the ultimate risk of Canada and the United States of America (subject, possibly to the exemption of the Canadian National ships);

(c) To enter into an agreement of arbitration concerning all ships and cargoes at the ultimate risk of the Governments of Canada and the United States of America.

7. The United States Department of State very much prefers a Knock for Knock Agreement which would include all ships and cargoes at the ultimate risk of both Governments, and only desires to enter into an agreement for arbitration in the last resort and as a lesser evil.

8. It is desired, therefore, that Cabinet should give a decision as to which of the courses set forth above should be followed.

It is impossible to follow the course indicated in paragraph 6 (a) and do nothing, unless the Government is prepared actively to facilitate legal proceedings in which Canadian ships are at fault, whether merchant ships or warships.

Practically speaking, it would be necessary to make some concessions in order to take into account the United States Government's entirely proper reluctance to become engaged in a law suit against the Royal Canadian Navy. It is suggested, therefore, that the minimum concession which could be made would be to concur in an arrangement for setting up an international board, or possibly two boards, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific coast, to make recommendations for the settlement of the claims. Insofar as general policy is concerned, it would be preferable, on the whole, to extend the Knock for Knock Agreement. The policy of Knock for Knock Agreement was initiated by the Canadian Government, and it has spread throughout the Allied world. The United States and other Governments readily concurred in applying the principle upon Canadian request. This is the first time that the Canadian Government has been asked to make a concession in this matter. Regardless of the balancing of accounts, there would be a good deal to be said for accepting Knock for Knock upon a universal basis to cover all claims which would be fundamentally claims between the two Governments concerned. On the other hand, it is impossible to overlook the very strong opposition by Park Steamship Company Limited, and so far, in deference to this opposition, it has been possible to avoid commitment, in the negotiations with the United States Government, to bringing the Park ships within the scope of Knock for Knock.

CANADA-UNITED STATES;
CLAIMS FOR COLLISIONS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT VESSELS;
EXTENSION OF "KNOCK FOR KNOCK" AGREEMENT

19. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE referred to an External Affairs memorandum which had been submitted, and suggested that the extension of the "knock for knock" principle to include all ships and cargoes at the ultimate risk of the two governments was in the general Canadian interest.

The memorandum observed that the U.S. government were anxious to estimate the scope of an exchange of notes of May 1943, setting out an agreement for waiver of claims arising from clearance of vessels of war between the two countries. It was now suggested by the United States that this principle be enlarged to other government vessels.

At present, the United States had thirty-seven claims against Canada to an approximate total of $4 million and Canadian claims totalled some $650,000, of which $600,000 represented Park Steamships' claim against U.S. War Shipping administration. The principal U.S. claim (some $3,600,000) lay against the Canadian Navy.

Alternatives to extension of the "knock for knock" principle were to leave the situation as at present or to enter into an agreement of arbitration.

Copies of the memorandum had been circulated.

20. THE MINISTER OF TRANSPORT agreed that an extension of the principle to all government vessels was in the general interest though Park Steamships would suffer loss and, in the absence of the Minister responsible, some reservation should be made in any decision taken.

21. THE CABINET, after further discussion, agreed that, as a matter of policy, it was desirable to extend the "knock for knock" agreement to include all ships and cargoes at the ultimate risk of the two governments and that, subject to the concurrence of the Minister of Reconstruction, Canadian representatives should seek this end in negotiations with the United States; it being understood that, if the agreement were so extended, the Navy should compensate Park Steamships to the extent of their claim against the United States.

With reference to the conclusion reached at the meeting of the Cabinet held on December 19th, the Secretary of the Cabinet has now heard from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that he concurs in the decision reached with regard to the extension of the agreement with the United States on a "knock for knock" basis in respect of collisions between vessels at the ultimate risk of the two governments. RUSH-BAGOT AGREEMENT[55] a — Canada and the United States may each maintain on Lake Ontario and on Lake Champlain one vessel not exceeding 100 tons burden and armed with one 18 pound cannon.

b — On the upper lakes two vessels of the same specification.

c — All other vessels on the lakes to be forthwith dismantled and further construction or arming of warships on the lakes prohibited.

d — Naval forces to be restricted to "such services as will in no way interfere with the proper duties of the armed vessels of the other party."

I have nothing to add to an admirable statement of the case. J. E. R[ead]
I agree with the proviso that any new agreement should be signed on the anniversary of the 1817 agreement so as not to upset the Kiwanis Club who celebrate this occasion! H[ume] W[rong]

The Rush Bagot Agreement is obviously out of date both with regard to the numbers of vessels permitted and with regard to the construction of vessels. It has been "interpreted" on a number of occasions and the prohibition against the construction or arming of warships was finally "interpreted" in 1942[56] to permit the construction of naval vessels having their armament in complete readiness for action upon arrival in the open sea, with all essential tests and trials, including submerged operations of submarines and test firing of torpedoes and guns, conducted in Great Lakes waters.

It seems probable that after the war both Canada and the United States will wish to have naval vessels on the Great Lakes for training purposes. They may also wish to construct naval vessels and there seems no reason why they should not. Even in the unthinkable event of tension between the two countries the presence or absence of naval vessels on the Great Lakes would be of insignificant importance.

Since the Rush-Bagot Agreement bears so little relation to the facts of the present day situation it seems appropriate to consider whether it should not be replaced by a new agreement which would take account of the changes which have occurred since 1817.

Such an agreement might cover the following points:

a — Permit each country to maintain such vessels as it requires for naval training purposes and for police work.

b — Permit the construction of such vessels as each country requires for the purposes mentioned in "a" above as well as for ocean use by each party or for sale to other countries, subject to whatever agreements on naval limitation might be binding on each party.

c — Provide for complete exchange of information on all activities under "a" and "b" above, perhaps through the medium of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

The principal argument against a new agreement is the great sentimental value that attaches to this historic document. It is one of the earliest successful agreements for the limitation of armaments in history. It was of great value in easing tense relations after the war of 1812 and in providing for a period of rapid growth and expansion on both sides of the border, which was unclouded by any possibilities of a naval race. It is, therefore, a landmark of nearly 130 years standing and a monument to the excellent relations that prevail between Canada and the United States.

On the other hand there are two arguments in favour of a new agreement which it is suggested have even greater weight.

1 — A new agreement might possess even more sentimental value if appropriately conceived and properly launched. The old agreement was, despite its undoubted value, based on mutual suspicion and the need to keep a watchful eye on naval armaments. A new agreement could be based on the complete confidence that exists between the two countries which eliminates the need for that watchful eye. It would be based on mutual trust, not on mutual suspicion. It could well be linked with the Ogdensburg Agreement of 1940[57] under which the two governments agreed to collaborate in joint defence. Indeed, a naval limitation agreement seems inconsistent with joint defence and the responsibilities entrusted to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. A new agreement based on these considerations would be a landmark in the history of both countries.

Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 3.

2 — The existing agreement is so obsolete and meaningless that scarcely one of its provisions is in force. It has been "interpreted" out of existence and bears no relation to the facts of the present day. If international agreements are to have any meaning and are to command respect it is questionable whether the retention of agreements which are continually violated is wise. It appears preferable to abrogate, amend or replace them.

On balance it is suggested that a new agreement, far from destroying something of historical interest and sentimental value, would be a document which would command great interest and respect and would in time acquire sentimental value in its own right. It would moreover give appropriate recognition not only to the generally changed conditions which have superseded those of 1817 but to the specific new developments in joint defence which date from the Ogdensburg Agreement.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Washington, December 12, 1945

Dear Mr. Macdonnell:

I have your letter of December 6th† about the question of revising the Rush-Bagot Agreement.

I agree in principle with the proposed revision but I would underline the necessity — admitted in the memorandum — of avoiding any misunderstanding or misinterpretation of the move. Very careful preparation for any negotiations from the publicity and explanatory angle will have to be made. (Nothing must be done, of course, to compromise our proudest after-dinner boast — the undefended frontier.)

An additional argument for change would be that the new treaty would be a Canadian-United States treaty, not a United Kingdom-United States treaty. This fact, appropriately handled, could have useful educational effects in this country.

Negotiations for any new agreement would flow naturally from the Ogdensburg Agreement and from wartime cooperation between the two countries. The implications here are important and would have to be carefully considered.

I agree that the Permanent Joint Board should be brought into both the negotiation and the administration of the agreement, as suggested. It might even be found possible to have a reference made to the Board's existence in the text of the agreement itself.

I am a little doubtful about point b on page 2 of the memorandum — in particular about the mention of "the construction of such vessels . . . . . for sale to other countries."

Should the Rush-Bagot Agreement be revised, it would be possible to underline the fact that it is a revision of an international agreement which has been in existence and observed since 1817. I believe, in fact, that this is an additional argument for revision. This fact — that there has been an international agreement of this kind in force for 128 years — would be a good one to publicize at the present time.

Yours sincerely,

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

SECRET [Ottawa,] April 10, 1944

In collaboration with the Defence Department we have been preparing a review of the principal aspects of Canada's external relations. One question which we suggested the army should think about was our post war defence relationship with the United States and its connection with any general security scheme. The following extract from a letter of General Pope's[†] commenting on the position, is interesting and I think a correct appreciation:

"The subject of Canada's Post War Defence Relationship with the United States is an interesting one, but I wonder if it is as big as at first glance it might appear? The problem as I see it is pretty well as follows.

In August, 1940, the Prime Minister and the President set up the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. As I have often remarked to you, the word 'Permanent' in the title was not lightly inserted. Indeed, I understand that it was deliberate. I presume, therefore, that it will be within our Government's policy to continue that relationship[58] even though I readily agree that the Board was established at a time when the United States, and, I fear, many people in Canada, were unduly perturbed as to the security of this Continent. That feeling, of course, has already passed. As you know, I hold that the Scales of Attack, to which it could reasonably be held we were exposed, were, are and will be almost insignificant.

However this may be, I believe that on the conclusion of this war it will be held desirable, certainly by the United States Government, and very probably by ours, that the present intimate defence relationship be continued. At the moment we have Defence Plan ABC-22.[59] This Plan was drawn up before the United States came into the war as a belligerent. It was put into effect on the 8th of December, 1941, and will lapse on the cessation of hostilities. As we approach that time I feel sure that the United States will ask us to revise it so as to have it ready to be put into effect when the next war comes. As I have indicated, I do not think it will be possible for Canada not to accede to this request, nor do I think it will lie within Government policy to refuse to do so.

The revised Plan, apart from a preamble which I shall deal with in a moment, will require a statement of the objects (or tasks) to be achieved and a statement of the forces that will be made available to achieve those objects. The preamble will be somewhat tricky, but it is one, thank goodness, that will have to be drafted principally in External Affairs, as it will be a statement of Government policy. However, we need think only of a recrudescence of strength of Germany and Japan. This seems rather far-fetched at the present, and I hope will remain so for a long time to come. Public opinion, however, has a short memory, and we may again find ourselves thinking in terms of peace while our present enemies will be actuated by entirely different thoughts and motives.[60] They may again attack us or oblige us in self-defence to make war on them, in which circumstances the situation of 1939 and 1940 will again arise. We must, therefore, have a plan ready and this should not be difficult to draw up.

There is one exception to this, and that is the possibility that sometime in the future the United States, from their idealistic dislike of Russia, may find their relations with that country somewhat strained. In such circumstances any unfortunate event might provide a spark that would lead these two countries into war. The British Empire, on the other hand, I should think, would be unlikely to be so moved and would be desirous of sitting back.[61] In such circumstances our position would be a difficult one. To the American the defence of the United States is continental defence, which includes us, and nothing that I can think of will ever drive that idea out of their heads. Should then, the United States go to war with Russia they would look to us to make common cause with them, and, as I judge their public opinion, they would brook no delay.

So, therefore, my view is that the defence relationship between the United States and Canada in the Post-War Period should just be that intimate technical relationship that we enjoy at present. We should renew ABC-22, and take good care that in our defence establishments we should provide adequate forces, not so much as to defend ourselves against possible raids from the enemy (though this would be necessary), but more to ensure that there was no apprehension as to our security in the American public mind. As I used to hold ten years ago when I was in operations, what we have to fear is more a lack of confidence in United States as to our security, rather than enemy action. I can put this in another way. If we do enough to assure the United States we shall have done a good deal more than a cold assessment of the risk would indicate to be necessary."

Mémorandum au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum for Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa,] April 4, 1944

The Prime Minister read aloud this morning your memorandum of April 10, quoting from General Pope's appreciation of the post-war defence relationship with the United States. The following points which arose from our discussion may be of interest:

1) The permanent character of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence was certainly quite deliberate.

Mr. King says that the President called attention to this feature when the Ogdensburg Agreement[62] was being drafted and that he told the President that he certainly believed the defence arrangement ought to be on a permanent basis.

2) There may be occasion to fear a recrudescence of strength of Germany and Japan. But Mr. King clearly thinks that the Canadian position, as lying between the U.S.S.R. on the one side and the U.S.A. on the other, may have to be worked out with very special care.

3) We will also have to think in terms of a rising unity of colour policy in the Far East generally which, from the point of view of world strategy, might have to regard the Far East as a solid block opposed to the so-called white races generally.

4) There is the possibility that oil developments in northwest Canada will reach such a scale as to make this area a much more vulnerable one in terms of offensive plans of any possible future enemy. The fact that it lies near the international air routes perhaps emphasizes the strategic aspect of which account would have to be taken.

V. Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States
(Paper submitted by the Army Representative)†

Colonel Jenkins explained that the paper had been circulated to the Planning Staffs of the other Services and it was now tabled for the consideration of the Working Committee, prior to submission to the Advisory Committee. He explained that it had treated the subject from a general standpoint and suggested that special studies might be made of various aspects of Canadian-United States defence relations later. The Chairman stated that the paper dealt with the subject comprehensively, but would require careful study by the Working Committee in view of its many implications, some of which were of a political nature, and he invited discussion. The following were some of the more important points made:

[63]Le cabinet du Premier ministre./Prime Minister's Office.

It was felt that in the consideration of Canadian static defences after the war, attention should be given to the possible threat to Canadian security which might arise from the outside, and that Canadian defence policies would have to be oriented in relation to them. After the war it would be safe to assume that Germany and Japan would be incapable of aggression for some time. The paper should however, it was thought, take into account Canadian relations with the U.S.S.R., and especially defence problems arising out of the possibility of tension between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R., in which Canada, being sandwiched between the two, would inevitably be involved. Any Canadian defence policy would have to take this possibility into account, especially as regards defence installations in the Alaska region where the boundaries and strategic interests of Canada, U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. come together. There was full discussion of this point and it was agreed that the paper would require modification in the light of the discussion. It was also pointed out that in the consideration of defence installations it should be borne in mind that some of these could equally be given an offensive character. For instance, the defence facilities accorded to United States by Canada in the staging routes both in the North-East and North-West for the transport of aircraft to the scene of operations, were in reality used for offensive purposes, and it was essential that the granting of facilities under the special circumstances of this war should not be used as a precedent for future action in time of peace, if Canadian neutrality were not to be prejudiced. It was also felt that the role of the Permanent Joint Board of Defence should be more closely examined as the very fact of its existence might give rise to mistrust on the part of third powers who might not appreciate its defensive character.

At the conclusion of the discussion it was agreed that a Sub-Committee composed of Major R. G. C. Smith, Lieutenant J. S. Hodgson, Mr. R. M. Macdonnell and Mr. G. Ignatieff, should give further consideration to this paper in the light of what had been said at the meeting, and should submit a redraft[†] for the next meeting of the Working Committee.

(Consideration of a revision† made by the Sub-Committee of the Working Committee appointed at the meeting on Thursday, May 18th)

The Chairman stressed the importance of this paper and said that he would like to see most careful consideration given to it before it was submitted to the Advisory Committee and the Working Committee of the Cabinet. It would perhaps be advisable before proceeding with a detailed consideration of the paper to submit a brief statement of the premises on which the Committee was proceeding in the study of this subjiect for the approval of the Advisory Committee. It was agreed that a draft of such a statement would be prepared for the next meeting. After discussion of various aspects of the paper the Chairman invited members to send written comments on the second draft to the Secretary prior to the next meeting, and to reserve a detailed consideration of the paper as a whole until then. This was agreed.

V. "Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States" (consideration of statement prepared of the premises on which the committee is proceeding in the state of this subject)

The Chairman reminded the members that at the last meeting it had been agreed to put forward a draft of the assumptions on which the Committee was proceeding with this study for agreement in the Working Committee, and later, for submission to the Advisory Commission with a request for guidance. Colonel Jenkins suggested that there were certain objections in this procedure. He felt that the preliminary paper,† which had been prepared for this purpose, proposed a number of questions on which the Advisory Commission would not be able to pass judgment without reference back to the Joint Planning Committee. Colonel Jenkins thought it better that a summary be prepared of the Working Committee paper on "Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States," in its revised form, and that the Advisory Committee be asked for its views on the conclusions which had been reached.

The Chairman explained that the Working Committee studies on Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States had to be fitted into the larger picture of Canadian defence problems, and that there was danger in considering various aspects of the problem in detail without higher guidance as to the general perspective of the Working Committee's studies. It was suggested that the preliminary paper had been prepared with this in view, but it likewise contained the main conclusions of the paper on Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States. After discussion it was agreed to give consideration to the preliminary paper in detail and to put it forward in the form of a statement of tentative conclusions. Certain amendments were proposed and agreed upon. It was also agreed that the revised version of the preliminary paper should be submitted at once to the Advisory Committee.

It was further agreed that the next meeting of the Working Committee would be held on Monday, July 3rd, at 4:30 when an oral reading will be given of Part I of the paper on "Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States."† A summary of this Part would be circulated by the army representatives, together with any changes submitted by members before the next meeting.

Le président, la Mission canadienne de l'état-major conjoint, Washington, au ministère de la Defense nationale

Chairman, Canadian Joint Staff Mission, Washington, to Department of National Defence

[Washington] June 27, 1944

Dear J. [H. Jenkins],

Thank you for your note of the 22nd June† with which you sent me a copy of a preliminary paper on "Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States."[64]

2. Perhaps I have tried to read this paper too quickly but some points in it I find a little confusing. For instance, at the end of Paragraph 2 you say that facilities in Canada will be required for both static defence and to meet aggression or the threat of agression outside North America. From this I presume you must be referring to transit rights for the despatch of United States forces abroad which I presume will require base ground forces, e.g., at Goose and the Northwest Air Staging Route, etc., as at present. Taking into account points made lower down in the paper, this will not mean U.S. occupation in time of peace, but on Canada's part, a freely given right to do so in the event of an emergency arising at some future time. This, as I see it, is rather a nice one and very much up to External Affairs to draft. As for the deployment of U.S. forces in Canada see my Para. 5 hereunder.

3. I find myself very much in agreement with the first part of your Para. 4, because on the conclusion of this war it should be fairly safe to presume that our present enemies will be rendered impotent for a long while to come. In this I think you will find yourselves opposing the American technique of assessing enemy capabilities as against our view of what the enemy will probably do. You will find people saying that the enemy is quite capable of despatching a hundred, or a thousand, planes against Gander or White Horse. That is true, but my counter to that is "Will he?, i.e., are there reasonable grounds for assuming that he will?" If one guards himself against enemy capabilities everywhere you will soon exhaust your resources. As I see it, we shall be required in the post-war period to have permanent air forces at Goose, Gander and Tor Bay, and probably nucleus ground forces as well, but if we adopt the "ten year rule", as I imagine we shall, we shall require only the smallest of nuclei, provided we have in being more centrally located forces capable of rapidly being despatched to the outlying points. For example, if Germany concludes this war without a warship I do not think we shall need to maintain a coast defence battery (unit) at St. John's. If we put the present guns (or even modern equipment) at St. John's and Goose on a care and maintenance basis we shall have made ample provision, always provided that we maintain at Halifax or elsewhere, sufficient trained personnel adequate for the manning of this equipment at comparatively short notice.

4. I must say that I find it extremely difficult to agree with the idea contained in the last sentence of your conclusion (d).[65] The possibility of such a war in the northern Pacific strikes me as being extremely remote. I should imagine that the chances of a future war between the U.K. and Russia to be the more likely, though that too is remote. A contrary view appears to be held in External Affairs, but the reason for this entirely escapes me. The idea of Russia and the U.S. making war on each other across the wastes of Northeastern Siberia and Alaska strikes me as being somewhat far-fetched.

5. Holding these views, I am inclined to question the soundness of your conclusion (b).[66] I cannot imagine a situation arising within the foreseeable future which would require the United States to deploy forces in the northern half of this continent, namely Canada. Transit rights to Alaska I can see, but Canada proper and Newfoundland, including the Labrador, I think that we should entirely take on ourselves. I except of course, the presence of heavy U.S. naval units at Argentia. My feeling therefore is that we should not bring such ideas to the attention of our American friends, but on the contrary we should await their doing so (and I am not sure that they will) but from the very outset make it clear to them that actual Canadian defence will be undertaken by Canada.[67] And if you agree that the proper way to assess the risk to be probability rather than capability, I think you will conclude that there is no reason why the load should prove an onerous one. Only in this way shall we avoid being in a position of a "client state", an idea which some of our External Affairs friends do not like to contemplate. My view is that there is little risk of the Americans attempting to put us in that position and if by any chance they did we should not have much difficulty in disposing of it.

6. One last point in this connection. During the past three years we have done a great deal for the United States without subjecting their proposals to really critical examination. There being a war on, as good neighbours and as little fellows, we were practically obliged to meet their requests and that speedily. As a result we and they have done a number of foolish things which are now a burden on our taxpayers. I think in future if cases of this kind again arise, we would be wise not to accept immediately but to observe that in our view, in which we have a certain measure of confidence, the proposal or request seems to be exaggerated and to resist their pressure and to suggest to them that they lower their sights.

2. Paper† on Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States

It was agreed that an oral reading of this paper be postponed until after the Advisory Committee had considered the preliminary paper. There followed a discussion on various aspects of the paper. It was suggested that there should be some modification of the emphasis on the prospect that U.S. defence planning would centre on the danger from the U.S.S.R. If war were to come between the United States and the Soviet Union, it would probably come as part of a world conflict and the fighting would take place in Asia or in Europe. It was suggested that the paper should include an estimate of the nature of the possible threat of attack on North America by the Soviet Union, assuming that the worst situation came about.

The post-war role of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence was considered. Mr. Wrong said that the Working Committee might try to define more carefully the nature of the Board's future role. There was general agreement that, even though the Agenda of the Board in the post-war period might be very small, it would be useful to continue it. The Board could at least provide a continuing means of exchanging information and a useful cover for discussions which might otherwise attract unwarranted attention. The Board would have some use, even if it were maintained purely for show.

The urgency of the strategic problems listed on page eleven of the paper[68] was raised. Mr. Wrong said that, even though the possibility of any attack on North America were dismissed for some years at least, nevertheless political questions had constantly to be decided which involved an appreciation of future defence problems. He cited political problems with regard to Newfoundland and Greenland as examples. In Mr. Wrong's view at the worst there might be some years of confusion in parts of Europe and Asia after the defeat of Germany and Japan; then again at the worst there might follow a period of exhaustion which might last a decade during which Canadian defence problems, aside from problems of maintenance, would be practically dormant. At the best, during this decade or so, an effective system of maintaining security would come into being, and the specific part of Canada in it would become clear.

It was decided to hold a further discussion of this subject at the next meeting, which will take place on Thursday, July 13th.

2. Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States

Mr. Wrong said that the Working Committee was preparing a study of post-war defence arrangements with the United States. They had prepared a preliminary paper which has been circulated to members of the Advisory Committee in order to know if the general way in which their minds were working was in agreement with the views of the Advisory Committee. This paper was read to the meeting.

Admiral Jones expressed objections to the reference in paragraph 4 to a ten year period during which, if certain conditions were fulfilled, there would be no danger of attack on North America. He thought that ten year year concept had been a fallacy of pre-war planning which persisted until 1939. He questioned also the advisability of including in a Service paper political judgments such as that expressed in the last sentence suggesting that the U.S.S.R. could not be in a position to take part in a war during the next decade.

The meeting agreed that the ten year period was a moving period which should be reviewed annually. It was not a time during which defences could be relaxed or forgotten because at the end of it they would have to be prepared for possible attack. It was agreed, therefore, to add to the second sentence in paragraph 4 the following: ". . .; it is recommended, however, that this period should be kept under constant review and should be modified or confirmed by the Government annually, in the light of the general international situation."

A typographical error in paragraph 5[69] was noted. The word "agreement" in line 4 should be "argument". In connection with paragraph 5(a) there was some discussion of the future of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. The view of the meeting was that the Board should be considered "Permanent" and Mr. Heeney said that this was the view of the Government.

It was agreed that paragraph 5(b) should be struck out, as its purpose was sufficiently covered by 5(a).

After some discussion it was agreed to let 5(c) stand. It was not considered desirable at this stage to define whether the "international agreements" referred to in the last sentence included bilateral as well as multilateral agreements. The purpose of the paragraph was to leave a way open in case plans for United Nations bases materialized and it was considered that the provision of bases on these terms was preferable to strictly bilateral arrangements with the United States.

Objections were expressed to paragraphs 5(d) and (e) on the ground that they indicated susceptibility to a Russian bogey; and also on the ground that it was implied that Canada would have little part in making decisions as to her own policy. It was agreed, therefore, that the first sentence of paragraph (d) should be revised to state that requirements for the defence of Canada "will be influenced by decisions in Washington", rather than "will be in part determined by, etc." Mr. Robertson said that allowance would have to be made for psychological-political biases in the United States which would necessitate our taking actions which might not be strictly logical on purely strategical grounds.

It was agreed that as the last sentence of 5(e) begged certain questions concerning the relations between the Soviet Union and the Commonwealth, it should be revised to state that: "The maintenance of good relations between these two countries is therefore a matter of great importance to the defence of Canada."

The last part of paragraph (f), it was agreed, should read ". . . should fall into place as part of a world system of general security."

It was decided that the paper as revised should go to the War Committee with the explanation that it had been prepared by the Working Committee on P.H.P. and approved by the Advisory Committee; that it was still a preliminary review of the situation but guidance from the War Committee at this stage would enable the P.H.P. Committees to proceed further.

Mr. Robertson raised the question as to whether, in view of the references in the paper to a ten-year period with few risks of attack, it might not be well to point out that, although the dangers of involvement under headings (a) and (b) of paragraph 1, were small, there would be other important military commitments during that period, including obligations Canada might assume in a world security organization. It was decided, therefore, to insert a paragraph to this effect between paragraphs 4 and 5 and to circulate the

Mémorandum du deuxième secrétaire, le ministère des Affaires extérieures, au sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Second Secretary, Department of External Affairs, to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa,] July 5, 1944

Attached is a memorandum from Mr. Escott Reid, sent to Mr. Macdonnell in comment on P.H.P. Working Committee's draft paper on "Canadian Defence Relationships with the United States".

Mr. Reid explains that the memorandum was originally prepared as a comment on the letter from General Pope to Colonel Jenkins of April 4th[70] on this subject and has been revised in the light of the Working Committee's paper.

It will be observed that Mr. Reid is inclined to discourage the idea of joint planning of post-war defence policies with the United States as there are too many unknown factors (at the present time).

He suggests, rather, that we should concentrate on helping in the establishment of a universal security system and then decide how multilateral defence arrangements might be fitted into this general scheme. The role of P.J.B.D. should likewise be considered in this context.

It seems to me that this line of argument invites a prolonged postponement on the part of Canadian Defence Departments to make a decision, even of a tentative nature, on the possible role, and consequently the form of Canadian defence forces after the war. Such a decision, it must be admitted, is exceedingly difficult in view of the unknown factors to which Mr. Reid refers and also because much of our planning to a large extent depends on decisions by the Great Powers.

However, it is at least not premature to apply the lessons of the present war to a consideration of the defence relationships between Canada and the United States in the next ten years or so. Of these, one of the most important is the development of close co-operation between the land, sea and air forces in mobile combat groups. The merging of land and air warfare seems to be particularly applicable to the problem of defence of North America with its great expanses and transport problems.

It seems to be especially important that this should be given consideration as it would affect decisions regarding the numbers of personnel, and the amount and types of equipment required in the post-war period in all three services, but especially in the army and air forces whose functions will inevitably become more closely inter-related in Canadian defence. The new techniques of army-air co-operation, moreover, would require a degree of training and skill which could hardly be attained by militia personnel, which suggests another factor which would have to be considered.

The development in the technology of warfare also suggests that the references in the P.H.P. draft to static defence should be more clearly defined. There would, of course, be certain static defence installations, but it would seem undesirable to encourage thinking in terms of coastal defences and air bases being manned by units of the Canadian Permanent Force when the security of such bases could perhaps best be assured through the appropriate disposition of airborne and other mobile forces.

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire, l'ambassade aux États-Unis

Memorandum by First Secretary, Embassy in United States

SECRET [Washington,] June 29, 1944

CANADA'S POSTWAR DEFENCE
RELATIONSHIP WITH THE UNITED STATES

1. The framework of our postwar security policy has been clearly laid down by the Prime Minister —

"The peace of the world depends on preserving on the side of peace a large superiority of power so that those who wish to disturb the peace can have no chance of success. . . [We must] aim at attaining the necessary superiority of power by creating an effective international system inside which the cooperation of all peace-loving countries is freely sought and given. . . a system which would involve for its effectiveness firm commitments by all peace-loving states to do their share in preserving peace". (January 31, 1944)

The course which the Canadian government should take in pursuing this security policy as defined by the Prime Minister is, I think, clear. We should first of all do our best to help in the establishment of a universal general security system. Then we should decide how far regional (multilateral not bilateral) security arrangements can wisely and usefully be fitted into that universal system. Only then can we decide whether there is any useful role for the P.J.B.D. to play. Since the Board is a permanent advisory body it will, in all likelihood, remain in existence but, if it has little or no useful role to play, it ought to become dormant.

2. In discussing the postwar role of the P.J.B.D. it is misleading to attempt to draw too close a parallel between the situation which existed in 1940-41, when Defence Plan ABC 22 was drawn up by the service members of the P.J.B.D., and the situation which is likely to exist after the war. Then the enemies were known. After the war the potential attackers on North America will not be known. We could, of course, draw up defence plans based on the possibility of attacks from Germany and Japan but this, it seems to me, if taken literally, is preparing for this war not the next. What would probably happen is that the plans would be drawn up on the assumption that the U.S.S.R. was allied to either or both Japan or Germany.

3. It is just because the plans would be either remote from reality or drawn up on that assumption, that I think it would be dangerous for Canada to participate with the U.S. in framing them. "Could Canada, situated as she is geographically between the United States and the Soviet Union, and at the same time a member of the British Commonwealth, (of which the principal member, the United Kingdom, has a twenty-year treaty of alliance with the U.S.S.R.) for one moment give support to such an idea?"

4. Canada is a buffer state between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. A buffer state becomes a client state if it makes bilateral defence arrangements with only one of its great neighbours. If we go in for bilateral arrangements, and wish to avoid becoming a client state of the United States, we will have to make bilateral arrangements with the U.K. and with the U.S.S.R. The better plan would be to make no bilateral defence arrangements but, if security arrangements are necessary and desirable beyond those contained in the overall international security organization, then to enter into a north Pacific regional pact (U.S.S.R., U.S.A., Canada and possibly China), and a north Atlantic regional pact (U.S.S.R., U.K., U.S.A., Canada and the Scandinavian countries).

5. It is dangerously misleading to attempt to oversimplify the problem by asking what could Canada do if the world-shaking tragedy of a U.S.-U.S.S.R. war occurred. By not becoming a client state of the U.S., by pushing for an effective international security organization and, if necessary, effective regional security organizations, we will make that tragedy less likely.

6. There are, of course, additional measures which we can suggest or initiate for removing possible causes of suspicion and friction between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. We can, for example, take the positive step of supporting or, if necessary, initiating proposals for the formation of joint airline companies to fly the great strategic routes leading from the United States to the U.S.S.R. over Canada. We can take the negative step (already indicated by the discussions on Canol and on other U.S. defence projects in Canada) of refusing to the U.S. any continuing preferential postwar rights in defence facilities in Canada. We can cooperate intensively with the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. in joint studies of the problems of our Arctic regions. We can take every possible precaution against entering into U.S.-Canada fisheries arrangements in the north Pacific which would be repugnant to the U.S.S.R.

7. Speculation now on what our policy should or would be if a U.S. — U.S.S.R. war broke out would not serve any useful purpose. There are too many unknowns, too many contingencies. It is highly probable that public opinion in the U.K. would be badly split — mainly on class and party lines —, and hitherto Canadian public opinion has never become reasonably united on a declaration of war unless Great Britain was a belligerent. (This might not, however, continue to be true in a decade or two.) Europe might be largely pro-Soviet in its sympathies. This would have some effect on Canada. Public opinion in Canada would undoubtedly be divided, the war party securing perhaps its greatest strength among those sections of the population which are least keen on this war. The kind of belligerent activities which would be conducted, at least in the early stages of the war, is largely unknown. They might conceivably be such that we could try to make Canada a chastity belt as the result of agreements with the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. The pressure in the U.S. to walk rough-shod over Canada would be great; but the U.S. would be restrained — especially in the early stages of the war — by the fear that by so doing they would risk exchanging the probability of "all support short of war" for the vitual certainty of sullen non-cooperation from a large part of the Canadian people. There is always some hope at the beginning of a war that saner counsels may prevail, and a Canada that remained neutral might be able to do something to assist in restoring reason in Washington and Moscow before the war had reached its final stage of competition in the utter destruction of what remains worth cherishing in this world.

SECRET Ottawa, July 6, 1944

Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States: Preliminary Report. The Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems presents for the consideration of the Cabinet War Committee the following preliminary report on post-war defence relations between Canada and the United States. This report is based on a paper prepared by the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems which has been considered and revised by the Advisory Committee. The Working Committee has asked for guidance on the tentative conclusions expressed in this paper in order to assist them in more detailed studies.

1. This aspect of Canadian defence policy cannot be considered in isolation. There are three important lines of approach to the consideration of Canadian military policy after the war, each of which is closely related to the other two. These are:

(a) Canadian participation in the static defence of the North American continent;

(b) The Canadian relationship to the defence of the British Commonwealth and especially of Great Britain; and

(c) the military obligations which may be assumed by Canada as a member of the new world security organization.

2. Canadian defence arrangements with the United States relate especially to the first of these three aspects. If the plans are fulfilled to develop the present alliance against Germany and Japan into a permanent security organization, in which the United States is an active partner, the third aspect will in part merge with the first, because the employment of facilities on Canadian territory, especially air and naval installations, will be essential in order to ensure the rapid deployment of forces from North America against an aggressor in Europe or Northeastern Asia. Hence, facilities in Canada will be required both for static defence and to meet aggression or the threat of aggression outside North America.

3. The connection between the defence of the British Commonwealth and Canadian defence arrangements with the United States is perhaps not as close. The common standards of training and equipment maintained by United Kingdom and Canadian forces, however, ensure that for a period of years at least Canadian military policy will be greatly influenced by developments in the United Kingdom, quite apart from the political considerations arising from membership in the British Commonwealth.

4. Long range planning must be based on an appreciation of the dangers of attack in the case of static defence and of the probable enemies in the case of a general war. It cannot be projected far into the future and it is suggested that a period of ten years from the defeat of Japan might be accepted as the basis for Canadian planning; it is recommended, however, that this period should be kept under constant review, and should be modified or confirmed by the Government annually in the light of the general international situation. Provided that complete victory is won and that it is followed by thorough disarmament of Germany and Japan, it may safely be assumed that there is no danger of attack on North America during the ten years after the war. Even if tension were to become acute between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S., the problems of recovery and development in the U.S.S.R. are so great that the possibility of warfare between these two Great Powers during the next decade is extremely remote.

5. Although on present prospects Canadian planning for the ten years after the war need not emphasize the possibility of attack on North America or of the outbreak of war between the U.S. and U.S.S.R., there will be considerable military needs to be met by the United Nations during all or part of that period. In the first place, the aftermath of the war may leave in parts of Europe and Asia conditions of local disturbance requiring the presence of Allied forces to prevent relapse into anarchy. Secondly, considerable forces will be needed for the policing of Germany and Japan so that the terms of surrender may be enforced. Thirdly, during that decade the new system of world security should be in process of development, and Canada and other countries will be expected to maintain military establishments large enough to make a proportionate contribution to the forces available for employment in the interests of general security.

6. Before a more comprehensive report is prepared on postwar defence arrangements with the U.S., it would be of assistance to ascertain whether the argument of paragraphs 1-5 is generally acceptable and whether the following preliminary conclusions are concurred in by the Cabinet War Committee:

(a) Canada and the United States will continue after the war to consult and cooperate on defence matters along the lines developed since the establishment of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence in 1940. The P.J.B.D. will be maintained as part of the machinery for joint defence planning.

(b) Canada will not be willing to permit the United States to provide and maintain defence installations in Canadian territory. Canada will itself provide, maintain and operate all such installations, with the possible exception of facilities installed by international agreement in special cases.

(c) Requirements in men, material, airfields, coastal defences, naval bases, radar, etc. for the defence of Canada will be influenced by the assessment in Washington of threats to North American security. The possibility of renewed aggression by Germany or Japan will be one factor in this assessment. It is not improbable, however, that the means of meeting possible attack by the U.S.S.R. will be an important element in defence planning in the United States.

(d) Because of this Canada may be subjected to pressure to undertake defence commitments of considerable magnitude which might become a source of friction between Canada and the U.S.S.R., as constituting a threat to the security of the U.S.S.R. Canadian defence arrangements with the United States will, therefore, be greatly influenced by the general character of the relations between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R.; the maintenance of good relations between those two countries is a matter of great importance to the defence of Canada.

(e) It is, therefore, greatly in the national interest that Canadian defence arrangements with the United States should fall into place as part of a general system of world security.

4. Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States

The Chairman invited Colonel Jenkins to inform the Committee of the result of his talks in Washington on this paper,† to which reference had been made by Colonel Collinson at the previous meeting. Colonel Jenkins explained that these were informal talks arranged by General Pope with representatives of the War and State Departments. He had learned that the War Department had prepared a paper playing down the possibility of a direct clash between the United States and the U.S.S.R. It was not thought that warfare between these two countries was likely, especially in the North West Pacific area, although it was admitted that there might be some friction, and political pressure leading to the increase of defensive military establishments in the North West Pacific area which would affect Canada. If any clash came it was more likely to arise out of a general war involving other countries also, in Europe or in Asia. The Chairman agreed with these views reported by Colonel Jenkins, but felt that it would not alter the fact that the planning of the Working Committee should take into account the possibility that requests might be made by the United States for increased defence facilities in the North West, arising out of political pressures or public agitation or as a form of strategic reinsurance. Discussion revealed agreement on this point.

The Chairman referred to the use of the word "static" defence in the paper and asked whether this covered plans for maintaining highly mobile forces, such as air-borne troops, for use in meeting possible attacks on national territory. The term "static" might give the impression that it related to the defence of naval and air bases by garrison establishments. Colonel Jenkins agreed that the use of this term might give rise to some misunderstanding, but explained that while certain naval bases, and more recently air bases, required local defence forces, the principal reliance was upon a general reserve which would be mobile. He agreed that this point might be made more clear.

The Chairman also referred to the question of postwar role of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. There was some difference of opinion as to its usefulness. Discussion revealed that there was general agreement that the Board was particularly useful as a place where joint staff talks could be held in an informal manner, and that the Board's authority to make recommendations direct to the President and the Cabinet was also valuable in certain contingencies.

Colonel Jenkins suggested that the discussion of this subject at this and the previous meeting, as well as in the Advisory Committee, indicated that it might be advisable to start the paper afresh rather than to try a detailed revision of the existing draft. This was agreed, and also that a new draft of the paper would be prepared by the Service members for early discussion by the Committee.

POSTWAR DEFENCE RELATIONS, CANADA-UNITED STATES

7. THE ACTING SECRETARY submitted a memorandum, copies of which had been circulated, from the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems, on postwar defence arrangements with the United States.

The memorandum described considerations affecting the formulation of Canadian defence policy in North America for the period immediately following the war, and drew certain preliminary conclusions which, if approved, would be used as a base for further studies.

(Report to War Committee from the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems, July 6, 1944 — C.W.C. document 823).

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE pointed out that the memorandum assumed there would be no danger of an attack on North America for ten years after the war and suggested that the views of the U.S. Chiefs of Staff, on this point, be ascertained.

9. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the views of the U.S. Chiefs of Staff, regarding the point raised by the Minister of National Defence, be ascertained;

(b) that the balance of the memorandum be approved, subject to the following amendment;

Paragraph 6 (c) to be omitted and subsequent paragraphs to read as follows:

"6 (c) Canadian defence arrangements with the United States will be greatly influenced by the general character of the relations between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. The maintenance of good relations between those two countries is a matter of great importance to the defence of Canada.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au chargé d'affaires aux États-Unis

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Chargé d'Affaires in United States

SECRET Ottawa, July 19, 1944

Dear Mr. Pearson,

With your letter of June 29th† you enclosed a memorandum by Mr. Reid[71] commenting on a Report of the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems of June 16th entitled "Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States: Preliminary Paper." We were very glad to have these comments and we shall look forward to having your own views when you have time to put them down.

The Preliminary Paper of June 16th† was considered by the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems at a meeting of July 4th. As a result of the discussions at this meeting, changes were made in the paper. These changes are explained in the minutes of the meeting of July 4th† which are being sent to you under separate cover. I am enclosing a copy of the Paper as it has been revised in the form of a memorandum for the Cabinet War Committee.

You will notice from the minutes of the meeting of the Working Committee of July 13th† that the point raised by Mr. Reid with regard to the use of the term "static defence" was discussed by the Committee. While the force of Mr. Reid's point was recognized, it was felt that the term "static defence" had a technical significance which made its use proper in this connection. The paper will have, of course, a very limited circulation. The insertion of a new paragraph 5 was intended to remove any illusions about the possibilities of passive security behind a "static" defence.

There is some reference in paragraphs 26 and 27 of the Paper of May 26th† to the problems concerned with the standards of training and equipment to be used in Canada. This is a matter of some importance, but it will, as you have noted in the margin, depend almost entirely on politico-defence relationships.

As for the possibilities of war between the three Great Powers in the next two years or so, it may be somewhat overconfident to describe them as

"extremely remote" but I am inclined to agree with your comment to the effect that a breakdown of good relations would mean isolation, for some years at least, because of general exhaustion and war-weariness.

In his comment number (2) on paragraph 5, Mr. Reid suggests that a P.J.B.D. with the Soviet Union might be established in order to prevent distrust in the U.S.S.R. of defence measures Canada might take as a result of her purely bilateral defence relationship with the United States. While in theory we should perhaps be prepared to establish similar relations with the Soviet Union to those established with the United States, it does not seem probable that in the near future the Soviet Union would be prepared to share with us its defence planning in the way in which the United States collaborates with us in the P.J.B.D.

As you will have learned from the Minutes of the meeting of the Working Committee of July 13th, a new version of the Paper on Defence Relationships with the United States is being prepared. We shall send you a copy of this when it is ready.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

SECRET IMPORTANT

Washington, August 5, 1944

COS from CJS. Your CSC TS 545 26 July.†

1. . . Matter of Advisory Committee's tentative assumption has been informally discussed with:

(a) A U.S. member of the PJBD whose judgment merits respect. His general reactions was that the Canadian assumption has been drawn up somewhat conservatively.

(b) A member of the U.S. Strategic Survey Committee (a board of senior officers set up in 1942 to advise the US Joint Chiefs of Staff on both long and short-term strategic problems.) This officer's reaction was not unfavourable. He pointed out, however, that while the U.S. service and other authorities saw no reason whatever why within the predictable future, the United States and Russia should go to war with each other, there lurked in their minds the possibility of war breaking out between the United Kingdom and Russia in which circumstances the United States feared that they would once again find themselves drawn into a major war in support of the United Kingdom. Their appreciation of such a possibility was that both they and the United Kingdom would be thrown out of Europe and that in such circumstances, or in any circumstances the two great western powers would be unable to bring about the defeat of Russia. Speaking purely from himself the officer under reference said he would be prepared, as the saying goes, to go along with the tentative assumption though he thought it probable that the US Joint COS in their reply would qualify their agreement by inserting the immediately foregoing as a proviso.

(c) The Deputy Chief of Staff of a service department. His reaction was immediate and categorical. He thought it extremely unlikely that the U.S. Joint COS would be disposed officially to state their agreement with the tentative assumption. The United States services both were hoping and planning to make compulsory military service a feature of the postwar period. They certainly proposed to retain a powerful navy. As for their land and air forces they proposed to remain in a position which would enable them rapidly and at any time to mobilize an army and air force of four and one-half million men. To achieve this policy they would be dependent on Congress. This being so it would be most unwise on their part officially to subscribe themselves to the proposition that the possibility of a major war during the first decade of the postwar period was extremely remote. For if word of this ever reached the ears of Congress the hopes they now cherished and planned to achieve would be dashed against the rocks. We were left in no doubt whatever under this head.

2. . . . In these circumstances we suggest that the information requested in the last paragraph of your instructions under reference has in a fair measure been obtained and that you concur in this our suggestion that this question be not officially presented to the U.S. Joint COS.

6. Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States

(a) It was reported that most of the members of the Advisory Committee had agreed to accept General Pope's interpretation of the views of the United States' Chiefs of Staff on the prospect of a 10-year period during which there would be no danger of attack on the North American Continent. It was suggested that Commander MacTavish should secure the views of the Chief of the Naval Staff, who had not yet expressed an opinion, and then discuss with the Secretary of the War Committee an early report on the matter to the War Committee in order that the reservations placed upon the acceptance of the Advisory Committee's paper might be removed.

(b) The meeting proceeded to consider the Army paper† on defence arrangements with the United States.

Mr. Macdonnell suggested a revision of paragraph 22 on the P.J.B.D. in order to separate two points: (1) the desirability of coordination and (2) the machinery to carry it out. The meeting recommended that the drafting group consider the two paragraphs proposed by Mr. Macdonnell.

There was some further discussion concerning the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. Mr. Wrong said it was important to recognise that the Board was a piece of machinery and not a regional system of defence, as had been suggested in the paper. It was a useful piece of machinery, as it made it possible to thrash matters out at this level. Col. Collinson asked concerning the differences between discussions at this level and discussions through diplomatic channels. Mr. Wrong and Mr. Macdonnell described the difficulties of getting service people in Washington around a table in this way, especially in view of the inter-departmental jealousies which existed. The suggestion had been made that civilians should be dropped from the Board. There was general agreement in the Committee that although it might be advisable to make changes in the present civilian chairmen, nevertheless it was useful to have the State Department and External Affairs represented. Mr. Wrong pointed out that it was useful to have the State Department and the United States service departments on the Board if for no other reason than that their representation made it necessary for the differences between the various departments to be worked out or at least exposed. It was agreed that the paper should include a recommendation that the Board continue to include representatives of the services and the respective foreign offices.

On the recommendation of Mr. Wrong and Mr. Macdonnell it was agreed to ask the drafting group to reconsider paragraphs 26 and 27 and paragraph 29-f. The advisability of reaching any specific conclusions in this study as to the relations which should exist between the Canadian and United Kingdom or other Commonwealth services was questioned. This whole subject was being considered in another paper[72] and should not be prejudged in a paper dealing with relations with the United States. In the course of the discussions, the view was expressed that a choice between close service relations with the United States and with the United Kingdom may not arise because closer service relations may be established between those two countries themselves. The desirability was also foreseen of arranging, among other things, for an interchange of personnel with staff colleges in both countries.

Lt. Commander Hodgson suggested that in paragraphs 5 and 6 some mention should be made of the view previously expressed that the danger of hostilities with Russia would be more likely to arise through the outbreak of war in Europe and Asia rather than in the form of a Russian attack upon North America.

Lt. Commander Hodgson also suggested changes in Paragraph 25 with respect to Newfoundland. In this paragraph it was stated that Canada should accept responsibility for the defences of Newfoundland and adjacent territories on a scale commensurate with the joint needs of Canada and the United States. The United States, however, had leased bases in Newfoundland, which were also in part a United States responsibility; some reference should be made to this fact. The Planning Group was asked to take this recommendation into consideration.

Mr. Wrong stated that he thought that a better case could be made for the continuance of military preparations in Canada during the 10-year "safe period" than was made in paragraph 4. He thought it better to connect the need in the immediate post-war period with (1) the uncertainty of conditions in Europe and Asia which might require some action even if not an engagement in a major war and (2) Canadian commitments to the world security organization.

The advisability of referring to the 10-year "safe period" was raised. It was agreed that the meaning attached to this period should be carefully defined. Mr. Wrong suggested that it might be useful to establish a procedure by which every year some body similar to the Advisory Committee might send to the Government an assessment of the period during which there seemed to be little danger of war. This would be based both on diplomatic and military opinions.

Mr. Macdonnell said that paragraph 21[73] was a condensation of a much longer paragraph in a previous paper†. He though it might be expanded and proposed a draft revision.

recommended that Bermuda and the West Indies be included in 2 (iii) of the Summary as places recognized as vital to the defence of the United States. Mr. Heeney suggested an amendment of 3 (d) of the Summary as well as paragraphs 18 and 21 (d)[76] of the Report. Canada at the time of the Bases Agreement[77] acknowledged that defence of Newfoundland and Labrador was an integral part of the defence of Canada. Canadian responsibility for the defence of their territories however, could not be treated on the same basis as responsibility for their defence of Canada, and the position of Newfoundland and Labrador should be the subject of a separate recommendation. The Committee agreed that after changes along these lines had been made, the Report should be submitted to the War Committee.

POST-WAR CANADIAN DEFENCE RELATIONSHIP WITH THE UNITED STATES: GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

At the request of General Murchie, the Chiefs of Staff Committee, at their meeting of December 29th, gave some further consideration to paper CPHP (44) Report 5 (Final).

The discussion on this occasion was centered chiefly about two particular questions:

(a) Whether or not there was good reason for the assumption — "That for several years at least there will be no direct military threat to North America;" and,

(b) Should some reference be made to the continuing need for exchanging technical information on military research and development, and for the provision of suitable facilities for this purpose.

The Chiefs of Staff had individually felt some apprehension regarding the assumption referred to above. It will be recalled that Admiral Jones had mentioned this at the meeting of the Advisory Committee held on July 4th and, as a result of his objections, some modification of the clause in its original form was accepted. It was, moreover, chiefly this assumption which prompted Air Marshal Leckie, who had himself been unable to attend the meetings on July 4th and October 25th, to ask that there be further discussion of this paper before it was finally approved for submission to War Committee. When, therefore, the matter of reference to the exchange of technical information was put forward, the Chiefs of Staff took the opportunity of re-examining other passages of the paper and, as a result, they agreed that the assumption in question was not an essential part of the paper and would be better omitted. Accordingly, I have been instructed to convey the suggestion to the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems that paper CPHP (44) Report 5 (Revised Final) be amended in the following manner before it is put before War Committee for their approval,—

It is necessary, however, that the means to meet any such threat should be available during this period.

(c) Add as sub-para (g) to para 3, page 1, and to para 21,[79] page 6 that the exchange of technical information on Military research and development between Canada and the United States should continue and that Canada should maintain the means of making an effective contribution to such exchange.

Since the basis for exchange of technical information must be mutual, it is necessary that adequate technical establishments staffed by well-trained scientists and research personnel be maintained in Canada, capable of undertaking independent research and development of a high quality, the results of which would be available as a basis for the exchange of such information.

(e) Re-number paras 20 and 21 to 21 and 22[81] respectively.

SECRET Ottawa, January 3, 1945

You will doubtless see the memorandum which the Secretary of the Chiefs of Staff Committee sent to the Secretary of the Advisory Committee on P.H.P. on January 2nd concerning the paper before the War Committee on defence relationships with the United States. I think that the amendments proposed by the Chiefs of Staff Committee are not in substance open to objection but that some change in form is needed to two of them for drafting reasons. The amendments numbered (c) and (d) and the consequential amendment (e) are in my opinion improvements to the paper and should certainly be incorporated. Amendment (b) to paragraph 3 on page 2 of the paper, however, seems illogical as drafted. The paragraph states that "it may be assumed that for several years there will be no direct military threat to the North American continent" and the Chiefs of Staff propose that an additional sentence should be added saying that we must make available the means "to meet any such threat." I suggest that the second sentence of this paragraph be amended to read as follows: "Whether or not this is so, for several years any direct military threat to the North American continent is unlikely in view of the exhaustion and war weariness of the nations of the world." Then the addition suggested by the Chiefs of Staff can follow at the end of the paragraph.

Following on this I think their amendment (a) which proposes the omission of any reference to this assumption in the summary on page 1 might also be revised. Instead of omitting paragraph 1 (ii) entirely it might be changed to read "that for several years at least a direct military threat to North America is unlikely."

It is relevant, however, to point out that in the short paper which was approved by the War Committee last June or July called "Post-War Defence Arrangements with the United States — Preliminary Paper"[82] the following sentences appeared in paragraph 4.

"Provided that complete victory is won and that it is followed by thorough disarmament of Germany and Japan, it may safely be assumed that there is no danger of attack on North America during the ten years after the war. Even if tension were to become acute between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S., the problems of recovery and development in the U.S.S.R. are so great that the possibility of warfare between these two Great Powers during the next decade is extremely remote."

2. I think their views can best be summed up by quoting the remarks of Air Marshal Leckie, who has written

"I still feel that there is grave danger in accepting as an assumption for Post-War planning any statement which suggests that there will not, or might not, be any military threat to North America over a period of time after the close of hostilities. However, as there appear to be strong opinions to the contrary, and as the changes suggested by Mr. Wrong constitute a compromise, I am prepared to accept these changes to the recommendations made by the Chiefs of Staff Committee."

3. I should not fail to add in this connection that General Murchie telephoned me to say that he was prepared to agree with your version provided the sentence, "It is necessary, however, that the means to meet any such threat should be available during this period," be also included at the end of para 1 (ii) in the summary of the paper in question.

4. As you are aware, Mr. Heeney desires to include this item in the agenda for next Monday's meeting of the Cabinet War Committee and to circulate the agenda and relevant papers by 12 o'clock noon tomorrow. If you are agreeable to General Murchie's further amendment, might 14 copies of the revised paper be furnished Mr. Heeney by then.

POSTWAR DEFENCE RELATIONSHIPS WITH THE UNITED STATES

8. THE SECRETARY, referring to a report of the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems on this subject, recalled that consideration of this paper had been deferred so that members of the War Committee might have further time for its examination.

Meantime, at the request of the Minister of National Defence, an amendment had been made so as to provide for the exchange of technical information on military research and technical development between Canada and the United States. Copies of the report had been circulated.

(Committee's report — C.P.H.P. (44) report (final — second revision) Jan. 4, 1945 — C.W.C. document 917).†

9. THE PRIME MINISTER made a number of suggestions for amendment of certain passages in the report.

Insufficient emphasis had been given to the importance of Canada's positive contribution to peace in fostering and maintaining good international relations. This was a central principal of Canadian external policy; we were too small and vulnerable to rely solely on defence arrangements.

The "permanency" of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence had already been recognized. Reference to the Board's continuance should accord with this decision. Alterations should also be made in the references to responsibility for Newfoundland defence and in the conclusion concerning possible sources of friction.

10. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS pointed out that the object of the paper was generally to indicate objectives which, in the opinion of the government's advisers, constituted desirable elements of Canadian policy on this subject. The conclusions of the paper were submitted, not as a basis for present commitments but rather as a delineation of policy upon which departments might formulate specific proposals at a later stage.

11. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE stressed the importance of technical research in the military sphere in collaboration with the United States. The Department was very anxious to obtain a definition of policy in this respect.

12. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further considerable discussion, agreed that the paper be referred back to the Advisory Committee for revision in the light of the observations made, and that, thereafter, it be submitted to the Cabinet for consideration.

2. Post-war Canadian Defence Relationship with the United States: General Considerations, C.P.H.P. (44) Report 5 (Final Second Revision), January 4th†

The Chairman invited Mr. Heeney to summarize the views of the War Committee on this paper. Mr. Heeney explained that there had been no disposition on the part of the War Committee to disagree with the main contents of the Report. There was some doubt, however, as to the purpose of this paper. It was not clear whether it was intended to recommend certain commitments to be accepted by the Government, or to be a general statement of policy. The Prime Minister, moreover, had expressed the view that Canada could not depend on defence arrangements for their security, but must primarily rely on the establishment of an international system of security. Emphasis, therefore, should be placed on the Canadian contribution to the peaceful settlement of international problems.

The Chairman explained that the paper was intended to recommend a general line of policy and not to furnish a basis for specific commitments. The appropriate Departments would have to work out recommendations with respect to the application of proposals covered in a general manner in the paper. He thought that it might be necessary to prepare a covering paper containing a projection of the long-range political considerations governing Canadian external policy, and that the specific studies on defence relationships with the United States, the Commonwealth, etc. would have to be related to this paper. This would bring these P.H.P. studies into better perspective and explain their purpose.

General Pope raised the question of the time element and the priority to be allotted to the respective studies, and wondered whether, for instance, the United States and Newfoundland papers would be held up pending the preparation of the covering paper, which might take as much as six months. Mr. Wrong thought that the covering paper need not take as long as six months; he also suggested that perhaps an appropriate amendment of the United States defence paper might meet the Prime Minister's point, so that the paper could be promptly approved. General Pope read out a suggested amendment which he thought might be included as paragraph two of the Introduction, the ensuing paragraphs to be renumbered. It was agreed that an amendment along these lines should be included.

Mr. Heeney said that another point to which the Prime Minister referred related to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. The permanence of this body was not in question, and this should be made clear in the paper. Accordingly paragraph 22(b) of the Conclusions[83] was amended to read that the Permanent Joint Board on Defence "will continue to be a valuable means of . . .;" instead of "should be retained as a valuable means . . .," other relevant passages in the paper to be amended accordingly.

As regards the other conclusions of the paper, Mr. Heeney said that it was thought that 22(c) might require modification. The possibility of friction with the United States arising out of differing views towards matters within the Continent should not be ruled out. Mr. Wrong pointed out that this conclusion was intended to summarize paragraphs 4 and 15[84] which made the point rather more clearly. It was agreed that this conclusion should be redrafted to accord more closely to these paragraphs, and also to bring out the possibility of intra-continental sources of friction as well as extra-continental sources.

As regards (d) it had been felt that, as stated, this conclusion and the relevant paragraph 18[85] seem to inflate the importance of local defence in relation to the defence of Canada. Here again it was important to bring out the dependence of Canada on an effective general system of security and its relations with other countries, especially the United States and the United Kingdom. It was agreed that appropriate revision would be made.

It had been felt in the War Committee that paragraph (e) seemed to imply that Canada would accept full and exclusive responsibility for the defence of Newfoundland. As this was not intended, it was agreed that the word "local" should be added before "defence" in the second line of this sub-paragraph. Similar amendments should be made in the relevant passages of the paper, including 3 (e) of the summary. It was agreed that conclusions (f) and (g) should remain unchanged.

Finally it was agreed that in addition to the amendments noted, an explanation of the purpose of the paper should be added. Also wherever the word "must" occurred in the recommendations in the paper the word "should" ought to be substituted. It was agreed that Captain MacTavish and Mr. Ignatieff, in consultation with General Pope, should make a revision of the paper in the light of the discussion, and that this paper, together with the one on Post-war Defence of Newfoundland and Labrador,[86] should then be submitted to the War Committee.

Rapport final du Comité consultatif sur les problèmes de l'après-guerre
Final Report of Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems

SECRET [Ottawa, January/February 1945]

SUMMARY

1. The paper is based upon the following assumptions:—

i. It may be assumed that international problems arising from purely Canadian-United States relations are unlikely to bring about a conflict of policies serious enough to prejudice general friendly relations and that, therefore, any threatening difference of view would only be occasioned through differing attitudes towards events in other parts of the world. The possibility, however, of the United States being moved to exert undue pressure on Canada, particularly as respects matters of defence, should not be overlooked.

ii. That for several years at least a direct military threat to North America is unlikely, although the means to meet such a threat should be available during this period.

iii. That the victor nations, including the United States, will maintain larger armed forces than before the war to enforce peace.

2. The present war has brought about the following developments:—

i. Opinion in both countries has gone far towards recognizing that the two oceans no longer provide full protection for North America and that the ultimate security of the continent depends on the maintenance of peace in Europe and Asia.

ii. Adequate protection against air-borne attacks, — especially from the North, Northeast and Northwest, — has become an essential part of North American defences.

iii. The defence of Canada, Newfoundland, Alaska, Greenland, Iceland, Bermuda and the West Indies is recognized as vital to the defence of the United States.

Canada, Documents on the Relations between Canada and Newfoundland, Volume I, enclosure, Document 943.

iv. Neither Canada nor the United States is likely to reduce its defences to the pre-war level.

3. It is concluded:—

a. that the defences of Canada should be closely coordinated with those of the United States after the war;

b. that the Permanent Joint Board on Defence will continue to be a valuable means of facilitating this co-ordination;

c. that relations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. are of special concern to Canada;

d. that in joint planning with the United States, Canada should accept full responsibility for all such defence measures within Canadian territory as the moderate risk to which we are exposed may indicate to be necessary;

e. that Canada should continue to accept responsibility for the local defence of Newfoundland and Labrador, and that the part of the United States in the defence of these territories should be limited to the operation of their leased bases in Newfoundland;

f. that the new vulnerability of this Continent necessitates the maintenance of larger Canadian armed forces than before the war;

g. that the exchange of technical information on military research and development between Canada and the United States should continue and that Canada should maintain the means of making an effective contribution to such exchange.

Introduction

1. In view of the disparity between Canada's military strength and that of the Great Powers, the governing principle of Canadian policy should be to continue to foster and maintain good international relations, generally between all nations, particularly with the United States. Any policy which would create unfriendliness between the United States and Canada would, in the long run, be inimical to Canadian interests.

2. Although it is not possible at this stage to foretell the exact conditions under which Canadian-United States defence relations will operate in the post-war period, enough data are available to indicate the broad outline of the problems which Canada will be required to face.

3. It may be assumed that international problems arising from purely Canadian-United States relations are unlikely to bring about a conflict of policies serious enough to prejudice general friendly relations, and that, therefore, any threatening difference of view would only be occasioned through differing attitudes towards events in other parts of the world. The possibility, however, of the United States being moved to exert undue pressure on Canada, particularly as respects matters of defence, should not be overlooked.

4. It is probable that after the war, a world security organization will be set up. Whether or not this is so, for several years any direct military threat to the North American continent is unlikely in view of the exhaustion and war weariness of the nations of the world. It is necessary, however, that the means to meet such a threat should be available during this period.

5. Nevertheless, the victor nations will have to retain considerably larger armed forces than before the war to police Germany and Japan, and to provide a reserve capable of maintaining peace, by force if necessary. The policy of any future world organization for the preservation of peace is certain to be based on military action as a last resort, but to be effective this instrument must be ready for instant use when required. There appears to be general agreement that the maintenance of adequate forces by the victor nations must be an essential element in the world security system.

6. It may [be] assumed, therefore, that, although there will be virtually no risk of general war for some years, military preparation within the United Nations will not be allowed to fall into neglect, and that the United States will not again allow its military power to become so far out of step with its world interests as before this present war.

Current Situation

7. In the past, Canadian "defence" planning has been based on a strong British Navy, and on the premise that the United States would be a benevolent neutral if not an ally in the event of Canada being at war. Developments of this war have not changed these two fundamentals, but other factors have come into being necessitating a review of certain aspects of Canada's defence planning particularly vis-à-vis the United States.

8. Because of the belief in the immunity of attack to the North American continent provided by the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and the control exercised by the British and United States Navies, planning for defence against attack on the United States or Canada was considered of minor importance. Both countries could count on adequate time to prepare for war after the actual outbreak of hostilities. While these conditions held, there was no liaison between Canada and the United States for mutual defence planning — there was no apparent need for it.

9. The present war has changed these conditions, and the defence problems of Canada and the United States must now be considered as inter-dependent. While it may be held that the East and West coastal areas are still relatively immune from major attack (as long as the British and United States Navies are in being, which will continue to be a basic assumption), the development of air power has diminished the physical isolation of the North American continent by opening up the northern approaches. Defence planning must be re-oriented to take this into account.

10. Canada, lying across the shortest air routes from either Europe or Asia, has now become of more direct strategic importance to the United States. Consciousness of the need for close co-ordination in defence began to grow even before the war, but it was the fall of France that forcibly brought to the fore the need for practical action. Thus, at a time when the defeat of Britain seemed possible, and with Canada at war but the United States at peace, the Canada-United States Permanent Joint Board on Defence was established.

11. The essential importance of Newfoundland and the Maritimes to the security of both Canada and the United States was fully recognized in the earliest meetings of the Board. At the first meeting, as a direct result of its recommendations, Canada agreed to despatch further forces to Newfoundland and to undertake further defence measures there. One of the main topics of the second meeting of the Board was the defence of the Maritime Provinces. Eventually, following the recommendation of the Board, a joint defence plan was evolved by the Service members and accepted by the Governments of both countries.

12. Nearly all the tasks set out in this plan involved measures to be implemented in Canada, Newfoundland and Alaska. It is possible that if Canada had not been able to carry out the defence measures required on Canadian territory the United States would have done so, even though the United States was not then at war.

13. This attitude of the United States became more apparent after the entry of that country into the war. If Canada had refused or failed to undertake projects which formed part of United States plans (such as the Crimson Air Staging Route), or measures in Canadian territory for the special protection of the United States (e.g. the Radar Chain across Northern Ontario to protect industrial installations in the mid-continent), the United States was willing and even anxious to proceed alone. As time went on, it became increasingly apparent that the existence of major military installations in Canada built, paid for and operated by the United States might impair Canada's freedom of action. This difficulty has been mitigated, if not eliminated, by the Canadian Government's decision, agreed to by the United States, to reimburse the United States for construction costs of all airfields and certain other facilities of continuing value erected in Canada by the United States.

14. Thus, developments in the present war have brought about a new set of defence relationships between Canada and the United States of which the following are the most significant:

(a) Opinion in both countries has gone far towards recognizing that the two oceans do not provide full protection for North America from attack, and further that the ultimate security of the continent depends on the maintenance of peace in Europe and Asia.

(b) Both the United States and Canada have accepted the fact that in addition to protection against seaborne attack they must have adequate protection against airborne attack, especially from the North, Northeast and Northwest.

(c) Canada along with Newfoundland, Alaska, Greenland, Iceland, Bermuda and the West Indies will continue to be vital to the defence of the United States. As aviation develops the northern routes will increasingly become world commercial highways. By the same token they will become potential routes for hostile powers with designs against the United States, and could conceivably be used by the United States for offensive purposes.

(d) Although no immediate threat of attack may be discerned, neither country is likely again to reduce its defences to the pre-war level.

Canadian Defence Policy in the Post-War Period

15. In the circumstances, the United States may be expected to take an active interest in Canadian defence preparations in the future. Moreover, that interest may be expressed with an absence of the tact and restraint customarily employed by the United Kingdom in putting forward defence proposals. Pressure along these lines will doubtless develop in accordance with the trend of United States post-war foreign policy. It is unlikely that isolationism in the United States will return to its traditional form, but is quite possible that it may develop as a militant form of continental defence-mindedness. If such is the case, the pressure on Canada to maintain defences at a higher level than would seem necessary from the point of view of purely Canadian interests might be very strong.

16. Since Canada lies astride the overland route between the United States and the U.S.S.R., any serious deterioration in their relations would be embarrassing to Canada. The best hope of Canada being able to avoid such embarrassments lies in the establishment of an effective world security organization in which the leading military powers actively co-operate to secure jointly the settlement of international disputes.

17. Whether there is a security organization or not, it is clear that defence planning for Canada and the United States should be co-ordinated. This co-ordination, which would in fact constitute a regional defence system, would not conflict with the purposes of the world security organization, but would take its place as part of a plan of universal security. In this way one part of the world would be better provided against outside attack, and would be available as a safe base from which punitive operations might be launched against a country attempting to break the peace.

18. To facilitate this co-ordination the Permanent Joint Board on Defence is an appropriate piece of machinery. Through the Board, representatives of two countries (the one great and the other relatively weak) meet together on an equal footing. It is quite conceivable that in the post-war period there may not be a great deal for the Board to do. Nevertheless, its mere existence is a useful public symbol of the mutual confidence which exists between Canada and the United States. Moreover, there is a great advantage in having available a body that can consider potentially controversial questions of defence before government policy in either country has become fixed. The Board will continue to be available to recommend joint defence plans, and as an agency to facilitate discussion and exchange of information.

Implications of the Policy

19. While the actual defence measures that will be required cannot be discussed at this point, there can be no doubt that, with or without world security obligations, Canada will be required to carry a greater peacetime defence commitment than ever before. It seems clear that in future it should be part of our policy to accept full responsibility for such measures of local

Canadian defence as the moderate nature of the risk to which we are exposed may indicate to be necessary. Furthermore, the general responsibility of Canada for the local defence of Newfoundland and Labrador has been recognized and accepted by the Canadian Government during the war as an inevitable consequence of their geographical proximity. It is desirable that the role of the United States in these territories should be limited to the security of their leased bases, particularly at Argentia and Stephenville, from the first named of which the more extended defence of the North-West Atlantic would be carried out.

20. This closer tie-up with the United States need not conflict with the Canadian tradition of basing military policy and training upon British practice. However, if Canada and the United States are to be efficient in the defence of North America, common experience between the national forces will be desirable in time of peace (e.g. the pooling of information and possibly the carrying out of occasional joint exercises).

21. Since the basis for exchange of technical information must be mutual, it is necessary that adequate technical establishments staffed by well-trained scientists and research personnel be maintained in Canada, capable of undertaking independent research and development of a high quality, the results of which would be available as a basis for the exchange of such information.

22. This closer liaison with the United States is in no sense an isolationist policy. If any single lesson has emerged from the present conflict, it is that no nation can ensure immunity from attack merely by erecting a defensive barrier around its frontiers. Canada's first lines of defence at the present time extend far out into the Pacific in the West and to Europe in the East. With the growth of air power, frontier defences have become less significant. It is not intended that Canada should base its defensive policy exclusively on collaboration with the United States. On the contrary, it is considered that Canada should accept a fair share of responsibility, in an international security organization along with the other Nations both inside and outside the Commonwealth.

CONCLUSIONS

23. It is concluded, therefore:

(a) that the defences of Canada should be closely co-ordinated with those of United States in the postwar period;

(b) that the Permanent Joint Board on Defence will continue to be a valuable means of facilitating this co-ordination and also as a medium for the informal discussion of mutual defence problems;

(c) that the source of major friction between Canada and the United States is more likely to grow out of differing views towards events outside this Continent. Particularly in view of Canada's geographic position astride the overland route between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R., Canadian defence arrangements with the United States will be greatly influenced by the general character of the relations between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R.;

(d) that in joint defence planning with the United States, Canada should accept full responsibility for all such defence measures within Canadian territory as the moderate risk to which we are exposed may indicate to be necessary;

(e) that Canada should continue to accept responsibility for the local defence of Newfoundland and Labrador, and that the part of the United States in the defence of these territories should be limited to the operation of their leased bases in Newfoundland;

(f) that because of the new vulnerability of the North American continent, quite apart from any obligations under a world security organization, Canada must accept increased defence responsibilities and maintain larger armed forces than before the war;

(g) that the exchange of technical information on military research and development between Canada and the United States should continue and that Canada should maintain the means of making an effective contribution to such exchange.

POSTWAR DEFENCE RELATIONSHIPS WITH THE UNITED STATES

11. THE SECRETARY submitted a final report of the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems revised by the Advisory Committee in the light of the observations made by the War Committee at the meeting of January 8th. Copies of the revised report had been circulated.

(Secretary's note, Jan. 23, 1945,† and attached final report of Advisory Committee — C.W.C. document 928).

12. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS, commenting on the report, pointed out that its acceptance by the War Committee would not imply specific commitments on the part of the government. It represented, rather, an analysis and appreciation of the principal factors involved.

The lines of policy recommended therein were consistent with the successful establishment of the proposed international security organization.

13. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE observed that the report indicated a general orientation of policy, approval of which would be of great assistance to the Services in guiding their postwar planning and ensuring that such planning was done on a uniform basis. All Service recommendations based thereon would, however, have to come before the War Committee for approval.

14. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, approved the report submitted.

PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE

In your talks with the President,[87] it may be that the Board will be discussed. You may therefore wish to have a note on the recent meetings held on June 14 and 15.

2. In addition to a number of routine matters there were two items of considerable long range interest raised by the United States Section:

(1) Continental defence value of the Canadian Northwest. The Journal reads:

"General Henry read a statement which initiated a general discussion of the continental defence value of the Canadian Northwest. It was noted that preliminary studies of this question were being undertaken by interested authorities of both governments and that concrete questions under this heading might be presented to the Board for consideration. It was the opinion of the Board that the studies being made were timely and of direct interest to it and that it might be profitable to discuss aspects of this matter further at future meetings."

It was clear from General Henry's presentation that the United States may in future decide to request Canada to undertake defence responsibilities, chiefly with respect to the Northwest Staging Route and related weather and communication facilities, which would give the United States a secure overland air link with their defences in Alaska and the Aleutians.

(2) Post-war collaboration. The Journal reads:

"The Board held a general discussion on the subject of closer postwar collaboration between the Armed Forces of the two governments. There was general agreement that it would be desirable to provide for combined Canada-United States staff talks at a future date and that the subject should be given further study."

General Henry pointed out that the United States was trying to get the governments of the Latin American Republics to adopt United States standards of equipment, organization and training. He went on to suggest that

The Prime Minister met President Truman in San Francisco on June 25.

"from a military standpoint there appears little doubt that our tactical and supply problems for the defence of North America would be greatly simplified if Canadian and United States forces had interchangeable munitions and were trained and organized in general along similar lines." An interesting discussion followed in which the Canadian members, while agreeing that there was much to be said in certain cases for hemisphere homogeneity, pointed out some of the difficulties presented by Canada's acceptance of British Commonwealth standards and methods.

3. These discussions emphasized two points made in the P.H.P. paper on Canadian defence relationship with the United States:

A — The United States may be expected to take an active interest in Canadian defence preparations in the future and may indeed exert pressure.

B — The Permanent Joint Board on Defence is a most useful body to consider potentially controversial questions of defence before government policy in either country has become fixed.

4. It is likely that important questions of post-war defence relationships will continue to come before the Board. Since the continued functioning of the Board is to Canada's interest (and also to that of the United States) it is to be hoped that it will have the support and encouragement of the President.

PEACETIME DEFENCES IN THE NORTHWEST

The first four conclusions of the P.H.P. paper on postwar Canadian defence relationships with the United States are as follows:

A — That the defence of Canada should be closely coordinated with those of the United States after the war.

B — That the Permanent Joint Board on Defence should be retained.

C — That relations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. are of special concern to Canada.

D — That Canada must accept full responsibility for defence measures within Canadian territory.

This skirts around but does not touch the problems created for Canada by serious tension between the United States and the U.S.S.R. The possibility should not be excluded of vigorous Russophobia in the United States after the war. This might not be shared by the Canadian Government and people which would lead us to want to avoid being considered a party to any anti-Soviet designs of the United States.

Developments in the Permanent Joint Board on Defence indicates a likelihood that Canada may be asked to join the United States after the war in maintaining defences in the Northwest. The most likely request would be to keep up the Northwest Staging Route and related weather and communications facilities (probably the Alaska Highway as well) so as to provide the United States with a secure and up to date air link between its continental territory and its northern defences in Alaska and the Aleutians. Such a request if it comes will raise squarely the question of whether Canada is prepared to give the United States the right to use Canadian territory and Canadian military installations in time of peace.

It may not have occurred to the War Department that Canada might object to granting such peacetime rights, yet this will not be an easy decision to make. It would mean that Canada was bound to follow in the wake of the United States which might place us in a difficult position with the Soviet Union. The alternative course of retaining complete freedom of action and granting the United States no peacetime rights would expose us to pressure from the United States that it might be difficult or impossible to resist.

The main advantage of retaining our freedom of action would be to attempt to exercise a moderating influence between the United States and the Soviet Union. This really means that we would have a chance to attempt to influence the United States for it is unrealistic to believe that in such a state of affairs the Soviet Union would pay much attention to Canadian views. We would barely resolve a polite hearing and our opinions could not be expected to have any real influence. With the United States on the other hand we can count on full and frank discussions and a genuine interchange of views. There is at least a reasonable possibility of being able to exercise some influence.

If as suggested above the United States should press strongly for peacetime rights in Canada it might prove impossible to resist the pressure. The best way then of retaining some possibility of exerting a restraining influence on the United States might be to work for joint planning of northern defences. (A regional defence plan under the World Security Organization might have some merit.) It is out of the question to suppose that the War and Navy Departments would give us anything like a veto right on their plans for the defence of Alaska and the Aleutians. Nevertheless, it is worth considering whether we could not grant peacetime military rights on condition that through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence the defences of the Northwest as a whole should be jointly planned. This would give us a foot in the door, an opportunity to express views as to the urgency or otherwise of defence measures proposed by the United States. An agreement of this sort might be made terminable on notice.

One drawback is, of course, that we would be linked either publicly or not so publicly with the United States and might appear as a satellite committed to whatever the United States might choose to do. It is doubtful whether this could be avoided in any event. Whether or not there is a Permanent Joint Board on Defence, whether or not there is a defence agreement between the two countries, it will be clear to the world that in any predictable crisis with the Soviet Union, Canada and the United States would join forces. It seems wise to accept this as a fact and build on it in such a way as to promote harmonious relations with the United States and at the same time to have some voice in or at least indication of their defence planning.

PEACETIME DEFENCES IN THE NORTHWEST[88]

With reference to your memorandum on peacetime defences in the Northwest, I am in general agreement with your arguments.

I do not think there can be any question of our retaining complete freedom of action in relation to the United States defence interest in Alaska and the northwest generally. It must be admitted at the outset that the position of mistrust, between the Soviet Union on the one hand and the United Kingdom and United States on the other, has solid foundations based upon the unhappy history in relations between Russia and the Western Powers between the two wars. It must be assumed, therefore, that the cooperation between the Soviet Union and the Western Powers arising from the common interest in the war against Germany and ultimately in a solid peace settlement will only furnish an opportunity to establish confidence which cannot, however, be taken for granted. It may, therefore, be further assumed that the United States Government will be inclined to take at least certain minimum measures to provide for the defence of those territories which lie adjacent to the U.S.S.R. in the northwest.

Canada's part in any United States defence scheme in the northwest would probably consist in the main of granting transit rights on land and in the air in peacetime. While the granting of such rights, it may be argued, would not constitute offensive action against the U.S.S.R., the experience of countries adjacent to the U.S.S.R. in eastern Europe would indicate that the U.S.S.R. is not inclined to excuse even passive association with measures appearing to be directed against itself. It would seem, therefore, essential to establish at the outset the following two principles if the United States Government should govern our defence relations in the northwest:—

seen. R. M[acdonnell]

(a) that we recognize legitimate interest of the United States to have access to Alaska over Canadian territory for purposes of defence;

(b) that any transit rights that may be granted must be related to a strategic plan for the defences of the northwest as a whole and should be jointly planned between Canada and the United States.

I agree that it would be important as a safeguard of the position of Canada in relation to the U.S.S.R. to have it understood that, should we find ourselves not in agreement with regard to the strategic planning of the United States Government, we should be in a position to withdraw.

CANADIAN DEFENCE INTERESTS IN UNITED STATES INSTALLATIONS IN THE NORTHWEST

The Joint Drafting Group has met regularly with Mr. Macdonnell present to work on the drafting of a paper as agreed in the Working Committee.[89] Our discussion indicated that it was not possible at the present time to offer any determinate answer on the Canadian post-war defence interest in the various United States defence projects in the Northwest. In the first instance it would be necessary to have a strategic appreciation of the post-war defence needs of this region which would have to be concerted with United States military authorities, presumably through the P.J.B.D. The Group has drafted a paper for submission to the Working Committee[90] which outlines some of the political and strategic factors which need to be taken into account without going into the detailed consideration of the defence value of each project. These are merely listed with a note on the extent and purpose of each project.

Attached is a draft prepared by the Army representatives on the Joint Drafting Group of the paper on Post-war Canadian Defence interests in United States Defence Projects in North-west Canada. This paper is the result of several meetings in which Mr. Macdonnell participated.

Apart from a number of drafting changes which will be required, the paper is too long as it stands. It was found necessary to introduce a number of political and strategic considerations which belong more appropriately to a general appreciation.

However, in view of the interest shown at the last meeting of the P.J.B.D. by the U.S. military members in the north-west defence projects and Canadian participation in continental defence generally, Mr. Macdonnell is of the view that the conclusions (pp. 11 and 12) of this paper might be found useful in case we are pressed by the United States authorities for our views on these questions.

Presumably no action will be taken on this paper until further activity on P.H.P. is discussed in the Advisory Committee.

POST-WAR CANADIAN DEFENCE INTERESTS IN UNITED STATES DEFENCE PROJECTS IN NORTHWEST CANADA

PART I — INTRODUCTION

1. It was agreed by the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems that a draft paper should be prepared by the Joint Drafting Group "to examine

[91]Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Mr. Ignatieff: I think there is a good deal of useful material in this paper, although as you say, it is too long. H[ume] W[rong]

what defence interests, if any, Canada had in the Northwest Staging Route, the Alaska Highway and other United States defence installations in the Northwest."[92]

2. The Joint Drafting Group assume that these terms of reference are intended to cover all major US Defence Projects in Northern Canada, including the Crimson Project. The post-war period is taken to mean the period following the defeat of Japan.

3. The Joint Drafting Group, having examined the question referred to them by the Working Committee, agree that Canadian defence interests in specific United States defence projects in Northwest Canada can be realistically assessed only if related to a strategic appreciation of the defence problems of this region concerted with United States defence authorities; it being assumed that Canadian and United States post-war defence policies for this region will be co-ordinated. This paper, therefore, sets out in a preliminary way some of the factors which, in the view of the Joint Drafting Group, would in such event need to be taken into consideration, and puts forward certain recommendations regarding the action that might be taken. A list of United States Defence Projects in Northwest Canada, together with details regarding their background and present status, is included in this paper in the form of an

PART II — GENERAL ASSUMPTIONS

4. The following principles governing Canada's post-war defence relationships with the United States which have been accepted by the War Committee of the Cabinet,[93] are taken to be specially applicable to the subject of this paper:

(a) "that the defences of Canada should be closely co-ordinated with those of the United States in the post-war period;"

(b) "that the Permanent Joint Board on Defence will continue to be a valuable means of facilitating this co-ordination, and also as a medium for the informal discussion of mutual defence problems."

(c) "that the source of major friction between Canada and the United States is more likely to grow out of differing views towards events outside this Continent. Particularly in view of Canada's geographical position astride the

overland route between the USA and the USSR, Canadian defence arrangements with the United States will be greatly influenced by the general character of the relations between the USA and the USSR;"

5. In accordance with these principles, and in view of the fact that the US Defence Projects in Northwest Canada were undertaken for the joint defence of Canada and the United States, and will in general have a continuing value for joint defence in the post-war period, it is assumed that Canadian post-war defence interests in these Projects should be considered from the aspect of joint defence.

PART III — STRATEGIC CONSIDERATIONS

Effect of a World Security Organization

6. A serious threat to Canada and the United States involving the Northwest could only be presented by a major Power (either alone or in combination with other Powers). The United Nations Organization will be unable to restrain a Great Power bent on aggression. It may, however, be safely assumed that during such time as the Organization remains "effective" there will be no likelihood of serious threat to this region. Nevertheless, whether or not the Organization remains effective, measures for the joint defence of the Northwest will be necessary. Such regional arrangements would by their nature be consistent with the purposes and principles of the Organization, and as such would not be precluded by anything in the terms of the Charter.

7. Even in the absence of any immediate threat, it would be of definite advantage to initiate joint defence measures for this region during the period when the Organization could still be considered "effective". Such an undertaking would be possible at this stage without incurring the hostility of a member Great Power. If, however, such action were to be put off until continued deterioration in international relationships resulted in a threat to world peace, then pressure might be brought to bear to further delay such an undertaking, as constituting an action which might tend to aggravate an already tense situation. An additional advantage lies in the deterrent effect which material evidence of realistic joint defence measures in this region might have upon a major Power contemplating aggressive action.

Possible Sources of Threat

8. (a) The USSR: The USSR is the only major Power which would be capable of offering a serious threat to Canada and the United States involving the Northwest. The USSR is now the greatest land power in the world, and is likely to increase her offensive power during the post-war period through the development of her naval and air forces. Although there is not at the present time any indication that she intends to adopt a policy hostile to Canada or the United States, the fact remains that she is strategically in a position to present a serious threat to the Northwest.

(b) China: China is unlikely alone to be capable of constituting a serious threat to this region. However, China could contribute materially to the offensive power of a hostile USSR if allied to the latter.

(c) Japan: The resurgence of a thoroughly defeated and disarmed Japan as a major military power is considered unlikely for many years.

The Vulnerability of the Northern Approaches

9. In the Cabinet War Committee paper referred to above it is stated, that:

"the development of air power has diminished the physical isolation of the North American continent by opening up the Northern approaches. Defence planning must be re-oriented to take this into account."[95]

In addition the general conclusion is given:

"that because of the new vulnerability of the North American continent. . . . . Canada must accept increased defence responsibilities and maintain larger armed forces than before the war."[96]

10. The vulnerability of the Northern approaches is, however, not due alone to the development of air power. As a result of other technological developments in modern warfare, attacks involving land operations on a large scale have now become possible in this region. Ample evidence to this fact has emerged from recent large scale cold-weather tests conducted by the Canadian Army in these regions. In the official report of an exercise carried out on the Barren Lands, the following conclusion is reached:

"the exercise proved that the inaccessibility of the Arctic is just another myth, and, providing supplies are ensured, operations on the barren grounds which represent one-third of Canada's area can be as unhindered as operations on the Libyan Desert."[97]

11. It is evident that these Northern approaches will assume a greatly increased importance in the defence of North America, since this flank can no longer be considered immune to attacks by a major Power having access to the Arctic Ocean or the land masses bordering on it. However, joint defence planning for this region should take into account the fact that Canadian post-war defence involves other heavy demands on her united resources, not only for the defence of other regions in Canada, but for the conduct of operations outside of Canada in areas which under modern conditions are the first line of her defence.

Strategic Appreciation

12. It is evident that consideration of Canada's defence interests in the Northwest can only be realistic if based on a sound appreciation of probable threats to the Northern approaches, and related to defence commitments for other and more vital regions. Unfortunately, however, at the present time no authoritative Canadian Joint Service strategical appreciation relating either to Canada's post-war defence in general, or to the defence of the Northern approaches, is available. Moreover, United States views in regard to post-war joint defence for this region have not been ascertained.

13. Presumably one of the first steps in any concerting of joint defence plans by Canada and the United States would be an agreed strategic appreciation of the defence problems involved, and of the probable forms and scales of attack for this region. It is considered, however, that, prior to such action, and in anticipation of discussion of the question between the two countries, a Canadian Joint Service appreciation of Canadian interests in the post-war defence of the Northern approaches should be prepared in the light of available information.

Probable Forms of Threat — Assumptions

14. In the absence of such guidance, the following assumptions have been adopted for the purpose of this paper:

(a) Invasion: — It is highly improbable that a successful seaborne invasion of North America could be affected [effected?] by way of the Pacific Ocean proper, so long as the US and UK retained command of the seas. Invasion of North America through the Northwest, by way of the Aleutians, Alaska and Northwest Canada might be possible, but on strategic grounds such an attempt is unlikely.

(b) Diversionary operations: — Amphibious or airborne operations in the Northern regions, possibly involving land forces on a large scale, would be possible, and might well be considered strategically desirable as a means of tying down large forces and military potential. The probable object would be the diversion of strength from other directly threatened regions in Europe or Asia. The mere threat of such operations might achieve satisfactory results with considerable economy, and therefore such a threat might be posed and made obvious even prior to the outbreak of hostilities for either strategical or political ends. (The Japanese feint through the Aleutians is noted as a case in point.)

(c) Other possible threats

i) Long-range air attacks from bases on enemy territory.

ii) Operations with the object of neutralizing anti-aircraft defence measures, particularly radar and fighter-aircraft screens guarding the Northern approaches.

iii) Operations with the object of securing bases for attacks on vital industrial and communications centres in Canada and the United States.

iv) Operations with the object of denying the use of facilities in this region for counter-offensive action against the enemy.

v) Minor operations such as raids by sea, land or air, and the landing or dropping of agents for the purpose of sabotage or espionage.

The Time Factor

15. Any future threat from whatever quarter it may arise may come more suddenly and more devastatingly than in the past. If such a threat should arise there might be insufficient time to take adequate counter-measures unless preliminary preparations are made and maintained. In the past, defence measures for this region have been undertaken hastily or improvised from existing resources at a time when the effort could ill be spared from more vital operations. Defences were, moreover, brought to full operational strength only after the threat of attack had passed. In the future, however, should defence measures be neglected until the threat becomes apparent, the time lag involved may result in the defence failing to keep pace with a mounting scale of attack. It is evident, therefore, that joint defence planning will not be enough. Effective defence measures will have to be undertaken in peacetime even in the absence of any immediate threat. In this regard, steps should be taken by Canada to ensure that adequate maintenance is provided for those existing defence installations within her territory which are likely to be of value in the event of war.

United States Interest in Alaskan Defence

16. The Northern approaches comprise a general strategic region which is in fact divided into natural strategic areas, each of which involves distinct defence problems. The political boundaries between Canadian and United States territories do not coincide with this natural strategic division. Moreover, Canadian and United States defence interests are not identical for each sector.

17. This is of particular significance in the case of the strategic highland area which includes Alaska and the whole inland Canadian corridor through which passes the line of communication to Alaska, consisting of the Northwest Staging Route and the Alaska Highway with its feeders. It is likely that United States defence interest will be largely concentrated on the defence of Alaska. At a recent meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence it was indicated that the United States view was that a properly controlled air route to Alaska is considered indispensable to the permanent defence of the continent.[99] Any such one-sided emphasis on Alaskan defence may lead to United States pressure on Canada to undertake defence measures within the Canadian portion of this strategic sector at the expense of other, and perhaps more vulnerable sectors in which there is not such a direct interest on the part of the United States.

The following footnote was in the original:
Quoted in a memo by Maj-Gen Guy V. Henry to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence (8 Jun 45)[100] as a statement made by one authority commenting on a Bill presented to the U.S. House of Representatives. Its context in this memo would indicate that it reflects official U.S. views.

18. Therefore, if Canada, with her limited military resources, is to accept full responsibility for defence measures within Canadian territory, steps should be taken to ensure that any such pressure does not lead her to neglect the defence of strategic sectors which (lie wholly within Canadian territory, such as the Mackenzie River Valley, and the Arctic Barrens towards the East. These areas may well prove to be more vulnerable as a line of approach than the highland area of Alaska and the Canadian corridor, with its difficult terrain and greater dependence on roads for movement. Moreover they out-flank the latter.

PART IV — POLITICAL CONSIDERATIONS

19. At a recent discussion of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence it was indicated that the United States may ask Canada to maintain certain defence installations in the Northwest during the post-war period. The United States Defence Projects in Northwest Canada were (with the exception of the Crimson Route) constructed in relation to the war in the Pacific. Even with the threat of Japan removed, the United States may continue to regard defence measures in this region as necessary for the security of Alaska in case of war with a major power bordering on the Pacific Ocean. Since an attack from the North on continental United States territory would almost certainly involve Canada, it follows that the problem of the defence of the Northwest should be considered in terms of the defence of all the Northern approaches to the North American continent.

20. The possibility of tension between the USSR and the USA during the post-war period, which it must be earnestly hoped will not arise, is nevertheless a contingency which cannot be excluded. Should such tension develop, a most likely result would be pressure on Canada by the United States to join her in increasing the defences of the Northern approaches. Should Canada accede to such a course it would obviously have an adverse effect on her relations with the USSR, perhaps at a time when Canadian opinion did not share in like degree the feeling of apprehensiveness or of hostility towards the USSR then current in the United States.

21. Canada may thus be faced with two courses. On the one hand, of granting specific military rights to the United States in peacetime (including transit rights) and becoming fully associated with United States defence measures in the North, thus accepting the risk of prejudicing her relations with the USSR. On the other hand, of refusing such rights and retaining full freedom of action in any joint defence arrangements, in the hope of avoiding the risk of prejudicing her relations with the USSR.

22. The pressure which would be brought to bear on Canada by the United States in the event of Canada seeming reluctant or refusing to co-operate with her in continental defence, would be very substantial and might be difficult to resist. It is suggested that such pressure should be resisted only if substantial advantages could be derived from such a course. The main value of attempting to retain complete independence of action would lie in whatever possibilities such a course might offer Canada of exercising a mediating influence between these two Great Powers. However, since in the light of past experience, it is unlikely that Canadian views would have any real influence on the Soviet Government, such an advantage is more apparent than real, and does not appear to justify the difficulties which would attend a refusal to co-operate effectively with the United States. On the other hand, experience also indicates that Canadian views may at times have some influence on the United States Government. The most effective way, therefore, in which Canada could contribute towards ameliorating the difficult situation visualized above, would probably be to accept the course of becoming associated with the United States in defence measures, and of contributing a modifying influence.

23. If the foregoing argument is accepted it would follow that the desirable policy for Canada would be to co-operate with the United States in defence measures for these regions while retaining at the same time the maximum freedom of action consistent with such co-operation. Joint planning for the defence of the Northern approaches would appear to be the most advantageous course, with Canada assuming full responsibility for all defence measures within her own territory. Canada's consent to granting the United States specified peacetime military rights in her territory for the purposes of joint defence of this region should be made conditional on a full interchange of information relevant to the defence of the region and should also be based on the granting of reciprocal rights to Canada by the United States. This would ensure that Canada was provided with information about United States plans and intentions which would give her an opportunity to express her views regarding the urgency of any given situation and the necessity of proposed defence measures. Such joint planning and the undertaking of joint defence measures for the security of the Northern approaches should be concerted with the United States in the first instance through the facilities of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, as this medium offers the best possibility of defence co-operation with the United States, while at the same time retaining the maximum freedom of action.

24. Defence facilities in Canada which would be most likely to be needed by the United States relate to overland, air and ground communications between the United States and Alaska. In particular, the air route to Alaska will probably be regarded by the United States Government as indispensable for the permanent defence of the continent. Use of such an air route would involve the maintenance of existing air bases and a number of existing facilities.

25. In the light of the foregoing it is suggested that, should the United States request peacetime facilities in Canada relating to its communications with Alaska or to the defence of this region, the matter should be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence on the basis of the principles outlined in Paragraph 23 above. Provided that these principles proved acceptable to the United States Government, presumably the ensuing step to be taken would be the preparation of an agreed Canadian-United States strategic appreciation of the defence problems involved in the security of the Northern approaches. In anticipation of this, and in advance of discussion of the question by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence a Canadian Joint Service appreciation should be made to determine Canadian interests.

PART V — CONCLUSIONS

26. In summing up the strategical and political considerations put forward in this paper, the following main conclusions are reached:

(a) that the principles of post-war defence co-ordination between Canada and the United States, and of Canada accepting full responsibility for defence measures within her own territory, previously approved by the War Committee of the Cabinet, apply particularly to the defence of the Northern approaches to this continent;

(b) that joint Canadian-United States defence of the Northern approaches would by their nature constitute regional defence arrangements in accordance with the principles and purposes of the United Nations Organization, and as such would not be precluded by anything in the Charter of that Organization;

(c) that joint planning for the defence of the Northern approaches should be co-ordinated through the facilities of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, as the use of such a medium would afford Canada the best possibility of defence co-operation with the United States while at the same time retaining the maximum freedom of action consistent with such co-operation;

(d) that if joint defence of the Northern approaches is accepted in principle by the United States, Canada should be prepared, if so requested, to grant the United States such specified peacetime military rights in Canadian territory as are agreed to be essential for the joint defence of this region (including transit rights), on the basis of reciprocal action and interchange of information;

(e) that if the United States agree to the principle of joint defence of this region, a first step in joint planning should be the preparation of an agreed Canadian-United States strategical appreciation of the problem of the joint defence of the Northern approaches. In anticipation of this, and preferably in advance of discussion of the subject by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, a Canadian Joint Service appreciation from the viewpoint of Canadian interests should be undertaken;

(f) that any joint defence planning for this region should be based on a realistic assessment of probable forms and scales of attack or threatened attack. Preliminary examination indicates that any major threat to this region would probably be of a diversionary nature. Therefore the undesirability of Canada committing a disproportionate part of her limited military resources for the defence of this region, should be borne in mind in joint planning discussions with the United States;

(g) that as sufficient data is not at present available to warrant any firm conclusions regarding post-war Canadian interests in United States defence projects in Northwest Canada in relation to joint defence, the future disposition of individual projects should be discussed with the United States in the light of an agreed joint defence appreciation. Examination indicates, however, that the United States will regard overland, air and ground communications between the United States and Alaska as essential to the defence of North America, and that Canada may be asked to undertake specific responsiblities with regard to air bases and related facilities on this route. In this event such responsibilities should be accepted by Canada in accordance with the principles and policy outlined in (b), (c) and (d) above.

Memorandum by Military Staff Officer to Prime Minister

TOP SECRET Ottawa, July 28, 1945

I. Continental Defense Value of Canadian Northwest
II. Canada-United States Post-War Collaboration

You will recall that at a meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense, held in New York on 14-15th June last, the United Sates Army member informally initiated a discussion on two subjects which are of considerable long-term interest to Canada. These were (a) Continental Defence Value of the Canadian Northwest and (b) Canada-United States Post-War Collaboration.

2. While General Henry went to some pains to make it clear that he was merely expressing his personal views and that as a consequence he did not want a verbatim record of his remarks incorporated in the Journal of Discussions and Decisions, we may well assume that what he did say was at least not out of line with the views held by the U.S. War and Navy Departments. In these circumstances, as well as by reason of other indications of a growing United States interest in these matters, I think it expedient that at the next meeting of the Board in Montreal on 4th September, the Canadian Section should offer some observations on General Henry's remarks of an apparently equally "personal and tentative nature." In actual fact, however, such remarks as might be made on this occasion would have to be cleared with the Service Departments and External Affairs, and higher.

3. It is, of course, obvious that at the present moment there are too many unknown factors to enable us to arrive at any firm conclusions. The war against Japan has yet to be ended. Our obligations towards the United Nations have yet to be worked out. Our contributions in respect of defence will probably, in some measure at least, be related to those of the United Kingdom and the United States. Of the latter country's views on the post-war situation we have had no indication and joint defence planning should enjoy a two-way flow of information. In any event, we should strive to make it so.

4. Apart, however, from the general obscurity of our position, some aspects of continental defence stand out reasonably clearly and on these I suggest the Government might be in a position to approve of a "personal and tentative" expression of views by the Canadian Section. In the hope that I am not in error as to this, and also so as to serve as a basis for discussion in the Advisory Committee, I append a draft of some observations which I think we might make in P.J.B.D. I am afraid I have been obliged to leave some gaps, but these can be filled in in Committee. I have not attempted to develop our position point by point in this preamble. They either speak for themselves, or don't, in the draft. I have sought to observe in one way or another on each point raised by General Henry in his two papers, a copy of each of which is appended hereto.

CONTINENTAL DEFENSE VALUE OF THE CANADIAN NORTHWEST

1. Both the United States and Canada have expended large sums of money for defense purposes in the Canadian Northwest during the present war. The main installations are the Northwest Staging Route, the Alaska Highway, the telegraph line and gasoline distributing system in general paralleling the Highway, the Skagway-Carcross gasoline pipe line, the Haines cut-off, the Canol project proper and the various installations in Prince Rupert and vicinity.

2. The question arises are any of them from the viewpoint of both Canada and the United States necessary to the postwar defense of the North American continent or to the defense of Alaska from the viewpoint solely of the United States? If so, which are necessary and how is there maintenance to be financed in the postwar period? Some may also have both postwar military and economic value and for this reason should be maintained and developed.

3. Many people believe that the defense of Alaska in case of war with an Asiatic power is of major importance to the defense of the North American continent and that its defense would be largely a matter of air and navy.

4. All of the facilities built along the Northwest Staging Route were primarily constructed for the maintenance of an air route across Canada and into Alaska. One authority in commenting on a bill recently introduced in the United States House of Representatives seeking to create a commission to be known as the "Alaska International Highway Commission" states "a properly controlled air route to Alaska is considered indispensable to the permanent defense of the continent. Such an air route requires weather stations, auxiliary landing fields and flight strips, telephone and telegraph communications and supply of aviation gasoline, subsistence and maintenance items. The only feasible way to properly provide these necessary items to a controlled airway to Alaska is a highway generally along the same route." This matter may later be presented to the Permanent Joint Board for an official declaration regarding whether or not a land route to Alaska is of permanent value in the defense of the continent. Local pressure may also do the same, for it is understood that the Government of British Columbia has recently let a contract for a road connecting Prince George with the Alaska Highway at Dawson Creek and that either Alberta or British Columbia has provided for bridging one of the main streams on the road between Edmonton and Dawson Creek. Further, Alaskan interests are pushing for the maintenance of the Haines cut-off and the Alaska Highway from where that cut-off joins the same on to Fairbanks, Alaska.

5. I think it would be interesting to hear, perfectly informally, from our Canadian members their personal views regarding the defense value of the air route, the Alaska Highway, the telegraph line, the gasoline distributing systems and the Haines cut-off and whether or not the Canadian portions are likely to be maintained by Canada in the post-war period. Also the Prince Rupert installations might be touched upon.

POSTWAR COLLABORATION

1. The United States has informed the other American Republics that it believes the defensive power of the Western Hemisphere would be greatly augmented if the armed forces of the various American Republics were a homogeneous whole, i.e. armed and equipped with standard material and, in general, organized and trained along standard lines. In order the ascertain the views of the other American Republics on this matter, the United States has held joint staff conversations with the military representatives of these Republics and is also offering to assist them with armament, technical advice and training on the terms mutually agreeable to each Government.

2. The Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace held in Mexico City in early March 1945 approved certain "Declarations on Reciprocal Assistance and Americn Security". The outstanding one is known as the Act of Chapultepec and it further recommended "That the Governments consider the creation, at the earliest practicable time, of a permanent agency formed by the representatives of each of the General Staffs of the American Republics, for the purpose of proposing to the said Government, measures for a better military collaboration between all the Governments and for the defense of the Western Hemisphere."

3. Personally I do not see how there can be any true homogeneity of defence of the Western Hemisphere unless the Dominion of Canada is a member of the military family of American nations, so to speak.

4. From a military standpoint there appears little doubt that our tactical and supply problems for the defense of North America would be greatly simplified if Canadian and United States forces had interchangeable munitions and were trained and organized in general along similar lines.

5. In this war we have had at least two examples of the desirability of this, i.e., the re-equipping with U.S. materiel of the Canadian Aleutian Force and the present re-equipping and reorganizing of the Canadian Pacific Ground Force and the similar attempt by the RCAF.

6. There are certain complications in Canada being incorporated in a military family of American nations. First, would Canadian public opinion be favourable to a closer tie between Canadian and U.S. armed forces? Second, Canada's political, economic, cultural and military relationship with Great Britain. Third, Canada is a manufacturing nation as is the United States and this might, from a Canadian point of view, make it inadvisable for the Canadian armed forces to have equipment interchangeable with that of the United States forces.

7. Other people have in mind closer postwar relationship between the military of the two countries. This is shown by the following:

a. On February 17 to March 5, 1945, the British Commonwealth Relations Conference was held in London under the auspices of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. A short extract from the minutes reads, "The security of Canada and of Australia and of New Zealand depends upon collaboration with the United States."

b. Canadian Ambassador Llewellyn Keenleyside, according to press dispatches, recently stated in an address in Mexico City, "The clarification of Canada's relationship to the Pan American Union would await final results of the San Francisco United Nations Conference."

8. The views I have presented are purely personal. However, I would be glad to hear discussion regarding the feasibility, or the desirability, of our two countries entering into joint staff conversations, this with a view of determining the extent to which the two countries can in the postwar period coordinate their armed force efforts.

Projet d'observations du secrétaire militaire du Cabinet

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] July 28, 1945

Suggested draft of observations on General Henry's statements on (a) Continental Defence Value of Canadian Northwest and (b) Canada-United States Post-War Collaboration, to be made by Canadian Section at Meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence to be held in Montreal, 4th September, 1945.

1. Introduction

The Canadian Section listened with much interest to the remarks made by General Henry at the last meeting on the subjects of (a) Continental Defence

Value of the Canadian Northwest, and (b) Canada-United States Post-War Collaboration. These subjects are of considerable importance to both countries and as the war draws on towards its close they will tend more and more to become matters of practical politics. Actually, some of the points mentioned by General Henry come up in the day-to-day conduct of our national war effort, and during the last few weeks the members of the Canadian Section have endeavoured to reach some tentative conclusions in their regard. As respects others, there yet appear to be too many unknown factors to permit of a really objective appreciation. However this may be, we should like to offer the following observations to our United States colleagues who will of course understand that in so doing we are merely expressing in their presence our personal and tentative views.

2. General

As has been said, there are too many unknown factors in the international situation to enable us to study many of our defence questions with any degree of finality. The number, the nature and the scope of the special agreements to be negotiated on the initiative of the future Security Council and of the regional arrangements for international security for which provision has been made in the Charter of the United Nations, have yet to be defined. Nor again can the question of our defence commitments as a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations be said to be entirely clear. In these circumstances no clearly defined picture can be drawn.

3. Moreover, defence problems will only admit of rational solution on the basis of rational assumptions as to the nature and the measure of force to be resisted. We on our part are not unprepared to lay down such assumptions but we have here, as our name implies, to do with matters of joint defence which again implies that such assumptions be made in collaboration and not independently. At the moment the Canadian Services have no information as to the views to the United States Army and Navy in these matters.

4. It might be pertinent here to recall that during the course of the war a number of defence installations were constructed in Canada at United States request but which eventually became a charge against Canadian public funds. We are of course all agreed that in war prompt action must be the paramount consideration, but we on our side find it difficult to exclude from our minds the thought that the cost of some of these facilities was out of proportion with their value as factors towards the achievement of victory. It seems, therefore, to follow that in future it would be helpful if the Canadian Service were made more fully aware of the bases of the appreciation of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff as to the defence requirements of the North American continent. So much for the general picture.

5. Continental Defence Value of the Canadian Northwest

As regards the continental defence value of the Canadian Northwest, our personal views as to the points raised by General Henry, quite informally, are as follows:

(a) Northwest Air Staging Route:

We entirely agree that the Northwest Air Staging Route is, and will continue to be, an integral feature of Alaskan defence and as such will be maintained indefinitely into the future. The division of responsibility between the Military and Civil authorities and such questions as the number of airfields to be maintained as Air Force Stations are matters for later study and decision.

(b) Alaska Highway:

In our view the question of the Alaska Highway differs materially from that of the Air Route. Theoretically, perhaps, it can be argued that its existence adds to the defence potential of Alaska. Our information, however, is that no supplies have ever been sent to Alaska via this route. Nor during this war does the enemy appear to have made any attempt to interfere with the United States line of communication through the Gulf of Alaska. Moreover, it seems unlikely that, within the reasonably distant future, any Pacific Power will be in a position to threaten the sea route between Seattle and Alaskan ports. In these circumstance we are aware of no military considerations of a nature such as to require the maintenance of the Alaska Highway in the foreseeable future.

(c) Telegraph Line:

The telegraph line would appear to have, inter alia, a useful role to play in the defence of Alaska. We therefore believe that a reasonable case for its continued maintenance can be made.

(d) Gasoline Distribution Systems:

As we see it, the gasoline distributing systems are a necessary feature of supply for the Air Route and they should be retained in operation. The question of the siting of the Skagway-Carcross pipe line will of course have to be resolved.

(e) Haines Cutoff:

In the Canadian view the Haines Cutoff is without appreciable defence value.

(f) Prince Rupert and Port Edward: Certain United States installations at Prince Rupert are of defence interest to Canada. The same cannot be said of the Port Edward development.

6. Canada-United States Post-War Collaboration.

It need hardly be said that the members of the Canadian Section have read with interest of the proceedings of the Inter-American Conference at Mexico and of the signing of the Act of Chapultepec. In many, if not all respects, the questions involved seem in the last analysis to be of a political nature and as a consequence quite beyond our competence to discuss.

7. On the other hand, the question of Canada-United States post-war military collaboration does not appear to present any special difficulty. Our understanding, with which we are sure our United States colleagues will be disposed to agree, is that the founders of this body advisedly inserted the word "Permanent" in our title. There would then seem to be no reason why we should not, and every reason why we should, continue our collaboration of the last five years in matters of defence.

8. If this is agreed, the way ahead should be reasonably clear. We should both seek to agree as to the international picture of the coming post-war period in so far as this has a bearing on the question of North American defence. This having been done, it should only be necessary for us to revise Defence Scheme No. 2 (ABC-22) which has governed the employment of our forces disposed for home defence during the course of this war, so as to bring it into line with our new joint appreciation of our defence position. This having been done, and the new plan having gained the approval of our respective Governments, it can be held in readiness (subject of course to periodic revision) to be put into effect by Governmental agreement in the event of an emergency arising.

9. With regard to General Henry's view that our tactical and supply problems for the defence of North America would be greatly simplified if Canadian and United States forces had interchangeable munitions and were trained and organized in general along similar lines, we are of opinion that no sufficient reason has yet been adduced to suggest that a major decision under this head, even of principle, is in any way expedient. We very much doubt if any military appreciation of our North American defence position over the next decade or decades will lead to the conclusion that the territorial integrity of our territories will be exposed to serious threat. It therefore seems unlikely that our ocean waters, our lands or our air will be the scene of major operations. While our defences will probably require to be maintained on a greater scale in the future than they were in the past, they are unlikely in our view to be such as to require complete uniformity of equipment, organization and training.

10. In addition, we are confident that our United States colleagues will not fail to take into account our position as a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations, an association which it should go without saying the Canadian people give every evidence of being of a mind to maintain. The Canadian forces have a long history of close and intimate association with those of the Commonwealth and it seems unlikely that this association will no longer continue.

11. On the other hand, the way is open to us to model our forces on any pattern we may choose, including one of our own design. As mentioned by General Henry, there have been two instances in which the Canadian Army has adopted the United States model so as to facilitate the integration of the smaller force with the larger one. These instances, however, have been episodes in the prosecution of the War against Japan and it would be straining the point to argue that they fell under the head of Continental defence.

12. It should also be borne in mind that in view of the wide measure of standardization of Canadian and United States industry, as well as the difficulty sometimes experienced in times of peace of obtaining our accustomed equipment, that the Canadian forces have sought and obtained United States types. Our mechanical transport is similar to yours. Many of our aircraft are of United States design and manufacture. There are signs that our radio and radar equipment are tending to standardize themselves along United States lines.

13. Thus in some fields we can see uniformity developing on an ad hoc basis, but for the reasons we have given we are not inclined to conclude that a decision along the lines suggested is at all necessary or even essentially desirable.

14. In conclusion, may it be said that we trust that this informal expression of our personal views may be of interest to our United States colleagues and of some value to them in the further considerations of our joint defence problems.

Mémorandum du ministère des Affaires extérieures à l'officier d'état-major auprès du Premier ministre

Memorandum from Department of External Affairs to Military Staff Officer to Prime Minister

With regard to your memorandum of July 28th concerning the comments which might be made at the next meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence in reply to General Henry's statements at the last meeting of the Board, here are a few points which you may wish to consider in preparing a second draft as agreed at today's meeting of the Advisory P.H.P. Committee. There are a number of questions raised in your memorandum such as the defence value of certain projects in the Canadian Northwest on which I do not feel competent to comment.

Para. 2. I am not wedded to the use of the language "our defence commitments as a member of the British Commonwealth" which seems to me to be all right for home consumption but possibly misleading to Americans.

Para. 4. As a minor point, I think that it would be accurate and useful to insert a sentence following the veiled reference to the Crimson Route and other dubious projects to make it clear that Canadian doubts about the value of these projects were felt at the time and that criticism is not inspired by hindsight.

Para. 5. (b) General Henry's argument about the post-war use of the Alaska Highway centers entirely around its value as a feeder for the airports. The C.A.S. will doubtless submit a technical appreciation on this point which should be dealt with in the reply.

Para. 9. In the second sentence I think it might be safer to say "over the next one or two decades" instead of "over the next decade or decades."

Para. 10. I feel that this paragraph might with advantage be rewritten on the grounds already mentioned that the American mind is easily misled on these subjects.

Para. 12. General Henry cites in support of the argument for the adoption of common equipment and organization two instances occurring in this war, both of which together represent a very small proportion of the Canadian military effort. In fact if one looks for historical examples of this nature it is obvious that if the Canadian forces had adopted common standards and practices with the United States in the past we would have been gravely handicapped in putting our forces in the field during both this war and the last. Any possible commitment which we might enter into for participation in peace enforcement inside the Americas would be an entirely insufficient reason for taking the course suggested. If we were concerned solely with continental defence, there would be a good case for General Henry's point of view. He does not give the right reasons in his paragraph 6 for our resisting this course and the reasons are broader than our membership in the British Commonwealth. Indeed his whole memorandum is a bit of rather poor special pleading.

Para. 13. The argument might be expanded in order to express our interest in the larger problem of the establishment of common standards and equipment as far as possible by the United States and the United Kingdom. Mr. Macdonnell has given me the following note on this aspect under the heading of "Threats to the peace of the Western Hemisphere arising from aggression from outside the Hemisphere."

"Here we are prepared to play our full share in the most effective way possible, which we believe to be through commitments in the North Atlantic region and possibly in northern Canada as well. Although the shape of these commitments is far from clear it seems obvious that they will involve close association with the United States and the United Kingdom. Therefore our problem is to organize our forces so as to be able to cooperate most smoothly with whichever of those two great powers Canada may be most closely associated in any given situation. Methods, weapons, etc. might be of United Kingdom or United States type depending on the task to be done. We would, therefore, be prepared to examine with an open mind any proposals for standardization to demonstrate practical advantages in safe-guarding peace or meeting aggression. Obviously the closer together the United States and the United Kingdom come, the simpler will be the problem for everyone."

Mention might also be made in this connection of our interest in the continued exchange of secret technical information on weapons development and related questions and on treating as part of the general question of continental defence policy certain problems of the mobilization of industry for the production of strategic supplies.

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], August 4, 1945

Dear [General Pope],

As requested in your note of July 31st†, I am glad of the opportunity of making a few comments on your draft paper on Major General Henry's two memoranda — Continental Defence Value of the Canadian Northwest; and Post War Collaboration.

First of all I agree with you that it would be desirable and even necessary that the Canadian Section of the Board should make some statement in reply to the questions raised by General Henry. The statement might be "informal" but I think it should reflect as nearly as possible the Canadian point of view.

I gather from the remarks in your covering memorandum that your draft paper is intended to indicate only the general lines of the statement to be made by the Canadian Section of the Board. For this reason I shall not comment in detail but shall confine my remarks to the principal points raised by General Henry. Before passing on to the questions raised by General Henry, however, I might mention that in reading through your paper I did not always find mayself in agreement with the sequence of your argument as, for instance, in paragraph nine where it is stated that "we very much doubt if any military appreciation of our North American defence position over the next decade or decades will lead to the conclusion that the territorial integrity of our territories will be exposed to serious threat;" while in the final sentence of this paragraph the view is expressed that ". . . . . our defences will probaby require to be maintained on a greater scale in the future than they were in the past . . . . ." I feel sure that if your argument were fully developed these two statements would be reconciled.

With respect to the question of Continental Defence Value of the Canadian Northwest I am in agreement with the views you have expressed on the Northwest Staging Route, the Telegraph Line, the Gasoline Distribution Systems and Prince Rupert and Port Edward. As to the Haines Cut-off, I have very little information about its future defence value but, in any event, its chief value would probably be in connection with the defence of Alaska, and this is a question on which we might consult the United States.

The question of the post war defence value of the Alaska Highway is one which should receive thorough study before any decision is made. If it is decided that the Northwest Staging Route is a military requirement, then it would seem to follow logically that the highway, or certain portions of it at least, should be maintained in order to give access to the main and intermediate airfields and the landing strips constituting the Northwest Staging Route. Otherwise, the cost of transporting gasoline, equipment, stores and construction supplies to the airfields will be well nigh prohibitive. Just as an example, let us suppose that a runway at Watson Lake or Fort Nelson had to be extended by 1000 feet. If the Alaska Highway were not available, construction machinery, supplies, personnel, food stuffs, etc., would have to be flown in. I shall not dwell on this aspect of the question other than to state that the highway and the airway are inter-related and that the post war value of one cannot be properly assessed without reference to the other.

One of the questions raised by General Henry in his memorandum on Post War Collaboration related to joint Canada-United States staff conversations. This is not dealt with in your draft paper except for your suggestion in paragraph four that " . . . . . in future, it would be helpful if the Canadian Service were made more fully aware of the bases of the appreciation of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff as to the defence requirements of the North American continent." My own view is that Canada should not be drawn into any continental "bloc" which might involve us, for instance, in defence commitments in South America. On the other hand, certain defence arrangements between the United States and the United Kingdom may be of direct concern to Canada and in regard to these the Canadian Chiefs of Staff should be consulted. Furthermore, there will be problems of continental defence which mainly concern Canada and the United States and which, because they involve problems of strategy or the disposition of forces, could not be appropriately dealt with through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. Such problems might well be discussed as they arise by the Canadian and United States Chiefs of Staff. As an instance, one might mention the defence problems in the Canadian Northwest and Alaska about which we are very much in the dark as regards United States military thinking.

The other main point raised by General Henry in his memorandum on Post War Collaboration relates to the standardization of equipment and supply as between the United States and Canadian Forces. As you have pointed out, there are political, historical and military reasons why Canada should continue to employ equipment and methods of organization used by the United Kingdom and the other Commonwealth countries. At the same time, we should perhaps not overlook the advantages of some degree of standardization with the United States, particularly where questions of continental defence are primarily concerned. My own opinion is that we should take a broad view of this question of standardization and endeavour to bring United States and United Kingdom thinking in the matter of equipment as much into line as possible. Here I think we might play a very important and helpful role. The present war has furnished many examples of the delay and expense of manufacturing or modifying important items of military equipment to meet particular Canadian, United States or United Kingdom standards, although the basic design in all cases was the same, and the modified equipment was used for the same purpose and in the same theatre of operations by different Forces fighting side by side. In this regard I have in mind particularly certain types of aircraft, radio equipment and armament. With these considerations in mind, I would suggest that we should not dismiss General Henry's proposal about standardization but rather that we should explore the possibility of effecting a greater degree of standardization as between the United States and the British Commonwealth.

Dear General Pope:

I have read with much interest the second draft[101] of your observations on the two memoranda which General Henry presented at the last meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. As you have pointed out, the questions under discussion involve so many unknown factors that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to answer them explicitly at the present time. Much depends on the assumptions we may make, and even in this regard there have occurred in the interval, since your first draft was written, developments which may alter our previous conception of the basis of military power. Under the circumstances, therefore, one is inclined to the belief that we can at best present to General Henry but an outline sketch of the Canadian point of view. This I feel you have succeeded in doing remarkably well in your second draft.

As suggested by you I shall endeavour to place in writing a few of the observations which I made in our telephone conversations with respect to your note of August 9th to the Chief of the Air Staff.†

My first observation had to do with the question of joint staff conversations as suggested by General Henry. In reading through your second draft the impression I gained was that a number of convincing arguments had been advanced by you in favour of joint staff conversations as, for instance:

"At the moment the Canadian Services have no information as to the views of the United States Army and Navy in these matters."

"It seems, therefore, to follow that in future it would be helpful if the Canadian Services were made more fully aware of the bases of the appreciation of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff on the defence requirements of the North American continent."

The obvious suggestion is that these questions should be discussed by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and that the Canadian Services, through that medium, should be kept fully informed of United States thinking on the matter of continental defence. The fact remains, however, that full information has not been forthcoming through the medium of the Board. This may be because the United States Chiefs of Staff have not considered the Board as a suitable place to reveal current United States strategic plans. Possibly they would be more disposed to take us into their confidence in such matters if conversations were held on a Chiefs of Staff level. But whatever the reason, I think we must admit that the Board meetings have not enabled us to keep in close touch with United States military thinking. This is a matter in which the Board might interest itself with a view to improving our military liaison with the United States where matters of common defence are concerned, and I would like to see it suggested that the Board should take steps to arrange for joint United States-Canada staff conversations on the Chiefs of Staff level when specific defence problems of interest to the two countries arise. One beneficial result of such conversations would be that the Chiefs of Staff of both countries would be brought into close touch with one another and with the problems discussed by the Board. I understand that you have considered adding to the end of your draft observations the phrase "which might be carried out either through the medium of the Board or separate staff conversations." I am in full agreement with this suggestion, but in view of the considerations you have advanced in favour of a more complete exchange of military information I think it might be worthwhile to develop your suggestion further and to indicate the manner in which staff conversations might be arranged as well as the level on which they should be held.

In paragraph nine you have developed the idea that the northern half of our territories is unlikely to be threatened with invasion within the next one or two decades; that in the event of another major war the main Canadian effort will again consist in furnishing Armed Forces outside North America; and that, therefore, complete uniformity of equipment, organization and training as between the Forces of Canada and the United States would not be required. I agree with your conclusion but, at the same time, I would prefer to see the conclusion developed from different premises and these I would suggest might be somewhat as follows: that both Canada and the United States have subscribed to a World Security Organization which will strike at aggression wherever it arises; that the main Canadian effort will consist in sending Armed Forces outside North America to aid in enforcing the decisions of the Security Council, and to provide facilities for the rapid transit through Canada of Forces at the disposal of the Council; that in the performance of this role complete uniformity of United States and Canadian equipment, organization and training will not be required unless it should arise in the course of the development of uniform standards for all United Nations Forces at the disposal of the Security Council. The present tendency towards uniformity as between the Forces of the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom, which you have noted with approval, is perhaps an evolutionary trend in this direction.

General Henry has cited the Canadian Aleutian Force as an instance where re-equipment and re-organization to a uniform standard was necessary. Inasmuch as the Aleutians had been attacked by the Japanese, this seems to be a pretty convincing example of the need for uniform standards of equipment and organization where the defence of this continent from direct attack by an aggressor is concerned, and it is questionable if the Canadian Section should state that it would be straining the point to argue that this fell under the heading of continental defence. Would it not be preferable to admit that this is a valid instance of the need for uniformity, although it is out-weighed by the record of our close and intimate associations with the Forces of the British Commonwealth, and by the role which Canada is probably destined to play in helping to maintain the peace of the world?

Events of the past few weeks will certainly demand a complete re-examination of our defence relationships with the United States. On the one hand, we shall have to consider if it is in Canada's interest to draw closer to the United States; on the other hand, the United States may be disposed to manifest a more direct interest in the development and defence of certain parts of Canada. While these are matters which will come up for future consideration, they do not necessarily need to be introduced into the discussion of the questions raised by General Henry, and I have framed my comments on the assumption that the scope of your draft statememt would not be altered materially from that which you had originally contemplated.

Sincerely,

C. R. D.

TOP SECRET Ottawa, August 18, 1945

My dear Curtis:

I was very glad to get your very full and clear note S. 15-48-1 (AMAS B. 2) of 16th August, commenting on my second draft of a proposed verbal reply to General Henry at the next meeting of the Board. In reading these comments I have made several notes, which I append hereunder.

I am not sure that the United States Chiefs of Staff have not considered the Board as a suitable place to reveal current United States strategic plans. The principal reason, I think, is that our American friends are remarkably close in matters of this kind and are not disposed to come completely clean in any circumstances. However this may be, I see no reason whatsoever why we should not aim at a meeting of Canadian and U.S. Chiefs of Staff at the appropriate time, nor that we should not insert a suggestion to this end at the conclusion of the proposed reply.

Personnally, I am not sure that External Affairs would altogether go along with your restatement of the premises in the draft which lead up to the conclusion that complete uniformity of equipment, etc., is required at the present time. By this I mean that I have a feeling that the confidence in the Security Council which your words might seem to imply, is a little strong. Subject to this, I would be happy to accept your version.

I have always looked upon the Kiska and Attu operations as a diversionary effort on the part of the Japanese, and not as an attack against this continent. I think, too, that in this view I am supported by the United States Chiefs of Staff. In any event, I am sure that this is what they thought three years ago. Actually on this occasion we did adopt United States organization and a good deal of their equipment. The difference between us here however is not very great.

In view of the numerous points of view which must be brought into accord in this proposed reply, I think that the best way of putting the finishing touches to the paper would be by discussion around a table rather than in further correspondence. I have so suggested to Mr. Wrong, who agrees, and who has undertaken himself to go over the paper again from an External Affairs' point of view and to call a meeting of the Advisory Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems some time next week. If we can arrange this we ought to be able to dispose of this item in about an hour, and I sincerely trust that this will be done.[102] Time is running on and as I have feared from the very outset, we shall be hard put to it to get an agreed, and what is more, an approved statement in time for the meeting on the 4th of September.

With all kind regards,

Sincerely yours,

MAURICE POPE

Memorandum for Canadian Section, PJBD

SECRET Ottawa, September 3, 1945

Note on General Henry's statements on (a) Continental Defence Value of Canadian Northwest and (b) Canada-United States Post-War Collaboration, for use by Canadian Section at Meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence to be held in Montreal, 4th September, 1945.

1. Introduction.

The Canadian Section listened with much interest to the remarks made by General Henry at our last meeting on the subjects of (a) Continental Defence Value of the Canadian Northwest, and (b) Canada-United States Post-War Collaboration. These subjects are of considerable importance to both countries and now that hostilities have come to an end they will tend more and more to become matters of practical politics. Actually, some of the points mentioned by General Henry came up in our day-to-day conduct of our war effort, and during the last few weeks the members of the Canadian Section have endeavoured to reach some tentative conclusions in their regard. As respects [102]Aucun compte rendu d'une telle réunion ne fut trouvé.

No record of such a meeting was located.

others, there yet appear to be too many unknown factors to permit of a really objective appreciation. However this may be, we should like to offer the following observations to our United States colleagues, who will of course understand that in so doing we are merely expressing, in their presence, our personal and tentative views.

2. General.

As has been said, there are too many unknown factors in the international situation to enable us to study many of our defence questions with any degree of finality. The number, the nature and the scope of the special agreements to be negotiated on the initative of the future Security Council and of the regional arrangements for international security for which provision has been made in the Charter of the United Nations, have yet to be defined. Nor again can the question of defence co-operation within the British Commonwealth of Nations be yet said to be entirely clear. In these circumstances no clearly defined picture can be drawn.

3. Moreover, defence problems will only admit of rational solution on the basis of rational assumptions as to the nature and the measure of force to be resisted. We on our part are not unprepared to lay down such assumptions but we have here, as our name implies, to do with matters of joint defence which again implies that such assumptions be made in collaboration and not independently. At the moment the Canadian services have no information as to the views of the United States Army and Navy in these matters.

4. It might be pertinent here to recall that during the course of the war a number of defence installations were constructed in Canada at United States request but which eventually became a charge against Canadian public funds. We are of course all agreed that in war prompt action must be a paramount consideration, but we on our side find it difficult to exclude from our minds the thought that the cost of some of these facilities was out of proportion with their value as factors towards the achievement of victory. Our United States colleagues will doubtless remember that these doubts as to the ultimate value of one or more of these projects were expressed by some of us at the time they were first put in hand. It seems, therefore, to follow that in future it would be helpful if the Canadian Services were made more fully aware of the bases of the appreciation of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff on the defence requirements of the North American continent. So much for the general picture.

5. Continental Defence Value of the Canadian Northwest.

As regards the continental defence value of the Canadian Northwest, our personal views as to the points raised by General Henry, quite informally, are as follows:

(a) Northwest Air Staging Route:

We entirely agree that the Northwest Air Staging Route is, and will continue to be, an integral feature of Alaskan defence and as such will be maintained indefinitely into the future. The division of responsibility between the Military and Civil authorities and such questions as the number of airfields to be maintained as Air Force Stations are matters for later study and decision.

(b) Alaska Highway:

(i) In our view the defence value of the Alaska Highway as a whole may differ in some respects from that of the Air Route. Theoretically, perhaps, it can be argued that of itself the road directly adds to the defence potential of Alaska. We are under the impression, however, that no military supplies have ever been sent to Alaska via this route. Nor does the enemy appear to have made any attempt to interfere with the United States line of communication through the Gulf of Alaska. Moreover, it seems unlikely that, within the reasonably distant future, any Pacific Power will be in a position to threaten the sea route between Seattle and Alaskan ports.

(ii) On the other hand it is clear that certain sections of the highway are essential to the effective maintenance and supply of the airway. For this reason we feel that these said sections should be maintained to an effective standard.

(c) Telegraph Line:

The telegraph line would appear to have, inter alia, a useful role to play in the defence of the Canadian Northwest and Alaska. We therefore believe that a reasonable case for its continued maintenance can be made.

(d) Gasoline Distribution systems:

As we see them the gasoline distributing systems are a necessary feature of supply for the Air Route and they should be retained in operation. The question of the siting of the Skagway-Carcross pipe line will of course have to be resolved.

(e) Haines Cutoff:

The Canadian Section do not feel themselves to be in a position to assess the defence value of the Haines Cutoff and they would be glad of an indication of the views held by their United States colleagues under this head.

(f) Prince Rupert and Port Edward:

Certain United States installations at Prince Rupert are of defence interest to Canada. The same cannot be said of the Port Edward development.

6. Canada-United States Post-War Collaboration.

It need hardly be said that the members of the Canadian Section have read with interest of the proceedings of the Inter-American Conference at Mexico and of the signing of the Act of Chapultepec. In many, if not all respects, the questions involved seem in the last analysis to be of a political nature and as such not within the competence of the Board.

7. The question of Canada-United States post-war military collaboration does not appear to present any special difficulty. Our understanding, with which we are sure our United States colleagues will be disposed to agree, is that the founders of this body advisedly inserted the word "Permanent" in our title. There would then seem to be no reason why we should not, and every reason why we should, continue our collaboration of the last five years in matters of defence.

8. If this is agreed, the way ahead should be reasonably clear. We should both seek to agree as to the international picture of the coming post-war period in so far as this has a bearing on the question of North American defence. This having been done, it should only be necessary for us to revise Defence Scheme No. 2 (ABC-22) which has governed the employment of our forces disposed for home defence during the course of this war, so as to bring it into line with our new joint appreciation of our defence position. This having been done and the new plan having gained the approval of our respective Governments, it can be held in readiness (subject of course to periodic revision) to be put into effect by Governmental agreement in the event of an emergency arising.

9. With regard to General Henry's view that our tactical and supply problems for the defence of North America would be greatly simplified if Canadian and United States forces had interchangeable munitions and were trained and organized in general along similar lines, we are of opinion that no sufficient reason has yet been adduced to suggest that a major decision of principle under this head is expedient at the present time. We very much doubt if a military appreciation of our North American defence position over the next one or two decades will lead to the conclusion that the northern half of our territories is threatened with invasion. It therefore seems unlikely that within that time our ocean waters, our lands or our air will be the scene of major operations. Consequently, while our defence forces will probably require to be maintained on a greater scale in the future than they were in the past, they are unlikely in our view to be such as to require at an early date complete uniformity of equipment, organization and training of the Forces of our two countries.

10. We should, however, wish to make it clear that the way is quite open to us to model our forces on any pattern we may choose. As mentioned by General Henry, there have been two instances in which the Canadian Army has adopted the United States model so as to facilitate the integration of the smaller force with the larger one. These instances, however, have merely been episodes in the prosecution of the War against Japan and it would be straining the point to argue that they fell under the head of Continental defence. Nor do they in any way compare with the long record of our close and intimate association with the Forces of the British Commonwealth, which association seems not unlikely to continue.

11. There is however another aspect to this question. In view of the wide measure of standardization of Canadian and United States industry, as well as the difficulty sometimes experienced in times of peace of obtaining our accustomed equipment, the Canadian Forces have now and then sought and obtained certain United States types. Our mechanical transport is similar to yours. Many of our aircraft are of United States design and manufacture. There are signs that our radio and radar equipment are tending to standardize themselves along United States lines. Thus in some fields we can see uniformity developing on an ad hoc basis.

12. From a still wider aspect, we are of opinion that the co-ordination of military supply of the countries making up the English-speaking world would further the cause of international peace and consequently the security of our common interests, and the achievement of this end would be facilitated by the standardization of British Commonwealth and United States military equipmment. While, therefore, for the reasons we have given, we do not consider that a convincing case can yet be made for us to decide now to adopt United States standards, we have no hesitation in saying that uniformity of United Kingdom and United States military organization, training and equipment appears in our view to be a most desirable objective and Canadian influence, such as it may be, will always be exerted to that end.

13. In conclusion, may it be said that we trust that this informal expression of our personal views may be of interest to our United States colleagues and of some value to them in the further consideration of our joint defence problems, which might be carried out either through the medium of the Board or by separate staff conversations. Possibly on some appropriate occasion our Chiefs of Staff might meet for the purpose of making a broad survey of the requirements of North American joint defence.

6. General Pope referred to the discussion which took place at the last meeting of the Board on the statements presented by General Henry on the Continental Defence Value of the Canadian Northwest and Closer Postwar Defence Collaboration between Canada and the United States. In order to carry this discussion a step further, General Pope made a number of observations on behalf of the Canadian members, representing their personal and tentative views. It was agreed that this continuation of the earlier discussion had been profitable and provided material for further study. Copies of General Henry's memoranda, read at the meeting held on June 14, and of the Canadian Section's paper above referred to are annexed.

The United States Section associated themselves with the view expressed by the Canadian Section that the question of Canada — United States postwar military collaboration does not appear to present any special difficulty. Both were agreed that the founders of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence advisedly inserted the word "Permanent" in the Board's title. This being so, there would seem to be no reason why the two countries should not, and every reason why they should, continue their collaboration of the past five years in matters of defence.

In further discussion General McNaughton suggested that the most feasible way of achieving uniformity of armaments would be to bring about joint collaboration in the development of new weapons or materiel. The Board agreed with this view.

Compte rendu des débats et des décisions de la CPCAD
Journal of Discussions and Decisions of PJBD

New York, November 8, 1945

1. The Permanent Joint Board on Defence met in New York on Wednesday, November 7, 1945, at two p.m. at the Mayor's House. The following members participated:

Canadian Section	United States Section
General A. G. L. McNaughton	Mayor F. H. La Guardia, Chairman
Captain H. S. Rayner	Vice Admiral David W. Bagley
Major General H. F. G. Letson	Major General Guy V. Henry
Colonel J. H. Jenkins	Captain Felix L. Baker
Air Vice Marshal W. A. Curtis	Colonel Charles Deerwester
Group Captain W. W. Bean	Mr. J. Graham Parsons
Mr. R. M. Macdonnell

The Board welcomed two new members, Major General H. F. G. Letson, who replaces Lieutenant General Pope as senior Canadian Army Member, and Captain Felix L. Baker, who replaces Captain T. P. Jeter as United States Naval Air representative.

2. Air Vice Marshal Curtis referred to an indication from General Gaffney, Commander, Alaskan Wing, Air Transport Corps, that the United States forces would withdraw from the Northwest Staging Route on April 1, 1946, and asked if the United States Army representatives could provide further information on this subject. General Henry replied that he believed that details of this matter could best be settled at the meeting to be held in Ottawa on November 12 between Service representatives. He said, however, that the United States forces planned to withdraw all personnel from the Route except at Edmonton, Fort Nelson and Whitehorse. At these points it was expected to maintain small detachments rather indefinitely. It was understood that the foregoing statements apply to airforce personnel and not to landline maintenance and other ground personnel.

3. Air Vice Marshal Curtis referred to the program of assigning understudy personnel to learn the operation of the landline communications system, Northwest Staging Route, prior to take over by Canada and asked if the United States would be able to keep key technical personnel on duty to train their Canadian successors. General Henry stated that men having sufficient points for discharge would necessarily be returned home but a program was in hand to assure sufficient competent replacement personnel. In addition, it was hoped that many of the technical personnel now available would re-enlist.

In response to a question as to Canada's responsibility for maintenance of landlines along the Canol Project, General Henry stated that Canada has no responsibility for maintenance from the point where the Canol Line branches off from the route of the Alaska Highway to Norman Wells and from the point where it branches off at Carcross to Skagway.

General Henry distributed copies of a memorandum setting forth United States requirements and interests, military, civil and air, in the landline system paralleling the Alaska Highway. This memorandum is attached to the journal as an appendix† and states that from the point of view of the defence of the North American Continent, the United States is interested in the continued maintenance and use of the Northwest Staging Route, the Alaska Highway and the Canol pipeline distributing system. General Henry then said that the Civil Aeronautics Administration, the United States Weather Bureau, the Department of the Interior (Alaskan Branch), the Army Air Forces and the Army Signal Corps were all interested in maintenance of the landline system. He stated that the last named organizations expected to lease two circuits each to cover their continuing requirements.

4. Mr. Macdonnell inquired as to the United States long range plans for weather services in the far North. General Henry stated that he understood that a great deal of thought had been devoted to this question from a purely weather viewpoint; there were oceanographic and other considerations of importance. He hoped that both governments would consider this general question from a broad viewpoint.

General McNaughton referred to the establishment by private scientific interests of the Arctic Institute of North America and distributed to the members a paper† describing the organization, objectives and present status of the Institute. The importance of the Institute and the interest of its work to the Board were noted. Colonel Deerwester distributed a paper on the Arctops project.†

General Henry then read a memorandum in regard to United States Weather Stations in Canada and announced the willingness of the War Department to turn over the United States equipment involved if assurance could be obtained from Canada that it would be maintained in service after June 30, 1946. It was agreed that the Canadian Section would take up this proposal with the appropriate Canadian authorities and would later advise the United States Section. General Henry's memorandum on this subject is appended to the Journal†.

General McNaughton referred to the need for two new weather reporting stations in the vicinity of Baker Lake and Banks Island but felt that the matter of these proposed new stations should be kept separate from the question of the transfer of United States equipment now in Canada. There was general agreement that this question should have continuing attention.

5. Air Vice Marshal Curtis referred to the exchange of notes of December 16th, 1940,† and the subsequent exchange dated March 27th — April 18th, 1941.† In regard to the reciprocal transit of military aircraft and public vessels in Canada and the United States, it was noted that these exchanges had been entered into as a matter of comity between the two Governments. The members of the Board expressed their satisfaction as to the manner in which this continuing arrangement had operated.

6. Air Vice Marshal Curtis referred to the forthcoming transfer of certain air fields on the west coast from the Royal Canadian Air Force to the Department of Transport and inquired whether the United States had any requirements for the future maintenance of the Coast Air route to Alaska. General Henry and Captain Baker both stated that this route was essential to the future operations of the Army Air Forces and Naval Air Service. It was agreed that questions as to the maintenance of particular fields or landing strips should be made the subject of correspondence between the service members.

7. Air Vice Marshal Curtis inquired as to United States long range requirements for air facilities in Newfoundland and Labrador. General Henry replied that Goose Bay was considered by the War Department as essential to the defence of North America but that the interest in Gander was secondary. He stated that the United States personnel now at Goose could be reduced but that as long as United States troops remained in Europe, it would be necessary to retain some personnel there. As regards Gander, all the United States personnel could be withdrawn at once, provided that communications and weather facilities could be provided by Canada.

8. Air Vice Marshal Curtis inquired if a take-over date could be set for the buildings now occupied by United States Forces at Goose Bay and Gander. General Henry stated that he would take this matter up and inform Air Vice Marshal Curtis by letter.

9. Vice Admiral Bagley and General Henry presented to the Secretary of the Canadian Section of the Board a joint proposal on the general subject of continued collaboration between the United States and Canada. The Canadian Section agreed to transmit this proposal to the Canadian Government. It was decided that if the proposal is accepted, the service members would prepare suggestions for procedure under the proposal and that they would then be considered at an early meeting of the Board.

10. The Canadian service members stated that as a practical measure of continuing collaboration and to assist in co-ordinating the Armed Forces of United States and Canada, Canada's Chiefs of Staff recommend that the practice of interchange of Canadian and United states officers within selected positions should be developed. Such a system would promote better understanding and knowledge within the respective Services of the two countries and would be particularly valuable in such matters as the development and use of weapons, logistics, communications and organization. Some exchanges have been effected during wartime but it is felt that these should now go forward on a carefully planned basis.

The Board agreed that the continuance of exchange of officers between United States and Canadian Navy, Army and Air Forces was desirable and that the selection of positions to be interchanged should be left to the Chiefs of Staffs concerned.

The United States Navy and Army members undertook to seek the approval of their Chiefs of Staff to this proposal.

11. General Henry read a statement on the future importance of the Northwest Staging Route. This statement is attached as an appendix to the Journal.† It indicates that the War Department is concluding that the Northwest Staging Route is as important to the future defence of the North American continent as it was when the Permanent Joint Board on Defence made its 10th recommendation on November 14th, 1940.[103] In view of this, the War Department is gratified that the Canadian Government is undertaking — for a limited period at least — the maintenance and operation of the Northwest Staging Route, the landline and the highway. The Canadian Section undertook to present this statement to the appropriate Canadian authorities.

12. General Henry distributed copies of a memorandum which he had written to the Secretary of the Canadian Section announcing the decision of the United States to continue the maintenance of the Stephenville-St.John's landline. The memorandum is attached to the Journal as an appendix† and the Secretary of the Canadian Section will inquire as to any Canadian requirements for rental or lease of circuits.

13. General Henry presented a detailed memorandum† as to the terms upon which the United States proposed to turn over, under the exchange of notes of June 23-27, 1944,[104] certain categories of equipment along the Alaska Highway, the pipeline distributing system and the Northwest Staging Route.

Memorandum from Secretary, Canadian Section, PJBD, to Cabinet

[Ottawa,] December 13, 1945

POSTWAR DEFENCE COLLABORATION WITH THE UNITED STATES

1. At the meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence held on November 7th, the senior United States Army and Navy members presented identical communications† addressed to them respectively by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, in the following terms:

"Although the 'Ogdensburg Agreement' provides a continuing basis for common military action by the United States and Canada, it appears that the Joint Canadian-U.S. Defence Plan (ABC-22), which provided for specific action in the event that the United States and British Commonwealth were associated in the war against Germany and her allies, requires revision. While the Plan did not fix a period for which it was to be effective, its general tenor was such as to provide for the war just concluded.

"I desire that you initiate. . . . . conversations leading to revision of ABC-22 to provide, in the light of changed world conditions, a continuing basis for joint action of the military forces of Canada and the United States in order to ensure the security of Alaska, Canada, Labrador, Newfoundland, and the northern portion of the United States."

The Canadian members of the Board undertook to seek the views of the Canadian Government.

2. The Joint Canada-United States Defence Plan (ABC-22) was prepared in July, 1941, before the United States entered the war. Its purpose was to assign definite responsibilities to the forces of each country in providing for the local defence of North America (in the event of the United States becoming a belligerent) and to assure close liaison and cooperation.

3. The plan was drawn up through the medium of the Service Members of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence following staff conversations between the United Kingdom and United States which took place early in 1941. ABC-22 was thus designed to fit into the broader strategic picture drawn up by the United Kingdom and United States Chiefs of Staff. The tasks to be undertaken jointly by Canada and the United States were set forth as follows:

(1) Protect associated overseas shipping in the northern portions of the western Atlantic and Pacific areas.

(2) Defend Newfoundland and protect associated sea communications within the coastal zone.

(3) Defend eastern Canada and the northeastern portion of the United States and protect sea communications within the coastal zones.

(4) Defend Alaska and protect sea communications within the coastal zone.

(5) Defend western Canada and the northwestern portion of United States and protect sea communications within coastal zones.

4. With the entry of the United States into the war ABC-22 came into operation. Thereafter throughout the war, it served as the basis for effective cooperation between Canada and the United States in meeting problems of local defence, and its value has been widely recognized by the Service authorities of both countries.

5. In considering the United States proposals for revision of ABC-22, it is pertinent to recall the conclusions of the paper "Postwar Canadian Defence Relationship with the United States" (C.W.C. document No. 917)† which was approved by the Cabinet War Committee on July 19, 1945.[105] These conclusions were summarized in the paper as follows:

(a) That the defences of Canada should be closely coordinated with those of the United States after the war;

(b) That the Permanent Joint Board on Defence will continue to be a valuable means of facilitating this coordination;

(c) That relations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. are of special concern to Canada;

(d) That in joint planning with the United States, Canada should accept full responsibility for all such defence measures within Canadian territory as the moderate risk to which we are exposed may indicate to be necessary;

(e) That Canada should continue to accept responsibility for the local defence of Newfoundland and Labrador, and that the part of the United States in the defence of these territories should be limited to the operation of their leased bases in Newfoundland;

(f) That the new vulnerability of this continent necessitates the maintenance of larger Canadian armed forces than before the war;

(g) That the exchange of technical information on military research and development between Canada and the United States should continue, and that Canada should maintain the means of making an effective contribution to such exchange.

Recommendation of Cabinet Defence Committee

6. At their meeting of December 4th the Cabinet Defence Committee agreed to make the following recommendation to the Cabinet:

"That the United States proposal for continued collaboration in defence planning be accepted and that the Chiefs of Staff Committee, with the addition of appropriate civilian officials, be given the responsibilty for coordinating Canadian participation in the preparation of joint plans."

7. In amplification of this recommendation, the following proposals are submitted for approval:

A. Principles

(i) It is recommended that the conclusions of C.W.C. Document 917 mentioned in Paragraph 5 above be taken as general terms of reference by Canadian planning groups. With regard to (e), dealing with Newfoundland, the uncertainty respecting the future Constitution of Newfoundland may make it difficult to conclude long-term arrangements with respect to defence facilities. Nevertheless, in view of the strong position held in Newfoundland by the United States because of its leased bases, it is felt that Canada's strategic position should be safeguarded.

(ii) It is not unlikely that the United States may propose the acceptance by Canada of defence responsibilities on a considerable scale. It is therefore recommended that joint discussions with the United States should proceed in the first instance in terms of current plans for Canada's postwar forces, and that guidance from the Government should be sought in the event that any substantial departure from these plans, or from the conclusions outlined in Paragraph 5, is urged by the United States.

B. Procedure

(i) Arrangements for joint planning with the United States to be made through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

(ii) The Chiefs of Staff Committee to delegate to their Joint Planning Sub-Committee the responsibility for the necessary collection of information and drafting, the Secretary of the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and the Secretary, Cabinet Defence Committee, being added to the Planning Committee for these purposes.

8. It is in the national interest that joint planning begin as soon as possible in order that we may learn as much as possible about the plans being formulated in the United States, since these will affect the decisions now being taken on the composition of Canada's postwar forces.[106]

UNITED STATES MILITARY BASES ABROAD

I. It is a matter of public knowledge that the United States War and Navy Departments are anxious to retain or establish rights in military bases in non-United States territory for the postwar period. This has been discussed to some extent in Congress and in the press but without much specific indication as to what the War and Navy Department want. From documents† received from United Kingdom sources by the Department of External Affairs, to which an exceptionally high degree of secrecy attaches, it is possible to outline the trend of United States policy which may be summarized as follows:—

A. ATLANTIC

(a) Newfoundland, Bermuda and the Caribbean.

It was announced in 1940 that ninety-nine-year leases to these bases had been given by the United Kingdom. It is to be assumed that the United States will wish to retain rights in all these bases.

(b) Iceland.

The United States Government has been in negotiation with the Icelandic Government since September last for long-term leases of a naval base and two air bases. No specific civil air rights are apparently being sought. The Icelandic Government has not been prepared to grant long-term leases, although it is willing to conclude short-term leases which would expire when an international security system has been set up under the United Nations Organization. A short-term agreement is not regarded as satisfactory by the United States, although they are ready to agree that the bases should be available to the Security Council. Negotiations appear to have reached a temporary impasse, although they are expected to continue.

(c) Greenland.

No information has been received with regard to United States intentions but it is reasonable to conclude that they will wish to retain rights in at least one of the air bases which they constructed during the war. Indications of renewed United States interest in the air fields at Chimo and Frobisher in northeastern Canada support this belief.

Although earlier the United States appeared to have in mind air bases in the Azores which would either be under tripartite Anglo-U.S.-Portuguese control or under the Security Council of the United Nations Organization, they have more recently proposed to the United Kingdom that long-term rights to operate military bases in both groups of these Portuguese islands should be sought. They suggested that these rights should be exercised jointly by the United States and Portugal. Civil air rights under this proposal would be extended on a more favoured nation and non-discriminatory basis. The United Kingdom in turn, have made the suggestion that the best solution would be to treat the Azores as a free-for-all civil aviation station but to have it equipped under an agreement between Portugal, which would retain sovereignty, Brazil, the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom. They have also suggested that the execution of any such plans should be postponed until the United Nations Organization is in operation and Portugal has been admitted to membership. It is thought that the United States might not seek to develop facilitaties in the Cape Verde islands, although desiring to secure the right to do so.

(e) West Africa.

No indications of United States policy have been received recently but it is known that the late President Roosevelt had discussions with General de Gaulle about a United States base at Dakar. No conclusions were reached and the present position is obscure. Long-term bases might be sought in Liberia.

(f) Ascension Island.

The United States are seeking joint military air rights with the United Kingdom.

(g) Latin America.

It is not known what long-term rights the United States may seek to secure in Latin American countries, such as continued use of their existing air bases in Brazil.

B. PACIFIC

(a) In territories administered by the United Kingdom, Australia or New Zealand, the United States wishes to obtain long-term base rights as follows:

Place	Sovereignty	Nature of Rights	Use.
Canton Is.	United States — British joint control	Exclusive and possession	Naval and Air
Christmas Is.	Disputed, United States — British	Exclusive and possession	Air
Espiritu Sante.	French — British condominium	Joint	Naval and Air
Funafuti	disputed, United States — British	Exclusive and possession	Naval and Air
Guadalcanal Tulagi	British	Joint	Naval and Air
Manns	Australian Mandate	Joint	Naval and Air
Tarawa	British	Joint	Naval and Air
Upolu	New Zealand Mandate	Joint	Air
Vitilevu	British	Joint	Naval and Air

(b) In addition to Funafuti and Christmas mentioned in (a), the United States want the United Kingdom and New Zealand to withdraw their claims and recognize United States sovereignty over the following twenty-three islands in which they dispute the British claim to sovereignty: Vostok, Danger, Malden, Nukufetau, Starbuck, Caroline, Nurakita, Flint, Nukulailai, Canton, Atafu, Enderbury, Nukunono, Phoenix, Fakaofo, Sydney, Penrhyn, Hull, Manihiki, Gardner, Rakahanga, McKean, Birnie.

(c) It can be assumed that the United States will wish to maintain bases in islands formerly under Japanese sovereignty or mandate. No particulars of their plans in this respect have been received.

(d) Rights in the Philippines are being sought.

(e) It is a matter of public knowledge that the United States are seeking rights in the Galapagos islands off the Ecuador coast.

(f) Possibly other requests for bases are being put forward (for example, in French, Chinese, or Netherlands territory) of which we have heard nothing.

II. ATTITUDE OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

The United Kingdom authorities are clearly concerned over these developments. They fully recognize the value of close relations with the United States for defence purposes, but they see serious objections to concluding arrangements in advance of the international security system under the United Nations Charter. It is of military importance to the United Kingdom that the United Nations Organization should be a success and any action which might prejudice that success would be open to both political and military objections. Although the United States seem to contemplate that all their bases in territories of other countries would be made available to the Security Council, they object in London to an attempt by the United States to stake their claims before the Security Council is set up. In particular, they feel that early action of the kind proposed would give the Soviet Union justifiable grounds for suspicion which would create difficulties when the Security Council is being established, and which might encourage the Soviet Union to take unilateral action in respect to the bases which they desire.

A further point made by the United Kingdom authorities is that a clear definition must be drawn between the granting of rights for military bases and the granting of facilities for civil aviation. This is particularly important as regards the disputed islands in the Pacific, both from the point of view of preserving United Kingdom rights to facilities therein and of obtaining such facilities in territory in the Pacific under United States control. In connection with the requests of the United States, they are anxious in London to secure United States support for their own requirements, and they desire full information on the demands which may be addressed to other countries.

Discussions are proceeding between the United Kingdom and the United States, especially on the question of avoiding action which would prejudice the success of United Nations Organization to which the United Kingdom attaches so much importance.

The United Kingdom have said that they would be very glad to have any comments at this stage which the Canadian Government may feel able to offer.

III. CANADIAN INTERESTS

Canada has obviously an immediate interest in the rights secured by the United States to Atlantic bases in Newfoundland, Bermuda, Iceland and Greenland, and a considerable though lesser interest in the position in the Caribbean, Azores and other Atlantic locations. All the places in the Pacific mentioned in Section I.B. of this paper are remote from Canadian territory, and our interest in what is done is part of our general interest in the maintenance of peace and security.

There is some ground for the anxiety expressed in London over the effect on the United Nations Organization of the exercise of pressure at this time by the United States to secure exclusive or joint rights with so wide a range of territories. The chief cause for nervousness is the possibility that the Soviet Government will be moved to do likewise in Bornholm, Spitzbergen, the Finnmark district of Norway, the Straits and perhaps the Aegean, and in the countries of Europe and Asia which border on Soviet territory. So far as is known here, the only recent Soviet move in this direction has been an approach to Turkey with respect to the Straits, although Mr. Molotov at the Council of Foreign Ministers last September implied a Soviet interest in Tripolitania, Eritrea, and the Dodecanese. In any case, it is in the interests of Canada that the influence and prestige of the United Nations Organization should not be lowered by a preliminary contest for far-flung rights to bases conducted by the two greatest of the large powers.

On the other hand, Canadian defence would be assisted by the maintenance of United States bases in the Atlantic and Pacific, especially in Iceland and Greenland. While the United States proposals set forth in Section I may be regarded as reflecting somewhat grandiose ideas, held in the War and Navy Departments more strongly than in the White House and State Department, yet, if bases are to be established around the world, it is i our interest that the United States should bear a large part of the responsibility and expense, especially as they are likely to make them available for the purposes of the Security Council on acceptable terms. Criticism is thus directed more at the timing than at the aims of their proposals.

By inference, however, these proposals, from their scale and extent, are of great concern to Canada. They contemplate that the United States will secure rights on the far side of the Pacific, both North and South of the Equator and on, or close to, the Atlantic coasts of Africa. If they feel they need so much so far away, what are the scales of defence that they will regard as satisfactory in the northern part of their own continent? What sort of action will they request of Canada, or what rights will they seek from Canada, to complete their system of extra-territorial defences?

Sir,

Enclosed are five copies of a note dated January 20th received from the Secretary of State, proposing in effect that the Joint Economic Committees be abolished.

2. For the documents referred to in the opening paragraph of the enclosed note, please see my despatch No. 1730 of June 17, 1941,† and previous correspondence.

3. I understand that the desire of the United States Government to liquidate the Committees will not come as a surprise to the Department of External Affairs.

4. There is one curious and inaccurate statement in the enclosed note to which I should like to direct your attention. It is the statement in the third paragraph that—

"Within six months of the establishment of the Committees, both Canada and the United States were attacked by Japan. . . ."

5. You will note that the State Department is willing to continue, under its own auspices, the work on the United States side of the North Pacific Project which is at present being carried on by the Joint Economic Committees.

Note du secrétaire d'État des États-Unis à l'ambassadeur aux Etats-Unis

Note from Secretary of State of United States to Ambassador in United States

Washington, January 20, 1944

The Secretary of State presents his compliments to His Excellency the Ambassador of Canada and refers to the Aide-Memoire of the Canadian Legation of March 17, 1941,[107] the Aide-Memoire of the Department of State of June 6, 1941[108] and the Aide-Memoire of the Canadian Legation of June 17, 1941,† by which the Joint Economic Committees were established.

These Committees have, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, served a useful purpose in recommending to the two governments measures which have for the most part been put into effect for the better utilization of the combined resources of the two countries in the production of defense requirements and for the better coordination of war-time measures and controls in the two countries, they have surveyed economic problems of the common concern which will face the two countries after the war, and they have initiated an intensive survey of the development of the North Pacific area of Canada and Alaska.

Within six months of the establishment of the Committees, both Canada and the United States were attacked by Japan and the aggressor countries of Europe declared war on the United States. These developments greatly extended the number of agencies for collaboration between the two Governments for the prosecution of the war and thus affected, almost from the outset, one of the two principal fields in which the Joint Economic Committees were expected to function. In fact, the Committees have not occupied themselves with problems of war-time collaboration for over a year.

With respect to their second proposed function, i.e., exploration of the possibilities of a greater degree of economic collaboration between the two countries to minimize the probable post-war economic disequilibrium in each country, the Committees recognized early in their deliberations the impossibility of making great progress without simultaneously considering the economic relations of the two countries not only to each other but to the rest of the world as well. This larger task was not one for which the Committees were established, nor was it one which they could have undertaken at that time.

For some time technical experts of the two Governments have been engaged in informal exploratory discussions of proposals for international exchange stabilization. The two Governments have now designated technical experts to conduct similar exploratory discussions at the expert level with a view to developing an orderly agenda on questions of commercial policy, commodity policy, and cartels.[109] In due course more formal consideration of some or all of these and other subjects may presumably be expected, involving all the United Nations and those associated with them.

In the field of general economic relationships and post-war readjustments, therefore, the course of events is tending to follow that in the field of war-time collaboration.

This raises the question of the present and future functions of the Joint Economic Committees. It is the view of the Government of the United States that the circumstances under which the Committees were established have altered, that the present requirements can be more adequately served by other means, and that it is doubtful whether a sufficient residue remains of their original functions to make desirable the continuance of the Committees.

The Government of the United States therefore proposes that, if the Canadian Government agrees, the Committees be regarded as having completed their work and that announcement to this effect be made at a mutually convenient early date. With regard to the North Pacific Project of the Committees, the Department of State would be prepared to continue, under its auspices, the work on the United States side until June 30, 1944, by which time it is anticipated that the task can be completed.

It has been felt for some time by those concerned with the work of the Joint Economic Committees that their effectiveness has largely disappeared due to the development, since their establishment in June, 1941, of many other agencies of contact and cooperation between the United States and Canada. The Committees have made several surveys of problems of wartime coordination that will have post-war implications, but they are hardly suited for the increasingly necessary examination of particular post-war problems. Among other factors, they labour under the disability of their joint character which raises serious difficulties when any problem is to be dealt with that should first be examined nationally. The United States authorities have come to the same conclusions, and on January 20th the Secretary of State sent a note to Mr.

McCarthy proposing that "the Committees be regarded as having completed their work and that announcement to this effect be made at a mutually convenient early date."[110] The members of the Canadian Committee who have commented on this are in agreement.

I think a note should be sent agreeing to the proposal and suggesting that an announcement in the form of a short press release be made on an agreed date. You may wish to announce the termination of the Committees' work in the House, but, on the whole, I think that a less prominent form of announcement will be less conducive to misinterpretation of the move.[111]

No. 313 Ottawa, March 7, 1944

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 159 of January 22 enclosing copies of a note from the Department of State proposing that the Joint Economic Committees be regarded as having completed their work. As you suggested, this desire on the part of the United States Government does not come as a surprise to the Department of External Affairs.

It would be appreciated if you would communicate with the State Department informing them that the Canadian Government agrees with the suggestion that the Joint Economic Committees be regarded as having completed their work and that an announcement to this effect should be made at a mutually convenient early date.

While it would be desirable that a public announcement should be made concerning the termination of the work of the Committees, I do not think that it is necessary to have a publication of a formal exchange of notes. There would, I think, be advantages in having an announcement which would explain briefly the reasons for the termination of the Committees' work, while at the same time avoiding any large degree of emphasis on the move which might lead to misinterpretation. In accordance with this, perhaps it might be suggested that a press release should be made at 11:00 a.m. E.D.T. one week from to-day, March 14, along the following lines:

"It was announced to-day that the Governments of Canada and the United States had agreed to dissolve the Joint Econonic Committees which were established in June, 1941, to assist in the collaboration of the two countries in the utilization of their combined resources for the requirements of war. The Committees have been of great assistance, not only in the coordination of wartime measures and controls, but also in surveying and advising on economic problems of common concern. It has been agreed, however, by the two Governments that the development of other agencies for coordination and exchange of views and the establishment during the past three years of methods of cooperation in production and the use of resources, have rendered unnecessary the continued operation of the Committees."

I should appreciate it if you would inform me after communication with the State Department whether they are in agreement with the above suggestions.[112]

Dear Mr. Hickerson:

There was one omission from our note No. 85 of March 10th† regarding the Joint Economic Committees. The State Department's note of January 20th concluded with these remarks:

"With regard to the North Pacific Project of the Committees, the Department of State would be prepared to continue, under its auspices, the work on the United States side until June 30, 1944, by which time it is anticipated that the task can be completed."

We should have said in our note that the Canadian Government will arrange for the continuance of whatever work is required on the Canadian side of the North Pacific Project until June 30, 1944, by which time it is anticipated that the Project will have been completed.

No. 47 Washington, January 7, 1944

Sir,

Mr. Hull on Wednesday afternoon, the 5th January, requested that I should call upon him on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock, without indicating the reason or matter he desired to discuss.

I learned later from Mr. Hickerson that it was with reference to the question of supply of Canadian woodsmen to work in the Maine woods; and probably also with reference to the supply of pulp and pulpwood to United States consumers.

I sent for Mr. Plumptre and Mr. Monteath Douglas,[113] who are in charge of this, and got fully briefed by them, for which I was really very thankful.

Mr. Hull opened the conversation by stating that the question of the supply of Canadian labour to work in the woods of Maine was he feared approaching a combustible state, and that there was going to be on Capitol Hill adverse criticism of Canada of a combustible nature, which by co-operation and discussion might be avoided. He intimated that some of their people were going to Ottawa to discuss it with our people. I told him that I was sure they would be most welcome. I also told him that we were in constant collaboration on a lower level on these matters, and that I had a feeling that those who were collaborating with us did not feel that we were unreasonable or un-cooperative.

I found that he did not know very much about the facts, so took advantage of the opportunity to give him an outline as I understood it of our position, telling him first, that the question of the supply of men had been decided on Cabinet level; that Canada was suffering tremendously from the lack of manpower; that our paper mills were only working up to 65% of their capacity; and that from Canada's standpoint permitting men to work in the woods of Maine was not a popular proposition, and particularly so in the Province of Quebec, pointing out to him also that we had between six and seven hundred thousand of our men and women overseas, and that, together with those engaged in industrial war enterprises, absorbed our total manpower. But, that owing to the Prime Minister's personal intervention, and to prove how cooperative we were, it was decided that 3500 men could this year obtain permits to work in the woods of Maine; that it was only 700 less than last year, and a great many more than we could or really ought to spare.

I also explained to the Secretary that we had been stretching ourselves to the limit to meet the war demands on our forest product industries, including very heavy demands from the United States. I pointed out that we were sharing equally with the United States the pulpwood which was available for sale in Canada, that we had doubled our supplies of wood pulps as compared with pre-war years, and that we had nevertheless been able to maintain our supplies of newsprint to the United States at peacetime levels.

I felt at the conclusion of the discussion that I had made a favourable impression upon Mr. Hull. He, however, did say that he hoped co-operative collaboration would result in a satisfactory solution.

The discussion was concluded by my stating that we desired to be co-operative; that if he heard any further rumblings not to hesitate to send for me, and he said he would do so.

Since writing the above, I have been informed that representatives of the United States agencies concerned have an appointment to meet representatives of the Canadian agencies concerned in Ottawa on Tuesday next, the 11th instant, for discussion.

Ambassador of United States
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, January 12, 1944

My dear Mr. Robertson:

I am enclosing a statement† prepared by War Production Board representatives on the subject of the critical situation faced by the forest products industry of the northeastern states.

My Government believes that woods labor, which is in short supply, is a commodity to be shared in accordance with war needs and in conformity with the Hyde Park principles.[114] In this connection, it may be recalled that authorities of your Government have instructed industry controllers and administrators that short supply situations are not in themselves sufficient justification for banning the export of the affected commodities to the United States. Accordingly, I would be interested in knowing whether or not the Canadian authorities agree with the premise that woods labor is a commodity to be shared in the best interests of our joint war effort. If the Canadian authorities do agree with this premise, I should be very glad to know whether, as persistently reported to the American authorities, additional Canadian woods labor is available in the area contiguous to the American northeastern forest products industry.

May I point out that irrespective of the answers to the foregoing questions, the Canadian authorities have succeeded in raising the woods labor force actively employed in eastern Canada from some 20,000 men to something over 40,000 men during the past few months. During this same period no opportunity has been afforded United States employers to increase seasonally their force of Canadian workers and actually Canadian action has finally reduced the effective Canadian woods labor force employed in the areas across the border to levels one-third to one-fourth of that prevailing in recent normal peacetime years. In these circumstances, and with the industry's entire production now devoted to urgent war and essential needs as determined by the War Production Board, I venture to suggest that the decrease in the labor force made available to the American industry, engaged in producing high priority lumber and pulps, as contrasted with the increase in the labor force of the Canadian industry, engaged in such large proportion in production of newsprint, is not in accord with the primary needs of the war effort. The northeastern area in the United States is the only major pulp producing area east of the Rocky Mountains which is falling far behind rather than exceeding last year's production rates.

In closing this letter I should like briefly to refer to the hitherto unsuccessful effort of the War Production Board to persuade the Canadian administrative officials of the discriminatory effect which Order No. 20 of the Timber Controller and other regulations have had on the wartime activities of the United States forest products industry. I am happy to inform you in this connection that at conversations held in Ottawa on January 11-12 assurances were given that, upon receipt of certain additional information from the War Production Board, those operations of existing Canadian regulations which have handicapped the maximum production of pulpwood for export to the United States would be promptly and sympathetically reviewed. The information requested will be in the hands of the appropriate Canadian authorities almost at once, and it is thus hoped that action at the administrative level will take care of this important and hitherto most unsatisfactory aspect of the general problem.

Sincerely yours,

RAY ATHERTON

DESPATCH 53 Ottawa, January 14, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 47 of January 7th, concerning the employment of Canadian woodsmen in the Maine woods.

This matter was discussed at a meeting in Ottawa, on Tuesday, January 11th, between United States representatives and Canadian officials.

The United States representatives were:

The Hon. Ray Atherton, United States Ambassador
Mr. Lewis Clark, United States Embassy
Mr. Geoffrey Parsons, State Department
Mr. Boeschenstein, War Production Board
Mr. Cancell, War Production Board
General Rose, War Manpower Commission and
Mr. Bardsely, War Manpower Commission

The Canadian officials present were:

Mr. Robertson, Department of External Affairs
Mr. Keenleyside, Department of External Affairs
Mr. Deutsch, Department of External Affairs
Mr. Williamson, Timber Controller
Mr. Fowler, Wartime Prices and Trade Board and
Mr. Douglas, Wartime Prices and Trade Board

The Ambassador opened the discussion with the following oral statement:

"We met in September[115] to consider ways and means of increasing the amount of pulpwood available to the United States in its war effort, and I took the position under the Hyde Park principle that woods labor was a commodity like any other and should be shared where most effective and shared with us as we are sharing with you our coal and other commodities in short supply.

Since then, there have been technical discussions and Mr. Boeschenstein has explained the United States position, that we felt woodsmen were merely one part of the woods product problem and that we must have more wood pulp and pulpwood from Canada or woodsmen in the North East woods. Although I believe the Canadians recognize the situation, we have obtained merely less of each and I venture to point out that the agreement reached by our technicians in the meetings with the War Production Board terminating on October 20 has not been fulfilled by the Canadian authorities.

The Secretary of State, in view of these developments and in view of only an estimated 65 per cent, effectively employed woodsmen from across the border in the North Eastern woods, instead of the 4,200 we understood would be offered and the 3,500 finally offered, of whom 664 are, I understand, allocated to Canadian companies, took the matter up with the Canadian Ambassador in Washington, who undertook to refer this whole subject to the Prime Minister.

These conversations today are taking place in that the United States Government, despite the efforts of its officials, has failed to make headway in this question of material produced for war purposes. The Secretary of State understands that the Prime Minister is to be kept advised of the situation as it develops.

When the Canadian Government first raised this question in November 1941 wth the American Minister we regarded it as a problem for mutual cooperation, and we still so regard it. We are hopeful that all of us assembled here, with full appreciation of the war effort involved, may in these present discussions determine finally the policy for solving what is in essence a joint problem."

In the course of the discussion the United States representatives made the following points:

1. The decline in United States production of wood products has been stopped, by special efforts to recruit labour, in all regions except the North-East. In the North-East output remains substantially below last year.

2. About 12,500 workers are required for woods labour in the North-East. Approximately 2500 can be obtained locally which leaves a total of 10,000 to be met from Canadian sources. Last October the United States was given a quota of 3500. Actually there are now only about 3100 across the line owing to the conditions which do not permit replacements for labourers returning to their homes. If the number were brought up to the quota a deficit of 6500 would remain. A part of this deficit can be met from within the United States but it would be very helpful if about 3500 additional Canadians could be obtained.

3. The United States mills in the North-East are important sources of alpha pulps, nitrating pulps and market pulps, all of which are essential to the war effort. Lumber and box crates are also obtained from this region. Only about 17% of the Canadian woodsmen have been allocated to the production of pulpwood for newsprint.

4. The Canadian authorities have stated that it has become possible to increase the monthly export of newsprint to the United States from 182,000 tons to 200,000 tons. The War Production Board would prefer to obtain more pulp, pulpwood or labour rather than newsprint. Consequently W.P.B. is contemplating the stockpiling of the additional newsprint as an immediate measure pending information on whether or not Canada could supply more pulp or labour. If not, consideration will be given to repulping the additional newsprint.

5. While the Maine woods were given a quota of 3500 Canadians, the number at work is considerably less, because losses are not replaced. It would be very helpful if the movement could be so administered that the full quota would be available at all times.

6. The United States authorities would not suggest that any men already working in the Canadian woods or otherwise in essential work should be permitted to go to the Maine woods. However, it would be desirable to have survey made of the border areas for the purpose of finding out whether there is any labour which is not engaged in essential work and, if so, how much.

The Canadian representatives at the meeting made it clear that Canada is anxious to co-operate with the United States authorities in these matters, so that the resources of the two countries might be used most effectively for the common war effort. With this in mind it would not be possible to remove the controls over the movement of labour across the Maine border. Owing to the considerable differences in wage levels it was necessary to impose a quota and to keep the border closed except for brief periods of controlled recruiting. Otherwise labour would be drained away from essential Canadian operations or would be lost to the war effort of both countries through the disposition to remain idle on the farms while awaiting the opportunity to cross the line for higher earnings.

The Canadian woods labour situation was generally better than what was anticipated a few months ago. This improvement was the result of the special efforts, and intensive campaign of the Department of Labour to persuade farmers to work in the woods. Mr. MacNamara, the Deputy Minister of Labour, thought that these efforts were so thorough that he doubted that there was any significant amount of labour on farms, including the areas adjacent to Maine, available for the woods which is not already there. In spite of these efforts there is still a shortage of woods labour in Canada. Eastern Canadian lumber operators are ungreatly [urgently] requesting an additional 29,000 men. Consequently there is no surplus which could be permitted to go to the United States and, in Mr. MacNamara's opinion, any additional numbers which might be allowed to go to the Maine woods would directly or indirectly reduce the number available to Canadian operators.

It was explained that the Canadian authorities were aware that the number of Canadian woodsmen presently employed in Maine had fallen below the quota and that it was the intention all along to review the situation some time in January. Mr. MacNamara said that he would be agreeable to a re-opening of the border for a short period to enable recruiting up to the full quota of 3500 and that he would be glad to explore the possibility of administering the movement in such a way as to keep the quota filled.

With reference to the improvement in the Canadian production of newsprint Mr. Fowler explained that this was the result of the improvement in the woods labour situation. In the general effort to persuade farmers to work in logging camps it so happened that a larger number went into pulpwood cutting than had been anticipated. Since newsprint capacity is not fully employed expansion in output followed. Canadian pulp capacity is being completely utilized and no further increase in production is possible.

The United States representations were discussed in Cabinet War Committee on January 12th. After full consideration it was decided that the previous decision granting a quota of 3500 stand, and that the implementation of this decision, with respect to the filling of this quota, rest with the Department of External Affairs and National Selective Service. It was decided also that National Selective Service be directed to carry out a field survey in the area of Eastern Canada concerned, with a view to ascertaining the present availability of woods labour and the extent to which the essential requirements of Canadian operators were at present being filled. I have conveyed these decisions to Mr. Atherton, the United States Ambassador. I told the Ambassador that if the survey mentioned above showed that additional labour not employed in essential work in Canada was available, the matter of the quota could be re-considered in the light of that information.

In view of the Cabinet War Committee's decision the border will be opened in about a week for a short period to enable the Maine operators to recruit up to the full quota of 3500. After this the border will again be closed.

Yesterday Mr. Atherton left with me a statement† in which the United States view is presented at length. We shall prepare a reply to enquires which it contains. A copy of the statement is enclosed.

L'ambassadeur des États-Unis

Ambassador of United States

Ottawa, February 8, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson:

Following the conversation of the Canadian Ambassador with Mr. Hull on January 6 on the subject of Canadian woods labor and the subsequent visit to Ottawa of officials of the War Production Board, the War Manpower Commission and the Department of State, I addressed a communication to you on January 12 in regard to this problem. It was understood at that time that the Canadian Government was making an urgent survey to determine whether there was labor, available in the areas of Canada bordering the United States northeastern woods, which was not then engaged in productive work on behalf of the war effort.

Despite the urgency of the situation, approximately four weeks have elapsed and the American authorities have not yet been informed as to the result of the survey. As the season is well advanced it is of considerable importance that the American authorities know whether additional Canadian woods labor will be permitted to enter the United States to assist in meeting the critical situation in the northeastern woods.

In this connection, I think you should know that following publicity alleging that additional woods labor was available in the Province of Quebec, the Department of State has been somewhat disturbed to note certain statements attributed by the press to the Canadian authorities. According to the Canadian Press, a Labor Department spokesman has characterized the present quota as "pretty much the same (quota) as they always got" whereas, in actuality, the present quota is the smallest since the Canadian Government commenced exercising labor exit control. The same spokesman is said to have indicated that it was not possible to permit able-bodied men to "float over the border" because of the need of making certain that such men would return to their farms. It will hardly be necessary to remind the Canadian authorities that no Canadian woods laborer is allowed to enter the United States until his employer has posted a bond to ensure departure and that during his stay in the United States his presence is subject to constant check by United States immigration authorities. There is, moreover, no obstacle placed in the way of Canadian workers desiring to return to Canada as will be readily acknowledged by the Canadian authorities who have knowledge of the excessive labor turnover in this industry.

Other information coming to the attention of the Department of State through informal channels suggests that the Canadian authorities are apprehensive of criticism of Canada should men of draft age appear in the American forests. In this connection it is hardly necessary to remind the Canadian authorities that the work which these men would perform is directly related to important war needs and that the men come from a class, agricultural labor, which is also exempt from the draft in the United States. It is hardly conceivable that the presence of these men in the Maine woods could cause any criticism comparable to that regarding the woods labor problem as a whole which has already appeared in the press of the United States despite the efforts of responsible officials to discourage publicity of this sort. The American authorities, moreover, would be prepared at any time to explain the high value for war purposes which they place on the services of these men in the American woods.

Officers of the Canadian Government are also said to have expressed the view that this issue has been complicated by the absence of reliable factual data from both sides. If this view is in fact held by the Canadian authorities the American authorities would welcome information as to what further factual information they would desire to have from United States sources. On repeated occasions responsible officers of the United States Government have made available to the Director of National Selective Service of Canada and other officers of the Canadian Government information indicating the need for Canadian woods labor, the essentiality of the end product of their work, the efficacy of policing and control on the American side of the border and, in general, information on all pertinent aspects of the problem.

Naturally, the American authorities have never been able to present data concerning the number of men not engaged in productive employment in the Canadian border areas, and it has long been a matter of regret to the Amercain authorities that the Canadian authorities have not seen fit to share with them official Canadian data in regard thereto. It is for this reason that the American authorities especially welcomed the assurance that an urgent manpower survey was being made in the areas of Canada bordering the northeastern woods.

The fact that four weeks have been allowed to pass without our having been informed of the result of a manpower survey which we had understood would be made urgently, has created in the minds of the officers of my Government dealing with the matter the fear that they have not been successful in convincing the interested Canadian officials of the urgency and seriousness with which this problem is considered in the United States.

Sincerely yours,

RAY ATHERTON

Ottawa, February 9, 1944

My dear Mr. Atherton:

I refer to your note of January 12th and to your note of February 8th concerning the employment of Canadian woods workers in the Northeastern United States.

Following the discussion of this matter between United States and Canadian representatives on January 11th, the Canadian Department of Labour was asked to make a field survey in the border counties of Quebec and to report upon the availability of labour in these areas for employment in the Maine woods. The report of the Department of Labour containing the results of this survey states the situation to be as follows:

1. The intensive campaign carried on during the autumn to encourage farmers to take employment in winter woods operations has been very effective in the Quebec border area and all but a very few of the men who could safely be taken off the farms for this purpose have been taken. In the opinion of the local provincial agricultural representatives the number of men remaining on the farms is less than what is needed to maintain agricultural production and in a relatively short period steps will have to be taken to move men back to the farms in preparation for the spring season.

2. The requirements of Canadian operators from the Quebec border counties have not been filled. Employment Offices in this area have 500 to 600 outstanding orders for Canadian companies.

3. In Quebec as a whole there are almost 60,000 men employed in woods operations at present. This number is at least 7,700 short of what is required.

In view of these circumstances the report concludes that additional men could not be made available from the Quebec border area for employment in the United States without diverting workers directly or indirectly from essential producton in Canada. Since no purpose would be served by such a diversion, the Canadian Government feel that the present limit of 3,500 men allowed to cross the border for employment in the forests of Northeastern United States should not be increased.

Yours sincerely,

IMMEDIATE. Following for N. A. Robertson from the Ambassador, Begins: Mr. Stettinius, Acting Secretary, requested me to call upon him this morning, which I did. He desired to further discuss the question of Canadian-United States wood labour problems in the northeastern United States.

He told me that they were being further pressed in the matter. I replied by stating that if we were to get anywhere each Government must have faith in the other; that I was advised by my Government that they were doing everything that could possibly be done to relieve the situation. I further stated that they fully appreciated the war necessities of the problem, but that I could not hold out any hope of their being able to substantially better the present conditions.

He accepted my statements, and I hope that we will not in the near future be subject to further pressure by him. Ends.

TELETYPE WA-991 Washington, February 19, 1944

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: You will have received the Ambassador's teletype WA-983 of February 18th regarding his talk with Stettinius on the Maine woodsmen question. In the afternoon I was asked to see Hickerson on this matter, and he took with me a much stronger line than Mr. Stettinius took with Mr. McCarthy. Hickerson said the main grievance of the State Department, and he expressed it in no uncertain terms, was over the procedure adopted by the Canadian Government in this matter. The State Department had been waiting for weeks for a reply to their note, when the Minister of Labour announced in the House of Commons the rejection of their request.[116] They felt that it was, to say the least, discourteous that they should have first been informed of the matter in this way. Subsequently, of course, our rejection was officially confirmed by your letter of February 9th, which Hickerson thinks is pretty curt in form and unimpressive in content. The Department furthermore feel that, apart from the procedure adopted, their representations have not really been given the consideration they deserved and that they have not been put in possession of facts which would enable them to reply to the strong congressional pressure to which they are at present subjected. Hickerson finally admitted that this pressure was political in character and influenced no doubt by the nature of the commodity under consideration; pulp and paper. They hope that the last word has not been said by the Canadian Government in this matter and that steps may yet be taken to meet the American position.

2. Later in the afternoon, Parsons phoned me to say that Senator Brewster, as a member of the Truman Committee[117], had asked for a copy of your note of February 9th to Mr. Atherton. He had been told that this could not be given without the consent of the Canadian Government, but that such consent would be requested. As I mentioned to you on the telephone yesterday, I told Parsons that I would forward this request but that undoubtedly the Canadian authorities would wish to know whether Senator Truman intended to publish the letter or not; whether it was also intended to turn over to him and the Truman Committee previous correspondence concerning this matter and, if so, how much. They are looking into this matter, but meanwhile hope the question of publication in principle can be considered immediately by the Canadian authorities. Personally, I think we should try to avoid this, if at all possible, as the correspondence is not, I think, of a character and form which either Government would really wish to see given to the press.

3. Contrary to that received by the Ambassador, I got the impression that we would very definitely hear more of this matter. I hope I am wrong, as it certainly would be a great misfortune if this issue, unimportant in itself, were permitted to develop serious irritations. Ends.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] February 19, 1944

I am enclosing copies of Washington messages WA-983 and WA-991 with further reference to the question of the Maine woodsmen. Twice this year Mr. McCarthy has been asked by the Secretary of State to come down to the State Department, and each time it has been to receive a complaint about our handling of the woods labour problem. He has taken a strong line and stuck to his guns, and I very much hope he is correct in believing that his explanation of the position has satisfied the United States Government.

From the second message reporting conversations which Pearson had with Hickerson on the same subject later that same day, I am afraid we are in for further public controversy. I wish our position were stronger, both in respect of the substantial issue and of the way it has been handled. The Americans have some ground for feeling aggrieved in that their representations were answered rather cavalierly in the House of Commons by the Minister of Labour before they had received a reply to their note. You will recall that the War Committee decided at its meeting on Friday, February 4th, to defer until its next meeting consideration of the report made by the National Selective Service on the woods labour available in the Quebec counties along the Maine border. Apparently the question was brought up, however, at a meeting of Council on Monday, February 7th, when it was agreed that the Minister of Labour should go ahead and make a statement in the House based on this report. I did not know that this decision had been taken and therefore was not in a position to reply to Mr. Atherton's letter until after the Government's position had been put on Hansard. In the circumstances I did not think I could do more than confirm to the United States Ambassador the statement of Government policy that had already been made by the Minister (See my letter of February 9th attached).

Senator Brewster of Maine has now asked that a copy of this letter be made available to the Truman Committee when presumably it would find its way into the American press. It is not a very impressive statement of our position, and I should not like to see it published either alone or with Mr. Atherton's letter of February 8th, to which it is in reply (copy attached).

As I have several times suggested to War Committee, this question of the availability of labour for the Maine woods has a nuisance value out of all relation to its economic importance, either to us or to the Americans. The latter, under political pressures from their operators and their newspapers, have strained every argument and used all sorts of pressures to get another twelve or fifteen hundred men for their woods operations; nor has our attitude in the matter been entirely uninfluenced by local political pressures. Our woods operators and particularly newsprint manufacturers have been equally anxious to reserve what labour is available for their operations. The difficulties of reaching a fair settlement have been increased by conflicting evidence about the facts of the case. The survey that National Selective Service was asked to make by the War Committee was intended to settle the question of fact, but it did not really do so. In the first place, the survey was not made by the National Selective Service itself but by the agricultural field officers of the Provincial Government, who might be expected to have a certain bias in favour of keeping farmers on their farms in Quebec instead of having them work in the woods. In the second place, the survey was made by regional sampling, which may or may not have been really representative. In the third place, the evidences of availability of local workers collected by National Selective Service in rebuttal of American newspaper charges and quoted by Mr. Mitchell in the House, were themselves in conflict on some points with the report submitted by the Quebec Agronomes. These were points which I hoped to have an opportunity of putting to the War Committee before a decision was taken as to the reply which should be returned to the United States Government.

CANADIAN WOODS LABOUR IN NEW ENGLAND

17. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported that further strong representations had been made by the U.S. Department of State with regard to the position taken by the government and the statement made in the House by the Minister of Labour with regard to the admission of Canadian woods labour into New England.

The U.S. government based their argument for assistance from Canada upon the most effective utilization of the resources of the two countries for the prosecution of the war. They disputed the Canadian version of the situation and resented the fact that the Canadian statement had been made public before being communicated to them. The State Department had also passed on a request for the release to the Truman Committee of the inter-governmental correspondence on this subject.

The matter appeared likely to assume proportions out of all relation to its actual importance.

(Memorandum, External Affairs to the Prime Minister, Feb. 19, 1944; also telegrams Nos. WA-983 and WA-991, Canadian Ambassador, Washington, to External Affairs, dated Feb. 18 and Feb. 19, 1944).

18. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE suggested that, in present circumstances, it was virtually impossible to obtain a reliable statement of the availability or otherwise of Canadian workers for employment in the American woods. Reports were bound to be affected by the interests of those from whom they were obtained. So long as employment in the United States offered higher wages and freedom from Canadian taxes, it would be possible to find men willing and anxious to accept such employment, regardless of what importance attached to what they were doing in Canada. Any large scale release of Canadian labour must have a serious effect upon Canadian lumbering because of the wage differential involved.

19. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR pointed out that even if surplus manpower were available at present, it would shortly be needed for farm labour. The question of agricultural leave was already exercising the Services.

20. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE felt certain that the Canadian government had not, at any time, accepted the principles of the Hyde Park Agreement as applicable to manpower. Such a view was quite untenable.

21. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY felt strongly that no change should be made in the attitude of the government. The U.S. government should be told flatly that no further men could be released.

22. THE SECRETARY said that the Prime Minister took the view that, if, in fact, no surplus Canadian labour were available, no change should be made in the present position; if, in reality, there were a surplus, an effort should be made to meet the United States' needs.

23. THE WAR COMMITTEE after further discussion, agreed that, in the circumstances, it could not accede to the U.S. government's representations and that the position should be explained to U.S. authorities, in the light of the foregoing discussion.

Dear Mr. Pearson,

I am enclosing copy of a letter from Mr. MacNamara, covering a memorandum he had received from Paul Goulet, the Deputy Director of National Selective Service. I can hardly believe that any official United States Government agency would send its own field investigators to make enquiries in Canada without informing the appropriate Canadian Government agencies of its desire to do so, but you might make some enquiries to see if Mr. Sawyer has, in fact, the status of "special investigator from Washington" which he appears to have assumed.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I attach herewith copy of memorandum from Mr. Paul Goulet.

A Mr. Sawyer, who is introducing himself as a special investigator from Washington, is at St. Georges de Beauce interviewing Mayors and others in regard to the labour situation.

I suppose it is a pretty hard thing to stop but on the other hand I certainly think the Washington authorities should be informed of the matter if they have not already heard of it.

I suppose we will be hearing the results of the investigation quite soon.

I think some means should be found to stop this "sniping".

Yours very truly,

Mémorandum du directeur adjoint, le Service sélectif national, au sous-ministre du Travail

Memorandum from Deputy Director, National Selective Service, to Deputy Minister of Labour

Late yesterday afternoon Mr. Adrien Morin, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, very kindly telephoned from Quebec to inform us that he had just been made aware by Mayor Boulanger of St. Come (Beauce) who is also the Wartime Prices and Trade Board representative at St. Georges de Beauce, that two gentlemen were interviewing some mayors in Beauce county, and maybe elsewhere in regard to the available manpower which could be employed in Maine, not particularly now but at all times, as bush workers. One is Mr. Hutton, official of the Great Northern Paper Co., Maine; the other, Mr. Sawyer, who introduced himself to Mr. Boulanger as a special investigator from Washington.

After speaking with Mr. Morin, at his suggestion I called Mr. Boulanger at the Wartime Prices office at St. Georges. He confirmed that he had been interviewed the night before at St. Come and summarized his talk as follows:

How many men in the parish would be willing and available to work at all times in Maine?

Also in the conversation it was stated that the United States were actually attacking the enemy and here in Canada, due to the fact that we had voluntary enlistment only, we could dispose more easily of manpower to help them cut the wood which they need so pressingly.

It may be that this special investigator from Washington is there at the instigation of the Great Northern Paper, who are mainly responsible, in my opinion, for having raised the stir which has given us so many headaches lately. It is difficult to believe that Washington would send an investigator into our country to check on the province of Quebec Agriculture Department and our Minister's statements, without first having the courtesy of advising us of their intentions. I feel quite incensed at the apparent fact that some American operators forget that we also have operations of our own to look after, that is forestry, farming and other essential needs.

2. It seems to me outrageous that an agency of the Government or Congress of the United States should send an investigator of anything to Canada without first seeking and obtaining the permission of the Canadian Government. The objections to such a course are even more obvious when the subject of investigation is a matter at issue between the two Governments.

3. I would suggest that you speak to Hickerson about this.[118] It is not necessary to decide immediately whether a written protest is desirable.

TELETYPE EX-1154 Ottawa, March 17, 1944

Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Here follows our long deferred reply to your message WA-991 of February 19th on the Maine woodsmen position. How much of it should now be used and in what way I shall gladly leave to your discretion.

2. In view of Hickerson's remarks I think it would be well to explain to him that we were not very happy over the way this question was handled. The State Department should not have received the first answer to their representations in the form of a statement in the House, but they should also understand that this sort of slip-up is not always avoidable.

3. As I explained to Atherton at the time, the United States note of January 12th could not be answered until the Department of Labour had completed its review of the actual employment situation in the field. Then the Minister of Labour made his statement in the House before we had had an opportunity to reply to the United States note. I did not know when I was speaking to Atherton that Cabinet had approved, on Monday, February 7th, of the Minister of Labour making a statement in the House based on the Selective Service report on the woods labour available in the Quebec counties along the Maine border. This statement was an answer to misstatements which had appeared in the Boston Herald, which the Government felt it desirable should be corrected at once. The War Committee of the Cabinet had previously decided on February 4th to defer until its next weekly meeting consideration of this report, and I had accordingly told Mr. Atherton that I could not give him an answer until the Government policy had been settled.

4. You may assure Hickerson that the United States representations received very complete and careful consideration in the Cabinet and by the Government Departments concerned and that throughout our negotiations we have endeavoured to do our utmost to meet the needs of the United States operators in the northeastern United States. Only with reluctance did the Canadian Government feel compelled to conclude that the present limit of 3,500 men allowed to cross the border should not be increased.

5. While we feel the State Department is by now well conversant with the Canadian situation they may be interested in knowing that a recent review of Canadian conditions shows that on the Canadian side our requirements of essential forest products have not been adequately met and are steadily increasing. Our commitments to the United Kingdom have not been fulfilled in spite of every effort, including the return to Canada of a large contingent of the Canadian Forestry Corps.

6. While we have more men in the bush this year than last there are nearly 25,000 unfilled orders in Canada for woods labour required to produce essential woods products. Nearly 8,000 of these were in Quebec. We are under continuous pressure from Canadian operators not to allow more men to cross the border, men who if not attracted by the higher wages offered in the United States would be content to work in Canadian woods operations. The wage differential is such that a relaxation of the border crossing limit would seriously threaten the maintenance of our own vitally necessary wage controls.

7. The Department of Labour has under constant consideration a satisfactory means of keeping the number of men from Canada in the Maine woods up to the quota of 3,500. A constant check is imperative because many of the Canadian workers in the Maine woods have never been in the habit of staying on the job over a lengthy period. There is no means through regulations of keeping men on the job in the United States or preventing their return to Canada when they feel that they are needed on their farms in Quebec or have other reasons for returning at any time.

8. Our policy has been to open the border at definite intervals to refill quotas when the necessity became urgent and apparent. To permit replacement of workers in the United States as they leave employment, by opening the border continually, would nullify our efforts through control of the movement to secure labour so urgently required from the border areas for Canadian operations. This would have the effect of immobilizing many men in this area who would remain on their farms waiting for a chance to cross the border instead of going to Canadian woods camps.

9. The men who went to the woods last fall are already starting to filter back to their farms for spring work. The permits to woods workers in this country expire April 1st and those to woods workers in Maine expire April 30th. Within the next month the Department of Labour will have to consider carefully our agricultural needs for the coming season if we are to maintain essential food production for our armed forces and the United Kingdom, and to what degree this must be given priority until autumn.

10. I am rather afraid that documents given to the Truman Committee would find their way into the press. I think we should attempt to avoid publication of our letter of February 9th to Mr. Atherton and any part of the exchange of correspondence in the first place because I cannot believe that either government would really wish to give correspondence of this character to the press and in the second place because this Maine woods question has already assumed the status of a problem out of all relation to its economic importance and any publication of correspondence would probably provoke newspaper controversy which could only do mischief. Hickerson should appreciate the fact that we strongly desire to avoid such a development. However, if you are put under heavy pressure to give something to the Truman Committee there would be no objection to giving them the substance of paragraphs 4-9 inclusive of this message. Ends.

Le ministre-conseiller, l'ambassade aux États-Unis, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Minister-Counsellor, Embassy in United States, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Washington, March 22, 1944

I should like to refer to your EX-1154 of March 17th regarding the Maine woods labour question. Enclosed are two copies of a letter dated March 21st† which I have sent to Mr. Hickerson of the State Department. The letter contains all the information in your teletype with the exception of the first and last sentences of paragraph 10 of the teletype.

When delivering the letter to Mr. Hickerson today, Mr. Wershof added orally that there was an obvious danger that documents given to the Truman Committee would find their way into the press even if the Truman Committee did not officially release them to the press. Mr. Hickerson did not dissent from this, and I am hopeful that there will be no further request for permission to give the exchange of correspondence to the Truman Committee.

If Mr. Hickerson should raise this particular matter again, we will keep in mind the statement at the end of your teletype that, if necessary, the Truman Committee can be given the substance of paragraphs 4 to 9 inclusive of your teletype.

We should not be surprised if the Truman Committee produces a report on the Maine woods labour question during the next couple of months. As you know, this subject was dealt with briefly in the Third Annual Report of the Truman Committee released a couple of weeks ago.

Sincerely yours,

L. B. PEARSON

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

[Ottawa,] April 19, 1944

I gave you a note the other day about prospective trouble about the Maine woods labour situation. The War Committee's feeling was that we should not be pushed from our present policy by the threat of adverse publicity in the United States arising out of reports from the Truman Committee or from the American Newspaper Association.

Since then, Mr. MacNamara has been in touch with General Rose of the United States Manpower Commission. Rose was anxious to secure the renewal, after May 1st, of the Exit Permits under which some 3,500 Canadian workers are employed in the Maine woods. MacNamara told him, after talking with me, that the Canadian Government could not be expected to consider sympathetically any American requests for manpower if they were being badgered or blackmailed by threats of adverse newspaper publicity from United States Government or trade sources. In no case could we consider requests for additional labour beyond that presently authorized.

MacNamara tells me tonight that he has had a wire† from General Rose, who believes he has been able to check both the Truman Commission and the American Newspaper Association. He proposes a joint announcement, which would come from Paul MacNutt, Chairman of the United States Manpower Commission, and the Minister of Labour to the effect that the Canadian and American manpower authorities have reached agreement on meeting the needs of woods labour in the highly critical Northeastern area on the basis of renewing, as from May 1st, the presently authorized Exit Permits for an average of 3,500 Canadian workers in the Maine woods. He suggests that, in making such an announcement, MacNutt would say that the United States authorities were very gratified by the cooperation which they had received from Canada.[119]

I think this would be a very satisfactory solution of a difficult business, which has always had possibilities of mischief in it far beyond its intrinsic economic importance. The American formula proposes Exit Permits for "an average of 3,500 workers", whereas we have been issuing Permits up to a maximum of 3,500 workers. The difference does not seem important to Mr. MacNamara or to me. We would both recommend a prompt acceptance of this agreement. If you approve, I do not think the question need go back to War Committee or Cabinet.[120]

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in United States

Following for Scott.[121] Begins: Since our agreement to participate in the Decentralization Plan[122] we have been asked on a number of occasions, and on fairly short notice, to express our views of modifications proposed by the United States authorities. The most recent modifications of this kind were announced by Bulletins 137 and 139 which we have accepted pro tem. Although they do not fully satisfy Canadian requirements having in mind (a) the generally improved shipping and supply situation, (b) the fact that Canada's national economy and export trade do not exactly parallel those of the United States, and (c) that all exports from Canada, except newsprint, are subject to export permits thus ensuring adequate control.

On the basis of the foregoing considerations, will you please discuss the proposed modifications set forth below with the United States authorities and let us know as soon as possible whether they have any objections. If not, it is our intention to propose that this modified plan apply to Canada in relation to all the Latin American countries except Argentina. If the United States authorities concur in our proposals, we presume that we may continue to look to the United States Missions to assist in the administration of the simplified Canadian plan in those countries where they have assumed this responsibility.

Quote — In view of (a) the improved shipping and supply situation for exports to Latin American destinations, (b) the different character of Canadian export trade as compared with that of the United States, and (c) in an effort to simplify the Decentralization procedure as it affects shipments from Canada, it has been decided to require Import Recommendations (in the case of Brazil, Preference Requests; Mexico, Export Recommendations) for only the commodities detailed hereunder:

Woodpulp
Iron and steel — sheets and malleable castings only
Paper-makers felts
Fourdrinier wire
Copper bars, rods, strips, sheets, plates, tubing, wire and cable
Brass and bronze bars, rods, strips, sheets, plates and tubing

[121]H. A. Scott, conseiller commercial./H. A. Scott, Commercial Counsellor.
[122]Voir le volume 9, document 1138./See Volume 9, Document 1138.

Valves of all kinds, including brass, bronze, iron, etc.
Automobile parts and accessories
Batteries (storage) and plates
Nickel in primary forms including ingots, shot, etc.
Brushes with natural bristles 2 inches or more in length
Rubber and products of which rubber is an important component
Kraft wrapping paper
Non-ferrous metals, including babbit metal; type metal; lead in pigs, refined, etc; lead pipe, sheet, traps and bends; aluminum and products including scrap; zinc and products

The following observations should be noted with regard to the above list:

1. The commodities listed are in decidedly restricted supply in Canada but limited quantities may be exported if the circumstances warrant. Import Recommendations will, therefore, assist the Canadian export control authorities to decide whether or not to approve applications for export permits covering these commodities.

2. Estimates of probable supply from Canada will continue to be furnished for most of the listed items as an indication of the limits to which Import Recommendations may be issued by the various Country Agencies. In cases where estimates are not furnished Import Recommendations may be issued up to 5 per cent of the United States estimate of supply.

3. Estimates of probable supply from Canada will also continue to be furnished for certain other commodities not listed above, such as upper leather, agricultural machinery, asbestos, calcium carbide, sodium cyanide, etc. These other commodities, while in short supply, are not, strictly speaking, critical materials and the Import Recommendation is, therefore, not considered necessary. In certain cases the estimates are prepared because the commodity is of a bulky nature and the estimates will be of assistance in planning the use of available shipping space.

4. Certain commodities in critically short supply do not appear on the above list. Failure to list them does not mean that they are available from Canada. On the contrary, they will probably not be exported from Canada in any circumstances. It is believed that Latin American importers will discover upon inquiry that such commodities are not obtainable in Canada and that there will not, therefore, be any applications for Import Recommendations presented to the Country Agencies for commodities in this category.

5. It is also believed that normal commercial inquiries will discover those commodities, other than those listed above, which are in relatively free supply in Canada and that such transactions should not be hampered by the requirement of Import Recommendations.

6. Latin American Country Agencies may continue to issue Import Recommendations for any commodity other than those listed above to indicate a degree of essentiality for a particular shipment. Such shipments will be given preferred treatment by the Canadian export control authorities if the commodity is one that may be exported from Canada.

7. Import Recommendations will not be required even for shipments of the above listed commodities if the order is valued at $25 or less.

8. The above list of commodities will be kept up-to-date by such additions and deletions as may from time to time become necessary. End Quote.

If the United States authorities concur in the above rollback having application to Canadian participation in Decentralization, we would leave it to them to decide whether or not to publicize the change in Current Control Bulletins or the press. We will, of course, publicize the change in the Commercial Intelligence Journal, trade papers and the Canadian press, and will endeavour to arrange for publicity in the Latin American countries.

It is our hope to make this simplified Canadian plan effective March 1st and we would, therefore, like to have the views of the United States authorities as soon as possible so that sufficient time will be given to present the modifications to the Latin American countries concerned. Ends.

TELETYPE WA-672 Washington, February 3, 1944

Following for C. M. Croft,[123] Department of Trade and Commerce, from Scott, Begins: At a meeting in F.E.A. this morning, we were advised that airgrams have gone to Latin American Governments concerned covering a further roll-back of decentralization. It is proposed to remove the following commodities from the decentralization scheme: radio tubes from radio receivers, motor trucks, typewriters, petroleum products and repair parts for capital equipment distinct from repair parts, say, for motor cars or ordinary wearing parts. These items are all in very short supply and are subject to strict W.P.B. [War Production Board] control over production and distribution. W.P.B.'s controls conflict with decentralization control and for this reason it is proposed to ask the importing countries to waive decentralization covering these products.

I will have particulars and copies of the airgrams† with me for discussion in Ottawa next week. Ends.

TELETYPE EX-591 Ottawa, February 10, 1944

Following for W. F. Bull,[124] Canadian Embassy, from C.M. Croft. Begins: Your WA-672 of February 3rd was discussed whilst Scott was here and we agree with him that the principle behind the removal of the listed items from Decentralization is difficult to understand. Since the commodities concerned are of little interest to us we will follow the U.S. lead in this further roll-back but it seems to us that this action by the United States authorities lends further weight to our arguments in presenting our proposed modification and that you should not fail to make use of this fact when you receive instructions (in the form of a teletype which we have recommended to External Affairs) to take your informal discussion to a higher level in State Department.

The obscure principle apparently being followed by the United States authorities in this latest roll-back clearly indicates that the original purpose for decentralization has disappeared. If commodities are being removed from decentralization because of the existence of other United States controls on production and distribution the United States authorities should be reminded, as I am sure you have already done a number of times, that all Canadian exports to Latin America, except newsprint, are under control by export permits and thus by the appropriate Administrator or Controller responsible for production. In the case of newsprint a very effective control is in operation, as you know.

This suggests the adoption of one of the following alternatives: (a) the complete scrapping of Decentralization by both United States and Canada (b) withdrawal of Canada from the plan, or (c) the simplification of the plan to the degree which we have proposed in order to relieve exporters in both Canada and the United States and those concerned with administration in the Latin American countries of as much of the onerous paper work as possible. We trust that you will shortly be in a position to report progress along one of these alternative lines.

Following for Scott. Begins: My EX-306 of January 22, proposed modification of Decentralization Plan.

We understand that the informal discussions which you have had with officials of the State Department and F.E.A. have not led to any decision with regard to the approval of the simplifications suggested in the teletype of January 22, and that you consider that our proposals have not in fact received serious consideration. These proposals were put forward because Canadian exporters have informed the Department of Trade and Commerce that they question the value of continuing decentralization in any form and because we are inclined to share this opinion so far as Canadian interests are concerned. The proposals constitute a compromise which would in our view meet the wish of the United States authorities to continue the Plan in form at least. The point of our proposals is that they retain the frame-work of the Plan but apply its procedure only to those Canadian exports for which some form of documentation as to end use is needed.

In view of the fact that our proposals are designed to enable us to meet the substance of the United States wishes, we consider that it would be appropriate, if you see no objection to such a course, to take the matter to a higher level in the State Department and to point out that, as we had hoped to make the simplified proposals effective as from March 1, we should welcome an early expression of the views of the United States authorities concerned in order to avoid the danger of working at cross purposes. Ends.

TELETYPE WA-1128 Washington, February 25, 1944

IMMEDIATE. Reference your EX-306 of January 22nd and your subsequent EX-619 of February 12th, re proposed Modification of Decentralization Plan.

The following acknowledgement has now been received from State Department by the Commercial Counsellor to his letter of January 24th† to that Department, based on the instructions given in your teletypes [sic] referred to above:

"This is with reference to your memorandum of January 24, 1944, addressed to Mr. James Farriss, containing the views of the Canadian Government with regard to the modification and simplification of the decentralization procedure of Export Control in the other American Republics, and your request that you be informed as to the attitude of this Government in connection therewith. I also refer, in this connection, to the several conversations which I have had with you and Mr. Bull regarding this matter and your discussions with Mr. Raymond Dodson of the Foreign Economic Administration.

"I am pleased to be able to confirm to you that it is the intent of this Government to modify the decentralization procedure in the other American Republics in an orderly and progressive manner, and as rapidly as conditions of war, supply, and shipping permit. Thus, in agreement with you, there have been transmitted to the Embassies of this Government in the other Republics proposals to eliminate five additional categories of commodities from the requirements of obtaining import recommendations. This proposed modification, in addition to the modification which was effective on January 1, 1944, will be helpful in arriving at the ultimate objective the establishment of a limited positive list of commodities for which import recommendations are required, all commodities not on the list being excepted from this requirement. The Department, as well as the Foreign Economic Administration, hopes the positive list can be established as of July 1, 1944, with regard to the majority of the other Republics, and possibly sooner with regard to Brazil.

"The Department and the Foreign Economic Administration have examined with care the positive list of commodities as outlined in your memorandum under reference and believe that it provides an excellent basis for mutual discussions looking toward a correlation with the possible list of American products, studies in connection with which are being actively made.

"It is my distinct impression that your proposal and the objective which this Government has in mind are entirely compatible and that further mutual discussions will solve any minor details as to the most desirable procedure to be followed in the modification of the Decentralization Plan.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES F. KNOX, JR.
Chief, American Republics Requirements Division."

For your information, a separate communication† was received from F.E.A. on this subject and was transmitted informally to Croft, Department of Trade and Commerce on February 23rd (our WA-1063).† F.E.A.'s letter was in effect their comment on the Commercial Counsellor's official letter to the State Department, a copy of which was furnished F.E.A. at the time.

L'ambassadeur aux États-Unis
au secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures

Ambassador in United States to Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs

No. 1168 Washington, May 10, 1944

Sir:

Recent discussions between Canadian and United States officials in Washington indicate a growing uneasiness on the part of the latter that Canada is converting wartime industries into the manufacture of civilian goods more rapidly than the United States and that therefore we are achieving a preferential position in respect of the domestic consumption and export of civilian goods. Indeed, there is much loose and misinformed talk here in United States official circles that we are earmarking a substantial percentage (15% has been mentioned by one official) of our production of civilian goods for export.

2. The question has been brought to a head in discussions with F.E.A. over clearance of our estimates of proposed shipments to Latin America; but it is, of course, much broader than this. It also concerns current discussions regarding combined export-policy machinery. It has, in fact, definite political implications bearing on the general relationship between the two countries and if not carefully watched might easily disturb that relationship.

3. A member of this Embassy has recently received, in discussions with F.E.A., certain specific indications of U.S. uneasiness on this score. He was told that there was some feeling in this Administration that Canada was taking advantage of its easier limitation orders on such things as bronze water meters, aluminum pots and pans, and pipe. It was pointed out, for instance, that in clearing our pipe estimates of shipments to South America, F.E.A. would reconsider British Empire demands on the United States under Lend-Lease for this and any other commodity which Canada was in a position to offer for export. It was even hinted that F.E.A. would consider the possibility of requiring export licenses for all shipments to Canada as a method of controlling the movement of merchandise commodities to Canada if we insisted in non-restricting the export of manufactured articles containing U.S. components or manufactured articles similar to articles imported from the United States; for example, cotton textiles and cotton products.

4. In bringing these matters to your attention, I do not wish to exaggerate their importance or to suggest that we have not an answer to American complaints. I realize also that these complaints have been made on a comparatively low operating level and possibly a different attitude might be taken higher up, where Canada's reasonable and co-operative policy in these matters is doubtless better understood and appreciated. I feel, however, that it is essential that we put forward the facts of our situation on every possible occasion to the United States officials interested; from the highest to the lowest. We should emphasize, as indeed we have emphasized, that Canada has no apologies to make to anyone for the control she has exercised over both exports and domestic consumption of civilian goods in the interests of the successful prosecution of the war. It should also be pointed out that there is already adequate Combined and Joint machinery in existence where all these matters can be discussed by the governments concerned.

5. Nevertheless, consideration should, I think, be given to the desirability of a formal and top-level approach to the State Department on this whole question. Before any such approach can effectively be made, however, it seems to me that Canadian policy should definitely be established on the following:

(a) The export of commodities containing United States components.

In this regard, I feel that Canada should be free to export goods containing new United States components and materials, just as the United States is free to export goods containing Canadian components and materials.

(b) The export of commodities which United States manufacturers are unable to make because of limitation orders.

In view of the fact that Canadian regulations on manufacture are, to say the least, as sensible and well devised to meet wartime demands as similar United States regulations, there seems to be no reason why Canadian exports should be bound by United States limitation orders.

(c) The export of raw materials for the manufacture of commodities in third countries, the manufacture of which is prohibited in the United States by limitation orders.

I do not see why Canada's exports to third countries should be restricted to materials, the domestic manufacture of which is approved in the United States. This would be tantamount to the imposition by the United States, and Canadian co-operation therein, of limitation orders on the whole world regardless of whether they are sensible at home or relevant abroad.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures à l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in United States

No. 843 Ottawa, June 8, 1944

Sir,

Your despatch No. 1168 of May 10 mentions "growing uneasiness" on the part of certain U.S. officials that Canada is converting wartime industries more rapidly than the United States and is thereby achieving a preferential position in respect of the domestic consumption and export of civilian goods.

Our reply must mention the mounting resentment on the part of certain Canadians who consider that such concern is unfounded; that it disparages the seriousness of our war effort and that as a consequence of it difficulties have been put in the way of legitimate and justifiable Canadian exports.

It is to be hoped you have over-estimated the uneasiness and we the resentment, but in any event both must be dissipated for the good of our general relationship. We suggest that this can best be done by establishing at top level principles which we can both apply to export problems. While principles will not eliminate competition for markets, they will ensure that neither of us fights the battles of peace-time trade with the weapons of wartime control and prerogative.

We submit the following: —

(A) Neither country shall export at the expense of the united war effort.

(B) Neither country shall take advantage of a preferred wartime position to further its commercial export interests at the expense of the other.

(A) [sic] No Canadian exports have been made at the expense of men, materials or facilities needed for war.

The movement of Canadian manpower is regulated by National Selective Service. We do not use DMS or WPTB orders for the purpose. The United States, we understand, does so use limitation and material orders. The lifting of a material order in Canada may have no effect on the manufacture of goods from the material if, as is frequently the case, no fabricating facilities are available or if no labour is available. Since the Canadian war programme is short of men, National Selective Service does not permit labour of use in war production to move to the production of non-essential goods.

On materials, the war effort has always had first claim and those United States officials who are concerned with the supply and distribution of materials know it well. When aluminum was in critically short supply, although Canada could supply her own war and civilian needs many times over, she devoted proportionately less to civilian use than did the United States with a domestic supply far below her own war needs. You can appreciate the feelings aroused here by the attitude of the United States that although aluminum is now in surplus supply, we should not declare it surplus and should not export it because somebody somewhere may make pots and pans out of it at a time when the United States manufacturer is not permitted to do so for reasons unrelated to aluminum. The United States has always been in a position to draw upon Canadian supply for war and essential use through the Materials Co-ordinating Committee, United States-Canada. The United States is kept fully informed of the Canadian production and stocks.

As to facilities there again exists special machinery — The Joint War Production Committee, United States-Canada — to ensure that any surplus facilities in Canada which are needed by the United States for war purposes are put to war use. No facilities have been converted to peace-time use that have been needed to meet war requirements. The United States has had a particularly good opportunity of utilizing plants not required by the Canadian war programme and she has taken advantage of the opportunity. When any facilities are given over to peace-time purposes, it is because they are not needed for war.

(B) The preferred position problems arise from such conditions as control of shipping; conduct of diplomatic negotiations; administration of screening units in the fields. You have many examples to hand which we have raised with the U.S. authorities in respect to Venezuela, Peru, Martinique and North Africa.

When we apply the above standards to categories a), b) and c) mentioned in your letter we arrive at the same answers as you have.

a) The export of commodities containing U.S. components.

As you have indicated, the obvious answer here to criticism is to say that Canada is as free to export goods containing United States components and materials as the United States is free to export goods containing Canadian components and materials, subject, of course, to the principles enunciated.

It appears to us, moreover, that the question in practice answers itself. When components are in short supply in the United States, they are obtainable only for approved use. Exercise of Canada's right to export depends on her ability to obtain the components. Generally speaking, if such commodities are not made available in the United States for export they are not made available to Canadians for export. If they are available in the United States for export they should be made available in proper proportion to Canada for export. If not, then the U.S. wartime controls of priorities, scheduling and allocation would be made use of to further United States commercial export interests to the detriment of Canada.

b) The export of commodities which United States manufacturers are unable to make because of limitation orders.

We again arrive at your answer. To arrive at any other would be to subscribe to the principle "If either country is unable to export, then neither shall export."

Further, it has not been Canadian policy to prevent the import from the United States of commodities, the manufacture of which was prohibited in Canada, and in fact such goods are being imported. We assume conditions there are such that the manufacture can be allowed. If conditions are such in Canada that the manufacture can be allowed, one would expect the United States to welcome the addition to the supply.

c) The export of raw materials for the manufacture of commodities in a third country, the manufacture of which is prohibited in the United States by limitation orders.

Again we reach your answer. The United States and Canada cannot bind the importing nations to the controls imposed in our countries. We agree with you that Canada's export to third countries should not be restricted to commodities, the domestic manufacture of which is approved in the United States, for "this would be tantamount to the imposition by the United States and Canadian co-operation therein of limitation orders on the whole world regardless of whether they are sensible at home or relevant abroad."

More specifically we are amazed to read once again of bronze water meters. The United States and ourselves have shaken hands over the dead body of this problem at least half a dozen times. The case is well stated in Mr. Plumptre's memorandum to Mr. Bateman of April 11th:†

"Brass housings are made from a low grade ingot. This is in surplus in Canada; it has been repeatedly offered to U.S. but has been refused. U.S. regulations only permit housings of cast iron which, it is generally agreed, is an unsatisfactory material requiring for machining four times the man-hours required for brass. In short, brass is the better material under present circumstances, and there is no good reason why U.S. officials should for months have denied shipping space and thereby held up Canadian exports of brass meters to a normal Canadian market in South America."

On aluminum pots and pans, the answer surely must lie in aluminum. If it is in surplus war supply, if its use or export does no harm to the war effort, that should be an end to it. It is we who must and do complain about the interference on the part of the United States with our aluminum shipments to Latin America. These are still held up and we suggest that such interference is unwarranted and we urge you to press immediately for clearance.

The Department of Trade and Commerce has information from Rio indicating that so far this year no less than 420 tons of virgin aluminum had been taken by one firm alone; that the orders were originally for Canadian metal, but in view of the export permit situation in Canada, the orders were transferred to United States suppliers. They have advice also from Cuba that "substantial quantities are arriving from the United States."

As to pipe, Canada has always imported large quantities of steel from the United States for the manufacture of pipe, tubing, etc. The Steel Controller's statement on Canadian requirements of United States steel includes specific reference to the fact that a certain proportion will be used for re-export and the steel has been allocated on this declaration. The exports are examined very carefully to determine essentiality.

As to export from Canada of articles similar to those imported from the United States, there has been agreement that the principle to be applied is that such exports shall only be for essential use in the maintenance of past trade to old customers. This principle is based on the understanding that we are operating from a common pool. If the need is essential it will be filled. It is fair that it should be filled by the country that has developed the market. Whichever country is the supplier, the same amount of material moves.

You say that it has been hinted that unless we subscribe to certain limitations that export licences will be imposed. If there is the least danger of such a development, the matter should be taken up in the highest possible quarters immediately, for such a retrograde step would contravene declarations of the President and our Prime Minister. The United States has complete control over the allocation and distribution of materials and components needed for war. Canadian procurement in the United States is completely subject to those controls. For this reason, export controls to Canada were removed as they represented an unnecessary duplication of existing controls. Their re-imposition could not be interpreted otherwise than as a clear case of the imposition of wartime controls to further peace-time commercial interests.

We have not dealt with the rate of Canadian conversion to peace. It has, of course, not been more rapid than that of the United States. Our show of speed came in the conversion to war, not from it. Mr. Plumptre, for the CPRB needs, covered this ground fully and well in his memorandum dated April 11th to Mr. Bateman.

We subscribed to the Decentralization Plan as a means of avoiding over-supply to any country of materials in short supply and of avoiding overloading of distributing, shipping and port facilities. We tabled the most complete information on our export programmes. We regret to say that we found certain U.S. officials particularly at operating levels, over-critical of our programmes and reluctant to give us complete information on U.S. programmes. We ask that those in the United States Administration who understand and appreciate "Canada's reasonable and co-operative policy" — to use your words — see to it that administrative officials are disabused of any idea that it is their duty to police our exports. If this is done we should be able to maintain in the export field the same high degree of friendly co-operation which exists throughout our general relationship. Examples of what appears to be policing are: the programme for water meters has been held up since January; the aluminum programme since April 27th; that for brass E ingot since April 8th. The supplementary estimates for the first and second quarters of 1944 were held up from January 21st to March 14th.

We do hope that difficulties will be dispelled. The volume of trade involved from the Canadian point of view is so small it would be a great pity if any trouble arose because of it. Our exports to Latin-America in 1943 were $26,574,072, less than half of our 1941 exports to Latin-America and less than 1% of our total exports last year. This 1%, as has been pointed out, is only slightly higher than the Canadian Government's gift of foodstuffs to Greece under the Relief Scheme.

We think the Embassy should move to establish the principles enunciated above at top level and to take vigorous action to clear all programmes justifiable by these principles.

I have etc.

EXTENSION OF HYDE PARK AGREEMENT; EXCHANGE OF NOTES

9. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY submitted a letter from the U.S. Ambassador proposing the continuation of the general principles of the Hyde Park Declaration on a reciprocal basis for the remainder of the war.

Under the Declaration, each country was to provide the other with the defence articles which it was best able to produce, and above all produce quickly; production programmes to be co-ordinated accordingly. The Agreement had been implemented in large part by equal and reciprocal application of priorities and allocations to domestic producers in the two countries. It was hoped that the same spirit of co-ordination would characterize the approach to reconversion and other problems of mutual concern in the transition to peacetime economy during the remainder of the war.

Accordingly, it was stated in Mr. Atherton's communication that, on condition of reciprocity, particularly where Canada was to supply materials needed for reconversion to civilian production, the U.S. government would be prepared to implement the following principles with respect to Canadian industrial requirements for reconversion purposes:

(a) application of priorities to Canadian requirements would be as closely parallel as practicable to the application of U.S. priorities to U.S. domestic requirements;

(b) Canada would be given priorities assistance only of the character and to the extent parallel to assistance to similar U.S. needs, including machinery for reconversion (No objection, however, would be made to more rapid conversion if components could be obtained without priorities.);

(c) assistance similar to that granted small domestic firms in the United States would be given to Canadian companies and other rating privileges extended on a comparable basis; and

(d) an effort would be made to pursue, as far as possible, a parallel course in the revocation and relaxation of controls, but in the event of more rapid relaxation in Canada, priorities assistance would not be given to make civilian goods in Canada, the manufacture of which remained prohibited in the United States.

The disposal of surplus war assets, arising from orders placed by either government in the other country and the relaxation of wartime controls affecting trade were also mentioned as matters in which similar principles might be employed, but, in these respects, no specific proposals were advanced by the U.S. government.

(Letter, U.S. Ambassador to Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, May 7, 1945).†

10. MR. HOWE said that the general principles of the U.S. government's proposals seemed acceptable, and it was intended if Cabinet approved, to have a draft reply prepared expressing Canadian agreement with the proposals contained in the U.S. note, but omitting specific reference to the Hyde Park Declaration. The draft reply would be forwarded to the Prime Minsiter in San Fransisco for final approval before despatch.

(External Affairs memorandum for Council, May 10, 1945).†

11. THE CABINET, after discussion, approved the proposals of the U.S. government as set out in the communication submitted, and agreed that the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs should have an appropriate reply prepared for despatch upon the approval of the Prime Minister being obtained.

Dear Mr. Read,

Confirming our telephone conversation yesterday afternoon about the reply to be made to United States Embassy Note No. 320 of May 7th,[125] I am enclosing, for your information, copies of a note by Mr. Rasminsky, to whom I had sent your telegram No. D. 138† for his observations.

I think the points made in Mr. Rasminsky's memorandum are well taken, particularly his suggestion that, in concurring in the United States proposal that our two countries continue their economic cooperation during Stage II, we should not do so under the sign of the Hyde Park Declaration. I made this point in conversation with Mr. Theodore Achilles of the Department of State this morning. He thought an assurance, in general terms, of the continued cooperation of Canada would meet the War Production Board's requirements, and that they were not counting on our confirming in terms the specific reference to the Hyde Park Declaration. I got the impression from him that the references to the Hyde Park Declaration in the American note had been inserted as a bit of special pleading by friends of ours in Washington who were anxious to justify the extension of domestic treatment to Canadian requirements at a time when the United States authorities expected to be under

Mémorandum de l'adjoint exécutif du gouverneur, la Banque du Canada, aux sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Executive Assistant to Governor of Bank of Canada to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] May 8, 1945

I have the following observations to make with regard to Confidential telegram No. D-138 of May 7th from Ottawa,† regarding the United States Embassy Note of that date:

1. It seems to me that the substantive proposals of the United States Government are in themselves reasonable. I am, however, not very happy to have them linked to the Hyde Park Declaration since this might open the door to all sorts of other proposals in the future. The specific requests which are made of us, or which we are warned of, in the United States note are the following:

(a) Reciprocal action regarding priorities, allocations and de-controls during the reconversion period;

(b) Disposal of surplus war-like stores arising from orders placed by either Government in the other country;

(c) Abolition of the war exchange tax, and

(d) Procedures applicable to exports to Latin America.

Even if no further requests for action under the general principles of the Hyde Park Declaration are forthcoming, this list covers a very broad section of our future economic policy. It may well be desirable for us to enter into co-operative arrangements with the United States regarding all these matters (though it is difficult to see why we should have a concerted policy regarding exports to Latin America which is not also applied to exports to other parts of the world). However, I think that it is straining the meaning of the Hyde Park Declaration to say that the concerted action in these matters is a logical and necessary consequence of the Declaration. The only general principles enunciated in that Declaration are the following:

(a) A statement that the President and the Prime Minister "discuss measures by which the most prompt and effective utilization might be made of the productive facilities of North America for the purpose both of local and hemisphere defence, and of the assistance which, in addition to their own programme, both Canada and the United States are rendering to Great Britain and the other democracies," and

(b) It was agreed as a general principle that "in mobilizing the resources of this continent each country should provide the other with the defence articles which it is best able to produce, and above all, produce quickly, and that production programmes should be co-ordinated to this end."

It would seem to me that to whatever extent we are willing to enter into concerted measures of economic policy with the United States during the reconversion period, we should base this willingness on our general desire to co-operate as reflected for example in the exchange of notes of November, 1942,[126] (?) embodying undertakings similar to those in Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreements.

I think that we could accept their proposal that "the same spirit of co-operation between the two countries (which was manifested in the Hyde Park Declaration) should characterize their treatment of re-conversion and other problems of mutual concern as the transition to peace-time economy progresses," without tying this firmly to a continuation of the general principles of the Hyde Park Declaration on a fully reciprocal basis as they have done, since these general principles are not really relevant to the new situation.

2. As regards their detailed enumeration of principles on page 2 of the cable, I suppose that the main item which we might find difficulty in placing American requirements on a parity with our own is lumber, but I do not know enough about the supply situation to make a useful comment.

We would have to take some general protection regarding the continued necessity of export controls to protect domestic supplies where our price ceiling is lower than the American price ceiling. The last sentence of principle 2, without this qualification, might put us in a position where American purchasers could outbid domestic purchasers without benefit of priorities assistance and we would not be entitled to object to resultant more rapid re-conversion activities in the United States.

No reciprocity is possible with regard to principle 3.

I see no objection to principle 4.

3. I wonder whether the reference in the third paragraph on page 3 to the "close collaboration among the Governments of the British Commonwealth and of the United States" as a factor in the great wartime increase in the output and exchange of goods, taken in such close juxtaposition to the reference to "post-war collaboration along equally bold and imaginative lines in the interest of expanded world trade" might not be taken as a suggestion that we initiate discussions with the United States looking in the direction of concerted action to help deal with the British financial difficulties? The conversations I have had here with American officials do not support such an interpretation but it is rather difficult to understand just why this reference was introduced.

November 30, 1942. Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 17.

My conclusion is that we might express concurrence in the general principle that the same spirit of cooperation which has guided the two countries during the war should characterize their treatment of reconversion and other problems of mutual concern as the transition to peacetime economy progresses and that post-war collaboration along bold and imaginative lines is essential in the interests of expanded world trade, while reserving, at least for the time being, the linking of this Declaration to the Hyde Park Agreement.

Aide-mémoire de l'ambassade des États-Unis
Aide-mémoire from Embassy of United States

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, July 18, 1945

The Government of the United States has long held the view that wartime controls and restrictions should be discontinued as soon as the war need for them disappears and no other valid emergency reason for retaining them exists. In the belief that the Canadian Government shares this view, and fully recognizing and appreciating the steps already taken in Canada to terminate or relax wartime restrictions on imports from the United States, the United States Government desires to invite attention to certain measures still in effect which tend to restrict imports from the United States into Canada. Specific reference is made to the following:

(1) The 10 per cent war exchange tax on imports from non-sterling countries.

(2) The increased tariff preferences to the United Kingdom on imports of goods named in Schedule Two of the War Exchange Conservation Act.

(3) Prohibitions and other quantitative restrictions on imports of specifically named products by administrative order.

It is understood that the Canadian Government's need of building up an adequate reserve of United States dollars was the primary reason for taking the first two measures named. That need, however, would appear no longer to exist in view of the magnitude and steady increase of the Canadian Government's holdings of United States dollars. Appreciative note has been taken of the recent action of the Canadian Government in relaxing in several directions the application of the Canadian exchange control, which is indicative of the improved situation in this respect.

Officers of the Canadian Government have announced on several occasions an intention to remove the 10 per cent war exchange tax and the increased tariff preferences in the War Exchange Conservation Act as soon as the emergency need for them has disappeared. For example, on June 24, 1940, when introducing the war exchange tax (as an amendment to the Special War Revenue Act), the then Minister of Finance, in his budget speech, stated:

"As I have explained these measures for conserving exchange are dictated by the conditions of the present emergency. Needless to say, we regret that the exigencies of war make any such restrictive action necessary, and our fervent hope and firm resolve are that at the earliest possible moment we may be able to return to the long-run policy of this Government, which is that of the progressive lowering of trade barriers and the encouragement of trade not only with the United States but with all peaceful nations. The Government remains in fullest accord with the Trade Agreements programme in which Canada has co-operated with the United States, Great Britain and other countries, and has no intention or desire to alter by these emergency measures the permanent channels of trade.

"The War Exchange Tax is peculiarly an emergency measure. It is of the type provided for by The War Clause of The Canada-U.S. Trade Agreement, and action is taken under that clause. The operation of this proposed measure will, accordingly, end with the War."

Later, on December 2, 1940, when Mr. Ilsley, who had become Minister of Finance in the interim, introduced the War Exchange Conservation Act, he declared:

"I wish to emphasize . . . that we have no desire or intention in the measures which we must take for war purposes of implying any permanent change in our normal trade policies . . ."

Later he stated:

"Action now taken is peculiarly an emergency measure whose operation will end with the war, and no vested interest in it will be recognized."

On December 5, 1940, he stated:

"These proposals have one purpose and one purpose alone, namely the conservation of foreign exchange."

Finally, in January, 1941, Mr. Ilsley declared that the measure "would not be continued longer than was necessary."

From the foregoing quotations it would appear that the Canadian Governmnt laid great stress on the emergency character of the legislation. While in each case it was stated that the operation of the measure would "end with the war", the emphasis appears to have been clearly on the meeting of emergency needs which, it was evidently presumed, would continue for the duration of the war.

Also, the Embassy's note No. 320 of May 7, 1945, to the Canadian Government on problems of transition from war to peace[127] proposed continued United States-Canadian reciprocity under the Hyde Park principles, and specifically stated that among other questions on which the United States Government might seek the favorable consideration of the Canadian Government under these principles was relaxation of the war exchange tax. The Canadian Government in its reply of May 15, 1945,[128] stated that the Hyde Park spirit of cooperation would guide it in handling transitional problems of mutual concern. In the light of the closeness of the economic cooperation between the two countries, both in the war and in the transition periods, it seems not unreasonable to consider the Canadian wartime measures restricting imports from the United States as of mutual concern to the two countries.

As regards the various prohibitions and other quantitative restrictions on imports under the authority of individual control officers, it is recognized that scarcity conditions and other wartime phenomena may in many instances at least make immediate termination of such restrictions undesirable, but it would be helpful if the purposes now served by such restrictions might be reviewed with a view to appraising the need, if any, for their retention. In this connection, the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. J. L. Ilsley, released May 10, 1945, a statement which contained the following paragraph:

"It has already been said in a statement, made on behalf of the Government and laid before Parliament, that following the European war 'it will be the policy of the Government to relax controls over production, materials and manpower as rapidly as supplies justify.' The control measures were instituted to ensure that, in conditions of acute scarcity, the war programme and the essential needs of the civilian population were not jeopardized. As acute scarcities disappear and as it becomes possible to shift over to civilian employment, wartime controls will be relaxed and discontinued."

In the case of certain products the 10 per cent war exchange tax and perhaps some of the individual quantitative restrictions conflict with Articles VI and X of the United States-Canada trade agreement of 1939[129] prohibiting imposition or increase of duties, or imposition of quantitative restrictions, on imports of Schedule I products. In general, as regards measures taken by either government under the war escape clause of the agreement, it is the view of the United States Government that as the shortages in products or in exchange or other conditions which have given rise to such measures disappear, and the furtherance of the joint war effort no longer requires the continuance of the measures, they should be discontinued.

The United States Government hopes that Canadian wartime measures restrictive of imports from the United States will be discontinued as soon as practicable even where they are not in conflict with provisions of the trade agreement, that is, that all the wartime import restrictions will be removed as soon as practicable, independent of their specific relation to the agreement. In this connection, reference is made to Article XV, paragraph 1, of the agreement, providing as follows:

"Should any measure be adopted by the Government of either country which, while not conflicting with the terms of this Agreement, appears to the Government of the other country to have the effect of nullifying or impairing any of the objects of the Agreement, the Government which has adopted any such measure shall consider such representations and proposals as the other may make, with a view to effecting a mutually satisfactory adjustment of the matter."

Canada, Treaty Series, 1939, No. 8.

The United States Government has proceeded and is proceeding, as regards its own wartime controls affecting Canadian trade, in conformity with the same general principles as advocated by various responsible Canadian officials for termination of Canadian wartime controls. As regards United States wartime controls which are in conflict with the objectives of basic United States commercial policy, the United States Government takes the position that each control should be reviewed from time to time to determine whether the reasons for its imposition have disappered. The policy of the United States Government is to remove wartime trade controls as soon as the original reasons for imposing them no longer apply and no valid reasons relating to national security or to existing commitments, or to the implementation of policy with respect to neutrals and ex-enemy countries or to the maintenance of the essential requirements of civilian populations exist. Action relative to international trade has already been taken under this policy. For instance the number of commodities now subject to import control orders M-63 and WFO-63 has substantially declined from the peak listings of the fall of 1943.

In the light of the foregoing and on the assumption that there was no reason other than exchange considerations for the imposition of the war exchange tax and that no valid emergency reason has since come into existence, the United States Government hopes that the Canadian Government may give favorable consideration to the immediate termination of the war exchange tax insofar as it still remains in force.

The United States Government would also greatly appreciate any information as to the intention of the Canadian Government, particularly in the light of Mr. Ilsley's statement quoted above, regarding the future of the increase in preferential tariff margins granted the United Kingdom in Schedule Two of the War Exchange Conservation Act.

As regards the prohibitions and other quantitative restrictions on imports under the authority of individual control officers, many of which were imposed in consultation and cooperation with the United States, the United States Government feels that these prohibitions and restrictions should be removed pari passu with the disappearance of the emergency need for maintaining them. It is the belief of the United States Government that this is, in fact, the policy of the Canadian Government and it fully appreciates the relaxations in this category of restrictions which have already been made in Canada, many of them paralleling similar relaxations in the United States.

The United States Government, in connection with the foregoing observations, wishes to make known its appreciation of the extent to which the Canadian Government has already partially relaxed its wartime restrictions affecting imports, not only in connection with the prohibitions and restrictions referred to in the immediately preceding paragraph but also by terminating effective August 1, 1944, the prohibitions on imports of various products from the United States under Schedule One of the War Exchange Conservation Act; by its various deletions from the list of products subject to the war exchange tax; and by its easing of the exchange control and travel restrictions. The United States Government also appreciates the fact that the Canadian Government has been most cooperative in trade matters which have recently arisen between the two Governments. Furthermore, it most sincerely desires not to make any suggestions to the Canadian Government which might seem to reflect inadequate appreciation of the wartime economic problems still facing that Government.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa,] July 18, 1945

The United States Charge d'Affaires, accompanied by Mr. Fox, the Commercial Counsellor of the United States Embassy, left the attached aide mémoire with me this morning. I promised to bring it to the attention of the Ministers concerned.

As regards the requested removal of the War Exchange Tax, I said I could add nothing to the repeated declaration of Canadian Government policy which were quoted in their memorandum. The Minister of Finance had, time and again, made it clear that the Government regarded the War Exchange Tax as a temporary emergency measure, to be removed whenever the conditions which had made it necessary ceased to exist. Canadian manufacturers had been warned that they could not count on consolidating the adventitious protection they might draw from the War Exchange Tax. Altogether I could not see any cause for their worrying about the indefinite continuance of this Tax.

As regards their second point, the continuance of the larger British preferences resulting from the wartime reduction or removal of duties on certain United Kingdom products, I said I did not know what the Government's policy would be. It would undoubtedly be under serious pressure from local manufacturing interests to have their pre-war protection against United Kingdom exports restored. For my own part, I would be sorry to see this done. It was unreasonable for the United States to press us to increase the tariff duties on United Kingdom imports as a means of restoring the "equilibrium position" between United States and United Kingdom exports existing prior to the war. That equilibrium had, in fact, been completely and perhaps irretrievably upset, and to the advantage of the United States, by the fact of the war itself, which had severed many Canadian-United Kingdom trade connections and increased our dependence on domestic and American sources of supply. Given the overall difficulties which the United Kingdom would have to meet in rebuilding her export trade and given our joint interest in seeing that trade expanded, I did not think that the United States should press us to put any new obstacles in the way of such imports as we might be able to take from the United Kingdom.

On the third point relating to prohibitions and quantitative restrictions on imports, Mr. Fox said that he fully recognized that these controls had, in most instances, been worked out in cooperation between the competent United States and Canadian authorities, and that, in a number of cases, the United States was relying on Canadian import controls to supplement their own domestic priority and price maintenance policies. His Government was not pressing us to take any precipitate action to remove or modify these controls which, in general, had worked fairly and, under wartime conditions, to the mutual advantage of both countries. They wondered if we had made any recent survey of the various import controls now in force under the wartime Orders. If so, they would be glad to have any further information on the subject that we could give them. I said I did not know exactly what the present position was or how recently we had taken an inventory of the operation of the special controls, which had been delegated to the Departments of Munitions and Supply, Agriculture, and the Wartime Prices and Trade Board. I would consult the External Trade Advisory Committee and find out whether they thought it would be feasible to take a general look at the present position and see which controls were now operating, which could perhaps be wound up, and which we should have to keep to support the price ceiling, as well as the war production and food supply programmes.

Acting Secretary of State of United States to Chargé d'Affaires in United States

Washington, September 18, 1945

The Acting Secretary of State presents his compliments to the Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of Canada and refers to the Embassy's note no. 222 of April 24, 1943, in regard to Canada's participation in Decentralization Plan A with respect to the control of exports to the other American republics. Reference is also made to recent conversations between officers of the Embassy and the Department in regard to the abolishment on October 1, 1945, of Decentralization Plan A, and the discontinuance on September 30, 1945, of the certificate of necessity procedure for Argentina.

As indicated in the above-mentioned conversations, the Foreign Economic Administration has announced the abolishment of the Decentralization Plan and the discontinuance of the certificate of necessity procedure and there is transmitted herewith, for the Embassy's information, a copy of the Administration's Current Export Control Bulletin no. 274[†] containing these announcements.

The Department is extremely grateful for the Canadian Government's cooperation in connection with the administration and the successful termination of these war-time export controls, and wishes to express its appreciation of the Embassy's participation in these matters.

No. 341 Washington, October 3, 1945

The Canadian Ambassador presents his compliments to the Acting Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to Mr. Acheson's note of September 17th concerning the abolishment of Decentralization Plan A on October 1, 1945, and the discontinuance of the certificate of necessity procedure for Argentina on September 30, 1945.

The Canadian Ambassador has been instructed to inform the Acting Secretary of State that the Canadian Government agrees to the arrangements already made between officers of this Embassy and the State Department for the discontinuance of the two procedures affecting exports to Latin American countries. Notice of the termination of these arrangements has appeared in official Canadian Government publications and in the press.

In concurring with these proposals the Ambassador wishes to convey the Canadian Government appreciation for the helpful assistance and co-operation given officers of this Embassy and visiting Canadian officials at all times by the staffs of the United States agencies concerned with this matter.

FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION

IMMEDIATE. Canadian officials in Washington have been considering the effect on opinion in this country of the proposed action to suspend meat rationing in Canada. We feel bound to report to you our views in this regard.

In the official world our proposed action has been greeted with alarm. At discussions with officials of OPA[130] and the War Food Administration it was pointed out by the Americans that our action would result in very great pressure on the United States to take similar action and would cause them very real embarrassment. They do not feel that they should follow our course, though political pressure may force them to. In any event they will have to expedite an announcement which they were already going to make to revise downward the point values for meat, though this revision will not be of such a character as to make it possible for them to say that their people are being as well treated as ours.

They have also pointed out to us that our action will make it more difficult for them to keep up Lend-Lease food shipments to the United Kingdom, as it will be more difficult for them to maintain rations and thereby divert supplies to Lend-Lease. I think that they appreciate our difficulties, but naturally they are extremely concerned with the effect of our action on their own difficulties and some of them have used fairly strong language in this regard.

The reaction in Congress will, I think, be immediate and will reflect the inevitable public verdict — namely that the Canadian people are much better treated in these rationing matters than Americans. As you know, there is already a widespread opinion to this effect, and the suspension of meat rationing will enlarge and strengthen it. In that regard, the proposed action of Ottawa will have a bad effect on our standing in this country — at least for the time being. There seems to be no doubt that the headlines on Wednesday morning will be "meat rationing abandoned in Canada." That will certainly not look well here.

We realize that, of course, there are considerations in Ottawa which may require this action; nevertheless, we feel bound to give you our opinion of its repercussions in this country, even though these repercussions may be neither logical nor defensible, in view of the circumstances which necessitated our action. In the light of the effect it will have in this country, would it be possible to reconsider the matter? You will of course be aware that the British have had a similar situation with temporary gluts, especially in the case of cheese. Their experience has been that it is much better to keep on controls, even though they are nominal.

As was pointed out at a meeting of the Combined Food Board Executive officials this afternoon, once you suspend, it is extremely difficult to restore. For this reason, United States authorities have also on three occasions rejected proposals to abandon rationing of pork, and instead have successfully moved supplies by adjustments within the existing ration system. Would it not therefore be possible to increase the meat rations and not do away with them? The argument for this would seem to be stronger, if suspension will not in fact result in the surplus being removed by consumption.

If, however, suspension is required to meet the Canadian position, could not the public announcement be made in such a way as to minimise its effect in this country? We had thought that possibly a sentence might be included to the effect that the Canadian Government naturally would be glad to consider any means by which some of this surplus meat could be moved into American consumption, but on enquiry we find that such an announcement would embarrass rather than help them here, because it would be impossible to implement it.

In any case, should there not be a very carefully prepared press statement given out in Ottawa at the time the official announcement is made to Parliament? It seems to us that the first draft of the preliminary parliamentary statement† would not be suitable, in so far as its reception in the United States is concerned. We have no illusion that any announcement will prevent what we think will be an inevitable unfavourable reaction in the United States. It might soften the blow, however, if the announcement were skillfully phrased.

We think that such an announcement should be very short and emphasize that the suspension is temporary only; that this emergency is due to an excess supply situation which cannot be taken care of by storage or transport, for reasons which might be briefly indicated; that it does not mean that we are lessening shipments overseas or backing down on our commitments, and finally, that if there had been any alternative action possible, we would have been glad to take it. However, the alternatives were simply to let meat rot in Canada or have it eaten in Canada. We would be glad to prepare such a statement here, designed primarily for United States consumption.

There seems to be one possible source of misunderstanding between us and the United States authorities which could be cleared up in conversation but could not very easily be made the subject of a formal press announcement. The United States view seems to be that we should embarrass them less if we were to relax our rationing of meat by increasing the quantities per coupon than if we were to suspend the rationing for a short period. On the American system of rationing this is obviously true because of their point system. In our own case there is no difficulty in suspending meat rationing for a period and no technical difficulty in resuming it at any time. The view of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board is that it would be quite unjustifiable to keep their staff at work checking a coupon system if the quantities per coupon were substantially greater than they are now. The reason is that we expect no greater consumption under suspended rationing than would take place if the coupon values were substantially increased. Do the United States authorities fully appreciate the position that we should be in if we maintained meat rationing in appearance when it was obvious to every consumer that it was of no practical importance?

The three morning papers that I have seen handled our suspension of meat rationing in a satisfactory way. We have been greatly helped by its association in the newspapers with the O.P.A. decision to ease meat rationing here and though there is a considerable difference between our suspension and their easement, that difference is not emphasized in the headlines I have seen. We are also helped by the fact that in the same editions appears a story from Ottawa based on Mr. Howe's speech[131] and under a heading "Canada pays for United States air aid." Fortunately our official release† was in time to kill the unofficial story that the news agencies were carrying. Even the 11 o'clock radio news carried our official story which was of course much better for us as the unofficial report was inaccurate and misleading. We have, however, a very strong and legitimate complaint about the way this official news release was handled in Ottawa. You will recall that we were asked to prepare it here primarily with the press of this country in mind. We did so and yesterday afternoon had it cleared in Ottawa with Sharp of the Department of Finance. He, however, said that they could not issue it in Ottawa as they were not issuing any press release of any kind, merely the text of Abbott's statement.[132] Campbell was also told by W.I.B. that on no account could he issue it before 10:00 p.m. Meanwhile, as I told you last evening on the telephone, unofficial reports had begun to appear on the news service tickers and both Mr. Ilsley and I urged you to do what you could to get Abbott to make his statement earlier so that we could release our official statement here. We received no reply from Ottawa so assumed that the original time held.[133] Campbell had all evening been worried, as I had, by telephone calls and had replied that we could give no information until 10:00 p.m. Sometime after 8:00 p.m. W.I.B. had told him that Prendergast was also issuing a release[134] (this contradicted

This made our day's activities in preparing a release and getting it cleared quite useless and meaningless. We have enough to do here without wasting our time in this way but that is probably not so important as the fact that it made our W.I.B. office look pretty ridiculous in the eyes of the press here whom it is supposed to help. It seems a strange thing to us that the publicity officer of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board could go ahead with a release of this kind without Finance knowing anything about it. In any event, we down here seem to have been made the goat. Ends.

IMMEDIATE. Following for Pearson from Robertson Begins: Your WA-1232 of March 1, meat rationing.

I am glad to learn that the morning papers discussed the Canadian suspension of meat rationing in a satisfactory way. The misunderstanding about the time of the release of the official statement in Washington appears to have occurred in the following way: After my telephone conversation with you I communicated with Gordon and he inquired if Abbott could make his statement earlier than originally planned. Abbott replied that he could not break in on the debate without making the statement appear far more important than it actually was but he agreed to release his statement to the press before he made it in the House. Gordon's impression was that this meant a release at 10:00 p.m. and he explained these arrangements to Angus who telephoned to him at my suggestion about 8:20 p.m. The Minister's secretary made the release to the press shortly after 9:00 p.m. and presumably this action led to its being known in Washington before you made your release at 10:00 p.m.

The statement made by the Wartime Prices and Trade Board was not intended as a press release to supplement the Minister's statement in the House but was made by the Board to explain the exchanges in the machinery for the aid of Canadian consumers. It was in no way the counterpart of the release which you had earlier proposed that we should make. By accident it got into the hands of the press about 8:00 p.m. instead of at 10:00 p.m.

We have no doubt all of us suffered a good deal of inconvenience from the fact that the story leaked out in Washington and forced us to take emergency action in anticipation of what we had arranged to do.[135] Ends.

Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Following memorandum, prepared by Chapdelaine this morning, shows state of our current knowledge of United States intentions re termination of meat rationing. You will appreciate how important it is for us to know as promptly and precisely as possible what United States policy in this field is going to be during the next few weeks and months. Memorandum begins:

The W.P.T.B. has never put the question bluntly of what future United States policy will be in regard to meat rationing. In recent days Mr. Gordon has spoken to Mr. Bowles,[136] who has explained that the United States would have difficulties in keeping meat rationing, mainly from an organizational point of view (workers are volunteers and they are leaving in large numbers). Mr. Bowles undertook to give ample notice should there be changes; such notice is also required by a Combined Food Board Resolution.

(2) Meantime the United States have increased their civilian allocation for the fourth 1945 quarter by 25%, bringing consumption during that quarter up to about 140 lbs. per head; this compares with some other periods of this year during which the consumption was 115 lbs. per head per year.

(3) Mr. Bowles let it be understood to Mr. Gordon that the United States probably would not take meat off rationing; nevertheless the trade is working on the assumption that meat rationing would be off in from four to six weeks.

(4) The W.P.T.B. representative in Washington, from talks with O.P.A. members has given his opinion that meat rationing would probably be lifted completely by middle October.

(5) A teletype† which arrived this morning states that the Department of Agriculture is pressing O.P.A. to remove their rationing on canner and cutter beef (all cheap cuts); that O.P.A. is resisting because Bowles is unwilling to take any action piecemeal when the possibility exists of complete lifting of rationing and Bowles does not wish to take any action until Snyder of O.W.M.R.[137] returns shortly. Ends. Message ends.

FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Your EX-3341, September 15th, United States meat rationing policy. Dr. Barton,[138] who was here last Thursday and Friday, was given the latest information concerning United States policy and plans on this matter. That policy was crystallized in the President's statement issued yesterday[139] and about which I spoke to you on the telephone a few minutes ago. I have reason to believe that this statement was given very serious consideration before its issue and is meant to be carried out, though of course one can never feel entirely confident that there may not be a change at any time. The statement confirms reports recently made to officials of this Embassy by United States officials that the United States Government recognizes its obligations to send relief and rehabilitation supplies to Europe and the Far East and intends to carry that obligation. They are worried, however, about financial and Congressional implications of this obligation. In this connection, more than one United States official has told us how helpful the re-imposition of Canadian meat rationing[140] has been from their point of view as an instance of Canada's determination not only to accept its responsibilities in this matter, but to implement that acceptance by concrete action. As one United States official put it, "Canada's action in this matter has certainly put us on the spot." Ends.

Meat rationing had been reimposed in Canada on September 10, 1945. See also Volume 10, Documents 1306 and 1308.

1. I have been advised in strict confidence by the Canadian representative on the Combined Food Board that the United States member has intimated to his colleagues on the Board the probability of the United States discontinuing meat rationing on or about December 1st.

2. I have recent and vivid impressions of the urgent need for supplies of meat in the United Kingdom and continental Europe and of the extent to which they are relying on the cooperation of North America. It is, however, because of the great importance of close cooperation between our two governments that I am sending this message.

3. In the course of several conversations we both have agreed on the great value of the intimate wartime collaboration through the various Combined Boards, and we have also agreed on the desirability of continuing a maximum degree of similar collaboration during the difficult months that lie ahead.

4. The discontinuance of meat rationing in the U.S.A. will raise questions of policy in Canada which will require most careful examination. In the light of desparate European needs during the coming winter we feel that we should not discontinue meat rationing at the present juncture, and it is our present intention to continue meat rationing in full effect.

5. In view of the pressing needs of Europe and of the likelihood that the decisions of each country will react on the neighbouring Government, I should like to suggest that no final decision be taken in this matter before there is opportunity for further full discussion in the Combined Food Board, or, if desirable, at a higher level. Ends.

Yours very sincerely,

FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: You will have received a copy† of the covering letter I sent to the President with Mr. King's note to Mr. Truman regarding meat rationing. I also sent a copy of this letter under a covering one† to the State Department. The President's reply reached me a few minutes ago and is as follows. Letter Begins:

"November 27th, 1945.

"My dear Mr. Ambassador:

"I appreciate very much your note of the twenty-third, enclosing me a letter from the Honourable Mackenzie King.

"I am certainly sorry I did not get it before the order went into effect. Will you please inform him, however, that our shipments of food supplies will not be affected by this rationing programme? We are going to put forth every effort we have and contribute every ounce we can to prevent starvation in Europe this winter.

"Please express to him my kindest regards and best wishes.

"Very sincerely yours,

"HARRY TRUMAN"

Letter ends.

Unfortunately, before that letter reached me, the President's Press Secretary, Mr. Ross, made a statement on this matter this morning which carried on the news ticker this afternoon in the following form:

"President Truman prepared a reply to a letter from Prime Minister Mackenzie King about this country's sudden termination of meat rationing. White House Press Secretary Ross said Mackenzie King's letter involved the discontinuance of rationing and 'its possible effect on supplies we send the United Kingdom and Europe.' Ross explained that the letter was received by Mr. Truman after the end of meat rationing but that it was written before Mackenzie King knew about it. It has been reported that the letter protested the end of rationing in this country without consulting Canada. (Time: 12:13 p.m.)

"President Truman sent word to King that the end of meat rationing in this country will not affect American food shipments to Europe. The President asked Canadian Ambassador L. B. Pearson to inform King that 'We expect to ship all we can possibly spare,' adding that 'The American people will not sit idly by with surplus foodstuffs when other countries are starving'."

2. I have also received a reply from Mr. Wailes to my letter to Mr. Hickerson, as follows. Letter Begins:

"My dear Mr. Ambassador:

"I received just now your letter addressed to my predecessor in connection with the announcement on Friday last of the cessation of meat and other forms of rationing in this country.

"In as much as you have, under instructions, taken this matter up directly with the President, I have no doubt that the White House is sending copies of the Prime Minister's letter on to the Secretary of Agriculture. I am, accordingly, holding the copies which you were good enough to send to me.

"Having learned on Saturday that the Ottawa office of Time magazine was aware of the Prime Minister's action in this matter, Mr. Parsons of this Division inquired in the Department of Agriculture as to the steps which had been taken to keep the Canadian Government informed. He was advised that the matter was discussed in the Combined Food Board meeting of November 20th, at which meeting the Canadian representative, Mr. Paterson, was present. The United States decision was taken late the following evening and on Thanksgiving Day Mr. Paterson was informed by telephone.

"Although I would agree that in the final stages this matter progressed rapidly to a decision, it is my belief, based upon the foregoing, that the trend of opinion in this Government has been made known to Canadian officials fully and frankly throughout. You will recall that Mr. Donald Gordon had discussions with some of the interested officials the previous week. I believe, therefore, that in this Department, too, there may be some surprise, in view of the action just taken by the Canadian Government, that no earlier indication was received of the strong reaction which this impending action would evoke in Ottawa. I, of course, share your regret that on the matter of meat and other rationing, once again there is a divergence of action on the part of our two Governments.

"Sincerely yours,

"EDWARD T. WAILES,
"Chief, Division of British

Letter ends.

I anticipated a somewhat short reply from the State Department, but nothing quite so flip and irritating as this. The State Department are, I think, annoyed because we took this matter up direct with the White House. They are also, I think, not disposed to admit that their guilt in this matter is any greater than ours was a year or so ago when we suspended meat rationing in Canada without giving the authorities here much notice. IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: My WA-5956, November 27th, meat rationing. I have sent the following reply to Mr. Wailes to his letter to me of November 26th quoted under paragraph 2 of above teletype. This was delivered by hand to the State Department at 11:30 this morning. Letter Begins:

Washington, D.C.

Dear Mr. Wailes:

I have received your letter of November 26th dealing with the cessation of meat and other forms of rationing in this country. May I, in the first place, apologize both to Mr. Hickerson and to yourself for the stupid mistake in the addressing of my letter of November 23rd to which yours was a reply.

For the sake of the record, as they say, may I also comment on one or two points which you raise in your letter. I regret that the Department first learned of our Prime Minister's proposed action in this matter through the Ottawa office of Time magazine. How Time secured that information which was, of course, unauthorized, I am unable to ascertain. They seem to be enterprising in more Capitals than one.

I had hoped, of course, that you would get your first information about the Prime Minister's letter from a more official source and for that purpose sent my letter, referred to above, to the State Department by hand Saturday a.m., November 24th. Unfortunately, the State Department was closed; there was no one there to receive the letter which was returned to this Embassy and re-delivered to Mr. Hickerson to 10:00 a.m. Monday, November 26th.

I am afraid that the information given to Mr. Parsons by the Department of Agriculture concerning the steps which had been taken to keep the Canadian Government informed of proposed United States action on this matter does not harmonize in certain respects with our own understanding of what happened. The facts of the matter as reported to my by the Canadian Executive Officer of the Combined Food Board are as follows:

At the meeting of November 20th, to which you refer and at which Mr. Paterson was present, the matter was, as you state, discussed. Mr. Anderson,[141] however, asked that this discussion be strictly off-the-record and that no minute be made of it. Mr. Anderson added that there was to be further discussions with the President probably later that day, or later in the week, but he made it clear that while there was a possibility of a change in rationing policy, no such change was likely to be made effective before December. There was, therefore, no decision of any kind for Mr. Paterson to report to me or to the Canadian authorities. There was, of course, information, as you state, concerning the trend of opinion in your Government on this matter but that information led us to believe that no decision would be taken for at least a week.

[141]Clinton P. Anderson, secrétaire à l'Agriculture, États-Unis.
Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture of United States.

Following the meeting referred to above and at the request of Mr. Anderson, Mr. Paterson got in touch with Dr. Fitzgerald, United States Deputy Member of the Combined Food Board. They agreed on a message† which might be sent by teletype to the Canadian Minister of Agriculture. This was sent immediately on Wednesday, November 21st, and indicated that no change of policy would be announced before December.

According to your letter, a decision to act at once was taken on the evening of the same day, Wednesday, November 21st. This means that almost at the time we were informing the Canadian Government (in terms agreed on with the United States Deputy Member of the Combined Food Board):

(a) That no action would be taken for at least a week;

(b) That confirmation of United States intentions in regard to such action would be communicated later, definite action was, in fact, being taken. In the circumstances, you will, I feel sure, appreciate our surprise.

Mr. Paterson was advised of this November 21st decision at 8:45 p.m. on Thanksgiving night, November 22nd; definitely too late to permit the Canadian Government to consult with the Government here before the press conference at 10:00 a.m. on Friday, November 23rd, when the news was given out. Our Prime Minister, however, did try to bring about such consultation by his letter to the President, copy of which I have sent to you. However, the timetable made that impossible and there was no way by which the arrangements for prior consultation previously agreed on between Mr. Anderson and Mr. Gardiner could be carried out.

You mention Mr. Donald Gordon's visit to Washington, and suggest that he might have been able to ascertain during that visit what was about to take place. His information, however, was the same as Mr. Paterson's, that no action would be taken until December. In fact, his representative in Washington was informed by O.P.A. officials at this time that, in their opinion, no change of policy would be made before the end of 1945.

In view of the above circumstances, I find it difficult to understand how, as you suggest in the next to last sentence of your letter, the Canadian Government could at any earlier date have given to the State Department an indication of its reaction to the specific action which was so suddenly taken.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON.

[Washington] December 29, 1945

My dear Mr. Ambassador:

Although at this late date there is little perhaps of a constructive nature to be accomplished by writing a further letter in regard to the circumstances surrounding the cessation of meat and other forms of rationing in this country, I have decided to do so because of the very real concern felt here and in the Department of Agriculture over the evident belief of the Canadian authorities that we did not carry out our commitments to keep them fully advised of developments in this matter. Moreover, your letter of November 30, 1945, in which you so kindly apologized for several incidental and unimportant slips which occurred, put the record straight from the Canadian viewpoint. In fairness to our people in the Department of Agriculture, I should like similarly to put the record straight from the United States viewpoint.

Mr. Parsons of this Division referred a copy of your letter to the Department of Agriculture in as much as you indicated that the information given to him did not altogether harmonize with the Canadian understanding of what had happened. He received in reply a letter from Dr. Fitzgerald, copy of which is enclosed. I should like to repeat that we are sending this to you not in any spirit of controversy, but rather to indicate the concern which was felt over the Canadian dissatisfaction and to place our version of the matter on record.

Office of Requirements and Allocations, Department of Agriculture of United States, to Assistant Director, Division of British Commonwealth Affairs, Department of State of United States

Washington, December 14, 1945

Dear Mr. Parsons:

This is in reply to your letter of December 5, reference BC, with which was enclosed correspondence with Ambassador Pearson concerning the recent removal of meat rationing in the United States.

I attended the CFB meeting on November 20 at which Secretary Anderson discussed the meat situation. Mr. Pearson is correctly advised that the discussion was off-the-record. At the same time, Secretary Anderson suggested that both the United Kingdom and Canadian Members of the Board immediately advise their respective Governments of the substance of the discussion.

The fact that Secretary Anderson suggested an immediate communication, plus the tenor of his remarks, clearly forecast the actual decision. In stating that "there was, therefore, no decision of any kind for Mr. Paterson to report to me or to the Canadian authorities," Mr. Pearson is being purely technical. While Secretary Anderson could not report that a final decision had been made, his position was clearly apparent. Moreover, he stated explicitly that the Price Administrator favored the removal of rationing because the system had even then largely broken down.

The CFB meeting ended about 4:00 p.m., November 20. Upon his return to the office, the U.K. Member immediately cabled London, but the Canadian Member apparently took no action until the next day for he called me just before noon on November 21 to read a proposed telegram to Ottawa.† Even assuming the telegram was sent promptly thereafter, it is apparent that there was a delay of nearly 24 hours in reporting the substance of the discussion at the CFB meeting to the Canadian authorities in Ottawa. We have, of course, no way of knowing when Ambassador Pearson was informed of the developments. It is apparent that if Ottawa had been advised on November 20, rather than on November 21, the Prime Minister would have been able to express his concern on November 22 rather than on November 23, and this would have permitted us ample time to delay the announcement to accommodate the Canadian authorities.

We would, of course, have been entirely agreeable to doing this if we had been given any indication that there was objection to our proposed action. On the contrary, however, both the U.K. and Canadian representatives at the CFB meeting left the distinct impression that the proposed action would not create any insuperable difficulties in their respective countries. Their only request was that they be advised when the decision became official. That the decision was imminent is recognized by Ambassador Pearson, since he states that "Mr. Anderson added that there was to be further discussion with the President probably later that day, or later in the week. . . . . ."

Ambassador Pearson also emphasizes that the discussions strongly indicated that rationing would not be discontinued before December 1. It is correct that the date of December 1 was mentioned frequently but the point was also made that the exact date might well have to be determined by the date on which new ration evidence would otherwise have to be validated.

Moreover, the important consideration was not the date of discontinuation of rationing itself, but the date on which the announcement was made. There was absolutely no indication in the CFB meeting that any announcement concerning the discontinuation of rationing would not be made until December 1. In fact, every indication was that the official decision was to be made very promptly. Once this decision was made, an immediate announcement was necessary since the failure of the Office of Price Administration to validate new ration evidence would, in any event, make the decision apparent.

We regret very much the Prime Minister and other Canadian authorities feel that they have not been kept fully advised of developments in connection with the removal of meat rationing in the United States. However, we still believe that we fully carried out our commitments to keep the other members of the CFB currently advised. As a consequence, the protests of the Canadian authorities come as a complete surprise.

Very truly yours,

D. A. FITZGERALD, Director

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

Ottawa, June 7, 1944

HAULAGE OF UNITED STATES FREIGHT BY TRUCKS ACROSS SOUTHERN ONTARIO

For several years we have been receiving almost a continuous series of representations from the United States Government asking for permission for United States trucks to haul freight over Canadian highways in the Niagara Peninsula. There is a saving in distance of some 90 miles between Buffalo and Detroit by the Canadian route as against the route south of the lakes. There is an established traffic of United States freight over the railways of the Peninsula but the movement by United States trucks has not, until recently, been permitted by the Canadian authorities.

In the spring of 1942 the matter was referred by Cabinet War Committee to the Board of Transport Commissioners for investigation and report. In its report† the Board recommended that authority be granted, for the duration of the war only, for the transportation in bond of war materials by United States trucks between United States points across Southern Ontario. This recommendation was put into effect by Order-in-Council† in July, 1942.[142] Following this authorization the movement had by the summer of 1943 reached an average of about 30 trucks a day.

In August last we received further representations from the United States Government asking for a liberalization of the arrangement.[143] In particular the United States authorities requested a widening of the term "war materials" to "materials necessary for the prosecution of the war or the maintenance of essential civilian economy." They had no complaint to make about the interpretation by Canadian officials of the existing limitation which they agreed was liberal but they wished to have it extended to include essential materials generally. In support of this request they stated that a) it is highly important to conserve the existing supply of trucks in the United States which will continue to be urgently required for essential transportation, b) trucks themselves should be regarded as a "war material", c) it is necessary to do everything possible to save rubber and gasoline, d) substantial savings in trucks, gasoline and rubber could be achieved by diverting trucks, which are now moving south of the lakes, over the shorter Canadian route, e) it is not intended to divert new traffic to trucks and hence the railways will not be deprived of freight which they now carry, f) owing to the shortage of railway facilities it is not possible to conserve trucks by shifting the freight to the railways, and g) the post-war position is protected since no request is made for the privilege beyond the duration of the war.

The United States representations were considered by the Ministers of National Revenue, Transport and Labour. The Minister of National Revenue also had an interview on the question with representatives of the railways and the railway labour unions. Both of these were opposed to the requested liberalization of the arrangement. They flatly disputed the contention that the railways in Southern Ontario are unable to handle any additional traffic. Therefore, they maintain that the most effective way to conserve trucks, gasoline and rubber is to divert the traffic from the trucks to the railways. They do not believe that the liberalization of the truck movement could be so drawn as to apply only to existing truck traffic and they would regard any diversion of traffic from the railways as a serious matter from the point of view of railway revenues and employment. Furthermore, they do not believe that the privilege could be withdrawn at the end of the war despite the assurances now given.

Since the important facts of the matter were in dispute the Minister of National Revenue suggested to the Minister of Transport that the question be referred to the Board of Transport Commissioners for report. The Minister of Transport referred the question to Cabinet where the suggested reference to the Board was decided against. The Minister then told me that the matter could only be reconsidered if the Prime Minister wished to raise it himself in Council.

A few days ago an officer of the U.S. Embassy again approached this Department on the subject and stated that they had been asked to take it up energetically with the Canadian authorities. It is necessary to decide whether or not we should definitely refuse the request or whether the Board of Transport Commissioners should first be asked to report on the matter. The latter course would appear to be preferable to an immediate refusal even though it might appear as an attempt to achieve further delay. If a refusal were finally decided upon it could then be based on more solid ground.

Some consideration has been given also to the possibility of a report on this trucking question by the International Joint Commission. Mr. Read, the Legal Adviser to the Department, sees no reason why the Commission could not handle a reference of this sort satisfactorily if the necessary technical assistance is provided. This procedure would have some merit in that there would be an examination of the facts pertaining to the situation in both countries by an international body.

I am returning for your records the memorandum[144] I gave you last month on the trucking in bond question. We have told the United States Embassy that if they wish to send a representative of the Office of Defence Transportation to Ottawa to discuss this question again, we shall be glad to talk to him, though we cannot hold out any encouragement that the present regulations will be further liberalized.

I do not think the Americans' request is unreasonable in itself, but I do not consider that getting the concession they seek would help them as much as giving it might hurt the Government. The railroad companies are solidly against any change in the present practice and they have mobilized the railway unions in support of their position. Mr. Gibson, Mr. Mitchell and Mr. McLarty[145] all have seats in the area directly interested in the trucking in bond question. In the circumstances I think we shall simply have to try to convince the Americans that they are not doing badly under present regulations and that it would be a mistake to press for further amendment.

I attach copy of a letter† from Dave Sim[146] to whom I gave a copy of the note I had given you. Sim will see the representative of the Office of Defence

Meeting between Mr. Sim, Deputy Minister of National Revenue, and Major Keller of O.D.T. and Mr. English, U.S. Embassy. August 14th, 1944.

Major Keller had come to Ottawa to renew the request of the Office of Defense Transportation for a liberalization of the restrictions on the movement of United States trucks across southern Ontario. Major Keller stated that the reasons which led the United States authorities to make this request originally were now stronger than ever. He emphasized particularly the critical situation in truck tires and the great need to save manpower. He said that Colonel Johnson, the new Director of O.D.T. is just as anxious as his predecessor, Mr. Eastman, had been to obtain the savings in transport equipment made possible by a greater use of the shorter truck route across southern Ontario.

Mr. Sim reviewed the development of the movement since its beginning in the autumn of 1942 and pointed out the steady increase in the number of trucks taking advantage of the arrangement. He explained also the liberal attitude that had been taken all along by Canadian officials in administering the regulations. Mr. Sim asked Major Keller whether in view of the continued increase in the movement and its liberal administration he did not agree that virtually everything which O.D.T. could reasonably wish to achieve was not or would not shortly be accomplished without any changes in the existing arrangement. Mr. Sim said there was very little hope of obtaining any alteration in the present provisions. Major Keller replied that if he could have Mr. Sim's assurance that the existing liberal administration of the movement would be continued during the period of wartime necessity O.D.T. would be satisfied and would not ask for any formal change in the arrangement. Mr. Sim went on to say that if O.D.T. wished, in order to save trucks and tires, to direct a greater number of trucks over the Ontario route that no administrative barriers would be put into the way provided of course that the traffic bore a reasonable relation to the furtherance of the war effort. With this understanding Major Keller appeared to be fully satisfied. Mr. Sim made it clear that the present arrangement would remain in effect only during the period of the war and that no commitments or undertakings whatever, expressed or implied, were being made regarding the continuance of the privilege after the war. Major Keller agreed and said that O.D.T. was not asking for anything beyond the period of the war.

Mr. Sim conducted the discussion in this meeting with much skill and it appears that a satisfactory understanding on this vexed question was reached.

Le sous-ministre du Revenue national au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Deputy Minister of National Revenue to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, October 29, 1945

Dear Sir,

My Minister, the Hon. Dr. McCann, is continuing to receive representations and delegations appealing for the cancellation of Order in Council P.C. 6129, of the 16th of July, 1942,† ordering that for the duration of the present war, war materials in transit from a point or points in the United States of America to another point or points therein, shall be permitted to be entered for transportation in bond through the Province of Ontario by motor vehicles, without payment of duties and taxes, and under such regulations as the Minister of National Revenue may prescribe.

The Department has taken the attitude that although hostitilies ceased on V-J Day it was possible that there might be some dislocation or disturbance to war-time contractors winding up their war-time contracts if the facilities provided by the Order were withdrawn too hastily, but the time is rapidly approaching, if it has not already arrived, when we can no longer hold that goods being moved by motor trucks through the Province of Ontario under the terms of the Order referred to are "war materials".

The Minister has asked me to submit that the time is possibly now opportune for you to take the matter up with the State Department with a view to reaching an agreement that the practice established by the Order in Council referred to be discontinued.

You will have observed that questions have appeared on the Order paper in the House of Commons, and it is becoming increasingly difficult to justify any further delay or joint consideration by the two Governments.

Yours faithfully,

DAVID SIM

Le sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures, au sous-ministre du Revenu national

Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of National Revenue

Ottawa, November 6, 1945

Dear Mr. Sim,

With reference to your letter of October 29th, concerning the operation of Order in Council P.O. 6129 of July 16th, 1942,† which authorized the trucking in bond of war materials across Canadian territory. As you are aware, this Department has received repeated representations† from the United States Government in favour of the extension of the wartime procedure to cover the peacetime movement of traffic. I feel that before a final decision is taken, it is in the interests of our harmonious relations with the United States Government that they should be afforded another opportunity of stating their case to representatives of the Canadian government. I have therefore suggested to the United States Ambassador that he propose to his Government that they should send qualified officials to Ottawa for this purpose. Mr. Atherton has agreed to propose this to the Department of State. He has suggested that an appropriate date for such a meeting would be in perhaps three weeks' time.

I hope that this procedure will be agreeable to your Minister. It seems to me to be the most effective way of carrying out his suggestion, which you passed on to me in the third paragraph of your letter. I should add that I have made it clear to Mr. Atherton that the existing Order will, in any event, have to be revoked in view of its reference to war materials.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

Place: Room 123, East Block

MR. WRONG acted as Chairman on December 17 and MR. ROBERTSON took the chair on the two following days.

December 17

MR. WRONG welcomed the U.S. delegation and Mr. Atherton replied.

MR. PARSONS outlined the problem facing the meeting, particularly in relation to the question of trucking in bond. In voicing the gratitude of the U.S. for the arrangement made by Canada in P.C. 6129† during the war, he pointed out that advantages to Canada would accrue if the practice of trucking in bond were continued in peacetime. He listed revenue, in United States dollars, which would be gained by Canada in purchases of gas and food, and in the hire of drivers and maintenance services. Referring to the "Proposals for the Expansion of World Trade and Employment,"[147] he suggested that the problem of trucking in bond should be considered not in vacuo, but "in the light of bold and expansive steps to the development of world trade."

MR. JOHNSON stated that the principle of trucking in bond was settled by the United States many years ago. Although a higher bond was set for trucks than rail traffic and although more careful investigation was required in the case of trucking, he stated that trucking in bond had never created any serious administrative difficulties.

[147]Voir États-Unis,/See United States, Department of State Bulletin, Volume 13, December 9, 1945, pp. 912-29.

MR. SIM, pointing to the number of administrative details in customs procedure which could profitably be co-ordinated by the United States and Canada, urged the discussion of common problems by customs authorities of the two countries at regular intervals. In the matter of trucking in bond MR. SIM stated that no administrative difficulties had been encountered during the war. He pointed out that P.C. 6129 emphasized both the "duration of the present war" and "war materials".

MR. MACDONNELL stated that trucking in bond is a problem of policy. In view of the undertakings given by Cabinet Ministers and officials of the Canadian Government at the time of the enactment of P.C. 6129, the extension of the practice into peacetime would require serious consideration by the government. He felt that the best hope of solution lay in treating this problem as one aspect of the general lowering of trade barriers which will be considered in the coming year. MR. MACDONNELL observed that in Canada there was strong opposition from some quarters to the practice of trucking in bond, while there was no counter-balancing support for the practice. This made it extremely difficult for the government to take the action desired by the United States representatives.

To MR. SIM'S inquiry as to the effects of prohibiting trucking in bond for a few months, MR. PARSONS answered that there would be many administrative difficulties. He also suggested the likelihood of greater difficulties in resuming the practice, once ceased, than the continuation of a procedure still in effect.

It was agreed that before the next meeting, MR. JOHNSON and MR. SIM should meet to discuss those administrative matters of mutual interest concerning customs which might profitably be revised and coordinated.

December 18

Reporting on his talks with MR. JOHNSON on the following day, MR. SIM stated that Canadian and United States customs procedures, while differing in detail, did not differ substantially in principle. He reiterated his belief in the benefit to be derived from discussions at frequent intervals.

MR. ROBERTSON observed that the talks between MR. SIM and MR. JOHNSON had not revealed sufficient differences in customs procedure to provide a framework for an agreement on trucking in bond. Although it was suggested that the question of trucking in bond be discussed in the multilateral trade talks in the spring of 1946, MR. ROBERTSON felt that the matter could be more profitably approached bilaterally. He suggested the appointment of a joint body similar in form to the Joint Economic Committees, which would study steps to eliminate frontier difficulties "from Skagway to Maine." Questions of practical convenience to the traveller could be referred to such a committee, which would also consider problems not previously fully examined. The proposed committee would confine itself to matters of administration and would not deal with the protective aspect of customs.

It was agreed that a sub-committee of eight would discuss, before the next day's meeting, those problems which could profitably be examined by the proposed joint committee on customs procedure.

December 19

MR. MACDONNELL, who acted as chairman of the subcommittee, reported that there had been drawn up a list of subjects including movements by highway, rail, and air, which could profitably be referred to the proposed joint committee. The subject headings discussed are given in Annex "A".

MR. PARSONS submitted a draft press release† which, after some discussion and general approval, was given to a sub-committee for final revision.

MR. WILSON enumerated administrative difficulties which would result from the temporary prohibition of trucking in bond. Among these were the necessity of rerouting, of changing schedules, of using more vehicles and hiring more men for an interim period.

Members of both delegations expressed their appreciation of the difficulties involved in the reversal of policy which would be required by the extension of trucking in bond privileges into peacetime, and it was recognized that these privileges would have to lapse at the end of the year. It was agreed that the joint committee on customs procedures should, with the approval of both governments concerned, meet at an early date in the new year to formulate recommendations on trucking in bond and other customs problems.

There is attached as Annex "B" the press release issued on December 21.† An identical statement was given out in Washington at the same time. In this way the two governments recorded their approval of the recommendation that a Joint Committee be set up.

Annexe A

Annex A

[Ottawa,] December 27, 1945

Subjects discussed on December 19th by a Sub-Committee and considered suitable for reference to the proposed Joint Committee on the simplification of Customs procedures.

1. AIR

(a) Joint use of airports near the border, both for traffic and non-traffic purposes.

(b) Special facilities for aircraft used for pleasure purposes only.

(c) Documentation of tourists' purchases to be forwarded in transit for export by air.

(d) Use of airports for repairing and testing foreign aircraft.

(e) Stationing of customs officers of the other country at airports of embarkation.

2. HIGHWAY

(a) Simplication of documentation in respect of periodic or seasonal in transit for export movements of foreign motor cars, trucks and buses with or without goods or passengers.

(b) Disposal or temporary storage of goods brought into country by a tourist resident of the other country which are not articles of commerce but are ascertained to be conditionally prohibited or restricted; consideration to include possibility of temporary storage for limited period pending later pick up for export rather than immediate forfeiture or disposal if goods not returned at once.

(c) Improved facilities for entry of trucks at Canadian border ports.

(d) Entry at interior points in Canada.

3. RAIL

(a) Examination of documentation for In Transit for export movements of goods by rail without examination under seal to ascertain whether one set of documents suitable for both countries may be used instead of two sets.

(b) American goods returned — Possible simplification of documentation to establish freedom from U.S. duty on return in respect of goods which have not left Customs or carrier custody while in Canada.

4. ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICES

(a) Closer collaboration on such questions as opening of new offices and hours of work.

(b) Cooperation in dealing with emergency conditions.

CANADA-U.S. FINANCIAL RELATIONS

13. THE MINISTER AND DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE with reference to discussions at the meeting of December 1st,[148] reported upon recent conversations in Washington with the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant to the Secretary (Mr. Harry White).

[148]Voir le volume 9, document 1073./See Volume 9, Document 1073.

At December 31, 1943, Canada's holdings of U.S. dollars had been approximately $650 millions, $300 millions above the limit established in the Canada-U.S. exchange agreement.[149] These holdings continued to increase and it was estimated that they totalled $750 millions at the end of February, 1944.

In view of the excess balances built up during the period of the agreement, the United States had advanced certain suggestions for reduction of these balances, on the understanding that, if these suggestions were accepted, Canada would henceforth be free to retain all U.S. dollar balances accumulated. It was informally understood that the agreement could be considered terminated as of December 31st, 1943.

The suggestions put forward were: reimbursement to the United States for Canex[150] deliveries; the assumption by Canada of subsidy payments included in the contract price for the production of metals in certain marginal mines; the subsidies paid or payable to Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited by the United States for certain capital extensions; cancellation of the present arrangements under which Canada purchases nickel from New Caledonia and sells it to the United States; reimbursements to the United States for airfield construction in Northwest Canada; termination of the arrangements whereby United States supplies crude oil to the United Kingdom on Lend-Lease for use in the Air Training Plan; taking over the contract of the U.S. Navy Department for the production of PBY aircraft in Canada including the reimbursement of amounts already paid on this contract by the U.S. Navy; and the assumption of certain U.S. War Department contracts placed in Canada.

The proposed arrangements would reduce Canada's holdings of U.S. dollars by $155 millions.

(Memorandum, Department of Finance, dated March 7, 1944).†

Subsequently, the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury had suggested that Canada reimburse the United States for airfield construction in Northeast Canada, for certain railhead expenses at Dawson Creek, and for part of the cost of construction of telephone communications in the Northwest, at a total estimated cost of $42,800,000.

14. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY felt that the U.S. suggestions for repayment for their expenditures at Dawson Creek and for construction of airfields in Northeast Canada (Crimson Route) should be resisted. The Dawson Creek terminal facilities were part of the Alaska Highway; the Crimson Route bases were entirely without postwar value and had been constructed by the United States against the unanimous advice of Canadian authorities.

15. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE referred to current discussions with the United States regarding disposition of the Canol project[151] and suggested the desirability of making a comprehensive settlement with the United States which would cover outstanding problems connected with the disposition of all U.S. defence construction in Canada and the general financial position.

16. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that a special meeting be held at 11:00 a.m. on March 10th for consideration of the whole financial position in relation to U.S. defence expenditures in Canada; that meantime the special sub-Committee on Canol meet to consider the present position of discussions with the United States.

CANADA-U.S. FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

3. THE PRIME MINISTER, referring to the discussion at the previous meeting (March 8th), drew attention to the difficulties involved in accepting certain of the U.S. Treasury's proposals for settlement of the present exchange problem.

It should be borne in mind that these proposals were based in large part on U.S. political considerations. It was the duty of the government to ensure that any agreed upon settlement was defensible in Canada's own national interest.

4. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES mentioned the difficulties encountered in connection with Canol and urged that any settlement of the financial question, under discussion, should include final disposition of all U.S. defence expenditures in Canada, particularly Canol and the Alaska Highway, each of which offered some degree of continuing benefit to Canada. If the settlement were not all-inclusive, the United States would continue to raise similar questions, in the future, to meet their own political pressures.

5. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY suggested that once the existing exchange arrangement with the U.S. Treasury were satisfactorily terminated, the government would be in a better position to meet subsequent demands in relation to Canol and the Alaska Highway. Further, it would certainly be preferable to avoid payment for the Crimson project and for the terminal facilities at Dawson Creek. It might be suggested that Canada assume full financial responsibility for construction at Goose Bay.

In any event the exchange agreement should be brought to an end as quickly and upon as favourable terms as possible, and the Minister and Deputy Minister of Finance should be given full authority to make as good a deal as they could.

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE was of the opinion that while the government was bound to recognize the obligation to reduce Canadian holdings of U.S. dollars, in accordance with the agreement, freedom of action should be retained as to the methods by which reductions were to be achieved. The U.S. government should take into consideration the special situation created by extensive sales to the United States of Canadian wheat and Canadian securities.

7. THE MINISTER AND DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE drew attention to the history of the agreement with the U.S. Treasury. At a time when Canada had been confronted with a serious shortage of U.S. dollars, the United States had agreed to ensure that Canadian holdings would not fall below $300 millions; in return, Canada had agreed not to accumulate U.S. dollars beyond a maximum of $350 millions. As a result, a large number of U.S. contracts, which would not otherwise have been placed in Canada, had been obtained. Subsequently, for reasons already explained, Canada's holdings of U.S. dollars had risen, by the end of 1943, far beyond the agreed maximum. U.S. authorities now took the view that Canadian balances should be substantially reduced if the agreement was to be terminated satisfactorily.

In the circumstances, the U.S. proposals would probably have to be accepted, with such modifications as could be obtained. We should attempt to avoid payment for the Crimson project and for construction at Dawson Creek. In place of these we might offer to pay the whole cost of the telephone lines between Edmonton and Fairbanks, to assume full financial responsibility for construction at Goose Bay, at the same time urging special consideration in relation to an increase in the price of tanks being purchased for Canadian forces.

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR referred to additional construction on the Northwest Staging Route requested by the U.S. authorities, totalling some $6 millions,[152] suggesting that Canada might assume responsibility for these costs as part of a general settlement.

9. THE WAR COMMITTEE after further discussion, agreed that the Minister and Deputy Minister of Finance proceed to Washington with a view to effecting, as soon as possible, in the light of the discussion, a final settlement with the U.S. Treasury and the termination, upon satisfactory terms, of the 1943 exchange agreement, it being understood specifically:

(a) that they would propose, to be included in the settlement, payment by Canada for telephone lines from Edmonton to Fairbanks, expenditures at Goose Bay, and expenditures for proposed additional construction on the Northwest Staging Route;

(b) that they should seek to avoid including in the settlement payment by Canada for the Crimson Route air bases and terminal facilities at Dawson Creek; and

(c) that they should not, at this time, introduce the matter of U.S. expenditures upon Canol and the Alaska Highway.

Note:

In this connection, it was understood that, in selecting the items to be included in the settlement, the Canadian representatives should seek the necessary reduction by inclusion of such as would be of the greatest value to Canada, rather than accepting such items as were of embarrassment to the United States.

CANADA-U.S. FINANCIAL RELATIONS

3. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE reported, in some detail, the results of discussions in Washington between the Minister of Finance and himself on the one hand, and Secretary Morgenthau and U.S. Treasury officials, on the other.

In order to reach a settlement, it had been necessary to agree that Canada should pay for the Northeast airfields (Crimson route), the airfield at Mingan, all of the permanent air base construction at Goose Bay, and the telephone lines on the Northwest Staging Route between Edmonton and the Alaska border. On the other hand, it had been possible to eliminate certain objectionable features included in earlier proposals, notably U.S. government obligations in respect of Falconbridge Nickel and terminal facilities at Dawson Creek.

As a result of the agreement eventually reached, Canadian U.S. dollar balances would be reduced by $295 to $300 millions. A substantial portion of this total would be accounted for by payments arranged for U.S. tanks for the Canadian Army overseas. The maximum-minimum agreement was to be brought to an end by an exchange of letters between the Minister of Finance and the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury. An agreed schedule would set out the detailed items to which consent had been given in the discussions.

Subsequently, it was intended to relax Canadian travel restrictions and the operation of the War Exchange Conservation Act.

Le ministre des Finances au secrétaire du trésor des États-Unis Minister of Finance to Secretary of Treasury of United States

Ottawa, March 24, 1944

Dear Mr. Morgenthau:

During the last few weeks discussions between yourself and myself and our officials have been taking place on the subject of Canada's holdings of United States dollar exchange.

Last year, in keeping with the principles and the spirit of the Hyde Park Declaration, we had reached an understanding to the effect that the United States would follow a program of procurement of war supplies such as to prevent our holdings of gold and U.S. dollar balances from falling below an agreed minimum and that Canada would take appropriate action if our holdings of these reserves tended to rise above an agreed maximum.

Unanticipated developments during 1943 served to increase our available supply of U.S. exchange beyond expectation. We have therefore now agreed upon a program intended to reduce our balances to the agreed range and, in accordance with our recent conversations, we undertake to put this program into effect as quickly as practicable.

Accordingly, in view of this agreement there is no further need for the continuance of last year's arrangement and Canada and the United States are mutually released from the obligations assumed under such arrangement. As applied to Canada this means that Canada will be free to maintain, build up, or deal with its reserves as it sees fit.

If the above is in accordance with your understanding of the agreement which has been arrived at, I should be glad to have your confirmation.

May I express my appreciation of the understanding of our position which you have always shown and of the spirit of co-operation and good-will which you have manifested in seeking to achieve the objectives of the Hyde Park Declaration[154] and in the conduct of our recent negotiations.

Yours sincerely,

J. L. ILSLEY

Washington, March 29, 1944

Dear Mr. Ilsley,

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of March 24, 1944, regarding Canada's holdings of United States dollar exchange. The views expressed in your letter are in accordance with our understanding of the agreement we have reached.

The atmosphere of cooperation and understanding in which these arrangements have been conducted is, for me, a source of genuine satisfaction.

Sincerely,

Le gouverneur de la Banque du Canada au ministre des Finances

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, June 19, 1945

Dear Mr. Ilsley,

As you are aware, there have been certain discussions between officials of your Department and representatives of the U.K. Treasury on the subject of equipment and supplies of Lend-Lease origin obtained by our Forces overseas from the British. The British feel that their arrangement with the United States commits them to report such transfers to the U.S. Government. They have received requests from the United States for information of this kind in respect to Canada, but have so far not been in a position to furnish it.

Lord Keynes in his communication of January 19th, 1945,† deals very fully with the problem. It appears that it may be possible clearly to establish the value of certain items furnished as initial equipment, but that run-of-the-mine deliveries of replacement equipment and general supplies are very difficult to trace. In these circumstances, the U.K. suggests that the practical thing would be to estimate the proportion of supplies of Lend-Lease origin contained in their total deliveries to us. On this basis, they arrive at an estimate of our liability to the U.S. of $250 millions U.S. funds as at June 30, 1945, in addition to any liability not yet settled in respect of initial equipment.

While estimates of this kind may be acceptable to the parties concerned for the purpose of dividing up Lend-Lease deliveries as a matter of record (as, for example, between U.K. and Australia) they are certainly not satisfactory as a basis for Canadian parliamentary appropriations and cash payments to the Americans. As you know, military equipment of any kind which our forces in Europe received from the British was not paid for or accounted for on the basis of individual items and types. The practice has been to agree on a capitation rate, that is, a standard sum per head, applied to the total number of Canadians overseas in the service in question. This rate is intended to cover in a broad way the cost of equipment and supplies of all kinds (other than initial equipment), but it remains constant over a long period of time and does not at any particular time or with respect to any particular flow of equipment represent an exact appraisal of the value of the equipment. No accounting records are kept of individual types and items of equipment, no distinction is made between the various items according to their country of origin, and there would be no verifiable basis for an estimate of the value of equipment received by Canada from the British Army, Navy or Air Force which had originally been obtained by the United Kingdom from the United States on Lend-Lease.

Quite apart from the difficulties which there may be in arriving at a proper figure, I believe that it is completely wrong in principle for us to assume the responsibility for each payment to the United States for equipment and supplies we receive from the British. Our Army, Navy and Air Force have been inextricably mixed up with the British in the battle of Europe. It has been absolutely essential that equipment and supplies should be inter-changeable. We have given the British a vast amount of things of a character which we were best equipped to supply. They have reciprocated in part to the extent of their capacity, and a very large deficit has been covered by Mutual Aid. It could be argued that if we had chosen to devote sufficient time and labour to the job, we could have supplied ourselves with all the things of Lend-Lease origin which we have received from the British. However, it was obviously against the Allied interest for us to do so, and we therefore arranged certain "swaps", of equipment and supplies.

Looking at the problem from another angle, it seems to me wrong that two countries, both of which have been supplying other countries on a vast scale free of charge, should endeavour to obtain cash settlements one from the other in respect of equipment and supplies which third countries may have inter-changed with them, practically speaking on the field of battle. It therefore seems to me that we should approach the U.S. Administration and endeavour to secure their agreement to the principle that neither of our two countries will endeavour to hold the other responsible for military equipment and supplies obtained from third countries in the course of military operations. I should add that it is a principle from which we have departed, for special reasons, in making payment to the United States for Sherman tanks which we obtained from the United Kingdom as initial equipment for our troops in Italy. (At the same time, we turned over our Ram tanks to the British and have not yet agreed with them as to what settlement, if any, should be made on this account.) However, I do not suggest that we should endeavour to have this transaction reversed. I am not by any means familiar with all the ramifications of our arrangements, and it may be that Mr. Bryce will point out other complications. However that may be, I do not believe that it is too late for us to change our attitude.

In approaching the United States in the sense suggested, Canada is not, in my opinion, trying to get off lightly. Our strong current cash position in gold and U.S. dollars might lead the Americans to believe that we have done very well. In fact, however, our strong position is based on borrowing from the United States or realizing on U. S. assets which we held at the beginning of the war. Our net indebtedness to the United States, after allowing for our gold and U.S. dollar holdings, is certainly some hundreds of millions of dollars larger, and perhaps $500 million larger than it was at the beginning of the war. Our total net debt to the United States is now extremely formidable, and further increases of any magnitude must be regarded with apprehension.

Another matter of serious importance as affecting our foreign exchange position is that of direct purchases of U. S. equipment for the Canadian Army or Air Force engaged in the Pacific war. I think that there should be an opportunity of examining the financial implications of such arrangements before we become irrevocably committed. Obviously, the first consideration must continue to be the supplying of our Forces with the type of equipment which is best suited to their needs. But if the U.S. dollar liability involved is very large, I think that the financial aspects of the matter must be discussed with the United States. If the cost of specific war equipment will not exceed an amount which we can manage to pay without materially increasing our debt to the United States, I believe we should make payment. If, on the other hand, cash payment would involve a serious increase in debt, then we should try to arrange a loan of the major items of initial equipment, as well as replacements and supplies in the field, but not on the basis of Lend-Lease.

At first blush, this may sound like a proposition which the Americans would not accept, but a firm attitude on our part might produce the desired results, particularly as the only items I have in mind are fighting equipment for the Pacific war. Our Army is required to operate as an integral part of the U.S. Army. We are not able, and would not be permitted by the United States, to develop our own supply lines and bases, and the United States will not handle our types of equipment. We have no option, therefore, but to use American equipment. Most of our war industry was developed to produce Canadian and British types. We can obtain the necessary equipment and supplies for our Forces for the Pacific war only from the United States as part of the equipment and supplies furnished by the United States to its own Forces. If the United States is not making sufficient purchases in Canada to provide us with U. S. dollars so that we in turn can buy this American equipment, we should not be expected to pay cash to them. But neither should we accept the necessary equipment on Lend-Lease terms. The equipment can be regarded as belonging from first to last to the United States Army, and made available to Canadian units fighting as integral units of the United States Army. When the fighting ends, the unused equipment and supplies will remain in the possession of the United States Army.

Whether it will be necessary to adopt this position depends on the total amounts involved on both sides. It would be desirable to obtain a good estimate of possible U. S. dollar costs of the Army and Air Force in connection with the Pacific war. We should then have to consider these amounts in the light of our prospective sales of war supplies to the United States and of our total prospective balance of payments with the United States on current account.

I think it is important that the Lend-Lease question discussed in the earlier part of this letter should be raised with the U.S. Government as soon as possible. We shall probably not have sufficient information on the Pacific war question to raise it definitively at the same time, but it would, I think, be advisable to mention it informally so that we should not later be thought to have held something back.

Yours sincerely,

G. F. TOWERS

Mémorandum du ministère des Finances
Memorandum by Department of Finance

[Ottawa,] June 29, 1945

RE: MEETING ON JUNE 29, 1945, RE: LEND-LEASE SETTLEMENTS

A brief meeting was held in Mr. Ilsley's office on June 29th to discuss the proposed course of action in approaching the United States regarding the amounts and means of settlement for Lend-Lease supplies acquired by the Canadian forces overseas from the U.K. Those present included Mr. Ilsley, Dr. Mackintosh, Mr. Towers, Mr. Ross,[156] A/C Murray,[157] W/C Ryrie,[158] Mr. McIntyre,[159] Mr. Allen (Financial Superintendent Air Force), Mr. Rasminsky, Mr. Coyne and myself.

The meeting was opened by a brief statement by me outlining the nature of the problem and the background of earlier negotiations with the U.K. and attempts to estimate the amounts involved. Mr. Towers then spoke at some length, arguing for a solution along the lines proposed in the draft message,† which had been distributed two days prior to the meeting. Mr. Ross, A/C

[156]A. D. Ross, sous-ministre de la Défense nationale (Armée).
A. D. Ross, Deputy Minister of National Defence (Army).
[157]Commodore de l'air J. M. Murray, directeur des comptes et des finances, CARC.
A/C J. M. Murray, Director of Accounts and Finance, RCAF.
[158]Lieutenant colonel G. Ryrie, Directorat des comptes et des finances, CARC.
Wing Commander G. Ryrie, Directorate of Accounts and Finance, RCAF.
[159]B. G. McIntyre, contrôleur du Trésor.
B. G. McIntyre, Controller of the Treasury.

Murray and W/C Ryrie gave some information regarding the manner in which the proposed course of action related to the types of transfers that were involved in their Departments, but none of the comments suggested that we should not take this action or that the broad lines of argument are inconsistent with the facts. There was some discussion about the applicability of the argument to initial equipment for the Army and capital equipment for the Air Force. It was recognized that an exception had to be made in respect of the initial equipment of tanks, for which payment had already been made to the U.S. Mr. McIntyre made a number of comments in the light of his discussions in Washington regarding the prices and means of settling for the tanks obtained as initial equipment. He emphasized, amongst other points (before Mr. Ilsley came in), that in most cases the profits of renegotiation of contracts go to the Treasury rather than to the contracting Department in the U.S., and that consequently the advantages of renegotiation cannot be reflected in the charges made for individual items on Lend-Lease or otherwise. Apparently only where the renegotiation affects only one contract under which production is currently taking place does the change in price redound to the benefit of the contracting Department and result in a change in the prices quoted.

Mr. Ilsley raised a number of questions as to how the suggested course of action would appear from the American point of view. Mr. Towers and I both endeavoured to point out that these possible American charges could be met quite reasonably.

Mr. Towers, in answer to a question, suggested that if the Americans were reluctant to accept the course of action suggested, Canada should be prepared to take a fairly strong attitude on this, believing that the course proposed is a just and reasonable one.

It was noted that Mr. Robertson would be going to Washington to see Mr. Clayton about other matters on July 9th, and it was hoped that he could take up this matter at that time. (This will require fast action to obtain clearance from Cabinet here and make any necessary drafting changes. It will also require fast clearance with the U.K.) It was also suggested and agreed that Mr. Pearson should be given an opportunity at the earliest possible time to see a draft of this suggested memorandum and make any comments or suggestions he can about it.

In regard to the substance of the message, it was noted by Mr. Bryce that some alteration would have to be made in the third paragraph to take into account the records that are available in regard to the transfer of aircraft. Mr. Towers suggested that it would be well to review the last two lines of the message and if possible make such alterations as would enable Canada to obtain some American equipment for its forces operating with American forces in the Pacific without necessarily having to purchase it. Mr. Ross in this connection said that he had been endeavouring to make arrangements with the War Department under which Canada would not purchase any initial equipment for its Pacific forces, but would pay for equipment which it consumed, lost or destroyed in operations. He said he had already put forward a proposal of this kind to the Americans and was awaiting their answer on it.

There was also a brief discussion as to the possible magnitude of U.S. dollar costs in the Pacific operations. Some figures were given of anticipated R.C.A.F. requirements of U.S. type equipment which it was expected would be obtained through the R.A.F. on Lend-Lease as heretofore. Mr. Ross thought the costs for U.S. equipment for the Canadian army forces operating with the U.S. would not exceed $100 million a year for maintenance at its maximum rate. His inference is that it would be substantially short of this figure. This maintenance cost would not reach a maximum rate of this magnitude until late in the current fiscal year, and the costs for this fiscal year would be very much less. In addition there would be U.S. dollars required for pay of these Canadian forces, particularly when they were in training in the U.S. In this general connection Mr. Towers felt that Canada might be able to stand these U.S. costs if they did not exceed a reasonable figure, he mentioned one of, say, $150 m. or $160 m. a year, but it would be quite a different matter if they should run at, say, $500 m. a year.

It was left that I would make some changes in the draft message, endeavouring if possible to meet the points raised by Mr. Towers, and that we would then attempt to get agreement on it in time to have Mr. Robertson present it to Mr. Clayton on the 9th of July. Unfortunately I did not think to raise the question of clearing this with the U.K.

TELETYPE EX-2448 Ottawa, July 3, 1945

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Following for the Ambassador from Wrong.

Annex 1 below gives the text of a letter dated today addressed to me by the Acting Deputy Minister of Finance. Annex 2 is the draft of the message to the United States Government which is referred to in this letter. These documents are self-explanatory for the most part and I need supplement them only by the following comments:—

(1) It is a matter of substantial importance that we should do our best to reach agreement with the United States along the lines proposed in the draft message. Should the United States Government press a claim for reimbursement, the amount would probably be very considerable although no estimate can now be made. Furthermore, the process of negotiating such a claim would be very troublesome and probably protracted.

(2) The United Kingdom Government is somewhat embarrassed by their inability to answer the various enquiries from United States officials over a considerable period which are referred to in the last paragraph of Dr. Mackintosh's letter.

(3) What we would wish to receive from you at this stage is advice on the substance and form of the draft message and on the manner in which it can most effectively be presented. Perhaps it should be presented formally to Mr. Clayton (if we are ready to do so before he leaves for Europe) and at the same time, a copy should be given to Mr. Oscar Cox.

(4) Would you consider also one minor point? This is whether the last 3 or 4 lines add in your view substantially to the strength of the argument. These imply that we shall continue to give full value for all war supplies required by our forces during the Pacific War, and thus could be regarded as constituting an apparent commitment which would be uncertain both as to duration and as to the amounts involved.

Le sous-ministre par intérim des Finances
au sous-secrétaire d'État associé aux Affaires extérieures

Acting Deputy Minister of Finance to Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, July 3, 1945

Dear Mr. Wrong:

I am sending you enclosed herewith a suggested draft message to the United States Government on Lend-Lease supplies received by Canadian forces from the United Kingdom. I believe Mr. Bryce explained the nature and purpose of this message to you on Saturday last. It concerns a matter of the highest importance from the point of view of our financial and economic relations with the United States. It is hoped that, following its approval by the Government, this message, or an improved version of it, can be delivered to the United States Government within the next two weeks.

As Mr. Bryce explained to you, we should appreciate it if you could send this message by teletype to Mr. Pearson in Washington for his comments and suggestions regarding the substance of it, its form, and the manner in which it should be presented to the United States Government. It has been our thought that it should be presented as carefully as possible to one of the senior officers of the State Department. However, I understand that the F.E.A. may be the ones primarily concerned in recommending a policy to be followed on this matter, and that Mr. Oscar Cox is now, or is shortly to be, the head of this agency, and if so, that it would be desirable that it be presented to him as well as to the State Department, as he is apt to be sympathetic to the course of action that is proposed.

I am proposing to send a copy of this draft to Mr. Gordon Munro, of the United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office, this morning, with the suggestion that he might acquaint the United Kingdom authorities of our intentions in this matter and secure any comments or suggestions they may have regarding it, inasmuch as the United Kingdom is very much involved in this question with us and it is necessary that we keep in step as closely as possible with them in acting on the matter. You will note that the message suggests the United States should regard as a legitimate Lend-Lease requirement of the United Kingdom the supplies which it exchanges with the Canadian forces for supplies of Canadian origin.

The Minister of Finance has approved the substance of this approach to the United States, but the matter has not yet been placed before the Prime Minister or the Government. I believe Mr. Ilsley plans to take it up at least with the Prime Minister after we have secured Mr. Pearson's comments and those of the United Kingdom authorities concerned.

It may assist Mr. Pearson in considering this matter to know that Canada has had no direct discussions or contacts with the United States authorities on this matter up to date, except one or two brief meetings in Washington some time last year concerning the procedure which might be followed in establishing and agreeing upon amounts of certain types of supplies which had been retransferred. Even these meetings might be taken to have related to the special transactions regarding tanks for the initial equipment of the army, which are mentioned in the second last paragraph of the message. United States officials have inquired of the United Kingdom at various times about the amounts of supplies which had been transferred to Canada. The most recent of these inquiries took place within the past few months, and concerned only the relatively small quantities of foodstuffs of Lend-Lease origin which the United Kingdom had transferred to the Canadian forces. Mr. Goschen, of the United Kingdom Treasury delegation, is familiar with these inquiries and might be able to give Mr. Pearson some background information regarding this matter. I assume that Mr. Munro will be informing him of the nature of the message which we are considering.

Yours very truly,
W. A. MACKINTOSH

Projet du message au gouvernement des États-Unis
Draft Message to Government of United States

SECRET Ottawa, July 3, 1945

SUGGESTED DRAFT OF MESSAGE TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT ON LEND-LEASE SUPPLIES RECEIVED BY CANADIAN FORCES FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM

The Canadian Government has been informed that included in the supplies which have been furnished by the United Kingdom to Canadian forces overseas were some supplies originally obtained from the United States under the Lend-Lease Act. The United Kingdom Government has stated it wishes to inform the United States Government of the disposition of such supplies although records of transfers to Dominion forces operating with British forces were not required under the general Lend-Lease arrangements and therefore any figures provided would have to be estimates. It is understood that it would be necessary to have any estimate of the amount of Lend-Lease supplies transferred to Canada verified and accepted by the Canadian Government before it would be acceptable to the United States Government.

Any supplies of Lend-Lease origin which Canada has obtained from the United Kingdom pool of supplies have in substance been received by Canada in exchange for other war supplies which Canada provided to that same pool. This pooling and exchanging of supplies from different sources has been regarded by the Canadian Government as an essential part of the organization of the maximum effort against our common enemies. Neither the total amount of supplies drawn from the pool by the Canadian forces, nor the amounts which were of Lend-Lease origin, have been recorded, and such figures cannot be estimated with any approach to accuracy. The Canadian Government proposes to inform the United Kingdom that in its view there should be no need to make any determination of the amount of supplies of Lend-Lease origin received by Canadian forces from the United Kingdom, nor of the amount of supplies of Canadian Mutual Aid origin received by the United States forces from the United Kingdom.

In the European war the Canadian Army, Navy and Air Force have operated in the very closest cooperation with the corresponding forces of the United Kingdom, using the same equipment and supplies and in most cases operating under the same command. The Canadian forces have made use of United Kingdom lines of supply, bases, rear echelons and similar supply establishments instead of setting up duplicate facilities of this kind. The Canadian forces have therefore drawn their supplies from these United Kingdom sources as and when they were needed, without inquiry or concern as to the original source of such supplies (which in some cases may have been wholly or partly of Canadian Mutual Aid origin, and in other cases of United States Lend-Lease origin, but inextricably mixed with supplies of British origin). As most of the supplies were drawn during the actual course of military or air operations, it was not possible to keep records of the amounts, let alone their origin, except in the case of complete aircraft, and no specific payments have been made in respect of any item of supplies so obtained. (Certain supplies obtained in advance as "initial equipment" of the Canadian Army were recorded and dealt with separately, as noted below.) In substance, Canada has obtained these supplies from the United Kingdom in exchange for other war supplies provided by Canada to the United Kingdom. This exchange has been effected by the Canadian forces depositing, in an account in Canada, sums which have been determined by agreement to be a fair and reasonable estimate of the value of the supplies currently consumed by the British Army or Air Force units of the same types as the Canadian units in question, and these sums have then been used to meet the cost of producing war supplies in Canada for the United Kingdom. In addition, of course, Canada has provided and is continuing to provide the United Kingdom with large quantities of war supplies as Mutual Aid.

Canada, like the United States, has furnished other United Nations with large amounts of supplies required for the common effort without payment of any kind. Canadian war production has been planned and directed to meet the joint needs of the United Nations most efficiently, rather than the particular needs of the Canadian forces themselves. This policy is in accord with the general principle agreed and announced by Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. King at Hyde Park in April, 1941, that each of the two countries should provide what it is best able to produce and produce quickly. The most effective use of Canadian productive capacity for war purposes has been made possible by the arrangements described above under which Canada contributed certain types of war supplies to the United Kingdom pool and drew the particular supplies required by her own forces from that pool. In addition, Canada has provided supplies as Mutual Aid to France, China and the U.S.S.R., as well as to other Dominions and India. Well over half of Canada's war production has been for Allied forces, rather than Canadian forces.

In view of the circumstances set forth above, the Canadian Government wishes to suggest to the United States Government that the unknown quantities of supplies of Lend-Lease origin transferred by the United Kingdom to Canadian forces should be regarded simply as having been exchanged by the United Kingdom for other essential war supplies of Canadian origin. Whatever the amounts of such supplies, Canada has given full value in the form of her own war products in exchange for these supplies, and the Canadian Government believe it would be unnecessary and undesirable to attempt to make some arbitrary estimate of the amounts involved and to readjust the accounts among the three countries concerned on such a basis. It is suggested that the United States and Canada, both furnishing aid to their Allies on a large scale, should follow a broad principle of pooling and substitution in respect of supplies furnished to third countries, such that if Canadian forces receive from a third country supplies of Lend-Lease origin, or if United States forces receive supplies of Canadian origin, there shall be no accounting to the country of origin for those re-transfers.

In the event that the Canadian forces find themselves at the end of hostilities in possession of any items obtained from the United Kingdom which can be determined to be of Lend-Lease origin, they will be prepared, under the policy suggested above, to re-exchange them with the United Kingdom for items of Canadian or British origin, so that the United Kingdom may place them at the disposal of the United States, if the United States Government so desires.

One special case should be noted. In providing the initial equipment for the Canadian Army in Europe, it was decided for operational reasons to use tanks of a United States type rather than Canadian types, and a large number of tanks were obtained for this purpose. In order to save time and shipping, it was decided to obtain these tanks from the stocks held by the United Kingdom in England and in Italy, rather than directly from the United States. Records were kept of the numbers and origin of these particular items of initial equipment and nothing was given to the United Kingdom in exchange for them. Payment for them was made directly to the United States Government in April, 1944, subject to subsequent adjustment when the numbers, prices and shipping charges were verified and agreed. It is not suggested that this special transaction should be disturbed in any way by the adoption of the general policy proposed above.

The Canadian Government does not wish to propose any change in the present arrangements under which Canada pays in cash for all supplies which she requests from the United States, whether through Government channels or by direct purchase from producers, including any supplies, such as raw materials, which the United States has received as reciprocal aid from the United Kingdom or elsewhere. The amounts which Canada has expended in purchasing war supplies from the United States have greatly exceeded the amounts which the United States has spent on war supplies from Canada, and in fact have resulted on balance in an increase during the war in the substantial indebtedness of Canada to the United States, but in view of Canada's capacity for war production, the Canadian Government wishes to continue to provide full value in exchange for all war supplies acquired by the Canadian forces.

TELETYPE WA-3579 Washington, July 6, 1945

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: Your EX-2448, July 3rd, Lend-Lease military supplies transferred by the United Kingdom authorities to the Canadian Army. I have discussed this matter twice with the Canadian officials interested in Washington, as a result of which I desire to make certain suggestions on the question of procedure. Your reaction to these suggestions regarding procedure will, of course, affect our views regarding the substance of the draft communication attached to your teletype. I am, therefore, not giving you our views on this question of substance at this time. I feel, and my feeling in the matter is shared by those with whom I have talked, that it might be premature to initiate discussions on this matter now with the United States authorities in the manner suggested, e.g., by a lengthy, carefully argued and formal communication. If we adopt this course, we are thereby giving great official importance to the question and in a sense putting ourselves on the defensive concerning it. Its importance is, of course, obvious, but only if the United States Government were to press their claim for reimbursement. We have, I take it, no concrete evidence that such a claim will be pressed apart from the enquiries which the United States authorities from time to time have addressed to the United Kingdom authorities. Your telegram does not indicate the levels on which these enquiries were made or the weight which should be attached to them. For these reasons, might it not be unwise at this particular moment to address a formal communication such as that proposed to the United States Government, if by so doing we were to make an inter-Governmental issue out of a question which, up to the present, has not been raised with us by the United States Government — except indirectly by enquiries to a third party, the United Kingdom?

Might it not be better at this stage merely to indicate to the United Kingdom authorities that if the United States make further requests for information as to the nature and extent of the transfers in question, we would have no objection to their being supplied with whatever information is available. At the same time, we might suggest to the United Kingdom authorities that they could indicate the complications and difficulties which would arise if the United States pressed for reimbursement from Canada, and that in such circumstances, similar information would undoubtedly be required by the Canadian Government in respect of Mutual Aid materials transferred by the United Kingdom to the United States Army? In this latter connection, are there any facts available as to the value of such Canadian tranfers, which would, I assume, be largely foodstuffs and timber for United States construction purposes overseas?

If the United States receive the information requested from the United Kingdom authorities, they would then have to decide what to do with it. They might then, of course, desire to initiate discussions with us or they might let the matter drop. If the former, would that not be the right time for us to put forward our case?

Such a case, I suggest, might, in the first instance, be embodied in a much shorter communication than that attached to your teletype and in one which would concern itself more with principles and policies than detailed argument. If, in spite of this communication, the United States insisted on pursuing the matter, then we would deal with the whole question at length and in detail, mobilizing all the arguments we possess in formal discussions. I feel, however, that it would be a mistake to do this until every other procedure were exhausted. If this is wise, then it follows that at this stage we should do nothing but indicate to the United Kingdom authorities that we have no objection to information being given to the United States concerning the Lend-Lase transfers in question, if in fact such information is available.

As stated above, I am refraining at the moment from giving you our views on the substance of your draft letter until I get your reaction to these suggestions regarding procedure. Ends.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures à l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in United States

TELETYPE EX-2583 Ottawa, July 13, 1945

I have discussed with Finance your message WA 3579 regarding Lend-Lease supplies transferred by the United Kingdom to Canadian Services, and that Department has furnished me with the following comment for you:

It is unfortunate we did not inform you more of the background of this situation in sending you the suggested draft message, as it might have answered in advance some of the questions you raise. In the first place, it should be made clear that conversations and correspondence have been carried on with the United Kingdom about this matter over the past three years, mainly over the question as to who would pay the United States for these supplies, and more latterly, as regards the possible methods of estimating them. Lord Keynes wrote a very long letter† to the Deputy Minister of Finance some months ago about the matter, a copy of which we could send you if necessary to give you some of the background material. At first it was contemplated that the U.K. might pay the U.S. for these supplies but later it was agreed that Canada ought to pay for them rather than the U.K. However, when the large magnitude of the amounts became evident, and the effect of these payments in increasing Mutual Aid that would be necessary to the U.K. and in seriously depleting Canada's reserves of U.S. dollars, it was felt that an entirely new line such as that suggested should be taken.

As regards your suggestion that we should have no objection to the U.K. supplying the U.S. with what information they can as to the nature and extent of the transfers in question, we are anxious if we possibly can to avoid any figures being given to the U.S. as that is likely to crystallize in their minds, and possibly in the minds of Congress, as an amount which Canada should rightfully pay the U.S., or else the U.S. should waive payment for, in effect thereby providing Canada with Lend-Lease. It is precisely this unpleasant dilemma which we are most anxious to avoid and yet which we are apt to be led into if the U.K. officially informs the U.S. that any specific or estimated value of Lend-Lease supplies has been transferred to Canada. In addition, for the reasons set forth in the proposed message, we believe that any estimates that can be given by the U.K. are quite arbitrary and could not stand up to any searching scrutiny. In fact, the amounts of such Lend-Lease supplies actually received are not known and cannot be ascertained. On the other hand, the U.K. we feel may be most reluctant to have this reason emphasized as the only one impelling us to refuse to agree to any estimates. It was for this reason that we felt the message should state that we did not believe any determination of the amounts involved would need to be made.

As regards your inquiry about the level on which U.S. inquiries to the U.K. have been made, we understand they were addressed in the first instance in March of 1944 by the Deputy Director of the International Division of the War Department to General McCready of the British Army Staff in Washington. In recent months specific inquiries have been made by Mr. Griffin of the F.E.A. to Mr. Goschen of the U.K. Treasury Delegation in Washington. The recent inquiries, as well as the original ones, have been for statistical information, but the U.K. feels that these statistics are apt to be given to Congress and to be construed as official information of the amounts transferred to Canada. So far as we know, these recent inquiries have not been pursued at high levels in a formal manner, but they are causing the U.K. Treasury authorities some real concern. Possibly by this time it is too late for the F.E.A. to furnish any information to Congress this year, and the pressure on the U.K. Treasury may be temporarily relaxed. You may also be interested to know that there were some previous discussons in Washington in the spring of 1944 over the procedure that would be followed in estimating the amounts of supplies transferred to Canada, if and when payments are made by Canada to the U.S. for them. You might note particularly Army message CAW 184 of April 14, 1944,† which describes a meeting that took place between Canadian representatives and the War Department. In regard to the inquiries made of the U.K., it might be worth your while speaking confidentially to Goschen of the U.K. Treasury in Washington. The U.K. authorities, as we understand it, feel that they are under an obligation to supply information to the U.S. but cannot do so without our concurrence, particularly as the U.S. authorities have taken the view that the amounts involved are primarily questions to be settled between the U.K. and Canada. We have submitted suggested draft message to the U.K. for their comments, however, and may have more information to supply you on their views about this matter in the next day or two.

Value of Canadian Mutual Aid supplies transferred by U.K. to U.S. may be relatively small. We inquired about food supplies transferred in this way and it appears that they amount to less than half a million dollars in value. Timber, which you mention, is not being obtained by the U.K. through Mutual Aid in Canada. Consequently we have little to bargain with in this respect except the principle involved, although we might well take the line that any Canadian supplies, whether provided on Mutual Aid or not, would be covered.

If you feel our draft message is too formal and defensive in tone, we would be glad to consider an alternative method of presentation or an alternative draft that would be free from this danger. We have found it difficult to conceive a message that would separate the arguments regarding determination of the amounts involved from the argument regarding the principles that ought to apply in respect of such transfers, particularly as we feel that the principles that should be adopted are the main argument for not attempting to determine the amounts involved. We will inform you further of the reaction of the U.K. to these suggestions, and would appreciate any further comments you can make in reply to the explanation given above and also on the substance of the message and the procedure in taking up this question with the U.S. Ends.

Your teletype EX-2583, July 13th, Lend-Lease transfers.

The background information on this matter included in your teletype disposes of a good many of the points raised in my earlier teletype WA-3579. I have a better understanding now of your difficulties in this matter, especially as I have also received through the United Kingdom Treasury delegation here (not from External Affairs) a copy of Gordon Munro's letter to Mackintosh dated July 12th.† I gather that the whole question is now being reconsidered and, therefore, it would appear unnecessary for me to comment on any detail of your original draft which is now likely to be changed.

I realize that I am not as familiar with this problem as you are in Ottawa but I am still not entirely convinced by the argument you make in your draft and feel, therefore, that the United States authorities would be even less convinced by it. I agree that, in view of the circumstances, it is difficult not [sic] to avoid a defensive tone in any communication of this kind because, in my view, our case is logically a pretty defensive one. I still think, however, that it would be better to open discussions on this matter informally and verbally with the F.E.A. people here rather than formally by a note to the State Department. Might it not be desirable, after discussions with the United Kingdom are concluded, to send someone to Washington who is entirely familiar with this matter to take it up with say, Oscar Cox of F.E.A.?

It seems to me that the Army transfers in question, however normal and justifiable they may have been under the conditions established, do at present represent Lend-Lease assistance received by Canada from the United States. We can acknowledge it as such and ask the United States authorities not to press for any accounting of it in view of the very special circumstances under which the assistance was given, or we can make some settlement with them. If we succeed in the former course, it will be difficult for us to maintain our proud, if somewhat expensive, boast in the future that Canada has received no Lend-Lease from the United States. However, I do not think we can have it both ways, and we shall have to decide whether the boast is worth something in the neighbourhood of 200 millions. What do you think of the United Kingdom's suggestion that we should offer to pay for identifiables only?

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, August 4, 1945

Dear Mr. Munro:—

In accordance with our discussion yesterday afternoon and at the request of the Minister of Finance, I am sending you herewith a draft for a letter from the Minister of Finance to your High Commissioner,† which we are considering as a means of bringing to a head the discussions which we have had in recent months about the adjustment of the provisional payments made by our Services overseas to take into account the Lend-Lease supplies which they are considered to have received from the United Kingdom. I should much appreciate having any comments or suggestions from your authorities in London regarding the usefulness of a letter of this kind in furthering the satisfactory solution to the problems involved in these suggested adjustments in respect of supplies of Lend-Lease origin.

As you know, we considered at one stage making an approach ourselves directly to the United States authorities on this matter, and we furnished you with a copy of the sort of message that we had thought of giving to the United States.[160] In your letter to me of July 12th† you forwarded some comments from your authorities on this proposal and suggested some changes which you thought might improve the exposition and argument set forth in our proposed message. We have noted these comments and suggestions carefully and have indeed re-examined our whole plan of approach on the matter in the light of the London attitude towards it.

The substance of the argument put forward in this letter to the U.K. is the same as in the proposed message to the U.S., which your people have already seen and commented upon. What is now involved is a change in the channel through which we would present these points, first to the U.K. and, if necessary, through the U.K. in the first instance to the U.S. It appeared to us on reflection that a direct approach to the U.S. involved two risks: in the first place, there was some chance that Canada might inadvertently misrepresent some aspect of the U.K. position in the matter; secondly, if we were to take it up with the U.S., we would probably have to do so at a fairly high level. This might well exaggerate the importance of the issue to the U.S. and possibly prejudice its favourable consideration. Consequently, we have now come to the conclusion that an alternative approach to the U.K. is better.

We believe that it would be both more logical and more convenient to have the first approach to the United States on this matter made by the U.K. on the basis of a reply which they have received from Canada to the suggestions that adjustments be made to reflect these items of Lend-Lease supplies included in the total supplies transferred to the Canadian forces. We feel this is more logical because up to date all the discussion with the U.S. on this matter has been carried on by the U.K., and, of course, it is the U.K. whom the U.S. must hold in the first instance responsible for these supplies provided as Lend-Lease. Indeed, under the arrangements which we are proposing, these supplies would continue to be recorded by the United States as having been provided to the U.K. for essential war purposes. We feel it is convenient to make the approach in this manner, as it will permit U.K. authorities to make clear their own position on this matter when raising it with the U.S., and leave the U.K. free to support the Canadian view or not, as they see fit. We would be quite prepared to discuss the matter with the U.S. once the question has been opened up from the U.K. side, and we would expect to argue the Canadian point of view ourselves if continued discussions are necessary on the matter. We would not expect the U.K. to carry the burden of argument on our behalf. On the other hand, of course, we would welcome a tripartite discussion on the matter and also any support which the U.K. would feel prepared to give to the Canadian suggestions.

As I told you in our discussion, we are making the suggestions embodied in this draft letter not only because they seem to us logical and sensible in themselves, but also because we are seriously concerned over the substantial increase that would result in the difficulties of financing the U.K. requirements in Canada in this current year if it is necessary for the U.K. to make very substantial rebates to Canada in respect of all payments made by the Canadian forces to the U.K. this year and in past years.

Yours very truly,

W. A. MACKINTOSH

TELETYPE WA-5610 Washington, November 1, 1945

SECRET. Brigadier Rodger, Flt. Lieut. Feldzan [Feldman] and Ritchie met this morning informally with Harmer of the United Kingdom Treasury and representatives of the United Kingdom Treasury delegation, British Army Staff, Royal Air Force delegation and the British Air Commission to learn from them the problems which they were encountering in connection with the submission of records and transfers and inventories for Lend-Lease equipment in connection with the current United States-United Kingdom economic negotiations. Harmer will be writing a detailed letter to Munro in the High Commissioner's Office, Ottawa, on this subject probably tomorrow for discussion with officials of the Department of Finance and other Departments.

In the meantime, you may wish to have a brief report of what took place at the informal discussions this morning.

The problems arise in connection with three sorts of statements which the United Kingdom will have to provide either immediately or eventually to the United States authorities:

1. List of transfers to third countries (including Canada) of Lend-Lease supplies during the course of the war. The United Kingdom propose to submit in the case of Canada a list of identifiable transfers which will not be confined necessarily to initial equipment but may, in fact, include maintenance items insofar as such items are properly identifiable. They do not see how in their relations with the United States they can confine the statement to initial equipment if, in fact, other transfers are equally identifiable.

2. The inventory of Lend-Lease equipment on hand as [of] September 2nd, 1945. The United Kingdom had not decided at the beginning of the meeting whether they would prefer to put in separate inventories for the United Kingdom and for other non-United Kingdom countries under United Kingdom operational control, including Canada, or to put in a lump inventory of all supplies on hand under United Kingdom operational control without distinction as to the nationality of the fighting unit which happen to have physical possession of the items at that particular time. At the close of the meeting the consensus of United Kingdom opinion was that the lump inventory would be preferable, and they expressed the opinion that from the Canadian point of view the lump inventory might have much to commend itself, since it would help to avoid raising questions of wastage, maintenance, etc., in respect of Canadian fighting elements. It might be mentioned in this connection that the United Kingdom expect that they will not be required to pay for strictly combat equipment in the military inventory but that they will have to pay only for items having possible civilian end-use and even for such items only after they have been declared surplus.

3. A statement of items which the Canadian forces expect to retain or withdraw from the overseas pool for return to Canada. This list will be required to enable the United Kingdom to discharge their obligation to inform the United States of the ultimate disposition of supplies originally received by them under Lend-Lease and to provide a basis for settlement between Canada and the United States for supplies retained by Canada insofar as such supplies have not already been included in the list identified as (1) above.[161]

The United Kingdom, probably through Harmer's letter to Munro, will be requesting your agreement on the general principles to govern the preparation of these lists. Although the actual lists may take some time to complete, agreement on the governing principles will be necessary within the next few days in order that the United Kingdom may inform the United States of the procedure they propose to follow in preparing their statements. In the preparation of the actual lists the United Kingdom will seek agreement of Canadian authorities in London and Ottawa as to the technical accuracy of the lists in advance of their submission. It should be noted that these statements pertain to transfers of supplies overseas only and do not in any way affect supplies to the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan which are understood to be the subject of separate discussions now taking place in Ottawa between representatives of the United Kingdom and Canada.

CANADIAN LEND-LEASE REBATE

In our discussions with the Americans about military Lend-Lease settlement, some points have arisen affecting this question. We arranged, therefore, for a meeting this morning to discuss the position. Ritchie of the Canadian Embassy, Brigadier Rogers [Rodgers], and Flight Lieutenant Feldman were present, together with Brigadier de Chassiron, Air Commodore Nowell, and a number of other representatives of U.K. Missions concerned.

The position may be summarised as follows: We are hoping to arrive at a settlement with the Americans on the general basis that:

(a) We make a return, in agreed form, of all our holdings of Lend-Lease military equipment as at V-J Day.

(b) We are allowed to retain such items as are required for essential military use, subject to a limited number of special cases where the Americans may wish to recapture.

(c) No payment is required in respect of combat materials; or of other equipment having a possible civilian end-use unless, and until, it becomes surplus.

(d) A lump sum payment shall be agreed and included in the settlement in final discharge of any claims by the U.S. Government in respect of material becoming surplus and disposed of for civilian end-uses.

(e) We undertake either to notify or possibly to obtain the prior consent of the U.S. Government to any transfers of Lend-Lease equipment in our inventory to third Governments (including Commonwealth Governments) for military purposes.

The foregoing is a rather condensed summary of proposals which have not yet been finalised. But we hope they may be acceptable both to the Americans and to London.

Arising out of this, the following points should be mentioned as involving Canadian interests:

(1) We have to consider whether our inventory of holdings in, e.g. North West Europe and the Mediterranean Theater should exclude those items actually in the hands of Canadian (or other non-U.K.) units at V-J Day, or whether we should put in an inventory showing all the holdings on U.K. charge.

(2) We have to consider what the position would be in the event of the Canadian forces wishing to take home with them items of Lend-Lease origin.

(3) Finally, there is the question whether our present discussions with the Americans in any way affect the handling of the Canadian question, the lines of which we discussed in September in Ottawa.

As to (1), our conclusion is that we should show our holdings undivided — i.e. not distinguishing those items in the hands of non-U.K. forces from the rest. One reason for this is, as we are advised, that the holdings as at a particular date may be largely accidental. Thus there is no reason to suppose that the Canadian holdings will consist either of the same items or the same quantities as they may want to take home with them. Equipment may have been returned to depots, and Canadian forces might be expected to draw from those depots when they return home,[162] but out of a pool in which their V-J holdings have been merged. Thus, if the effect of our showing the Canadian holdings separately were to establish Canadian ownership of these items, it might prove inconvenient later.

On the other hand, it is clear that we must somehow protect the Canadian interest. But we think this is best done separately — I refer to this again in discussing point (3) below — and that all that need be done in the present context is to insert a covering note into our inventory stating that it includes "Holdings of non-U.K. Units in such Theaters" or some similar form of words.

The question of (2) then arises, i.e. of what happens when the Canadians wish to withdraw items of Lend-Lease origin. Under our proposal in (1), the formal position will be that these items will have appeared on the U.K. inventory, and we have to establish not only that the Canadians are entitled to withdraw them, but that no further question of financial settlement arises. We do not foresee any difficulty in obtaining U.S. consent to such withdrawals, and this question, therefore, resolves itself into that of clearing the point about settlement.

This brings me on to point (3). As you know, we have been collecting the lists of Identifiable Lend-Lease items included in initial equipment issued to the Canadian Army, and similar lists of Air Ministry items. (The Air Ministry, as you know, have a different procedure from the War Office, and do not make the same distinction between initial equipment and maintenance. But in their case, as in that of the War Office, it is possible to produce a list of those Lend-Lease items, the issue of which to the Canadians can be recorded; and this has been the basis of all our previous discussions of the matter.) We have now received the War Office lists, and B.A.S. are examining them. (Ken Goschen sent you particulars with his letter of 27th October.) They will be telegraphing any comments to the War Office, and asking the latter to ensure that the lists are agreed with Ottawa, and that we get authority from the Canadian Government to submit them to the War Department.

As regards the Air Ministry, I understand their lists are in course of preparation, but I have not seen them. But they too will be asked to ensure that they are cleared with Ottawa, and that authority is given for RAFDEL[163] to submit them to the War Department.

We propose, therefore, that when these lists are submitted (with Canadian concurrence) it will be understood that the Canadians will then be prepared to complete the financial settlement direct with the U.S. Government on the basis of these lists. In other words, they will relate these lists to the advance payment which we understand they made in 1943, and will settle about any difference one way or another that may arise, without our being further concerned. But we shall not ourselves raise the question of maintenance or other Unidentifiable issues; and if it is raised by the Americans, we shall reply on the lines recently discussed in Ottawa.

We still think this is the best way of handling the matter, and in our view there is no reason why we should delay submitting these lists longer than necessary (see in this connection Ken Goschen's letter of 27th October referred to above). Indeed, there may be advantages in putting them in fairly promptly, since this will enable us to put on record with the War Department that our inventories may include items which are the subject of this settlement between the Canadian and U.S. Governments.

If the Canadians are in a position to say, in the fairly near future, precisely what items of Lend-Lease origin they may wish to ship back to Canada, this question could be taken up forthwith, i.e. as soon as these lists have been submitted to the War Department. (In this connection, I understand they have already taken back certain items since VE-Day, e.g. Dakotas.) It would probably be necessary to make a joint U.K.-Canada approach, but we can consider this further. If the items and amounts which they wish to take back are within the totals for which they will settle with the War Department, we should hope that no difficulty would arise. (But obviously at this point there is the possibility that the question of maintenance issues will be raised, and will have to be dealt with.) If, however, they want to take greater amounts than they have settled for, or items not appearing in the list at all, then we fear that separate settlement may be unavoidable. But the impression at our meeting this morning was that this was not likely to be a serious consideration.

[163]Royal Air Force Delegation.

I should be grateful if you would show this letter to Bob Bryce, and get his reactions. I enclose a spare copy. As far as we can see the procedure suggested above is the best that we can devise to protect the Canadian position, but before committing ourselves to it, we should like to know that they agree. The immediate point, as you will see, is to settle the form of the U.K. military inventory, and of the covering agreement dealing with the retransfer point. This may have to be done in the very near future, and I hope, therefore you can give me an early reply.

There are two further points I should mention. In the first place, you will know that we are dealing only with major items of Identifiable Lend-Lease origin. We assume that no question of retransfer procedure, etc., will arise in respect of the rest. Secondly, the question of making an inventory of U.K. Lend-Lease holdings in Canada itself will have to be dealt with as an entirely separate matter. This arises, of course, mainly out of the B.C.A.T.P.; but there are certain complications due to exchanges of aircraft between the training scheme and Canadian Home Defense forces, which will need to be sorted out. But these need not, we think, affect the handling of the questions discussed above, which concern inventories in combat theaters.

Yours ever,

F. E. HARMER

P.S.

1. On reading this over, there is a passage which I have marked on page 2 where I am afraid the sense is not clear. What I meant to say was, Canadian forces might quite possibly, on V-J Day, have already turned in their previous holdings of equipment, but this would not necessarily mean that they did not wish to take certain amounts of such equipment back to Canada ultimately. In that event, they would draw what they required from U.K. depots when the time came; and there is no particular reason why the amounts they would wish to draw, or the particular items involved, would correspond, in any way, to the holdings they happen to have of September 2.

2. You should know that F.E.A. have again reminded us of the question of the Lend-Lease element in Food supplied to the Canadian forces. We propose to reply early next week that we have made enquiries, but that we are not in a position to make any returns of issues of Lend-Lease articles to the Canadians other than the returns which are in process of being submitted to the War Department; and that, as we understand these latter returns do not show any food items. So far the question has been dealt with on the telephone. But this may bring it to a head. Anyway, the foregoing is the least we can say without being too disingenuous, and we feel that the time has come when we must be prepared to make some reply.

Following for Ritchie from R. B. Bryce, Finance Department. Begins:

1. Re Reporting by U.K. of Lend-Lease inventories and transfers, I have discussed with appropriate Army and Air Force authorities the proposals which Harmer and Goschen have outlined to us in respect of the information the U.K. is to provide to U.S. in respect of Lend-Lease inventories, Lend-Lease transfers and Canadian requirements of Lend-Lease material already obtained. We would appreciate it if you would transmit the following to Harmer or Goschen for us.

2. We are agreeable to the U.K. submitting inventories of all holdings of Lend-Lease equipment remaining in various theatres under U.K. command at V-J day, provided it is made clear, as suggested by Harmer, that it includes holdings of non-U.K. units in such theatres. We believe it is necessary in this connection to indicate to the U.S. authorities that this inventory includes items of Lend-Lease origin transferred to the Canadian forces and covered by notification of transfers being given to the U.S. We think it is also necessary to indicate that these inventories include, as we understand they will, some items obtained directly by Canada from the U.S. and paid for in cash, either through the reimbursable Lend-Lease machinery or directly from American contractors. In this connection we cannot immediately supply any estimate of the amount of these latter items that will likely be included in the U.K. inventory, but the Army has taken items to Europe which have been purchased here from the U.S., heavy trucks, for example. There are further complications that it seems hardly necessary to mention at this stage, for example, Army equipment of Lend-Lease origin which the Canadian authorities obtained in exchange for similar equipment of other origin which they had held but which they turned over to the U.K. in circumstances which made such swaps desirable. These complications regarding inventory are not so great in the case of the R.C.A.F. holdings, but we would like to be clear in this connection whether engines of actual or presumed Lend-Lease origin in planes of U.K. origin will be included in the inventories or not.

3. We are agreeable in principle to the submission of lists to the U.S. of recorded transfers of identifiable Lend-Lease equipment to Canadian forces by U.K. in the manner suggested. I understand that in general these lists will include items of initial equipment for Army and corresponding items for Air Force, and possibly a few additional items recorded for one reason or another, but that in general it is unlikely to include any significant amount of items transferred as maintenance (except possibly aircraft), inasmuch as these were usually not recorded and the transfers are covered under the general arrangements pertaining to transfers in the course of operations. We understand all transfers of aircraft and engines have been recorded and would like to know as soon as possible if it is considered necessary to include such transfers made to replace wastage. The list attached to Goschen's letter to Munro of 27th October† is being considered now by Army and verified against their records. Army authorities here had not received it yesterday through Army channels in Washington, but will be in touch with them about it. We have as yet seen no Air Force lists, but understand that they will be made up on the same principle. We would like to see them as soon as possible. We would like to know whether these lists are to include equipment issued to R.C.A.F. squadrons and later returned to the U.K. on re-equipping the squadrons with other types. We should also like to know if possible whether Army lists include items obtained temporarily for special operations, as for example D.D. Tanks, and if so whether these are to be included in lieu of, or in addition to, other items of initial equipment.

4. We believe the U.K. appreciate that it will be necessary to make adjustments in our payments to them in respect of any items on the lists covered in paragraph 3 which are necessary to avoid Canada paying both the U.K. and the U.S. for the same equipment, but it might be well if you could confirm with them that this is the case.

5. Army and R.C.A.F. are now proceeding to compile lists of items of known Lend-Lease origin which they will wish to bring back to Canada. In the case of the Army it is not expected these lists will be large in relation to amounts obtained by Canada as initial equipment. In the case of the Air Force it will be substantial in certain categories. In this connection we should like to know whether items already brought back to Canada, particularly before V-J day, are to be included in these lists. We should also like to know whether aero engines of U.S. origin in U.K. air frames are to be included, notably Packard-Merlins in Lancaster 10's. It may be difficult to complete these lists with finality in the near future and we should like the option of revising them subsequently.

6. Is it intention that these lists of items of Lend-Lease origin which Canada wishes to bring back are to be submitted to the U.S. and if so by whom and under what circumstances? Can our forces regard themselves as free to bring back items of this nature before these lists are compiled and submitted to U.K. and/or U.S.? We assume so, as some items are already being returned. We are not clear as to how far we will be able to bring back these items if they exceed in quantities the amount of such items we obtained as initial equipment or some proportion of that which might be considered to remain in inventories now. If payment to U.S. for such items is necessary, then presumably it must also be covered by adjustments with U.K. to avoid Canada having to make duplicate payments for same equipment.

7. As I told Harmer on telephone Friday, Canadian Army is contemplating some disposal of equipment to Netherlands Army, in which they would like to include some equipment of U.S. origin. This would probably not exceed amounts which Canadian Army will settle with U.S. for on basis of transfer lists noted above. Canadian Army regard this equipment as rightfully theirs and feel they should be able to dispose of it in this way. I understand from Harmer on the telephone that he feels we should not undertake to make such disposals to Netherlands without consultation with U.K. authorities and probably with U.S. authorities. Canadian Army would hope this matter could be cleared up in near future as they are anxious to have disposals carried out. We would appreciate any indication from U.K. authorities as to when and how they felt this matter could be most usefully discussed. We should also like additional information on the prospects for disposal of Lend-Lease inventories that will be declared surplus, and whether Canada will have any rights in respect of such disposal arising out of their payments to U.S. on one hand and U.K. on the other.

8. I have already informed Goschen by telephone of the general purport of this message, and am furnishing copy to Munro of U.K. here.

L'ambassadeur aux États-Unis au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Ambassador in United States to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELETYPE WA-5831 Washington, November 19, 1945

Following for R. B. Bryce, Finance Department, from A. E. Ritchie, Begins: The questions in your EX-3886 of November 12th concerning Lend-Lease inventories and transfers were communicated to Goschen of the United Kingdom Treasury delegation on November 12th. On Saturday, November 17th, I met with Harmer and Goschen to receive their views on the questions which you have raised. Their oral replies are reported in summary form in the following paragraphs.

2. On the general question in your paragraph 2 concerning the description of inventories, Harmer and Goschen are of the opinion that the form of statement which they have in mind will meet most of the points which you raise in that paragraph. In any event, they propose to provide us with the text of the descriptive remarks,† which will accompany the inventories, before submission to the United States in order that we might have an opportunity to determine whether the statement protects us adequately at all points. Harmer doubted that such items as heavy trucks, which had been obtained directly by Canada from United States, would appear in the Lend-Lease inventories, since they would almost certainly be distinguishable from similar Lend-Lease items. Concerning swaps (e.g., Ram tanks for Shermans), Harmer feels that this problem need not be resolved at this stage and that any necessary off-setting might be deferred for discussion until after the basic inventories have been prepared. In answer to your question concerning the treatment of engines of actual or presumed Lend-Lease origin in planes of United Kingdom origin, Harmer reports that the following major Lend-Lease components in aircraft will be shown in the inventory: engines, propellers, automatic pilots and gun turrets.

3. With reference to your paragraph 3, Harmer and Goschen confirm that in general the Army lists of recorded transfers are unlikely to include any significant amount of items transferred as maintenance. They are not able to say at the moment whether the same is true for aircraft maintenance but they are checking and will let us know if aircraft maintenance are to be treated in a manner different from that applicable to Army equipment. They are inclined to think that any recorded transfers of aircraft and engines should be included in the lists, as they are anxious to be in a position to assure the United States that the lists include every transfer of which the United Kingdom has record. They expressed the opinion that from our point of view, as well as from their own, it would be desirable to provide the United States authorities with a list of recorded transfers sufficiently complete to satisfy the United States authorities without requiring any estimate of, or allowance for, unrecorded transfers. Harmer indicates that the United Kingdom would probably be reluctant to withhold any recorded data, the withholding of which might give a general impression of a lack of frankness on the part of the United Kingdom. The Air Force lists, which you have not yet seen, are being worked on by Air-Commodore Nowell of the R.A.F. delegation here (Harmer thinks in consultation with the R.C.A.F. representatives) and will be sent to Munro when they are in a sufficiently complete form. It is expected that they will be sent to the Canadian authorities in Ottawa by the R.C.A.F. representatives at the same time. It is not known at the moment whether these lists are to include equipment issued to the R.C.A.F. squadrons and later returned to the United Kingdom but the United Kingdom representatives here are checking this point with London and will let us know the result of their enquiry. Similarly, it is not known whether temporary transfers to the Canadian Army are included and this point also is being checked with London. Harmer thought that temporary transfers would not have been recorded but that, in cases where equipment similar to that temporarily transferred had been issued to Canadian forces for permanent retention, the items would have been recorded.

4. Concerning your paragraph 4, Harmer confirms that the United Kingdom appreciates the necessity of making adjustments in our payments to them in the circumstances which you indicated. So far as he knows, such adjustments are likely to be required only in connection with Air Ministry transfers and not in the case of War Office transfers, since Canadian payments to the United Kingdom for initial equipment are understood to have been confined to Air Ministry items. In any event, the United Kingdom authorities are prepared to make such adjustments as may be necessary to avoid duplication of payments by Canada.

5. Concerning the lists of retentions or withdrawals referred to in your paragraphs 5 and 6, Harmer indicates that for the present the United Kingdom will merely report the V-J inventory and try to get acceptance of some general principles permitting reasonable withdrawal of items included in that inventory. They do not propose at this time to get involved in any discussion of the details of proposed withdrawals. Eventually, Canada would be expected to notify the United States of any withdrawals from holdings included in the V-J inventory or any earlier withdrawals (or to request prior consent of the United States to such withdrawals if the items are major, particularly in comparison with items or quantities indicated in the original lists of transfers to Canada, or if they have political significance as in the case of transport aircraft). Harmer expressed the opinion that it would be desirable for the Canadian authorities to discuss these detailed lists (or major individual withdrawals) with the United Kingdom authorities before submitting them to the United States authorites. He thought that United Kingdom advice or assistance might be found helpful, particularly in those cases in which the Canadian authorities were proposing to withdraw items not included in the original lists of transfers or if they were proposing to withdraw any items in quantities which approached, or exceeded, the quantities indicated in the original lists of transfers. It is not possible to predict the extent to which Canada might be asked by the United States to pay for such retentions or withdrawals. In so far as payments might be required by the United States, Harmer confirms that the United Kingdom would be prepared to make the adjustments necessary to avoid duplicate payments, and comments that for this reason, as well as for the reasons indicated above, it would be desirable for the Canadian authorities to discuss the lists of proposed withdrawals or retentions with the United Kingdom authorities at an early stage. On the specific question which you ask on aero-engines of United States origin in United Kingdom airframes, the answer is that they will be included in the inventory and will, therefore, have to be included in any lists of withdrawals.

6. With reference to your paragraph 7 and the question of disposal to the Netherlands Army, Harmer doubts that the Canadian Army should in all cases regard this equipment (even though in total it might not exceed the amounts indicated in the lists of transfers) as rightfully theirs. He points out that insistence by the Canadian Army on this right might raise the whole question of wastage and maintenance, since it is not possible to determine the extent to which wastage may have cut into, or even exceeded, the initial transfers for which payment has been made or is to be made to the United States. Harmer suggests that, if the Canadian authorities desire a clear title before making any disposals to the Netherlands, we should extend our list of proposed retentions or withdrawals to include this material, that is to say, we should make it a comprehensive list of all items to which we desire to secure a clear title. Harmer feels, as I believe he indicated to you on the telephone, that premature disposal by us of any such material might raise all sorts of complications in the discussions which we shall have to have with the United States concerning the items which we expect to retain or withdraw, particularly as we should presumably be competing with the United States in disposing of army equipment in Europe. Concerning the last sentence in your paragraph 7, Harmer was not quite clear as to the exact scope of your enquiry. Are you concerned only with the disposal of those items and quantities representing the amounts by which the difference between initial transfers and ultimate retentions exceeds reasonable wastage? If that is the problem, it would seem impossible to determine the extent and nature of the Canadian interest until we know whether and to what extent the United States will insist on some allowance for wastage. May it not be that in the interest of avoiding any involvement in settlement for possible maintenance we might be prepared to regard the quantities and items which we shall be retaining as representing (in the aggregate, if not item by item) the residue of initial transfers after a generally reasonable allowance for wastage? In that event, our direct interest in Lend-Lease disposal would presumably disappear. If the question you have in mind is larger than my interpretation of it, I should be grateful for some amplification from you on the basis of which I could discuss the point with Harmer.

7. Since dictating the above, I have received your EX-3960 of November 19th,† to which I think you will find at least a partial answer in paragraph 3 above. I had already passed a copy of your message of November 12th to Connor[164] through Brigadier Rodger. I shall provide copies of my present teletype to Brigadier Rodger, Flight Lieutenant Feldman, Connor, Harmer, and Goschen. If any of these officials have comments on the views as reported in this teletype, I shall communicate those comments to you.[165] Ends.

Mr. John Read, Department of External Affairs;
Mr. Escott Reid, Department of External Affairs;
Dr. D. B. Finn, Deputy Minister of Fisheries.

Chairman: Mr. N. A. Robertson.

Mr. Robertson opened proceedings with a brief statement emphasizing the importance of the Northern Atlantic Fisheries to the three countries represented, the peculiar nature of the fisheries in this region in that while contiguous to North America certain European countries had historic interests in them, the apparent need for conservation of fisheries in view of the probability of extensive fishing by European as well as North American countries with modern fishing appliances in the post-war period, and the happy relations between the United States and Canada in effecting measures of conservation in fisheries of the Pacific area. Mr. Robertson explained that it was understood that the present meeting was exploratory, but expressed the hope that it would contribute to mutual understanding and agreement, as to the best methods of conservation.

Mr. Atherton reciprocated Mr. Robertson's hopes for the success of the meeting. He also stressed the importance of the fisheries in this region to the three countries concerned, and general agreement among us as to the desirability of conserving this valuable resource. He thought we should keep in mind the principles already established in the Pacific to meet Japanese inroads.

The Agenda worked out by correspondence by the Canadian and United States delegates was agreed to. (See Annex I).

Items A and B of the Agenda —

Dr. Deason presented tentative statistics as to respective interests of the various countries in the fisheries of the North-Western Atlantic broken down by regions, as per attached map. (See Annex II.)† It appeared that in Area XXII fishing was at present almost wholly by United States interests, except in sub-division A of the area; that in Area XXI Canadian "take" was considerably in excess of that of the United States; that in Area XX the present United States "take" was almost negligible, with Newfoundland first and Canada second; that in Area XIX there was presently no United States fishing, although this was likely to be resumed after the war, that fishing at present was almost entirely Canadian with a small Newfoundland participation. The statistics presented for these areas represented deep-sea fishing rather than shore-fishing. While the statistics of the "take" of various European countries were very unsatisfactory, it was agreed that certain countries had historic interests in the Atlantic fisheries, notably France, Spain, and Portugal, although recent fishing seems to have been largely confined to Area XX.

The Canadian and Newfoundland delegates agreed with the general statistical picture presented. It was, however, agreed that further statistical investigation and analysis was necessary. The United States delegates undertook to report at the next meeting, tentatively set for February 10 in Washington. The question was raised whether in the event of a special fisheries regime or regimes being established present participation in fishing in any area for any species should be the basis for the participation in the regime or in future fishing. It was generally agreed that historic interest in the fisheries would have to be taken into account. Mr. Gushue intimated that Newfoundland would not be prepared to accept present participation in an area or in fishing for any particular species as a basis for limitation of future fishing.

Items C and D of the Agenda — Objectives and Methods

It was generally agreed that the objectives should be the conservation of the fisheries as a highly important food supply not only to the peoples of North America but other peoples as well, and the maintenance of this resource so as to provide the highest possible continuous supply.

Mr. Sturgeon suggested that the problem of regulation, insofar as it concerns European countries, was largely confined to Area XX of the map. Mr. Sturgeon prepared an informal statement on fisheries policy to indicate the general lines on which the United States delegation were thinking. (See Annex 3.)† It was asked (a) whether the United States delegates contemplated regulation in certain areas exclusively by North American countries, and (b) whether they were thinking of American countries having exclusive rights of fishing in certain areas. Dr. Gabrielson intimated he was thinking only of regulation, but that North American countries being contiguous to the fishing areas might be deemed as having exclusive rights of regulation. Mr. Dooman suggested that North American countries should be prepared to take reprisals against other states whose nationals might disobey the regulations. Mr. Atherton said there was an important difference between the right of regulation and the right to fish, and intimated that the former might be exclusive without the latter. Mr. Sturgeon referred to the exclusive right of fisheries which Canada and the United States are trying to establish on the West Coast and said that the political implications of a retreat from these principles with respect to arrangements on the Atlantic coast should be borne in mind.

The Chairman felt that there were profound differences between Atlantic and Pacific fisheries. Certain European countries have had long established interests in the Atlantic fisheries, while on the Pacific coast no trans-oceanic country had an established interest and conservation measures had already been instituted by North American countries. He also referred to the Atlantic charter,[166] which, by implication, would debar the exclusion of European countries from participation in fisheries of the Atlantic.

There was, however, general agreement that North American countries being contiguous to the fisheries had a stronger interest and, consequently, a prior claim to participate in their regulation for purposes of conservation.

Mr. Keenleyside suggested that, in view of the very great differences in the degree of interest of European countries in the fisheries in the different areas, a line from the Nova Scotia-New Brunswick border south to opposite the tip of Nova Scotia, then south-east passing north and east of Brown's Bank to parallel 42° north latitude, and that a separate regime might be established for the area west of this line while the eastern area might be brought under the London Convention.[167] Mr. Sturgeon felt that this would meet in general the views of the United States delegates, but did not wish for the moment to make any commitment.

The meeting adjourned at 12:45 a.m.

AFTERNOON SESSION

The meeting resumed at 2:30 p.m. It was suggested that there was some confusion between the proposed new doctrine about exclusive fisheries under discussion by the United States and Canada,[168] which had been developed with a view to meeting the situation of the Pacific and the regulation of the fisheries on the Atlantic coast, where the problem was quite different. The Canadian delegates suggested that it might be better to clear the matter of the new doctrine first. The United States delegates, however, intimated that while they had studied the proposals further they were not yet ready to commit themselves on the matter.

With respect to the Atlantic fisheries, Mr. Atherton suggested that regulations might first be drawn up and then submitted to the London Conference to secure compliance. Mr. Keenleyside felt, however, that the main question was one of machinery and that it would be more appropriate for a commission or whatever body was established to supervise the fishery to draw up the regulations after its establishment. The United States delegates declined to comment for the time being on the Canadian proposals as set forth in the Final Act of the London Conference,[169] or to make counter proposals, but admitted that from the point of view of enforcement there might be some advantage to be gained by relating the administration of the Western Atlantic fisheries to the London Convention.

A further meeting in Washington was agreed to for February 10.[170] Although the original proposal of the United States was for a meeting at "the expert level", it was agreed that the conference should not be confined to technical problems. The United States delegates agreed to try to obtain the final views of their government as to the text of the proposed statement on international law, and in any event to be prepared to discuss the matter further at the Washington meeting. It was also agreed that the matter of a regime for the Western Atlantic should be discussed, and the hope was expressed that agreement might be reached at this meeting as to the recommendations to be made to the governments represented.

L'ordre du jour d'une réunion avec une délégation des États-Unis
Agenda for Meeting with United States Delegation

[Ottawa,] January 24, 1944

A — Review of United States interests in the North Atlantic fisheries based on available data.

B — Review of Canadian interests in the North Atlantic fisheries based on available data.

C — Discussion of objectives in relation to the North Atlantic fisheries.

D — Discussion of methods of obtaining agreed objectives.

(1) Establishment of a separate regime for the North Atlantic fisheries.

(2) Establishment of a special regime for North Atlantic fisheries integrated with the general international agreement.

NOTE: The draft proposal referred to in C could be utilized as a basis for discussion whether the conference reaches agreement D(1), D(2) or some compromise between them.

The Canadian representatives at the conference will be prepared also to discuss the proposed new formulation of certain principles of international law relating to fisheries on the high seas which has been under review during recent months if the United States officials so desire.

Rapport du président par intérim, le Comité des conseillers techniques sur les pêcheries de l'Atlantique du nord-ouest

Report by Acting Chairman, Committee of Technical Advisers on Northwestern Atlantic Fisheries

[Washington?] February 19, 1944

The Committee of technical advisors appointed by the Governments of the United States, Canada and Newfoundland, at its meeting on February 17 and 18 after a careful consideration of the biological and statistical data presented and discussed at that meeting, agreed unanimously on the following recommendations and expressions of opinion to be presented to the Conference.

1. Newfoundland, Canada, and the United States, because of contiguity, considerations of production and consumption, have a major interest in the use and conservation of the fisheries on the fishing grounds of the Northwest Atlantic area, including international statistical Areas XVI to XXII.

2. Certain European countries have participated in the fisheries of this area to a varying extent for a number of years. Their interests must be considered and their adherence obtained to international conservation measures designed to maintain fisheries in this area at their maximum yield.

3. Although the area is occupied by more or less local stocks of fish, the intermigration of certain species and the mobility of the fishing fleets of the United States, Canada and Newfoundland makes the area a single economic unit.

4. Available evidence shows that conservation measures are already necessary for at least one species (i.e. haddock) and indicates that measures will be necessary as regards other species in the near future. If, as anticipated, there is considerable expansion of fisheries in the post-war period, the problem of conservation will become more general and more serious.

5. The Committee urges upon the Conference the necessity of dealing with international fishery problems of the area defined in paragraph 1, and that machinery be set up by the three countries represented here for the continuous cooperative study of common problems and for effectively implementing the results of such study.

For the Committee:
ELMER HIGGINS

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Definition of the Area Defined in Paragraph 1

The area defined by the Committee as being of major fishery interest to the United States, Canada, and Newfoundland in the Northwest Atlantic is bounded on the west by the North American continent and is contained within the following parallels and meridians, to wit:

Starting on the coast of the United States of America at 71° 40′ West Longitude, proceeding southward along that meridian to 40° North Latitude, thence proceeding eastward along this parallel to 40° West Longitude, thence proceeding northward along this meridan to 59° North Latitude, thence proceeding westward along that parallel to 59° West Longitude, thence proceeding northward.

Rapport de l'adjoint spécial en temps de guerre au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Report by Special Wartime Assistant to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

February 22, 1944

MEETING ON FISHERIES PROBLEMS HELD IN WASHINGTON, D.C., FEBRUARY 19, 1944

Present:

United States Delegation

Messrs. Hackworth, Sturgeon, Dooman, Arnold, Bishop and others from the Department of State; Messrs. Deason, Harrington, Higgins and others from the Department of Fisheries and Wildlife.
Mr. Gushue from Newfoundland.

Canadian Delegation

Messrs. Read, MacKay from the Department of External Affairs; and Messrs. Finn, Leim, McKenzie and Needler from the Department of Fisheries.

Place: The State Department — Time 10:00 A.M.

Chairman: The Hon. Joseph C. Grew

1. Mr. Hackworth presented a draft statement on the "Regulation and Control of Coastal Fisheries" to serve as a basis for discussion (copy attached)†. He felt that it was inexpedient to make a joint declaration of principle at the present time but that it would be desirable to have an agreed statement as a basis for whatever joint measures of the regulation and conservation were undertaken. He felt that states contiguous to a fishery were likely to have a greater interest than other states, and that international law should recognize this. There were many precedents for national control of a fishery on the High Seas contiguous to state territory (e.g., certain pearl fisheries) and for international regulation (e.g., the Fur Seal Convention, the Pacific Halibut Convention). New methods of exploitation of fisheries and the danger of over-fishing which were likely to arise after the war made necessary certain advances in international law for the conservation of fisheries. He recognized that there might be difficulty in obtaining universal acceptance of necessary changes, but felt that we should be prepared to use whatever forces were necessary to put them into effect. He suggested that it would be desirable to have the concurrence of the U.S.S.R. because of its interest in Pacific fisheries, and of the United Kingdom.

2. Mr. Read asked how a doctrine of exclusive use of fisheries on the High Seas could be reconciled with the Atlantic Charter, to which it was replied that it was understood that the Atlantic Charter assured access to natural resources by trade rather than rights of direct exploitation.

3. Mr. Sturgeon said that the prepared statement was intended as a guide to future policy, to be applied when occasion offered (e.g., the fishery or an area might be closed to other states if and when the need for conservation or other conditions warranted). Mr. Dooman felt that there was a difference between exploitation of a fishery by a state for purposes of securing food supplies and exploitation for commercial purposes, and that international law should take cognisance of it. To this it was objected that for some states exploitation of a fishery was a necessary means of producing exports to obtain other needed supplies (for example, in the case of Newfoundland) and that it would seem doubtful whether international law could take account of any difference in the purposes of exploitation.

4. Mr. Bishop said that it was not the intention of the present draft to exclude from a fishery any state now fishing there or with established historic or legitimate interests therein. Mr. Read pointed out that international law recognized the right of fishing on the High Seas for any state and that this legal right was an established interest. Mr. MacKay expressed doubt whether it were expedient or just to freeze the status quo as regards participation in a fishery on the High Seas and thus to exclude a state which had not hitherto participted.

5. Mr. Gushue said there was a real difference between the problems of the Pacific and those of the Atlantic, and suggested that the Atlantic problems should be approached by examining conditions which obtained there rather than by attempting to apply a new legal principle. Mr. Dooman said that the United States could not agree to European states participating in the regulation of fishery off the Atlantic coast without reassuring the people of the western states that trans-Pacific states would not have the right to participate in fisheries off the Pacific coast, and that therefore a general statement of principle was desirable before attempting to regulate the Atlantic Fisheries. Mr. Read felt that the purport of the United States proposals could only be understood when applied to particular areas, and under the present wording he felt that Newfoundland alone would have the right to regulate the Grand Banks area and probably to exploit the fishery there. Mr. Bishop said that it was intended that the right to participation in the regulation of fishery should depend on proximity or present participation in the fishery rather than proximity and participation, and that exclusive exploitation of a fishery should depend on previous exclusive participation and other essential conditions laid down in the statement.

ITEM I OF THE AGENDA[171]

The report of the committee of technical advisers on Northwestern Atlantic Fisheries was presented by Mr. Higgins (copy attached). Dr. Needler explained the statistical backgrounds for the first two conclusions of the report; Dr. Harrington the backgrounds for conclusions three and four; and Mr. Higgins discussed conclusion five. In general, the committee's report concluded that the area of the Atlantic north of 40° north latitude and west of 40° west longitude, excluding statistical areas 14 and 15 about Greenland (see attached map),† constituted a single economic area, both biologically and commercially. Mr. Gushue felt that the Atlantic Fishery should be treated as a separate region. He said that the biological and commercial approach was a much more practical one than that of international law, and that this approach should be followed. There was a further objection that the general legal approach to the subject might antagonize European countries, which he said Newfoundland could not afford to do.

[171]Cet article traitait de la limite occidentale de la pêche dans l'Atlantique du Nord.
This item dealt with the western boundary of the North Atlantic fisheries.

Mr. Arnold and Mr. Sturgeon felt that we should not put ourselves in a position of following contradictory principles in the Atlantic and Pacific and that all possibilities of reaching a common basis of principle should be exhausted before attempting to deal with the Atlantic separately.

Mr. Dooman said that the United States delegation were prepared: (1) to recommend the findings of the technical advisers as a basis for the relation between a regime for the Western Atlantic region and that provided in the proposed London Convention; and (2) to endeavour to redraft the statement of international law so as to meet the situation in both the Atlantic and Pacific regions. He asked whether the Canadian representatives were prepared to recommend the findings as a basis of policy to their Government. On Mr. Read's enquiry as to the proposed relation of the western regime to the London Convention, it became apparent that the United States delegation were thinking of an entirely separate regime for the western Atlantic and of proposing 40° west longitude as a westward boundary for the London Convention. Mr. Dooman said that the American people could not contemplate regulation of North American fisheries by European nations.

Mr. Higgins argued that the London Convention provided no protection for North American Fisheries. Dr. Needler, however, pointed out that the size of the mesh for the western Atlantic proposed by the London Convention was 105 mm., which, he understood, was acceptable to the United States experts. Mr. MacKay pointed out that the London Convention provided a basis of law, such as "rules of the road", for fishery operations and for policing fishing areas. He asked whether the United States members contemplated anysuch arrangements, if a separate western regime were established, and, if so, whether they had examined the possibility of coming under the London Convention for such purposes? It was replied that they contemplated a complete scheme similar to the London Convention for fisheries operations and the policing of the western Atlantic fishery areas, and that certain sections of the London Convention might be incorporated in a convention for the western Atlantic.

Mr. Sturgeon felt that a regime for the western Atlantic areas could be established much more quickly if entirely separate from the London Convention which was not expected to go into effect until after the war. It was pointed out, however, that several European governments would be concerned in the establishment of a separate western Atlantic regime and that since some of them were governments in exile the same difficulties with respect to immediate action would arise, as in the case of the London Convention.

To the question by the United States delegation as to whether Canadian representatives were prepared to recommend the experts' report to their government, Mr. Read replied (1) that considerable progress had been made on the clarification of legal matters but that a further draft would be necessary; (2) that it would be necessary to examine the proposed statement of legal principle in application to particular fishing areas in order to appreciate its implications; (3) and that the experts' report was an excellent basis for discussion but that it did not decide any question of policy with respect to administration of western fisheries, and that an elaboration of the proposals which the United States delegates had in mind would be essential before any recommendation could be made to the Canadian Government.

Mr. Gushue asked what the position of the United States delegation would be should Newfoundland decide that the London Convention was necessary for the protection of her interests. Mr. Sturgeon replied that the hope was that Newfoundland, Canada and the United States could agree upon a common policy. It was agreed that the United States members should prepare as soon as possible a new draft of the statement of international law; that the United States members should elaborate their ideas for a separate western Atlantic regime; that a further meeting should be called as soon as these drafts were prepared; that the Canadian and Newfoundland delegations would await examination of these drafts before making any recommendations to their respective governments.

Secretary of State for External Affaires to Ambassador in United States

DESPATCH 1038 Ottawa, July 15, 1944

May I refer to my despatch No. 420 of March 22, 1944,† regarding the removal of obstructions to the ascent of Sockeye Salmon through Hell's Gate Canyon on the Fraser River.

2. Under Article III of the Convention between Canada and the United States for the Protection, Preservation and Extension of the Sockeye Salmon Fisheries in the Fraser River System, ratified July 28, 1937,[172] the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission is required to "make a thorough investigation into the natural history of the Fraser River sockeye salmon, into hatchery methods, spawning ground conditions and other related matters." The Commission may also recommend to the two Governments "removing or otherwise overcoming obstructions to the ascent of sockeye salmon, that may now exist or may from time to time occur, in any of the waters covered by this Convention, where investigation may show such removal of or other action to overcome obstructions to be desirable."

[172]Canada, Recueil des traités, 1937, N° 10.
Canada, Treaty Series, 1937, No. 10.

3. As a result of extensive investigation the Commission recommended to the two Governments on January 11, 1944, remedial measures for overcoming obstructions to the ascent of the salmon in Hell's Gate Canyon and further investigation and remedial measures for overcoming obstructions to the ascent of the salmon elsewhere in the Fraser River watershed. It was estimated that the costs of the works recommended would be $2,000,000, which, in accordance with Article III, paragraph 2, of the treaty, would be shared equally between the two Governments. Three copies of the letter and memorandum from the Commission under date of January 11, signed by the chairman and secretary are attached hereto as appendix A.† Also attached as appendix B† are three copies of a list of the remedial works recommended by the Commission.

4. The Canadian Government has approved of these recommendations of the Commission as set forth in its letter and report of January 11. A vote of $1,000,000 to provide for Canada's share of the costs of these works has been recommended to Parliament. The Commission has also been authorized by Order in Council P.C. 5002 of June 30, 1944, to let contracts for the remedial works recommended. Three copies of Order in Council P.C. 5002, marked appendix C,† are attached hereto.

5. The regular procedure for the payment of expenses properly incurred by the Commission is that such expenses are paid by the Canadian Government, one-half being recoverable later by Canada from the United States. This procedure was agreed to by the United States by a Note from the Secretary of State to the Canadian Minister under date of December 10, 1937. It is acceptable to the Canadian Government that this procedure should be followed with respect to expenditures incurred by the Commission for the proposed remedial works.

6. It is my understanding that the recommendations of the Commission and the arrangements as set forth in P.C. 5002 for letting contracts and the payment of expenditures have met with the approval of the appropriate officials of the United States Government. It is further understood that the Commission is presently looking to the letting of contracts for the urgently needed permanent remedial works in Hell's Gate Canyon early in August. It would, however, appear desirable that the recommendations of the Commission as set forth in this letter and report of January 11, 1944, and the arrangements proposed for implementing these recommendations should be formally approved by Exchange of Notes between the two Governments. Would you, therefore, please arrange for an Exchange of Notes with the Secretary of State.[173]

Mémorandum du ministère des Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Department of External Affairs

TOP SECRET May 3, 1945

RE: CONSERVATION ZONES IN COASTAL FISHERIES

1. Despatch No. 1099 of April 28, 1945,† from the Canadian Embassy in Washington encloses a statement of United States policy in this matter, together with an explanatory memorandum.† The same documents are being given to Mexico, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Netherlands, Portugal, Norway, France, Iceland and Cuba. The explanatory memorandum states that the United States would welcome the adoption by other governments of a similar policy. The State Department told our Embassy that it was hoped Canada would not only adopt a similar policy but would join the United States in an approach to the other countries mentioned. It is not stated what the United States course will be if all or most of the countries reject the statement of United States policy. The State Department hopes to secure adoption of their policy by May 31; it is not clear whether this means that the United States seriously expects to get definite concurrence from the countries by May 31 or whether the United States itself intends to announce its policy publicly by May 31 regardless of the replies, or lack of replies, from the other countries.

2. The United States statement of policy is —

"In view of the pressing need for conservation and protection of fishery resources, the Government of the United States regards it as proper to establish conservation zones in those areas of the high seas contiguous to the coasts of the United States wherein fishing activities have been or in the future may be developed and maintained on a substantial scale. Where such activities have been developed and maintained by its nationals alone, the United States regards it as proper to establish explicitly bounded conservation zones in which all fishing activities shall be subject to the regulation and control of the United States and may when conditions warrant be limited to the United States. Where such activities have been legitimately developed and maintained by nationals of other states, explicitly bounded conservation zones may be established under agreements between the United States and such other states; and all fishing activities in such zones shall be subject to the regulation and control of, and may when conditions warrant, be limited to the United States and such other states. The right of any state to establish conservation zones off its shores in accordance with the above principles is conceded, provided that corresponding recognition is given to any fishing interests of nationals of the United States which may exist in such areas. The character as high seas of the areas in which such conservation zones are established and the right to their free and unimpeded nagivation are in no way thus affected."

3. This statement is the latest in a series of draft statements which have been discussed by the United States and Canada, sometimes also with Newfoundland.

4. Early in 1943, Mr. Keenleyside of this Department drafted a proposed doctrine of international law on this subject, which goes even further than the United States statement of policy. Mr. Keenleyside's draft, which was never considered by the Canadian Government or sponsored by this Department, was given to the State Department in July, 1943, as an idea worthy of discussion. A copy of Mr. Keenleyside's draft is annexed as Appendix "A".† Before it was sent to Washington, Mr. Keenleyside's draft was considered by the Legal Adviser, Mr. Read, who wrote in part as follows —

"The difficulty arises from the need for the establishment of a new rule of International Law. A new rule can be established in the following ways:

(a) By the building up of a usage generally recognized and accepted by the nations of the world. Usages of this sort are not ordinarily the result of deliberate action, but there is no real reason why policies should not be carried out with the conscious objective of a new rule of International Law.

(b) By the embodiment of the new rule in a multilateral agreement.

(c) Legislative action by an organization of nations endowed with such powers. At present there is, to all intents and purposes, no such organization, but in the future it is probable that a world organization will be established, having some law-making power.

(d) By bold and lawless action by a powerful State or States, ultimately reluctantly acquiesced in by the nations of the world unwilling to challenge their action.

It is the last way, namely (d), that is envisaged in the present proposal".

5. In October, 1943, an International Fisheries Conference in London met to consider a draft convention relating to the Policing of Atlantic Fisheries. The Conference approved a draft Convention for consideration by Governments with a view to formal conclusion at a further Conference. The Canadian delegation proposed the addition to the draft Convention of Article 52A (a copy of which is annexed hereto as Appendix B).† Article 52A would enable the countries who participate regularly and substantially in a 'Special Area' to restrict and police all fishing in that area. Unlike Mr. Keenleyside's draft doctrine, Article 52A does not provide for exclusive access of one or some countries to a fishery. The Conference adopted the following Resolution relating to Article 52A:

"The Conference, having taken note of the proposals presented by the Canadian Delegation which form Annex II to this Final Act, recommends the principles of the proposals contained in this Annex to the immediate and sympathetic consideration of all Governments interested in the subject matter. The Conference suggests that at the later conference the question should be decided whether suitable provisions to meet the points raised by the Canadian Delegation should either be incorporated in the Convention or form the subject of a separate protocol to be signed at the same time as the Convention. The Conference agreed that there was nothing to prevent the earliest possible consideration of these proposals by the Governments particularly interested in fisheries in the region set out in paragraph 6 of the draft Article 52A in Annex II prior to the meeting of the second conference with a view to drawing up by agreement proposals for the regulation of fisheries in this area which might either be adopted at the second International Fisheries Conference or adopted at a more limited conference confined to those Governments particularly interested in fisheries in this area."

6. In February, 1944, representatives of Canada, the United States and Newfoundland, discussed the problem of coastal fisheries at a meeting in Washington. At this meeting, the State Department presented a draft statement of policy. Annexed as Appendix C is a memorandum by Dr. MacKay of this Department summarizing the discussion at Washington,[174] to which is annexed in turn the State Department's draft statement.† In brief, the State Department's position like that of Mr. Keenleyside, was that the states which are contiguous to or have actively participated in a fishery should assume and announce the right not only to regulate and police it but also to exclude others from it. Messrs. J. B. Read and MacKay, who represented this Department at the meeting, doubted both the legality and fairness of the proposal.

7. The United States informally gave us redrafts† of the proposed statement in May and July of 1944. Dr. MacKay discussed the July redraft in a memorandum dated August 12,† in which he said, in part:

"It is further suggested that it is in the long-run interest of Canada to uphold international law generally and that such a course should be departed from only for compelling reasons and certainly not for short-run advantages. International law has probably been the best defence of small nations against encroachment by the Great Powers. The shift in the preponderance of power to the Big Three would appear to make even more necessary the strengthening of international law for the protection of small states. It would appear to be especially in Canada's interest in view of the great increase in power on the part of the United States. Further, it would not seem to be conducive to the best relations with other countries if the impression were created that Canada is willing to participate in United States imperialism, economic, territorial, or maritime.

"It is recommended that:

[174]Document 1064.

(a) We agree to the principle of exclusive enjoyment, unilateral or bilateral as the case may be, of specific fisheries which have been created or very substantially restored without protest from other states (the Bristol Bay Salmon fishery, the Pacific Halibut fishery, the Sockeye Salmon fishery — if fishing for sockeye on the high seas is practicable). This might be done by express reference to such fisheries in the exchange of notes.

(b) That we agree to the principle of regulation of fisheries on the high seas bona fide for conservation purposes by those states having a major interest, and to the principle that conservation regulations should be enforceable against all fishing vessels frequenting the fishing grounds in question. Other states which have participated in these fisheries should be invited to participate in working out regulations but not permitted to obstruct.

(c) That we do not agree to exclusive enjoyment of any existing high seas fishery by the coastal state alone, or jointly by states which have hitherto participated in the fishery."

The Under-Secretary, Mr. Robertson, noted his agreement with this memorandum. We did not transmit these views to the United States Government.

8. In November, 1944, Mr. Sturgeon of the State Department informally gave Mr. Keenleyside another redraft† of the policy. This redraft is the same as the statement of policy enclosed with despatch No. 1099 of April 28, 1945, from Washington. Mr. Sturgeon told Mr. Keenleyside that the draft was to be submitted to the Secretary of State along with the opposing views of (a) the State Department's economic experts and (b) its political and legal experts. The economic experts opposed the idea of excluding any country from high seas fisheries (except perhaps Japan in the Northeast Pacific). It is now clear that the views of the economic experts have not prevailed.

9. Although the United States statement of policy now received differs in form from the one discussed in February, 1944, and the one reviewed by Dr. MacKay in August, 1944, it is substantially the same in effect and is certainly no less restrictive. It contains the principle of exclusive enjoyment, and draws no distinction between (a) fisheries which have been created or substantially restored by a state or states, and (b) fisheries which have not been established or re-established by conservation measures. The phrase "developed and maintained" in the present statement of policy is so general that, in my view, it is in no way limited to fisheries which have been created or re-established by conservation measures. Any fishery which has been exploited by a country would, I think, be a fishery which has been "developed and maintained" within the meaning of the statement.

Mémorandum du deuxième secrétaire, le ministère des Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Second Secretary, Department of External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] May 11, 1945

A meeting was held in the Department of External Affairs on Wednesday, May 9, to discuss despatch No. 1099 of April 28 from Washington† concerning the jurisdictional status of coastal fisheries. Those present from the Department of External Affairs were —

The Acting Under-Secretary (Mr. Read)
Dr. MacKay
Mr. Macdonnell
Mr. Wershof
Mr. Chatillon

The Department of Fisheries was represented by—

The Deputy Minister (Dr. Finn)
Mr. Ozere, Solicitor

After discussion, it was agreed that the Department of External Affairs should prepare and send to the Department of Fisheries a draft reply to the United States along the following lines. The Canadian Government is in general sympathy with the objectives of the proposed statement of policy but has doubts as to the wisdom and feasibility of retaining the provision for exclusive exploitation. An attempt to impose such a principle would inevitably be brought before the Permanent Court of International Justice where it would be impossible to defend. Furthermore, if the idea of exclusive exploitation is sound, the way to establish it is either to get it approved by the Assembly of the United Nations Organizaton which is being established, or perhaps by an international conference for the codification of international law when such a conference is called. In criticizing the idea of asserting the right of exclusive exploitation, we do not, of course, object to excluding from a fishery individual ships which disobey the regulations in force in that fishery, or even the ships of a country which declines to abide by such rules.

Mr. Read felt that Cabinet approval was not necessary for an interim reply of this kind.

It was agreed that the Department of Fisheries is to prepare a memorandum from a factual point of view showing the possible advantages and disadvantages to Canada of the proposed statement of policy.†

Mr. Macdonnell is to ask Mr. Clark of the United States Embassy whether the statement of policy has now been given to all the countries listed in the despatch from Washington and whether Newfoundland has received the statement via the United Kingdom.

P.S. Mr. Macdonnell spoke to Mr. Clark on May 10 and was given the following information.

The Mexican Government was given the same material as the Canadian Government on April 27. The material was sent to Mr. Gushue in London and he has presumably received it.

On May 9 the United Kingdom was given the statement of policy and a somewhat shorter explanatory memorandum than we received. On May 10 the Soviet Government is to be given the same documents. In the next few days, these documents are to be given to Cuba, France, Norway, Portugal, the Netherlands, and Iceland.

First Secretary, Embassy of United States, to Legal Adviser

Ottawa, June 11, 1945

Dear Mr. Read:

May I refer to Mr. Robertson's letter of February 23, 1945,† regarding the proposed Great Lakes Fisheries Convention, and to subsequent discussions of this subject.

The Canadian revised draft convention† has been carefully studied in the Department of State and the views of the Federal fishery authorities have been obtained with regard thereto. Consultations have also taken place in Washington with fishery conservation authorities from all of the States bordering on the Great Lakes.

From this further consideration of the question a number of suggestions were developed which appeared to merit incorporation into the Canadian draft. A new draft has, therefore, been prepared and a copy thereof is enclosed for review and consideration by the appropriate authorities of your Government. The reason for and significance of the revisions will, I believe, be readily apparent in most instances.

The present draft represents perhaps the greatest measure of common agreement that has been developed from the study and consultations which have thus far taken place in the United States and in Canada. It is not yet clear, however, whether the type of agreement now in draft will fully meet the views of some of the States of the United States in respect of their participation in the regulatory regime contemplated. It is nevertheless believed in the Department of State that a point has been reached where joint efforts of the two Governments might profitably be resumed, possibly through a meeting of representatives to discuss the proposed convention as suggested by Mr.

Robertson in his letter of February 23, 1945. I should appreciate learning whether this suggestion is agreeable.

Sincerely yours,

LEWIS CLARK

Revised Draft of Great Lakes Fisheries Convention

CONFIDENTIAL [Washington,] May 1945

PREAMBLE

The President of the United States of America, and His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, in respect of Canada,

Recognizing that the fish of the Great Lakes and their connecting waters constitute an important source of food supply and a natural resource of great economic importance to the United States and Canada, that fishing operations and other factors in the waters within the jurisdiction of one country may adversely affect the supply in the waters within the jurisdiction of the other, that some species of fish in the Great Lakes have declined and that further declines are probable unless adequate provision is made for the development, protection and conservation of the Great Lakes fisheries and for the maintenance of conditions which will permit the maximum yield, and that the conservation and effective management of these fisheries require cooperation between and joint action by the governmental agencies of both countries concerned with the administration of their fisheries,

Have resolved to conclude a convention for this purpose and have appointed as their respective plenipotentiaries,

The President of the United States of America:

His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, for Canada:

who, after having communicated to each other their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following Articles:

ARTICLE I

It is agreed that the provisions of this Convention shall apply to: (1) Lake Ontario, (2) Lake Erie, (3) Lake St. Clair, (4) Lake Huron, (5) Lake Michigan, and (6) Lake Superior, and to the connecting waters, bays and component parts of each of these lakes.

ARTICLE II

1. The High Contracting Parties agree to establish and maintain a joint commission, hereinafter referred to as the Commission, to be known as the International Commission for the Great Lakes Fisheries and to be composed of two national sections, a United States section and a Canadian section.

2. Each High Contracting Party may also appoint an advisory committee for each lake consisting of representatives designated by each state or province, as the case may be, having jurisdiction on the lake.

3. The salaries and expenses of each section and of each advisory committee shall be determined and paid by their respective governments, provided that joint expenses incurred for administration or research or for other purposes shall be paid by the two High Contracting Parties in equal shares.

4. The constitution of the Commission, the national sections and the advisory committees, shall be based upon the provisions of Schedule "A" attached to and made a part of this Convention. The Commission, the national sections and the advisory committees shall be governed by the provisions of Schedule "A".

ARTICLE III

The Commission shall formulate and recommend specific research programs, which may be undertaken by the appropriate agencies of the two governments in collaboration with the states of the United States of America concerned and the Province of Ontario, as well as such other institutions and facilities as the Commission deems advisable, for observations and studies of the Great Lakes fisheries to guide it in exercising its functions provided for in Article IV of this Convention. Such programs may include the collection and analysis of statistical information to reveal the current conditions and trends of the fishery resources, studies and appraisal of methods for increasing the abundance of fish by artificial propagation and other means, and studies of any factors that may affect the fisheries of the Great Lakes, including silting and pollution. The Commisson shall take such further steps as it considers practicable to coordinate and develop research which it may deem of value in connection with the Great Lakes fisheries.

2. The High Contracting Parties agree that within one year from the date of the exchange of the ratificiations of this Convention, the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada will undertake such observations and studies, recommended by the Commission for joint or concurrent action, as are considered by the High Contracting Parties necessary to the effective guidance of the Commission in the exercise of its functions.

3. It is understood that nothing contained in this Convention or in the laws and regulations of the High Contracting Parties or of the states or of the Province of Ontario shall prohibit the Commission from conducting or authorizing fishing operations and biological experiments at any time for purposes of scientific investigation.

ARTICLE IV

1. The Commission shall undertake to develop a comprehensive plan for the effective management of the fishery resources of the Great Lakes and their connecting waters as specified in Article I for the purpose of securing the maximum use of these resources which is consistent with their perpetuation.

2. The Commission may determine and fix by regulations: the open and closed seasons; open and closed waters; size limits for each species of fish; the time, methods and intensity of fishing; the type and specifications of the nets, gear, apparatus and appliances which may be used; the methods of measurement; the extent and nature of stocking operations; the introduction of new species; and catch returns and other statistical records as may be necessary to give effect to the purposes of this Convention. Such regulations shall be uniform for each lake or equivalent in their effectiveness in the waters of each country as determined by the Commission. For these purposes, the Commission may from time to time issue regulations for each lake separately and may establish zones within a lake and issue regulations for the various zones of that lake in accordance with differences in conditions. All regulations shall be adopted for a lake or for a zone within a lake with due regard to the necessary interdependence of such regulations with the regulations adopted for other waters of the Great Lakes.

3. The Commission may make recommendations to the appropriate federal, state, provincial and local authorities regarding measures for dealing with such other factors affecting the Great Lakes fisheries, including silting and pollution, as are not included under section 2 of this Article.

4. The United States section alone shall exercise all powers and functions of the Commission in matters relating to Lake Michigan having due regard to the necessary interdependence of regulations on that lake with those adopted for the other lakes. The Commission shall, with respect to Lake Michigan, take cognizance of regulations and conditions of that lake for the purpose of taking account of the necessary interdependence of regulations adopted for the other lakes.

5. Regulations recommended by the Commission for United States waters, and by the United States section for Lake Michigan, shall not become effective until approved by the President of the United States of America.

6. Regulations recommended by the Commission with respect to Canadian waters shall not become effective until approved by the Governor General in Council.

ARTICLE V

1. The High Contracting Parties agree to provide for the enforcement, whether directly or through state and provincial governments or by both means, within their respective waters of the regulations issued under this Convention.

2. It is understood that in United States waters the regulations for each lake may be enforced in the first instance by the enforcement agencies of the states bordering thereon within their respective jurisdictions and in Canadian waters by the appropriate enforcement agencies of the Province of Ontario.

3. The Commission shall keep informed as to the effectiveness of enforcement, shall report to the High Contracting Parties with respect to any charges, allegations or conditions of unsatisfactory enforcement of which it is aware, and may recommend to the High Contracting Parties measures for the improvement of enforcement. Except as to Lake Michigan, upon the complaint of either national section with respect to enforcement in any area of the waters of the other country the government of that country will take appropriate action to enforce the regulations adopted for that area and will continue such action so long as it deems necessary.

ARTICLE VI

Nothing in this Convention shall be construed as preventing either of the High Contracting Parties, subject to their respective constitutional arrangements, or the Province of Ontario or any of the states of the United States of America bordering on the Great Lakes from making or enforcing laws or regulations within their respective jurisdictions which will give further protection to the fisheries of the Great Lakes: Provided, That such laws or regulations are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Convention or with the regulations issued thereunder.

ARTICLE VII

The High Contracting Parties agree to provide, subject to their respective constitutional arrangements, for the prohibition of the shipment, transport, purchase, sale, import or export of fish taken from the Great Lakes in violation of the regulations issued under the authority of this Convention.

ARTICLE VIII

The High Contracting Parties agree that, subject to the regulations issued under the authority of this Convention, and subject to their respective constitutional arrangements, licenses to fish in the waters of any state or province within the purview of this Convention may continue to be issued by such state or province in accordance with its laws and subject to such fees as it may fix: Provided, That such licenses and licensing are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Convention or with the regulations issued thereunder, and Provided Further, that where such licensing of fishing activities is necessary to give effect to the regulations issued under the authority of this Convention, if any state or province fails to establish licensing adequate for the successful control or management of any such fishing activity, the High Contracting Party having jurisdiction will take such measures as may be necessary to maintain the needed licensing in the area of its waters affected.

ARTICLE IX

The High Contracting Parties agree to provide for the enactment and enforcement of such legislation as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of this Convention and the regulations adopted by the Commission under the authority thereof, with appropriate penalties for violations.

ARTICLE X

The present Convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Majesty in accordance with the constitutional practice, and it shall become effective upon the date of the exchange of ratifications which shall take place at . The Convention shall continue in force for a period of ten years, and thereafter until one year from the day on which either of the High Contracting Parties shall give notice to the other High Contracting Party of an intention of terminating the Convention.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present Convention and have affixed their seals thereto.

SCHEDULE "A"

Provisions Relating to the Joint Commission, the National Sections and the Advisory Committees

1. The United States section shall be composed of three members, one a representative of the fishery agency of the Government of the United States of America, and second a person chosen by the President of the United States of America from a list of two or more persons named by the states having jurisdiction on the Great Lakes, and the third a person duly qualified to represent the public at large by reason of knowledge of the fisheries of the Great Lakes.

2. The Canadian section shall be composed of three members, one a representative of the public services of Canada, the second a representative of the public services of the Province of Ontario, and the third a person not otherwise connected with the public services of Canada or Ontario but duly qualified to represent the public at large by reason of knowledge of the fisheries of the Great Lakes.

3. Each High Contracting Party may fix the terms of service of its members of the Commission and of the members of any advisory committees established by it pursuant to Article II.

Each High Contracting Party may fix the composition of the membership of any such advisory committee established by it, in order to give adequate representation to state or provincial conservation and fishery agencies, commercial fishermen, sports fishermen, and the public at large; but the members of such advisory committee shall be designated by the states or province having jurisdiction on the lake concerned.

4. At the first meeting of the Commission and at every second subsequent annual meeting thereafter the members shall select from themselves a Chairman and a Secretary both of whom shall hold office for two years. The Chairman shall be selected from one national section and the Secretary from the other national section, Provided that the offices of Chairman and Secretary shall alternate biennially between the national sections.

In the event that the Chairman or the Secretary is not present at a meeting of the Commission the other members may appoint one of their number to act in his stead. In case the Chairman or the Secretary ceases to be a member of the Commission, the Commission shall select from the members of the same national section a new Chairman or Secretary to assume office for the unexpired term.

The Commission shall adopt suitable by-laws or provisions for the conduct of its meetings and for the exercise of the functions and duties vested in it by this convention and may employ necessary personnel for the discharge of its functions.

5. The members of the Commission shall each have one vote and the Commission shall determine for each lake other than Lake Michigan by majority vote of the entire Commission the fishing regulations and other decisions with respect to such lake. With respect to Lake Michigan, each member of the United States section shall have one vote and decisions shall be by majority vote.

6. Any advisory committee which, pursuant to Article II, may be appointed by each Government for a particular lake, shall be invited to all non-executive meetings of the Commission or its respective national sections at which matters concerning that lake are to be considered, and shall, except in case of emergency, be given full opportunity to examine and to be heard on all proposed fishing regulations and other decisions relating to that lake. Emergency regulations and decisions taken without opportunity for examination and recommendation by the pertinent advisory committee or committees shall not be operative for more than one year and may not be renewed without full opportunity for examination and recommendation by the advisory committee or committees.

7. For the purpose of considering and adopting regulations regarding the fishing in the lakes, the Commission, or in the case of Lake Michigan the United States section alone, shall meet at least once a year. The date and place of the annual meeting and of such other meetings as may be necessary at any time shall be agreed upon by the Chairman and Secretary except that only the representative of the United States of America holding the office of Chairman or Secretary shall call such meetings for Lake Michigan.

8. Prior to any meeting at which regulations for any lake are to be voted upon, a hearing or hearings shall be held by the Commission, or in the case of Lake Michigan by the United States section, at a place or places adjacent to that lake which shall be open to fishermen and other persons in either country interested in its problems, provided that meetings may be held in the event of emergency circumstances without proceeding hearings. Nothing herein shall be deemed to prevent either national section from holding hearings within its own country at its discretion.

9. The Commission shall publish biennially, or more frequently as it judges desirable, reports of its activities and recommendations, as well as such publications as it may see fit of a scientific nature or other public information, and may also arrange to publish the results of the research of collaborating and associated agencies.

10. Regulations adopted by the Commission under Article IV of the convention shall not become effective until one year from the date when the convention comes into force.

11. The Commission may determine the boundaries between the lakes, and between the waters specified in Article I and waters flowing into or from such waters, for purposes of the application of this convention and regulations issued thereunder.

12. The provisions of this schedule may be revised and amended from time to time by the Commission, provided that any revisions or amendments which are inconsistent with any of its provisions must be confirmed by exchange of notes between the High Contracting Parties, and provided also that no revision or amendment may be inconsistent with the convention, and provided further, in view of the diverse interests of the several states of the United States bordering on the Great Lakes, that no revision or amendment thus adopted shall diminish the extent or effectiveness of state participation and representation of state interests now provided under paragraphs 1, 5, 6, and 8 of this schedule.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au sous-ministre des Pêcheries

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Fisheries

TOP SECRET Ottawa, July 27, 1945

Dear Dr. Finn,

I refer to my memorandum of May 23,† with which was enclosed a draft reply† to the United States Note on the Jurisdictional Status of Coastal Fisheries.

It has been decided not to send the previous draft which you saw and approved. In view of Dr. Keenleyside's long interest in the matter it was decided to hold the draft for discussion with him during his visit to Ottawa. Following discussions with him, the draft has been radically revised. I enclose a copy of the revision.

The essential changes are:

(1) The exceptions permitting exclusion of other states from a conservation zone are broadened to permit of cases where fishing activities have been exclusively enjoyed over a long period by the state or states declaring such a zone under regulations designed to protect the fishery; e.g., the Pacific Halibut.

(2) A statement of the general principle of the right of fishery on the High Seas has been included in order to protect Canadian interests in fisheries not now exploited by Canadian fishermen; e.g., the tuna fishery off Mexico.

(3) The suggested procedure whereby international law might be changed has been omitted in the present draft.

Since it seems reasonably clear from a perusal of our files that the Canadian Government has never formally announced the principle of exclusion of other states from protected fisheries lying off the Canadian shore; e.g., the Pacific Halibut fishery, and since such a policy would go beyond existing international law, it is felt that the reply to the United States should have Ministerial approval. Would you be good enough to take the matter up with your Minister. We propose to follow the same course in this Department.

Yours sincerely,

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Nouveau projet de réponse

Revised Draft Reply

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] July 27, 1945

DRAFT REPLY TO THE UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF STATE ON THEIR STATEMENT OF FISHERIES POLICY OF APRIL 26, 1944

1. The Canadian Government has carefully considered the statement of United States policy concerning the jurisdictional status of coastal fisheries, which the Department of State gave to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington on April 26, 1945.

2. The Canadian Government is in general agreement with the provisions for conservation and protection of fishery resources on the High Seas contiguous to the national domain. They are, however, doubtful as to the wisdom of asserting such a broad right of exclusion of other states from a regulated fishery as seems to be implied in the United States statement of policy. The statement provides that in the case of a conservation zone established by the United States fishing activities "may when conditions warrant be limited to the United States," and in the case of a conservation zone established by the United States and other states jointly, fishing activities "may when conditions warrant be limited to the United States and such other states." The statement of policy would thus appear to leave to the state or states establishing a conservation zone full discretion in fixing the conditions under which other states may be excluded therefrom.

3. It may be observed that under international law the right to fish anywhere on the High Seas is common to all maritime nations. This right would not appear to be lost by non-exercise; nor, broadly speaking, has any state, or group of states, the right to exclude other states from a fishery on the High Seas. It is, however, possible that exceptions to this general principle might be justified. Exclusion of a particular ship from a duly declared conservation zone might be justified as a sanction to compel its obedience to conservation regulations deemed essential to the preservation of the fishery in the zone. Likewise, exclusion of the whole fishing fleet of a state which refused to recognize such regulations might be justified as a sanction against that state. It might also be possible to justify exclusion of other states from a fishery by a state or states if the fishery had been exclusively enjoyed by its or their nationals over a reasonable period of time, and had been carried on under regulations designed to preserve and protect the species of fish concerned.

4. The Canadian Government, accordingly, thinks that the right of a state or states establishing a conservation zone on the High Seas to exclude other states from enjoyment of the fishery therein should be strictly limited. With this exception the Canadian Government is in general agreement with the United States statement of policy.

Rapport d'une réunion
Report of Meeting

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa, c. September 19, 1945]

MEETING ON THE GREAT LAKES FISHERIES HELD IN OTTAWA, SEPT. 18 & 19, 1945

A meeting was held in Ottawa on September the 18th and 19th between representatives of Canada and the United States of America to discuss on the official level a draft convention for the development, protection and conservation of the Great Lakes Fisheries. The United States draft of May, 1945, served as a basis for discussion.

Present:

United States Delegation.

Messrs. J. G. Parsons, W. E. S. Florey, C. I. Bevans, W. W. Bishop, Jr., F. A. L. Linville, Miss M. C. Shreve from the Department of State; Messrs. I. N. Grabielson, H. J. Deason and D. J. Chaney from the Fish and Wild Life Service. Mr. J. Shillock of the United States Embassy.

Canadian Delegation.

Messrs. J. E. Read, R. M. Macdonnell, C. Chatillon and W. C. Hopkins from the Department of External Affairs; Messrs. D. B. Finn, A. J. Whitmore, D. H. Sutherland and S. V. Ozere from the Department of Fisheries; Messrs. D. J. Taylor and H. H. Mackay from the Department of Game and Fisheries, Ontario.

Place: Chateau Laurier.

Time: 3 p.m.

Chairman: Mr. Read.

The Honourable H. Francis G. Bridges, Minister of Fisheries, after a few words of greeting declared the meeting open.

Mr. Read, acting as Chairman, invited the heads of the various delegations to make some general observations on the draft before discussing it. Mr. Parsons pointed out that since the states concerned were not represented he would be gratified if publicity would be restricted to the minimum. A Press statement† was worked out and it was agreed to have it released by both countries at the same hour the next day. Mr. Parsons also mentioned that the United States draft represented the agreed views of the United States and state governments, and that the United States delegation could hardly agree to changes of substance without consulting the states and securing their consent.

Before proceeding with the main task, Mr. Macdonnell outlined briefly the negotiations that had taken place in the last three or four years resulting in the present draft.

It was decided that Mr. Bishop and Mr. Hopkins would act as draftsmen.

The Chairman read the draft clause by clause, each subject to a free and informal discussion. The Preamble. Articles II, III, IV, V, VI, VII, VIII,IX and X were accepted with no serious alterations. A few words and the disposition of certain phrases were changed but mainly for the sake of clarity and uniformity.

ARTICLE I

It was pointed out that the international section of the St. Lawrence River, included in the old draft,† had been omitted from the present one. It was explained that the omission was due to the fact that New York state considered that zone more of a sport fishing area than a commercial one. It was suggested (and stressed by Ontario) that the international zone be re-included in Article I.

The revised draft, i.e., the September draft, (copy attached)† includes in what is referred to as the Great Lakes "The St. Lawrence River from Lake Ontario to the forty-fifth parallel of latitude." It was understood that this major change had to be reported to the state concerned (New York) and the State Department officials confided that they would support the Canadian viewpoint in dealing with New York.

Paragraph 1

Was accepted as such.

Paragraph 2

The part reading "not . . . . . but" was deleted, in case the Government of Canada would like to appoint an official such as a university professor or a former "dollar a year" man who was, or had been, related in some way to the public services.

Paragraphs 3, 4, 5 and 6

Were accepted as such.

Paragraph 7

The part "At least once a year" was changed to read "at least twice a year" to assure more efficiency on the part of the Commission.

Paragraphs 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12

Were accepted as such.

A revised draft (Sept. 18th) was prepared and agreed to by all present.

The United States delegation then asked what were Canada's views on the question of fractional voting. The representatives of both the Canadian and Ontario governments agreed that voting should remain as stipulated in the current draft and should not be fractional. Mr. Parsons stated that they would use this statement as a guide in future discussions with the states interested.

It was clear that certain states were not happy about the provisions in the present draft dealing with membership and voting, and might try to revert to the earlier proposal for fractional voting. The strong views held by both the Canadian and Ontario governments would be used by the State Department as an argument in favour of accepting the present draft.

It was agreed that the United States Government should discuss the September 18th draft with the interested states and inform the Canadian Government of the results of these discussions.

Le conseiller, l'ambassade aux États-Unis, au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Counsellor, Embassy in United States, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

DESPATCH 2560 Washington, October 31, 1945

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to my despatch No. 2488 of October 20† concerning the progress of discussions between the federal authorities and the interested States in connection with the draft Great Lakes Fisheries Convention as drawn up in Ottawa on September 18 and 19.

2. Representatives of the State Department and the Fish and Wild Life Service met yesterday afternoon with a member of this Embassy to inform us officially of the results of these discussions and of the inter-departmental meeting mentioned in paragraph 4 of my despatch under reference. Two documents (enclosed) were furnished for transmission to the Canadian Government: (a) "Resolutions of Representatives of the Great Lakes, October 15, 1945"† embodying the proposal mentioned in paragraph 3 of my despatch No. 2488 and (b) a revised version of the Draft Convention of September 19,† containing alterations submitted by the State Department and the Fish and Wild Life Service as the minimum changes which they think may make the Draft Convention acceptable to the States concerned.

3. With regard to (a), it is obvious that the federal authorities are hoping that Canada will register strong disapproval. Mr. Parsons pointed out that, while the "Resolutions" urge the State Department to negotiate with Canada for the substitution of this proposal regarding representation on the Commission, the State Department should not be considered as backing it in any way. It is merely being submitted for our information and comment, as it represents a serious new development in the situation. Mr. Parsons also remarked that it would no doubt be obvious to us that this proposal would mean that whenever one lake only was concerned, Ontario would in effect have two members to the Dominion Government's one.

4. Later on it was pointed out that the main objection to this proposal is that it would radically alter the nature of the Commission. Instead of a more or less permanent body picked for their general competence and interest in the subject, it would become a group fluctuating between four and six members; the extra States' representatives for individual lakes being specifically appointed as representatives of special interests and to that extent changing its character. The Commission might also be assumed to be less efficient in the new form.

5. With regard to (b), the following revisions have been suggested and are contained in the enclosed copy:

No. 2560.

(1) Article I. Treatment of the international section of the St. Lawrence as a separate lake (with its own advisory committee).

(2) Para. 3 of Schedule "A". Division of paragraph into three sections, the second being a new provision ensuring that the advisory committees have a 45-day period within which to review any proposed regulations before their submission to the respective governments. Other minor changes (page 3, lines 1, 4 and 6) relate to the emergency powers of the Commission.

The purpose of this amendment is to placate New York and the other States (Pennsylvania, Indiana and possibly Minnesota) who feel that the advisory committees are not of any real significance and are an inadequate substitute for representation of special interests on the Commission.

(3) Schedule "A", page 3, line 7. Substitution of "making" for "adopting". Merely a formal alteration in interests of uniformity.

(4) Para. 11 of Scheule "A". Deletion of reference to St. Lawrence, in line with suggested amendment of Article I of the Draft Convention.

6. These amendments have not been discussed with the States, and Mr. Parsons is none too sure of the reception which they might receive. Before going any further, however, the State Department would like to be informed of the Canadian reaction to both documents enclosed. They are most anxious to have this information as soon as possible, because it is feared that Ohio is ready to start a public campaign in opposition to the whole scheme in the very near future, and this may be dangerous unless the State Department are in a position to take counter measures on their side.

7. With further reference to the information contained in my previous despatch, Mr. Parsons said that, at the meeting of the States' representatives, no vote had been taken on the Draft Convention. Illinois (absent) is known to be in favour of it, Ohio to be opposed to any Convention. Michigan and Wisconsin disapproved of the "Resolutions" (enclosure (a) and are presumably for the Draft. Minnesota approved the "Resolutions" but is thought to have simply followed the majority at the meeting without any strong objections to the Draft. The only significant opposition therefore was New York, supported by Pennsylvania and Indiana.

8. At the time of this meeting on October 16, Mr. Parsons impressed upon the States that the Draft was the result of protracted negotiations between the Dominion authorities and Ontario, and that, in the interests of achieving a Convention, it would be inadvisable to reopen these negotiations if this could possibly be avoided.

Dear Dr. Keenleyside,

I refer to your letter of October 16† asking about the Canadian reply to the United States Statement of Policy on Coastal Fisheries.

The United States issued its declaration of policy unilaterally by White House Press Release on September 28. I enclose a copy of the statement.[175]

The Canadian reply has not yet been approved. As noted in my letter of August 8,† it was felt that the reply as drafted following your discussions with officials of the Department on your visit to Ottawa last spring would constitute approval of a change in international law and therefore needed ministerial approval. Due to the pressure of other business, the matter has proceeded no further.

We received a letter from the French Ambassador under date of August 28† expressing concern over the United States Statement and enquiring as to our views. I enclose for your information a copy of the Ambassador's letter and our reply of September 14.†

Yours sincerely,

INFORMAL DISCUSSION ON PELAGIC SEALING HELD IN OTTAWA, SEPTEMBER 20, 1945

An informal meeting between United States and Canadian officials was held on September 20th to exchange views with regard to fur seals in the Pacific Ocean. The United States group asked that the discussion be considered unofficial and kept purely on an exploratory basis. This met with general approval.

Present:

United States:
Department of State: Messrs. Parsons, Bishop, Bevans, Flory, and Miss Shreve.
Fish and Wildlife Service: Messrs. Gabrielson, Chaney, and Linville.

Canada:
Department of External Affairs: Messrs. Macdonnell, Hopkins and Chatillon.
Department of Fisheries: Messrs. Finn, Sutherland, Whitmore and Ozere.

Time: 1030 hrs.

Place: Library (Legal Division)

Chairman: Mr. Macdonnell

It was agreed by all that with the end of hostilities, the problem of pelagic sealing should be reviewed in the light of recent political developments.

The United States group sketched out the Treaty position from their own point of view. The 1942 Fur Sealing Agreement[177] was an interim measure providing for temporary arrangements to terminate 12 months after the emergency period ceased. It would therefore be highly desirable to conclude an agreement of a permanent nature in the near future.

The following points were advanced:

(a) It would be desirable to have a new and permanent Convention to replace the old 1911 Convention.[178]

See Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 25.
[178]Grande-Bretagne/Great Britain, Treaty Series, 1912, No. 2.

(b) Canada, the U.S.S.R. and the United States of America should participate in it.

(c) A section protecting sea otters should be inserted in the new Convention.

(d) Consideration would have to be given to the policy to be adopted towards Japan.

The four points raised by the United States representatives met with general approval from the Canadian side. However, it was pointed out that Soviet views on this matter were not known and that clearly every effort should be made to secure Soviet cooperation and to bring them into the discussions at an opportune time.

Dr. Gabrielson outlined the history of the seal industry in the Pacific, the difficulties involved and the possible measures that might be taken for the protection and expansion of the seal herds. The 1940 survey revealed that there were from 4 to 5 million seals around the Pribilof Islands, off Alaska, while in 1910 and 1911 this industry was not considered profitable and the herd was approaching extinction. In 1941, the United States Government killed 71,000 seals in the area, restricting the kill to 3-year-old males. This was a successful commercial enterprise. It is clear that the herd can be protected and built up to its maximum so as to provide a productive and profitable natural resource. The United States is continuing to study the problem of the composition and breeding of the herd.

With regard to sea otters, Dr. Gabrielson stated that as a result of strict conservation measures the numbers of these animals on the Alaskan Coast and the Aleutian Islands had increased from something close to zero up to some six to ten thousand. The additional protection (in non-territorial waters) which would be afforded by a treaty would assist the further increase of these extremely valuable fur-bearing animals once practically extinct. He thought it likely that they would spread south and reach the British Columbia coast.

There was a discussion of the treatment that should be accorded Japan, which was a signatory of the 1911 Convention and received 15% of the take of the Pribilof seals. It was clearly the view of the Fish and Wildlife Service that Japanese interests should be excluded from sealing operations in the Pribilof Islands, and should receive no compensation. On the other hand, it was pointed out by the Canadian group that there were aspects of this complex problem that required careful study. The statements made during the war by the United Nations about permitting access on a non-discriminatory basis to the natural resources of the world, in the pursuit of peaceful trade, would have to be borne in mind in relation to any prohibition of Japanese sealing. It was learned that the State Department were exploring the question and considering various alternatives. One was to write into the peace treaties a flat prohibition against Japanese sealing operations in the Pribilofs. Some support emerged during the discussion for the view that in the long run a decision imposed in a peace treaty might not be the procedure best calculated to secure the cooperation of the Japanese over the years. Another alternative being examined by the State Department was to agree to continue to turn over to the Japanese the 15% of the catch which they had received under the 1911 Convention, but to link this with Japanese reparations in such a way as to use the proceeds as a fund from which to pay Canadian and United States war claims against Japan. No conclusions were reached beyond the obvious one that this was an exceedingly thorny question which required a good deal of further study.

Conclusions

There was general agreement on the following points:

(a) There is need for a Permanent Convention to replace the Convention of 1911.

(b) The adherence of the U.S.S.R. should be secured, if possible.

(c) Protection for sea otters should be included in the Convention.

(d) The policy to be adopted with regard to Japan should be the subject of further study by both Governments.

(e) In order to obtain, if possible, an indication of the probable views of the Soviet Government, the Canadian and United States Embassies in Moscow should be asked for their opinions as to the Soviet attitude towards signing a new convention. It was agreed that it would not be desirable at this stage to ask the Soviet Government for their views, even informally, but that the opinions of the two Embassies might be helpful. The next step would be for the United States to prepare a draft Convention and submit it simultaneously to Canada and the U.S.S.R. Canada and the United States would keep in close informal touch throughout.

(f) For the purposes of Article VIII of the 1942 Fur Sealing Agreement, these discussions were to be regarded as constituting consultation. In all other respects, as stated in the opening paragraph of this memorandum, the discussions were to be regarded as unofficial, exploratory, and confidential.

DESPATCH 474 Moscow, November 20, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 252 of October 9th,† concerning the question of fur seal fisheries in the North Pacific. According to your suggestion, I approached the United States Embassy with a view to ascertaining their views as to what will likely be the attitude of the Soviet authorities towards signing a new Convention. Unfortunately, the United States Embassy has received nothing from the State Department as yet; and, in the absence of the relevant information, they were not in a position to give their opinion on the subject. However, they have promised to get in touch with me if and when the State Department asks them to undertake this study.

2. Meanwhile, I am enclosing a short memorandum built, for a good part, on a conversation which I had with Mr. Wilgress just before his departure for London. I hope it will be of some assistance in the negotiations which are to take place.

Mémorandum du chargé d'affaires en Union soviétique
Memorandum by Chargé d'Affaires in Soviet Union

[Moscow,] November 20, 1945

POSSIBLE SOVIET ATTITUDE TOWARDS NEW SEALING CONVENTION

1. The Soviet Union has a concrete interest in the seals of the Northern Pacific and, consequently, should not be disinclined to cooperate in measures for maintaining the herds.

2. It appears from a "memorandum for Dr. Skelton" dated May 9th, 1938,† (on file at the Department) that the last Russian delivery of skins to Canada was made on August 23rd, 1922, by the Provisional Government at Vladivostok, this being only a small part of Canada's share of the 1920 catch; also that there had been no Russian delivery of skins to Japan since 1919. I assume that no Russian deliveries have been made since the time when the aforesaid memorandum was written.

Strictly speaking, an accounting could be required from the Soviet authorities for all the years covered by the Convention for which no returns have been given. In practice, however, it seems that nothing would be gained by making such a demand. It is clear that the Soviet authorities are not interested in giving skins and that they would find legal or other arguments for still avoiding to do so.

This past attitude of the Soviet authorities leads me to believe that they would not easily subscribe to a convention providing for the inter-delivery of skins, as the Convention of 1911 did.

3. In view of its recent acquisition of the Robben and Kurile Islands, Soviet Russia now exercises sovereignty over all the breeding islands on the western side of the Bering Sea. In these circumstances, the Soviet approach to the problem may be to divide responsibilities in two parts. On the one hand, the Soviet Union would be responsible for the seals in the western half of the Bering Sea and North Pacific Ocean. On the other hand, the United States and Canada would be responsible for the seals in the eastern half of the same waters. Soviet patrols would have nothing to do in the American-Canadian zone, and vice versa.

4. As for Japan, it is not improbable that the Soviet Union will suggest a clause in the peace treaty, which would debar Japan from any sort of participation in the new sealing arrangements. I agree with the view expressed at the Canadian-United States meeting of September 20th, viz. "that in the long run a decision imposed in a peace treaty might not be the procedure best calculated to secure the cooperation of the Japanese over the years." Moreover, the exclusion of the Japanese now that they have ceased to exert sovereignty over the Robben and Kurile Islands, might have the effect of weakening our own case, in as much as Canada is also without sovereignty of any of the breeding islands. The idea of linking the Japanese share with reparations appears wiser as well as more conformable to justice.

5. In the circumstances, I feel that the Soviet Union would best accept some of the principles proposed by the United States to Japan in 1941, which could now be set forth as follows:—

(a) A clear separation of the North Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea into east and west areas, the western area to be allotted to the Soviet Union — with limited hunting seasons fixed according to areas and regulations of hunting seasons.

(b) Pelagic sealing to be regulated by the respective Governments in the areas allotted to them under the new Covention; the taking of seals on land to be regulated by the sovereign powers thereof.

(c) No division to be made of the fur seals taken on land or at sea by the Soviet Union to the United States and Canada on the one hand, and by the United States and Canada to the Soviet Union on the other hand.

6. It is realized that the above principles do not cover the Japanese aspect of the problem. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union might be induced to accept an arrangement which would recognize the Japanese right to share in the skins of the western zone, but which would leave those skins in Soviet hands as reparations.

Sir:

I have the honor to refer to your note No. 157 of December 10, 1943,[179] concerning the desirability of having a study made by the International Joint Commission with respect to the Upper Columbia River Basin from the points of view of navigation, power development, irrigation, flood control, and other beneficial public uses and purposes.

As the result of informal exchanges of views on this subject I have been directed to bring the following suggested reference to the Commission to your attention with the request that I be informed whether it is acceptable to the Government of Canada:

"1. In order to determine whether a greater use than is now being made of the waters of the Columbia River system would be feasible and advantageous, the Governments of the United States and Canada have agreed to refer the matter to the International Joint Commission for investigation and report pursuant to Article IX of the Convention concerning Boundary Waters between the United States and Canada, signed January 11th, 1909.

"2. It is desired that the Commission shall determine whether in its judgment further development of the water resources of the river basin would be practicable and in the public interest from the points of view of the two Governments, having in mind (A) domestic water supply and sanitation, (B) navigation, (C) efficient development of water power, (D) the control of floods, (E) the needs of irrigation, (F) reclamation of wet lands, (G) conservation of fish and wildlife, and (H) other beneficial public purposes.

"3. In the event that the Commission should find that further works or projects would be feasible and desirable for one or more of the purposes indicated above, it should indicate how the interests on either side of the boundary would be benefited or adversely affected thereby, and should estimate the costs of such works or projects, including indemnification for damage to public and private property and the costs of any remedial works that may be found to be necessary, and should indicate how the costs of any projects and the amounts of any resulting damage should be apportioned between the two Governments.

"4. The Commission should also investigate and report on existing dams, hydro-electric plants, navigation works, and other works or projects located within the Columbia River system in so far as such investigation and report may be germane to the subject under consideration.

"5. In the conduct of its investigation and otherwise in the performance of its duties under this reference, the Commission may utilize the services of engineers and other specially qualified personnel of the technical agencies of Canada and the United States and will so far as possible make use of information and technical data heretofore acquired by such technical agencies or which may become available during the course of the investigation, thus avoiding duplication of effort and unnecessary expense."

If the proposed reference is acceptable to your Government I should appreciate being informed, and this note together with your reply would be regarded as an agreement between our two Governments on the terms of reference.

Le premier secrétaire, l'ambassade des États-Unis, au conseiller juridique

Ottawa, October 18, 1944

Dear Mr. Read:

About a year ago you handed us a revised draft note on Line A-B.[180] Your draft, after careful consideration by officers of the Department of State, and after informal consultation with you and Mr. Max Wershof, has been revised, and I enclose herewith a copy of the revised draft.† This revised draft differs from the draft received from you in the following respects:

"(1) By Article I of the draft received it was provided that should either Government hereafter declare that the doctrine of historic waters applied to any part of the waters contiguous to the waters of the coast of Alaska or British Columbia, such waters would continue to be open to the vessels, etc. of the two countries. At the time that this phraseology was first embodied in a draft it was thought that Dixon Entrance might be declared historic waters at some future time. Since the two Governments by the agreement as now drafted would resolve the status of Dixon Entrance, the provision with respect to a future declaration on the subject becomes unnecessary and it is accordingly eliminated.

"(2) Article I of the draft received refers to measures being taken by the two Governments for the defence of 'the northern half of the Western Hemisphere.' The northern half of the Western Hemisphere extends south of the United States and for this reason these words have been changed to read 'the northern part of the Western Hemisphere.'

"(3) Having in mind the inapplicability of the reference to historic waters which constituted the greater part of Article I, the draft has been simplified (a) by incorporating in a preamble the references in Article I to defence measures and to existing rights, and (b) by omitting Article I as it appeared in the earlier draft.

"(4) There is also contained in the preamble a new provision that the two Governments conclude the agreement 'without interfering in anywise with the right of innocent passage of vessels of other states through the areas referred to in Article I hereof.' This change is in accordance with the informal discussions between officials of the two Governments.

"(5) Article I of the revised draft omits all reference to 'adjacent' waters and refers simply to the specific bodies of water by name as they lie to the north and south of the limits of Dixon Entrance, as defined in Article I, paragraph 3. These changes, however, do not alter the reciprocal rights in these waters accorded by Article II of the Canadian draft. For convenience in studying the changes incidental to omission of references to adjacent waters there follows a text of Article I, following the portion thereof which describes the boundary, with omissions overlaid with dashes[181] and additions underlined:[182]

"It is further agreed that the waters of Dixon Entrance include the waters south of the line AB and north of a line drawn between the Canadian Geodetic stations Tow Hill on Graham Island and Stephens on Stephens Island, [and that, for the purpose of this Agreement, the adjacent waters include the waters of Revillagigedo Channel south of the lighthouse on Mary Island, and of Clarence Strait south of Wedge Island and of Cordova Bay south of Kaigani Point and of Hecate Strait south of a line drawn between Tow Hill and Stephens, and the waters between a straight line from Cape Muzon and Langara Point and the high seas.]

"It is hereby declared that the waters of Dixon Entrance are [historic] national waters of Canada and of the United States of America and that [the part of] such of the waters [which is] as are north of the boundary [is included within the territorial] are national waters of the United States of America, and that [the part of] such of the waters [which is] as are south of the boundary [is included within the territorial] are national waters of Canada.

"It is further agreed that the part of the waters of Dixon Entrance and the fisheries thereof which are north of the boundary, and which are more than one marine league distant from the coast of the United States of America, measured from mean lower low water, will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of Canada, who may use and enjoy such waters and fisheries upon a basis of equality with the vessels, aircraft and nationals of the United States of America; and that the part of the waters of Dixon Entrance and the fisheries thereof which are south of the boundary and which are more than one marine league distant from the coast of Canada, measured from mean lower low water, will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of the United States of America, who may use and enjoy such waters and fisheries upon a basis of equality with the vessels, aircraft and nationals of Canada.

"It is further agreed that the [parts of the adjacent] waters of Revillagigedo Channel south of the lighthouse on Mary Island, of Clarence Strait south of Wedge Island and of Cordova Bay south of Kaigani Point [and the fisheries thereof] which are north of the line AB, and which are more than one marine league distant from the coast of the United States of America, measured from mean lower low water, and the fisheries thereof, will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of Canada, who may use and enjoy such waters and fisheries on a basis of equality with the vessels, aircraft and nationals of the United States of America; and that the [parts of the adjacent] waters of Hecate Strait [and the fisheries thereof] which are south of [the] a line drawn between Tow Hill and Stephens and which are more than one marine league distant from the coast of Canada, measured from mean lower low water, and the fisheries thereof, will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of the United States of America, who may use and enjoy such waters and fisheries upon a basis of equality with the vessels, aircraft and nationals of Canada, [and that the adjacent waters and fisheries thereof which are between a straight line from Cape Muzon and Langara Point and the high seas and are more than one marine league distant from the coast of either country will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of both countries on a basis of equality.]

"(6) The third and fourth paragraphs of the description of the boundary vary from the corresponding paragraphs of the draft enclosed with the despatch of October 1. The description contained in the present draft closely approximates an earlier suggestion on the part of this Government, and varies only slightly from an earlier Canadian description. The turning points indicated are located on straight lines connecting existing reference monuments. For the sake of clarity there has been added, immediately following the description of the boundary, the following sentence: '(The above geodetic positions are on the North American datum of 1927.)'

"(7) It is declared in the present draft that the waters of Dixon Entrance 'are national waters of Canada and of the United States of America.'

"(8) In order that the base line or coastline from which one marine league is measured may be known, the phrase 'measured from mean lower low water' has been inserted in the appropriate places in Articles I and II.

"(9) The final paragraph of the draft relates to the putting into effect of the agreement. It has been decided by the Department that it is desirable to submit the agreement to the Senate of the United States for its approval. You may inform the Department of External Affairs that this Department is willing that the formula be revised to suit Canadian wishes, subject to the understanding that the agreement is not to be regarded as effective prior to approval of our Senate."

I should appreciate receiving your reaction to this draft.

Sincerely yours,

LEWIS CLARK

Dear Mr. Read:

You will recall my letter to you of October 18, 1944, enclosing a revised draft note on Line A-B. I conveyed your oral comments on the revised draft to the Department of State and I have now been informed that as the geographic description of the boundary line in Dixon Entrance departed from the earlier Canadian draft for technical reasons only, my Government is prepared to revert to the Canadian proposal for the extension of the boundary line as set forth in your proposals of September 1943. That description, with the insertion of the equivalent in feet of the lengths given in meters, reads as follows:

"From the entrance to the Portland Channel at the Point B in latitude 54° 42′ 27″.933 North and longitude 130° 36′ 50″.047 West of Greenwich, by a line 4,550 meters (14,927.8 feet) in length with an initial bearing of South 30° 36′ 00″ West to Turning Point 1 in latitude 54° 40′ 21″.261 and longitude 130° 38′ 59″.287;

thence by a line 32,082.45 meters (105,257.2 feet) in length with an initial bearing of North 83° 00′ 00″ West to Turning Point 2 in latitude 54° 42′ 24″.082 and longitude 131° 08′ 37″.639;

thence by a line 63,376.86 meters (207,928.9 feet) in length with an initial bearing of South 63° 44′ 55″.593 West to Turning Point 3 in latitude 54° 27′ 06″.062 and longitude 132° 01′ 12″.289;

thence by a line 55,324.77 meters (181,511.3 feet) in length with an initial bearing of North 88° 41′ 04″.577 West to Turning Point 4 in Latitude 54° 27′ 36″.303 and longitude 132° 52′ 22″.648;

thence by a line to the high seas at right angles to the line joining Langara Point lighthouse with Reference Monument No. 1 on Cape Muzon, with an intial bearing of North 62° 05′ 25″.38 West.

(The above geodetic positions are on the North American datum of 1927)

Should the Canadian authorities feel that any other of the changes made by my Government in the draft submitted in October last may give rise to difficulties, or are not for any other reason desirable, I have been directed to say that the Department of State would be entirely willing to give consideration to your views.

You will recall my oral comment to you earlier this year that although we realize you may not wish to attempt formal action on Line A-B at the moment, we deem it desirable to place the matter in such shape that final action could be taken whenever the situation seemed favourable. May I suggest, therefore, that active consideration be given to this matter with the idea that we will agree upon an exchange of notes but not actually effect the exchange until such time as may be mutually agreeable to both Governments.

APPENDIX A

REVISED DRAFT NOTE REGARDING DIXON ENTRANCE AND THE STRAIGHT OF JUAN DE FUCA

Excellency,

I have the honour to refer to correspondence between your Government and the Government of Canada and to conversations between officers of our two Governments regarding the remaining unsettled boundary questions on the Pacific Coast, and to propose that an understanding should be reached in the following terms:

Having in mind the measures being taken jointly and severally by the two Governments for the defence of the northern part of the Western Hemisphere; and recognizing that it would be undesirable to impair or augment in any way the rights which the nationals of each country now enjoy in the waters of the other country dealt with in the present agreement, including the right to engage in the fisheries thereof, or to interfere in any wise with the right of innocent passage of vessels of other states through the areas referred to in Article I hereof, the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada agree upon the following Articles:

I

It is agreed and declared that the line which is referred to as "the line marked AB" in the decision of the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal dated October 20, 1903, being a line in Dixon Entrance from Cape Muzon to the entrance to the Portland Channel, allocated all land to the north thereof to the United States of America, and all land to the south thereof to Canada.

It is further agreed to extend the boundary between Canada and the United States of America, hereinafter in this Article referred to as the boundary, as follows:

From the entrance to the Portland Channel at the Point B in latitude 54° 42′ 27″.933 North and longitude 130° 36′ 50″.047 West of Greenwich, by a line 4,550 meters (14,927.8 feet) in length with an initial bearing of South 30° 36′ 00″ West to Turning Point 1 in latitude 54° 40′ 21″.261 and longitude 130° 38′ 59″.287;

thence by a line 32,082.45 meters (105,257.2 feet) in length with an initial bearing of North 83° 00′ 00″ West to Turning Point 2 in latitude 54° 42′ 24″.082 and longitude 131° 08′ 37″.639;

thence by a line 63,376.86 meters (207,928.9 feet) in length with an initial bearing of South 63° 44′ 55″.593 West to Turning Point 3 in latitude 54° 27′ 06″.062 and longitude 132° 01′ 12″.289;

thence by a line 55,324.77 meters (181,511.3 feet) in length with an initial bearing of North 88° 41′ 04″.577 West to Turning Point 4 in Latitude 54° 27′ 36″.303 and longitude 132° 52′ 22″.648;

thence by a line to the high seas at right angles to the line joining Langara Point lighthouse with Reference Monument No. 1 on Cape Muzon, with an initial bearing of North 62° 05′ 25″.38 West.

It is further agreed that the waters of Dixon Entrance include the waters south of the line AB and north of a line drawn between the Canadian Geodetic stations Tow Hill on Graham Island and Stephens on Stephens Island.

It is hereby declared that such of the waters of Dixon Entrance as are north of the boundary are national waters of the United States of America, and that such of the waters as are south of the boundary are national waters of Canada.

It is further agreed that the part of the waters of Dixon Entrance and the fisheries thereof which are north of the boundary, and which are more than one marine league distant from the coast of the United States of America, measured from mean lower low water, will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of Canada, who may use and enjoy such waters and fisheries upon a basis of equality with the vessels, aircraft and nationals of the United States of America; and that the part of the waters of Dixon Entrance and the fisheries thereof which are south of the boundary and which are more than one marine league distant from the coast of Canada, measured from mean lower low water, will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of the United States of America, who may use and enjoy such waters and fisheries upon a basis of equality with the vessels, aircraft and nationals of Canada.

It is further agreed that the waters of Revillagigedo Channel south of the lighthouse on Mary Island, of Clarence Strait south of Wedge Island and of Cordova Bay south of Kaigani Point, which are north of the line AB, and which are more than one marine league distant from the coast of the United States of America, measured from mean lower low water, and the fisheries thereof, will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of Canada, who may use and enjoy such waters and fisheries on a basis of equality with the vessels, aircraft and nationals of the United States of America; and that the waters of Hecate Strait which are south of a line drawn between Tow Hill and Stephens and which are more than one marine league distant from the coast of Canada, measured from mean lower low water, and the fisheries thereof, will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of the United States of America, who may use and enjoy such waters and fisheries upon a basis of equality with the vessels, aircraft and nationals of Canada.

II

It is agreed and declared that the waters of the Strait of Juan de Fuca to the east of the line from Tatoosh Island lighthouse to Bonilla Point are national or inland waters of Canada and of the United States of America, and that there is a contiguous belt of territorial waters to the west of that line which connects the belts of territorial waters adjacent to the coasts of the Province of British Columbia and the State of Washington.

It is further agreed to extend the boundary between Canada and the United States of America as follows:

From Turning Point 12 midway on a line between Tatoosh Island lighthouse and Bonilla Point, at right angles to that line, with an initial bearing of North 86° 26′ 40″ West to the high seas.

It is further agreed that the waters and fisheries thereof which are between a straight line from Tatoosh Island lighthouse to Bonilla Point and the high seas and more than one marine league distant from the coast of either country, measured from mean lower low water, will be open to the vessels, aircraft and nationals of both countries on a basis of equality.

III

It is agreed that the Commissioners appointed under the provisions of the Boundary Treaty of April 11, 1908,[183] and acting also under the provisions of the Boundary Treaty of February 24, 1925,[184] will have authority to do all things which they deem necessary in the way of the establishment of monuments, making of surveys and publication of maps and reports, to give effect to the provisions of these Articles.

It is understood that the Government of the United States of America desires to obtain the approval of the United States Senate before making the proposed agreement effective. I, therefore, have the honour to suggest that if the foregoing provisions are acceptable to the Government of the United States of America, this note and your reply thereto, when approved by the United States Senate and by the Parliament of Canada, will be regarded as placing on record the understandings arrived at between our two Governments.

Accept etc.

BOUNDARY QUESTIONS AFFECTING CANADIAN WATERS IN THE PACIFIC

12. THE SECRETARY submitted a memorandum from the Department of External Affairs, also a draft note† to the U.S. government regarding the international boundary in Dixon Entrance and the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

After a careful examination of the questions involved by representatives of the Departments of Fisheries, Justice, National Defence (Navy), Mines and Resources and External Affairs, it was recommended that it be proposed to the United States that a new line of demarcation be established in Dixon Entrance to constitute the boundary between the two countries and that a U.S. proposal for the extension of the international boundary in the Strait of Juan de Fuca be accepted.

Maps illustrating these proposals were circulated for examination.[185]

An explanatory memorandum and the draft note had been circulated.

(External Affairs memorandum[186] and appendices, Sept.7, 1945 — Cabinet Document 59).

13. THE CABINET, after discussion, approved settlement with the United States of these two boundary questions on the basis of the draft note submitted, subject to assurance being obtained as to the attitude of the government of British Columbia.

My dear premier:

I duly received your telegram of December 14, concerning fishing rights and possible boundary modifications on the west coast of British Columbia.

The matter has been discussed with the Minister of Fisheries and with the appropriate officials of the Department of External Affairs, and I am glad to be able to assure you that no definite action will be taken by the Canadian government without opportunity being provided for the government of British Columbia to make its views known.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, December 22, 1945

Dear Mr. Read:

As a result of your message to me of December 6th, I took up the question of the suggested boundary alterations with the Provincial Government.

My communication to them was marked confidential and Premier Hart did not feel that he could treat it in any other way. Accordingly he got in touch with me by telephone and indicated that the Provincial Government of British Columbia was unalterably opposed to the suggested changes. As a result of that attitude I must advise that it would be bad policy for the Government of Canada to proceed with these negotiations at the present time. Otherwise I feel convinced that there would be a clash between the Provincial and the Federal Governments which, of course, would be most unfortunate.

Yours very truly,
IAN MACKENZIE

RE: PROPOSED VOYAGE OF THE R.C.M.P. IN THE ARCTIC

May I refer to your enquiry with regard to the course of action which should be followed by the R.C.M.P. in the Arctic patrol this summer.

I am enclosing a memorandum prepared by Mr. Chaput of this Department which suggests the basis for the activities of the patrol having in mind the Government's desire to protect its sovereignty over the Arctic Islands.

Mr. Chaput points out that, failing the establishment of new posts, the main contribution of a new expedition travelling north would be to see that Canadian laws and regulations are observed both by natives and foreigners in the whole of the territory covered. He also points out that care should be taken to avoid any action which could be interpreted as the taking of possession by Canada of new lands, thus giving rise to possible rival claims based on past discoveries.

Consideration might be given to the desirability of posting the ordinary notices and proclamations in matters relating to the government of the Northwest Territories which would be found publicly displayed in communities in the continental part of the territory. The notices so posted might be limited to those which would be likely to concern casual visitors if any came to the places in question, e.g., game regulations, permits, licences, etc.

Memorandum to Legal Adviser

SECRET [Ottawa,] May 31, 1944

PROPOSED VOYAGE OF THE R.C.M.P. IN THE ARCTIC

1. Canadian sovereignty over the Arctic must rest upon rights of (1) discovery and (2) effective possession which are in the last analysis the only elements on which title to new lands can safely be based under present International law.

2. While the great majority of islands of the Arctic Archipelago has been discovered by British explorers, there are still a certain number of islands which have yet to go through that preliminary process. Canada, however, claims the whole territory lying north of its mainland up to the North Pole. Consequently care should be taken not to take any action in this area which could be interpreted as the taking of possession by Canada of new lands, thus giving rise to possible rival claims based on past discoveries, at the same time opening the way for foreign discovery of unknown territory in the future.

3. Effective possession, therefore, should be the sole official preoccupation of Canadian expeditions in the North.

In order to comply with this requirement it is prescribed that a state "bring the territory (claimed) under its control and administration" (Smedal). Even taking into account that such "control and administration" need not be as real in northern regions as in most temperate ones, there may be some doubt whether Canada is actually extending enough jurisdiction throughout lands already discovered to make her claim to these territories unquestionable.

Hence every effort should be made in order to extend and substantiate Canada's administrative control in the North.

4. Precise information as to what constitutes "control and administration" is scarce and it seems hard to forecast any precise rule of conduct which should be followed by members of an expedition. The principle generally agreed to however is that the possessing state must make its authority felt in the occupied territory and maintain order therein (Hall). As a matter of practice, I should think this is translated in the administration of justice and the enforcement of national laws and regulations in the territory concerned.

The establishment of posts such as was done in the Canadian north in the past which serve as police posts, as well as custom houses and post offices, constitutes a perfect example of what is meant by control. Failing the establishment of new posts, I should think the main contribution of a new expedition travelling up North would be to see that Canadian laws and regulations are observed both by natives and foreigners in the whole of the territory covered. It is safe to assume that the ship carrying the expedition can be considered as a moving post, the activities of which have the same value as those carried by a permanent post established on land.

5. The main body of rules which are of particular importance with regard to Canadian jurisdiction in the Arctic are the following:

a) Custom laws and regulations;
b) Air regulations;
c) Immigration;
d) Importation of intoxicants (under the N.W.T. Act);
e) Game regulations (under the N.W.T. Act);
f) Permits under the Migratory Birds Convention;

g) Licenses or permits required by foreign scientists and explorers entering the Actic regions.

6. Mapping and other scientific research work effected in the course of the voyage, while of no legal value as such, when isolated can, of course, serve as supplementary evidence that Canada considers these territories as coming under her jurisdiction and thus be of great help from a legal point of view when envisaged against the background of other Canadian activities in that sector. This is especially true in the case of those regions of the Arctic which have yet to be explored.

7. The terms of this declaration shall be deemed to have equal force and effect as the Treaty itself and to form an integral part thereof.

1088. DEA/12216-6-40

Le premier secrétaire, l'ambassade des Etats-Unis, au conseiller juridique

First Secretary, Embassy of United States, to Legal Adviser

Ottawa, June 5, 1945

Dear Mr. Read:

On March 25, 1944, you handed to me a revised draft of reservations to the Extradition Treaty between the United States and Canada, which was signed on April 29, 1942. This revised draft was communicated to my Government and has received the careful study of the interested departments. I have now been directed to make the following suggestions.

Paragraph No. 2. It is suggested that the words, "and the primary purpose of which is not to aid in the sale or offering for sale of securities in the requesting country" be deleted, and that there be substituted therefor the words, "and not intentionally designed to aid in the sale or offering for sale of securities in the requesting country." In suggesting this change the Chairman of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission comments as follows:

"The term 'primary purpose' as used in the last clause of this paragraph is susceptible of a construction which would exclude from operation of the treaty those persons who intentionally circulate literature in Canada and the United States for the purpose of selling securities both there and in this country. It would be most difficult in such cases to establish that the 'primary purpose' was to sell in the United States."

Paragraph No. 4. It is suggested that '(a)' be inserted before the word "fraud", and that '(b)' be inserted before the phrase, "wilful and knowing violation of the laws of the requesting country." Also, it is suggested that the provisos in this paragraph be deleted. These changes are desired in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the effect of this paragraph. In commenting with respect to the suggestion that the provisos be deleted, the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission says:

"The proviso that appears in this paragraph should be deleted, in our opinion, because it would tend to confuse the application of the treaty provisions under consideration. It would seem that in view of the other clauses contained in this revised draft any innocent persons in Canada would be amply protected, and inclusion of this proviso will only tend to open the door to restrictive application of the treaty.

"The first part of the proviso relates to acts classified as occurring partly in Canada and partly in the United States. It is not unlikely that such a classification would be held to include most of the violations in which we would be interested. The proviso would require a showing that the act was criminal in both countries, and also in the particular 'place' where the act occurred in the requested country. In our opinion this would seriously handicap the extradition process. Indeed, it would very likely make it unworkable with respect to securities and mail fraud violations because, under the law of the 'place' the transaction might be held not to be a criminal offense; and it should be noted that in general criminal cases in Canada are subject to Dominion jurisdiction, as distinguished from a provincial or local jurisdiction.

"It would appear, moreover, contrary to established treaty practice as we understand it, and inconsistent with the spirit of the instant treaty, to require the requesting country to prove criminality under the law of a particular locale as well as under the national laws of the requested country.

"I find it difficult to perceive any justification for the second part of said proviso, which provides that a person committing the violation wholly in the requested country is immune from extradition, if he takes refuge in a particular 'place' in which the laws do not make the violation a criminal offense. It seems to us that this can only serve as an escape mechanism.

"We appreciate that the proviso may be the result of concern on the part of some Canadians that unwitting and inadvertent violations of our securities laws might be made the basis for extradition. As we have stated previously, the securities laws administered by this Commission do not provide criminal sanctions except in cases where there is wilful intent to violate the law. Moreover, you may assure the Canadian authorities of the fact that criminal proceedings under the securities laws are not brought except in cases of substantial, as distinguished from technical violations, and that would be particularly so when extradition proceedings are involved.

"In our view, paragraph 4 of the proposed reservations, modified as suggested, makes it clear beyond doubt that no persons can or will be extradited except for fraud and wilful offenses."

Paragraph No. 5. It has been suggested that the clause reading, "and the primary purpose of which is not to aid in the sale or offering for sale of securities in the requesting country" be deleted, and there be substituted therefor the words, "and not intentionally designed to aid in the sale or offering for sale of securities in the requesting country".

Since the reservations envisaged would constitute a modification of the treaty to the ratification of which the Senate of the United States has already given its advice and consent, it is the view of the Department of State that it will be necessary to submit the Canadian reservations to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification. In the circumstances, it is believed that it would be advisable for the reservations to be prepared in the form of a protocol, so drafted as to be made a part of the treaty. The ratifications of the protocol could then be exchanged at the same time that the ratifications of the treaty are exchanged.

I would appreciate it if you would let me know the reaction of your Government to the above suggestions.

Sincerely yours,

LEWIS CLARK

Le sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures au premier secrétaire, l'ambassade des États-Unis

Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to First Secretary, Embassy of United States

Ottawa, July 3, 1945

Dear Mr. Clark,

May I refer to your letter dated June 5, 1945, in which you transmitted a revised draft which was a revision of a revised draft delivered to you on March 25, 1944. For the purpose of convenient reference, I will refer to the latter as the revised reservation and to the communicaton which you enclosed in your letter of June 5 as the United States counter-draft.

The Departments of the Canadian Government which are interested in this question have given the most careful consideration to the counter-draft. Every effort has been made to meet the desires of your Government, but it has been necessary at the same time to ensure that legitimate Canadian interests are protected.

It is, of course, desirable that no time should be lost in working out a practical solution of this question. Before bringing the matter to the attention of our Government I will venture to comment on the principal questions raised by the counter-draft. This course should save time.

I am enclosing three copies of the revised draft of March 25, 1944, and of the United States counter-draft of June 5,1945 with notes. The revised draft and counter-draft are put in parallel columns with notes after the paragraphs in which there has been some change suggested by the United States authorities.

You will observe that the principal change suggested was in paragraph 2, recurring in paragraph 5. It involved the revision of the last clause in the paragraph and the notes indicate clearly the reasons why the suggested change is not regarded as being acceptable.

You will also observe the suggestion that this clause should be struck out altogether, which would probably meet your difficulties.

The other points are raised in paragraph 4 and you will note that there is general agreement with the suggestion put forward by the United States authorities for including (a) and (b) in the principal paragraph.

There is also acquiescence in the proposal to strike out the proviso.

There seems to have been some misunderstanding, with regard to the proviso, which was put forward with the idea of making extradition workable. The Chairman of your Securities and Exchange Commission in his comments seems to think that the proviso would tend to confuse the application of the Treaty provisions under consideration. As a matter of fact, the proviso was designed to clarify the application of the extradition arrangements and if it is considered in conjunction with the laws enforced in this country it will be manifest that it has this effect. However, the striking out of the proviso will not prejudice any Canadian interest and the Departments of the Government concerned are not inclined to question your suggestion in this respect.

Yours sincerely,

R. G. ROBERTSON

for External Affairs.

REVISED DRAFT RESERVATION DELIVERED TO UNITED STATES EMBASSY, MARCH 25, 1944	UNITED STATES COUNTER-DRAFT, JUNE 5, 1945

2. WHEREAS, it is desired that said provisions should not extend to the extradition of a publisher or vendor of a lawful publication in the requested country which primarily intended for sale and circulation in that country, the circulation of which in the requesting country is only incidental to the ordinary course of publication and sale in the requested country, and the primary purpose of which is not to aid in the sale or offering for sale of securities in the requesting country;	2. NOTE

(a) The change proposed by the United States did not commend itself to the Departments of the Government which have examined this question.

(b) We might be justified in following the suggestion of omitting the entire clause.

(c) On the other hand, I do not think that it is possible to accept the revisions suggested by the U.S.A.

(d) Assuming that the Montreal Gazette publishes a standard advertisement for a new issue, e.g. Victory Bonds, City of Ottawa Bonds, C.P.R. Certificates, Calgary Power Preference, it could not be argued that the circulation to the United States subscribers in the U.S.A. was not "intentionally designed to aid in the sale or offering for sale" of any of these securities in the U.S.A. Having in mind the provisions of the United States laws (all 49 States), this would be regarded as an offering for sale in the U.S.A., notwithstanding that the advertisements called for offers bids in Canadian offices. On the other hand, with the omission of the clause, the Montreal Gazette could not be extradited because the circulation in the U.S.A. was only incidental to the ordinary course of publication and sale in Canada.

(e) Consideration has been given to the possibility of definition on a percentage basis, but it would not be satisfactory. It is not out of the question that we might have, either now or prospectively, a respectable Canadian publication which was in the same general sort of position as Time or many other U.S. periodicals, with a circulation continental in its character. In that case, we would have a genuinely Canadian publication, which might have more than 50% of its subscribers within the U.S.A. It is better to leave the matter to be proved in the particular case.

(f) It is inconceivable that there should be actual difficulty in proof in any case in which it was desirable to prosecute and extradite. The sort of cases which are concerned are cases not of genuine circulation, but of phoney newspapers published for the sole purpose of puffing the sale of phoney stocks.

Dear Mr. Read:

Your letter to me of July 3, 1945, regarding the Extradition Convention was sent immediately to the Department of State.

After discussion with officers of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice, I have now been directed to say that we agree to the suggestion contained in your letter that the contentious clause in paragraphs numbered 2 and 5 of the proposed reservations to the treaty be deleted. We have also noted your agreement in respect of paragraph 4 to including (a) and (b) in the principal paragraph, and omitting the proposed proviso.

Inasmuch as the reservations have been proposed by your authorities, it is assumed that Canada will prepare the necessary document in duplicate, incorporating therein the reservations as now agreed upon for signature. While the Department of State has heretofore suggested that the reservations be prepared in the form of a protocol, I am now informed that it would be satisfactory if you adopt either a protocol or a declaration for the purpose. In either event it would seem to be desirable that the document be given a heading sufficient to identify it with the treaty, as it must be submitted to the Senate in the United States for advice and consent to ratification.

Should you desire that the Ambassador have a special full power to sign the document, I should appreciate being advised when it will be ready for signature in order that the full power may be obtained from Washington.

Sincerely yours,

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES

1. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE described the position with regard to proposed extradition arrangements between Canada and the United States.

A treaty had been signed on April 29th, 1942, and the United States had provided for ratification. Before the treaty was brought before Parliament, however, strong representations against certain items relating to the advertising and sale of securities were made to the government.

After further negotiations with U.S. authorities, with a view to meeting the substantial Canadian objections, a final draft of a protocol had been prepared designed to cover the extradition of security fraud offenders. This draft was now submitted with the object of obtaining a ruling as to whether signature should be authorized.

An explanatory note and copy of the draft protocol were circulated.

(External Affairs memorandum, August 16, 1945 — Cabinet Document No. 52).†

2. THE CABINET, after discussion, agreed that signature of the draft protocol be authorized and that the necessary measures to give effect thereto be prepared for introduction into Parliament.[191]

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

SECRET AND IMMEDIATE [Ottawa,] January 17, 1944

The United States and United Kingdom Governments are trying to work out a common policy about Argentina. Our Embassy has been kept informed of their discussions by the British Embassy, which has been in direct touch with the United States State Department on the subject. We have also received a number of messages from the Dominions Office† on this subject.

I am not at all happy about the programme of action which seems to be taking shape in Washington. The steps proposed for effecting the complete isolation of Argentina may prove very costly to the United Nations, and are not certain to be effective. They envisage the recall of ambassadors for consultation, then the withdrawal of diplomatic representation, the dispatch of United States battleships, and the formal indictment of Argentine complicity with the Nazis, followed by the freezing of Argentine assets and the application of economic sanctions, which will involve the stoppage of pretty nearly essential supplies now furnished by Argentina.

This formidable battery of external pressures will probably bring Argentina into line with United Nations policies, but may, in doing so, strengthen temporarily the internal position of the Government by permitting Ramirez to identify his regime's peculiar policies with Argentine traditions of national independence and resistance to American pressure. Argentine resistence, however wrong-headed, is likely to receive a good deal of sneaking sympathy from nationalist elements in other Latin American countries, and it may be difficult to keep them in line with the policy the United States is proposing.

The United States, and the rest of us in degree, are plainly confronted with an extremely difficult and delicate situation, which may undermine the "good neighbour" relationship which the United States has built up.

In the circumstances, I think there may be less danger in the long run from a "cloak and dagger" policy of secret interference in Argentine politics with a view to effecting the revolutionary overthrow of the Ramirez Government by elements prepared to cooperate with the United Nations. It might be possible to organize elements of the Argentine liberal and socialist opposition parties, which claim the support of 60 percent to 80 percent of the population, into a Free Argentine Government, which might establish itself in Montevideo and be granted recognition. The revolutionary forces could be given weapons and money enough to make sure that a coup d'etat would come off. When it came, the change of front and policy would be effected by Argentinians and in the name of a free Argentina, not as a result of obvious and elaborately legalized external pressures. In the long run this might prove a very important difference.

I do not suppose that you will approve of these subversive suggestions or would think them fit to be passed on to the President. They obviously could not be put on paper.[1]

However, there is one aspect of the situation that will concern us directly, whatever plan the Great Powers decide to pursue. If the United States recalls Mr. Armour "for consultation", the United Kingdom will follow very quickly. We shall have to tag along. It so happens we were on the point of moving Mr. Turgeon any way. He has indicated that he would be very glad to accept appointment as Canadian Minister to the Allied Governments in the United Kingdom. I suggest we tell him, right away, to make the earliest possible arrangements for his return to Canada.[2] Desy has recently returned to report on his mission in Brazil, and it would be quite in order for Turgeon, having completed two years' service, to come back on a similar errand. If the political situation develops as anticipated, he would be in fact the first of the United Nations representatives to come home for consultation. Otherwise, he would simply be coming back in the ordinary way preparatory to accepting another diplomatic appointment.

Washington for consultation. This will be announced by United States Government on Monday January 24th, at which time it is expected the United States will issue an order freezing Argentine assets in the United States.

As you know we have had in mind the desirability of your returning to Canada preparatory to assuming another diplomatic post. We have been deferring action on your proposed nomination as Minister to the Allied Governments in the United Kingdom because it was helpful to have you in Argentina during this critical period. In view, however, of the way events appear to be shaping, with the United States bringing its Ambassador back for consultation and the United Kingdom expected to take similar action, I am afraid that if announcement of your departure is deferred longer some misunderstanding of the Canadian attitude may develop both in Argentina as well as in North America.

In the circumstances I think the best course is for you to inform the Argentine Government that you are being transferred to another diplomatic post and that you are returning to Ottawa before taking up your new duties. We shall advise the Canadian newspapers accordingly on Monday. In informing the Argentine Foreign Minister of your impending departure, you should not, repeat not, give him the impression that the explanation offered of your move is intended to disassociate Canada from the American attitude toward recent Argentine policies. I shall endeavour to see the Argentine Minister tomorrow and make our position clear to him.

The Argentine Government broke off relations with Germany and Japan this morning. Their Ambassadors in Buenos Aires will be handed their passports later today. Mr. Hull is expected to comment on these developments later in the day. The forecast from Washington earlier in the week was that the United States would expect Argentina to comply with all the recommendations of the Rio Conference[3] with respect to Axis funds, personnel, etc., and would not be content with this formal breach of diplomatic relations at the eleventh hour.

MOST SECRET. In present uncertain situation I think it best for you to refrain from official contacts with the Farrell Administration which might give appearance either of recognizing it or approving its policies. The United States position has been made public by the statement on March 4 of Acting Secretary of State Stettinius[4] which you have no doubt seen. We understand that Sir David Kelly[5] has been instructed to confine his official communications with Argentine Government to requests for Customs facilities and similar routine matters and that the British Government prefers to proceed cautiously and avoid precipitate action in case Farrell should fall as a result of further intrigue. We are awaiting further information as to the policy of the United Kingdom.

We should very much appreciate your comments on the argument that a policy of non-recognition might possibly strengthen the hand of the Nationalists on the ground of foreign pressure.

In view of the Prime Minister's announcement in the House of Commons this afternoon, defining the Canadian attitude towards the present Argentine Government, it is necessary to suspend official relations with the Argentine Minister in Ottawa and with members of his mission. This suspension does not apply to the transaction of routine business, such as Customs clearances, etc. It applies, however, to all business of other types, including the issue of exequaturs to consuls and the despatch of communications on current matters to the Argentine Legation. I have informed the Argentine Minister this afternoon that this procedure will be followed. He should not of course be invited to any Government functions until the situation clears up.[7]

Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] July 6, 1944

Mr. de Berenguer-Cesar, Counsellor of the Brazilian Embassy, called on me by appointment yesterday afternoon to discuss the situation in Argentina. At his request, I explained that the Canadian Minister had left Buenos Aires some time ago and that his withdrawal was not the result of a decision to impose a formal sanction on the Argentine Government but was rather a routine move of a member of our diplomatic service.

On the other hand, our failure to appoint a new Minister might be interpreted as evidence of the unwillingness of the Canadian Government to give encouragement to the present regime in Argentina. The fact that we had no Minister in Buenos Aires when the United States and the United Kingdom withdrew their Ambassadors made it unnecessary for Canada to decide either for or against similar action.

I said that speaking personally, I had some doubts as to the wisdom of the course that is being followed by the United Nations and particularly the United States in Buenos Aires. These doubts arose not from any sympathy with the present Argentine regime for which in fact I entertain a lively dislike, but simply on the grounds that external pressure may have the effect of strengthening the Farrell Government in Argentina and may even tend to obtain for that Government a certain sympathy from other governments in Latin America. There is also the consideration that the withdrawal of the heads of Missions was not in itself a very effective form of sanction and yet it would be difficult to supplement it with any other action without at the same time adversely affecting the economic interests of the United Nations.

Mr. Berenguer said that he himself and, he believed, that all those who are really well acquainted with Latin America and particularly with Argentina, share the views which I had expressed as my personal opinion. He said that he and his Brazilian colleagues all heartily dislike the present government of Argentina, but that they are afraid the policy being followed by Washington and, under United States influence by other members of the United Nations, will have the effect of strengthening rather than weakening the Farrell regime, at least for some time to come.

Mr. Berenguer expressed the opinion that the revolutionary government of Bolivia would not have been able to maintain itself in office for one month if it had not been for the opposition of the United States. This hostility of Washington aroused the nationalistic sentiment of the Bolivians behind their new government. In reply to a question, Mr. Berenguer said that he would not prepare to offer a firm opinion as to the future probabilities in Bolivia, but that he was inclined to the view that the Government had now become pretty firmly established and that it might well remain in office for some considerable period.

Mr. Berenguer referred to the fact that his Ambassador will be speaking over the C.B.C. tonight. I refrained from telling him that I had read the text of the Ambassador's speech. Nor did I ask him about the statement included in the text to the effect that Brazil is about to send 25 divisions to fight on the battlefields of Europe!!

Le sous-ministre par intérim du Commerce
au sous-ministre d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Acting Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce
to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, November 17, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson:—

With further reference to our previous correspondence† on Canadian relations with the Argentine, Mr. Scott, our Commercial Counsellor in Washington, at a meeting of the Sub-Committee on Export Control, held on Wednesday, October 21st, outlined the new American relations with that country. He pointed out that the secret agreement signed in 1942, and the State Department memorandum of August 26th, 1943, had now been largely superseded by a new American policy enunciated by the State Department, and embodied in instructions dated September 19th, 1944, issued to F.E.A. licensing officers, which he read to the meeting. Under this policy practically all shipments to Argentina are withheld unless they contribute directly to the war effort of the United Nations, or to the maintenance of public health and safety in the country. Mr. Scott indicated further that if we co-operate wholeheartedly with the United States in this policy, we must refuse applications for export permits, with very few exceptions.

Mr. Scott went on to say that the American authorities have no desire to dictate Canadian policy, although they naturally hope that we will find it possible to co-operate to the fullest extent. After due consideration, Mr. Scott was advised that it was the desire of the Committee to co-operate and this decision was approved by Mr. Pierce, your departmental representative at the Committee meeting. It was pointed out, however, that the British attitude is not the same as our own, and that, consequently, we are possibly excluding certain shipments from Canada to Argentina which will be filled by various other British Empire interests.

We, in the Department of Trade and Commerce, feel that it is necessary to follow this American policy on an overall basis, but desire to outline below, certain possible exceptions which require careful consideration, possibly by the External Trade Advisory Committee.

Asbestos

Canada has for many years been the principal source of short fibre asbestos for Argentina, present annual trade being valued at about $300,000. If this material is not shipped from Canada, in all probability it will be provided by Rhodesia. In a previous attempt to prevent certain grades of asbestos containing an appreciable quantity of long fibre reaching Argentina, an attempt was made through your office to secure the collaboration of the British authorities, but this was not forthcoming, and shipments of Rhodesian material of an equal grade were, we understand, received regularly by Argentina. There is no U.S. interest in the Argentine market.

Calcium Carbide

Canada has for some years been one of the principal suppliers of carbide to Argentina, an important share of which is used by British owned railways. Shipments of carbide from South Africa to Argentina have been heavy this year and we are now advised by the Dominion Oxygen Company that South Africa is offering to take up all business offering for January delivery. Therefore, it would appear that we are simply handing the existing business of, roughly, three-quarters of a million dollars, over to that country, unless the full collaboration of South Africa is obtained. In view of our previous experiences with asbestos, it is hardly likely that this will be agreed to. United States exporters are not particularly interested in the Argentine market.

Refractory Materials

A promising market in Argentina for refractory bricks and other material, worth possibly $50,000, is being this year sacrificed to British interests. However, U.S. business of still greater proportions is also being sacrificed.

Agricultural Implement Repairs

It has been the policy to maintain shipments of repair parts for Canadian machines abroad, even where iron and steel was short for the war effort, as it was considered absolutely necessary to keep such machines in operation. In the secret agreement with the United States, Canada agreed not to ship complete machines, but to continue to ship necessary repair parts, which in 1944 are programmed to amount to about $125,000, or 20% of the total value of shipments in the average 1940-41 period. Mr. Scott has been asked to report on corresponding American policy.[8]

Ferro-Alloys

The Canadian allocation of ferro-alloys to Argentina for 1944 is valued, roughly, at $100,000. If Canadian ferro-alloys do not move to this market, supplies will be provided by Brazil and Mexico and considerable impetus given to domestic production. United States is normally not much interested.

---

[8]La note suivante était dans l'original:
The following note was in the original:

A letter has just been received from M. Scott,† advising unofficially that the United States intend to withhold such shipments, and presumably we should be prepared to do likewise.

Agricultural Products

Seed Potatoes — After many years of effort a substantial market, averaging possibly $800,000 annually, for Canadian seed potatoes was developed in Argentina, now our third largest market. This is important from both the immediate and the long range view. At present, if Canadian potatoes are not supplied, it is anticipated that they will be replaced by British shipments.

Apples

A good deal of effort has been expended in popularizing Canadian apples in Argentina. Due to various reasons, a number of our most important markets, such as the United Kingdom, are largely barred to us, and it is, therefore, important that we endeavour to hold the Argentine market.

Mr. Pierce was of the opinion that the approach to the British authorities, in order to secure the collaboration on shipments of asbestos from Rhodesia, and carbide from South Africa, should be made by the American authorities, and according to Mr. Scott, this has been done covering all products. In addition, I feel that if we are to refrain from shipping to Argentina asbestos, calcium carbide, ferro-alloys and seed potatoes, we should take steps to ensure that this action on our part would not merely mean a diversion of trade from Canadian sources, with no appreciable effect on the economy of Argentina.

I should like to have your views on the desirability of an approach being made to the United Kingdom authorities to determine their attitude on this important question. The matter is really urgent, as we are receiving many inquiries from Canadian exporters with respect to their trade with Argentina.

Yours faithfully,

OLIVER MASTER

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au sous-ministre par intérim du Commerce

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Acting Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce

Ottawa, November 24, 1944

Dear Mr. Master:

I reply to your letter of November 17th, on the subject of Canadian relations with the Argentine.

Mr. Pierce advises me that it was his understanding, from the proceedings at the meeting on October 21st of the Sub-Committee on Export Control, that Mr. Scott would, on his return to Washington, advise the U.S. authorities that it was our intention to continue to co-operate with them in their trade policy towards the Argentine. Mr. Scott was, however, to point out to the U.S. authorities that in certain cases it would not further that policy to refuse applications for export from Canada of such exports as calcium carbide in particular and others where supplies would be made available to the Argentine in the required quantities from other sources. He understood that Mr. Scott was to seek the view of the U.S. authorities on the export from Canada of commodities which fell into this category. It was expected that Mr. Scott would soon thereafter discuss the matter informally with the same United States authorities with whom he has been in close contact in similar matters for a long time.

It appears from the copy of Mr. Scott's letter of November 14th† to Mr. Mallory[9] that Mr. Scott is still waiting an official directive, pending the receipt of which he considers it inappropriate to raise specific issues. It is assumed that you will send Mr. Scott this directive.

It is and has been the view of this Department that Mr. Scott can inform the U.S. Government of our continued willingness to co-operate and to put before them the advisability of making exceptions in those cases where the policy will not suffer. What those cases are can best be decided by your Department for you can best determine whether supplies are likely to be available from other sources if they are not forthcoming from Canada.

I do not consider that the matter need be discussed with the External Trade Advisory Committee.

With reference to an approach to the British authorities, it would scarcely seem appropriate for Canada to make such an approach inasmuch as the U.S. is the author and sponsor of the policy. If the U.S. authorities should consider it necessary, in furtherance of the policy, to shut the Argentine off from British Empire sources of supply, they, not we, should approach the British.

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM 16 Ottawa, April 6, 1945

SECRET. Your telegram No. 30 April 5th. Procedure for resumption of diplomatic relations with Argentine Government. We favour Canadian resumption of diplomatic relations with Argentine government immediately after such action has been taken by both United Kingdom and United States. If the United Kingdom should take such action before the United States, we would delay until the United States had also acted. If the United States were the first to act, we would wait for the United Kingdom.

2. United States Ambassador here told the Under-Secretary that the American Republics were consulting on time and form of action to be taken about recognizing Argentine government. He is to let us know in advance the conclusions they have come to and has been instructed to inform us that they hope the other "non-recognizing" governments, including Canada, would take no steps to recognize Argentina until they have learned of the proposed course of action of the American Republics. Mr. Atherton was informed that if we did not act simultaneously with the American Republics we would act after them.

3. We are asking our Embassy in Washington also to ascertain from the State Department, if possible, its course of action.

4. For resuming diplomatic relations, we think that you might do so by formally acknowledging official copy of Argentine declaration of war presented to you by Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the paying of a formal call on the Foreign Office.

5. Letters have been exchanged on a personal basis between the Argentine Legation here and ourselves when we were informed of the declaration of war. In our personal letter we said, "I need scarcely say that the Canadian government welcomes this action of your government in aligning itself with the other governments of the western hemisphere in the war against the Axis."

Sir,—

I have the honour to inform you that as the Canadian Custodian may shortly issue an Order under the Regulations respecting Trading with the Enemy, permitting personal remittances to be made to Belgium, the Bank of Canada desires to explore with the Banque Nationale de Belgique the possibility of obtaining from them, against Canadian dollars, the Belgian francs required for this purpose.

2. I should therefore greatly appreciate it if you would convey the following message to the Banque Nationale de Belgique from the Bank of Canada:

"In the event of the Canadian Government agreeing to the remittance of funds to Belgium for such purposes as support and maintenance would you be willing to provide us with francs against Canadian dollars to be placed to your credit here and to be available for the needs of your Government in Canada. If it should develop later that the Canadian dollars so credited are surplus to Belgian requirements we should be prepared to convert to gold or United States dollars. If you agree please advise terms and conditions. On assumption you would be prepared to deal at mid-rates we would suggest rate of 39.69 francs per dollar Canadian based on rate of 176⅝ to the pound converted at 4.45. We should transfer francs obtained from you in round amounts to the accounts maintained by our banks with their correspondents in Belgium through which remittances would be channelled."

3. I should be glad if the reply of the Banque Nationale de Belgique to the Bank of Canada could be transmitted through the Embassy at your early convenience.

No. 1279 Ottawa, February 15, 1945

Sir:—

I have the honour to bring to the knowledge of Your Excellency that for some time the need had been felt for working out the means for settlement between the Canadian and Belgian Governments with regard to the Belgian currency issued to the Canadian Army operating in or near Belgium.

Baron Silvercruys, former Belgian Ambassador to Canada, initiated conversations on this subject with responsible Canadian authorities.

Baron Boël, Counsellor of the Belgian Government, came to this country with a view of discussing the various aspects of the whole problem. A general agreement was reached as a conclusion of several meetings with officials of the Canadian Departments of External Affairs, National Defence and Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada. In accordance with this agreement an account will be opened in the name of the Belgian Government at the Bank of Canada. This account will be credited on February 15th, 1945, with an initial amount of ten million dollars as a first instalment for the Belgian currency issued to Canadian troops. Pending agreement on the exact rate of exchange further payments will be made monthly as from March the 15th. In this matter I am awaiting a reply from my Government which I will not fail to communicate to Your Excellency.

During his negotiations Baron Boël referred also to the goods and services provided by the Belgian Government to the Canadian Army in Belgium. Owing to the complicated nature of this problem it is being kept in abeyance until further discussions take place between British, Canadian and Belgian authorities.

On behalf of my Government to which I have reported, I wish to express my deep appreciation for the promise of assistance made by the Canadian Government with a view to securing Belgium with an amount of Canadian dollars necessary to cover her purchase of badly needed food-stuffs and raw materials in Canada.

Accept etc.

NOTES OF A MEETING HELD IN THE OFFICE OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY AT 3 P.M., OCTOBER 11, 1945 AND A SECOND MEETING HELD IN THE OFFICE OF THE DEPUTY MINISTER (ARMY), AT 11:30 A.M., OCTOBER 12, 1945

PRESENT:

Messrs. Jacqmin, Gutt, and Couvreur	Government of Belgium
Mr. Alex Ross	Deputy Minister, Army
Mr. R. B. Bryce	Department of Finance
Mr. B. G. McIntyre	Comptroller of the Treasury
Mr. J. O. Hodgkin	Asst. Comptroller of the Treasury
Mr. A. W. Bannard	Chief Treasury Officer, Air

The Office of Mutual Aid, Belgium, have supplied or will supply by November 8, 1945, goods and services to British and Canadian forces to the estimated value of $251,000,000, for which no reimbursement has been made by either the United Kingdom or Canadian governments. It was stated by the Belgian representatives that the existing arrangements are being terminated on November 8, 1945, and that after that date the Belgian Government would expect repayment in cash for all supplies and services furnished to Canadian forces.

Of the $251,000,000, some $3,500,00 or $4,000,000 can be identified as representing indents placed directly with the Office of Mutual Aid by Canadian units or formations. The remainder represents goods and services drawn down for the common use of British and Canadian formations, included in which is the 21st Army group, which group contained Canadian personnel estimated at approximately 20% of the whole. On the broad assumption that Canadian troops participated in Belgian mutual aid in the same proportionate ratio as British troops, it is roughly estimated that Canada's obligation is 20% of $251,000,000 — or some $50,000,000.

It was pointed out that under existing capitation rate agreements with the United Kingdom Government, the British are required to supply everything the Canadian troops need in theatres of operation. Mr. Alex Ross expressed a preference for concluding a capitation rate on an overall basis which would include the cost of goods and services furnished by Belgian Mutual Aid, but instead of Canada's paying the full amount to the British, we would reduce the British claim by an amount representing our share of Belgian Mutual Aid, which latter amount would be paid in Canadian dollars to the Government of Belgium. This method was considered as the most practicable by both the Belgian and Canadian representatives, and it was left to Mr. Ross to instruct the Financial Superintendent, C.M.H.Q., to seek the concurrence of the War Office and the United Kingdom Treasury in the proposal. The Belgians favour the proposal on the grounds that by the Belgian and Canadian Governments dealing on a direct basis with each other, Belgium will procure the credits in Canadian dollars which she desires.

Adverting to the question of determining Canada's proportionate share of the $251,000,000 obligation, it was considered that the most practicable way of arriving at this would be on the basis of comparative strengths — British vs. Canadian — in the theatres where the goods and services were consumed. Whereas we have accurate figures of Canadian strengths, and whereas the British must have similar figures, the allocation of charges on the basis of strengths should be comparatively simple. It is considered especially desirable to adhere to this basis on the grounds that it conforms with the general principles on which the capitation rates were founded.

The discussion then centred on the question of payment by the British Government for surplus war assets sold by the War Assets Corporation to the Belgian Mutual Aid Board. Mr. Jacqmin expressed the desire that these payments be made in Canadian dollars rather than in Belgian francs. It was observed that technically speaking, the payments are due to the War Assets Corporation, a Crown company, rather than to the government.

Mr. Jacqmin stated that, on and after November 8, 1945, Canada will be expected to pay in cash for all supplies and services furnished through the Belgian Office of Mutual Aid, and he further stated that the Belgian Government would prefer if Canada would continue to draw direct from the Belgian Ministry of Finance whatever Belgian francs are required by Canadian paymasters for the pay and allowances of our troops.

The following is the suggested plan for handling the financial transactions arising from the proposed arrangements:

1. Canada will deposit in the Bank of Canada for credit of the Belgian Office of Mutual Aid a sum in Canadian dollars equivalent to Canada's liability for goods and services furnished by reverse mutual aid in the period ending November 8, 1945, such sum to be converted from Belgian francs at the offical rate of exchange.

2. On and after November 9, 1945, the Belgian Office of Mutual Aid will maintain three accounts, namely, a British-Canadian pool account, an account in the name of the Government of Canada, and an account in the name of the United Kingdom Government.

3. To the pool account will be debited the value of all goods and services furnished to British-Canadian Forces which cannot be identified as for the specific end use of either Force. At the close of each month, or at less frequent intervals if considered mutually desirable, the Belgian Office of Mutual Aid will furnish a statement of account to the War Office, and will concurrently send to C.M.H.Q. a copy of such statement. The War Office and C.M.H.Q. will then agree on the proportion of the total charge which is to be assessed against each Force, and will advise the Office of Mutual Aid accordingly.

4. Upon receipt of advice as to the allocation of charges, the Office of Mutual Aid will credit the pool account and debit the accounts of Canada and the United Kingdom with the amounts as indicated on the allocation statement.

5. The Canadian account will also be debited with the value of Belgian francs furnished to our field cashiers and paymasters, and will be credited with the value of surplus assets sold to Belgium by the War Assets Corporation.

6. At agreed intervals the Belgian Office of Mutual Aid will remit to the Government of Canada, Department of National Defence (Army), a cheque in Canadian dollars in the amount of any net credit balance in the account, and will bill National Defence (Army) for any net debit balance, as the case may be.

7. Payments by Canada to Belgium will be made by Receiver General cheque drawn in favour of the Bank of Canada for credit of the account of the Belgian Office of Mutual Aid. Payments by Belgium to Canada will be made by cheques drawn on the Belgian account in the Bank of Canada.

8. The Belgian Office of Mutual Aid will maintain adequate accounting records and will support all entries in Canada's account with satisfactory documents evidencing proof of Canada's obligation to pay, or entitlement to credit, as the case may be.

9. The Belgian Office of Mutual Aid will render their monthly statements of account to C.M.H.Q., London.

10. The Government of Canada will appoint a resident auditor in the Belgian Office of Mutual Aid who will pre-audit the monthly statements of account to facilitate settlement when the statements are received at C.M.H.Q.

11. In the event that a monthly statement of account indicates that Canada is the debtor, C.M.H.Q. will cable advice to N.D.H.Q. of the amount of the obligation, and payment will be made forthwith by the Army Treasury Office as outlined in paragraph (7) above. Conversely, if the statement indicates that Belgium is the debtor, C.M.H.Q. will advise N.D.H.Q. accordingly, and the Belgian Office of Mutual Aid will cable the Bank of Canada to remit the amount of the obligation to the Army Treasury Office.

12. The amounts due the War Assets Corporation as indicated by the audited monthly statements of account, will be made available to the Corporation through the medium of appropriate journal vouchers to be raised by the Army Treasury Office.

Washington, October 15, 1945

Dear Mr. Bryce:

Please find enclosed copy of the letter I am sending to Mr. Ross. It will show you that, after we met on Friday morning, I received the cable from my Government accepting my suggestions.

You already know from Mr. Couvreur, whom I instructed by telephone to inform you on Saturday morning, that my Government cabled their agreement on all the terms proposed for the loan — e.g. on the letter addressed by Mr. Mackintosh to our Ambassador on September 7th,† — and their choice of the 3% rate for a 30 years term loan with reimbursement spread over the thirty years.

I had already cabled, asking my Government to give by cable to Mr. Paternotte de la Vaillee[10] the necessary powers to sign the loan agreement. Anticipating that the loan could be concluded at the very beginning of the week, I further cabled them to instruct our Ambassador to ask at once that, out of the 25 millions, ten millions be transferred to the account of the National Bank of Belgium at the Bank of Canada, and to instruct the National Bank to have those 10 millions transferred to the account of our Economic Mission. I should be glad if all those operations could take place Tuesday or, at the latest, Wednesday October 17th.

Thanking you for the way in which you have — as you always did — understood our position and needs, and collaborated with us,

I am, dear Mr. Bryce,

Yours very sincerely,

Washington, October 15, 1945

Dear Mr. Ross:

Before leaving Washington, I want to thank you for your kind welcome and for the way you have been trying to meet us.

I am glad to be now in a position to tell you that my Government cabled me, accepting the suggestions on which we had tentatively agreed at our meetings, e.g.:

1. Payment in cash for all goods and services supplied prior to November 9th, — the amount of those goods and services to be fixed by a criterion agreed upon; for instance, by the relative proportion of the strength of the Canadian forces to the total strength of the British forces.

2. Payment of goods and services supplied after November 8th, and of the Belgian notes delivered after same date for the pay of the Army — the amount of those goods and services to be established, too, through a proportion calculated in the same manner as under No. 1.

This amount would be charged to a current account, as well as the value of the surplus property delivered to us. A balance would be struck periodically, and paid in dollars to the creditor, whoever he is.

3. Until a settlement has been agreed to concerning No. 1 and 2, no payment would have to be made by us on account of surplus property.

I hope you will early be able either to agree to our suggested formula of calculation, or to suggest another one. You told me you wanted to discuss the matter of the overall cost with our British friends before settling the present matter with us. I do not quite understand the reason for it, as our mutual aid deliveries to Great-Britain are not part of the overall cost of the British soldier and are therefore not to be taken into account in the calculation of the capitation rate, but of course you know better than I do in this regard. What I wish is that you will be, as soon as possible, in a position to mention the bases of a settlement.

Believe me, dear Mr. Ross,

Yours very sincerely,

DESPATCH 131 Rio de Janeiro, June 29, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my despatch No. 98 of the 11th May, which accompanied a draft note submitted by the British Embassy to the Brazilian Foreign Office concerning the position of volunteers of dual nationality who are serving or may serve in the armed forces of the United Kingdom.† Actually, this agreement between Brazil and the United Kingdom was signed on 27th May, and I am enclosing a copy of it as published in the bulletin of the British Community here.†

2. In the last paragraph of my aforesaid despatch, I expressed a desire to be informed as to whether a similar agreement ought not to be concluded between Canada and Brazil. I may now add that a number of Brazilian-Canadian parents whose sons or daughters are serving with the Canadian Forces have asked me about the situation of their children in such cases. I had, of course, to reply that the United Kingdom-Brazil agreement did not apply to those serving in the Canadian Forces. I know of about twelve such cases in Rio de Janeiro alone.

3. I am sending, herewith, a translation of Decree-Law No. 1317 of 2nd June 1939,† in which you will see that a Brazilian-Canadian may lose his Brazilian nationality for serving in the armed forces of another country without having secured permission from the President of the Brazilian Republic. The agreement signed by the United Kingdom is for the purpose of avoiding such sanction.

DESPATCH 147 Ottawa, September 26, 1944

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 131 dated June 29, 1944, relative to your enquiry as to the advisability of an agreement regarding war service between Canada and Brazil, similar to the one reached between Brazil and the United Kingdom on the 27th May, 1944.

The matter was referred to the various governmental departments concerned and while they feel that the number involved will be somewhat small, they all favour such an agreement. They have noted that you are already aware of twelve cases in Rio de Janeiro alone, for whom this agreement might prove beneficiary.

I would, therefore, appreciate it if you would take the necessary steps towards bringing about such an agreement between Canada and Brazil.[11]

TELEGRAM 147 Rio de Janeiro, November 30, 1945

IMMEDIATE. Foreign Minister Vellese and principal economic adviser to Foreign Office requested joint conferences with United States Ambassador Berle and me today. They stated that they had been negotiating with the Argentine Government for resumption of shipment of Argentine wheat to Brazil. These negotiations had broken down, and from the nature of the negotiations and underlying situation, Brazilian Government had reached the conclusion that they could no longer count on continuing supply from the Argentine, at least for the coming year. Embassy is further informed that [11]Il y eut un Échange de notes à Rio de Janeiro le 9 février 1945. Canada, Recueil des traités, 1945, N° 4.

Notes were exchanged at Rio de Janiero on February 9, 1945, Canada, Treaty Series, 1945, No. 4.

Brazilian Government is seriously offended at the Argentine position, describing the situation as blackmail. Commencing with the offer to reopen the wheat trade if 10,000 tires were delivered, Brazil made arrangements to ship 10,000 tires but then was told that 10,000 tires would release shipment of only half of 100,000 tons of wheat which is one month's supply, and this although Brazil has no tires to spare.

Meanwhile, wheat supply in the country has reached dangerously low position so that unless immediate steps are taken there will be bread shortage in January. Brazilian Government justifiably fear that this may occasion considerable social unrest and bad or perhaps dangerous conditions for new Government to commence.

There appears to be slender but probably adequate supply of wheat and flour in the country to cover month of December, but during the month of December flour, not wheat, must be imported to take care of January needs. Supply of wheat must be arranged for later months.

Problem thus boils down to making immediate arrangements for sale and shipment to Brazil during the month of December from Canada and/or United States of 100,000 tons of flour or wheat or combined, to take care of January needs. All wheat would not do because of time element required for milling. Rough guess at Canadian and American Embassies is that at least half should be flour.

Second problem, likewise immediate, must be to secure current wheat supply at the rate of approximately 100,000 tons per month covering year of 1946. Brazilians have reached point at which they are prepared to pay added American or Canadian price so as not to be helpless in the hands of the Argentines. This apparently involves negotiations through Combined Food Board which must be initiated at once.

Problem further requires allocation of adequate transport, Canada and/or United States able to carry 100,000 tons per month. Montreal being closed, winter months would probably involve shipment from United States port except to the extent Halifax might supply part, though later winter months conceivably could be covered from the Pacific coast. Our rough estimate is this would require using 12 Liberty ships for this purpose.

This telegram is sent simultaneously by Canadian and American Embassies and our concrete recommendations are:

First, that immediate arrangements be made for sale and December delivery in Brazil of 100,00 tons of flour or flour and wheat;

Second, that immediate arrangements be made through appropriate channel of Combined Food Board to secure allocation of 100,000 tons of wheat monthly for Brazil, delivery to commence in January and through the year 1946;

Third, that immediate arrangements be made with Shipping Pool to detach equivalent of 12 Liberty ships for this trade.

Though details have not as yet been discussed, it is evident that while trade might go through private channels, Bank of Brazil would guarantee arrangements. Brazilian Government propose immediately to cancel tariff on flour, encourage importation; and will guarantee priority of unloading at Santos and presumably elsewhere if necessary.

Above telegram sent mutatis mutandis to Washington for United States Ambassador today.

TELEGRAM 125 Ottawa, December 15, 1945

IMMEDIATE. Your No. 147 of November 30th, request for wheat from the United States and Canada.

The Brazilian request was considered at the last meeting in Washington of the Cereals Committee of the Combined Food Board. United States officials said that the United States might be able to ship to Brazil 4,000 tons of wheat which had already been ordered. It was not proposed to ship more than this quantity. We understand that the United States Ambassador to Brazil has been so advised and has been instructed to recommend to the Brazilian authorities that they look to Argentina for wheat.

We regret that the supply position in Canada makes it impossible for us to be of assistance. We cannot meet the screened requirements of Western European and other countries who have been old customers of ours and whose dependence on us is greater than that of Brazil. We have fully committed our export surplus for the next five months and yet will fall short of meeting requirements already placed with us. Most of the countries will receive far less wheat from us than they require and some may receive none at all.

Would you please advise the Brazilian authorities.

L'ambassadeur du Chili

Ambassador of Chile to Secretary of State for External Affairs

No. 302 Ottawa, September 7, 1944

Sir,

The Government of Chile has been informed recently that the plants in Trail, Calgary and Welland which were erected in Canada for purposes of national defence are supplying a considerable portion of their production, in the form of nitrate of ammonia, for agricultural uses in the United States.

Furthermore, Press reports in the month of March insisted that these Government plants are permanently destined to the manufacture of fertilizers, with the intention of maintaining production when the war is over for sales in the United States or other world markets. The issues of March 11th and 25th of the Financial Post of Toronto comment on these plans at length. One of these articles reads as follows:

"A chemical triumph has been achieved by the Canadian nitrate of ammonia plants. They were originally constructed to manufacture explosives for Great Britain and now they are producing a substitute for sodium nitrate, a fertilizer which was previously imported from Chile, and the importation of which has been greatly reduced during the war through lack of transportation facilities caused by the submarine warfare.

These nitrate of ammonia plants, which are the property of the Government, were erected at the beginning of the war to meet Great Britain's need for explosives. But the Luftwaffe was not able to destroy the chemical plants of the United Kingdom as they had expected and Great Britain has not required huge supplies of nitrate of ammonia to continue the war. At about the same time there occurred a decrease in the supply of saltpetre coming to the United States from Chile and the Canadian chemists solved the problem of transforming nitrate of ammonia into a nitrate suitable for fertilization, and now the Canadian plants provide a great part of the fertilizers required by the agriculturists of North America. Will Canada be able to continue this procedure after the war? The Canadian plants are now enjoying a very favourable situation but they realize that American investigators will, if they direct their energies to the task, be able to develop a similar fertilizer after the war. However, the Canadian plants believe they will succeed in holding a part of the United States market and perhaps find other foreign markets, improving efficiency of production."

Other reports indicate that the productive capacity of nitrate of ammonia of the three above mentioned plants amounts to 114,000 tons of nitrogen a year, the approximate equivalent of 700,000 tons of Chilean nitrate. As the Canadian soil requires only a relatively small proportion of this new productive capacity, practically all the fertilizers of those plants will be sold in the United States or other markets.

The Government of Chile can not conceal its concern at the possibility of deceased sales of sodium nitrate in the United States and in other world markets arising from the competition offered by the nitrate of ammonia manufactured in the plants which the Government of Canada has erected for purposes of national defence and believes the moment propitious to approach the Canadian Government, taking as a basis Article V of the Commercial Agreement with that country,[12] with the request that the above mentioned plants do not destine their production to normal agricultural uses.

The following considerations move the Government of Chile to make this representation to the Government of Canada:

(a) It must not be forgotten that natural sodium nitrate constitutes one of the basic exports of Chile and is therefore essential for the maintenance of its entire economy. These sales are vital to the very existence of an important section of the Chilean territory, which afford no means of employment other than the exploitation of the natural nitrate.

(b) The normal development of the country could not continue unless its sales of saltpetre were maintained at approximately over the 8% of the world consumption of nitrogen which was the situation before the war. This modest percentage of the world consumption of nitrogen does not assume for other producing countries the importance which it has for Chile. As far as the United States and Canada are concerned, the new plants have been established to meet the urgent needs of a period of emergency and a decreased participation in the sales of that product for normal agricultural uses would not fundamentally affect the entire economic life of the country, as would be the case in Chile.

(c) The United Nations are presently engaged in a struggle for the maintenance of the principles of liberty and the material and moral improvement of humanity. The Government of Chile considers, therefore, that an understanding attitude on the part of the United Nations with regard to this problem of capital importance to a sister country who has cooperated within the full measure of her abilities in the war effort of those Nations would be consistent with the spirit of the principles which they are upholding.

(d) The Government of Chile has made similar representations to the Government of the United States and has also sustained this point of view at the Rio de Janeiro Conference of Foreign Ministers[13] to the end that they might adopt the necessary measures to prevent such serious detriments to the economy of Chile, and that the basic industries might be protected by means of friendly cooperation, based on continental inter-relationships and the recognition of the respective importance of those industries for the nations interested, thus preventing our country from being faced with a crucial situation which would not be in accord with the principles in question.

Although Canada did not participate in the Conference of Foreign Ministers at Rio de Janeiro, I believe that Resolution IX of that Conference is in perfect consonance with the policy of hemispheric cooperation which Canada has been implementing in so exemplary a manner. I take the liberty of reproducing below this Resolution:

"WHEREAS:

1. War conditions have caused some American countries to create, in special cases, emergency industries which normally would be considered without economic justification or contrary to the economic solidarity of America, and

2. It is imperative to avoid, insofar as possible, the injurious consequences of the facts outlined in the above clause relative to the economy of the American countries,

"BE IT RESOLVED:

That the Nations of America will stimulate the development of the basic production of each of them, avoiding as far as possible the establishment or augmentation of industries manufacturing substitute or synthetic products which are economically artificial and which might replace the consumption of natural products available in other American countries, admitting only those indispensable to national defence and always provided that this need can be met satisfactorily by natural products."

Finally, it may be pointed out, in support of the above, that this Resolution IX served as a precedent without doubt for the under-noted Declaration approved at the World Conference on Alimentation and Agriculture held in Hot Springs in 1943, and in which Canada participated:

"The fertilizers and other materials necessary for an intensified production should be made available to agriculturists as soon as possible — preferably nitrates from natural sources, where this is economically feasible."

As is known, this Resolution was adopted after a lengthy debate and replaced a motion proposing the construction of synthetic nitrogen plants in zones distant from existing plants.

The Government of Chile is deeply preoccupied with this situation and manifests to the Government of Canada its vital interest in obtaining its valued cooperation and reaching a mutually satisfactory understanding.

No. 27 Ottawa, October 20, 1944

Sir:

I have the honour to reply to your note No. 302 of September 7, on the subject of the production of nitrate of ammonia in Canada and the possibility of decreased sales of Chilean sodium nitrate in the United States and in other world markets arising from the competition offered by the nitrate of ammonia manufactured in Canadian plants.

The Canadian plants were established on the basis of the forecast of requirements for explosives of the U.K. and Canadian war programs. When the anticipated interference with British chemical production by enemy air action did not occur to the extent envisaged in the forecast, it became possible to produce ammonium nitrate in the form of fertilizer to meet the pressing demands of the food programs of the United Nations. These demands are still urgent and we are moreover advised that there is a serious world shortage of nitrogen for fertilizer in prospect in 1945 and possibly for some years thereafter. There is, therefore, the expectancy that for some time to come both the Chilean and Canadian products will be needed to meet world requirements.

We appreciate fully the concern of the Chilean Government over any threat to an industry of importance to the Chilean economy from emergency industries which normally would be considered without economic justification. We are now examining the ammonium nitrate industry in Canada to determine whether it will be economically justified under peace time conditions. If it proves to be an industry unsound economically and not strategically essential, Government subvention to make it competitive in world markets with Chilean industry is not contemplated.

Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs to Chargé d'Affaires in Chile

DESPATCH 28 Ottawa, October 25, 1945

Sir,

During the visit of the President of Chile to Ottawa,[14] a discussion took place between the members of the President's suite and the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and certain Canadian officials. At this meeting, which was held in the Prime Minister's Office, a number of matters were brought forward by the Chilean representatives, mainly relating to questions of trade between the two countries. The Chilean representatives, in particular, expressed their hope that a larger market would be found in Canada for certain Chilean agricultural products, in particular wine and malt. The possibilities in this respect are being further explored between the Chilean Embassy and the Department of Trade and Commerce. With respect to nitrates, they repeated an earlier request that the countries producing synthetic nitrates should not subsidize their production. They were given a general assurance that the extension of subsidies of this nature was not in accord with the international commercial policies favoured by the Government. They went on to say that their nitrate production for the next eighteen months or two years was already covered by contracts, let or under negotiation, amounting in all to some 2,300,000 tons. This was largely due to the intense shortage created during the war in certain countries, especially in Egypt, and their concern over their markets related to the period after the unusual current demand had diminished to normal proportions.

There was also some discussion about the purchase of ships by Chile in Canada and the Chilean representatives were asked to provide fuller details of what they required, so that it could be seen whether the demand could be met from new construction and from ships available for sale.

Finally, a request previously made by the Chilean Ambassador was repeated, to the effect that Chile would welcome an assurance of support by the Canadian Government for election to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. It was explained in reply that it was not the practice of the Canadian Government to pledge support in advance in a matter of this kind, and that this policy had been followed in connection with elections to the various organs of the League of Nations. The interest of Chile in securing election was warmly appreciated and would, without doubt, be taken into sympathetic consideration by the Canadian delegation to the first Assembly of the United Nations. The Canadian Government was itself concerned with securing the election of Canada to both the Economic and Social Council and the Security Council at this Assembly, but was not seeking definite pledges of support at this time from other Governments.

[Ottawa,] January 4, 1944

I have received your note to Mr. Robertson of January 3rd, concerning the adoption of legislation at the next session to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act. I find that the situation is as follows. It is necessary to substitute, for the Act, an agreement with the Chinese Government, which can be most effectively made in the form of a treaty. A draft treaty has been under consideration for some time. I think that you saw a copy of this draft about a year ago.[15] Some changes of no great importance have been made in it as a result of further interdepartmental consideration, and I now attach a copy of the latest draft.† This has not yet been presented to the Chinese Minister, although its general provisions have been discussed with him. It has the concurrence of the Director of Immigration and of the Under-Secretary of State.

If the presentation of this draft is approved and the Chinese Government accepts it, Parliamentary action would, I think, have to be deferred until the treaty was signed and ready for ratification. An Enabling Bill is essential, since Article 5 over-rides both the Naturalization Act and the Common Law. Such a Bill could include the repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act, to take effect as soon as the treaty became operative.

If we are to get the matter completed during the session, we should start things moving now by approaching the Chinese Government with a definite proposal.

H. W[RONG]

P.S. Since dictating this note, I find that the draft agreement has been considered by the Department of Justice, who have made proposals for a few drafting changes which I am referring to the Legal Adviser for consideration. I expect that you will wish to secure the approval of Council before we submit the draft to the Chinese Minister.

DESPATCH 20 Ottawa, February 17, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that representations have been made here by interested persons with a view to ascertaining whether a portion of Canadian Red Cross Aid to China might be made available to the International Peace Hospitals founded by Dr. Norman Bethune, Canadian surgeon, in Northwest China.

In your despatch No. 234 of December 2nd† you indicate in paragraph 3 that allocation of Red Cross supplies received is made to the National Health Administration, the Chinese Red Cross, the Ministry of Education and the International Relief Committee in order to ensure the widest final distribution of these supplies among medical institutions serving the people of Free China. While it is recognized that the Canadian Government cannot officially request the Chinese Government to lift its blockade on supplies to Communist territory, we wonder whether it would be possible for you to do anything there unofficially to further the humanitarian service projected above by drawing to the attention of the International Relief Committee the continuing interest of the Canadian people in seeing that such Canadian Red Cross Aid as is sent to China is given the widest possible distribution without respect to political affiliation.

DESPATCH 155 Chungking, China, March 4, 1944

Sir:

ENTRY OF CHINESE INTO CANADA

I have the honour to suggest that a reconsideration of the whole procedure required of Chinese who, like Mr. Chang Kia-ngau,[16] desire to enter Canada for business reasons or as tourists, is desirable. Viewed from this distance and without the advantage of previous experience, it appears to me that the system now in use was designed to discourage, not to facilitate, entry — to put obstacles in the way of those who might want to visit Canada. I have listened to many influential Chinese tell stories of the ridiculous (from their point of view) and undignified (from anyone's point of view) experiences they encountered when merely trying to pay a flying visit to Niagara Falls; and at times I have felt a little ashamed. I realize that there was a time when Canadian public sentiment was strongly in favor of maintaining impassable barriers against Orientals; but I imagine that this sentiment has changed in the last few years.

2. I am advised that anyone wanting to proceed to Canada through the United States must wait till he reaches the United States before his entry into Canada can be arranged; and I understand that this is because the port of entry must be specified in the document, a thing that could not be done here as the port to be used would not be known. There is some truth in this, and yet there is an error as well. For a planned trip, the port of entry would be known before the traveller left China.

Minister of Communications of China, 1937-1942; sent to United States on government mission to study economic reconstruction, 1942-1945.

3. The essential points, as I see them, are:

(a) it is desirable that men of the Chang Kia-ngau, banker, industrialist, business man, tourist, student types be encouraged to visit Canada and that all possible obstacles be removed from their paths; and

(b) more is known, or can be ascertained, about any one of this class here in China than can possibly be learned at the point in the U.S. where application would have to be made.

It would appear possible to have "permission to enter" approved here, with a port of entry named, if that is essential, or, in the alternative, to have the permit issued subject to approval as to port of entry at a Canadian or British Consular office in the United States. The important thing is to let the Chinese business man, traveller or student know, before he leaves China, that he will be allowed to enter Canada, and to save him from unnecessary hardships and humiliations when he is in the United States and actually trying to pass into Canada.

4. My whole argument may be based on false premises and on a faulty understanding of the actual situation. If it is, you will be in a position to make the necessary corrections. I am not anxious to have more detail routine work done here than is necessary; but I am quite prepared to undertake many more tasks in order to ensure that, with all necessary safeguards, Chinese of the right character bent on correct and innocent missions will be able to enter Canada smoothly, knowing in advance that they are going to be both allowed to visit Canada and welcomed when they get there. It has surprised me to find that Chinese think they have to suffer more indignities, and be more crudely treated, when going to Canada than when entering the United States. My own impression, gained after much experience, is that the Canadian immigration service is courteous but efficient while the American one is efficient but not courteous.

DESPATCH 163 Chungking, China, March 21, 1944

Sir:

CANADIAN RED CROSS AID TO CHINA

I have the honour to reply to your despatch No. 20 dated February 7, 1944. In this despatch you refer to the continuing interest of the Canadian people in seeing that Canadian Red Cross Aid to China should be distributed without respect to political affiliation and specifically to the representations made to you by persons who are interested in having a portion of the aid made available to the International Peace Hospitals founded in Northwest China by Dr. Norman Bethune.

2. I am glad to be able to state that the Canadian Red Cross Advisory Committee at its monthly meetings of February and March took steps which would seem to ensure that some of the supplies which it is about to receive from Canada will reach these International Peace Hospitals. Before outlining these steps, however, as a matter of record I should like to set forth the system of organization through which Canadian Red Cross supplies are allocated and distributed.

3. As stated in my despatch No. 234 of December 2, 1943,† to which you refer, the United States Red Cross makes allocation of its supplies to four organizations, namely, the National Health Administration, the Chinese Red Cross, the International Relief Committee, and the Ministry of Education.

(a) The National Health Administration includes all government hospitals, government controlled hospitals and health centers throughout the country.

(b) The Chinese Red Cross has its own characteristic activities covering both civilian and military fields.

(c) The International Relief Committee is responsible for relief and medical aid extended to mission hospitals, private hospitals not covered by the other three bodies (including, for instance, the International Peace Hospitals), orphanages, schools and universities not under government control, medical clinics, etc.

(d) The Ministry of Education is responsible for hospitals attached to government medical schools and for government higher schools and colleges.

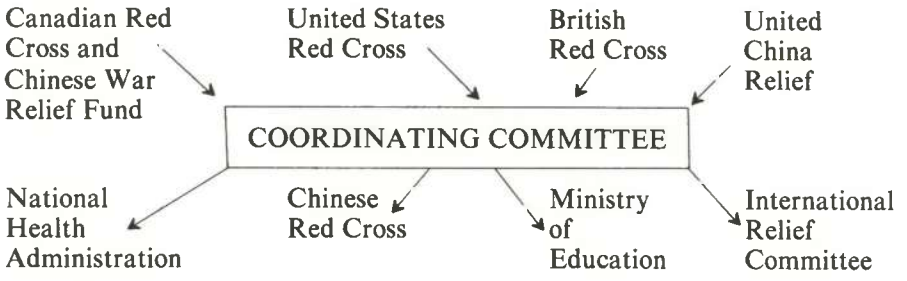
4. In this distribution of responsibility it is believed that all worthy medical organizations in China are covered and the United States Red Cross has agreed to leave to these four bodies the distribution of the supplies which it sends into the country.

5. A similar policy in relation to bringing in and distributing medical supplies has been adopted by the British Red Cross, United China Relief, and finally by the Advisory Committee which represents both the Canadian Red Cross and the Chinese War Relief Fund of Canada. A coordinating committee has been formed representing these four organizations. Dr. Stewart Allen, Chairman of the Canadian Advisory Committee, is the Committee's representative on the coordinating committee. The latter decides on:

(a) The total amount of medical supplies to be brought into China from each source; and

(b) The proportionate distribution which is to be made to the four Chinese bodies mentioned above.

The procedure may be charted thus:



It should be emphasized that this organization functions with respect to medical supplies only and not in relation to allocation of financial grants in aid.

6. Under ordinary circumstances, therefore, a portion of the medical supplies allocated to the International Relief Committee should find its way to the International Peace Hospitals which are of particular interest to many Canadians because of Dr. Norman Bethune's relation to them.

7. It was commonly believed, however, that even if supplies were allocated to the International Peace Hospital or other organizations in Communist territory, they might not reach their destination.

8. The Assistant Director of the International Relief Committee, Dr. T. S. Outerbridge, a Bermudian, who is also a member of the Canadian Advisory Committee, informed this committee in February that a request from the International Peace Hospitals had come to the International Relief Committee and had been granted.

9. Under these circumstances the Canadian Advisory Committee at its February meeting received a request from the China Defence League, of which Madame Sun Yat-sen is chairman, for a direct grant of supplies to the International Peace Hospitals and of money for the relief of orphans and refugees in the Northwest area.

10. The Committee at that time affirmed its adherence to the principle that its grants should be made regardless of the political affiliations of the recipients. Since there was some doubt in the minds of the members as to whether supplies would reach the hospitals in question, the chairman, Dr. Stewart Allen, was asked to confer with Madame Sun Yat-sen and report to the Committee at its March meeting.

11. Dr. Allen reported to the March meeting that medical supplies which had been forwarded to Yenan by trucks which had accompanied Chou En-lai when he travelled from Chungking to Yenan in July, 1943, had reached their destination, and that another shipment was soon going forward with the assurance from government authorities that it also would be permitted to go through. (Dr. Allen personally surmises that it is the intention to have this shipment go on the convoy which will take the press correspondents on the proposed trip to the Communist area early in April.)

12. On receiving Dr. Allen's report the Canadian Advisory Committee at once recommended that a grant of medical supplies be made to the International Peace Hospitals plus a cash grant of CN$200,000[17] to the China Defence League for the relief of orphans and refugees. Dr. Allen and Dr. Outerbridge were requested to draw up the list of supplies which are to be taken from the goods already ordered from Canada.

13. It is not clear at this time of writing whether this allocation of supplies to the International Peace Hospitals will be approved by the coordinating committee as an allotment in excess of the allocations already made to the International Relief Committee or whether it will be taken out of the allocations already made to that committee. Dr. Allen will urge the former course. In any case, Canadian donors may be assured that a designated portion of medical supplies from Canada have been channelled through the Canadian Advisory Committee in Chungking to the International Peace Hospitals.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 29, 1944

I am enclosing herewith copy of despatch No. 155 of March 4th from the Canadian Minister (now Ambassador) in Chungking suggesting that the procedure governing the entry of bona fide Chinese visitors to Canada be re-examined with a view to enabling bankers, industrialists, businessmen, tourists, students and other such desirable classes to visit Canada more readily.

The opening of the Canadian Legation in China and its recent elevation to the status of Embassy is evidence of the importance which the Government attaches to the maintenance of close and friendly relations with our Chinese ally, both during the war and afterwards. In order to assist our Ambassador in China in his work we have, as you know, been giving consideration to the progressive removal of technical obstacles to good relations between our two countries.

Among such obstacles our immigration laws and regulations bulk larger than is their intent, and have become a symbol of racial discrimination. We hope that the new Sino-Canadian Immigration Treaty, which is now being negotiated, will go a long way toward the removal of this misunderstanding.

[17]Chinese National.

I wonder if, as General Odlum suggests, it would not be helpful to the forging of good relations between Canada and China if we were, at this time, to re-examine our immigration regulations and practices as they apply to Oriental visitors in order to eliminate, without contravening the spirit of the Immigration Acts, technical difficulties that have been put in the way of their entry into Canada. I think there is a good deal to be said for an arrangement which would permit our Embassy in Chungking to tell prospective Chinese visitors in each case whether or not they will be admitted to Canada temporarily. If approval of a visit were granted in advance it would clearly be desirable for formalities at the border to be reduced as far as possible.

I should be grateful if you would be so good as to give your consideration to the suggestion which the Ambassador has made and let me have your views concerning the matter.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington together with a request that he make any observations which he may consider pertinent.

Memorandum du deuxième secrétaire, l'ambassade aux États-Unis, au ministre-conseiller, l'ambassade aux États-Unis

Memorandum from Second Secretary, Embassy in United States, to Minister-Counsellor, Embassy in United States

[Washington,] April 11, 1944

Re: General Odlum's suggestions to facilitate the entry of bona fide Chinese visitors to Canada

The situation here is different inasmuch as United States citizens wishing to enter Canada do not need Canadian visas, and it is easy whenever we receive application for entry from Chinese to obtain Immigration's approval by teletype. We are, of course, in a position to tell Ottawa the port of entry, which will be used and the approximate date of entry.

But it is certainly anomalous that this Embassy, purely on account of its geographical proximity should be in a position to tell Chinese applicants whether they may enter Canada or not, while our Embassy in China, which necessarily receives far more applications, cannot do so.

It is highly desirable that such procedure along the lines suggested by General Odlum be devised. General Odlum suggests two alternatives: (a) to have "permission to enter" approved at our Embassy with a port of entry named, or (b) have a permit issued subject to approval as to the port of entry at a Canadian or British Consular Office in the United States.

In my mind procedure (b) although satisfactory in wartime because Chinese visitors travel to Canada via the U.S. would not be practicable in peace time when direct communcations are resumed. Inasmuch as we are considering making a change in the procedure, we might as well adopt procedure (a) which will be workable now and after the war.

If steps are taken to facilitate the issuance of visas by our Chungking Embassy to Chinese visitors, it would be desirable at the same time to give attention to the more general question of the issuance of visas by Canadian consular and diplomatic officers abroad, and the conditions under which these visas may be issued.

As it is, the Immigration Branch is for all practical purposes the only agency competent to decide whether or not a person may be admitted to Canada. The main criticism against this system is that the entry of aliens tends to be regarded solely from the Immigration standpoint. The present request from our Chungking Embassy is as good an example as any of the shortcomings of this procedure. A person who is not a good immigrant or non-immigrant under our Immigration law may be a very desirable visitor and vice versa. This goes to prove that the Immigration Branch is one agency concerned with the entry of aliens in Canada, but by no means the only one. Another disadvantage of the present system is that mentioned incidentally by General Odlum in his despatch. The officer abroad generally knows more about the character of the applicant or is in a better position to find out than anyone else. He should, therefore, be given a good deal more authority regarding a decision of this kind than he has at present.

It may be interesting to note that the authority to decide whether any person may be admitted in the U.S. lies with the Visa Division of the State Department in consultation with other departments and consular representatives abroad. I am attaching herewith a short memorandum† setting forth the rules under which visas are issued to aliens who wish to enter the U.S. during wartime. Now that the Chinese Exclusion Laws have been repealed, applications from Chinese are dealt with under the same rules as applications from nationals of other countries. The point which this memo makes abundantly clear is that the question of admissibility into this country is not left mostly to the Immigration authorities.

A satisfactory solution regarding the disposal of applications for entry into Canada would probably necessitate the setting up of a Visa Section within our Diplomatic Division which in consultation with other departments including Immigration will have final authority in the matter. The establishment of a visa section is warranted by the coming expansion of our consular service and the growing importance of our diplomatic establishments abroad.

As a preliminary step, I would suggest that our missions abroad be asked to submit their views as to the best procedure to follow relative to the issuance of visas.

Le directeur de l'Immigration, le ministère des Mines et des Ressources, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Director of Immigration, Department of Mines and Resources, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, April 22, 1944

I have read with a great deal of interest copy of despatch No. 155 of March 4th, from the Canadian Ambassador in Chungking dealing with the entry to Canada of Chinese visitors, which accompanied your letter of the 29th ultimo, and I fully agree that everything possible should be done to remove the difficulties referred to by General Odlum.

Having been closely associated with the administration of immigration legislation governing Chinese for the past 50 years, I venture to record herein some facts and comment which I hope will be of value in dealing with this difficult problem in Chungking and assist in dispelling some of the erroneous beliefs of the Chinese in regard to the application of the present Act.

An examination of immigration statistics will show that the Chinese Immigration Act of 1906 did not effectively control the admission of Chinese to Canada and that immediately after the last war there was a determined and partially successful attempt to secure the admission to Canada of Chinese labourers first as merchants and later as students. It is not necessary to relate here all the various administrative measures adopted to control these movements, but it became apparent that legislative action was the only solution to the problem.

In June, 1923, the present Act was passed and, while the same provided for the admission of merchants and university students, it prohibited the admission of wives and children, restricted Chinese to certain ports of entry and effectively put an end to the admission of Chinese immigrants; it did not provide for the entry of tourists, business and professional classes, etc., unless the use of the Minister's permit can be described as such. It can thus readily be seen that educated Chinese who became conversant with the Act would be apt to resent and criticize the same.

Resentment of the provisions of the Act has been expressed in the form of complaints of discourteous treatment of tourists and other Chinese visitors by Canadian officers, claims of refusal to admit high ranking persons at Canadian ports, etc., and these complaints have, on occasion, been widely circulated. I have no doubt it is some of these stories to which the Ambassador refers in paragraph one of his note of March 4th. A number of instances that are recited never occurred and other complaints, on investigation were found to be unfounded.

It will be observed that the very terms of the Chinese Act make its administration difficult and subject to misunderstanding and criticism. For instance, to limit the entry of visitors and tourists to certain specified ports, to subject such persons to manifesting on trains, would be impracticable and the Department has, therefore, to some extent regulated non-immigrant traffic by the intent rather than by the letter of the law. The instructions contained in Departmental Official Circular No. 22, of which copy is attached,† will illustrate this point.

The Ambassador refers to Chinese paying flying visits to Niagara Falls and the difficulties experienced in doing so. Canadian officers have always facilitated such visits from the United States, but the situation at Niagara Falls illustrates a difficulty with which Canadian officers are sometimes confronted, necessitating delicate handling of individual cases. Until recently United States Immigration officials considered that if a person of Chinese origin left the United States without pre-investigation establishing readmissibility, he could only again secure re-entry upon fully complying with the law. This meant considerable inquiry and, of course, delay. At Niagara Falls our officers made it a practice of securing verbal assurance of re-entry from United States officers opposite, if such assurance was not forthcoming and this occasionally happened, the applicant was told that compliance with his request for entry would cause him embarrassment. Strange to say when a situation such as this arose, the resultant annoyance was usually directed against Canada. The same situation sometimes developed at other border ports in dealing with Chinese citizens temporarily in the United States who applied for entry to Canada for short visits.

I believe I am correct in stating that since the present Chinese Act came into effect no Chinese citizen of the classes mentioned in paragraph 5 (a) of the Ambassador's despatch, coming to Canada for a temporary purpose from abroad, has been refused entry to this country on the ground of race. There have been instances of Chinese coming from the United States with the intention of returning thereto not being admitted for the reasons set out in the proceding paragraph.

The recent change in the United States law relating to Chinese whereby such persons are now dealt with in the same manner as other races, has simplified the problem of Canadian inspectional officers on the International Boundary because the matter of their return to the United States without difficulty can be determined with reasonable accuracy by our officers. This fact will eliminate some of the troubles that have existed in the past and that unfortunately have all too frequently been laid at our door.

Dealing now with the main point raised in the Ambassador's despatch, there is no objection to the Embassy granting visas without reference to Ottawa, to visitors of the classes described in the despatch. Our officers will be instructed that the presentation of passports duly vised will indicate that the Embassy has conducted the necessary inquiries and established the bona fides of the applicant.

In the case of merchants and students described in Section 5, (i) (ii) of the Chinese Act, the requirements are not so simple. Experience has proven that many Chinese desiring admission to Canada for permanent residence as merchants are really clerks and sometimes labourers. They present manufactured evidence indicating investments in Chinese firms in Canada; investigating at this end establishes the investment claim is false and frequently discloses that the firm is nothing more than a small shop in the Chinese section of one of our larger cities. Investigation in this class of case at this end is essential.

In the student case evidence of admissibility to a Canadian university should be in possession of the applicant and he should also establish that his finances are sufficient before being granted a visa.

Both merchants and students should bring with them three small photographs which will be required by the Department for their certificates and official records as required by the provisions of the present Act.

There will not likely be immigrant merchants coming from China during the war, but I understand from correspondence exchanged that some students will be coming forward; as they will not be admitted at Vancouver or Victoria as called for by the Act and will travel via the United States, we should have advance advice from the Embassy of their expected arrival and port of entry so that appropriate instructions may be issued to the officers concerned.

I realize that this letter is rather lengthy and has dealt with points somewhat beyond the Ambassador's inquiry. I have, however, felt that an outline of the problems caused by existing legislation and the means taken by this Service to overcome them would be of interest to the Ambassador and his staff. I know that General Odlum has had numerous opportunities to judge the work of the Inspectional Staff of the Immigration Service and the kindly reference to the same in the closing sentence of his despatch is much appreciated.

Sir:

With reference to your despatch No. 155 of March 4th concerning the entry of Chinese visitors into Canada I have the honour to enclose herewith copy of a confidential letter of March 29th sent to the Director of Immigration forwarding copy of your despatch under acknowledgment and copy of Mr. A. L. Jolliffe's reply thereto dated April 22nd. You will note that the Director of Immigration has gone to considerable trouble to prepare a full explanation of the present regulations.

2. I may also say for your own information that consideration is now being given to the modification of existing regulations concerning persons of Chinese race "in transit" or on "temporary visits" to Canada, and that an Order-in-Council may be passed in the near future which would remove any discrimination against persons "in transit" or on "temporary visits" on the ground only that they are of Chinese origin or descent. A copy of the Order-in-Council will be forwarded to you as soon as it is passed.

3. A copy of this despatch is being sent to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington.

Mémorandum au ministre de la Justice

Memorandum for Minister of Justice

[Ottawa,] April 28, 1944

You will recall that on March 31 a short debate occurred in the House in connection with the case of a Chinese woman having United States citizenship who was removed from a train about to enter Canada from Detroit en route to Buffalo. The case received a great deal of attention and emphasized the desirability of doing something to modify the present regulations which are imposed under the Chinese Immigration Act on Chinese persons passing through Canada "in transit".

(2) The regulations concerning the entry of persons of Chinese race for temporary visits are also very strict and these will undoubtedly be subject to criticism in the near future unless they are modified. In the same way, strict regulations which should be altered affect the position of Chinese persons domiciled in Canada who leave Canada for the purpose of temporary visits.

(3) This entire matter has been discussed with the Immigration Branch of the Department of Mines and Resources and agreement has been reached on the attached Recommendation to Council.† The matter has not been placed before the Prime Minister, but I doubt if there will be any need or if it would be desirable to wait for his return. It is possible that in the interim, cases might occur which would give very undesirable further publicity to the existing position. Moreover, if the order were passed, it could be presented as being the first step toward the ultimate settlement of the Chinese immigration position which was foreseen by the Prime Minister in his brief remarks in the House concerning the negotiations for an immigration treaty.[18] The recommendation attached would go part way toward the final position contemplated and would not conflict with any of the terms under consideration.

(4) You will note that the proposed order would be under the War Measures Act. This may seen somewhat anomalous, but the reason for doing this arose out of the fact that the "in transit" regulations have regard in particular to the movement of indentured Chinese labour from China to the West Indies and from the West Indies to China through Canada. For the duration of the war this traffic does not exist. It is therefore possible under the War Measures Act to deal with the matter of a temporary basis without having to consider the technicalities that would be involved if a permanent settlement of the position of "in transit" indentured labour were to be considered. At the end of the war this aspect will have to be covered and the necessary consideration can be given without promoting any enquiry, if it is obviously necessary to make some new peacetime provision.

(5) If you approve, I shall inform the Director of Immigration that he might place this matter before Mr. Crerar for presentation to Council.

(3) Notwithstanding anything provided in the Immigration Act, the Chinese Immigration Act, or any Order or Regulation made thereunder, no person shall be denied entry to Canada for a temporary visit at a port of entry on the ground only that he is of Chinese origin or descent or that he is applying at a port other than one designated in Section 7 of the Chinese Immigration Act.

(4) Notwithstanding the requirements of Section 24 of the Chinese Immigration Act, registration as required by Section 23 of the said Act shall not limit the person so registering to one visit abroad during the period of validity of the said registration provided such registration is effected subsequent to May 1st, 1944, and the final visit is not extended beyond the period of registration as defined by Order in Council P.C. 10160 dated the thirty-first day of December 1941.†

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa,] June 2, 1944

THE CHINESE IMMIGRATION TREATY

1 — Dr. Liu, the Chinese Ambassador, called on the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning to discuss the proposed Immigration Treaty between Canada and China. Mr. Robertson asked Mr. Keenleyside to participate in this discussion.

2 — Dr. Liu stated that, after careful examination, his government had found it impossible to accept the principle on which the draft treaty was based. The Chinese objections are:

A — that the treaty, while in form reciprocal as betweeen China and Canada, was in fact discriminatory because it would establish a distinction in Canadian policy between the admission of Chinese and of other foreigners to Canada.

B — that, if accepted by China, the treaty would be seized upon as a precedent by other countries that desired to prevent Chinese immigration.

3 — Dr. Liu pointed out that a number of other countries — chiefly in Central America — had recently abolished their regulations which prevented the entry of Chinese immigrants. The Chinese Government hopes that Canada will do the same. He added that the Chinese Government is not anxious to foster emigration and would, in fact, impose very strict controls against any large scale movement to Canada or elsewhere.

4 — It was pointed out to Dr. Liu that Canada is in a very different position from Cuba, Trinidad or Honduras, and that even the solution adopted by the United States (the establishment of a quota under the general United States scheme of immigration control) would be practically impossible in this country. It was added that, although the proposed treaty did provide a special regime for Chinese wishing to enter Canada, it was a regime under which, in certain conditions, Chinese would actually be favoured in comparison with other peoples. Moreover, insofar as the treaty might be considered discriminatory, it was mutually so — Canadians going to China would be treated exactly as would Chinese coming to Canada. Finally, it was argued that even if the proposed treaty was not perfect, it would represent a very material advance on the present position and might eventually be employed as a stepping stone to something better.

5 — In the course of the discussion, which lasted over an hour, it was also pointed out to Dr. Liu that there could be little hope of the present Chinese Immigration Act being repealed unless some workable agreement could be reached; that political and demographic conditions in Canada would make it quite illusory to hope for a complete relaxation of the rules against Chinese immigration in any foreseeable future. The failure to maintain strict control over the influx of Chinese, if it should come about, would, moreover, make it proportionately more difficult to remove the few remaining handicaps under which persons of Chinese race now in Canada suffer.

6 — Dr. Liu was clearly not optimistic that his Government would be prepared to accept the argument that half a loaf of bread was better than no cake. He agreed, however, to explain the Canadian viewpoint again to Chungking and was obviously sorry that it has been impossible to make progress towards agreement.

7 — If the Chinese Government are determined to insist upon complete equality for their nationals under the Canadian immigration regulations, there would seem to be no alternative to the maintenance of the present Chinese Immigration Act. Any movement towards the repeal of that Act, which was not accompanied by the concurrent implementation of a new policy that would provide effective control, would cause immediate and grave difficulties in British Columbia. And under present circumstances the attitude of British Columbia would be likely to receive strong support elsewhere in Canada.

8 — The next step would seem to be clearly up to Chungking. It has been explained that Canada cannot accept the ideal solution desired by the Chinese Government. Ottawa has, however, made a useful and a friendly offer. On second thought perhaps China will be willing to accept this offer rather than face an indefinite continuance of the present situation.

SECRET [Ottawa,] February 5, 1945

I am rather concerned over two or three points on which General Odlum has placed emphasis during discussions in the Department.[19] As he will be seeing you tomorrow afternoon, I am sending you this note.

General Odlum admits that there is no real chance of Chinese troops proving to be of military value in defeating the Japanese. He has argued strongly since his return from Chungking that despite this, we should send arms and munitions, under Mutual Aid or otherwise, to the Chungking Government on the ground that it is so much in our interest to maintain Chiang Kai-shek in power, both now and after the war, that we should grant military assistance of this nature. He maintains that the United States has aided Chiang Kai-shek for this purpose, but this has been denied in Washington. It would certainly not be in accordance with the Mutual Aid Act for us to supply munitions to China unless we were satisfied that they would contribute to winning the war against the Japanese to such a degree as to deserve priority over other destinations. It seems to me that it would be dangerous for us to adopt the course which he suggests, which could be regarded as interfering in internal Chinese affairs.

General Odlum is also very critical of the current United States policy of "compelling" the Kuo Min-tang to reach an agreement with the Communists in Yenan, and he considers that Canada should not support any such effort to bring about internal unity in China. I doubt that we could do very much one way or the other to influence a solution of this Chinese internal problem, except that General Odlum's personal prestige in Chungking is high and he might on his return be able to encourage the Generalissimo to resist United States pressure. Here too, I feel that we should follow a policy of "hands off".

The general wishes to secure from you some guidance as to the line he should take on his return to China, and it seems likely that he will raise with you particularly these two matters of military supplies for Chiang Kai-shek and of his dislike of the new United States policy towards the Communists.[20]

DESPATCH 465 Chungking, China, October 9, 1945

Sir,

CHINESE IMMIGRATION "DISCRIMINATION"

I have the honour to advise you that on a number of occasions recently Chinese friends of mine have called my attention to a report from Washington, dated Sept. 27, announcing that representatives Helen Douglas and Frank Havenner have introduced identical bills in Congress to remove discrimination against American citizens of Chinese origin. (I am enclosing herewith a copy of the Central News Agency despatch which made the news public in Chungking.)†

2. Ever since coming to China I have waited patiently for a lead from the Department as to the course Canada proposes to follow in connection with the rectification of Chinese immigration restrictions. On all occasions I have defended Canada's position and I am, of course, quite prepared to continue doing so. Canada's case is a good one, based upon the assumption that the conditions which prevailed when it was formulated still exist. But any thoughtful person must agree that the assumption is not sound. There have been very important changes, not the least of which is the complete elimination of Japan from the picture. Japan has eliminated itself.

3. All will agree that Japanese must be completely barred from Canada for a long time to come. But the same unanimous judgment will not extend to the Chinese. True, the old major consideration does still prevail — China has an overwhelming number of people of a very low standard of living, available for migration. Canada cannot accept many of them, without endangering her own approved. W. L. M. K[ing] 10-2-45.

economy and standards. China knows this and knows that there must be restrictions on the possible flow from China to Canada. But the restrictions should not, however, be on racial grounds. We must not exclude a man because he is a Chinese; but we may control his movement to Canada because he represents a migratable group beyond our capacity to assimilate.

4. It seems to me that the token acceptance of Chinese immigration, such as the Americans have adopted is the correct answer. Based upon American and Canadian populations, the relative proportions should be as 10 to 1; that is, if the Americans admit 105 per year as acceptable immigrants, Canada should accept 10. But based upon the relative Chinese populations of the two countries, the proportion, I think, would be about 3 to 1; or 35 Chinese immigrants permitted per year to enter Canada as against 105 for the United States.

5. I sincerely hope that Canada will raise the issue herself before it becomes important in the eyes of the Chinese. At the present moment, the position of Canada in China is exceedingly good. This favorable atmosphere should, I submit, be capitalized and a definite effort should be made to reach a happy understanding on a reciprocal basis. If Canada allows a certain number of Chinese to migrate to Canada, a similar privilege should be extended to Canadians by China; and, above everything else, the rights (of property ownership, for example) extended to Chinese in Canada should be extended to Canadians in China. May I urge that this matter be given renewed study?

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir:

CHINA WAR RELIEF FUND & "BETHUNE" HOSPITALS

I have the honour to advise you that I have twice within the last few days, talked with Madame Sun Yat-sen in connection with the suggestion that the China War Relief Fund of Canada, acting through the Friend's Ambulance Unit (under Dr. R. McClure) and cooperating with the China Defence League (henceforth to be known by its new name of the China Welfare League), the head of which is Madame Sun Yat-sen, should take over the task of restoring the "Peace" or "Bethune" Hospitals, a name they bear because of the association with them of a famous Canadian who lost his life in China during the war. At present they are "cave" hospitals, in the Northern or "border" area. My second visit to Madame Sun was to meet Chou En-lai, who speaks for the Communist Party as its senior representative in Chungking now that Mao Tze-tung has gone North again.

2. Both Madame Sun and Chou En-lai welcomed the suggestion that Canada should take major interest in the Bethune hospitals, and make of them an institution that will be recognized as predominantly Canadian. I made it quite clear that I had no thought that Canada should take over full responsibility. The responsibility would continue to rest on Chinese shoulders, Canada merely appearing as a friendly helper. If Canada were ever to play a greater role, it would only be by agreement following frank negotiation.

3. Chou En-lai suggested that if the C.W.R.F. in Canada approved the general proposal, a committee of three should be set up to supervise and be responsible for the undertaking, but not to assume the burden of direct administration. He named Madame Sun Yat-sen, Dr. Sun Fo[21] and myself — Madame Sun representing the "left" and the China Defence League, Dr. Sun Fo, in person but not officially, representing the Central Government, and myself representing Canada. The hospitals would be actually administered jointly by the F.A.U. and the China Defence League, under an agreement to be worked out.

4. No commitment has been made, but the prospects seem promising. If the project is carried through, it will establish Canadian prestige in the North as it is already established, through the West China Union University, in Szechwan.

5. This despatch, of course, does not suggest any action. It is merely intended to bring your information up to date pending approval by the C.W.R.F. of the proposal put forward by the China committee.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au ministre de Grande-Bretagne à Cuba

Ottawa, January 22, 1945

Sir,

I wish to refer to the matter of the effective extension of the Cuban flour import subsidy to Canadian flour, as a question of concern to the Canadian Government.

The difficulty arises from an agreement reached recently between the Cuban Minister of Commerce and a committee of flour importers of the Havana Produce Exchange, the pertinent excerpt from which is as follows:

"(a) The importers, on behalf of themselves and in the name of the other members of the Chamber, undertake beginning to-morrow to acquire in the United States of America wheat flour in sufficient quantities for the necessities of the country, although this promise is conditional upon the shipping facilities granted by the United States and by the Government of Washington allowing for the situation that prevails.

"(b) On his part, the Minister of Commerce in the name of the Government, guarantees that he will arrange official measures to assure to each importer who makes importations into Cuba of wheat flour without the special subsidy of $2.70 per 200# which was enjoyed on the product up to the present, a domestic subsidy equivalent to the difference between the general subsidy which rules at the time of shipment and the expressed subsidy of $2.70, plus the difference that results by reason of the 2% tax on the export of money and the 1/10 bank exchange and the 2% consular charges on the mentioned difference."

It is not clear whether the agreement limits the flour to that of United States origin. The Cuban Minister of Commerce did not specify any point of origin but did base the import subsidy calculation on the difference between the United States general export flour subsidy and the special flour subsidy.

[22]Non trouvé./Not located.

We are naturally anxious to have the subsidy apply to Canadian flour and also to flour milled in bond in the United States from Canadian wheat. Although Canadian flour has not been exported in large volume to Cuba in recent years because of the United States subsidies and the Cuban tariff restrictions, nevertheless, over 90% of the Cuban flour importations were exported from the United States in bond mills located in Buffalo. These mills ground Canadian wheat exclusively for export to Cuba and obviously cannot continue to utilize Canadian wheat unless their exports participate in the Cuban import subsidy.

I understand that this question has been brought to your attention also by L. A. Cabrera and Company Ltd, agents of the Maple Leaf Milling Company Limited, and that the Canadian Trade Commissioner in Havana has been furnished with copies of the agreement and other correspondence.

I should appreciate your consideration of the matter and if in your opinion it is one that can appropriately be discussed with the Cuban authorities informally, will you be kind enough to make such representations as you think desirable? If you find that any formal representations are necessary, I shall be glad to forward a note for that purpose.

DESPATCH 93 Havana, November 19, 1945

RESTRICTED

Sir,

I have the honour to enclose copies of the following documents† relating to proposals that have been recently made by the directors of Canadian life insurance companies in Cuba, after conversations with persons interested in promoting the sales of Cuban cigars abroad, looking to the possibility of opening the Canadian market to Cuban cigars in exchange for a relaxation of Cuban taxes on capital invested abroad.

1. Memorandum by Mr. William A. Campbell, Chairman of the Life section of the Cuban Union of Representatives of Insurance Companies, re: Tax on Capital invested abroad.

2. Letter from Mr. H. A. Chisholm, Manager for Cuba of the Sun Life Assurance Company, to Roy C. Grant, dated Nov. 9.

3. Letter and enclosed memorandum by J. L. Mutter, Commercial Secretary, Canadian Legation, to Mr. C. M. Croft, dated Nov. 9.

Mr. Campbell called on me on November 10, to leave his memorandum and explained that Canadian Companies had heretofore received some protection under Article 4 of the Anglo-Cuban Commercial treaty but that, with the establishment of the Canadian Legation here in Havana, Cuban Government officials argued that Canadian Life Assurance companies should no longer enjoy this privilege. They were prepared, he said, to negotiate the matter and suggested that Canada should make Cuba some trade concession in return for a relaxation of the tax on capital invested abroad which is on the statute books now but has never been collected. Whether the idea of Canada offering customs concessions to Cuban cigars originated with the Cuban Government or with one of the Canadian Life Insurance Company managers (possibly Mr. Chisholm) is of little importance. It is, however, of interest, that as Mr. Campbell points out, the suggestion appealed to the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the President himself. I told Mr. Campbell that I would be glad to transmit his memorandum to you but pointed out that balancing two such different concessions would be difficult. I said that I hoped that eventually Cuba and Canada might conclude a general commercial treaty but that discussions of its terms should probably better wait until the conclusion of Anglo-U.S. and Canadian trade and loan discussions in Washington were completed and it was possible to see what the future of the Empire preference system was.

Mr. Chisholm's proposals which as you can see he took up with Mr. Mutter just before his departure are along similar lines to those made by Mr. Campbell in his memorandum. Mr. Mutter has not yet received a copy of Mr.

Chisholm's letter to Mr. Roy C. Grant and I should be grateful if you would be good enough to let him see a copy of the letter as well as Mr. Campbell's memorandum while he is in Ottawa. He will of course be in a good position to discuss these suggestions with you within the framework of possibilities for the future development of trade between Canada and Cuba.

RESTRICTED

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my despatch No. 93 of November 19 enclosing copies of certain documents relating to a proposal that Canada grant certain customs privileges to Cuban cigars in return for taxation concessions to Canadian insurance companies. With this despatch, I enclose a copy of a memorandum prepared by the Cuban Union of Insurance Company Representatives,† and submitted to my colleague, the United Kingdom Minister, pointing out that the reception given to the Cuban trade delegation visiting Great Britain now with a view to securing the reopening of the United Kingdom market to Cuban cigars will have a direct bearing on the attitude which the Cuban Government will take toward the adjustment of taxation claims against foreign insurance companies for the capital they have invested abroad.

You are aware that Canadian insurance companies have received a measure of protection heretofore under Article 4 of the Anglo-Cuban Commercial Treaty. I understand from my colleague, Mr. Dodds, that Mr. H. A. Chisholm, Manager for Cuba of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, accompanied the group of British Fire and Marine Hazard Assurance Company representatives when they left the enclosed memorandum with him. As you may observe, the memorandum, itself, does not suggest that the Canadian companies should not continue to receive the benefit of protection given them under the terms of the Anglo-Cuban Commercial Treaty whose provisions have been suspended during the period of the war because of the United Kingdom import difficulties. Now that Canada has established separate diplomatic representation here in Cuba, I doubt if Canadian companies can claim protection under the Anglo-Cuban Commercial Treaty much longer. Accordingly, it would seem advisable to bear in mind, when the terms of any future Cuban-Canadian commercial treaty are being considered, the desirability of incorporating an article which would protect Canadian insurance firms and banks against what they consider as arbitrary taxation policies of the Cuban Government.

Le directeur, relations commerciales, le ministère du Commerce, au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Director, Commercial Relations, Department of Trade and Commerce, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, December 29, 1945

This Division has been considering despatches (Numbers 93 and 96) from the Canadian Minister to Cuba regarding the suggestion that tariff concessions be granted on Cuban cigars in return for an undertaking by Cuba to relax the tax on capital invested abroad by foreign insurance companies operating in Cuba.

This matter as it relates to the Canadian Customs Tariff is primarily one of concern to the Department of Finance. We have, however, some observations which may have a bearing on more general aspects of the question.

It is suggested that a large proportion of the cigars that might be imported into Canada under lower rates of duty would be purchased by U. S. tourists in Canada to take home under the provisions of the $100 exemption. If this should turn out to be the case, it would automatically have the unfortunate effect that to the extent the tourists took home Cuban cigars, their other purchases in Canada would be reduced. In any case the United States Tariff Act permits the importation of not more than 100 cigars under the tourist privilege.[24] If there should develop any large importation of Cuban cigars from Canada, there might be a disposition in the United States to reduce even further the number of cigars allowed entry or to place new restrictions upon the general privilege. We should deprecate any action which might lead the United States authorities to give consideration to withdrawing or reducing the privilege as it exists.

We doubt also the wisdom of granting a tariff concession under the threat of a confiscatory tax on insurance companies. We desire to obtain more favourable tariff treatment in Cuba for Canadian products. Particularly we should like to see the surcharges which sometimes apply to Canadian products removed and we should like to obtain most-favoured-nation treatment. To this end it would be desirable to retain our bargaining position in respect of an important Cuban export commodity like cigars.

It may well be that there are good reasons why the Canadian tariff on high quality cigars should be reduced in the interests of our own consumers and the Canadian revenue. Even so, we should prefer to try to obtain suitable and adequate trade concessions in return. Cuba is to be one of the "drafting" countries in the series of bilateral trade negotiations to be undertaken in the spring. We shall accordingly doubtless be negotiating an agreement with Cuba at that time. It is suggested that the question of the taxation of insurance companies should if necessary be taken up with the whole complex of trade relations and not as an isolated item and if possible a clause similar to article 4 of the Anglo-Cuban Trade Agreement could be inserted in the treaty with Canada. In the meantime we question whether much will be gained by immediate capitulation under a threat of more onerous conditions for our insurance companies, particularly as we understand the same menace applies to United States and United Kingdom companies, notwithstanding the provision in the Anglo-Cuban Trade Agreement.

The relevant article of the Anglo-Cuban Treaty of February, 1939 reads as follows:

"The Government of Cuba agree not to subject British insurance enterprises to legislation imposing conditions which are in any respect more onerous than those already applying to the conduct of their Cuban business."

With regard to the fact that the Convention did not cease on the occurence of war, although its effects were suspended while hostilities lasted — which is also the attitude of the Czechoslovak Government — I would be very grateful if the suspension period could now be terminated, as hostilities have now ceased and the territory of the Czechoslovak Republic is again under the administration of its own government.

The Credit Agreement between Canada and Czechoslovakia was recently increased from $15,000,000 to $19,000,000[26] and will soon be put into force. I would therefore appreciate it very much if the resumption of the Trade Agreement could now be carried out and if it could be used as a basis for the importation of Canadian goods to Czechoslovakia.

Dear Dr. Pavlasek,

I refer to your letter of June 29th in which you asked that as hostilities have now ceased and the territory of the Czechoslovak Republic is again under the administration of its own Government, the suspension period of the Canadian-Czechoslovak Trade Agreement concluded in Ottawa between our two Governmnts on March 15th, 1928, might now be terminated.

I agree that conditions governing the revival of this Agreement between our two countries now obtain and I suggest therefore that both countries might place on record by an exchange of notes the existing commercial arrangements.

I feel, however, that under present dislocated shipping and inland transportation conditions the strict application of the Agreement might largely prevent Czechoslovakia from obtaining the benefits contemplated and I therefore suggest the temporary suspension of Article 5 which reads:

"To enjoy the benefit of the tariff advantages provided for in the foregoing articles, without prejudice to the stipulations of Article 4, goods the produce or manufacture of Czechoslovakia shall be conveyed without transhipment from a port of Czechoslovakia, such being understood to be a port of a foreign country in which Czechoslovakia has defined rights under treaties to which Canada is a party, or from a port of a country enjoying the benefit of the Preferential or Intermediate Tariff, into a sea or river port of Canada."

There may be other temporary modifications you consider necessary in the present circumstances.

I regard the speedy resumption of trade as being more desirable than any formal amendment to the Agreement which would involve avoidable delay.

I may now say, however, that, in reply to the first question, the Franco-Canadian Trade Agreement is still considered as applying to Algeria and French possessions in North Africa generally.

With respect to the second question set forth in your letter under reference I may say that, under the War Exchange Conservation Act, among many other items, the importation of wine from non-sterling countries is prohibited. Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

M. Mendès-France, Commissioner of Finance in the French Committee, called to see me this morning, accompanied by M. Guyndet, his assistant, and M. Bonneau and Paul-Boncour of the French Delegation. He said that a chief purpose of his visit to Ottawa had been to express the gratification of the Committee for the extension of Mutual Aid. I told him that we regretted that the supplies furnished to the Committee had been so small up to the present, adding that we appreciated their difficulties in straightening out their supply programmes and adjusting them to their requests on the United States. He raised two questions in this connection. First, he wished to make a case for our providing, under Mutual Aid, foodstuffs for French colonial possessions such as the French West Indies, saying that, in fact, their supplies had to be treated as a whole, and that if we agreed to furnish say wheat to North Africa only, it would mean that they would have to waste shipping wheat from North Africa to Martinique. I told him that I felt it was impossible to lay down general principles covering these cases, and that there were domestic political difficulties about providing, under Mutual Aid, civilian supplies to areas remote from the war. We had already faced these problems and, in general, we felt that they had to be treated piecemeal. Secondly, he spoke at some legth on the problem of relief supplies and the responsibilities which would be thrown on the Committee, especially in the event of the rapid liberation of all or most of French territory. I think that no new points arose during this part of our discussion.

He then raised the question of the return, in some form, of the two remaining French ships which we had requisitioned in 1940. In particular, he asked for the return to the French fleet (on an undertaking that the ship would be kept in the Allied shipping pool) of the Maurienne, on the ground that the captain of this ship had voluntarily brought her into a Canadian port at the time of the armistice, and this action on his part strengthened the case for handing the ship back at once to the French authorities. I told him that I was not familiar with the current status of this question, but I knew that the Maurienne had been burnt out in Halifax and had had to be reconstructed. I said I would make enquiries and communicate with Mr. Bonneau later. He also mentioned the Limoges, saying that he felt that this ship should either be returned to the French now or time chartered to them so that it would be under their immediate operational control.

He then enquired whether there was much prospect of our being able to assist the Committee by the provision of ships. I explained that we did not transfer title of ships under the Mutual Aid procedure, and that we could give no commitment, at present, on whether we might be able later on to provide ships under bare boat charter in the way adopted with the United Kingdom. He expressed great concern over the probable shipping situation after the liberation of France. I told him there might be some prospect, when hostilities ended, of their securing freighters owned by Canada, probably by purchase. He also asked whether we could provide, under Mutual Aid, small offshore fishing vessels, to be used to supplement food supplies in France as soon as possible after liberation. I said that we were not, at present, constructing such vessels for civilian use, but that a request from them would be taken into consideration. He emphasized that if they were able to re-equip the Breton fishing fleet, it would cut down on the amount of overseas shipping needed to feed France.

Mémorandum du premier secrétaire
au sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from First Secretary to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] May 16, 1944

I was present yesterday at the interview between the Minister of Finance and Mr. Mendès-France. Mr. Mendès-France again expressed to Mr. Ilsley his thanks and the thanks of the Committee for the assistance which the French had been receiving from Canada. He then placed before Mr. Ilsley for his consideration the three following points:

1. He said that under the plan to pay Allied troops in French currency when they are in France, the French authorities would like to recover Canadian dollars against Francs advanced for the payment of Canadian troops. The present arrangement, as he understood it, provided for the recovery of sterling against these Francs in case the Canadian dollar equivalent would accrue to the credit of Great Britain. Mr. Ilsley said that insofar as he could see it would not make any difference to us but he suggested that there might be complicated accounting arrangements to be made. Mr. Mendès-France thought that a round sum could be agreed upon without necessarily working it down to the last centime.

2. Mr. Mendès-France told Mr. Ilsley that the French authorities were fearful that the relatively large purchasing power which would be in the hands of British, American and Canadian troops if they were paid their full wages in Francs as compared to the purchasing power of the French civilian population and in relation to the amount of consumer goods available might make for trouble. He wondered whether any plan could be instituted under which a part of Canadian soldiers' pay would be withheld and deposited to their accounts at home. He said that this matter has already been taken up with the United States and United Kingdom authorities. Mr. Ilsley said that a part of Canadian soldiers' pay was already being withheld and he would be glad to look into the matter.

3. Mr. Mendès-France enquired as to the possibility of increasing Canadian purchases of French Empire products in order to build up French-Canadian dollar balances. He referred particularly to the possibility of importing wine from North Africa. Mr. Ilsley said that he would look into this matter and in particular into the status of the Order in Council under which alcoholic beverages can only be purchased in sterling areas.

Mr. Mendès-France undertook to leave with Mr. Ilsley a memorandum on each of the above three points.

This conversation, which lasted about twenty minutes, was very cordial indeed.

Monsieur le Sous-Secrétaire d'Etat,

Comme suite aux entretiens que, le 15 mai, M. Mendès-France Commissaire National aux Finances a eus respectivement avec l'Honorable C. D. Howe, Ministre de l'Armement et de L'Approvisionnement, avec M. H. Hume Wrong, Sous-Secrétaire d'Etat adjoint aux Affaires Extérieures et avec l'Honourable J. L. Ilsley, Ministre des Finances, j'ai l'honneur de vous faire parvenir sous ce pli le texte de quatre notes verbales qu'il m'a demande de vous remettre concernant

1. — la fixation du montant de la solde qui sera versée en France aux troupes canadiennes.

2. — l'achat des francs nécessaires au payement de la solde des troupes canadiennes en France.

3. — l'aide mutuelle française au profit des troupes canadiennes en France.

Mémorandum du représentant, le Comité français de la libération nationale

[Ottawa,] le 15 mai 1944

Objet: Fixation du montant de la solde qui sera versée en France aux troupes canadiennes

Le Gouvernement canadien est pleinement informe de la situation économique extrêmement précaire qui règne actuellement en France. Quatre années d'occupation ont dépouillé le pays de la plus grande partie des biens de consommation; il n'existe pas de stocks; la population est sous-alimentée; la plupart des marchandises manquent.

Si les soldats canadiens devaient recevoir en France la contrevaleur en francs de la totalité de leur solde, ils disposeraient d'un pouvoir d'achat beaucoup plus élevé que celui des Français. Alors qu'un salarié français doit vivre de son salaire, le soldat des armées alliées recevra gratuitement son logement, sa nourriture et son habillement, et disposera par conséquent d'un pouvoir d'achat élevé sur un marché où il y a peu de biens à acquérir.

La conséquence inévitable sera une augmentation des prix et un accroissement des opérations de marche noir. En outre, la plupart des marchandises n'existant qu'en quantités insuffisantes, tous les achats individuels faits par les troupes alliées tendront à réduire la part déjà réduite de la population civile.

La libération provoquera un grand enthousiasme dans le peuple français et il est essentiel de maintenir et de développer les sentiments de camaraderie qui pourront se manifester alors entre l'armée alliée et la population civile. Il serait déplorable que des questions matérielles puissent risquer d'entrainer des frictions entre l'une et l'autre.

Le Comité Français de la Libération Nationale attire donc l'attention la plus sérieuse du Gouvernement canadien sur cette importante question, comme il l'a déjà fait à l'égard du Gouvernement des États-Unis et du Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni. Il suggère que soient envisagées les mesures suivantes:

1) La partie convertible en francs de la solde journalière des militaires canadiens serait, pendant les premiers mois de la libération, jusqu'à l'époque où le ravitaillement sera amélioré, limitée à un chiffre aussi bas que possible;

2) Des instructions appropriées seront données par le Commandement militaire pour empêcher les achats individuels de produits alimentaires en France par les membres des Armées alliées.

Mémorandum du représentant, le Comité français de la libération nationale

Memorandum from Representative, French Committee of National Liberation

[Ottawa,] le 15 mai 1944

Objet: Achat des francs nécessaires au payement de la solde des troupes canadiennes en France

Aux termes de l'accord franco-canadien d'aide mutuelle[30] les troupes canadiennes bénéficieront en France de l'aide mutuelle de la part des Autorités Françaises. Toutefois, l'aide mutuelle ne s'applique pas aux soldes. Les francs nécessaires au payement de la solde des troupes canadiennes en France, ou plutôt au payement de la part de la solde qui sera payable en francs, devront donc être achetés aux Autorités Françaises contre devises étrangères.

Comme les questions relatives à la situation des troupes britanniques en France sont traitées par le Commandement Britannique pour le compte de l'ensemble de l'Empire Britannique, il est possible que le Commandement Britannique envisage de se procurer contre Livres Sterling les francs nécessaires à la solde des troupes canadiennes. Cependant, comme les Autorités Françaises ont des besoins de dollars canadiens et ne peuvent se procurer de dollars canadiens contre Sterling, il serait normal que les francs nécessaires à la solde des troupes canadiennes fussent achetés aux Autorités Françaises contre dollars canadiens.

Il serait souhaitable que le Gouvernement Canadien voulut bien s'entendre en ce sens avec le Gouvernement Britannique. Plusieurs solutions pratiques peuvent être envisagées en vue de distinguer les fancs qui seront fournis au Commandement Britannique pour les troupes canadiennes et les francs qui seront fournis pour les autres troupes de l'Empire Britannique. On ne peut, du côté français, que laisser le soin au Gouvernement Canadien et au Gouvernement Britannique de s'entendre sur une formule appropriée. L'essentiel est que le but recherché soit atteint, c'est-à-dire, que la contre-valeur des francs utilisés pour le payement de la solde des troupes canadiennes soit versée périodiquement aux Autorités Françaises en dollars canadiens.

Le Gouvernement Britanniques est également saisi de la question.

Objet: Aide mutuelle au profit des forces canadiennes

L'accord d'aide mutuelle franco-canadien prévoit que les Autorités Françaises donneront l'aide mutuelle aux Forces Canadiennes en territoire français. D'autre part, l'accord d'aide mutuelle franco-britannique en vigueur, qui est antérieur à l'accord d'aide mutuelle franco-canadien, et qui d'ailleurs ne s'applique qu'aux territoires français outre-mer, ainsi que les arrangements pris avec le Gouvernement Britanniques pour l'application dudit accord, prévoient que l'aide mutuelle fournie au Gouvernement Britannique comprend toutes les troupes réunies sous le Commandement Britannique. Par conséquent, l'aide mutuelle au profit des troupes canadiennes qui peuvent se trouver dans les territoires français d'outre-mer est fournie, non pas au Gouvernment Canadien mais au Gouvernement Britannique.

Étant donné que l'aide mutuelle fournie à la France par le Gouvernement Canadien est distincte de l'aide fournie par le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni, il serait à première vue normal que l'aide mutuelle fournie par la France aux Forces Canadiennes ne soit pas confondue avec l'aide fournie aux autres troupes combattant sous le Commandement Britannique.

La question ne paraît pas avoir d'intérêt pratique pour les territoires français d'outre-mer. Mais vraisemblablement, il en ira de façon différente en France. La question se pose donc de savoir si en France, au cas où serait conclu un accord d'aide mutuelle franco-britannique s'appliquant à la France, l'aide aux troupes canadiennes ne devrait pas être distinguée de l'aide fournie aux autres Forces placées sous le Commandement Britannique.

Il est suggéré que le Gouvernement Canadien se concerte à ce sujet avec le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni et fasse connaître ses vues au Comité Français de la Libération Nationale.

Le Gouvernement Britannique est également saisi de la question.

Objet: Navires français réquisitionnées au Canada

1. On se rappelle qu'à des périodes diverses à partir de juin 1940; un certain nombre de navires français de commerce ont été réquisitionnés soit par la Grande Bretagne et ses Dominions, soit par les Autorités Américaines.

Par l'effet des accords signés à Alger le 1er mars 1944, un régime nouveau a été institué pour ces navires, savoir:

a) un certain nombre de navires sont déréquisitionnés par les autorités intéressés et nous sont rendus pour être ensuite replacés par nous en "Time Charter" au Pool.

b) les autres restent sous réquisition alliée, mais nous sont retournés en gérance.

2. Il ressort de la lettre dont ci-joint copie, qui a été écrite le 7 avril à M. G. Anduze-Faris par M. Weston, représentant du Ministry of War Transport,† que les gouvernements du Canada, de l'Australie et du Sud Afrique ont déjà donné leur accord pour que les navires réquisitionnés par eux et remis à la disposition du Ministry of War Transport soient placés dan la catégorie b).

3. En ce qui concerne le Canada, les navires réquisitionnés ont été les suivants:

Lisieux qui a été torpillé et coulé.
St. Malo qui a été coulé ultérieurement.
Pasteur
Limoges
Maurienne

Le Pasteur ayant été replacé à la disposition du Ministry of War Transport il n'y a aucune question à poser à son égard aux Autorités Canadiennes.

Il reste donc à régler les cas du Limoges et du Maurienne qui normalement devraient être également placés par le Gouvernement du Canada dans le cadre des accords du 1er mars 1944, c'est-à-dire, nous être redonner en gérance.

Il y a lieu toutefois d'observer que le cas du Maurienne est spécial. Ce navire a bien été réquisitionné comme les autres, mais après s'être rendu volontairement au Canada sur décision de son Capitaine, (répondant à l'appel du Général de Gaulle, lorsqu'il a demandé à tous les navires français de commerce de se rendre en ports alliés). Il y aurait donc lieu de demander pour ce navire aux Autorités Canadiennes la déréquisition, par analogie avec la décision prise par le Gouvernement Britannique au sujet de navires réquisitionnés par eux dans les mêmes conditions. Les Autorités Américaines ont de leur côté déréquisitionné les navires français qu'ils avaient réquisitionnés après leur entrée en guerre (sauf Normandie qui a été vendu).

4. Pour les navires déréquisitionnés, soit par les Britanniques, soit par les Américains, en vue du règlement des comptes pour la période comprise entre le moment de la réquisition et celui de la déréquisition, il a été décidé par les accords du 1er mars, que:

a) le Comité serait crédité pour la période considérée du taux de location "coque nue" prévu par les accords Eisenhower de décembre 1942.

b) le Comité, par contre, serait débité du montant des réparations effectuées par les Autorités requisitionnaires pour remettre le navire en état de navigation.

5. En résumé nous demandons:

1. La déréquisition du m/s Maurienne. Ce navire est d'ailleurs un bananier, et si comme on l'espère, ses installations frigorifiques sont encore en état, il nous serait vraiment utile, en particulier pour la Martinique.

2. La remise en gérance française du Limoges dont nous ignorons l'état, par application des accords du 1er mars 1944.

TELEGRAM 1707 London, July 10, 1944

With reference to Dominions Office telegrams No. 975 of July 4th† and Circular D. 19 of July 5th,† summarising the position regarding the Agreement between the United Kingdom and French authorities on the subject of the administration of French territory.

Article 3 (1) of the Agreement provides that the French authorities would place at the disposal of the War Office such funds in French currency as are required in Metropolitan France by the British armed forces. In negotiating this Agreement it was, of course, intended that it should apply only to United Kingdom forces and the above is the understanding of the French officials. The French have, however, raised the point that some currency will be required for the use of the Canadian forces for which they expect to be paid in dollars. This would be a matter for direct negotiation between the Canadian Government and the French authorities, and I understand that some preliminary conversations on this subject have already taken place in Ottawa, but the French are anxious to have this understanding on record. In these circumstances the United Kingdom authorities suggest that in the exchange of letters between the United Kingdom and French authorities governing the currency arrangements the following sentence should be included:

"With reference to Article 3, it is understood that the provision of French currency and the mutual aid to Canadian forces in Metropolitan France will be the subject of separate negotiations between the Canadian and French authorities."

It is understood that a passage on these lines would satisfy the French. The United Kingdom authorities have enquired whether you are prepared to agree to the insertion of a passage on these or similar lines.

High Commissioner in Great Britain to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM 1970 London, August 4, 1944

Your telegram No. 1444 of July 18th†, United Kingdom-French Agreement.

The following is a result from discussions with representatives of the R.C.N., the R.C.A.F., the Financial Superintendent of C.M.H.Q. and the Canadian Chief Treasury Officer Overseas.

1. It would not be possible to separate Mutual Aid supplied by French to Canadian Forces in France from that given to Allied Forces in general and United Kingdom Forces in particular. For operational purposes, Canadian Army uses British lines of communication for supplies and services whether obtained in France or supplied from United Kingdom bases.

2. Possible manner of adjustment for Army and R.C.A.F. would be to obtain percentage rebate on such items known to include French Mutual Aid covered by capitation rates paid to the United Kingdom. This would presumably have to be agreed between United Kingdom, French and Canadian authorities and the amount so arrived at would be deducted from payments to United Kingdom suspense account for maintenance of Canadian Army and Air Force squadrons from United Kingdom sources and paid to appropriate French authority in Canada or credited as reverse Mutual Aid.

3. In regard to currency obtained for advances of pay and allowances, we understand the United Kingdom are considering exclusion of such sums from Mutual Aid and setting aside quarterly to the credit of the competent French authorities in London the sterling equivalent of the sums so used. If the Canadian Government are prepared to consider a similar arrangement, provision may have to be made in regard to French currency advanced as pay and allowances and not spent in French markets. The following are comments by the services on the question of adjustments:

(a) Canadian Army obtain advances on a cash advance voucher from United Kingdom paymasters and will continue to do so, and United Kingdom Command paymasters could turn the cash advance voucher over to the French authorities for credit of British account, and French authority would, in turn, render an account, supported by the cash advance voucher, to the Chief Treasury Officer in United Kingdom who would verify the correctness of the claim and advise Chief Treasury Officer (Army), Ottawa, of the amount to be paid in dollars to the appropriate French authority in Canada. Any return of funds to the United Kingdom paymasters would be covered by the same voucher as a credit to Canada and procedure to be applied as a reduction of the amount due by us to the French.

(b) R.C.A.F. now clear advances against pay and R.A.F. allowances to Canadian air force personnel through acquittance rolls which are recapitulated and total amount refunded by Chief Treasury Officer Overseas to the Air Ministry. A rebate is subsequently obtained for R.A.F. allowances. It is suggested, therefore, that the amount of advance may represent, to a large extent, the allowances payable by the United Kingdom, and it is estimated that the amount which would be payable by Canada would be too small to justify the administrative difficulties involved.

(c) R.C.N. is drawing French currency through Admiralty but amount involved is infinitesimal, and recommend that no change be made for the present.

Please repeat to A.F.H.Q., Comot, Defensor, N.S.H.Q.

Dear Mr. Bonneau,

I am referring to a note dated May 15th, concerning the limitation of the pay which should be drawn by Canadian troops in France, which you transmitted to me under cover of a letter dated May 27th. I am informed that, although no restrictions have been placed on the sums which may be paid to Canadian army or air force personnel in France, the amounts drawn by individual soldiers have been relatively small.

With respect to the second point mentioned in the note, I am informed that an Army Routine Order has been issued concerning individual purchases in liberated territory. The Order recites that the existence of surpluses of food in various places in France merely indicates that there has been some interference with the ordinary channels of distribution. It emphasizes the importance of conserving all available food for redistribution to areas which are in urgent need of it. It also emphasizes the danger of the high prices which may be caused by excessive expenditure. The Order goes on to forbid all individual purchases from civilians in liberated areas. It is to remain in force until it is found that certain purchases of non-essentials can be made without occasioning any substantial increase in price or interfering with the restoration of normal economic conditions.

It is hardly necessary to add that, in view of the severe fighting which is taking place the troops will have very little opportunity to spend money.

Yours sincerely,

We see no objection to insertion in exchange of letters between the United Kingdom and French authorities of the sentence contained in paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 1707 of July 10th.

There have been no formal negotiations with the French in Ottawa on subject of payment in dollars for currency advances or mutual aid, other than receipt of memoranda from Mendès-France dated May 15th and arising out of his conversations here.

For your confidential information, it now appears that it may be possible to arrange for payment in dollars for French currency used for advances of pay and allowances. On the other hand, payment in dollars for Mutual Aid supplied to Canadian forces by the French may prove to be impracticable, and negotiations on this aspect of subject are not likely to be fruitful.

In order to provide the French here with funds for purchasing essential civilian requirements in Canada, we desire to put into effect as soon as possible arrangements for paying French authorities in Canadian dollars for francs obtained for pay of Canadian troops in France. Matter has been discussed with French Delegation here who are communicating with Algiers. United Kingdom Treasury Representative in Ottawa has also been acquainted with our wishes and is notifying Treasury in London. Canadian Army is cabling Financial Superintendent at C.M.H.Q. on the matter and asking him if it is possible to put into effect quickly the procedure suggested in paragraph 3 (a) of your telegram No. 1970. It is hoped to arrange at earliest opportunity for a payment to French here of Canadian dollar equivalent of francs obtained for Canadian Army in France during June, July and August.

We understand that United Kingdom-France agreement on currency and Mutual Aid was to be signed on August 22nd and take effect as from June 6th. We propose arrangement for purchase of French francs for Canadian troops and payment therefor should also date from June 6th, which may involve some readjustment with United Kingdom authorities. Financial Superintendent at C.M.H.Q. has been asked to investigate this aspect. I am now able to inform you that the Canadian Government is prepared to consider handing over to the French authorities two former French vessels, the M.V. Maurienne and the S.S. Limoges, provided, in the first place, that the French authorities give the Government of Canada a guarantee against all claims of the owners or their agent, similar to the guarantee accepted by the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States in the Algiers Agreement of March 1st, 1944; and in the second place, that it be mutually accepted that the compensation to be agreed upon for the term of requisition be a contribution by the French authorities under the provisions of Article 2 of the Mutual Aid Agreement, signed on April 14, 1944, between the Government of Canada and the French Committee of National Liberation. The Government of Canada is prepared to discuss also the terms of compensation for the S.S. Lisieux and the S.S. St. Malo, and the fishing vessel Angelus, subject to a similar guarantee.

If this proposal is agreeable to you, I suggest that our respective expert advisers meet to discuss the terms of compensation to be paid by the Government of Canada at as early a date as possible, since the S.S. Limoges will return from the West Indies about the middle of October and the M.V. Maurienne is expected to be fit for sea at about the same time.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Mémorandum

Memorandum

[Ottawa, c. November 22, 1944]

At a conference in the office of the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs at noon on November 22nd, the following information was given concerning the preparations which are being made for withdrawing control from various French assets in Canada:—

1. An Order-in-Council will be required to withdraw control from the French Legation property, French consular property and other property belonging to the French State in Canada. This Order will provide that any expenses incurred by the Canadian Government under the provisions of Orders-in-Council P.C. 352 of January 14th, 1943,† and P.C. 2325 of March 23rd, 1943,† may be met by the Custodian out of the account maintained by the Bank of Canada in the name of "Custodian, Department of Secretary of State, French State Account." The balance of this account will then be transferred to the Canadian dollar account of the Government of the French Republic.

2. A draft Order-in-Council is also being prepared, providing for the release of the French Government accounts. These accounts include (as of September 16th):

U.S. Dollar deposit — Acct. "'A"	$1,597,520.75
U.S. Dollar deposit — Acct. "'B"	$155,000,000.00
Canadian dollar deposit	$33,975.71
Custodian, Department of the Secretary of State, French State Account — Canadian Dollar Deposit (Special Account)	$617.88

It was agreed that all of these accounts arose from an earlier account which was opened on July 12th, 1940, and which consisted of deposits made by the British Purchasing Commission. It was added that the payments made by this Commission are likely to be the subject of discussion between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Provisional Government of the French Republic. When the Order-in-Council has been passed releasing these accounts, we shall hope to receive a statement from you of the officers authorized to operate them in order that we may transmit this information to the Bank of Canada.

3. The holdings of the Bank of France are as follows:

Gold	11,135,127.979 fine ozs.
Canadian Dollar Deposit	$572,149.65
French Bank Notes (Ottawa)	908,165 francs
French Bank Notes (London)	350,040 francs

In order that Custodianship control of these holdings may be released, it will be necessary to have an assurance that the Bank of France is under the control of the Provisional Government of the French Republic. It will also be necessary, before the Bank of France can give instructions to the Bank of Canada regarding these holdings, that we should be informed of the officers who are authorized to sign on behalf of the Bank of France.

4. Private Property. As soon as normal banking facilities for the transfer of funds exist, payment of the following will be permitted after clearance with the Custodian:

(i) Canadian military and civil pensions;
(ii) Payments under Workmen's Compensation Acts;
(iii) Government and insurance annuities.

Insurance companies will require individual releases from the Custodian for the payment of insurance annuities.

5. In the case of other property individual claims must be submitted to the Custodian, to be considered on their merits. Before considering any application the Custodian will require a certificate from the appropriate authority of the French Provisional Government regarding the status and identity of the claimant. The French certificate will not mean automatic release of property as the Custodian may either approve or defer for further examination.

6. Favourable consideration on compassionate grounds will be given to claimants for interim relief payments out of moneys held by the Custodian, provided that identity and need are established and the Canadian Embassy in France and the French Provisional Government approve.

7. The Custodian's control, which is to be released, has afforded a considerable degree of protection to the owners of French assets in Canada. They have been protected against forfeiture for non-payment of taxes and proceedings have been taken to collect debts due to them. A request was, therefore, made that a general assurance should be obtained from the Provisional Government of the French Republic and that France would support and respect the claims of Canadian creditors in France in the same manner as the Canadian Government had acted upon the claims of French creditors in Canada. It is realized that circumstances do not permit of identical procedures but it would be appreciated if we might have a statement of the steps which the Provisional Government of France can see its way to taking.

8. It was agreed that two further matters should be discussed with the Canadian Custodian. The first concerns copyrights, patents, trade-marks and trade names, and any licences which the Custodian has issued for the use of copyrights, etc. The second concerns the release from control of French enterprises in Canada. In a general way it was understood that an application for release from control would be similar to an application for the release of assets held by individuals.

Décret en Conseil
Order in Council

P.C. 8965 [Ottawa,] November 27, 1944

WHEREAS the Secretary of State for External Affairs reports as follows,—

By an Order in Council P.O. 222, January 12, 1943,† measures were adopted to regulate the holding and disposition of the following accounts maintained by the Bank of Canada for the French State —

(a) Canadian Dollar Account for the Government of the French Republic (opened April 12, 1940);

(b) United States Dollar Account of the Government of the French Republic denominated "Account A" (opened July 12, 1940);

(c) United States Dollar Account of the Government of the French Republic denominated "Account B" (opened July 28, 1942, by transfer from "Account A");

in order to provide for a situation then existing in which there was no government recognized as representing the French State.

The Government of Canada provided on the 23rd of October, 1944, for the formal recognition of the Provisional Government of France as being the Government which represents the French State and as being the Government, the acts of which must be adopted and recognized by any government which later may be duly established in France.

It is expedient that the accounts listed above, which are now held by the Bank of Canada, should no longer be subject to the disposition of the duly accredited representative of the Provisional Government of France.

THEREFORE, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, concurred in by the Minister of Finance and by the Secretary of State of Canada, is pleased to revoke Order in Council P.O. 222, January 12, 1943, and it is hereby revoked accordingly.

His Excellency in Council, on the same recommendation, with the concurrence aforesaid, and under the authority of the War Measures Act, is pleased to order and doth hereby order that the Bank of Canada may accept as signing officers for the accounts as listed above any signing officers named by the Provisional Government of France through that Government's representative in Canada subject to authentication and approval by or on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

No. 303 Ottawa, le 6 décembre 1944

Monsieur le Sous-Secrétaire d'Etat,

Faisant suite aux questions que vous avez posées à notre Ambassade au sujet de la Banque de France, j'ai l'honneur de vous faire part ci-dessous des informations que je viens de recevoir de mon Département:—

1° Le Gouverneur de la Banque de France est M. Emmanuel Monick, qui a été nommé à ces fonctions par décret du Gouvernement Provisoire de la République Française, en date du 7 octobre 1944, décret publié au journal officiel de la République Française du 8 octobre, page E-983.

2° Le Gouverneur de la Banque de France a confirmé M. Charles Cariguel dans ses fonctions de Directeur Général du service bancaire étranger, qui comportent les pouvoirs de recevoir et de contrôler tous les dépôts d'or et de devises que la Banque de France possède à l'étranger et notamment à la Banque du Canada et, d'en disposer.

Ces pouvoirs, dont était déjà précédemment investi M. Cariguel, sont conformes aux statuts de la Banque de France et aux dispositions de la loi française.

Je pense que ces précisions sont suffisantes pour donner à la Banque du Canada les garanties que très légitimement elle désirait avoir avant de renouer ses relations avec la Banque de France, main je reste, bien entendu, à l'entière disposition de la Banque du Canada au cas où toutes autres informations complémentaires lui paraîtraient nécessaires.

Je vous prie, Monsieur le Sous-Secrétaire d'Etat, de bien vouloir trouver ici l'assurance de ma haute considération.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I am sending you herewith, copy of a letter which I have received through General Vanier, from Maître Jean Sturel, a French lawyer who will be defending General Bergeret[32] at his trial. I am enclosing the text of my reply[†] in which you will see that I do not consider myself free to appear as a witness without your permission since the knowledge of the military facts on which I could report was acquired in the course of my duties in France. I am leaving it entirely to you to decide what should be done, but should you agree that my testimony should not be withheld when a man's life is in cause it is essential that it should be given in camera for reasons of security.

As I wrote to you before, General Bergeret allowed the Intelligence Section of his Ministry to enter into contact, through myself, with the British Intelligence, and covered the activities of his subordinates at great risk. General Ronin, Head of the Service de Renseignements, with some of his agents, was once arrested by Admiral Darlan's police and questioned without success for several days. Admiral Darlan was unable to establish the proof that General Jean Bergeret, Vichy Secretary of State for Air, 1941-2; High Commissioner in North Africa, 1942-3; Commander-in-Chief, Air Forces in French West Africa, 1943.

General Bergeret's men were working for the Allies. However, before releasing them he insisted that General Bergeret should promise that, in future, all contacts should cease between himself and his Service on the one hand and the British on the other. I must say that this promise did not prevent in any way General Bergeret and his assistants from continuing their very useful activities in our favour. These are the only facts I would be ready to testify about and would not agree to express any opinion on General Bergeret's political position in France after 1940. I am under the impression that if these facts could be made clear to the Court, General Bergeret would, at least, receive a more moderate judgment than he could expect if these facts remained unknown.

Yours sincerely,

DESPATCH 126 Ottawa, February 19, 1945

SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to a letter of January 2, 1945† from Maitre Jean Sturel, General Bergeret's lawyer of Paris, which was transmitted through you to Mr. Dupuy.

2. In connection with this matter, I should be grateful if you would inform the French authorities that Mr. Dupuy brought Mr. Sturel's request to the attention of our Department, and that the Department thinks that, in the interest of justice, it would be necessary to waive any immunity which Mr. Dupuy might possess and enable him to attend and give the tribunal any information which the tribunal might desire, in order to insure that justice would be done in this case. Mr. Dupuy could only do this if the proceedings, insofar as he was concerned, were in camera. A letter† is being sent to Mr. Dupuy, enclosing copy of this despatch, to inform him that the Department has no objection to his giving testimony at General Bergeret's trial.[33]

Le conseiller commercial, l'ambassade de France, au ministre des Finances

Commercial Counsellor, Embassy of France, to Minister of Finance

No. 1041 Ottawa, June 12, 1945

Honourable Minister,

On the occasion of his recent coming to Canada, M. Guillaume Guindey, Inspector of Finances, Assistant Director of the Treasury, had conversations with Dr. W. C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance and Mr. Graham Towers, Governor of the Bank of Canada, respecting an exchange of letters intended to define more clearly the conditions in which financial settlements between Canada and the franc zone would be carried out.

As a matter of fact, it appeared during the course of these conversations that a first project which had been worked out at the time of and with reference to the payments of Canadian dollars effected by your government per contra French francs received for the pay and expenses of Canadian troops stationed in France, a project I had discussed previously in particular with Mr. R. B. Bryce, Financial Investigator of your Department, has since then been outstripped by the turn of events.

Hence, it was essential that there be evolved a new project better suited to the new situation and making it possible to effect until further notice the financial settlements that can arise between the franc zone and Canada.

Consequently, I have the honour, as agreed between M. G. Guindey, and Messrs. W. C. Clark and Graham Towers, to deliver to you herewith the project my Department has instructed me to submit for your approval.

Seeing that it seems to me it is a matter of mutual interest to Canada and France that this question which has long been under study be settled rapidly, may I make bold to ask you to be kind enough to make a rapid examination of the project in question, so that there may take place without too much delay the exchange of letters that would culminate in the agreement of our two governments on the terms and conditions contemplated.

Projet de proposition de l'ambassade de France

Draft Proposal by Embassy of France

[Ottawa, c. June 12, 1945]

FRENCH SETTLEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE FRANC ZONE

Payments between Canada and the franc zone will be effected in accordance with the following provisions:

1. All Canadian dollars held by the Bank of France will be entered in a single account in Canadian dollars. This account will be credited in particular:

a) with Canadian dollars which the Bank of France will purchase from persons residing in the franc zone (Canadian dollars corresponding either with revenues or a capital sum),

b) Canadian dollars paid by the Bank of Canada for the acquisition of French francs with a view to payments in the franc zone.

2. Payments from the franc zone to Canada will be made a) In Canadian dollars when the matter has to do with I° official French payments (purchases through the medium of the French Purchasing Mission to Canada and the expenses of French diplomatic missions to Canada) II° with payments from St. Pierre and Miquelon.

b) In United States dollars in all other cases.

3. Payments by Canada in the franc zone will be made in principle in United States dollars with the reservation of the two following exceptions:

a) Payments receivable for the account of St. Pierre and Miquelon will be made in Canadian dollars.

b) The Bank of Canada may continue to acquire francs against Canadian dollars for the purpose of affecting payments in the franc zone.

4. a) The credit balance in francs of the account of the Bank of Canada with the Bank of France may at any moment be converted into United States dollars.

b) On account of the importance of the payments which the French Government will have to effect in Canada during a certain period, there is no reason to anticipate at the present time the conversion into United States dollars of the credit balance of the Bank of France with the Bank of Canada. However, the evolution of circumstances was to lead subsequently to the accumulation to the credit of the account of the Bank of France with the Bank of Canada of a balance of Canadian dollars in excess of the requirements of the French Government for its payments to Canada. This balance could be converted into United States dollars.

to Commercial Counsellor, Embassy of France

Ottawa, June 22, 1945.

Dear M. Paul-Boncour,

I wish to thank you for your letter of June 12th, containing draft proposals for financial arrangements between Canada and the franc area.

In principle, these proposals are acceptable to me, subject to the following points of interpretation;

1. In paragraph 1 (a), where it is stated that the Canadian dollar account of the Bank of France will be credited in part with Canadian dollars which the Bank of France buys from persons residing in the franc area (Canadian dollars arising out of either income or capital), I have to point out that under our foreign exchange control regulations Canadian dollars arising out of capital payments are not ordinarily good payment for exports which, when consigned to countries outside the sterling area, are required to produce either United States funds or a currency freely convertible into United States funds. As the Governor of the Bank of Canada informed M. Guindey, however, we should be prepared to allow Canadian dollar bank balances owned by residents of France, and now under the control of the Canadian Custodian of Enemy Property, to be transferred to the account of the Bank of France and used to make payments in Canada, including payments for goods to be exported from Canada to the franc area, without attempting to determine whether these Canadian dollar balances arose out of income or capital transactions. We should not at the present time be prepared to undertake that future Canadian dollar payments of a capital nature to residents of France would be similarly treated, but we should, of course, be prepared to discuss this question with you in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time the situation arose.

2. In the enumeration in paragraph 1 of the sources of Canadian dollars which will be credited to the account of the Bank of France, it might be desirable to include as a separate item:

(c) Canadian dollars arising out of the sale of United States funds in Canada.

3. In paragraph 2 (a) it would be desirable to state that payments from the franc area to Canada may be made in Canadian dollars "derived from official sources as described in paragraph 1 above." The addition of paragraph 1 (c) suggested above will complete the list of official sources of Canadian dollars and the addition of this phrase will make it clear that the Canadian dollars to be used in payment from the franc area to Canada cannot arise through purchases in the unofficial market in Canadian dollars.

I have discussed the points relating to the conduct of the Bank of France account with the Bank of Canada, and am advised that they are satisfactory to the Bank of Canada. I assume that the Bank of France will be in direct communication with the Bank of Canada regarding the details of these arrangements.

The arrangements you propose regarding the convertibility into United States funds of excess French franc balances which France may hold, and excess Canadian dollar balances which France may hold, are satisfactory.

If these points of interpretation are satisfactory to your Department and you can confirm that fact to me by letter, I would suggest that our exchange of letters, together with your memorandum, should themselves constitute the agreement between our two Governments on the matters which they concern.

Yours very truly,

J. L. ILSLEY

Excellency,

I have the honour to refer to your note of June 19th conveying in the name of your Government a request, first for the return of the two French vessels M.V. Maurienne and S.S. Limoges which were requisitioned by the Government of Canada in 1940, and secondly for compensation in respect of their use for the period of their requisition.

I am pleased to inform you that the Government of Canada is ready to make arrangements for the prompt delivery of these ships and to leave the terms of compensation to be agreed upon by the expert advisers of the two Governments, who, it is suggested, should meet at as early a date as possible.

As regards the method by which this compensation is to be paid, I should like to draw your attention to my earlier note of September 26th addressed to your predecessor in which it was indicated that the Government of Canada would wish it to be mutually accepted that the compensation to be agreed upon for the term of requisition be a contribution by the French authorities under the provisions of Article II of the Mutual Aid Agreement, signed on April 14, 1944, between the Government of Canada and the French Committee of National Liberation.

Subject to the acceptance of this understanding, the Government of Canada would be glad to arrange an early meeting of expert advisers and would be prepared to discuss, in addition to the terms of compensation for the use of the M.V. Maurienne and S.S. Limoges, terms of compensation for the two French ships, the S.S. Lisieux and the S.S. St. Malo, which were lost subsequent to requisition, provided that the French authorities are willing to give, in respect of these two vessels, a guarantee of indemnity similar to that contained in your note of June 19th in respect of the Maurienne and the Limoges.

You will have seen from my telegram under reference that agreement has now been reached for the supervision of the forthcoming Greek elections by ourselves, the United States of America and France. We are at the moment discussing with the United States Government the text of a suitable announcement. If this can be agreed in time the Foreign Secretary will probably make the announcement when he speaks in Parliament on about August 20th.

2. We should greatly appreciate Dominion Governments' participation in this supervision and am sure that such a step would be unreservedly welcomed in Greece. The form which such participation might take would be the inclusion of Dominion representatives in the British contingent.

3. Detailed plans for supervision have still to be worked out in consultation with the Greek Government. His Majesty's Ambassador in Athens suggested that each of the three supervising Powers might appoint about 70 observers, but the United States Government are thinking of larger numbers and have proposed a tentative figure of 500 for the American contingent. We have no reason to limit the number of observers and would, therefore, welcome up to say 50 representatives from each Dominion, subject to final plans when these are worked out. Decision has not yet been taken whether observers should be military or civilian, but the preliminary view is that they should be in uniform.

Mémorandum de l'adjoint spécial en temps de guerre du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Special Wartime Assistant to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa,] April 20, 1944

CANADA'S POST-WAR INTERESTS IN RELATION TO GREENLAND

1. Canada's interests in relation to Greenland may be classified as strategic, civil aviation, economic, cultural.

STRATEGIC INTERESTS

2. Events of the war have amply demonstrated the importance of Greenland for maintaining air and surface communications with the United Kingdom.

Bases in Greenland have been used for three purposes: staging fields for aircraft proceeding to Britain; air coverage for Atlantic patrol; patrolling of Greenland coasts and near-by waters to prevent use by the enemy. As a staging field, Bluie West 1 has been useful for part of the year, especially for short-range aircraft and for bombers completely equipped and with full complement of crews. Practically all aircraft proceeding over the Northern Route have been despatched via Gander or Goose, the Hudson Bay Route being little used. Except for short-range aircraft or completely equipped bombers the distance direct to the United Kingdom or via Iceland is not prohibitive. The southern base in Greenland, Bluie West 1, has proven to be a relatively hazardous landing field because of fog and proximity to mountains. The northern base, Bluie West 8, is a safer field and much freer from fog but farther off the direct route to Iceland. The East Greenland field, Bluie East 2, has proven to be difficult to service because of ice conditions and appears to be subject to fog. The Greenland fields, particularly Bluie West 1 and Bluie East 2, have proven useful for patrolling Greenland coasts and territorial waters and for protecting convoys over the northern route. Greenland meteorological stations have also proven to be of great importance for observing and forecasting weather conditions. They have become essential for trans-Atlantic aerial navigation, and are highly useful for aerial operations over Western Europe. Wireless direction finding stations have been of importance in locating submarines operating in the Atlantic. The persistent attempts of the enemy to establish meteorological stations in northern Greenland indicate that weather forecasting may also be important for submarine operations.

3. Greenland has also attained a new importance for the direct defence of North America, especially of Canada. The establishment of landing fields in Greenland has created new defense hazards since undefended they would be an invitation to enemy landings. The construction of two chains of landing fields (that by Goose and that across Baffin Island to Churchill) has made Greenland a junction area for two aerial highways into the interior of the Continent. The helicopter plane may create new defence problems, since it apparently does not require elaborate landing fields to unload cargo or personnel. These new hazards cannot be overlooked in post-war defence arrangements for North America. It is thus obvious that North America cannot afford to leave Greenland without the means of effective local defence, as it was before the war.

4. The local defence of Greenland during the present war is the exclusive responsibility of the United States, responsibility being formally assumed by the Agreement with Minister Kauffmann of April 9, 1941. It is noteworthy that the United States consistently opposed any military action by Canada in Greenland.

After April 9, 1940, when Denmark was overrun, Canada suggested sending a guard for the cryolite mine, assuring the United States that the action would be purely of emergency character, that Canada "would be acting as a trustee for a restored and independent Danish Government," but the United States Secretary of State replied that any military action would be highly undesirable — personnel of the United States Coast Guard were employed as mine guards instead. Later when, at the request of the United Kingdom, Canada suggested the desirability of establishing an air field for ferrying aircraft and meteorological and wireless stations, and proposed sending a survey party, the United States intimated its disapproval of action by Canada, but agreed to send its own party, Canada being asked to send an observer. Again, after the Bismarck's attack on a convoy in the Denmark Strait, Canada expressed concern about the defence of Greenland and offered to co-operate in its defence. The United States declined the offer. On the other hand, it should be noted (1) that the United States was not then formally at war, and was following a policy of hemisphere defence; and (2) that Canada encouraged the United States, or at least did not discourage the United States from assuming responsibility for Greenland.

Moreover, in negotiations over Greenland Canada was kept carefully informed by the United States, and in the Agreement of April 9, 1941, Canada was assured the use of defense facilities as "an American nation".

5. Assuming an independent Denmark after the war, the re-establishment of Danish control over Greenland would appear to be virtually certain. The United States Government has repeatedly gone on record as favouring the continuance of Danish sovereignty and control over Greenland and has repeatedly defined its role in Greenland as that of trustee for the Danish Government. The Canadian Government has assured the Governor of Greenland of its belief in the good faith of the United States in this respect and it also pointed to the Atlantic Charter as additional evidence of American policy. By implication Greenland is thus assured as to Canadian policy.

6. The disposition of the bases is, however, another matter. The Agreement of April 9, 1941, with Minister Kauffmann is to remain in force "until it is agreed that the dangers to the peace and security of the North American Continent have passed." Presumably "present dangers" relates to the European war. The "modification or termination of the Agreement" will then be the "subject of consultation" between the Governments of the United States and Denmark. After consultation the Agreement is subject to repudiation by either party on twelve months' notice. This arrangement is in striking contrast to the Agreement with Iceland, which provides for immediate withdrawal of all American Forces at the close of the war. While the time factor in the Agreement with Greenland is sufficiently elastic to permit of continued occupation of the bases by the United States for a considerable period without any change in the Agreement, it is scarcely conceivable that occupation could continue indefinitely without modification of the Agreement. It should not be overlooked that in any postwar negotiations the United States will be in a strong position, Denmark in a weak position: First, the United States will be in occupation; second, the United States can reasonably claim to have protected Greenland for Denmark by the occupation; third, Denmark may be in serious financial difficulties. Carrying the colony has normally entailed a financial loss and may be more of a liability in the future than in the past, both because of the declining market for cryolite, which was an important source of public revenue for Greenland, and because of the probable demands from the people of Greenland for better services and higher living standards due to their contact with the outside world during the present war. A relatively small financial consideration might secure for the United States very substantial post-war rights in Greenland.

7. Since access to the Greenland fields can only be secured across Canadian territory and by use of Canadian bases, Canada is thus certain to be under heavy pressure from the United States for the right of transit across Canadian territory and the use of Canadian fields should it retain bases in Greenland after the war. Another strategic consideration, though a long-range one, should also be kept in mind. The increasing range of aircraft puts Greenland within reach and possibly before long within bombing reach of Northern Europe, even of the U.S.S.R. It is conceivable that if relations became strained between the United States and the U.S.S.R. Greenland might become a border zone between them. It is also conceivable that if the effective range of aircraft is substantially increased, continued possession of Greenland fields by the United States might be deemed by the U.S.S.R. as a possible menace. It would, therefore, seem to be in Canada's interests to have the United States withdraw from Greenland after the war. The bases probably could not be safely dismantled. Nor would the United States be likely to agree to such a course. They might be maintained and manned by Denmark, or even by Canada if the United States agreed, which is scarcely likely.

8. The local defence of Greenland is primarily a problem of air and coastal naval patrol, assuming that control of the High Seas of the North Atlantic rests in friendly hands. In view of the fact that direct air communications between Canada and Greenland are now easily feasible, the local defence of Greenland would appear to be easily within the competence of Canada, if such bases were readily available to Canada in the event of emergency, and especially if they were manned by Canada. Whether the United States would be willing to transfer Greenland bases to Canada is entirely a matter of conjecture, but, in view of the unwillingness of the United States to permit Canada to assume any responsibility for Greenland in 1940 or 1941, transfer of the bases in favour of Canada would seem scarcely probable, even if acceptable to Denmark. Even if the United States were prepared to do so it would probably attach conditions, among them (a) that the bases would be adequately maintained, and (b) that they would be available to the United States in any emergency.

9. If Canada is not prepared to grant the United States a permanent right of way to Greenland across Canadian territory, it is probable that the United States would be prepared to turn the bases over to Denmark subject to conditions of maintenance and right of user by the United States in event of emergency. Some financial assistance might be made to Greenland for their upkeep. Because of the geographical relation of Greenland to Canada, Canada should in that event insist on equal and similar rights of military user and be prepared to assist in maintenance costs. Otherwise Canada would tend to be dependent on the United States for defence of the Northeast, and for the maintenance of trans-Atlantic communications in the event of emergency.

10. It is, however, quite possible that the United States may seek to secure permanent or long-term tenure of the bases on terms similar to those for Atlantic bases secured from the United Kingdom. Such a development would not be in the best interests of Canada and perhaps not of Greenland, but we could do little to prevent it. If it should occur, or seem probable, Canada should make certain that she would have continued rights of military user. In view of the close consultation between Canada and the United States prior to the establishment of the bases, it may be assumed that the United States would be prepared to consult with, or at least inform, Canada prior to modification of the present Agreement. It should not, however, be assumed that consultation would take place on the initiative of the United States. Canada should, therefore, take advantage of any favourable opportunity to inform the United States that in view of the close consultations prior to the Agreement of 1941, and in view of the geographical proximity of Greenland to Canada, Canada would expect to be consulted prior to a modification of the Agreement.

11. When the sovereignty of Denmark over Greenland was recognized in 1920, the precaution was taken by the United Kingdom, at the instance of Canada, to inform the Danish Government that "His Majesty's Government must reserve their right to be consulted, should the Danish Government at any time contemplate the alienation of this territory." Canada would thus have good grounds for informing as well the Danish Government or its recognized representative, Mr. Kauffmann, that Canada would expect to be consulted prior to any modification of the Agreement with the United States.

INTERESTS WITH RESPECT TO CIVIL AVIATION

12. In the matter of civil aviation, Greenland is geographically on the great circle route between the mid-Continental arms of North America and Northern Europe. It is, of course, probable that the routes over Newfoundland and Labrador direct to Europe or via Iceland will be much busier. But the northern route via Greenland cannot be overlooked, and especially if Scandinavian countries or the U.S.S.R. desire to establish a direct route to North America.

13. Canada will control the American approaches to the Greenland route. The fields established during the present war in the Hudson Bay region will probably be useful for trans-Atlantic aviation if the northern or Greenland route is developed. Present bases in Greenland and particularly Bluie West 1 and East Greenland, appear however to be unsatisfactory for civil aviation. If a route via Greenland is developed it is possible that a field or fields farther north than any of the existing fields would be desirable. Development of such fields might entail development of new fields in Northeast Canada. But whether or not this route is developed, it would appear desirable to maintain the fields developed during the war in the Hudson Bay region for administrative and defence purposes.

ECONOMIC INTERESTS

14. An important consideration in 1940 was the maintenance of the continued supply of cryolite. This has now become relatively unimportant in view of the development of a synthetic product from high-grade fluoride, of which probably the world's largest deposit is in the Burin Peninsula, Newfoundland.

15. During the war Canada has become the main base of supplies for Greenland, but this is scarcely likely to continue with the re-establishment of Danish control. In quantity, however, this trade is of very little importance.

16. It is possible, although not probable, that the development of fisheries in Greenland may make Greenland a serious competitor of Canada in salt fish markets. Canada would appear at least to have sufficient interest in the Greenland fisheries to warrant co-operation from time to time with Greenland on fishing questions of mutual interest.

CULTURAL INTERESTS

17. Denmark has been relatively successful in, and has had long experience with, the handling of native Arctic peoples, and a great deal of scientific work has been done on the Arctic in Greenland. Canada has much to learn, both from a scientific and administrative point of view, from the experience and research activities of the Danes in Greenland. If a developmental programme were contemplated for the Northeastern Arctic obviously close co-operation with the Greenland Administration would be highly desirable.

DESPATCH 337 Mexico City, September 25, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to present a few comments on the financial position of this country which will provide a background for much of the political reporting that has, or will, emanate from this Embassy.

2. Recent issues of the Federal Reserve Bulletin (U.S.) have been devoting a good deal of attention to financial developments in Mexico and in Latin America as a whole. The material thus collated gives a useful framework within which the problems of the next few years can be tentatively sketched.

3. The chief effect of the war on Latin America as a whole has been greatly to stimulate the export trade and to retard imports. In U.S. dollar terms the total exports of Latin America in 1939 were only $1.8 billions. By 1944 this figure had expanded to $3.3 billions. Between 1939 and 1944 Latin American imports rose only from $1.3 billions to $1.8 billions, and much of the latter figure represented Lend-Lease materials supplied to Brazil, Mexico and other Allied countries. During the five years from 1940 to 1945 there was an aggregate export surplus of $3.5 billions of which only $1.3 billions went into (net) payments abroad on capital account or to the servicing of overseas debts.

4. In Mexico the general Latin American trend was reproduced though in a less exaggerated form than for the hemisphere as a whole. In this country exports increased but so, in certain years, did imports. This was particularly true in 1944 when imports from the United States rose almost 50%, as compared with 1943, to a total of $264 million as compared with exports to the United States of $204 million. From 1940 to 1944 inclusive Mexico stood first among the countries of Latin America in the list of customers of the United States. But even here there was a cumulative export surplus for the five years of $53 million. Through other channels, however, the U.S. dollar reserve in Mexico was expanded until at the end of 1944 it stood at $222 million as compared with $32 million in December, 1939.

5. For Latin America as a whole reserves of gold and foreign exchange increased over 300%: from $828 million in 1939 to $3,335 million in 1944. This vast increase in official reserves in such a brief period was by itself a great stimulus to monetary expansion within the various domestic economies. As a result of payments in local currencies for these foreign assets, the amount of money in circulation in Latin America was more than doubled. In Mexico it increased, through these and other causes, from $919 million pesos to 3,392 million pesos.

6. These conditions — a tremendous increase in purchasing power plus a severe decline in the quantity of goods available for purchase — presented the financial authorities throughout Latin America with a problem which they were ill-equipped to meet. Tax schedules were raised but tradition and the political influence of the more taxable elements in the populations made quite impossible any serious draining off of surplus funds by this means. In Latin America generally, although not in Mexico, the radical decline in imports disrupted the normal policy of relying upon customs' revenues for a large part of the national incomes. As no other comparable sources of revenue were readily available there developed in most countries of Latin America the paradoxical combination of budgeting deficits at the same time that the countries concerned were accumulating gold and foreign exchange assets. Financing of budgetary deficits by central bank credits became a common phenomenon throughout the hemisphere.

7. In general it can be said that the national policies in most Latin American states, instead of minimizing the tendency towards inflation, had, in fact, the contrary effect. As a result, domestic prices south of the Rio Grande have risen more sharply than in many of the countries actually engaged, in a serious degree, in the war. It is difficult to obtain satisfactory figures but for Mexico — admittedly one of the worst examples — a reasonable estimate for the increase in living costs between the end of 1939 and the end of 1944 is 250-300%. This compares with figures of, I believe, about 18% in Canada, and 27% in the U.S.A. (The official figures for Mexico show an increase in the cost of living index of only 100%. This index, however, is based on such an unrepresentative base that it has little relation to the actual situation.)

8. The countries of Latin America are now faced with the difficult task of endeavouring to work out a new and relatively stable equilibrium. This is going to be a particularly difficult task especially in some countries for, while holdings of foreign exchange have greatly expanded, these reserves will not be adequate to meet the cost of satisfying the accumulated demands for foreign goods. According to the Economist the U.S. Department of Commerce has estimated that Latin America will require over the next four years a total of $3.3 billion worth of capital goods imports to make good arrears on maintenance and replacement ($2.1 billion) and new developments ($1.2 billion). This is almost exactly the amount of the accumulated reserves as at the first of this year and it takes no account of the tremendous backlog of orders for consumption goods. Any estimate of the amount involved in the deferred demands in this category is necessarily a guess, but it is not unreasonable to estimate that it will at least equal the demand for capital goods imports.

9. The importation of foreign goods on any such scale as these figures would seem to indicate as possible, will inevitably create difficult problems for the financial authorities of the Latin American countries. It will also cause serious internal dislocations by its effect on the war-fostered and protected industries of the Latin American states. Most of these will collapse at once if exposed to the full rigors of North American and European competition. Yet they are inadequately developed, in most cases, to meet the domestic demands, and their costs of production are generally so high as to make their products unavailable to the mass of the consumers in their respective countries except in times of full employment, high wages and easy money.

10. These countries, including Mexico, are faced with the predicament of trying to decide just how far they can safely go in allowing foreign goods (particularly consumption goods) to enter their ports in order to supply the present active demand at the cost of eliminating some of their new war-protected industries. This explains the "unnatural" rapprochement that has recently developed in Mexico between the left wing of the Labour movement under Lombardo Toledano and the most conservative elements in the world of Mexican industry. Apparently Toledano is now prepared to protect the trusts and monopolies, and to allow the masses of Mexico to go without many articles that they could afford to buy if imported, in order to preserve the jobs of his syndicate membership.

11. The importation of capital goods into Mexico — and into other Latin American countries — will presumably be facilitated by loans, particularly from the United States through the Import-Export Bank. Just how justified such loans may be, from the standpoint of normal financial practice, will vary from country to country and from case to case. In many instances the deplorable history of the loans made to Chile, Bolivia, Peru and elsewhere after the conclusion of the First World War may well be repeated. The United States, however, will be under tremendous political pressure to grant such financial accommodation and it may be assumed that credits will be made available in many cases with political rather than financial justification. The fact that the United States is almost the only country in the world that has the resources to make such loans, and that in many cases at least the loans will be "tied" to United States exports, will give that country a tremendous commercial advantage in Latin America.

12. This raises questions for Canada. As has often been repeated, Canada is more popular in the Latin countries than is the United States and most Latin Americans would rather borrow or buy from Canada than from the United States.

13. As Canada is the only country, other than the United States, with money available for foreign loans on any considerable scale, it is suggested that some careful thought should be given to what extent, if any, interest in Canadian loans to Latin America should be stimulated. My own impression is that there are a good many sound investment opportunities — among a great many more questionable ones — available in the Latin American countries and that Canadian capital, by a judicious selection and by cooperation with local investors, could do a good deal of profitable business in these countries in the next few years. The desirability of associating Canadian investments with the funds of native investors has obvious political advantages and should never, except in the most exceptional cases, be varied.

14. I should be glad to learn at your convenience, the views of the financial officers of the Canadian Government as to the desirability of encouraging Canadian investments in this part of the western hemisphere. The connection between such investment and Canadian trade possibilities is obvious, and requires no emphasizing.

I have etc.

DESPATCH 407 Mexico City, November 13, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to enclose two copies of a translation of a draft of a commercial agreement[†] which has been presented to this Embassy by the Mexican Foreign Office, and which is designed to provide a basis for the continued discussion of the various aspects of this subject which have already been tentatively under review by the two Governments.

2. The draft submitted by the Mexican Government was translated in the Embassy, and has been examined in detail by Mr. Cole[37] and the members of the Commercial division of this office. It has been compared with other agreements which are in effect between Canada and countries of Latin America, and has been reviewed in the light of our knowledge of the views of the Canadian Government in regard to such matters.

3. As will be recalled from previous correspondence† in relation to the negotiation of a Trade Agreement between Canada and Mexico, it has been clearly indicated to us here that the Mexican authorities would prefer to have an agreement under which specific commodities would receive special tariff concessions which would not be granted to similar commodities from third countries. In our discussions with Mexican officials, however, we made it quite plain that there was little likelihood that the Canadian Government would be prepared to consider an arrangement of this kind. That our views in regard to this matter have been accepted by the Mexican Government is clear from an examination of the draft agreement on commerce now under reference.

4. In common with certain other countries in Latin America and Europe, Mexico's present tariff schedule is of the single column type and grants no preferential rates to imports from any other state. Throughout Latin America, however, a number of countries which formerly operated on the single column system have broken away from this policy during the past decade. This has been accomplished either by showing two columns in the tariff, or, while retaining the single tariff form, by establishing super-taxes to apply to imports from certain countries under specified conditions. Examples of the latter are found in the cases of Guatemala, El Salvador, Ecuador and Haiti. In still other instances the single column tariff has been modified by granting concessions on a few products by agreements with other countries but retaining non-differentiation for all other products. In this category may be included Chile and Colombia. As has been indicated above, Mexico would like to make an arrangement of this kind with Canada, although up to the present this country has adhered to the single column policy.

5. It will be recalled that Canada has extended Most Favoured Nation treatment to a few countries with single column tariffs as in the case of the Convention of Commerce with Belgium dated July 3rd, 1924, and a similar agreement with the Netherlands signed on July 11th, of the same year. In this connection it will be noted that, whilst Belgium nominally has maximum and minimum tariffs, the maximum has remained inoperative and does not apply to imports from any country. The Netherlands, for many years has treated all countries alike in applying tariff rates, and does not grant even her own colonies a tariff preference. Bolivia and Panama are countries in Latin America which have single column tariffs, but which are granted Most Favoured Nation treatment by Canada. Thus we would be creating no precedent by entering into a Most Favoured Nation agreement with Mexico. In the cases of Bolivia and Panama the Canadian concession was extended by Order-in-Council on July 20th, 1935. By this procedure Canada accepted the provisions of commercial treaties between the United Kingdom and the other countries concerned.

[37]D. S. Cole, conseiller commercial au Mexique.
D. S. Cole, Commercial Counsellor in Mexico.

6. As Canada's Most Favoured Nation agreeements follow, to some extent, a definite pattern or formula, I have asked our Commercial Division to prepare a comparative study of the draft agreement submitted by the Mexican Government and the Canada-Guatemala Agreement of September 28th, 1937. (This Agreement was published in our Treaty Series, 1939, No. 3.) The following comments are based on this study.

7. Articles 1, 2, 3 and 4 of the Mexican draft correspond quite closely to the four paragraphs of Article 1 of the Canada-Guatemala Agreement.

8. Article 5 of the Mexican draft corresponds in some degree with Article 7 of the 1937 agreement. The first sentence of the Mexican text referring to exceptions to the Agreement and "Customs Unions" is obviously unsatisfactory in its present form and should be modified specifically to meet the Imperial Preference problem or, better still, be deleted. Also, after item (f)[38] something of the nature of the following paragraph should be inserted if the Mexican Article 5 is used in the Canadian draft:

"It is, however, agreed that in the application of the regulations relating to the exceptions listed above, Canadian trade with Mexico and Mexican trade with Canada will not be subjected to restrictions more severe than those applied under similar circumstances to the Most Favoured Nation."

It would probably be preferable, however, to substitute a text similar to Article 7 of the Guatemalan Agreement for the whole of Article 5 of the Mexican draft.

9. Article 6 of the Mexican draft and Article 5 of the Guatemalan Agreement, dealing with problems arising from foreign exchange control and its effects, have much in common. There should be no difficulty in meeting the wishes of the Mexican Government in this regard.

10. Article 7 of the Mexican draft is similar to Article 4 of the Guatemalan Agreement, and will present no difficulties. The Canada-Guatemala Agreement, however, does not include Paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Mexican draft, which states that, when granting contracts for public works, Mexico will receive and accord just and equitable treatment. There would seem to be no good reason to object to the Mexican suggestions on this point.

11. Article 8 of the Mexican draft deals very briefly with shipping arrangements and it would probably be preferable to include the necessary articles on navigation and shipping in the proposed trade agreement rather than make them the subject of a special and distinct convention. If, however, the Mexican authorities strongly prefer a separate agreement, I can see no serious objection to this course. Our interests can be protected in a special agreement as easily as in a series of articles inserted in the commercial treaty. We should not, of course, in either case agree to anything like Article 1 of the Mexican draft shipping agreement† [see my immediately following despatch of this date No. 408] which commits the Canadian Government to establish and maintain a shipping service between Canadian and Mexican ports on the Pacific Ocean without providing for any reciprocal benefit for Canada.

[38]«Finally, and in a general manner, fiscal or police measures designed to apply to products of foreign origin the regulations enforced within the country in connection with like products of that country.»

12. Unless there is some hidden purpose in Article 9 of the Mexican draft, I see no reason why this should not be included in the final text. It is merely the manifestation of a general interest in the creation of Mexican-Canadian industrial and commercial partnerships. This refers, I presume, primarily to the investment of Canadian capital in Mexican industrial projects.

13. With reference to Article 10 of the Mexican draft, I assume that we will accept the proposal that the agreement be signed in Mexico City. Ratifications can subsequently be exchanged either in Mexico City or in Ottawa, as may accord with your wishes. Because of the desirable publicity that such a visit provides, I would like to suggest that when the treaty is prepared for signature, the Honourable J. A. MacKinnon be requested to come to Mexico City to join with me in the signing of the agreement on behalf of the Canadian Government. Mr. MacKinnon's previous visit to Mexico was prominently featured in the press of this country, and a further visit for the signing of the Trade Agreement would attract a great deal of favourable attention and comment.

14. Article 11 of the Mexican draft corresponds to Article 10 of the Canada-Guatemala Agreement except with regard to the time the agreement will remain in force. Whether the agreement with Mexico should run for three, five or more years is a matter on which I have no strong views. Provision for denunciation on six months notice prior to the expiration of the agreement should prove satisfactory.

15. In the Canadian response to the Mexican draft I think we might consider the advisability of including articles comparable to Article 2, Article 3 (most important), Article 6, and perhaps Article 7, paragraph 1 of the Guatemalan Agreement.

16. There are a considerable number of minor textual emendations that will be required if the Mexican draft is to be used as the basis for further consideration. The repeated reference to "The Dominion of Canada" is a case in point. It has not, however, seemed necessary to refer to these matters in this despatch as they can be attended to when we come closer to a final text.

I have etc.

DESPATCH 408 Mexico City, November 13, 1945

Sir,

With reference to my despatch of this date (No. 407) regarding the draft text of a proposed commercial agreement between Canada and Mexico, I have the honour to enclose a translation of a draft of an agreement on shipping and navigation between the two countries,† which was prepared by the Mexican Foreign Office and transmitted to this Embassy at the same time that we received the draft of the commercial agreement.

2. As was indicated in my despatch under reference, I am inclined to favour the inclusion in the commercial agreement of a number of articles relating to navigation, rather than the negotiation of a second convention on this subject. However, if the Mexican authorities strongly prefer the latter arrangement, I see no serious objection to treating navigation as the subject of a separate understanding.

3. In dealing with the Mexican draft on shipping, it should be pointed out that the Spanish text, as transmitted to this office, was ungrammatical and in places ambiguous. Mr. Eberts, who was responsible for the translation, has drawn attention to a number of corrupt passages, and has indicated that, in certain cases, it is difficult to be sure of the precise meaning which was intended by the Mexican authorities. From other evidence as well, I am satisfied that this draft was prepared in a great hurry and was not carefully scrutinized before being transmitted to us. Nevertheless, its general tenor is clear, and it provides an adequate basis for the following comments:—

4. Canada should not, of course, undertake to bind itself by treaty to inaugurate a steamship line between Canadian and Mexican ports on the Pacific coast as would be required by Article I of the draft agreement. The Mexican authorities propose no comparable contribution by Mexico, and there is no reason why Canada should bind itself to accept a unilateral responsibility of this kind. It is, of course, extremely desirable from the standpoint of Canadian trade with Mexico that such a shipping service should be established and maintained, but there is no reason formally to obligate ourselves in connection with such a service unless the Mexican authorities are prepared to undertake some similar or equivalent responsibilities.

5. There are a great many drafting points which should be corrected if it is decided to use the Mexican text as the basis for a convention between the two countries. These, however, can be discussed at a later stage, if it should be decided to make serious use of the Mexican draft. Of somewhat greater importance, however, is the fact that, in Article V, Section 4, there is an apparent and substantial contradiction in the text where reference is made to "vessels that furnish mail, passenger and baggage services, provided they do not conduct any commercial transactions." Under most definitions, mail, passenger and baggage services would be considered commercial transactions. Again, in Article XI, the Canadian Government could not agree to the definition of "national vessels", which would seem to require not only that the vessels should be registered in the said country and fly its flag, but also that they should be owned by citizens of the country concerned. It would be very difficult in some cases to establish Canadian "ownership" of certain vessels flying the Canadian flag, yet we would rightly demand that such vessels should enjoy whatever privileges our agreement with Mexico might provide for Canadian shipping.

6. It would obviously be desirable to have the proposals outlined in the Mexican draft examined in the light of other international agreements relating to navigation to which Canada is a party. I recall, for example, that the United Kingdom treaty of commerce, navigation and friendship with Japan, which was signed in 1911 and to which Canada adhered in 1913, had a large number of articles referring to this general subject. Unfortunately, we have not readily available here the text of this or any similar treaty, and cannot, therefore, prepare the desired comparison in this office. In any case, the comparative study can be better done in Ottawa, where all the records and material can be made readily available to officers who are fully acquainted with the subject, and are constantly engaged in the handling of these and related matters.

7. I assume that this draft, together with the draft of the proposed commercial agreement will be discussed in some detail with Mr. Cole during his current visit to Ottawa, and that he will bring back to Mexico an accurate and detailed indication of your views as to the next step that should be taken in relation to these matters.

The suggestion that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should visit Mexico and some of the smaller countries of Central America, seems to me a good one.[41] His earlier South American tour[42] was genuinely useful and led to a good many friendly contacts, which are proving valuable as trade possibilities revive. If the trip is definitely settled, you might wish to think of suggesting that he use the R.C.A.F. Liberator which was equipped for your use.[43] It would add to the impressiveness of the Minister's visit if he could arrive in an impressive Canadian plane.[44]

The Department of Trade and Commerce has been working for some months on a draft trade agreement with Mexico and hopes that it might be ready for conclusion early this winter, so that the Minister of Trade and Commerce could participate in its signature, if his journey to Mexico took place. The Craft agreement follows the model of the agreements for the exchange of unconditional most favoured foreign nation treatment which we have concluded during the last few years with most of the countries of Central and South America. Those treaties, in turn, are modelled on the general provisions of our 1938 Agreement with the United States.[45] They do not provide for any specific tariff reductions, but do stipulate that each country gives the other as favourable tariff treatment for its products as it gives to any other country.

In view of the prospect that we shall be embarking on general tariff negotiations in the spring, in company with all the principal trading nations, it

DESPATCH 273 Ottawa, December 1, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatches No. 407 and No. 408 of November 13th regarding respectively a proposed commercial agreement and a proposed treaty of shipping and navigation between Canada and Mexico.

The two drafts of treaties prepared by the Mexican Government† and enclosed in your despatches are at present under discussion between the interested Departments here.

Mr. Cole took with him a draft of the Canadian proposal for the commercial agreement.† This agreement has not yet been cleared with the interested Departments in Ottawa. I understand that Mr. Cole had been advised direct of a change in Article VI, paragraph 1. The words "and shall afford adequate opportunity for consultation" have been inserted before the closing words of the paragraph "with a view to effecting a mutually satisfactory adjustment of the matter." He has also been advised of a minor change in Article II, namely, the substitution of "other foreign country" for the words "the third country" where used. With reference to the omission of the frontier clause, we have advised the Department of Trade and Commerce that our view is that we need not press for its inclusion but cannot object to including it if the Mexicans wish to have it in. It is likely that some change will be made in Article III. We have suggested the use in its place of Article III in our Agreement with Brazil,[47] but this question is still under consideration.

The Mexican draft treaty of a shipping agreement is at present under discussion, and it may be some time before we are ready with our reply to the Mexican Government. The only comments so far received are to the effect that Article I, binding the Government of Canada to the establishment of a shipping service, would not be acceptable.

I shall send you further information on our progress as it becomes available.

I enclose a copy of a note of November 28th to the Mexican Embassy in Ottawa† in response to their request for lists of commodities which are or could be exchanged in trade between Canada and Mexico. The lists are, as you will note, very general, since in view of the Mexican single-column tariff we are anxious to avoid giving any suggestion that we would be prepared to make an agreement containing tariff concessions on specific products. You will note from the draft of the Canadian proposals that we aim at a simple exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment.

DESPATCH 283 Ottawa, December 10, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 337 of September 25th on the subject of the financial position of Mexico, in which you suggested that thought be given to what extent, if any, interest in Canadian loans to Latin America ought to be stimulated. Your interesting and informative despatch was referred to the Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce and to the Bank of Canada. This reply incorporates their views with our own.

We are, in general, doubtful as to the advisability of investing and pessimistic as to the possibility of any substantial investments being forthcoming in the near future. At the moment, we feel that our best opportunities lie in the vigorous prosecution of trade possibilities to lay a foundation for later investment opportunities. These conclusions are based on the unhappy history of investment in Latin America; the political instability; the corruption of which you wrote in an earlier despatch;† the unfriendliness toward foreign companies, of which you have had a taste in the Mexican Tramways affair;[48] the drain on gold and foreign exchange reserves, inherent in the accumulated demand built up during the war years; and our concern that the extended periods of chronic shortage of foreign exchange that characterized earlier history will be repeated.

[48]La nationalisation, le 4 février 1945, du Mexican Tramways Co., constitué en société au Canada en 1906, avec siège social à Toronto, mais contrôlé par des intérêts belges et américains.
Nationalization, on February 4, 1945, of the Mexican Tramways Co., incorporated in Canada in 1906 with head office in Toronto but controlled by Belgium and United States interests.

With particular regard to Government credits, we would prefer to use our credit-granting powers during the next few years to assist countries in Europe and the sterling area, and possibly the Far East, whose reconstruction need is greater than that of Latin America and with most of whom our pre-war trade has been of more importance.

As to private investments through the purchase of securities, we recognize, on the one hand, the need for the development of Latin America and the part that foreign investment could play in it. We also appreciate that by careful and intelligent selection and with the exercise of considerable patience, investments made jointly with local interests could be profitable to the investors and beneficial to Latin America. On the other hand, we find it difficult to see that Canadian investors will in the near future be inclined to assume risks in Latin America on any substantial scale. The history of investment is unfortunate and Latin American governments have not improved in honesty, stability or capability to a point where the danger of default has been removed.

As to direct private investments, i.e., the supplying of Canadian capital or equipment by Canadian enterprises, corporate or otherwise, in similar undertakings in Latin America, much of our industry that is adapted to export trade consists of branches of United States and British firms. Foreign expansion tends to be a head office matter. While it is true that branches in Canada have from time to time set up sub-branches abroad, this is the exception and is generally connected with unusual circumstancs. Almost inevitably expansion is determined by the parent firms' decisions rather than the intrinsic merits of the Canadian branch as a prospective parent. Moreover, with a few well-known exceptions Canadian firms are too small to embark on direct investments except with the utmost caution. The establishment of a foreign branch involves a minimum investment irrespective of the size of the home establishment. Where a large United States firm can contemplate the possible loss of a few hundred thousand dollars with comparative complacency, the Canadian counterpart cannot. The larger Canadian firms producing unique goods developed originally to meet our special requirements are already represented, though perhaps in some instances not as well or as fully as they might be. Briefly, while there are undoubtedly opportunities along this avenue they are likewise not apt to be very extensive.

Dealing with your question as to the extent to which Canadian interest should be stimulated in investment, we think that the attitude of the Canadian Government ought to be strictly one of laissez-faire. The Government ought to provide what service it can to enable potential Canadian investors to obtain the past history of investment and all the facts relating to present conditions in order that the investors themselves would be able to judge for themselves the soundness of investment opportunities. In addition, of course, the Government can be of service in bringing the potential Canadian investors into touch with prospective borrowers and co-investors in Latin America.

DESPATCH 439 Mexico City, December 11, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 273 of December 1st, regarding the proposed trade agreement and shipping and navigation agreement between Canada and Mexico.

2. The Canadian draft commercial agreement† was submitted to Sr. Manuel Tello, Under-Secretary of Foreign Affairs on November 26th, and the amendments to Articles II, III and VI of the draft, received by telegram from the Department of Trade and Commerce on November 30th,† were submitted on December 6th.

3. It has been pointed out to the Mexican Foreign Ministry that the Canadian Government has most-favoured-nation trade agreements of a standard type with all the leading countries of Central and South America; that the fact that it has no similar agreement with Mexico is disadvantageous to both countries; that this situation has undoubtedly been due to the Mexican single-column tariff; and that, Mexico will receive very considerable advantages if Canada grants it most-favoured-nation treatment.

4. When indicating to the Foreign Ministry that the Canadian standard form of most-favoured-nation agreement has been accepted by the principal countries of Central and South America and that, with minor and unimportant variations, this form has always been used, we expressed the hope that the Canadian draft will prove acceptable to the Mexican Committee of representatives of five Ministries which is considering it. The fact of acceptance of our standard form by the Central and South American governments should assure the Committee that this form is satisfactory and advantageous to signatory countries.

5. We have also brought to the attention of the Foreign Ministry the fact that the Department of Trade and Commerce have established an import division which is to be used for the encouragement of imports to Canada, particularly from those countries with which, in the past, we have had an adverse balance of trade. We have indicated our pleasure in utilizing this division for the encouragement of imports of Mexican commodities — although there is not the same necessity in the case of Mexico as there is in that of certain other countries in view of the favourable balance of trade which Mexico enjoys with Canada at the present time. As reliable Mexican statistics regarding Mexican-Canadian trade are not available, we have submitted to the Foreign Ministry the recent figures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which indicate a heavy balance of Mexican trade with Canada for the years 1943 and 1944.

6. The Foreign Ministry have been informed that it will require some months to prepare a draft shipping agreement. It has also been pointed out that, while Article I of the Mexican draft, binding the Government of Canada to the establishment of a shipping service, would not be acceptable, a Pacific Coast service of the Park Steamship Company, controlled by the Canadian Government, is already in operation on an experimental basis, and that the first boat, the Victoria Park, is en route to Mexico to establish the Vancouver-Manzanillo contact. Further, Sr. Tello has been informed that, in all probability, a similar service will be established on the Atlantic Coast, between Halifax and/or Montreal and Tampico and/or Veracruz in the early part of 1946, and that one Park vessel, the Champlain Park, has already arrived at Veracruz with a cargo of newsprint and other commodities.

7. It has been indicated, moreover, that any losses in connection with these shipping routes will, for the present, be borne by the Canadian Government with the result that, even prior to the conclusion of an agreement, shipping facilities are being provided for the cheaper and more rapid exchange of Mexican and Canadian commodities.

DESPATCH 449 Mexico City, December 22, 1945

Sir:

I have the honour to invite your consideration of the following aspects of present and potential commercial relations between Canada and Mexico.

2. As you are aware this Embassy has always considered the development of commercial contacts between the two countries to be one of its most important responsibilities. We have seized every opportunity to make Canada's industrial and commercial capacities better known. We have done whatever we could to confirm and strengthen the very definite friendliness towards Canada that exists in commercial as in other circles in this country. We have assisted Canadian representatives to establish suitable contacts here and we have placed many important Mexican organizations and individuals in direct contact with producers and manufacturers in Canada. Through the press, in public speeches and by private discussion, we have stimulated an interest in Canadian products and Canadian producers.

3. Our initial efforts along these lines have been greatly strengthened by the appointment as Trade Commissioner in Mexico, and as Commercial Counsellor of the Embassy, of one of the most senior, most experienced and most capable members of the Foreign Trade Service.

4. Having now had nearly a year in which to study the situation in Mexico, I am more firmly convinced than ever that Canadian-Mexican trade should and could be developed to something of the order of $50 million per year. I note that in a recent statement in the House of Commons, the Hon. James A. MacKinnon, Minister of Trade and Commerce forecasts a possible trade of $60 millions. We will gladly accept and work towards this objective, and with proper interest on the part of governmental and private agencies in Canada, I believe that it can be attained.

5. But it cannot be attained unless the present attitude of some Canadian agencies towards trade with Mexico, is changed and some present handicaps removed. For now, having aroused a very active interest in Canadian exports, and having succeeded through the intervention of the Hon. C. D. Howe, in arranging for the immediate establishment of commercial connections by sea in the Pacific and the early establishment of similar facilities in the Atlantic, we find that almost every important order for Canadian goods is blocked by policies or commitments which limit the freedom of Canadian suppliers, or by lack of interest in Canadian commercial circles themselves.

6. I understand the desirability of re-establishing Canadian goods in our traditional markets. I am also, of course, fully aware of the necessity of granting priority in many cases to the needs of the United Kingdom, France and other countries that have suffered in the war. I recognize the absolute responsibility upon Canada to meet the commitments that have been made to U.N.R.R.A. Insofar as our difficulties in Mexico are due to the latter causes, I have no criticism to present and only express regret that the chance to develop a new market here is being lost because of the continuance of sacrifices arising from the war.

7. But we are not satisfied that all of our impotence here is caused by the requirements of our original markets or of our new humanitarian commitments. There is, in my opinion reason to believe that among some Canadians — and this includes both commercial interests and officials of the Government — there is a tendency to think of Mexico as "being in the U.S. sphere" and consequently not worth very much Canadian effort. To those who hold these views, the first if not the only Canadian responsibility is to begin to supply again Canada's traditional markets.

8. Within limits, I share this desire to make our first surpluses available to our pre-war customers. My limits are restricted, however, by two considerations:

(a) These traditional markets will not meet Canadian export needs in the future and must be supplemented by the development of new outlets.

(b) New markets like Mexico can be developed today with a fraction of the effort that will be needed to switch them to Canadian goods later if we leave them to the Americans now.

9. It is also important to consider that a relatively small deduction from our exports to the United Kingdom, the United States and other "traditional" markets would be sufficient to get us established in Mexico. If we take advantage of present conditions here we can not only get a footing that can later be expanded but we can in some cases obtain actual contracts covering five, ten or twenty years! If we don't take advantage of these opportunities now we can whistle for the Mexican market when competition becomes stronger or a new depression hits the trading world. Expert Canadian agents here are constantly complaining to us that if they cannot get Canadian goods to meet at least part of the active demand, they will have to give up their plans for Mexican trade because the Americans will become so firmly established that it will be useless to try to dislodge them.

10. In order that my arguments may have a specific point let me refer to two particular cases: For weeks we have been endeavouring to obtain a relatively small supply of Kraft paper for the United Shoe and Leather Company of Mexico. This company is the most important manufacturer of its kind in this country and may well experience a tremendous expansion in the next few years. They have offered to buy all their paper from us for twenty years if we will sign a contract immediately. The initial amount required is very small in comparison with the total of our exports of this commodity, but here is a sure and probably an expanding market. We have received no satisfaction from our efforts to get affirmative action from Canada.

11. The Nacional Distribuidora y Reguladora is the Governmental organization through which the Mexican authorities try to keep down the price of bread and other basic commodities, for the benefit of the indigent people of this country. A short time ago, the managers of this organization indicated a definite interest in Canadian wheat and flour. They suggested that they would be prepared to sign a long-time contract. In other words, for the first time in its history, the Mexican Government has offered to commit itself to the purchase of Canadian wheat for its basic distribution — provided we can start shipping in the near future. Appeals to Canada for approval of this contract — not a large amount, initially, in comparison with our other sales abroad — have brought no response. The result is that Argentina will almost certainly get the contract. Yet only this morning, we have been informed that the Canadian authorities have released 10,000 tons of wheat for Colombia with 3,500 tons to be shipped at the beginning of February.

12. These examples could be mortifyingly extended.

13. With the greatest respect but with the strongest emphasis, I appeal to you to arrange for a complete and urgent review and revision of Canadian commercial policy towards Mexico. Here we have the most important potential market in America — apart from the United States. It is a market that is anxious to purchase Canadian goods on sentimental as well as on practical grounds. We have in the Embassy capable and experienced officers and there are on the ground competent and active Canadian agents who can produce exceptional results if they can get real support from trade and official agencies in Canada. At present these agents are frustrated and blocked at every turn in their efforts to supply Canadian goods to Mexican purchasers. If this situation is not radically modified in the very near future, we may resign ourselves to the fact that the Americans will be so firmly established here that it will be almost impossible to introduce Canadian products to this market. Mexico is going to go through a tremendous development in the next twenty-five years. If Canada intends to take maximum advantage of this fact, it is essential that a beginning be made now. Nowhere else in America have we a similar opportunity. Without infringing on the requirements of the U.N.R.R.A., without limiting our proper aid to Great Britain, I believe that we can make sufficient allocations to Mexico to enable us to ensure a great and expanding market in this country. But we cannot achieve this end by refusing wheat to the Mexican Government at the same time that we supply it to (presumably) private traders in Colombia.

14. The future requirements of Canada cannot be met by a foreign trade confined to our traditional markets. We must obtain additional outlets. Mexico offers one of the best, if not actually the best, opportunity for such a development. The people here want to trade with Canada. But if we cannot meet at least part of their needs now, they will, of necessity become so involved in other contacts and contracts that we will not be able to obtain their patronage later. The amounts involved are at present small in relation to our total output. They can, I believe, be deducted from our other commitments without breaking faith or contracts. And if we can get established here now we will find that Mexican trade is an asset of very real value when competition increases or depression threatens.

15. I shall hope to have an opportunity for an early discussion of these matters in Ottawa. In the meantime, I shall be most grateful if you will do whatever may be possible to ensure that Mexico and its potentialities are clearly envisaged by those who decide Government policy in regard to exports, and are made more widely known to those commercially engaged in Canadian foreign trade.

Dear Mr. Robertson:

You will recall that in discussions with Baron Boël and M. Gutt in your office some months ago, the question was raised of Canada paying Belgium for goods and services supplied by Belgium to the Canadian Army or other Canadian forces in Europe.[49] Belgium offered to provide these services as reciprocal Mutual Aid if Canada on her side provided Belgium with Mutual Aid, but stated that if Canada did not wish to enter into a Mutual Aid agreement and provide Belgium with supplies on Mutual Aid, then Belgium would hope and expect to be paid for the supplies, services and facilities provided to the Canadian Army. It was recognized in this discussion that the Mutual Aid agreement between Belgium and the United Kingdom technically covered the supplies provided by Belgium to the Canadian forces under British command, but that notwithstanding this agreement, Canada and Belgium should themselves reach a decision on whether the supplies and services were to be treated as Mutual Aid or cash transactions. After discussion by the Mutual Aid Board it was agreed that Canada ought not by that late date undertake to provide Belgium with Mutual Aid and the Minister of Finance therefore informed M. Gutt on April 9th that Canada will "be prepared to arrange for settlement in cash for goods and services supplied to our forces by the Belgian authorities when satisfactory arrangements can be worked out by both sides with the United Kingdom, through whose agencies the Canadian forces receive these benefits from Belgium." At the same time Mr. Ilsley informed him that Canada would only be able to provide Belgium with direct military supplies as Mutual Aid and that under these circumstances thought there would be no need for a Mutual Aid Agreement.[50]

The Canadian Army authorities are at present making the necessary inquiries to implement this arrangement.

At about the same time that this decision was taken with regard to Belgium, representatives of the Netherlands Government were in Ottawa discussing the possibility of obtaining export credits[51] and in the course of conversations the question of settlements for Netherlands currency and for goods and services supplied to the Canadian forces by the Netherlands, was raised, I believe by the Canadian side. The Netherlands representatives were informed of the arrangement either pending or just concluded with Belgium.

The Netherlands Minister has now informed Mr. Bryce of this Department that his Government hopes that arrangements could be made under which Canada would pay the Netherlands for these supplies and services obtained by the Canadian Army from the Netherlands. This Department is inclined to feel that it would be difficult to follow a different policy in respect of Belgium and the Netherlands in this matter. Consequently, we are prepared to recommend and agree to cash payments being made by the Canadian Army to the Netherlands to cover the value or the estimated value of the supplies, services and facilities obtained by the Canadian Army from the Netherlands. We would like first, however, to have the views of your Department on this matter. The Canadian Army has up to date been proceeding on the understanding that they were able to obtain these supplies by reason of the Mutual Aid agreement between the United Kingdom and the Netherlands under which the Netherlands provided these various supplies, services and facilities to all forces under British command. It would be understood, however, that any payments to the Netherlands could only be made if and to the extent that Canada had not paid the United Kingdom under capitation rates or otherwise for the supplies, services and facilities provided by the Netherlands.

Unfortunately we do not have any final estimates as to the amounts at issue in this question. The Army authorities have given us partial figures indicating that goods and services up to a value of approximately $1,000,000 have been obtained by certain Canadian units and services but how much more there is we do not know. It may conceivably amount to quite a number of millions of dollars. Of course it should be borne in mind that the Netherlands is paying many million dollars to Canada for supplies required for relief and reconstrucion in the Netherlands, including of course military relief supplies provided by the Canadian Army authorities. Moreover, it is possible that the Netherlands will wish to buy some Canadian surplus war assets which would to some degree and perhaps completely counter-balance the payments that would be required to be made by the Army under the policy outlined above.

Yours very truly,

W. A. MACKINTOSH

I refer to your letter of August 14th on the subject of the request of the Netherlands Government for the conclusion of an arrangement under which Canada would pay the Netherlands for supplies and services obtained by the Canadian Army from the Netherlands.

I agree with you that we can do no less for the Netherlands than we did for Belgium and my Department will concur in the recommendation you are prepared to make, agreeing to cash payments being made by the Canadian Army to the Netherlands to cover the value or the estimated value of the supplies, services and facilities obtained by the Canadian Army from the Netherlands, on the understanding set out in your letter that any payments to the Netherlands could only be made if and to the extent that Canada had not paid the United Kingdom under capitation rates or otherwise for the supplies, services and facilities provided by the Netherlands.

Ottawa, October 3, 1945

Dear Mr. Minister:—

I am writing in reference to the question of settlement for the supplies, services and facilities furnished to the Canadian Army in the Netherlands by the Netherlands authorities, which you discussed recently with Mr. Bryce of my Department. I understand that the Netherlands would like to receive payment from the Government of Canada for the value of these supplies, services and facilities.

I can assure you that the Canadian Government is prepared in principle to pay the Netherlands Government for supplies, services and facilities furnished by the Netherlands authorities to the Canadian Army in the Netherlands. It will be necessary in applying this principle to ensure that Canada does not pay both the Netherlands and the United Kingdom for any item of supplies, services or facilities which might have been furnished by the Netherlands originally but provided to Canada through United Kingdom channels. I should explain, perhaps, that we have arrangements with the United Kingdom under which Canada pays specified amounts per man, per day to cover the provision of various supplies, services and facilities to the Canadian Army. Inasmuch as the Canadian Army makes use of United Kingdom lines of supply, it is possible that some of the supplies of Netherlands origin may have been included in those supplies for which we have already made payment to the United Kingdom. However, I feel sure that adjustment for any possible duplication of this kind can be made in due course.

I understand that the Canadian Army authorities are endeavouring to obtain records or estimates of the amount and values of supplies, services and facilities obtained from the Netherlands authorities. I presume that your Government will be obtaining some figures from its own source, and it will be desirable to reach agreement on the amount actually involved. I would suggest that you or your authorities in the Netherlands or London take up this matter with the Department of National Defence or such officers of the Canadian Army, or of that Department, designated for that purpose.

Yours very truly,

You sent to Mr. Robertson, some time ago, a memorandum sent to the Prime Minister on behalf of the Canadian Palestine Committee,† following his discussion on March 31st with a delegation from this Committee and the Zionist Organization of Canada. I think it might be useful to have on the files at Laurier House the attached copy of a memorandum, prepared by Miss MacCallum in response to the Prime Minister's suggestion that notes on the subject should be prepared for use if the matter came up in London. A copy of the enclosure was taken to London by Mr. Holmes. Miss MacCallum has made a detailed study of the arguments advanced by the Canadian Palestine Committee, in the course of which she has explained the Arab point of view.

I would myself be loath to see any strong advocacy by the Canadian Government of a particular solution of the Palestine problem. No matter what

POSTWAR POLICY AND THE 1939 WHITE PAPER

Of the long series of controversies which have punctuated the history of the Palestine mandate none has been more acute than the present one centering in the statement of policy issued by the United Kingdom Government in May 1939. The purpose of that statement was to put an end to political uncertainties which were recognized to be a factor contributing to unrest in the country. Since the publication of the White Paper the situation in Palestine has improved, while the position of Jews in Europe has deteriorated. Nazi persecution has taken a form and reached an extent unprecedented in history, unforeseen by the authors of the Balfour Declaration or even by those who drafted the 1939 White Paper. The changed circumstances have brought to a head demands hitherto held in abeyance for the transformation of Palestine into a Jewish National State in which immigration and development will be the responsibility of Jews only. It is maintained that anything less than this would constitute a repudiation of the spirit and obvious intent of the Balfour Declaration.

In this memorandum it is proposed to review briefly (1) the circumstances in which the 1939 White Paper was issued, (2) the provisions it embodied, (3) the manner in which it was received (a) by Zionists and Arabs and (b) in Geneva, (4) the objections which have been raised to it in Canada, and a few of the comments to which these observations give rise, (5) to outline considerations Canadian representatives may find it useful to bear in mind during conferences at which policy toward Palestine is discussed.

I. Circumstances in which the White Paper was issued

When Arab disturbances in Palestine assumed the proportions of guerrilla warfare in 1938 a Royal Commission was sent out which reported in 1937 an opinion that the mandate should be replaced by two treaties with independent

---

[53]Voir Grande-Bretagne:/See Great Britain:
Cmd. 6019, 1939. Palestine: Statement of Policy, London. His Majesty's Stationery Office, 1939.

Arab and Jewish States respectively, Great Britain retaining a permanent mandate over Bethlehem, Nazareth, Jerusalem and a corridor to the sea. The Permanent Mandates Commission advised against the immediate creation of two independent states but was willing to support provisional cantonization or the establishment of two separate mandates. The partition proposal was dropped in 1938 when the Woodhead Commission reported against it on the ground that political, administrative and financial difficulties made it impracticable.

Since the Palestine disturbances were continuing and nothing had yet been done to meet the main criticisms of the Royal Commission, the United Kingdom Government fell back on an attempt to promote direct understanding between Arabs and Jews. With this end in view it convened a conference in London (February-March, 1939) but announced that if a joint policy could not be worked out within a reasonable length of time the government itself would draw up and put into effect a policy of its own.

The conference fared badly. Arabs and Jews refused to meet in joint sessions. Suggestions put forward tentatively by British officials were rejected by both groups. The United Kingdom Government was therefore obliged to draft its own plan (published two months later as the White Paper of May 1939). This was rejected by both Arab and Jewish delegations before the conference ended on March 17.

II. Provisions of the 1939 White Paper

Three ambiguities in the Palestine mandate were described as being a cause of unrest and hostility between Arabs and Jews. These were found in the statement of obligations relating to (a) the Jewish National Home, immigration and land settlement, (b) rights of non-Jews, and (c) self-governing institutions. In a controversy such as the mandate had aroused, the United Kingdom Government could not hope to satisfy the disputants; its purpose was to be just to two people(s) whose destinies had been affected by world events and who, since they lived side by side, must learn to practice mutual tolerance and cooperation. The new plan fell under three headings:

1. The Constitution

This section opened with a denial of fundamental positions taken by both Jews and Arabs:

a. The Churchill White Paper of 1922,[54] interpreting the Balfour Declaration, might be taken to imply that the United Kingdom Government did not intend to establish an independent Jewish State in Palestine. Today that position was affirmed unequivocally. The 1922 statement of what was meant by the development of the Jewish National Home was quoted once more and characterized as an authoritative and comprehensive description.

[54]Voir Grande-Bretagne:/See Great Britain:
Cmd. 1700, 1922. Palestine: Correspondence with the Palestine Arab Delegation and the Zionist Organization.

b. Palestine had not been included in the area in which Sir Henry McMahon[55] undertook on behalf of the British Government to recognize and support Arab independence. Regret was expressed, however, for the misunderstandings which had arisen over some of the phrases used in the McMahon correspondence.

Having dismissed thus directly basic claims put forward by both parties to the controversy, the White Paper went on to assert that the Mandatory Power was under obligation to secure the development of self-governing institutions. It desired to see ultimately an independent Palestinian State, in which Arabs and Jews would share authority in such a way that the essential interests of both would be secured. To that end it would begin to associate Palestinians gradually with the administration until they were in charge of all departments of government — assisted by British advisers — exercising administrative and advisory functions. Arab and Jewish appointments would be made approximately according to population ratios. A ten-year period might suffice to prepare the country for self-government, but the time could be extended if necessary. Local conditions permitting, provision might be made for an elected legislature if desired. There would be safeguards for (a) holy places, (b) protection of the various communities, (c) the special position of the Jewish National Home, (d) strategic requirements of the United Kingdom Government, and (e) interests of certain foreign governments.

III. Reception of the White Paper

1. Zionists and Arabs

Zionists rejected the White Paper primarily because it condemned the Jews to a permanent minority status in Palestine, which they held to be a violation of the promise made in the Balfour Declaration. An outcry against the statement of policy was raised in Jewish communities throughout the world for this reason.

Arabs, on the contrary, rejected the White Paper precisely because it still involved recognition of the Balfour Declaration, which they had always held to be in conflict with Article 22 of the Covenant. It had been their contention that under Article 20 of the Covenant a duty was laid on the United Kingdom Government to secure its own release from the obligations it undertook in issuing the Balfour Declaration. Until this duty had been fulfilled the Arabs were disinclined to cooperate — all the more so because they held that the Balfour Declaration was in conflict also with earlier British undertakings toward themselves. They objected to the White Paper, furthermore, on the ground that at the end of the ten-year period a Jewish veto might further defer the establishment of an independent government.

2. At Geneva

The Permanent Mandates Commission discussed the White Paper at its 36th session in June 1939. The document was never examined by the League Council, however, owing to the fact that the latter body did not meet again until after war had broken out.

Since inaccurate reports have been in circulation as to the findings of the Mandates Commission these might be summarized here:

The Commission stated that the White Paper was not in accord with interpretations it had placed on the mandate in the past. The Commission had, therefore, had to consider whether the mandate might be open to a different interpretation.

2. Immigration

Neither the mandate nor commonsense and justice required that political conditions should be ignored in framing immigration policy. Economic absorptive capacity had been laid down as a criterion in the 1922 White Paper and reaffirmed in 1931, but His Majesty's Government did not regard it as being necessarily for all time and in all circumstances the only criterion.

There were now two alternatives — either to seek to expand the Jewish National Home indefinitely by immigration, against the strongly expressed will of the Arab inhabitants, or to permit further expansion by immigration only as the Arabs acquiesced. The former policy meant rule by force and appeared contrary to the whole spirit of Article 22 of the Covenant and to specific obligations to the Arabs under the terms of the mandate. Considering the extent to which growth of the Jewish National Home had already been facilitated, His Majesty's Government had accordingly adopted the second alternative.

It would be unjust to stop immigration abruptly. Accordingly during the next five years (up to March 31, 1944) 50,000 immigrants would be admitted on regular annual quotas in addition to 25,000 refugees, making a total of 75,000 admissions. After March 31, 1944, further Jewish immigration would depend on Arab acquiescence. Illegal immigration would be checked. The total of illegal immigrants who could not be deported would be deducted from the legal quota.

3. Land

Powers to limit and regulate land transfers would be conferred on the High Commissioner so as to prevent the growth of a landless Arab population and a lowering of standards of living. Restrictive orders might be modified from time to time, however, as conditions improved.

Four members had concluded that the White Paper was not in conformity with the mandate. Three held that existing circumstances would justify the new policy provided the Council did not oppose it.

All members agreed that the suggestions made in 1937 for provisional cantonization or two separate mandates were still relevant and should be borne in mind at the appropriate moment.

The four members who opposed the White Paper did so chiefly for the following reasons:

a. The Mandates Commission had long recognized the equality of obligations to Arabs and Jews. The White Paper seemed now to give precedence to the former and to dispute the right of the Jews to establish a national home in Palestine against Arab wishes.

b. Since the avowed object of the White Paper was to restrict the effects of the Balfour Declaration, the new policy could hardly be represented as conforming with the mandate, in which the Balfour Declaration was embodied. One must choose between the mandate and political considerations. It was impossible to base oneself on both, although that was what the United Kingdom Government was trying to do.

c. No treaty clause or constitutional provision would afford adequate protection to a minority in a really independent country where a spirit of intolerance reigned. The Jewish National Home had been excluded from Transjordan, limited by recognition of the two-fold obligation to Arabs and Jews, and obstructed by the suspension of the criterion of economic absorptive capacity and the recent substitution of a political criterion. To place it now in an independent state with a permanent Arab majority would be to commit its destinies to the hands of a race which could not forgive its existence.

d. Provisions under the headings "immigration" and "land" infringed the positive obligations enunciated in Article 6 of the mandate.

e. The recent debate in the British Parliament had brought to light a strong opinion there that the proposed policy was contrary to the mandate. (Mr. Churchill, at that time still in opposition, had made a vigorous attack on the White Paper as a breach of faith. He maintained that obligations to Jews and Arabs were not of equal weight, that under the Balfour Declaration the main obligation was to facilitate the establishment of a Jewish National Home in Palestine, and that although it had never been intended that economic absorptive capacity should be the sole criterion in regard to immigration, it had also never been intended that responsibility for determining immigration rates should be turned over to the Arabs. Neither should it be given to the Jews. It should be kept in the hands of the Mandatory Power. The vote in Lords and Commons cut across party lines. In the House of Lords there was no division; in Commons the vote went 268 for the White Paper to 179 against.)

Considerations which moved three members of the Mandates Commission to support the White Paper included the following:

a. It was essential for the Mandates Commission to take political conditions into consideration as well as the terms of the mandate. If it did not consider the political consequences of recommendations it made to the Council — consequences for Palestine, for the Middle East and for the general world situation — it might help to bring about the destruction of the Jewish National Home.

b. It was only necessary to read the annual reports for Palestine or the memoranda of the Jewish Agency to see that the Jewish National Home was now established. The next essential thing was to ensure its maintenance and protection, and that depended on the re-establishment of order in Palestine to a point where continuous use of force was no longer necessary. To fix population ratios was probably the best way to do this. Lord Samuel had suggested a 40% ratio, but one-third had been set instead. At worst the Arabs would probably agree to sufficient immigration to keep the Jewish population up to that ratio.

c. In 1922 the Mandatory Power had chosen from among various possible methods of implementing Article 6 of the mandate that of getting on as rapidly as possible with Jewish immigration, subject to the limit of economic absorptive capacity. The Royal Commission had reported in 1937, however, that the rapidity with which the whole structure had been built up had intensified the difficulties inherent in the situation. Article 6 was fundamental, but it provided that immigration should be facilitated "under suitable conditions". Thus it would be open to the Mandatory Power to cut off immigration altogether if this were necessary as a last resort to save the Jewish National Home. But a less drastic alternative had been presented in the 1939 White Paper.

d. It was essential to know whether the proposed Palestinian State was to be unitary or federal. (At the London Conference, British spokesmen had explained that either form might be chosen.) If it were to be federal, the fear that the Jewish National Home would be put under subjection to the Arabs could be disregarded. That arrangement would come fairly close to the partition solution. Without further information on this point it would be impossible to say offhand that the Jewish National Home was threatened by the White Paper.

e. The Balfour Declaration had been a compromise formula to satisfy both those who hoped for the ultimate establishment of a Jewish national State and those who opposed it. Its reference to Arab rights was part of the compromise and was meant neither in a narrow nor a local sense.

3. The White Paper goes into effect

On February 28, 1949 [sic—1939], provisions of the White Paper relating to restriction and regulation of land purchase went into effect. In some areas transfers have since been prohibited. In others they have merely been limited. In still other areas they continue to be freely arranged.

There has been no change in regard to immigration. Because of the difficulty refugees have experienced in escaping from Nazi dominated territory, only 60% of the full quota of 75,000 legal immigrants had been admitted to Palestine by December 1943. It was accordingly announced that until the full total had arrived the principle of Arab consent would not be invoked.

IV. Reactions in Canada

Acting on a cabled request from Zionist headquarters in London, the President of the Zionist Organization of Canada protested to the Canadian Government in May 1939 against a policy which would limit Jews forever to one-third of the population of Palestine, close parts of the country to Jewish settlement altogether and give the territory independence, which meant the establishment of an Arab government. Jews would be compelled to do everything to prevent such a nullification of the Balfour Declaration and of the mandate.

Agitation against the White Paper continued. During its convention in January 1941, the Zionist Organization of Canada appealed to the United Kingdom Government to implement the Balfour Declaration and to permit unrestricted purchase of land by Jews so as to facilitate an unrestricted Jewish immigration. It laid on its members the duty of working for (a) equal individual and group rights for Jews in all countries, and (b) the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish Commonwealth within the British Commonwealth, so that it would be in a position speedily to absorb masses of distressed European and other Jews. A further resolution characterized as illusory all proposals for large-scale Jewish colonization elsewhere than in Palestine, since only in that country could the aim of national independence be entertained.

As the time approached when immigration rates were to be determined in consultation with Arab representatives, appeals for withdrawal of the White Paper began to reach the Canadian Government from Jewish groups, ministerial associations, youth groups and women's organizations. Two appeals falling outside these categories were those received from the League of Nations Society in Canada — which like the National Council of Women and the Federated Women's Institutes had been approached by an affiliated Jewish organization — and from the Canadian Palestine Committee.

The latter organization presented to the Prime Minister an oral brief which merits analysis both because of the care with which it was drawn up and because the membership of the Canadian Palestine Committee embraces men and women occupying responsible positions in the business and financial world, legislators, judges, lawyers, university professors, teachers, journalists and civil and provincial officials. (Christian ministers have been separately enrolled in the Canadian Christian Council on Palestine.) The brief represents statements these persons have become willing to sponsor as the result of direct or indirect suggestions from Canadian or visiting Zionists:

1. Canada's responsibility — Canada has a responsibility in regard to the White Paper because this country is "one of the 52 nations signatory to the measure by which the mandate was conferred" on the United Kingdom Government.

This statement, widely quoted, conflicts with the record. The mandates were not allocated in a manner conforming to the spirit of Article 22 of the Covenant, and precautions were taken by the League Council to prevent the Assembly — the "52 nations" mentioned in the brief — from discussing officially the terms of the mandates, whose acceptance the Council kept in its own hands. Canada was not represented on the Council at the time. In December 1920 the Rt. Hon. Charles J. Doherty protested most vigorously at Geneva against (a) the non-consultation of the League in allocating the mandates, and (b) the refusal of the Council to permit the Sixth Committee of the Assembly to examine the mandates officially. Mr. Doherty asked that revision of the Covenant should be considered to prevent any repetition of these violations of the intention of Article 22.

So far as the Palestine mandate was concerned, its history was this: Successive drafts were prepared by British and American Zionists and submitted to the Colonial Office. The latter sent to Geneva for the Council's approval a final draft whose essential provisions followed Zionist demands fairly closely, but not in every respect. The Council gave its approval on July 22, 1922. The Assembly was not consulted. Neither were the Arabs. The Canadian Government had nothing to do with the matter.

Sir George Perley, it is true, acting on behalf of Canada in 1920, had signed the Treaty of Sèvres in which the Balfour Declaration was embodied. In connection with the Chanak incident in September 1922, however, Mr. King explained to Mr. Meighen that Canada was not bound in any way by the Treaty of Sèvres, inasmuch as the latter had been repudiated by Turkey and had not been ratified by either the United Kingdom Government of [or] that of Canada.

Any interest Canada may have in the White Paper derives, therefore, from its membership in the United Nations and the responsibility it will share for establishing a just and durable peace.

2. Meaning of the Balfour Declaration —

The brief goes on to say that the Balfour Declaration was issued by the British as prospective conquerors of the Ottoman Empire. The Arabs may have expected a sovereign Arab State based on majority occupancy, but their claims were subordinated by the British conquering power. Lloyd George, Balfour, Wilson and certain other statesmen of the time interpreted the declaration as a first step toward setting up a Jewish Commonwealth in Palestine, implying ultimate conferment of Jewish citizenship in sovereign right.

Balfour, it is true, regarded the principle of trusteeship embodied in Article 22 of the League Covenant as a self-imposed limitation, whose degree was not open to question by any other government. That, however, was not the sense in which the mandate system was generally understood. The position taken at Geneva by Mr. Doherty in 1920 is sufficient evidence that the Canadian Government cannot accept as freely as the Canadian Palestine Committee appears to have done a definition of the British position which is not supported by the League Covenant.

It should also be recalled at this point that the vagueness of the Balfour Declaration, and even of the mandate and the 1922 White Paper, was due to the fact that not everyone shared the views of Lloyd George, Balfour, Wilson and Smuts. These three documents had to be phrased so as to give some satisfaction to political Zionists and their supporters on the one hand and on the other hand to meet the vigorous objections of distinguished British Jews and others who opposed the creation of an independent Jewish State. This being the case, all that the three documents can be said to have done was to initiate a new process. They left to the future, however, the difficult decision as to how far that process was to be permitted to go. It is perfectly true that the statesmen mentioned in the brief wished an independent Jewish State to grow out of the colonization encouraged under the Balfour Declaration. It is equally true that they were unable to promise such a result, owing to the strength of the Jewish and non-Jewish opposition they encountered. They therefore consented to the inclusion of limitations guaranteeing the position of Palestinian Arabs and of non-Zionist Jews in the Diaspora, which are quite as much a part of the Balfour Declaration as the promise to facilitate the establishment of a Jewish National Home and cannot be ignored now that the time has come to make the clear decision which could not be taken in 1922.

3. The escape from minority status —

The brief asserts that the Balfour Declaration was regarded as an effort to right a great wrong which for centuries had been suffered by the Jewish people — an ordeal of perpetual minority status in every country where they were permitted to live. The White Paper is a betrayal of this purpose, it says, because it would place the Jews of Palestine in the very position from which the Balfour Declaration was to have delivered them.

The designation of minority status as a "wrong" suffered by the Jewish people seems to be based on the popular illusion that the Jewish dispersion was forced. On the contrary it was voluntary. Only a fraction of the Jews remained in Palestine at the time of the Roman conquest in Titus' reign. Attracted to Alexandria and other parts of the Mediterranean world more prosperous than their own, they had already established themselves in many other regions, from which they later spread out through Europe. The real wrong they had to endure was not minority status but the restrictions and persecution imposed on them in the middle ages, continuing in modified form in later times and culminating in the unparalleled atrocities of our own day.

It is important to draw this distinction between persecution and minority status, since the Balfour Declaration itself — as already seen — makes reservations on behalf of those Jews who prefer minority status in the Disapora to the prospect of majority status in Palestine. Most Canadian Jews fall in this class.

4. Appeasement —

The White Paper is described as an offspring of the prewar policy of appeasement, now fully discredited.

Since this charge is constantly heard it is perhaps not irrelevant to recall that in 1939 Zionist leaders began to talk in veiled or direct terms of resorting to violence to prevent the White Paper from going into effect. They were willing to fight in order to win the majority status which Arabs had already been fighting to keep. The secret arming of Jews in Palestine is held to be not unconnected with the threats heard in 1939.

For the Mandatory Power there is apparently no escape from the charge of "appeasement", which will be heard no matter what it may do. To satisfy any Arab demand whatsoever will be to "yield to a truculent people who have resorted to arms." To grant any Zionist request, on the contrary, will be "to appease a worldwide clamour, insistently brought to the attention of every western nation by its Jewish citizens." The Balfour Declaration itself has been compared to the Munich agreement in one sense. Without consulting those in possession of the region concerned, the representatives of a number of nations arranged in both cases for the transfer of a territory at the demand of an ambitious people who were able to put forward a claim of historic association. There the resemblance ends. It is important, however, to distinguish clearly between "appeasement" of an expansionist power like Germany and any measures which may be taken to give Arabs the right to govern themselves in their own homeland or to allow political Zionists a chance to experiment with an independent Jewish State as an aid to solving the Jewish problem.

5. Canada, Palestine and the refugee problem —

The brief mentions Canada's need for a larger population, the contribution which wartime refugees have already made to Canadian life, and the expectation that Canada after the war will continue to help in the solution of the refugee problem. It mentions, also, the attraction Canada will undoubtedly have for many European refugees and remarks in this connection that they will want to come here at the very time when Canada must cope with the rehabilitation of almost a million demobilized service men and women.

This is not the first time it has been suggested to Canadians that it would be to their advantage to support unrestricted immigration into Palestine in order to reduce the number of applicants for admission to this country. When Bernard Rosenblatt was touring western Canada in 1945 on behalf of the Zionist Organization, speaking to Canadian Clubs and contacting well-known citizens, many of whom were later to become members of the Canadian Palestine Committee, this was his main approach. He asked whether it was not the duty of those who insisted on restricting immigration into their own countries to insist also that in Palestine — the one place where Jews had a claim on the trustee — the obligation to facilitate immigration should be carried out to the fullest extent. He found his hearers remarkably responsive.

Non-Zionist Jews, who though unorganized in Canada still form a large part of the Jewish population of this country, consider such an approach to be treacherous both toward European Jews and toward themselves — an extreme example of the lengths to which Zionist leaders are willing to go to establish quickly the desired numerical majority in Palestine even if it should increase the sufferings of those who have survived the terror in Europe. Adoption of the policy proposed by Mr. Rosenblatt and hinted at by the Canadian Palestine Committee is strongly opposed by non-Zionist Canadian Jews because it would result in discrimination between Jewish and non-Jewish refugees wishing to enter this country, which in turn would adversely affect the status of the Jewish citizens of Canada, reducing them to the "second class" status so widely dreaded.

6. Most of the remainder of the brief is devoted to Mr. Emmanuel Neumann's statement before the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives in Washington,[56] and to expressions of opinion in Canada and the United States favouring the views put forward in the brief.

Mr. Neumann's statement illustrates the extent to which the selective principle is adhered to in historical summaries sponsored by the Zionist Organization of America. It is most unfortunate that a case as urgent and just as that of the political Zionists should be made to depend so frequently on assertions no reputable historian would regard as adequate. It is true that there is little knowledge on this continent of what has actually happened in the Near and Middle East in the past 50 years, and that it is consequently easy to manipulate the record so as to encourage the view that Arab claims in the present controversy may be dismissed as all but irrelevant. It is obvious, however, to any who have followed developments attentively that a just decision would have been much easier to arrive at today had the literature of the controversy been less imaginative.

V. Considerations which must affect the Canadian position

Insofar as Canada is recognized as a leader among smaller powers it will be expected to watch with sympathy — and to aid when it can properly do so — the efforts to achieve nationhood and political independence of such peoples as the Arabs and the Jews, who have been grievously oppressed for centuries and who now see in statehood and association with other nations the surest escape for their children from the tragic frustrations of the past.

As a nation which is regarded, on the other hand, as having dealt successfully with a difficult minority problem, Canada may also be expected to speak in defence of Jews who wish to continue making their homes in the European lands with which their families have been associated for a thousand years or more, or in lands of the new world which they have helped their compatriots to establish and develop.

Several considerations make it difficult for Canada to fulfil all three of these expectations.

1. The conflict between Zionist and Arab aspirations on the one hand and between the interests of Zionist and non-Zionist Jews on the other makes it necessary to weigh carefully any proposed action on behalf of one of the three groups lest it result in unfair injury to another. Just decisions would be difficult enough to reach even with full knowlege of the situation. They become almost impossible, however, especially for the average responsible citizen, when only one of the three groups is organized and equipped to carry on an active propaganda in Canada, and when newspapers, radio broadcasts and public lectures serve to disseminate the views of that group almost without exception.

2. The conflict of interest between the three groups, although dismissed as fictitious or nearly fictitious in much of the literature current in Canada today, affects vitally the future well-being not only of Arabs and of Zionist and non-Zionist Jews, but also the stability of postwar arrangements as a whole.

(a) If political Zionists should be denied the right to establish an independent Jewish State, their chief aim would be frustrated. They cannot be content with halfway measures except as a matter of temporary expediency. It is essential to the fulfilment of their purpose that there should exist a Jewish government at the head of a Jewish nation, sending its official representatives to the world's capitals, watchful of the interests of Jews everywhere, and able to speak in international councils with an authoritiative voice on all questions of interest to civilized humanity and to make effective protests whenever any nation adopts oppressive policies toward its Jewish minority. Moreover, only an independent Jewish State can be counted on in future to offer a free haven of refuge in cases where international pressure may prove insufficient to put a stop to persecution. Nothing short of such a haven will give Jews the protection history has shown they need from the barbarity of European governments.

The minority status offered under the White Paper, though it guarantees an established position and a share in the government of Palestine, and though it gives some satisfaction to cultural Zionism, defeats the main purpose of political Zionism, the urgency of which nothing could illustrate more tragically than Nazi persecutions.

(b) Non-Zionists also are bitter over the proposal to regulate Jewish immigration into Palestine in accordance with Arab wishes at a time like the present, when it is possible at any moment that there may develop a most urgent demand for accommodation of refugees from Europe. They are also opposed, however, to the demand for transforming Palestine into an independent Jewish State. The eagerness with which Poles, Rumanians and Bulgarians are inclined to support this demand and — on a different level — the interest shown in it by Canadians who consciously or unconsciously discriminate against Jews socially, professionally or economically, gives substance to the fear that anti-Semitism is preparing to clothe itself in the respectable garb of a philanthropic policy, that in western democracies there will result the discrimination against which Jews have had to fight so long and hard a battle, and that in central and southeastern Europe all real security for Jews will become impossible.

Furthermore, non-Zionists maintain that no matter how clear a distinction is drawn legally between Palestinian citizenship and the allegiance Jews outside Palestine owe to the governments under whose jurisdiction they live, in practice there would develop an irredentist frame of mind as a result of the establishment of an independent Jewish State. There would be a tendency for Palestinian diplomatic representatives to be regarded — particularly in Eastern Europe — as observers of the treatment accorded to Jewish minorities in the various countries to which they were accredited. In all countries a new barrier would be raised between Jewish minorities and their fellow-citizens, setting them apart — in the western hemisphere particularly — from all other minorities. Other minority groups are present in the Americas as a result of centrifugal forces operative in Europe in recent centuries; the Jewish minority, however, is affected by a centripetal force. The former, because their desire to remain is not questioned, would enjoy a more secure position than the latter, the permanence of whose allegiance to the countries of their adoption would be constantly in question. The safeguarding clause with which the Balfour Declaration closes might perforce come to represent only an expression of pious intention.

(c) When the Principal Allied Powers decided at the close of the first World War to partition Arab territories detached from the Ottoman Empire, the inhabitants were forced to relinquish for the foreseeable future their hope of establishing a viable state in the Fertile Crescent between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf. Hussein,[57] as representative of the Arab nationalist movement, withdrew from association with the victorious powers and gave up the advantages of League membership on behalf of the Hadjaz rather than agree to the dismemberment of the Arab patrimony and the imposition on it of mandates in the drafting of which the Arabs were to have no part.

As time passed and the most advanced regions were denied the democratic rights repeatedly promised during the war and at its close and ostensibly guaranteed under the Covenant, a cynical attitude toward the professions of Mandatory Powers and of League members took possession of the whole region.

The first ray of hope came with the unexpected decision of the United Kingdom in 1929 to withdraw from Iraq, which was carried out in 1932. Further possibilities seemed to open up with the negotiation of the French treaties with the Levant States in 1938 and the conclusion of an Anglo-Egyptian treaty in the same year under the stress of the Italian threat to the balance of power in the Mediterranean. These were interpreted as a belated but welcome acknowledgement of the right of Arabs to democratic self-government.

When the French Parliament failed to ratify the draft treaties with the Levant States, and when in 1939 — in violation of Article 2 of the Syrian mandate — the port of Alexandretta and its hinterland were ceded to Turkey, the Arabs were forced back on the earlier conclusion that their reliance on the democratic powers of the west was not after all likely to expedite the realization of independence.

Although since that time the United Kingdom Government has used its influence to win for Syria and the Lebanon at least temporary recognition as independent States, there is no guarantee that liberated France will withdraw from the Levant, and the Arabs fear that it will not do so as long as the United Kingdom Government claims special interests in the Middle East. With Alexandretta already lost, and the possibility that France may not withdraw from the Alawite region or from Greater Lebanon, and the further possibility that a Jewish national state may control the coast of Palestine, the Arabs regard it still as a distinct possibility that they may be allowed to exercise an independent control only over territories facing on the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea, while their outlets on the far more important Mediterranean may be controlled by others. Meanwhile the artificial divisions already imposed by the Allies have created vested interests which will make it difficult to unite the region even were the French to withdraw.

If now the United Nations decide to establish an independent Jewish State, into which millions of refugees may pour from Europe, the Arabs believe a wedge will be driven between the component parts of the State or federation they themselves are trying to establish before the latter has had time to take shape, particularly if the French should be slow in leaving. Owing to the superior economic strength of the Jews, and the political power their contacts with western governments give them, and because of the drive imparted to Zionist ambitions by the pressure of persecution in Europe over and above the vigour they possessed prior to 1933, the Arabs fear that Jewish domination may not stop short at the boundaries of any State which may be carved out in response to Jewish demands. The whole of the Fertile Crescent, they believe, may be permeated by Jewish influence, or affected by an incessant struggle to keep Jewish influence out in order that an essentially Arab civilization may rise again in the regions where the Turks held sway for so long.

Arabs regard it as a matter of essential justice that Europe itself should make reparation to the Jews for the sufferings it has inflicted on them. If the establishment of an independent Jewish State is regarded as the best permanent solution of the Jewish problem, the logical thing to do, they hold, is to force Germany to alienate territory for the purpose. If the United Nations hesitate to do this on the ground that it would cause resentment and lead to future wars, precisely the same objection stands in the way of forcing the Arabs to alienate part of their patrimony — and in the latter case resentment would be increased by the knowledge that it was not the Arabs who had been responsible for the existence of a Jewish problem in Europe. If, on the contrary, Germany were merely asked to place a large fund at the disposal of the Jews, much of it to be used for the expansion of the Jewish National Home in Palestine, this again would mean that Arabs were being required to help pay for crimes they had not committed.

A fundamental element in the Arab position is the belief that Asia is not the property of westerners, to be parcelled out among European interests as was done at the close of the last war. Respect for this principle was implicit in the League Covenant but did not mark the decisions of the Supreme Allied Council. It is implicit also in the Atlantic Charter, but the Arabs are no surer of its application than Zionists are of receiving the independent State they demand, or than non-Zionists are of having their elementary human rights protected.

The partition proposal, which has been revived as a possible alternative to the policy of the 1939 White Paper, will not satisfy many groups in the Zionist movement which are already mobilizing against it on the ground that the territory offered is utterly inadequate for the purpose it must fulfil. Neither will the proposal be acceptable to the Arabs, since it will serve to drive the Jewish wedge more firmly than ever into a strategically important part of the Arab heritage. Similarly, it will not remove the dangers threatening non-Zionist Jews. If the partition proposal is adopted, however, there is a possibility that in conjunction with a more liberal immigration policy in Canada and the United States, the opening up of opportunities for Jews in the Soviet Union, and the provision of special facilities for the rehabilitation of Jews in Europe, the compromise may prove successful. It is not likely to do so, however, unless all possible means are utilized to reduce the population pressure on Palestine and thus relax the increasing tensions of which the discussions centering in the White Paper are an outward symptom.

Following guidance regarding our policy towards the Lublin "Provisional Government" has been addressed by Foreign Office to interested diplomatic missions abroad, Begins:

"It is probable that, as a result of recent developments in the Polish situation and of the fact that the Lublin 'Provisional Government' has, I understand, addressed a circular to diplomatic representatives in Moscow, you may receive enquiries from the Government to which you are accredited and other persons as to the attitude of His Majesty's Government towards the so-called 'Provisional Government of Poland'.

2. In replying to such enquiries, you should make it clear that His Majesty's Government has no intention in present circumstances of either recognising the administration set up a Lublin as a Provisional Government of Poland or of recognising a representative from Lublin in any official capacity in London."

TOP SECRET. My telegram of 19th January, Circular D. 112.

Poland

As indicated in that telegram, considerable efforts are being made by Lublin "Provisional Government" to secure recognition, and we trust that we may have support of other British Commonwealth Governments in maintaining, in present circumstances, attitude which we and United States Government have adopted of not according such recognition. We hope, therefore, that Dominion Governments will, in any approaches that they may receive from Lublin authorities, be prepared to take similar line to that indicated in my telegram under reference and will keep us informed. We shall, of course, continue to keep you fully informed of any developments.

We are instructing Canadian Ambassadors in Moscow and Paris to report at once any approach which they might receive on behalf of Lublin "Provisional Government" and to adopt attitude in case of enquiries similar to that set forth in your telegram D-112 of January 19th. Other Canadian diplomatic missions seem unlikely to be approached. We shall inform you of any overtures of this sort.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 348 London, February 26, 1945

TOP SECRET. My telegram of February 21st, Circular D. 320.† Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: General Anders[58] has informed us that he is much concerned as to future position of his troops, in the light of decisions of Crimea Conference, relating to Poland. He pointed out that he and they have sworn allegiance to Polish Government in London who might refuse to release them from their oath. Situation might, therefore, arise in future in which Polish forces who have fought under our command or elements of these forces might be unwilling or might indeed not be permitted to return to Poland. He asked what re-assurances could be given them as to their future. This was important if their morale was to be maintained.

2. We have been considering what could be done to meet his difficulties. The Poles can, of course, be assured that they will have a part in occupation of Germany in the British zone, and this should safeguard their position for a period of some years. It is, however, necessary to envisage the possibility that such an assurance will not wholly satisfy them. Poles may feel that possibility of difficulties arising later cannot be wholly excluded, and some assurance of a more permanent character may, therefore, prove to be necessary.

3. One possibility which has been suggested is that we might give an undertaking that any of the Polish troops who have fought on our side in western Europe or any elements of them who might be unwilling or might find it impossible eventually to return to Poland under the new conditions, should be enabled to become British subjects and thus to receive treatment accorded to members of the United Kingdom forces who have rendered equal service. There is some precedent for this in the provision made in Section 4 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act 1943 as to special naturalisation of French nationals who have served in His Majesty's forces, though the position in the two cases is, of course, not identical. Any such course, if it were decided upon, would involve amendment of Nationality Law and would, accordingly, require general agreement of all British Commonwealth Governments. It is not possible to give an estimate of number of persons who might be affected by any such arrangement, but Polish Ambassador informed us not long ago that total number of Polish citizens of all kinds who might be unwilling or unable to return to Poland was approxiately 60,000 and number might in fact prove to be of the nature of 100,000.

[58]Lieutenant général Wladyslaw Anders, commandant en chef, forces combattantes polonaises. Lt. Gen. Wladyslaw Anders, Commander-in-Chief, Polish Fighting Forces.

4. We should be grateful for general views of Dominion Governments on this question. It will be appreciated that no definite decision is at present required, since whole matter is still under consideration. It would, however, be very helpful if we could know how the idea mentioned above strikes you. Ends.

1. Your telegram circular D. 348, February 26, 1945, concerning naturalization of members of Polish armed forces.

2. The Canadian Government would have no objection to any action which might be taken by the United Kingdom Government or Parliament with a view to naturalizing the members of the Polish armed forces along the lines suggested in paragraph 3 of your telegram. In the event of action being taken, legislative measures would be prepared to the extent that it might be necessary to provide for recognition of the position of such persons as British subjects in the event that they were at any time in Canada.

3. It will, of course, be understood that the recognition thus accorded in Canada would not go beyond that which is accorded to British subjects. In other words, they would not by naturalization under an amended United Kingdom statute become Canadian citizens or Canadian nationals. Any question of settlement within this country would depend upon compliance with the Immigration Act and Regulations.

4. I assume no further publicity will be given to the possibility of action being taken on the lines contemplated in your telegram until after further consultation with the Commonwealth Governments concerned.

DESPATCH A. 246 London, June 26, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to report that Mr. Victor Podoski, former Polish Minister in Ottawa, who is at present in the Foreign Office of the Polish Government in London, has called on me to make official representations on behalf of his Government with regard to the possibility of our receiving in Canada some of those Poles who do not wish to return to Poland. Mr. Podoski explained to me the position of large numbers of Poles who, for political reasons, considered it unwise or undesirable to return to their country. The vast bulk of these were in the Services. Most of them were in the Polish contingent with the Canadian Army in Holland, or else with the Polish forces in Italy. In addition, however, there were some Civil Servants and members of the "intelligentsia". The great majority were agricultural workers or mechanics who had received skilled training in the Army. Practically all of them had some money: the amount varied from a few hundred pounds for those in the ranks to a thousand pounds or more for officers.

2. When I asked Mr. Podoski what numbers he was thinking of for entry into Canada he said that it would be a matter of how many Canada would be prepared to take. Those prepared to go might number up to 100,000 or 200,000. This seems a somewhat excessive estimate, particularly in view of the fact that in Dominions Office telegram D. No. 348 of 26th February you were informed that the Polish Ambassador in London had estimated to the United Kingdom authorities that the total number of Polish citizens of all kinds who might be unwilling or unable to return to Poland was approximately 60,000, but that the number might, in fact, prove to be of the nature of 100,000.

3. I did not give Mr. Podoski very much encouragement. I explained to him our primary obligations to transport our own Service-men to Canada and establish them in civilian employment. Even if the Canadian Government agreed to accept a few of these Poles as immigrants, I pointed out that it would be at least a year and a half before the first Pole would be able to cross the Atlantic. Mr. Podoski said that the matter had been discussed unofficially by some of the Polish authorities with unofficial Canadians in London, who had given them an encouraging response. It may well be that these informal comments have been given an unduly optimistic interpretation.

4. We have been informed by the United Kingdom Government of their intentions to accord citizenship to men serving in the Polish Army who do not wish to return to Poland, and in your telegram No. 69 of the 20th March to the Dominions Office you pointed out that the Canadian Government would be prepared to recognize these naturalized Poles as British subjects but not, of course, as Canadian nationals, and that the question of their settlement in Canada would depend upon compliance with the Immigration Act and regulations.

5. In view of the fact that Mr. Podoski raised this matter with me, I am reporting his conversation. The subject is one which should have been discussed with the Legation to the Allied Governments. Mr. Podoski's request has been brought to their attention, and I am sending a copy of this despatch to Mr. Dupuy.

TELEGRAM 143 London, June 28, 1945

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. In a conversation which Starnes[59] had today with Professor Stanislaw Kot, Deputy Leader of the Peasant Party in London, Kot stated that he believes that the Polish Government in London intend to make a demarche to the Canadian Government requesting that Raczkiewicz[60], Arciszewski[61] and some 200 of their followers be given asylum in Canada. Apparently Raczkiewicz is being invited by a group of Canadians of Polish origin who are ready to place a house in the Province of Quebec at his disposal.

Kot also believes that the Polish Government in London have already sounded out the Swiss Government on a similar project, but with negative results. Should their request be turned down by the Canadian Government, he believes they will endeavour to go to Eire.

In view of the imminent withdrawal of recognition of the London Government by the United States and United Kingdom Governments, I thought you might wish to have advance knowledge of this possibility.

Kot said that this request is in no way related to the request for naturalization of members of the Polish armed forces, referred to in Dominions Office telegram Circular D. 348 of February 26th and your telegram No. 69 of March 20th in reply.

TOP SECRET [Ottawa,] June 30, 1945

I attach a copy of a note left with me yesterday by the Polish Minister. This is a statement of the position adopted consistently for some time by the Polish Government in London with respect to the recognition of the new provisional Government in Poland. It concludes with the assertion that the Polish Government in London will "hand over its authority" only to a Government formed in Poland after popular elections. This implies that they will continue to maintain that they are the legitimate Government of Poland for some time after recognition has been withdrawn.

It is evident that action will be taken by both the United Kingdom and the United States in the very near future to grant provisional recognition to the new Government in Warsaw. I assume that we shall desire to follow the same course immediately following their action. This will involve the despatch of some note of recognition to the Warsaw Government which we might be able to deliver through Mr. Dupuy to whatever representative of that Government is appointed in London.

We shall also have to notify the Polish Government in London of the withdrawal of our recognition, which will be a more ticklish business. Some sort of communication will have to be sent either to the Polish Minister here or to the Polish Foreign Minister in London through Mr. Dupuy. It would be only fair to Mr. Babinski to give him what warning we can of the steps which we are taking. It is unlikely that the personnel of the Polish Legation here will be acceptable, at any rate in all cases, to the Warsaw Government, and we may have to make arrangements for their withdrawal from the Legation building and the reception of a representative appointed from Warsaw.

The attached telegram from Mr. Dupuy[62] contains the only official confirmation which we have received of the reports appearing in the press that the Polish Government may ask us to grant them asylum. This telegram does not go nearly as far as some of the press reports which indicated that we might be asked to receive the Polish Government in London as a Government with the extension of some extra-territorial rights. Professor Kot limited his suggestion to the granting of asylum to a large number of individuals including the President and Prime Minister. Undoubtedly the presence in Canada of a group of emigré Poles would prove to be embarrassing, but it might be difficult to refuse admission to certain individuals on the understanding that they would refrain from all political activity.

We are asking the United Kingdom Government to keep us informed on the means whereby they intend to extend recognition to the Warsaw Government and to withdraw it from the Government in London, and also as to the date of their recognition and any information which they may have about the future of Polish diplomatic Missions abroad.

TELEGRAM 59 Ottawa, June 30, 1945

TOP SECRET. Your telegrams 143 and 144.† No approach has been made by the Polish Minister concerning reception in Canada of members and supporters of Polish Government in London. There could, of course, be no question of the admission to Canada of the Polish Government as such after the withdrawal of recognition. Should you be approached with such a proposal or with a request that Canada give asylum to individual members of the Polish Government, you should confine yourself to stating that you will report the matter to Ottawa.

2. The Polish Minister yesterday left at the Department a note† containing a reasoned protest against the recognition of the new Government in Warsaw and ending with a declaration that the Polish Government in London will hand over its authority only to a Government freely formed inside Poland which corresponds to public opinion declared in free elections. A copy is being forwarded by bag.

Memorandum from Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa,] July 4, 1945

It is now definitely arranged that the United States will recognize the Polish Government in Warsaw at 7:00 p.m. tomorrow evening. The United Kingdom will follow suit unless some unexpected complication arises. The attached copies of Dominions telegram D-1158 of July 4th† and Washington message WA-3505, also of today,† give the latest information on the action of these two Governments.

The question has been placed on the agenda of Council for tomorrow afternoon and, if possible, I should be glad to have your comments before Council meets.

I have just sent a telegram to the Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow to apprise him of the position and to let him know that Canadian recognition is likely to follow very shortly. A copy of this telegram is also attached.†

Both the United Kingdom and the United States Governments appear to have received requests for recognition since the new Polish Government was formed on June 28th. We have not received any such request but I think that this need not delay our own action, especially since United States and United Kingdom recognition is based on their acceptance of the new Government as having been formed in accordance with the Crimea decisions to which we were not a party.

We need not, however, act simultaneously with the two Great Powers although I feel that we should not delay for more than a very brief period. I suggest that you should send a telegram en clair to the Polish Prime Minister in Warsaw on Friday morning and that a press statement should be issued here in time for publication in Friday evening newspapers. President Truman is following this course. We could communicate our recognition through the Polish Ambassador in Moscow but I am inclined to think it better not to send our notification via Soviet territory and Mr. Wilgress agrees with this view.

I attach for your consideration drafts of a telegram to Mr. Osobka-Morawski[63] and of a press statement for release in Ottawa.†

The United Kingdom Government is taking no formal action vis-à-vis the Polish Government in London to terminate their recognition on the ground that this follows automatically from their recognition of the Warsaw Government. We should, I think, tell our Charge d'Affaires to the London Government to inform the Polish Foreign Office there somewhat in advance of our public announcement and should make a similar notification to Mr. Babinski tomorrow evening or on Friday morning. There will be a number of problems to settle about the status of the Polish representatives in Canada.[64]

RECOGNITION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF POLAND

5. THE ASSOCIATE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS explained the position regarding the recognition of the new Polish provisional government in Warsaw and the withdrawal of recognition of the London Polish government.

Announcement of immediate recognition of the provisional government was being made by the United Kingdom and the United States and it was proposed that Canada follow suit by despatch of a wire to the Prime Minister of the provisional government, granting Canadian recognition; this would be followed by an announcement to the press.

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE referred to feeling within Canada against the Warsaw provisional government and also to the opposition of the Polish Army which had, through contact with the Canadian Army, influenced the opinion of the Canadian troops and suggested that it might be desirable, in these circumstances, to defer Canadian action.

7. MR. WRONG pointed out that delay would be likely to build up resistance to recognition and would also occasion doubt in the United States, the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R. and Poland regarding our position and policy.

8. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE pointed out that the recognition of Poland was in accordance with arrangements entered into at San Francisco, whereby Poland would be admitted to the United Nations when the major powers were satisfied that certain conditions had been met.

The Canadian announcement of recognition would cause less difficulty if it appeared consequential to action initiated at San Francisco.

9. THE CABINET, after further discussion, approved the granting of recognition to the Polish provisional government in Warsaw, on the understanding that announcement in Canada would follow the lines indicated by the Minister of Justice.[65]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa,] July 9, 1945

The attached note† was handed by Mr. Babinski to the Under-Secretary toward the conclusion of an interview at which I was present in the course of which we informed Mr. Babinski of the Government's decision to recognize the Polish Provisional Government in Warsaw. The interview took place between 12:30 and 1:30 p.m. on July 6th.

In the course of it Mr. Robertson, speaking personally, sought to secure from Mr. Babinski some recognition of the possibility that the Warsaw Government might establish itself as a really independent and democratic Polish Government. Mr. Babinski refused to admit any such possibility and declared his intention of continuing his allegiance to the Polish Government in London. He said that he felt sure that all Polish officials in Canada would pursue the same course. The discussion was inevitably a difficult one but Mr. Babinski on the whole spoke reasonably and appeared to recognize both the personal and official consequences of his position. He did not mention the question of Polish Government assets in Ottawa. He put in a plea for assistance in securing some employment for himself and for other Polish officials and also requested that General Sosnokowski,[66] who is still in Montreal, should be permitted to remain here. He was assured that we would treat Poles now in Canada with as much consideration as we could so long as they refrained from any sort of political agitation or propaganda. It was suggested to him that he might use his personal influence over other officials to dissuade them from issuing inflammatory declarations.

We read him an extract from Washington message WA-3505 of July 4th† concerning the arrangements made with the Polish Ambassador in Moscow for the custody of the Polish Embassy. We did not make any request for action on his part with respect to the Polish Legation, especially since he had recognized in the course of his own observations that he would have to vacate the premises soon.

The Under-Secretary suggested to Mr. Babinski that he might refrain from presenting his final note but he insisted on doing so, saying that he was acting under instructions from his Government. He had obviously brought it with him on the assumption that he would be informed during the discussion of the withdrawal of the recognition from the London Government although no such word had been conveyed to him in advance.

SECRET. My telegram No. 151 of July 9th† and your telegram No. 160 of July 6th.† Polish Government assets.

We understand that Gold deposited with Bank of Canada belongs to the Bank Polski, an independent company which formerly acted as Central Bank of Poland. Gold which represents bank's main asset is divided between Ottawa, London and New York. We have no definite information to show whether company was dissolved by any Act emanating from Poland, and without positive evidence we are advised that we must regard it as a legal entity under Polish law. It had a Board appointed by general meeting of shareholders. The number of the shareholders cannot be traced and surviving members of Board have been operating and controlling Bank in London. Company has been allowed to sue in courts of this country, United States of America and Switzerland.

2. A new bank of issue was created in Poland at the beginning of this year, but no doubt Polish Provisional Government will sooner or later lay claim to assets of Bank Polski. Our attitude is that until we have reached agreement with Provisional Government on certain questions we shall not release gold in London, sale or export of which we have power to control. Loans, in respect of which previous Polish Governments have acknowledged liability to repayment, exceed £50 million representing expenditure of £120 million to support Polish armed forces and civil administration less £70 million which will be written off as Mutual Aid. Until Polish Provisional Government agree to recognize our claims, we shall, therefore, wish to negotiate with regard to all assets of Polish State in our possession.

3. It would be of great assistance to us if Canadian Government could see their way to adopt a similar attitude in regard to Polish gold in Canada.

DESPATCH 1555 Ottawa, September 17, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 246 of June 26th and related correspondence regarding the admission to Canada of those Poles who do not wish to return to Poland. This question has been given careful consideration with the following results.

2. It is felt to be clearly undesirable to admit, at the present time, large numbers of Poles to Canada for permanent residence. Except possibly in a very few special cases, therefore, admission as immigrants can be granted only to Polish nationals who can qualify under the Immigration Act and Regulations.

3. Certain Poles with special connection with or claims on Canada may be admitted (or allowed to remain if already in Canada) with temporary non-immigrant status. Their position will be reviewed individually at a later date when conditions have become more settled. The following categories of Polish nationals may be admitted with the above status:

(a) Some 600 Polish engineers and technicians who are already in Canada and who have made a substantial contribution to Canada's war effort. Other Polish engineers who are not now in Canada (your despatch No. 300 of July 25th)† cannot, of course be included in this category.

(b) Former Polish diplomatic representatives in Ottawa, members of the Legation's staff and consular officers. This group includes some 12 persons.

(c) Former Polish officials now abroad, whose immediate families or close relatives are at present residing in Canada. Under this heading, permission may be granted to General Wladyslaw Bortnowski, whose wife is at present in Montreal (your despatch No. 303 of July 27th)† to enter Canada with temporary non-immigrant status.

(d) Certain individuals with established connections in Canada. One of these is Mr. Victor Podoski,[67] whose wife is a Canadian and who has fair prospects of finding employment here; another is Dr. George Adamkiewicz, former Consul General of Poland in Canada (your despatch No. 291 of July 20th).†

4. Consideration will also be given to applications for temporary non-immigrant residence of those Polish ex-servicemen whose Polish families are now in Canada as temporary residents. It is not intended that admission of this category should be made a rule, but the presence of their families here will be considered as a contributing circumstance in their favour.

5. By present procedure applicable to members of all Allied Forces, Polish ex-Servicemen who have Canadian wives in Canada are admitted for permanent residence following discharge, if they are in good health. Admission is authorized in each case by Order-in-Council waiving existing restrictions (P.C. 695 of 21st March, 1931, as amended).† It is felt that it would only be fair to grant admission by the same procedure to those members of the Polish Armed Forces whose Canadian wives have joined them overseas. There are likely to be very few in this category.

6. Polish nationals who apply for temporary entry to Canada for the purpose of making brief visits, attending university, etc., may be admitted on producing satisfactory documentary evidence of readmissibility to the country from which they come.

7. The individual applications of all categories of Poles specified in paragraphs 2 to 6 above should be referred to Mr. Congdon,[68] who will transmit to Immigration here for decision. Approval of temporary entry has been given for General Bortnowski (paragraph 3(c)) and to Messrs. Podoski and Adamkiewicz (paragraph 3(d)). These three persons should be referred to Mr. Congdon for medical examination and for non-immigrant visas valid for twelve months. As Bortnowski may be in Paris, the Embassy there will also be advised relative to his case.

8. With regard to the documents acceptable for admission to Canada, the present procedure is to continue to recognize the validity of passports issued by the former Polish Government, except in the case of diplomatic passports. The latter will be treated as ordinary passports and diplomatic visas will not be affixed to them.

9. I am sending similar instructions† to our other Missions abroad. The Director of Immigration requests that copies of this despatch be furnished Mr. Congdon for his guidance. Five copies of the despatch are enclosed herewith.

DESPATCH 79 Moscow, March 15, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to report that on March 13th, 1944, I had a long conversation, lasting over an hour, with Mr. Ivan Maisky, Vice-Commissar of Foreign Affairs, on whom I called pursuant to the series of calls I have to make as a result of my change in status. Whereas the other Vice-Commissars on whom I have paid such calls have appeared desirous chiefly of exchanging pleasantries and of engaging in conversation of a general character, Mr. Maisky from the outset seemed bent on a serious conversation involving an exchange of views on the problems now confronting the world. Naturally I was delighted to have this all too rare opportunity of a frank discusson with a Soviet official. I came away with the suspicion, and it is nothing more than a suspicion, that Mr. Maisky might have been put up to this by Mr. Molotov, who may possibly be desirous of knowing more about our general attitude to post-war problems. This shows the importance of Canadian diplomatic representatives, particularly those stationed at remote posts, being well briefed. I should appreciate greatly, therefore, such comments as you think should be given on certain of the points raised by Mr. Maisky and referred to in this despatch.

2. There is no Soviet official with whom it is more pleasant to discuss world affairs than Mr. Maisky. His long experience as Ambassador in London gives him a complete understanding of the western point of view. He is a very clear thinker and has a frankness of manner which makes him a delightful conversationalist. He is free from that sarcasm and that fondness for making little digs at other countries which characterises the other Vice-Commissars, even one who is otherwise so charming as Mr. Vyshinsky.

3. Mr. Maisky opened the discussion by asking me if we were busy with the study of post-war problems. I said that we had many committees at work in Ottawa on these problems and then asked him if this was the work on which he was engaged like Mr. Litvinov.[69] He replied in the affirmative and said they had commenced to study more actively these problems and to discuss them among themselves. He then turned to the main question of the prevention of future aggression and asked me what were our views about the future world organization for accomplishing this purpose. I told him that our Government had approved most enthusiastically the principles underlying Article 4 of the Moscow Declaration on general security.[70] I then said that our policy had been enunciated very clearly in a recent speech of the Prime Minister[71] and I asked him if this speech had come to his attention. He replied in the affirmative and said, "Mr. King gave Lord Halifax a very clear answer. Poor Halifax." The last remark was said with a quiet smile.

4. Mr. Maisky then brought the discussion to the consideration of more specific points, which showed at once the clarity of his thinking, his knowlege of Canadian points of view in the past and the direction in which Soviet minds are turning respecting the future world order. He said that the League of Nations had failed for two main reasons: (1) reluctance of some countries to use force to stop aggression, and (2) the requirement of unanimity for its decisions. As regards the former he said two proposals had been made, one for an international force at the disposal of the security organization and the other for the ear-marking of certain units in each country which the security organization could call on at any time to help put down incipient aggression. He asked me which of these two proposals found most favour in Canada. Feeling very much on the defensive, I countered by stating that our Government had not yet enunciated their policy on these questions because they had been waiting for the opportunity of discussing them with the other governments concerned. As for public opinion in Canada it was still in the fluid state, some being disposed to favour an international force for putting down aggression, but many consider this to be unpractical and believe that aggression can be precluded by the collective action of all like-minded states. He then showed his knowledge of our past and present situations by asking me the very pointed question as to whether opinion in Canada would be disposed to sending abroad Canadian forces to put down aggression. I countered by replying that I thought everything would depend upon the form which the future world organization would take. I explained that we had our own isolationist movement, different to that in the United States on account of the difference in our own conditions, but none the less just as potentially strong if Canadian ideals or just wishes were frustrated, and that the best way in which isolationism in Canada could be countered would be to make the Canadian people realise that Canada would have an influence on world affairs and in the future security organization commensurate with our economic and political importance. I further explained that this was the reason we had viewed with concern the possibility of the four-power pattern being adopted for future international organizations. While we agreed that the high strategy of the war had to be left to a few of the leading powers, we did not wish to see this carried over into the post-war organization of international society.

5. This brought Mr. Maisky to the other point he had mentioned in connection with the League of Nations, viz. the requirement of unanimity for its decisions. He recalled how in one case concerning Spain a decision had been blocked by Albania, obviously at the instigation of Italy, in another case by Austria, and in a third case by Costa Rica. This had made a farce of the whole procedure and was the reason why they felt that those countries who had the power and would be chiefly responsible for putting down aggression should have the greatest influence. He wanted to know if I did not think that this justified the great powers being given the decisive voice in making the decisions affecting peace or war. This gave me the opportunity of outlining our policy of the functional principle in international organization. I took as my text the memorandum of instructions to the Canadian delegates attending the meeting of the Council of UNRRA,[72] which I had pretty well committed to memory. Mr. Maisky listened very attentively and appeared to be thoroughly familiar with the history of our efforts to have an important voice in the direction of UNRRA. He then asked me how this principle would apply to the general security organization. For instance, would we admit that decisions should be by majority vote. I said that I did not think our Government had yet defined their policy on a detail of this kind, but speaking personally I thought some such compromise as decision by majority vote with unanimity among the great powers would be in accord with the functional principle and would be acceptable to Canada if the other conditions of the international organization were satisfactory to Canadian opinion.

6. From this subject we turned to the question of reparations and Mr. Maisky made it plain that this was the question to which the Soviet Government attached more importance than any other relating to the terms of peace to be imposed on Germany. He said that there was a danger that after Germany had been defeated opinion in the United States, Canada and other countries far removed from the scene of destruction, would tend to leniency and that this would conflict with opinion in the Soviet Union which felt very strongly that common justice demanded the Germans should make good the destruction they had wrought on Soviet soil. Speaking with feeling he mentioned that one could understand how Stalingrad had come to be destroyed as it had been the scene of a violent battle, but it was impossible to forgive the Germans for their deliberate destruction of Soviet towns and villages. He instanced the damage done to the towns around Leningrad and to Poltava, which had been intact until blown up and put on fire by the Germans just before they evacuated the town. I asked Mr. Maisky if the article by Professor Varga in "War and the Working Class" (see paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of my despatch No. 192 on November 11, 1943) represented the views of the Soviet Government on the reparations questions. A similar question had been put to other Vice-Commissars by other diplomats and they had always received the answer that opinions expressed in "War and the Working class" represented only the views of the authors and in no sense those of the Soviet Government. Mr. Maisky was much franker with me. He said that the Soviet Government had not yet decided fully its policy in regard to reparations and Professor Varga was expressing only his own views, but they were typical of what the Soviet people were thinking on this subject. I then said that the reparations problem was bound to be most difficult because it was a question of reconciling what those who had suffered considered to be just with what was a practical reparations burden for the German people to bear. He indicated that the danger was that other countries would want to be too lenient and would not understand the strength of Soviet public opinion on this subject. They must have machines to replace the factories destroyed by the Germans and they must have German workers come to repair the towns and villages they had damaged. It would be up to the German Government to decide the details as to how they are best able to comply with the Soviet demands in this respect, but the Soviet Government would certainly require that the machines and other materials and workers are provided by the German Government. He repeated the contention of Professor Varga that the Soviet socialized economy was better able to adjust itself to foreign workers coming in to repair war damage than a capitalized economy and, therefore, some of the other countries which had suffered from German occupation might not be so keen on German workers as the Soviet Union. I was on the point of asking if he agreed with Professor Varga that the economic situation of a country which had been the aggressor should not be better than that of the countries which had been the victims of aggression, but decided it would be more discreet not to put the question. It is clear from what Mr. Maisky said that the question of reparations is going to be the most difficult of post-war problems and the one that contains the greatest threat to future cooperation between the United States and other countries on the one hand and the Soviet Union on the other.

7. Mr. Maisky then linked the question of the punishment of war crimes with that of reparations as subjects on which public feeling in the Soviet Union was very strong. He spoke even more emphatically than he did in the case of reparations and mentioned that if the public demand for punishment of war criminals was not satisfied within a reasonable period of time there was a danger of the situation getting out of hand and the Soviet public might take the law into their own hands and ruthlessly punish whomever they could lay their hands on. The Soviet Government, therefore, considered that the best policy was to act quickly and to bring to justice as soon as possible those who had been guilty of war crimes. He hoped that in this respect a feeling of leniency towards Germans guilty of war crimes would not grow up in other countries after Germany had been defeated. I asked him if the Kharkov trial had been held to show the Soviet people that the Government meant business when they talked about the punishment of war criminals and he agreed readily that this had been the chief reason for holding the trial.

8. We then got on to discussing the political situation in the United States and Mr. Maisky made no attempt to hide the anxiety of the Soviet Government lest isolationist forces should again become uppermost or lest President Roosevelt should fail to be elected for a fourth term. He asked me my opinion as to the chances of Mr. Roosevelt being re-elected. I replied evasively that I was sure he would be nominated by the Democrats but that his chances of re-election would depend upon the course of the war, particularly the success of the second front, and also upon the skill with which he would deal with the attacks on his domestic policies. I pointed out that the isolationist forces would be greatly strengthened by any failure to achieve full success in the landing on the western coast of the continent or by any profound disagreement among the major allies. Mr. Maisky agreed and concluded by expressing the hope that the Presidency of the United States would remain in the capable hands of Mr. Roosevelt. This frankness was surprising to me, but it confirms what I have heard about the close attention the Soviet leaders are giving to the forthcoming election campaign in the United States. Their interest in the chances of the re-election of President Roosevelt is a remarkable tribute to the greatness of the man, but it would be just as well if this did not become known to his political opponents.

9. When we reached this point I had been with Mr. Maisky for an hour and ten minutes, considerably longer than is usual in such cases, but he had shown no signs of flagging interest or of desire to terminate the interview. I felt, however, that courtesy required I take up no more of his time, so I took my leave of him.

I have etc.

Your despatch No. 146 of December 21st.†

Under no circumstances should Canadian Army authorities use lack of facilities accorded to our Military Attachés as a reason for withholding similar facilities from Soviet Military Attaché at Ottawa. Similar methods of retaliation have been tried by other countries without accomplishing object in view, but prejudicing friendly relations. Information that might be obtained by our Military Attachés is of very minor significance compared with larger issues at stake. Soviet authorities have their own reasons for withholding facilities from Military Attachés and our representatives are not treated differently from those of other friendly countries. Soviet Military Attaché should be treated with typical Canadian hospitality as an outstanding representative of any army that has more victories over Germany to its credit than any army in history.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa,] April 12, 1944

The attached despatch No. 79 of March 10th [15th] from Wilgress is a most interesting account of a frank and lengthy conversation with Maisky on problems of the peace settlement.

Paragrahs 3-5 deal with the organization of world security. It is interesting to notice that Maisky was fully familiar with the contents of your speech on January 31st just as Molotov had shown himself to be in an earlier talk with Wilgress. Maisky played up in a reasonable way the necessity of according a special position and authority to the Great Powers and Wilgress held up his own end in the discussion with considerable skill.

Maisky's emphasis on the importance to the Soviet Government and people of reparations, which is dealt with in paragraph 6, shows that this question is certain to be one of the most difficult problems of the settlement. The Soviet Government has given some indication of what they may ask in the way of reparations in kind from Germany by their demand from Finland as an armistice condition of materials valued at 600 million U.S. dollars to be delivered over a period of five years. This sum would amount to about three-quarters of Finnish exports during such a period based on pre-war figures. It looks as though the Soviet Government will attempt to place the German people for a considerable period of time in a state of economic peonage and will not only demand vast quantities of materials for reconstruction but also large German labour forces to work in Russia.

Maisky also emphasized (para.7) the strong Soviet feeling on the question of the punishment of war criminals. This is another probable source of controversy after the defeat of Germany as it is very likely that the Soviet list of German war criminals will run to many thousands.

Finally, it is interesting to note Maisky's great concern (para. 8) over the possibility of a swing to isolationism in the United States and his frank avowal of Soviet interest in the election of President Roosevelt for a fourth term.

DESPATCH 84 Ottawa, April 21, 1944

SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to thank you for your two interesting despatches No. 79 of March 15th and No. 101 of March 28th† describing your interviews with the Vice-Commissars of Foreign Affairs. The conversations were, I am sure, of value both to the Vice Commissars and yourself as they are to us. In your despatch No. 79 you suggest that some comments might be made on points raised by Mr. Maisky.

The description given in paragraph three of that despatch of your statement on post-war policy describes the situation accurately if briefly. You may be interested to learn that on April 17th the Prime Minister moved the following resolution in the House of Commons:—

"That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a Department of Reconstruction with authority to formulate and coordinate reconstruction plans and carry out such plans during a certain number of years following the cessation of hostilities; to provide for the employment of officers, clerks and servants necessary for the proper conduct of the department; and to provide for the proper and efficient administration of the act."

It is intended that three departments be set up which were described in the House as follows:

"(1) A department of Veterans' affairs to have charge of the rehabilitation and re-establishment of members of the armed forces, and the administration of veterans' pensions and allowances;

(2) A department of reconstruction to promote and coordinate planning for national development and postwar employment; and

(3) A department of social welfare to organize and to assist in administering activities of the federal government in the fields of health and social insurance."

In the course of his remarks in the House the Prime Minister made this explanation of this Bill:—

"As an illustration of the need for this department of government I might mention briefly two or three essential considerations. The problem of reconstructon will involve the re-employment of nearly two million Canadians now in the armed forces, the merchant navy or war industry. Employment must be productive and must contribute to a rising standard of living. The great industrial plant created for war purposes must be transformed to meet peace time demands in Canada or abroad. Markets must be found and retained for our greatly increased food production unless we are not to face an agricultural depression. Railways, highways and other capital equipment which has suffered the strain of war must be reconstituted. Civilian aviation and other new means of transport and communication must be developed. Public works and conservation and developmental projects will be required, particularly while private industries are being converted to peace time operations. New housing, both urban and rural, improvements to existing housing and community planning can contribute at once to the volume of employment and the improvement of the standard of living.

"These are merely a few of the directions in which reconstruction planning requires to be carried on. Obviously most, if not all, of these functions relate specifically to some existing department of government. A question naturally arises as to why, if that is so, the planning should not be left to each separate department? It will be, I think, obvious that if the government were to proceed in that way there would be the possibility of much duplication and there would not be the opportunity for the coordination of post-war planning which is essential. Moreover, the problem is so large and at the end of hostilities it will be so urgent, that some special agency is necessary to see that plans are made and action is being taken in all the varied fields in which action will be required if we are to achieve and maintain the full employment and full production which are essential to secure the prosperity and welfare of our people.

"The bill which will be based upon the resolution, the extent it sets forth of the method of proceeding with regard to industrial reconstruction provides for similar action to that which has been taken in the United Kingdom. As Hon. Members know, their Lord Woolton has been selected as Minister of Reconstruction. Lord Woolton has not a department of government of his own, rather he presides at meetings of his colleagues representing other departments of government. Along with the experts by whom he is surrounded, he meets with these ministers and brings forward plans of reconstruction, obtains information from the different departments of government as to the projects that are already being proceeded with, and makes suggestions as to methods by which existing and other plans can best be furthered and developed.

"In Canada, we propose to have, in addition to a minister, a department of reconstruction, in order that there may be, so far as this country is concerned, the necessary machinery of government to effect the coordination that will have to take place, not only between the departments of government at Ottawa but also between the dominion government and the several provincial governments as well as municipalities in the provinces. The intention is to make provision for a Minister of Reconstruction, a Deputy Minister, and such staff as may be needed to carry on the work."

He later added that it was the intention that the Minister of Reconstruction should be one of the members of the present Cabinet. This would ensure that the Minister was familiar with the work of the Administration and would be in a position to confer readily with the Ministers of all Departments.

It may be assumed that the Department of Reconstruction when established will draw together and, to some extent, take over the work on this subject which has so far been done within various departments and by special committees. No doubt you are aware that there has been, during the past session and the present one, a House of Commons Committee on this subject.

The points which Mr. Maisky raised about world organization and which you described in paragraph four, go to the core of the problem. Some study of the question of an international army has been made by the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems here but there has been no question so far of the government making a decision on this point. Your answer on Mr. Maisky's second query is a fair description of our position, although it perhaps might be added that Canada did in 1914 and 1939 take very definite steps to stop aggression.

The question of unanimity on decisions in an international organization is also another major problem. That, too, has been discussed by the Working Committee on Post-Hostilities Problems and the objections to unanimity have been fully realized. Whether a majority vote combined with agreement amongst the Great Powers would be a satisfactory alternative is a question that would have to be given very full consideration.

I was particularly interested in your account of Mr. Maisky's views on reparations. The Soviet Union is in a special position in this regard since it can make good use both of German goods and German labour, whereas most other countries concerned, both in Europe and outside it, may be reluctant to interfere with their own production and employment by accepting reparations in the form of goods and labour. Some study has been made of an interim report prepared by a Committee in the United Kingdom in which careful attention was given to the special interest and approach of the U.S.S.R.

I should like again to thank you for these two valuable reports and to express my concurrence with the admirable explanations you made of Canadian policy in respect to the various questions raised.

I have etc.

MOST SECRET [Ottawa, c. May, 1944]

WAR AIMS OF THE U.S.S.R.

On the basis of available information the principal aims of Soviet wartime policy can be defined as follows:

(1) Shortening of the war through major military action by the United Nations on the continent, encouragement of underground activities in the occupied territories and diplomatic pressure on the neutral states.

(2) Complete defeat of Germany and her Satellites and the adoption of measures in concert with the United Nations to keep Germany from becoming strong again. These measures would include reparations, forced labour, punishment of war-criminals, territorial adjustments and drastic administrative changes within Germany.

(3) The setting up of an organization of collective security within which the U.S.S.R. would enjoy equal status with the United Kingdom and the United States.

(4) Restoration of the 1941 Soviet borders and probably such minor frontier adjustments as would be consistent with the ethnographic claims of the constituent republics and with the strategic needs for the defence of the U.S.S.R. as a whole.

(5) Close military, political, and economic relations with the neighbouring states of the Soviet Union. These relations would be based on a series of bilateral pacts of Mutual Assistance directed against Germany and her present satellites, such as the Soviet-Czechoslovak Treaty of 1943.

(6) Encouragement of and support for broad-based representative and progressive governments in Europe. These governments would not be communist, though they would include Communist members to the extent that they enjoy support among the people of the country concerned.

I. TERRITORIAL AIMS

The realization of these war aims would entail the following changes in the pre-war map of Europe in respect to Soviet frontiers.

1. Finland — Petsamo, Karelia and the industrial district of Viipuri would be incorporated in the Soviet Union. The U.S.S.R. would presumably acquire a short common frontier with Norway in the North and Finland would lose her outlet to the Arctic. In December 1941, Stalin told Mr. Eden that the U.S.S.R. would require naval and military bases in Finland, and wished to conclude a Mutual Assistance pact with Finland which would guarantee Finnish independence. The demand for bases may be modified as the Soviets are now willing to let Finland keep Hango, if an armistice is concluded within a short time.

2. Baltic States. — The Soviet authorities consider that this question has been fully settled by the Plebiscites of 1940. The Baltic States would become Soviet territory and the Soviet Union would thus obtain the port of Riga which played an important part in Russia's commerce before the Revolution. The southern frontier of Soviet Lithuania would be extended to include a part of north-western Prussia down to the river Niemen. Koenigsberg and Tilsit would lie within this frontier.

3. Poland — As matters now stand, the U.S.S.R. claims the 1939 Molotoff-Ribbentrop frontier. However they have indicated their willingness to settle the frontier on the basis of the Curzon line, and to make other minor adjustments which would transfer to Poland districts with a predominantly Polish population. No compromise on this issue is likely. As far back as December 1941, Stalin informed Eden that the question of western frontiers "is the main question for us in this war." Poland would be compensated by the acquisition of the lower part of East Prussia, Danzig, and German territory as far west as the Oder.

4. Czechoslovakia — The U.S.S.R. would have a common frontier with Czechoslovakia. It may be noted that at no time have they claimed Carpatho-Russia, whose population is more closely linked, culturally and ethnographically, to the Ukrainians than to the Czechs and the Slovaks. This is all the more significant as there is reason to believe that the Carpatho-Russians would prefer annexation to the U.S.S.R. than to Czechoslovakia. The Russians have suggested that the Czechoslovak frontier should be extended at the expense of Hungary, and that the district of Teschen, seized by Poland in 1938, should be returned to Czechoslovakia, together with the Sudetenland.

5. Roumania — Restoration of the 1941 frontier, by which Bukovina and Bessarabia would be part of the U.S.S.R. As in the case of Finland, the Russians would demand military and naval bases and would be prepared to conclude a pact of Mutual Assistance. This would bring the U.S.S.R. to the mouth of the Danube and would give them control over the Roumanian Black Sea Coast. It is likely that they would favour the ultimate retention by Roumania of the Dobrudja acquired by/from Bulgaria, since an agreement to have naval bases on the Black Sea would give the U.S.S.R. some control over this territory. They have also indicated their desire to return Transylvania, in whole or in part, to Roumania.

6. Bulgaria — As the U.S.S.R. is not at war with Bulgaria, no territorial demands have been made. In December 1941, however, Stalin was willing to allow Turkey to extend her European frontiers towards the Bulgarian seaport of Burgas. It is likely, however, that after the war the U.S.S.R. would be prepared to conclude a Mutual Assistance pact with Bulgaria in return for certain concessions.

7. Turkey — In his 1941 conversations with Eden, Stalin was prepared to sanction Turkey's enlargement at the expense of Bulgaria, and he suggested that the more important islands of the Dodecanese could be assigned to Turkey. This attitude was probably based on the expectation that Turkey would soon join in the war on Germany. As the war progressed relations between the Soviet Union and Turkey deteriorated. At the Moscow Conference the Russians expressed strong dissatisfaction with Turkish neutrality and indicated that the Soviet attitude to Turkey will be determined by Turkey's attitude to Germany. Should Turkey persist, as is most likely, in her present attitude the Soviet Union may present Turkey with a bill for the advantages which she has enjoyed as a neutral and which were purchased at the cost of devastation in other countries. The bill may include territorial adjustments in eastern Turkey (Kars, Ardahan), and economic concessions.

II. SOVIET POLITICAL RELATIONS WITH THE EUROPEAN STATES

The Canadian Ambassador in Moscow has emphasized repeatedly that the Soviet Union will require a long period of peace and security to recuperate from the tremendous losses they have sustained in the war. Thus the need to establish a viable system of European security is of paramount importance for Soviet policy. While there is every indication that the Russians would support the principle of collective security, they have at the same time taken steps to ensure their own security in the event that a collective system fails to materialize.

The leaders of the U.S.S.R. consider that the Anglo-Soviet Alliance of 1942 is the cornerstone of European Security. This treaty would be supplemented by a series of bilateral pacts of mutual assistance with the neighbours of the U.S.S.R. which would protect Soviet western frontiers. In his conversations with Mr. Eden in 1941, Stalin suggested that the United Kingdom might wish to acquire bases in the Netherlands, Belgium and possibly France. The U.S.S.R. would have no objection to the United Kingdom acquiring these bases as well as others in Norway and Denmark, and they would wish the approaches to the Baltic Sea to be secured in some manner. Although these realistic moves appear to break up Europe into spheres of influence, the Soviet leaders probably feel that they are not necessarily inconsistent with collective security based on the functional principle. The Great Powers cannot but be specially concerned about the security of the states which lie on their borders and whose weakness is an invitation to an aggressor. On the other hand, a system of defensive alliances may well prove to be a stable foundation for a system of enduring collective security. In various criticims of the League of Nations published recently, Soviet writers have stated the view that collective security failed not through the absence of adequate machinery, but through unwillingness, due to certain political factors, to make that machinery work.

Through its actions in according a fuller measure of recognition to the French Committee of National Liberation and in establishing direct relations with Italy, the Soviet Government have signified their intention to have a major voice in European affairs, on a basis of complete equality with the United Kingdom and the United States. They can thus be counted upon to participate actively in any organization of European security which may be set up.

At the Moscow Conference and before the Russians had expressed emphatic disapproval of any plans for the post-war federation of European States. While they have offered no objection to federation in principle, they have insisted that such plans are premature since there is no way of ascertaining to what extent the various governments in exile represent public opinion in their countries. Moreover, they have felt that it would not be realistic to federate political heterogeneous states, such as democratic Czechoslovakia and feudal Hungary. They are also afraid that hostile influences, either within the federations or outside, may turn their groupings into anti-Soviet blocs.

Towards Germany the Soviet Government is certain to adopt a very drastic attitude. At the Moscow Conference, Molotov stated that they had not yet decided how far it was expedient to go in breaking up Germany. It appears, however, that Stalin favours the creation of a number of small states, with the Rhineland as a protectorate and Bavaria independent.

The Soviet attitude to the Satellites would be influenced by the practical steps which they take to shake off their Axis connection and hasten a United Nations victory. But in any case they will be compelled to return the territories they have occupied, surrender the persons designated as war criminals, who will be tried in accordance with the Moscow Declaration by the countries they have victimized; and they will have to pay reparations. Their independence, however, will be preserved but only under governments acceptable to the United Nations. Next to Germany, the harshest terms are likely to be imposed on Hungary. At the Moscow Conference, Molotov stated that "half measures in the case of Hungary would be dangerous to future peace." Territorially, Hungary will lose Transylvania, Carpatho-Russia, and probably a part of its southern frontier to Yugoslavia. Italy will probably lose the Yugoslav districts of Triesti and the Adriatic islands and will be required to pay compensation. It will be recalled that the Soviet demand for one-third of the Italian fleet was made as a first installment on the reparations to be settled later.

The Soviet attitude towards the neutral states is not clear from the available information. It is likely to be based on the part which these states have taken in the war against Germany. If the views of the Soviet economist, Eugene Varga, may be taken as reflecting the official position, it is very unlikely that the neutrals would be permitted to retain the best of both worlds. The strongest demand for reparations will probably be made on Spain, whose contribution both in soldiers and supplies to the German war effort has been large. The U.S.S.R. may also require that Turkey should contribute to the restoration and the feeding of occupied countries. A more lenient treatment will probably be reserved for Sweden and Switzerland because of their special geographic positions, although they too will probably be required by the Soviet Government to make a contribution to the general rehabilitation of Europe.

III. THE SOVIET POSITION IN THE MIDDLE EAST

The very little that is known about Soviet objectives in this area is based upon the statements made by Mr. Maisky when he was in Bagdad en route to Moscow in October 1943. He envisaged Soviet participation together with the United Kingdom and the United States in the Middle East Regional Council, such as was suggested by Mr. Churchill. He appeared to regret that the Americans were so well established in Persia and seemed concerned at the possibility that the economic expansion of the United States in the Middle East may lead to political complications. He appeared to favour an early and radical solution of the Palestine problem but could not see how it could be achieved.

By the Teheran Declaration the Soviet Union is pledged to maintain the "independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iran" and to accord full consideration to the special economic problems created by its role in the war. There is some evidence to show that the Soviet Union intends to maintain close and friendly relations with the Shah as well as with the leftist party — the Tudeh. In the interview referred to above, Mr. Maisky indicated the desire of the Soviet Government to keep the trans-Persian supply route open after the war. Mr. Maisky added that the primary objective of Soviet policy was to prevent "disorders" in all territories adjacent to their frontiers. This, he said, was much more important than securing access to warm water ports.

There is no suggestion that the U.S.S.R. has any special interest in Afghanistan beyond the general desire of maintaining friendly relations and preventing "disorders".

During the war the Soviet press has maintained a discreet silence on the subject of India. The dissolution of the Comintern and the reorientation of the various Communist parties towards constructive support for the governments friendly to the U.S.S.R. may result in the Soviet Union lending its support to the United Kingdom in future disputes that may arise in connection with India, provided always that the Anglo-Soviet Alliance remains effective. In any case the U.S.S.R. is not likely to support the nationalism of Gandhi and Nehru who were subjected to much criticism in the Soviet press before the war.

IV. SOVIET POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

The Soviet position is governed by the necessity of maintaining neutrality with Japan so long as the Red Army is bearing the brunt of the land fighting in Europe. This is probably the reason why the Soviet Government has not permitted supplies to China to be shipped through Soviet territory. The withdrawal from Sinkiang last year may be taken as evidence of Soviet desire to maintain friendly relations with China. In this connection it may be worth recalling that in 1937 the U.S.S.R. offered to China a pact of Mutual Assistance directed against Japan. The pact was rejected by China because of the attitude of the Chungking Government to the Chinese Communists. The Chinese are now reported as being apprehensive about Soviet intentions in Mongolia and Manchuria.

As Japan's military position deteriorates the Soviet Government is likely to increase diplomatic pressure on Japan. The recent agreement by which Japanese concessions in Northern Sakhalin were terminated and Japanese fishing rights were curtailed is an indication of the kind of diplomatic pressure the Soviet Union is likely to exert. This may eventually touch upon the question of frontiers. It is not likely, however, that the U.S.S.R. will fight Japan or permit the establishment of Allied bases on its soil. The latter would involve the U.S.S.R. in land fighting to protect the bases and would cut the Far Eastern supply route. Moreover, as Stalin pointed out to Mr. Eden in 1941, it would be better from the Soviet point of view to act only after a Japanese attack on the U.S.S.R. Such a war would be much more popular with Soviet public opinion than if Russia took the first step. At the time, Stalin told Mr. Eden that the U.S.S.R. would be ready to fight Japan by the summer of 1942, but as is clear from subsequent events Stalin was assuming that a second front would already be in existence. The great losses suffered by the Russians since then would appear to be a compelling argument against their participation in the Far Eastern war.

It is almost certain, however, that the Soviet Union would demand a voice equal to that of each of the three Great Powers in the Pacific settlement on the grounds that its contribution to the defeat of Japan's principal ally was in itself a major factor in the collapse of a combined Axis strategy. Moreover, the presence of a strong Red Army in Siberia has immobilized something like forty first-class divisions in Manchuria, while the diplomatic pressure referred to above has deprived Japan of an easily accessible source of oil and of a portion of its food supply, and has protected the Aleutian islands from Japanese reconnaissance. The Russians could also claim that the considerable aid which they alone among the Great Powers rendered to China in the early stages of the Sino-Japanese war, especially in arms and aeroplanes, and their own border fighting against Japan in 1936 and 1939 were significant factors in prolonging Chinese resistance and in determining the Japanese to turn upon the United States before they had taken the necessary precaution of protecting their rear through the invasion of Siberia.

TOP SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of Mr. Wrong's letter of May 9th,† with which he kindly sent me a copy of the notes on the war aims of the U.S.S.R., put together by the Department to be taken to London by the Prime Minister's party. Although these are not intended to be an exhaustive description of Soviet war aims, they cover the ground very completely. I have read them over with great interest and wish to offer the following comments:—

A. In section 2. Baltic States, under the general heading "Territorial Aims" I note the reference to the inclusion of the German cities of Koenigsberg and Tilsit within Soviet Lithuania. My understanding is that a suggestion to this effect was put forward by Marshall Stalin at the Teheran Conference, but I have never been able to learn how serious is the Soviet intention to absorb this purely German territory. It is easy to appreciate the desire for strategic reasons to have a frontier based on the River Niemen, but this sharing with Poland the acquisition of East Prussia so weakens the Soviet case for a frontier with Poland based on the Curzon Line that I am very surprised that they should have put forward this suggestion.

B. Under section 5. Roumania, reference is made to the probability that the Soviet Union will favour the retention by Roumania of the Dobrudja acquired from Bulgaria. This, no doubt, is a slip since in September, 1940, the Dobrudja was assigned to Bulgaria as a part of the territorial adjustments dictated by Hitler at Vienna.

C. In the second paragraph under the general heading of "The Soviet Position in the Middle East," reference is made to the Teheran Declaration pledging the maintenance of "the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iran." This declaration, however, merely reaffirmed what had already been declared when the British-Soviet forces occupied Iran in 1941.

D. Later in the same paragraph reference is made to the desire of the Soviet Government to keep the trans-Persian supply route open after the war. In this connection we must not rule out the possibility of the Soviet Union seeking harbour facilities in an Iranian port such as Mohammerah.

E. In the last part of the notes dealing with "Soviet Policy in the Far East" it is stated that the great losses suffered by the Russians would appear to be a compelling argument against their participation in the Far Eastern war. We must not overlook, however, the possibility that the Soviet Union may seize the opportunity to enter the Far Eastern war when Japan is near collapse and when it involves no great risk. Feeling against the Japanese is strong among the people of the Soviet Union and the Soviet Government would wish to have the more decisive voice in the peace settlement with Japan such as participation in the war would give them.

In conclusion I wish to express my appreciation of the excellent summary of Soviet war aims provided by the notes reviewed in this despatch.

I have etc.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 947 London, June 29, 1945

SECRET. Following recent constitutional changes in the U.S.S.R. Commissars for Foreign Affairs have been appointed for the Ukrainian, Byelo-Russian and other constituent Republics of the Soviet Union.

2. United Kingdom Ambassador, Moscow, thinks it possible that we may at some stage be faced with a definite request from Soviet Government to appoint a separate representative to the Ukraine, and we have accordingly been considering what should be our attitude in that event.

3. It may be that Soviet Government may seek to draw a parallel between the new position in foreign affairs of the constituent Soviet Republics and the position of the Dominions. It has, of course, already been explained in the memorandum handed to the Soviet Chargé d'Affaires in London,[73] of which a copy was enclosed in my Circular despatch D. 79 of the 3rd September, 1943,† that there is no such resemblance. If an analogy to the position of the Union Republics is to be sought, it is to be found not in the British Commonwealth, but in the German Reich as it existed between 1870 and 1918, where some of the constituent States were allowed to exercise a certain limited control in foreign affairs and in army matters, and for that purpose received and appointed diplomatic representatives.

4. We feel, however, that it would be difficult indefinitely to withhold recognition of the international status of the 16 constituent Republics. If the U.S.S.R. is determined on this development of its international position, it would probably be impossible to persuade all the United Nations to stand firm in refusing recognition, and once one country accorded recognition others would follow, and our position, if we stood out, would cause great resentment in the U.S.S.R.

[73]Voir le volume 9, document 547./See Volume 9, Document 547.

5. At the same time, we see no advantage in hastening such recognition. Moreover, there would be difficulties in regard to immediate establishment of separate United Kingdom representatives in the Ukraine for three reasons:—

(1) We might find ourselves being represented as having recognized the Ukrainian Republic's claim to parts of eastern Poland. Since the claimed territory would be only a small proportion of the total territory of the Republic, such a contention would not be good in law. Nevertheless, the situation might be embarrassing.

(2) If we established separate representatives in the Ukraine, Soviet Government might apply pressure publicly to induce us to do the same for the Byelo-Russian Republic which claims parts of eastern Poland amounting to approximately as much territory as the whole pre-1939 extent of the Republic.

(3) The Baltic States Republics might put in similar requests for United Kingdom representatives, when freed from the Germans, which if granted would involve recognition of incorporation of the Baltic States in the Soviet Union.

6. In all the circumstances, we suggest that it should be our aim to try to postpone question of recognition of the 16 constituent Republics until the peace settlement. We should, however, be grateful to learn views of Dominion Governments on the matter.

7. If the Dominion Governments agree with the line proposed above, we would suggest that all British Commonwealth Governments should keep each other informed of any Russian move bearing on this matter. We should also propose to inform the United States Government and ask them to keep in contact with us on the subject. We would also suggest that the various representatives in Moscow should be instructed to exchange information on it.

8. We should be grateful for comments of Dominion Governments as soon as convenient. Ends.

SECRET.. My telegram of December 2nd, 1943, Circular D. 1050.† Whilst agreeing that it is right to supply Russia with maximum amount of information for use against Germany, United States authorities are not prepared to participate in proposed Tripartite Agreement. They consider that object in view can be attained more effectively by periodically presenting to Soviet authorities through Service Missions in Moscow separate agreed United States and United Kingdom lists of items of technical information which would be available to Russian technical representatives in countries of origin. First United States list has already been sent to Moscow, and we have been informed that supplementary United States lists will be sent in future. In these circumstances, we have no option but to conform with this procedure which will, in fact, give Russians all the information which they would have received under proposed Tripartite Agreement.

2. From time to time there may arise question of releasing to Russians items of technical information partly or wholly of Dominion origin. In that event, it is suggested that most convenient procedure would be for United Kingdom Service authorities to consult Dominion Service representatives in London as to authority for and method of disclosure. Should be glad to learn whether Dominion Governments would be prepared to agree to this procedure.

1. Your telegram Circular D. 947 of June 29th. Soviet constitutional changes. We agree with your views on the course to be adopted in the event that a request is made by the Soviet Government for appointment of a separate representative to the Ukraine and we shall be glad to keep you and other Commonwealth Governments informed of any Russian move which comes to our notice. We have instructed the Canadian Ambassador, Moscow, to keep in touch with other Commonwealth representatives there.

2. In view of the substantial number of persons of Ukrainian origin in Canada, we consider it not unlikely that the Soviet Government might also suggest an exchange of representatives between Canada and the Ukraine.

3. We think that the following points in addition to or in elaboration of the points mentioned in your telegram should be kept in mind:

(a) The case of each Soviet Republic for separate recognition in this manner should be considered on its merits. The arguments for recognition are strongest in the case of the Ukraine which is the second largest Slav state and holds an important place in world economy. Any agreement to exchange representatives with the Ukraine should not be considered a precedent establishing the international status of all the other Soviet Republics. In this way we could go some distance to avoid reviving the undesirable controversy over the alleged analogy between the status of these Republics and that of the countries of the British Commonwealth.

The telegram was repeated to Canberra No. 7, Wellington, No. 8, Pretoria, No. 6.

(b) We agree that it is desirable to postpone acceptance of separate diplomatic representation of the Ukraine until after the peace settlement. The Soviet Government may press the matter before then and if so it might be more conducive to Allied unity if recognition were granted promptly since it seems impossible to resist a Soviet request in the long run.

(c) In the meantime, nothing should be done which might suggest to the Soviet Government that they would receive a favourable reply if they should ask now or later for an exchange of representatives with the Ukraine or other Soviet Republics or for recognition of the international status of the Republics in some other manner.

TOP SECRET London, July 17, 1944

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I would refer to your letter of June 21st† enclosing copy of Mr. Malania's Memorandum on the war aims of the U.S.S.R.[75] In compliance with your request this paper was handed to Mr. Hill of the Research Department of the Foreign Office. In conversation Mr. Hill made the following comments:

a) On the whole, the Research Department were greatly interested in the Memorandum and they find themselves in agreement with the outline of the principal aims of Soviet Wartime Policy at the beginning of the paper.

b) They were particularly struck with the point made concerning the Soviet attitude towards Neutral States. Apparently that point had not occurred to them and they consider it very well taken. In their opinion, however, Soviet demands to Turkey are not very likely but it is quite probable that there will be some in the case of Spain. Mr. Hill thought that the Soviet might go as far as requiring the overthrow of Franco (incidentially they have reacted strongly to Mr. Churchill's speech with regard to Spain[76] and violent attacks have been made in their papers against that approach, even if Mr. Churchill himself was not mentioned). In any case, they will no doubt ask for reparations in connection with the Blue Division and they have already listed its Commanding Officers as one of the War Criminals whose surrender will be requested. Mr. Hill gave to understand that they intend to examine this question further and that they may take it up with the Foreign Office. They are glad therefore that Mr. Malania's paper had raised it.

c) On the question of whether the U.S.S.R. will fight Japan there is disagreement with Mr. Malania. It is Mr. Hill's as well as his superior's and the whole of his department's opinion that the U.S.S.R. will declare war on Japan. The reasons for that would be a) the possible results of Soviet neutrality on public opinion in the United States b) the need which the U.S.S.R. will have of industrial and economic assistance for reconstruction purposes: obviously, as long as hostilities against Japan are not concluded, the volume of assistance which can be expected from the U.K. or the U.S.A. will be limited c) the protection of Soviet influence in China especially and in the Far East generally. If the Soviet do not intervene, at the end of the war in the Far East, U.S. influence will be dominant and the U.S.S.R. may find it difficult to prevent the liquidation by the Government of communist elements in China. It is expected that the U.S.S.R. may delay their intervention and drive as hard a bargain as they possibly can but the Research Department are convinced that, in the end, she will join in the war against Japan.

d) As regards Dobrudja, Mr. Hill thinks that Bulgaria rather than Rumania will have it since Soviet Policy will be more pro-Bulgarian than pro-Rumanian: he expects that Northern Bukovina rather than the whole of Bukovina will be claimed.

e) Given the present relations between the U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia, it is almost certain that Italy will not keep the Yugoslavian district of Trieste and the Adriatic islands.

g) Mr. Hill said that he was grateful for our having brought this document to his attention. He returned it with some other papers† which he feels will interest Mr. Malania but he emphasized that these papers were passed on informally and that no reference should be made to them in communications to the Foreign Office or some other U.K. office. If Mr. Malania has any comments he suggested that they might be sent to him personally. Mr. Hill also referred to two Foreign Office Prints: one entitled "Soviet Pronouncements on Foreign Policy"(N 6763/499/38) and the other "The U.S.S.R. and the Principles of the Atlantic Charter and the Four Freedoms" (N.

774/158/38). In case these documents are not readily available, copies have been made and are attached hereto for your convenience.†

Throughout the conversation Mr. Hill expressed his very high opinion of Mr. Wilgress's reports and enquired about his staff, previous experience, etc. Apparently Mr. Wilgress's views are very closely followed in the Foreign Office.

This first exchange of views with the Research Department seems encouraging and if further papers on Soviet Questions are prepared in the Department it might perhaps be desirable to develop further this channel with a view to ascertaining the expert views here at an unofficial level.

Yours sincerely,

C. S. A. RITCHIE

2. United Kingdom Ambassador, Washington, has now been informed that the five British Commonwealth Governments concerned have agreed that the United Kingdom Government should inform the United States Government of their joint views on this matter and should ask the United States Government equally to keep in contact with us in regard to it and to instruct the United States Ambassador in Moscow to keep in contact with his British Commonwealth colleagues. United Kingdom Ambassador, Washington, has been instructed to approach United States Government accordingly after informing Dominion representatives in Washington.

3. United Kingdom Ambassador, Moscow, has also been instructed to exchange any information on this subject with his other British Commonwealth colleagues.

4. We have carefully considered suggestion in paragraph 3 (a) of Canadian Government's telegram, No. 118 of July 13th, that case for exchange of separate representatives with each particular Soviet Union Republic should, when an approach is received from the Soviet Government, be considered on its merits and that any agreement to exchange representatives with the Ukraine should not be considered a precedent establishing the international status of all other Soviet Republics. Exchange of representatives with one Soviet Republic would, however, constitute recognition of its independent international status, and we feel that once independent international status of one of the constituent Republics is recognized in this way, principle would be conceded and independent international status of the other Republics could not consistently be contested. In the circumstances we think it best to adhere to the suggestion in paragraph 7 of my telegram Circular D. 947 of June 29th, that action to be taken on any approach from the Government side for the exchange of Diplomatic representatives with any particular Soviet Republic should be considered on its merits in consultation when the occasion arises. We have instructed the Canadian Embassy in Washington to request the United Kingdom Ambassdor to delay the approach to United States Government mentioned in paragraph 2 of your telegram. We did not regard your telegram D. 947 as proposing this procedure. We consider that in capitals in which there is a Canadian diplomatic representative, it is generally desirable that the views of the Canadian Government should be conveyed to the Government concerned through him and not through the United Kingdom representative.

2. In the present case we did not think that any exchange of papers on the attitude to be adopted in the event of a Soviet request for exchange of diplomatic representatives with one or more Soviet Republics was necessary since the question had in fact already been discussed informally with the State Department by the Canadian Embassy. We understand that they have not reached a definite decision on the line they would take in such an event but there would probably be a strong disposition to avoid or postpone any such exchange between the United States and Soviet Republics.

Mémorandum du ministère des Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Department of External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa,] November 7, 1944

CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN MR. CHARLES E. BOHLEN, CHIEF OF THE EASTERN EUROPEAN DIVISION OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT AND MEMBERS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS, OTTAWA, NOVEMBER 3, 1944

The following officers of the Department were present: Mr. Wrong, Mr. Glazebrook, Mr. Riddell, Mr. Ignatieff, Mr. Norman and Mr. Malania. Mr. Atherton, United States Ambassador to Canada, joined the group towards the end of the meeting.

Mr. Bohlen began by emphasizing that after the war the Soviet Union would wish to proceed with internal reconstruction and would therefore desire as the main object of foreign policy, to ensure the security of the Soviet Union. Soviet leaders had two ways of doing this. The first, to which they attached particular importance and which Mr. Bohlen described as the No. 1 priority of Soviet policy, was to maintain a very close understanding with the other two Great Powers in the coalition. The other method was to insist upon having "friendly governments" in neighbouring states. The Soviet definition of "friendly Governments" is, however, quite different from that accepted by the British and Americans, and tends in practice to become undistinguishable from governments dominated by the Soviet Union. Such governments would be expected to enter into an alliance with the U.S.S.R., and would be under considerable pressure to tolerate no criticism of the Soviet system by their citizens.

This second method of ensuring security, that of insisting on friendly governments, is, however, in danger of jeopardizing what from the Soviet point of view is the more important condition of security, a close understanding among the Great Powers. After having secured friendly governments in the contiguous states, the Soviets may feel that the security of these states, in turn, would not be complete until the latter's neighbours were also "friendly". Thus the process of extending Soviet influence in the name of security might be endless. Mr. Bohlen felt that it was up to the United Kingdom and the United States to make clear to the Soviet leaders that they "cannot have their cake and eat it too," and that pursuit by the Soviet Union of unilateral policies may arouse public suspicion to such an extent that co-operation among the three Great Powers, to which they attach so much importance, would become impossible.

In this connection Mr. Bohlen said that the great majority of Americans felt very strongly on the question of Poland. He, therefore, believed that a stand should be taken by the Anglo-Saxon powers in the interests of preserving the Great Power alliance. He felt it was imperative to explain to the Soviet leaders the state of public opinion in the democracies. In his opinion the Soviet leaders were misinformed by the reports which they were receiving from their representatives abroad. He instanced the reports of the Tass correspondents and said that they were "feeding the party-line" back to Moscow. A meeting of two hundred Polish-Americans which endorsed the Soviet position would receive an impressive coverage, while a mass meeting of thousands which supported the Polish government would be described as a "handful of reactionaries". In reply to a question, he said he had reason to believe that Soviet diplomatic representatives sent similarly biased reports.

In taking a stand against undue extension of Soviet influence, the Anglo-Saxon powers should be careful to avoid giving the impression of a "united front" against the Soviet Union, as this would defeat its own purpose by arousing Soviet suspicions, and encouraging them to proceed unilaterally. The way to get around this difficulty was for the United Kingdom and the United States to make independent approaches, wording their representations differently. When controversial issues were under discussion between the three powers, satisfactory agreements would never be reached if the United States and United Kingdom always acted together; they must constantly be careful to treat the Soviet Government in all respects as an equal, and give no cause for suspicion that they were acting in concert in bringing pressure to bear on Moscow.

Several times in the course of the conversation, Mr. Bohlen reverted to the Soviet Union's insistence on having friendly governments in neighbouring states, and contrasted Soviet policy in this respect with that of the United States. While the United States would, of course, object if a Latin American republic concluded a military alliance with another Great Power, they did not insist on "friendly governments" in the Soviet sense. They would not object to governments which ranted against "Yankee imperialism," for instance. The Soviet leaders, on the other hand, with their personal background of bitter factional strife, were accustomed to think rigidly in terms of black and white. They would consider a government which tolerated private criticism of the Soviet Union, as not friendly. If it was not friendly, it was hostile; and if hostile, it was probably plotting something sinister. This conclusion, in turn, would lead to drastic action. Mr. Bohlen thought that the post-war relations between Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union would be a test-case of the possibility of a friendly neighbouring state of the U.S.S.R. retaining real internal independence. Beneš[78] had done everything possible to show his good intentions. Mr. Bohlen wondered whether in view of this the Soviets would Beneš tolerate any private criticism of the U.S.S.R. in Czechoslovakia.

In disbanding the Comintern, the Soviet leaders wished to emphasize that the Communist parties in various countries were henceforth to act as national parties. They retained, however, their links with Moscow, and while drawing heavily on the particular national traditions in their countries, they were intended by the Soviet leaders to act as pressure groups to keep their government in line with a pro-Soviet orientation. Mr. Bohlen did not think that the Soviets wished to have Communist parties in power in Europe, as this would arouse far too much suspicion. In the case of Germany, the coming to power of the Communist party might even constitute a danger to the U.S.S.R., not only because the German Communists might come to dominate Russia through German industrial and technical superiority, but also because German Communism might be Trotskyist and might wish to proceed at once with the world revolution. Mr. Bohlen said that the very first element to be liquidated in a country occupied by Soviet troops would be the Trotskyists and referred to his own observations of what had happened in Estonia in 1939 in support of this contention.

Eduard Beneš, President of Czechoslovak Republic.

Mr. Bohlen described the ideological basis of the Free Germany Committee in Moscow as the traditional pro-Russian orientation which was strong in a section of the German officer-class and officialdom (the Bismarck tradition). It was this tradition which had enabled the Committee to secure the adhesion of many high-ranking officers, and while the Committee itself might not play a political role in Germany, the Bismarck tradition might well become a political factor.

Mr. Bohlen said very little regarding the Churchill-Stalin conversations in Moscow last month. He mentioned that Stalin had deprecated Pan-Slavism, and Mr. Bohlen thought that the Pan-Slav policy would not be pushed. It was also clear that the Soviets no longer objected to Federations, as such, in Europe. They were, for example, prepared to see a Polish-Czechoslovak federation, provided always that each of the units in the federation maintained direct and friendly relations with Moscow. In this connection, Mr. Bohlen mentioned an apparent contradiction in Soviet policy. During the Moscow Conference in 1943 the Soviet delegation had objected to federations on the grounds that the Governments in exile were out of touch with public opinion within their countries and therefore could not commit their peoples to such an important step. Yet the Soviet Union did not refuse, almost immediately after the Conference, to sign a long-term alliance with the Czechoslovak Government, which was not any less unrepresentative than the others.

Regarding Turkey, Mr. Bohlen said that the Montreux Convention had been mentioned at the Churchill-Stalin meeting. The Convention would probably be revised to permit free passage of Soviet ships through the Straits. Beyond this, Mr. Bohlen did not think the Soviets would go. They were not likely to make any special claims on Turkey, but they would try to prevent the Turks from playing a leading role in the Balkans. Although he appreciated their fears of being bombed, Mr. Bohlen thought the Turks had missed their opportunity by not entering the war against Germany last year.

With regard to the other neutral powers, Mr. Bohlen did not think that the Soviet Union would make any special claim on them, although it was clear from the Soviet reply to the invitation to attend the Conference on Civil Aeronautics in Chicago, that the Soviets did not look upon the neutrals with a friendly eye.

Replying to a question regarding the Soviet attitude to the Dumbarton Oaks Conference, Mr. Bohlen again stressed the importance the Soviet Union attached to the concert of Great Powers. They were prepared to admit China to the group upon the insistence of the others, although they seemed to be frankly puzzled as to why China should be placed in that category. The Soviet Union appeared to think of the International Security Organization as virtually an alliance of the three Great Powers.

With regard to the making of Soviet policy, Mr. Bohlen thought that neither Maisky nor Litvinoff played an important role. Men like Andreev[79] and Zhdanov[80], who had lived all their lives in the Soviet Union, were, he thought, more influential. The real maker of Soviet policy was Stalin. He was, however, tremendously busy and probably issued only general directives. Mr. Bohlen likened such a directive to a lever, which, upon being pressed, set the whole machine into motion. This, he thought, was the explanation of Soviet policy in connection with oil concessions in Iran. The Soviet Union really needed oil. The refusal of the Iranian Government would be represented to Stalin, by a man like Andreev, as the rejection of a friendly offer and as a slight upon Soviet good intentions. Stalin would fume and make some such statement as that Iran should be shown that the Soviet Union was a Great Power and that its offers were not to be treated cavalierly. This would be enough to set the machine in motion. The result was a violent press campaign against Iran and a crude demonstration of Soviet military might in front of the Shah's palace. In the meantime Stalin would be busy, perhaps at the front, and completely unaware of the impression which the working of the machine was producing abroad. This led Mr. Bohlen to stress once again the importance of making quite clear to Stalin the impact of Soviet policy upon foreign public opinion.

Mr. Bohlen did not think that the Soviet leaders had any sinister long-range plans. His personal impression was that Soviet policy was formulated from day to day to meet conditions as they arose.

II

During an earlier conversation between Mr. Bohlen, Mr. Atherton, Mr. Robertson and Mr. Wrong, Mr. Bohlen made some other points not covered in his later talk. Asked about the reasons which led the Soviet Government at the last moment to refuse to participate in the Civil Aviation Conference, he said that he thought that the explanation given in the Tass statement should be taken seriously. The Soviet Foreign Office had known all along that neutral states with the exception of Argentina had been invited to attend. They had themselves formally accepted the invitation in a note dated October 19th, and their delegation was actually in Minneapolis when it was recalled to Moscow. He thought it not improbable that some of the old Bolsheviks in the Praesidium had at the last moment got Stalin's ear and convinced him that Soviet delegates should not sit in a conference with representatives of Switzerland, Portugal and Spain. There was a good deal of bitterness towards Switzerland based on the idea that it was presumptuous for so small a country to refuse to enter into diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R. Furthermore in Moscow there was a tendency to be intolerant towards small states just because they were small. If in addition small states suppressed communist parties as the Swiss had done, this intolerance was increased.

Asked for his views on the relations with Moscow of Communist leaders abroad, Mr. Bohlen said that one must assume that personalities such as Tito, Earl Browder[81], and the French Communist leaders such as Cachin and Thorez, remained in the good graces of Moscow because they maintained their connections there and did nothing inconsistent with the general lines of Soviet policy. Since, however, the Soviet Government was no longer actively interested in promoting world revolution, it was quite possible for Tito to be at the same time a faithful Communist in Moscow's eyes and a Yugoslav patriot. Ex-Communists and Trotskyists were to Moscow the chief public enemies. So long as the connection between communist leaders abroad and Moscow was maintained, the old duality of Soviet policy would continue. The present leaders, however, preferred to use normal methods of intergovernmental contact to promote Soviet interests abroad, and local Communist parties were likely to be employed more for general Soviet propaganda than to influence internal affairs.

With respect to the Churchill-Stalin meeting, Mr. Bohlen said that Mr. Harriman[82] considered that the results were quite satisfactory with regard to Balkan problems; a working agreement had been reached. He was far less happy about the Polish aspects. He confirmed that the Polish Committee of Liberation contained elements which the Poles had reason to regard with grave suspicion.

There was also some discussion of the status of the constituent Soviet Republics. Mr. Bohlen thought that in reality the significant change had been that relating to the army. He commented that the authority of the central government was effective even in the fields reserved to the constituent republics under the constituion, and it was quite inconceivable that they would be allowed to exercise any independent initiative in foreign affairs. He took little stock in the view that the constitutional changes, by encouraging diversity, might in the long run be welcome to the rest of the world; there was no intention to allow real liberty of action to the republics. He agreed that the right of secession nominally accorded to the republics in the Constitution could not be exercised, since there was no constitutional method of exercising this right. He did not seem to be very apprehensive about the use to which the Soviet government might put the alleged right of the republics to be directly represented on international bodies, and so on.

SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to report that, in spite of some recent manifestations of Soviet policy, I still believe that the Soviet Government are desirous of co-operating fully with the other great powers in laying the foundations for a lasting peace. By this I have never intended to convey that the Soviet Government would at all times placidly conform to the pattern sketched by the Anglo-Saxon powers. They will continue aggressively and in their own peculiar manner to exert their will on international policy whenever they consider their special interests are involved, but the main objective will be the avoidance of international unrest if this can be accomplished without jeopardising their vital interests. The reasons for this main objective are not unselfish in that the Soviet Government wish above all else to have a long period of external security in order that they can accomplish the tasks of internal reconstruction, which in the end will result in the country becoming still more powerful economically and therefore militarily.

2. This view is disputed by many, otherwise well-informed, observers abroad, who hold that the Soviet Government are motivated by aggressive intentions and are aiming to incorporate within the Soviet Union many of the territories on her western, southern and eastern borders. Those who hold this view are confirmed in their opinion by certain recent actions and policies of the Soviet Government, just as those who hold the contrary view are encourged by the magnanimity shown by the Soviet Government in the recent armistice negotiations with Roumania, Finland and Bulgaria, their cooperative action in regard to Yugoslavia, their willingness to assist in making effective international organs, such as the International Security Organization, U.N.R.R.A., the Food and Agricultural Organization, and the International Monetary Fund, and their pains to maintain unity in the Anglo-American-Soviet coalition against Nazi Germany. As so often happens those who hold the opposing sets of views go to extremes in expounding their respective theses and draw too far-reaching conclusions in support of theses theses from recent manifestations of Soviet policy. The truth lies somewhere in between and the difficulty is to place the proper valuation on such evidence as we possess. In adhering to my principal contention that the Soviet Government wish to follow a policy not of aggression but of avoiding actions that will disturb international harmony to any serious extent it is incumbent upon me to examine some of the evidence to the contrary produced by those who attribute motives of aggression to the Soviet Government. This can best be done by reviewing Soviet policies in relation to other countries and those recent actions that have caused uneasiness even in the minds of those confident of the peaceful intentions of the Soviet leaders.

3. The most disturbing recent signs of overt Soviet pressure on her smaller neighbours are the attacks in the Soviet press against Turkey and Iran. As regards the former the attacks are comparatively mild and may be said to reflect in part displeasure at Turkish failure to enter the war before it was too late. They probably also are a preparation for the day when the question of the Straits will become once more a principal subject of international controversy. The Soviet Union undoubtedly feels that the Montreux Convention must be scrapped because it does not accord recognition to the paramount interest of the Soviet Union, as the leading Black Sea power, in the question of navigation through the Straits. I should be surprised, however, if in putting forward what she considers to be her just claims for the internationalization of the Straits the Soviet Union will do anything which will create uneasiness about her intentions towards the integrity of Turkey or about her desire to play a role in the Mediterranean. The readiness with which the Soviet Government have accorded the United Kingdom a free hand in Greece shows that the Soviet Union is not ambitious as yet to meddle in either Mediterranean or Middle Eastern affairs, although undoubtedly in the future she will watch developments there closely and endeavour to increase her influence gradually by promoting economic and cultural relations.

4. More subtle reasons must be looked for in the recent crude bullying of Iran as a result of the refusal of the Iranian Government to grant now a concession to the Soviet Union for the exploration and exploitation of oil resources in northern Iran. I take this to signify a warning to Iran not to indulge in the old game of playing one great power off against another. British policy has been to bring the United States into Iran as a counter-weight to the Soviet Union. This has been resented by the Soviet Government who fear the possibility of future clashes with the North American colossus if the latter becomes embroiled in any of the countries bordering on the Soviet Union. The Iranian Government in refusing to grant the oil concession may have believed that after the war United States interests would outbid the Soviet Union for the concession. The Soviet Government response is to make clear to the Iranian Government that the integrity of Iran will be respected only to the extent that the Iranian Government recognize the division of the country into the already defined British and Soviet zones and keep outsiders out of the Soviet zone.

6. [sic] The Afghan Ambassador in Moscow has been even more apprehensive than the Iranian Ambassador about future Soviet intentions towards his country. A border incident has arisen over disputed ownership of some islands in the River Amu Darya which serves as the boundary between the two countries. These islands have been occupied by Soviet troops and the Soviet Government state that the border dispute can be adjudicated after the war. Difficulties have also arisen through the friendly reception accorded by the Afghan Government to Uzbeks and Tadjiks who to the number of 40,000 have sought refuge in Afghanistan from collectivized agriculture and religious persecution. It is clear, however, that the Soviet Government will seek to maintain correct relations with Afghanistan so long as India remains part of the British Empire and the Anglo-Soviet Alliance continues to be one of the corner-stones of Soviet foreign policy.

7. The most recent indications of Soviet policy towards China have been pressure to secure the removal of Governor Sheng from Sinkiang and attacks in the Soviet press against the Central Government for using a large force of well-equipped troops to blockade the Communists, thereby showing more interest in preventing the spread of Communism than in fighting the Japanese. On the Sinkiang issue the Soviet Government were seeking to eliminate a governor whom they considered to be hostile to the Soviet Union and whom the Central Government were unable to control. The removal of Governor Sheng has eliminated this cause for friction and the Chinese Ambassador reports an improvement in relations as a result. Here as in other border districts the test will be the ability of the Central Government to maintain effective control. As regards the Chinese Communists there is little evidence that the Soviet Union is interfering in Chinese politics or according material support to the Communists. On the other hand the Communist issue does provide a useful instrument for the Soviet Government to bring pressure to bear on China by instituting whenever they see fit press attacks on the dictatorial and non-democratic character of the Central Government.

8. In its policy towards China the Soviet Union will be guided by the consideration that a strong China is just as likely to be a threat to Soviet interests in the Far East as a strong Japan. For this reason there may be some substance to Chinese fears that the Soviet Government might like to see established a series of small socialist states in North China stretching from Outer Mongolia to Manchuria and from the Amur to the Yellow River. It is not likely, however, that the Soviet Government will take any positive steps to further these plans if in doing so it would bring them into serious disagreement with the United States. They realise very well that there is no area where conflict of views with the United States is more likely to cause serious trouble than China. Being nearly as dependent upon United States economic assistance as China itself they will be careful to respect the territorial integrity and sovereign rights of China so long as the United States Government support the Central Government of that country. This does not mean that the Soviet Government will refrain from doing everything possible to increase economic and cultural relations with such territories as Sinkiang and Manchuria, but any special political and economic concessions probably only will be sought in agreement with the other Allies as part of the bargain for the participation of the Soviet Union in the war against Japan. This might apply, for instance, to transit rights over the Manchurian railways and port facilities at Dairen. On the other hand it is unlikely that any tears will be shed in the Kremlin if China through its own weakness should split up into a number of units leaving only small powerless states along the border with the Soviet Union.

9. The settlement with Japan many present the possibility of differences between the Soviet Union and the United States over territorial adjustments in the Pacific. The Soviet Union may want and, if they participate in the war against Japan, probably will receive the southern half of the Island of Sakhalin. The Soviet Government, however, may put forward claims for the Kurile Islands which extend from the southern tip of Kamchatka to Japan. Certainly, they would not welcome the transfer of any of these islands to United States ownership or control.

10. Turning to the western frontier of the Soviet Union we find a very varied picture depending on the type of regime in power in each of the neighbouring countries. The most encouraging example of the correctness of Soviet policy is the attitude towards Finland since the signature of the armistice agreement with that country. Finnish stubborness has won the respect of the Soviet leaders and with faithful execution by the Finns of the armistice terms there has developed a trend towards the cultivation of friendly feelings between the peoples of the two countries. The Finns for their part are greatly relieved that their fears about Soviet troops occupying the more settled districts in Northern Finland and about Soviet interference in Finnish politics have proved to be unfounded.

11. Poland continues to be a major threat to allied harmony. Most blame must be ascribed to the anti-Soviet attitude of the Polish emigrés from whom the Polish Government in London have derived their chief support, but the emergence of Mr. Bierut with his communist antecedents has created misgivings about the intentions of the Soviet Government respecting Poland. Soviet policy is directed at the removal of any possibility of a regime coming to power in a future independent Poland which will prosecute policies hostile to the Soviet Union and thus make Poland a base for anti-Soviet intrigues. This probably can be achieved only by destroying the vestiges of feudalism in the Polish social structure, and thus there comes about a considerable degree of interference in the internal affairs of Poland. Unfortunately there is enough similarity between this situation and the United States attitude towards the present regime in Argentina to enable the Soviet Government to draw comparisons. However, the proximity of Poland, while justifying more interest by the Soviet Union in the type of government in power in that country, does tend to place the Poles in a position of dependence on the Soviet Union and definitely to earmark Poland as part of the Soviet sphere of influence. The solution in my opinion is to strive after the war to bring about economic cooperation between all the relatively politically weak units occupying "the peninsula of Europe." The United States with its practical altruism and its political disinterestness in Europe is in the best position to promote this objective as an offset to the tendency for the division of Europe into spheres of influence.

12. In marked contrast to Poland, Czechoslovakia remains the one country in eastern Europe following consistently the policy of close cooperation with the Soviet Union without jeopardising its political independence. With its highly developed industry and its strategic geographical position Czechoslovakia could do much in association with the industrial countries of western Europe to bring about that economic cooperation referred to in the preceding paragraph. This would be consistent with the previous policies of Czechoslovakia, and, if carefully handled, need not endanger the close understanding reached with the Soviet Union in the political sphere. The success which the Czechoslovaks have achieved in the latter respect gives them a unique opportunity for leadership in the post-war reconstruction of Europe, provided they receive the correct degree of encouragement from the two Anglo-Saxon powers.

13. Judging from the Soviet press the Soviet Government are not very satisfied with the present political situation in Roumania. The government of that country is criticised for not carrying out a sufficiently drastic purge of pro-fascist elements. The criticism is directed chiefly against the National Peasant Party and the Liberal Party and it would seem that the Soviet leaders would like to see these two parties eliminated from the government and a new regime installed in which the Communist Party would have more influence. The Roumanians thought they were being astute when they appointed Mr. Patrascanu, one of the Communist leaders, as head of their armistice delegation but this made no apparent difference to the manner in which they were treated in Moscow and M. Patrascanu probably lost face with his followers as a consequence. Since then, however, the Soviet press has kept up a constant criticism of the right-wing of the government, particularly the factions led by Maniu and Bratianu. The Roumanian Government have also been criticised for the manner in which they are carrying out the armistice terms, particularly the return of machinery and other industrial equipment looted from the Soviet Union. There has also been reports of difficulties having arisen between the foreign-owned oil companies and the Soviet Armistice Control Commission over the ownership of piping and other oil-well equipment. On the whole it looks as if Roumania is likely to provide a source of considerable trouble in the future and that the Soviet Government will not be so scrupulous in avoiding interference in the internal affairs of Roumania as they are in the case of Czechoslovakia. Like Poland, Roumania appears to have come very definitely within the Soviet sphere of influence.

14. The Soviet Union have very close historical and cultural ties with Bulgaria and the people of that country are very friendly disposed towards the peoples of the Soviet Union. The geographical position of Bulgaria, however, brings it very close to those Mediterranean interests which the United Kingdom regards as its concern. Mr. Eden achieved a real victory in Moscow last month in securing Soviet recognition of that fact. Nevertheless the occupation of Bulgaria by Soviet troops has led to the Soviet Union becoming more strongly entrenched in that country than ever in the past and henceforth we may expect the Bulgarian Government to pursue a consistently pro-Soviet policy. While this will lead to the influence of the Soviet Union throughout the Balkans becoming very great, it need not imply a threat to the integrity of Bulgaria. This threat probably will be lessened further if the Soviet Government succeed in supplanting the Montreux Convention with a new convention providing for international instead of Turkish control over the Straits.

15. A few weeks ago it looked as if the Soviet Government were still distrustful of the Yugoslav Government headed by Premier Subasic and inclined to favour the consolidation of control by the Yugoslav Committee of National Liberation headed by Marshal Tito. Mr. Eden was able to satisfy himself that the Soviet Government are anxious that Yugoslavia should not become another Poland and that they are willing to cooperate with the United Kingdom Government in the establishment of a government of national unity in Yugoslavia. Many problems still face that country but apparently it is to be spared a divergency of policies by the great powers and will be permitted to work out its own salvation with the minimum of interference from outside.

16. Admiral Horthy, while still Regent of Hungary, wrote a personal letter to Marshal Stalin last month seeking an armistice. He acted too late and was not in a position to swing all of his people to turning on the Germans. Hungary, therefore, will be conquered and there is no knowing what will happen. It is unlikely, however, that this country will prove a bone of contention between the great powers. It is too small to be of interest to the Soviet Union. Although Hungary has a more pronouncedly feudal social structure than Poland, there have been very few attacks in the Soviet press against the Hungarian magnates. This is because they have shown little enthusiasm for Naziism and Hitler has found his support mostly among the middle class of Budapest to whom his anti-semitism appealed for economic reasons.

17. The Soviet leaders assured Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden when they were in Moscow last month that they were not interested in Greece and that they recognised the importance of Greece to the United Kingdom as the principal Mediterranean power. No doubt the corollary to this is that the United Kingdom should recognise the paramount interests of the Soviet Union in territories of special interest to the latter country. Comparatively little interest in Italy is now being shown by the Soviet Government and the minor struggle which took place over that country last year probably was for the purpose of assuring the Soviet Union of its place as a full and equal member of the three-power coalition as well as to gain the sympathy of left-wing elements everywhere for the championship of a government representative of progressive forces and completely purged of reactionary elements.

18. Throughout the past two years the Soviet Government have been taking a very great interest in France and have been posing as the supporter of the progressive elements in France as against the more doubtful support of the other two great powers. When official recognition was accorded recently to the Government of France the Soviet Government allowed the rumour to circulate in Moscow that they all along had been in favour of recognition and that it had been hesitation on the part of the other two great powers that had deferred action until now. Behind the scenes, however, Soviet policy towards the French Committee of National Liberation had been vacillating, depending largely upon the extent to which General de Gaulle was influenced by the right or left-wing members of the Committee. The Soviet press recently has given prominence to telegrams from Paris reporting dissatisfaction with the decree disbanding the Patriotic Militia. This, however, has not prevented the Soviet Government from coming out with the proposal that France should be made a full member of the European Advisory Commission when all that Mr. Eden had proposed last month was that France should attend meetings of the Commission when matters relating to Germany were being discussed. Soviet policy probably is to woo France and prevent her from becoming too closely allied with the United Kingdom which would have the result of aligning the countries of western Europe into a close partnership for the furtherance of their common interests in the light of the new balance of power throughout the world.

19. There is good reason to believe that the Soviet Government have been disappointed at how the Anglo-Soviet Treaty Alliance of May 26th, 1942, is working out in practice. When the treaty was signed they hoped that this would mean the regulation of Europe by the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union, the former being responsible for western Europe and the latter for eastern Europe. They also hoped that the United States would not take too great an interest in European affairs. The day the treaty was signed Mr. Maisky, the then Soviet Ambassador in London, remarked that it would help the United Kingdom to withstand pressure from the United States. After that, however, the United Kingdom commenced to shape its policy closely to that of the United States. There commenced the frequent conferring together of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt. The practice grew to such an extent that the Soviet Government commenced to feel themselves an inferior member of the three-power coalition. This feeling became pronounced at the time of the 1943 Quebec Conference but was allayed by the successful outcome of the Moscow and Teheran Conferences which followed shortly thereafter. The conversations which took place last month when Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden were in Moscow further sucessfully restored the proper understanding between the two Allies, but the Soviet Government are now under no illusions about the necessity of the United Kingdom closely coordinating its policy, even as regards Europe, with that of the United States. Hence the Soviet desire that France should not become too closely aligned with the United Kingdom.

20. Uneasiness already can be detected in the United States that the Soviet Union may stir up political unrest in Latin America. There is nothing that I can think of more likely to prejudice that economic cooperation of the United States in the internal reconstruction of the Soviet Union than apparent interference by the latter country in the affairs of the Latin American countries. It would be my surmise that the Soviet diplomatic missions already established in Mexico, Cuba, Colombia and Uruguay have been enjoined strictly to avoid giving any appearance of being interested in the internal political developments of the countries in which they are stationed. I think you have found this to be the attitude of the Soviet Embassy at Ottawa and while the Latin American countries offer a more fertile field for encouraging political unrest, I should be surprised to find that the Soviet Government would consider the present or the immediate post-war period suitable for exerting that influence they are in a position to exercise on developments in those Latin American countries ripe for political change.

21. What probably has caused most uneasiness of late has been the Soviet attitude towards participation in some of the international organizations now being set up to regulate the post-war world. The Soviet demand that the permanent members of the proposed Security Council participate and have the right of veto in cases in which they are parties to a dispute can be regarded as equivalent to asking that the great powers should be above the law. The Soviet attitude, however, is largely a reflection of the past suspicion and mistrust in which the Soviet Union was regarded by other countries. While the activities of the Comintern were basically the reason for treating the Soviet Union as a pariah, there was a great deal in the attitude of other countries that the Soviet leaders are unable to forget and this makes them take precautions to preclude a ganging up of other countries against them. This explains the difference of views that arose at Dumbarton Oaks about voting in the Security Council. Mr. Molotov's plea to the British Ambassador that other countries should learn to trust the Soviet Union does show that the Soviet Government believe in and wish to make effective the system of security envisaged in the proposals for an International Security Organization. They will support the organization fully so long as it is not used to thwart what they consider to be their just aspirations. It is true that if any other important country made such a reservation, the system would not be worth the effort expended on making it work, but under the conditions whereby the Soviet Union emerges from the war as the predominant military power on the Eurasian land mass it is probably the only basis on which complete Soviet cooperation in the maintenance of a long period of peace can be secured and as such is worth trying. Certainly the Dumbarton Oaks proposals in themselves should provide an effective guarantee against the resurgence of German aggression. It will keep Germany and all smaller countries quiet even if it cannot "police the policemen."

22. It is ironical that just about the time there are published the details of a system of security designed to curb effectively renewed German aggression, there should be a spate of schemes for accomplishing the same end by destroying German industry and thus depriving the peaceful world economy of one of its most productive units. Naturally such schemes meet with a ready response in the Soviet Union where the loss of German economic cooperation in the future would be more than compensated for by the complete disappearance of the base of the military power of the only rival to the Soviet Union on the Continent of Europe. This is the danger inherent in putting forward schemes for the future of Germany that are devoid of any constructive features. The one rock on which future cooperation between the Soviet Union and the other two great powers is most likely to founder is the treatment to be meted out to Germany. It is essential to the future peace and welfare of Europe as well as of the world that the German people should have the opportunity of devoting their energy and skill to contributing a large share to mankind's common pool of peacetime products. The Soviet Union will be out for a hard peace no matter how destructive the terms and if we are to be spared a peace settlement devoid of constructive features there must be resistance on the part of the other two great powers to the extreme proposals likely to be formulated in Moscow. The German problem will have to be handled carefully if harmony among the Big Three is to be maintained, but it is doubtful that the Soviet Union would withhold its cooperation simply because it could not have its own way entirely over the settlement with Germany.

23. There are functional fields in which it will be difficult to attain full Soviet cooperation. This will be mostly for military or security reasons, such as in the case of the regulation of post-war civil aviation. In other cases it will be because the Soviet Union will not wish international organizations having too much authority in eastern Europe as illustrated by the case of the proposed European Inland Transport Organization. The great influence of the N.K.V.D. (People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs) and their antipathy to foreigners learning too much about the Soviet Union will preclude the granting of permission to foreign experts or commissions to come to the Soviet Union to conduct investigations or functions on behalf of international organizations. All this is a reflection of the extreme centralization of power in the Soviet Union and the lack of faith in either external or internal security, but it does not mean any unwillingness on the part of the Soviet Union to cooperate fully in the maintenance of peace.

24. To sum up, we can see that it is going to be very difficult to get along with the Soviet Union and trouble may constantly be arising over matters of important but not vital concern. On the large issues that determine peace or war — even on those that determine a sense of security or international uneasiness — we may expect that the Soviet Union will throw its full weight behind the forces working for peace and security. In no other way can the Soviet leaders carry out their aims of reconstructing the economy of the country, of repairing the glaring weaknesses in that economy and of making a people that have had to bear terrific hardships for nearly thirty years at least, reasonably happy and content.

DESPATCH 193 Moscow, April 16, 1945

TOP SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to enclose herewith four memoranda,† prepared by Mr. Arnold Smith, on (A) Soviet Attitude to Relief and Economic Reorganization Problems in Europe; (B) Soviet Attitude to International Transportation Coordination; (C) Certain Aspects of Soviet Diplomatic Techniques; and (D) Some Reflections on Bargaining Points and Materials for a Strong Policy by the Western Democracies. These studies are intended as background to explain certain conclusions which recent events have suggested:

(i) That the Soviet government at present seems intent on creating relatively exclusive zones of influence for itself in Europe and probably elsewhere.

(ii) That the Soviet government seems at present unwilling to cooperate seriously in international economic planning, or to contemplate meshing the economies of countries in "their" zones of Europe with those of the rest of the continent and the world. It is intended, however, that they be closely integrated with the economy of the Soviet Union.

(iii) That there has recently been a marked deterioration or stiffening in Soviet diplomatic techniques during the first three months of 1945, and an attitude of increasing unwillingness on the part of the U.S.S.R. to cooperate closely and frankly with their major Allies, especially in matters affecting the "Soviet" sphere in Europe.

(iv) That it is therefore time for a firm diplomatic line to be taken by the Western powers in their dealings with the Soviet Union, and that it is also desirable to consider building up those areas in Europe and elsewhere where Western influence is or can be dominant.

(v) That continued Western firmness may induce the Soviet Government to modify, at least temporarily, its present clearly isolationist trends.

(vi) That cooperation between the Western powers and the Soviet Union is in any case not ruled out. But it will have to be on rather other terms than those generally contemplated during recent years.

2. It seems that the Soviet Government at present intends that its post-war influence in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Romania and Bulgaria will be not only predominant but in effect more or less exclusive. This determination is illustrated by their insistence on Communist-controlled governments in these countries, and by other points mentioned in the attached memoranda. The Soviet government has decided to have a firm military alliance with Yugoslavia, and despite the secret "50-50" understanding regarding this country concluded last autumn in Moscow with Mr. Churchill it seems almost inevitable that Soviet influence with Marshal Tito and his supporters will be so predominant as to be exclusive in fact if not in form. The Soviet Government insisted on a Communist,[83] Mr. Fierlinger, being appointed Prime Minister of Czechoslovakia. It remains to be seen whether Soviet exclusivity will be possible here, whatever they wish. The Czech Government has already tried, on Soviet pressure, to delay or restrict the establishment of a United Kingdom Embassy in liberated Czechoslovak territory.

3. There is no reason to believe that Soviet zones of exclusive influence will be limited to Europe. It is significant that at the recent Trade Union Conference in London the Soviet delegation suggested that invitations be sent to the trade unions of the special areas in Iran and China. Regarding China, we understand that the Chinese Communists (who seem to have been more far-seeing and efficient than the Kuomintang) have predominant influence among the guerilla organizations in Japanese-occupied parts of northern China. Soviet control over the Chinese Communist Party seems to be at present non-existent or slight. But if the Soviet Union enters the Pacific war it is an easy guess that the Red Army will fight primarily in northern China and Manchuria. Close military cooperation must therefore be developed between the Red Army and the Communist guerillas. It is probable that after the war this military control of Russian communists over Chinese Communists will be to some extent at least perpetuated in the transposed form of political control.

4. It also seems clear, as the two attached memoranda on economic planning show, that the Soviet Government is at present unwilling to cooperate seriously in effective international economic planning, or to allow the economies or transport systems of countries in "Soviet" zones of Europe to be meshed with those in the rest of Europe. The Soviet Government has nevertheless been unwilling to state frankly its general policy in this field. Almost every suggestion of world or European economic and social coordination is accepted or even welcomed in principle. In each specific case, however, various reasons have been given for avoiding active coordination — reasons none of which seem quite plausible. When Soviet policy in all these economic and transport fields is considered together the conclusion is unescapable that the Soviet government does not in fact wish to take part in such activities. Organizations in which they have thus far refused to take part, and in some cases whose very existence they have tried to prevent or postpone, are the European Economic Organization, the European Inland Transport Organization, the International Civil Aviation Organization, the United Maritime Authority, etc. A detailed examination of Soviet policy regarding UNRRA, of which the Soviet Union has become a member, reinforces rather than weakens our general conclusion.

5. Virtually the only functional economic and social organizations in which the Soviet Union wholeheartedly participates seem to be those in which they commit themselves to little in the way of concrete action, and obtain the maximum in propaganda effect. The leading example here is the World Trade Union Organization which the Communist Party seems to be making a serious effort to "capture".

[83]Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Social Democrat.

6. The memorandum on certain recent aspects of Soviet diplomatic techniques lists a number of facts which, if it is granted that the emergent pattern is more than coincidental and is therefore not irrelevant, call for the most serious consideration. The patent falsity of many of the explanations given for Soviet policy, and the virtual disregard of certain obligations freely assumed, is new. There is thus some reason to believe that a basic change in the directions of Soviet policy has recently been decided upon in the direction of more "isolationism". Alternatively this switch may always have been the Soviet long-term intention to be put into effect only when the military threat of Germany is removed. In any case, it would seem that the Western powers must not only reconsider their interpretation of Soviet policy, but also seriously reconsider their own policies in the light of this reinterpretation.

7. The United Kingdom and United States Ambassadors in Moscow have been reluctantly forced to the conclusion that it is now essential for the Western powers to adopt a much stiffer attitude in diplomatic relations and policy regarding the Soviet Union than has been followed at any time during recent years. I understand that Mr. Churchill is now also of this opinion, and that Mr. Roosevelt came reluctantly to a similar tentative decision shortly before his death. Events have forced us to general agreement with this view.

8. It is quite possible that if the Western powers adopt at once a strong and realistic policy, along the lines described in the attached memoranda, the Soviet Union can be brought to modify its present clearly uncooperative and isolationist attitude. They may also modify some of their more unsatisfactory diplomatic techniques. They may thus be forced to reconsider, more favourably, the advantages of closer cooperation with the rest of the world, on a less exclusively "spheres-of-influence" basis. This seems to us the one hope of realizing even a slight approach to the widely-held ideal of "One World".

9. In any case, whatever the results of the strong "educational" technique described in the latter paragraphs of the attached Memorandum "C" on diplomatic techniques, and particularly in Memorandum "D", it would seem essential for the Western powers to concentrate without further delay on the building up of areas in western and southern Europe which during the emergency period are our main responsibility and the populations of which can in the post-war period be our reliable friends. In this connection an early and adequate supply of relief necessities, and an improvement in the food situation, would seem essential, if serious disorders are to be minimized and if Communist influence is to be kept within reasonable limits in these countries. The real dangers of Communist influence lie, of course, not in their social and political philosophy but in the fact that they seem so often to be in effect instruments of the external policy of a foreign Great Power, the U.S.S.R., whose long-term willingness to cooperate with the United Kingdom, the United States, and ourselves, cannot necessarily be predicted with confidence.

10. From a more long-run point of view it is suggested in Memorandum "D" that it would also seem desirable for Western civilization to play an energetic part in the economic, social and political development of backward populations in the Middle East, China and Africa. Such a policy is obviously desirable from a humanitarian point of view. It can also be economically useful as a necessary field for investing the surplus capital of North America during the coming decades and thus as one safeguard against unemployment. This economic development should go hand in hand with educational, propaganda and political programs designed to bring these "backward" populations into contented and therefore reliable partnership with Western democratic civilization. This policy alone can make democratic civilization permanently and overwhelmingly strong. Since the Soviet Government seems always careful to maintain a relatively free hand in foreign policy, and has demonstrated its ability both to make quick reverses in policy (e.g. 1939) and to bully when it feels its own position sufficiently strong, such a nurturing of potential friends and allies is the best long-run political guarantee of continued Soviet cooperation and thus of our security.

11. Considerations both of short-run tactics — "educational techniques" for dealing with Soviet intransigence — and of long-run objectives thus seem to coincide. Consolidation of Western civilization's strength seems under the circumstances the most effective permanent safeguard of future world peace.

12. There is inevitably some danger in a world divided into blocs, but the point is that since the Soviet Union now seems in any case determined to have a powerful bloc of its own, a bloc of Western civilization would seem necessary by default. The chief danger to avoid is thus not a Western bloc, but two distinct and exclusive "British" and "American" blocs which would compete between themselves.

13. It must be emphasized however that though these conclusions, if accepted, are profoundly disappointing, and indeed call for very serious discussions, there is nevertheless no reason whatever for alarm. There is no reason to feel that the Soviet Union will be aggressive at any forseeable period in the future. But a totalitarian dictatorship inevitably lacks those internal checks and balances which are the most dependable guarantee of continuing moderation. It is not true that power always corrupts, but it is true that absolute power can corrupt. A long-run policy of increasing the strength of Western civilization, coupled with a flexible diplomatic technique which would use firmness against firmness, yield advantage usually only against advantage, and that would always be ready to encourage cooperation but would offer no temptation through softness of the undue seeking of expansionist advantage, would seem a necessary educational technique. Such a technique may in the long run integrate the Soviet Union more closely with the rest of the world by continual objective demonstrations of the immediate material benefits of such a course.

14. Even though the Soviet Union insists for the time being on pursuing and consolidating its spheres-of-influence policy on a rather isolationist basis, there is no reason to feel that cooperation between the Great Powers and indeed between all nations will not be possible. This cooperation will nevertheless have to be on terms which take full cognizance of the Soviet point of view and methods.

15. There is no reason to believe that the Soviet Government is not sincere in its desire to take part in an effective World Security Council if on the terms agreed on at Dumbarton Oaks and the Crimea. Cooperation in innumerable other specific fields will also be possible, though it now seems certain that the Soviet Union will only be interested in such specified and carefully delimited fields of cooperation as contain clear material benefit to themselves, or alternatively which involve relatively limited commitments and appreciable gains in prestige or propaganda opportunities. It now seems clear that the dream, which many people especially in England have held, of cooperation with the Soviet Union on something approaching the intimate, frank and relatively free and easy basis which typifies for example Anglo-American relations, will not be possible of realization for some decades to come.

16. It should be borne in mind that there are almost certainly no sinister intentions whatever behind present Soviet policy. It is possible that cooperation between Western powers and the Soviet Union on any other basis than that outlined here, must inevitably have been foredoomed to failure in view of the totalitarian nature of the Soviet economy and of Soviet civilization. To a democrat a 90% majority represents overwhelming security: to a totalitarian a 10% opposition means a potential source of mortal danger. This explains a lot, in the differing approaches to post-war cooperation.

17. Given tacit acceptance therefore of the spheres-of-influence theory which the Soviet Government must have had always in mind, even in their most apparently liberal and cooperative moments, Soviet leaders probably sincerely feel at least as much cause for righteous indignation with United Kingdom and United States policy as many of us must feel towards theirs. While there have been occasional hints in the Soviet press that a West European Bloc or any United States concept of an "Atlantic civilization" based on sea power is contrary to Soviet desires, there has been relatively little real evidence of Soviet moves to prevent the materialization of such groupings, and many signs of Soviet encouragement. Soviet leaders must feel their own philosophy, methods, and objectives as natural, and have their own outlook as unconsciously but deeply coloured with their own techniques and ideals, as we westerners do with liberal methods and our "non-exclusivity" aims. In the light of this psychological background, the repeated efforts by the United Kingdom and United States Governments to interfere in Romania, Poland, and other territories near the Soviet Union must have seemed capable in Soviet eyes of most sinister explanations.

18. We cannot help feeling therefore that the honeymoon period of collaboration between the Western powers and the Soviet Union is — at least for some years — over. Excellent possibilities of sincere and mutually beneficial cooperation nevertheless remain, if the problems are approached without illusion and without weakness.

19. During the last few days — since April 10th — there have been signs that the Soviet Government has become alarmed at the stiffening in Western attitudes of press and diplomacy. There had been a very strong personal message from Mr. Churchill to Marshal Stalin, sent with President Roosevelt's approval, which produced in effect an apology from the Marshal and a hint of concessions. On Friday, 13th April, shortly after President Roosevelt's sudden death, Mr. Harriman saw Marshal Stalin and found him accommodating and reassuring. There will probably now be some concessions with regard to special fields. This swing toward a more cooperative policy is in our opinion a verification, not a modification, of the general memoranda. It is indeed reassuring to find that the Soviet leaders are so sensitive and susceptible to Western firmness.

Mémorandum de l'adjoint, le ministère des Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Assistant, Department of External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa, n.d.]

RE: DESPATCH NO. 193 OF APRIL 16TH FROM MOSCOW

Enclosed with this despatch are four memoranda† by Mr. Arnold Smith dealing with Soviet foreign policy. (A) Soviet Attitude to Relief and Economic Reorganization Problems in Europe; (B) Soviet Attitude to International Transportation Co-ordination; (C) Certain Aspects of Soviet Diplomatic Techniques; and (D) Some Reflections on Bargaining Points and Materials for a Strong Policy by the Western Democracies. The conclusions of the memoranda are summarized in the covering despatch.

Broadly stated Mr. Smith's thesis is that since early 1945 Soviet foreign policy has undergone a change and that the Soviets are now pursuing a policy of creating a cordon sanitaire in reverse in which Soviet influence will be exclusive. Mr. Smith feels that this leaves no alternative to the United States and United Kingdom but to create a strong western bloc, in which western influence would be paramount, and to pursue a firm policy of "yielding advantage only against advantage" as an "educational technique" to teach the Soviet Union that non-co-operation does not pay. At the same time Mr. Smith argues that the western powers should adopt a vigorous progressive policy in the colonial areas, which would turn colonial peoples into reliable friends of the western powers.

Mr. Smith insists, however, that the Soviet Union "has no sinister intentions whatever" nor any intention of being aggressive in any foreseeable period in the future. The purpose of a united western bloc, pursuing a tough policy vis-à-vis the U.S.S.R., should be merely to induce the latter to "integrate" its economy and policies with those of the western powers. This policy would in effect confront the Soviet Union, a Socialist state, by a bloc of "western", i.e.

capitalist powers (for in this context China is also a "western" power) whose aim would be to induce the U.S.S.R. to "mesh" its economy with that of the capitalist world. Mr. Smith does not discuss the probable reaction of Soviet leaders to this policy of pressure and encirclement, but it is difficult to see how it would fail to arouse those very suspicions, which the western powers have been attempting to allay, and which have resulted in the Soviet Union taking unilateral actions to forestall the sort of encirclement which is here envisaged.

It may be added by way of comment that these long-standing suspicions are no doubt behind the Soviet reluctance to participate in the European Economic Council and to give the UNRRA a free hand in Eastern Europe, which is considered by Soviet leaders as of crucial strategic importance for the defence of the Soviet Union. The policy of pushing internal reforms in Eastern Europe and of supporting those Governments which by their actions would be unalterably committed to a long-term policy of co-operation with the Soviet Union is likewise based upon the fear that in the absence of such a policy these states might eventually be used as bridgeheads for an attack on the U.S.S.R., as indeed they were in 1941.

With regard to the European Inland Transport organization, the main Soviet objection to participation was the unresolved Polish problem — a political rather than an economic issue. My own opinion is that political considerations likewise apply in the case of the Civil Aviation Conference. The bloc-voting which was a feature of this Conference might have resulted in the Soviet Government facing the alternative of either accepting certain decisions without being certain of what the shape of the post-war world would be, or of withdrawing from the Conference while it was in progress and thus perhaps wrecking it completely. On balance it may be just as well that the Soviet Union stayed out and permitted it to make at least some progress.

In Memorandum "C" on Soviet Diplomatic Techniques, Mr. Smith lists a series of incidents all showing that the Soviets can employ, though perhaps not too smoothly, such time-honoured diplomatic devices as ambiguity, procrastination, evasion, and even prevarication, and goes on to advance the thesis that the United Kingdom and the United States have hitherto pursued the policy of "turning the other cheek" to Soviet rudeness. This "soft" policy applies, of course, only on the procedural level.

On the plane of high policy, however, neither the United Kingdom nor the United States can be accused of having been supinely acquiescent. In paragraph 11, Mr. Smith points out that as far back as 1942-43, the Soviets made repeated attempts to come to an understanding, particularly with the United Kingdom, on such problems of first importance as the Baltic States, the Polish frontiers and government, Yugoslavia, and above all the future of Germany.

Mr. Smith fails, however, to draw the rather obvious conclusion from the Soviet failure to achieve this understanding. The firmness of the United Kingdom in refusing to commit themselves on these issues cannot have been very reassuring to the Soviet leaders, particularly in the light of their experience of 1938-39, when they found themselves completely isolated and faced with the alternative of either fighting Germany without any assurance that France and Great Britain would also participate to the limit of their resources (which in the light of the "Maginot Line" mentality then prevailing, as well as of the unfortunate experience of the Spanish Non-Intervention Committee, was not an unreasonable suspicion), or of making unilateral accommodation with the enemy they had been consistently denouncing since 1933.

It would be naive to expect the Soviets to be completely reassured as to their political future by the fact that after the blitz began the United Kingdom had put up a magnificent resistance, since the United Kingdom consistently kept putting off political problems until "the peace conference". This attitude aroused the strong suspicion that the United Kingdom expected the Soviet Union to be so weakened by the war, that the latter would willy-nilly have to accept the verdict of the other powers on matters of first importance to Soviet security. It was this suspicion which underlay the second front agitation, as well as the Soviet decision to proceed, in the absence of agreement with the United Kingdom, to make as many unilateral decisions as possible in order to have a strong bargaining position at the final settlement. The efforts of the United Kingdom to associate the United States with its policy in Eastern Europe and Iran merely strengthened Soviet suspicions. Instead of lessening these suspicions, the end of the war with its attendant confusion in Germany has intensified them.

In 1939 Stalin warned against attempts to force the Soviet Union "to pull other people's chestnuts out of the fire". This warning remains the cardinal principle of Soviet foreign policy. Now the chestnuts have been saved, but the question how they are to be divided and who is to eat them has not yet been settled. This situation coupled with the irresponsible newspaper talk about an inevitable third world war against the Soviet Union must give at least as much cause for concern in Moscow, as Moscow's actions produce in London, Washington and elsewhere. It could be argued that the Soviets should have felt enough confidence in themselves and their allies to take a chance on obtaining a square deal. But perhaps the experience of France after the last war made them feel that they must ensure their own security even at the risk of temporarily antagonizing their allies.

In Memorandum "D" entitled "Our Own Cards" Mr. Smith discusses the bargaining counters which could be used by the western powers in forcing the Soviet Union to adjust its policies to the wishes of their Allies. (1) The Allies could make use of their control of the more industrialized portions to Germany to grant or withhold reparations to the U.S.S.R. (2) The Allies should not commit themselves to any long-term loans for the U.S.S.R., but should grant loans and renew them for one year at a time regardless of the effects of such a policy on internal employment. (3) By investing more in India, China and other Asiatic countries than in the U.S.S.R., the Allies could make these countries gravitate towards them rather than towards the Russians. (4) Similar policies should be followed in Western Europe and particularly in Italy and Spain to encourage democratic regimes and draw them closer to the Western Allies. (5)

The Allies should utilize public opinion in the democracies to put pressure on the Soviet Union, since in Mr. Smith's opinion the Soviets are particularly sensitive to what is being said about them. In the last paragraph (p. 5 Memo. D) there is mentioned an expedient recently adopted by the United Kingdom Embassy to circumvent Soviet censorship. The Embassy now transmits by cypher those portions of correspondents' despatches which have been deleted by Soviet censors. These telegrams are then shown to the newspaper editors for their background information.

These five "cards" described by Mr. Smith presuppose a considerable degree of unanimity among the western powers with regard to financial policies, reparations, colonial policies, attitudes towards liberated areas and towards the Soviet Union, which can hardly be said to exist. Mr. Smith's approach assumes also that the people of Europe would be quite ready to support governments which would pursue a "tough" policy. It is rather difficult to conceive the French as willing to run the risk of a fourth invasion of their country in order to bolster the bargaining. This probably is true also of the British people. Even in the United States, where anti-Soviet attitudes cannot be attributed entirely to the recent actions of the Soviet Government, the pressure of public opinion has compelled Mr. Stettinius to adopt one of Walter Lippmann's recent criticisms of the State Department as a statement of the Department's own policy. The recent statements by Mr. Grew[84] and by a group of the State Department's heads of divisions, as well as President Truman's actions in seeking to improve relations with the U.S.S.R., indicate that it is futile to seek a solution of European problems by organizing pressure blocs.

Mr. Smith's memoranda are useful in drawing attention to the difficulties of dealing with the Soviet Union. These difficulties, however, will not be removed either by politeness or by "toughness" on our part, but only by persistent effort to face troublesome problems and to solve them before they have become explosive issues. In any such solutions the limits of our effective intervention should be clearly recognized.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa, June 1945]

VISIT TO THE U.S.S.R. OF GROUP OF CANADIANS FOR THE CELEBRATION OF THE 220TH JUBILEE OF THE ACADEMY OF SCIENCES AT MOSCOW AND LENINGRAD[85]

[85]Note marginale:/Marginal note:
Prepared by Miss Sonya Moravely. R. G. R[iddell]

Invitations were sent in the latter part of May by the Soviet Academy of Sciences to Norman A. Mackenzie, President of the University of British Columbia, Mr. D. A. Skelton of the Bank of Canada and Prof. Harold A. Innis, of the University of Toronto, to attend the anniversary celebrations of the Academy to be held in Moscow and Leningrad between June 15 and 28. [1945]. Two organizations, the Canadian Geographical Society and the Royal Society of Canada, were also asked to send delegates. The invitations were transmitted through the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa and the Department of External Affairs was not officially notified until June 2, but the recipients of invitations were in touch with the Department before this date and the matter had been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister. In view of the obvious advantage of establishing personal contact with Russian scientists, it was decided that the Government should cover the travel expenses of all Canadian delegates up to the point where they would transfer to a Soviet plane and, if necessary, all travel expenses of the two representatives of societies. In the case of individual invitations, it had been made clear that the recipients would be the guests of the Soviet Government while on Soviet territory. The Department also agreed to arrange transportation and possible priorities for the trip across Canada.

Due to the short notice and pressure of other duties, President Mackenzie and D. A. Skelton, as well as Professor J. D. Cockcroft and Professor Rudolf Peierls who received later invitations, found it impossible to undertake the trip. Dr. Hans Selye, Associate Professor of Histology at McGill University, was chosen to represent the Royal Society, and A. E. Porsild, Curator of the National Herbarium, went on behalf of the Canadian Geographical Society.

Dr. Selye, A. E. Porsild and Professor Innis left Rockcliffe Airport on June 6, 1945, and reached Fairbanks two days later. There a Soviet plane was waiting to fly them the rest of their journey to Moscow. The Canadian delegates were told that they were at liberty to stop over at any point in Siberia which they considered to be of interest and they took advantage of this offer in several cases. Both Mr. Porsild and Professor Innis were struck by the recent development of industrial centres such as Novosibirsk which grew from 100,000 inhabitants in 1931 to 900,000 now, Omsk and particularly Sverdlovsk, mostly towns which have benefitted by the movement of industry from the Ukraine during the war. Professor Innis also comments on the museums which he found in these towns; some of these have excellent collections referring to geographical development, history and national resources, but even those which are on a lower level stimulate interest and cultivate a regional pride which the government encourages within the framework of the Union. The scientists had no complaint of not being shown enough, they rather felt that they were seeing too much in too little time.

In Moscow, the Canadian delegates heard a number of papers read by Academicians and gained a fair picture of the achievements of Soviet science to date. On the whole, they agree that these achievements have been vastly overestimated, and that only about 25% of Soviet science is equal to or above the level of American science. The Russians do, however, excel in some fields, particularly in botany, mathematics and arctic research. In connection with the latter, Mr. Porsild, while in Leningrad, met the leading personalities of the Northern Sea Route Administration and had its system explained to him. He found that the Administration disposes of 77 experimental stations distributed in the Arctic area. In addition there are numerous individual investigators who co-operate in their projects. It is the practice for a scientist interested in some phase of Arctic research to be assigned for a certain period of time to the Administration, which in turn sends him for short periods to live and work at the experimental stations. After this experience the scientist returns to his Academy to work over the material he has gathered. Mr. Porsild felt that a great deal could be gained by sending Canadian scientists for limited periods of time to work and study with the Northern Sea Route Administration. He found the Russians eager to exchange material; they offered to send us 40,000 specimens of Arctic flora for study in Canada.

A good deal of original work has also been done in systematic botany and in chemistry, and the standard in mathematics is about the same as in America. Among individuals, the Canadians mentioned Kapitsa, a chemist working on the liquefaction of gases, and Engelgart, working on muscular proteins, as being first rate. On the whole, however, Soviet medical research was found to be far behind that of other countries. In botanical ecology, the reports presented by the Academy were not above the level of standard college text books.

The Soviet Government has given equal encouragement and financial support to all scientists regardless of their special field. The uneven character of Soviet science is attributed by the Canadian delegates to several reasons. Mr. Porsild felt that the very eagerness of the Soviet Government to develop all branches of science in the shortest possible time had led in some cases to the appointment of inferior or insufficiently trained men to highly responsible positions. But there is little doubt that, more than any other factor, VOKS has impeded the progress of scientific research. VOKS isolates the Soviet Union from practically all scientific publications printed abroad; since neither of its two leading figures is a scientist, the main function of this "Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries" seems to be strict political censorship of scientific contacts. Professor Selye found that none of the papers and books he has been sending to friends in the Soviet Union ever reached their destination. Many of the visiting scientists refused to attend a reception given in their honour by VOKS during their stay in Moscow. (In connection with censorship of scientific news, it is interesting to note that of the 30 British scientists invited by the Soviet Academy to the jubilee celebrations, 8 were refused permission to travel by the British government; according to a Reuter despatch, "their services were too essential in the prosecution of the war against Japan".)

Professor Innis points out another reason for the backwardness of Soviet science, namely the subordination of learning to political dogma. This is particularly apparent in an emphasis on practical results in preference to theory. Social sciences and philosophy are neglected while utilitarian science and research leading to the exploitation of national resources is greatly encouraged. Libraries have vast collections of revolutionary literature, and speeches at the Academy repeatedly mentioned the debt science owes to Stalin. Nevertheless, Professor Innis felt that the history papers he heard were paying this tribute to the State mostly as a gesture of courtesy and that, in spite of this ritual, the speakers were not losing sight of the fundamental aims of learning. It is noteworthy that the Pavlov Institute, unlike all other scientific institutions visited, contained no political pictures or slogans. Pavlov himself had been opposed to the Bolshevist regime and his attitude seems to be respected in this way even after his death.

In the choice of subjects, the influence of State-sponsored ideologies is very apparent; the history papers showed a marked emphasis on the pan-Slavonic movement and a great deal of archaeological work had been done on the movement of Slav populations. A strong pan-Slavonic feeling pervaded the meetings of the Academy and contributions of Slav delegates met with extraordinary enthusiasm. Other papers dealt with economic history, agrarian problems and peasant movements. In general, the standard of the history papers was highest when they were concerned with distant countries.

Probably the most powerful impression the Canadian delegates carried away from Moscow was produced by the prestige which science holds in the Soviet Union. It is characteristic that during the war, when all production of civilian goods was at a standstill, the printing of books remained unaffected and scientists carried on their research under normal conditions. A banquet given for the visiting delegates was attended by Stalin, Molotov and Kalinin.[86] Even in Novosibirsk, the mayor of the town came to breakfast to honour the Canadian scientists. In terms of money, the jubilee cost the Soviet government 10 million rubles — a sum no other government would be willing to spend on an undertaking of that kind.

Australia already has a scientist, Mr. Ashby, attached to her legation in Moscow and all three Canadian delegates strongly recommend that Canada follow her example. They feel that science is one basis upon which a normal, uninhibited relationship could develop between the Soviet Union and the outside world. During their stay in Moscow and in Leningrad, they found no difficulty in freely exchanging information with their Soviet colleagues and, in spite of VOKS, they carried away a large volume of publications given to them and left behind others which they had brought.

An interesting point put forward by Professor Innis concerns the indivisible character of science as represented by the Academy of Sciences in Moscow. All minor scientific institutions, of which there is a large number, report to the Academy on their findings, competition such as it exists in other countries is eliminated by the absence of private industry or universities. The ultimate aim of all science is the search for truth and in view of this aim all its various sections must be regarded as inter-dependent and not form water-tight compartments as they often do in America. In this connection, Professor Innis felt that the rigid control of the press and the absence of advertising, the former of which he otherwise found extremely irritating, had a beneficial effect insofar as it checked sensationalism and the resulting search for publicity on the part of scientists. In the U.S.S.R., science as a whole is conceived as a social weapon and organized as such. From the organizational point of view even medical science, backward in other respects, is seen at its best.

Professor Selye applied to the Department of External Affairs for permission to be allowed to return to Canada via Stockholm and London. But in view of increased cost of transportation and lack of accommodation, this was considered undesirable and he and Professor Innis returned the way they came with stop-overs in Sverdlov, Novosibirsk, Kirensk, Yakutsk and Fairbanks.

Mr. Prosild was in a somewhat different position insofar as he speaks Swedish and was requested by the Department of Mines and Resources to do some research work for it in Sweden. He therefore returned from Russia via Helsinki, Stockholm, Copenhagen and London. He found little damage in Helsinki. A curious thing was that during the bombing of the city the Russians had repeatedly hit the botanical gardens which lie outside Helsinki proper. Their accuracy of fire, however, was quite good on the whole and he thought the explanation was that the Russians wished to frighten the Finns but not to damage the city. He found the Finns apprehensive about the future. A friend who greeted him at the Soviet controlled Helsinki airport said: "Welcome to Finland — at least to what we hope will some day be Finland."

The main problem of the Scandinavian countries was shortage of fuel. In Finland there is the added problem of food. To solve the fuel problem the Finns and the Danes had resorted to using peat which is plentiful in both countries. The Finns were also extracting oil from shales which are not usually considered as oil-bearing. This was a new and interesting development. In Sweden electrification had been carried so far during the war that all railways are now electrically operated, and power was being exported by cable to Denmark.

The most apprehensive atmosphere seemed to prevail in Stockholm. The Swedes were worried about Bornholm, though they were relieved that the Russians had not occupied the Aaland Islands. In Denmark, however, there seemed much less anxiety over Bornholm. Fairly decent relations had been established with the Soviet authorities and the Danes seemed to believe that the Russians would eventually leave the island. In the Scandinavian countries, Porsild found that scientific activities had been disrupted by the war. In the U.S.S.R., however, scientists had been allowed to carry on and the Soviet Government had continued to expand their facilities particularly in the fields of research related to practical science.

An unpleasant incident occurred as a result of an interview which Dr. Selye gave to the press in Montreal. Articles appeared on July 11 in the Montreal Gazzette and the Ottawa Citizen entitled "Moscow Wanted Wedding Ring, McGill Man Sold Reds His Pants" and "Bought Valuable Tapestries With Pair of Trousers" respectively, in which undue prominence was given to two unimportant anecdotes which Dr. Selye had told his interviewers, and in which no or little mention was made of the achievements of Soviet science or of the sacrifices of the Soviet people during the war. The Soviet Ambassador in Ottawa apparently got the impression that Dr. Selye's interview had dealt exclusively with the shortage of clothing and of gold for dentistry in the Soviet, and this impression was conveyed, somewhat indignantly, to a member of the Department informally by Mr. Pavlov, a Secretary in the Soviet Embassy. It was later learned from Dr. Selye that he had been misrepresented insofar as he had told the reporters at length about scientific progress in the Soviet Union and had only casually mentioned the acquisition of two tapestries for a pair of trousers and the attempted purchase of his wedding ring by a Soviet engineer. It was agreed that in their present form, the two articles would inevitably appear ungracious, particularly in view of the hospitality extended to the Canadian scientists, and it was therefore suggested to Dr. Selye that he write to the Ottawa Citizen, correcting the false impression previously produced and send a copy of his letter to the Soviet Ambassador. Dr. Selye followed this advice and wrote a separate letter to Mr. Pavlov explaining what had happened and pointing to a series of other articles which had already appeared or were to appear in various Canadian publications as proof of his good will. On July 19, Pravda published a humorous but very sharp attack on Dr. Selye under the title "The Breeches of Mr. Selye", but the following day Izvestia and a number of other Russian newspapers seemed pleased about the articles published in the Toronto Star by Dr. Selye and in the Globe and Mail by Professor Innis and paraphrased them under the title "Canadian Scientists on the Achievements of Soviet Science." The sale of Dr. Selye's trousers had no further repercussions, except for a brief article in Time Magazine, written in its usual style, in which the disparagement of Dr. Selye by Pravda was contrasted with the recognition he had recently received from the Sugar Institute of the United States for his work on the effect of sugar upon blood. The favourable comment by Izvestia was, of course, not mentioned by Time.

Traduction d'une note de l'ambassade de l'Union soviétique

Translation of Note from Embassy of Soviet Union

No. 35 Ottawa, September 7, 1945

The Embassy of the U.S.S.R. in Canada presents its compliments and has the honour to inform the Department of External Affairs of the following;

A colleague of the Embassy, Igor Sergeievitch Gusenko, living at 511 Somerset St., failed to report for work at the proper time on the 6th. September.

In connection with this and for the purpose of clarifying the reasons for the failure of I. Gusenko's reporting for work, Consul V. G. Pavloff and two other colleagues of the Embassy visited the apartment of I. Gusenko at 11:30 on the 6th. Sept.

When Mr. Pavloff knocked at the door of Gusenko's apartment no-one answered. After this the apartment was opened by the above-mentioned colleagues of the Embassy with Gusenko's duplicate key, when it was discovered that neither Gusenko, nor his wife Svetliana Borisovna Gusenko, nor their son Andrei, were in the apartment.

It was later established that I. Gusenko robbed some money belonging to the Embassy and had hidden himself together with his family.

At the time when Consul Pavloff and the two other colleagues of the Embassy were in Gusenko's apartment, i.e. about 11:30 p.m. Constable Walsh of the Ottawa City Police appeared together with another policeman and tried with a rude manner to detain the diplomatic colleagues of the Embassy, in spite of explanations given by Consul Pavloff and the showing of diplomatic cards.

As a result of the protest expressed by Mr. Pavloff, Walsh called Inspector of the City Police Macdonald, who appeared at the Gusenko apartment in fifteen minutes, and also in a rude manner demanded that Consul V. G. Pavloff and the other diplomatic colleagues of the Embassy go with him to the Police Station, refusing to recognize the diplomatic card shown by Consul Pavloff.

Upon the refusal of Mr. V. G. Pavloff to go to the Police Station, Mr. Macdonald went away, leaving a police-man in the Gusenko apartment with the colleagues of the Embassy, for the alleged purpose of finding out who it was who had notified the police of the "forced entry" (lit. "breaking the door") into the Gusenko apartment.

Consul V. G. Pavloff and the other two colleagues of the Embassy, after waiting for Mr. Macdonald to return for 15 minutes, left, having locked the Gusenko apartment.

The Embassy of the U.S.S.R. asked the Dept. of External Affairs to take urgent measures to seek and arrest I. Gusenko and to hand him over for deportation, as a capital criminal, who has stolen money belonging to the Embassy.

In addition, the Embassy brings to the attention of the Department of External Affairs the rude treatment accorded to the diplomatic colleagues of the Embassy by Constable Walsh and Inspector of the City Police Macdonald, and expresses its confidence that the Department will investigate this incident and will make those guilty answerable for their actions.

The Embassy asks the Department that it should be informed of action taken in relation to the above.

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador of Soviet Union

No. 30 Ottawa, September 11, 1945

Excellency —

I have the honour to refer to your note No. 35 of September 7 with regard to the case of Mr. Gusenko.

The Canadian authorities have been asked to make every effort to find Mr. Gusenko and his family with a view to investigating the charges which you have made against him. When Mr. Pavloff of your Embassy discussed this matter by telephone at the beginning of the week, it was suggested that it would be helpful to the Canadian authorities if full particulars could be furnished. It would be important to obtain not merely descriptions of the missing persons, but also complete information as to the money or other items which Mr. Gusenko may have taken from the Embassy, and such evidence as you may have available to establish the charge of theft.

You will, of course, understand that, under the laws in force in Canada, it is impossible to comply in all respects with your request. The Canadian Police have no legal authority to arrest Mr. Gusenko and hand him over to your Embassy for deportation. If they adopted such a course, they would be open to civil action and the effectiveness of the proceedings could be challenged by habeas corpus, involving a complete enquiry into the circumstances and the release of the accused if it were established that the arrest was designed to enable him to be handed over within this country to a foreign authority.

In your note, you have made a complaint with regard to the rude treatment accorded to Mr. Pavloff and his associates by Constable Walsh and the Inspector of City Police, Macdonnell. It is a matter of very great regret that any Canadian Police authorities should fail in their duty to accord due courtesy to the persons with whom they are dealing, and it is particularly unfortunate that there should be any lack of courtesy in dealing with members of your Embassy. I hope that you will bear in mind the special circumstances including the lateness of the hour and the fact that the apartment had been entered without the authority of the tenant or a magistrate's warrant. The Police authorities in such circumstances cannot be too severely criticized for questioning the claims to diplomatic status of Mr. Pavloff and his party, and for doubting their credentials.

If an occasion arises in the future when you desire to enter these premises, arrangements will be made to apply for the necessary authority. In the meantime, under arrangements which were discussed by Mr. Pavloff by telephone, the apartment is being closed and sealed.

Accept etc.

Translation of Note from Embassy of Soviet Union

No. 37 Ottawa, September 14, 1945

The Embassy of the U.S.S.R. presents its compliments to the Department of External Affairs and has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the Department's notes Nos. 30 of the 11th. Sept., relating to the affair of I. Gusenko, and the note [sic] of the 14th Sept.,† acknowledging receipt by the Department of the Embassy's note No. 36 of Sept. 11th,† containing a description of Gusenko and his wife, and stating that the Royal Canadian Secret [sic] Police had been informed in order that it might be in a position to render assistance to the Embassy in the search for the above-mentioned persons.

Confirming its communication in the Note No. 35 of Sept. 7th, of the fact that Gusenko had robbed public funds, the Embassy, upon instructions from the Government of the U.S.S.R. repeats its request to the Government of Canada to apprehend Gusenko and his wife, and without trial, to hand them over to the Embassy for deportation to the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Government expresses the hope that the Government of Canada will fulfill its request.

Note from Department of External Affairs to Embassy of Soviet Union

Ottawa, September 20, 1945

The Department of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and has the honour to acknowledge receipt of the Embassy's note No. 37, dated September 14th, concerning the matter of Mr. I. Gousenko.

It is noted that the Embassy on instructions from the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics repeats its request to the Canadian Government to apprehend Mr. Gousenko and his wife and, without trial, to hand them over to the Embassy for deportation to the Soviet Union.

In reply the Department of External Affairs wishes to inform the Embassy that the question is being referred to the Department of Justice for the purpose of ascertaining the views of that Department on the Embassy's request.

DESPATCH 368 Moscow, September 25, 1945

SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to report that I arrived in Moscow a week ago yesterday and that since then I have been occupied in trying to pick up the threads of all that has happened during my absence from the Soviet Union of over five months.

2. I have come back to a situation entirely different to that which prevailed when I left. The Soviet Union during my absence experienced the end of two wars in which she had been engaged — the major war of survival with

Germany and her satellites and the brief war with Japan which she entered for the purpose of assuring her position as a Far Eastern power. Important international conferences have taken place at San Francisco, Potsdam and London which have provided the testing ground for the ability of the Soviet Union to cooperate with the outside world.

3. All of these developments are so complicated and of such world-shaking importance that it will take a considerable time before I become familiar with the Moscow background of the changed situation now awaiting my analysis. I ask your indulgence, therefore, in not expecting me to write with assurance upon the general international situation as viewed from Moscow until I have had the opportunity of taking up each phase of Soviet relations with the outside world. Only in this way can I recover my bearings in what is now for me the uncharted sea of Soviet diplomacy.

4. If you will be so kind as to bear this reservation in mind, I think it may be useful if I attempt in this despatch to set forth my preliminary impressions, tentative though they must necessarily be, on the general situation as disclosed by the conversations I have had so far with those in a position to know the facts.

5. The conclusion I am groping towards but do not yet feel sufficiently confident to state categorically is that the Anglo-Saxon powers are still a long way from finding the proper method of dealing with the Soviet Government. The United States Government have shown a refreshing readiness to assume more of the measure of responsibility that is commensurate with their great power. Unfortunately the advent of the Truman administration to power has coincided with the ascendency of those advisers who have been preaching "toughness" towards the Soviet Union. I am not sure if toughness for the sake of being tough may not at times take the place of that policy of being "firm but fair" which I would like to see applied to dealings with the Soviet Government. The United States Government have also taken as their starting point for the new policy the Yalta Declaration on Liberated Europe which brings them very definitely into clash with the Soviet Union in that part of Europe where Soviet power is paramount and where the Soviet government consider their interests to be most vital.

6. With the advent of Labour to power the United Kingdom Government appear to have abandoned any attempt to maintain a balance between the Anglo-Soviet alliance and that gradual evolution of the "Atlantic Community" which the perspicacity of Mr. Walter Lippman foreshadowed some months ago in his book on United States War Aims. In this, United Kingdom policy is undoubtedly correct as instinctively reflecting the true interests of the British Commonwealth of Nations, but it is leading the Soviet Union to feel isolated in its relations with the two other great powers. There may even be a trace of the feeling that their chief ally is not living up to what the Soviet government expected of it under the alliance. This may explain partly why to-day the United Kingdom is more the object of resentment than the United States, although the basic reason for this is that in so many parts of Europe and the Middle East there is a direct conflict between United Kingdom and Soviet interests. I continue to wonder at the naivety of so many of my fellow-Canadians who last July immediately jumped to the conclusion that the result of the British elections would lead to an improvement in Anglo-Soviet relations.

7. Thus I find on my return to Moscow a marked deterioration all along the line in relations between the Soviet Union and the two Anglo-Saxon powers. Much of this, no doubt, is the consequence of the elimination of Nazi power as a force keeping the major allies in harmony. There probably was bound to be a falling out of the victors over the spoils of war. What is disturbing, however, is the growth of mistrust and suspicion. On the allied side, much has transpired to make many doubt the intentions of the Soviet Union. On the Soviet side, we find increasing accusations of obstruction by the United Kingdom in settling the problems of the Balkans and a feeling that other countries do not trouble to understand the Soviet point of view. Out of this arises the old fear that the capitalist world is engaged in active intrigues against socialist Russia. Considerable anxiety is displayed in the Soviet press over the essentially premature soundings in Paris and elsewhere for a Western European bloc. When it is possible to engage in conversation with an average Soviet citizen he or she invariably expresses lack of confidence in the maintenance of peace. Finally, and what is most disturbing of all, there has been a resumption of that pre-war game usually described as the "war of nerves". Rumours are now current in Moscow of the massing of Soviet troops on the Turkish and Iranian borders. Foreigners are speculating about the refusal of permits to leave Moscow enforced for several days past. It is this irresponsible readiness to play with fire that makes one uneasy about the ability to avoid conflagrations.

8. My information about what is transpiring at the London Conference of Foreign Ministers is scanty, being based entirely on the official communiques and British press speculation thereon, but it does seem clear that Mr. Molotov with more than usual daring and with less than his usual sense of responsibility has been playing a game of colossal bluff. On the defensive in the Balkans he has carried the attack to what is to the British an equally vital sphere of influence — the Mediterranean. The hypocrisy of the trustee arrangements worked out at San Francisco has given him an admirable instrument for this purpose. By claiming for the Soviet Union a voice in the administration of Italian colonies he can play power politics without alienating left-wing opinion throughout the world.

9. It is this mixture of realism and idealism that is causing so much of the confusion in international politics. When Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden came to Moscow last October they were frankly realists. They had two main objectives — an agreement on Balkan problems and a solution of the Polish problem. Alarmed by the incursion of the Red Army into the Balkans Mr. Eden was anxious to keep the Soviet Union out of the Mediterranean. He reduced degrees of influence in the south-eastern European countries to mathematical proportions. The upshot was a free hand for the British in Greece in return for more or less a free hand for the Soviet Union in Roumania. The United States was never happy about these Balkan arrangements. The late President Roosevelt attempted to reintroduce idealism into the problems on that troublesome area by the signing of the Yalta Declaration of Liberated Europe. The United Kingdom considering that this declaration transcended the October understandings based its policy upon supporting the United States in efforts to apply the declaration to the complicated situation prevailing in the countries falling within the Soviet sphere of influence. All last winter the Soviet press maintained a remarkable silence upon events in Greece. Since the conflict of policies developed over Roumania comment upon the Greek situation has become more frequent and increasingly virulent.

10. The trouble over the attempts to apply the Yalta Declaration is that to Western and to Soviet minds the word "democracy" has two different interpretations. This is well brought out in the lecture by Professor Trainin which I am sending you with my despatch No. 366 of September 25th.† He shows that to the Soviet mind a democracy is one in which political and economic power is confined to the progressive forces to the exclusion of those seeking to maintain the pre-war system. Another difficulty is that with the exception of Czechoslovakia, Austria and Hungary, the Danubian countries are far from ready for political democracy as we understand it. Roumanian politicians have been venal and corrupt. Totalitarianism is particularly suited to the Bulgarian temperament which is so akin to that of the Russian. The clashes of nationalities and religions in Yugoslavia required the strong hand of a Tito for their solution.

11. Russian interest in south-east Europe has always been dominated by the question of the Straits. Roumania and Bulgaria provide the Russian pathway to the Dardanelles. The Danube Valley is the pathway for Central and Western Europe to that important waterway. Besides, from the strategic point of view the Danube Valley is a southern flank of greater Russia. It is to the Soviet interest, therefore, that no other great power should have any considerable influence in any of the countries of this area. More particularly the Soviet Government is anxious that none of these countries should provide a foothold for anti-Soviet intrigues. Hence, Soviet impatience with the Roumanian politicians, Maniu and Bratianu, who reverted to their old game of playing one great power off against another. They also are suspicious of the too open espousal by United States representatives in Belgrade of Mr. Grol, the Yugoslav opposition leader.

12. Of all these countries the quietest is Czechoslovakia, partly because they are more advanced and lie further to the West than the other countries and partly because the Czechoslovaks have been successful in keeping in tune with Soviet policy. Last week a disturbing fact came to the knowledge of the British Embassy. General Svoboda, the Czechoslovak Minister of Defence, came to Moscow and was asked by the Soviet authorities to provide accommodation in Bohemia for 500,000 troops of the Red Army. Hitherto it had been understood that the Soviet military establishment in Northern Bohemia was to be confined to 100,000 men. Possibly this new move is designed to accommodate troops for whom no adequate quarters are available in Germany or perhaps it is to indicate to the Czechs that they must cease flirting with the West.

13. In Germany, trouble has arisen in Berlin over Soviet troops coming into the British zone, sometimes to loot, at other times to carry off German technicians. The chief problem in relation to Germany, however, now receiving the attention of the British and United States Embassies in Moscow, is the seat of the Reparations Commission. The Soviet Government resolutely refuse to allow the Commission to be removed from Moscow, although practical experience has shown that the only place for the Commission properly to discharge its task is in Berlin where it can work in close cooperation with the control authorities.

14. In the Far East all is quiet so far as the Soviet Union is concerned. There is indication in the Soviet press that they consider United States policy in Japan to be too soft, particularly in so far as it relates to maintenance of the existing social order. By recounting illustrations of the dire poverty encountered by Soviet troops in Manchuria and Korea the Soviet press probably is unable to refrain from the opportunity of exploiting the unusual situation where the Red Army has come to an area with a standard of living below that of the Soviet Union. The Chinese Ambassador tells me that the conversations between Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and Mao-Tse-tung, the Chinese Communist leader, are proceeding very satisfactorily and that the Chinese-Soviet Treaty of Friendship and Alliance has given the Communists no option other than to come to terms with the Central Government. He also tells me that the execution of the treaty is proceeding smoothly. This is due to the fact that he urged his Prime Minister to leave no loose ends for himself, the Ambassador, later to settle. He explained to Dr. Soong that the latter was negotiating with Generalissimo Stalin, who alone can decide these questions and that after the treaty was signed it would be hopeless for him, as Ambassador, to attempt to settle the loose ends because he could only talk to Mr. Molotov. The consequence is that the annexes to the treaty go into great detail, even specifying the dates for the withdrawal of the Soviet troops from Manchuria. This shows the value of patience in dealing with the Soviet Government and the folly of trying to settle important questions in conferences lasting a few days with over-packed agendas.

15. My impression of the Soviet attitude towards the Far East is that of calling a halt and doing nothing to provoke the United States in an area where American power has become predominant and where American public opinion would be quick to react to any Soviet moves that savoured of aggression towards either China or Korea. This explains the Chinese success in concluding so speedily, although only after hard bargaining, a treaty that fulfilled so accurately the predictions of those of us who belong to the more optimistic school of interpreters of Soviet intentions.

16. If we find the Soviet Union on the defensive in the West and quiescent in the East, it is in the South that she is on the offensive. Here significantly it is more British than United States interests that are threatened. Besides the claims for a stake in the Mediterranean we have the disturbing developments over Turkey and Iran. There has been a revival these past few days in the Soviet press of references to the ethnographical claims of the Turkish districts of Kars and Ardahan to be attached to Soviet Armenia. Persistent rumours are circulating in Moscow about the movement of Soviet troops to the south. In Iran the People's Party are becoming increasingly active and stories are circulating of Soviet corruption of the Iranian press. The People's Party have lately put forward a claim for an autonomous Azerbaijan, which would immediately be suspected as the first step for the absorption of this most productive of the Iranian provinces into the Soviet Union.

17. The important point is what explanation may be offered for this offensive towards the South and for Mr. Molotov's bluster in London. The latter as I have indicated in paragraph 8 of this despatch may be tactical. By carrying the offensive to the special sphere of influence of the British Mr. Molotov may hope to get his way in the special sphere of Soviet influence in south-eastern Europe. By placing the British in the position of claiming the Mediterranean as a British sea Mr. Molotov is on firm ground in claiming that the Black Sea is Soviet. The atomic bomb is also surely a factor. By making extravagant claims Mr. Molotov may hope to strengthen the hands of those idealists who advocate giving the secrets of the atomic bomb to the Soviet Union as a grand gesture of appeasement. In any event he probably feels that it is incumbent upon him to show that the Soviet Union has not been deterred from playing the role of a power equal to the United States through the possession by that country of such a formidable weapon.

18. The Soviet offensives towards Turkey and Iran are more difficult of explanation. Undoubtedly the tactical element is present, particularly as regards Turkey. A show of strength probably is considered a necessary preliminary to the hard bargaining that is soon to take place over the question of the Straits. The raising of the question of Kars and Ardahan may reflect the consistent desire to restore to the Soviet Union all territory of Tsarist-Russia relinquished in the days of weakness. The offensive towards Iran has more the earmarks of frank aggression, although the oppression of the masses by the Iranian landowners and other vested interests gives an opportunity for the champion of the under-dog. Overshadowing all is the question of oil and its relation to military power. The master minds in the Kremlin may have concluded that the soft under-belly of the Atlantic Community is now in embryo is this region of the Persian Gulf. Your military adviser, Major-General Pope, will recall my discussing this question with him in San Francisco. True to his I.S.C.[87] training he rebutted my arguments about the possibility of this area becoming a zone of contention between the Soviet Union and the United States. He found support for his argument in Mr. Jack Hickerson of the United States Department of State, who dryly observed that the average American did not know where the Persian Gulf was. If this is correct the Soviet leaders may have decided to entrench themselves in Iran before the Americans realize their new responsibilities as policers of the seas and the importance of Iranian oil to the execution of those responsibilities.

19. In writing this despatch I have been very conscious of the relation of all that is now transpiring to the United Nations Charter signed at San Francisco. In spite of its realistic character compared with the Covenant of the League of Nations the signing of the Charter represented an idealistic phase of this morally-deficient era. No doubt consistent with their realism the Soviet Government have every intention of cooperating with other nations in making the charter work. But the world is now in a state of flux and what is decided upon in the coming weeks will set the pattern for many years to come. The Soviet leaders are out to take as much advantage as they can of this fluid situation. Once things settle down they will work within the framework of existing instruments according to the balance of forces prevailing at the time. Everything would have been easier if we could have removed that atmosphere of mistrust and suspicion that so long has permeated relations between the Soviet Union and the Western world. As things are now I fear we may lose the substance of genuine Soviet cooperation for the shadow of elections in the politically immature countries of Eastern Europe.

20. I am sending a copy of this despatch to the Acting High Commissioner for Canada in London.

Mémorandum de l'adjoint, le ministére des Affaires extérieures au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Assistant, Department of External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa, September 1945]

The attached memorandum on Present Trends in Soviet Policy was compiled in a great hurry and there was hardly time for necessary revisions. It is intended to be a summary of some of the considerations which appear to underlie the present trend of Soviet thinking about their allies. It is far from being complete, but I feel that the factors discussed in the memorandum play a large part in Moscow's evaluation of the international scene.

L[EO] M[ALANIA]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Mémorandum

TOP SECRET [Ottawa, September 28, 1945]

PRESENT TRENDS OF SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY

The increasingly unsatisfactory nature of the relations among the three Great Powers since the Crimea Conference has given rise to widespread concern that co-operation among them, and particularly with Russia, may very soon become impossible. The apparent failure of the first meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers to reach any substantial agreement[88] has served to accentuate the present concern.

Interpretations of Soviet policy range from the theory that the policy of the Soviet Union has changed to a form of aggressive expansionism in Central and South-Eastern Europe, the Middle East and the Far East, to the belief that the present conflicts are an anachronistic survival of Soviet fears of capitalist encirclement or a transitory feature of the confusions attendant upon the end of the war. Not enough definite information is as yet available to make any final judgement, but it might be useful to summarize some of the basic considerations which probably underlie the Soviet position.

The circumstances under which the Council of Foreign Ministers meets is no doubt a factor of considerable importance in the turn discussions have taken. To judge by recent statements in the Soviet press, the Russians appear to feel that with the end of the war, the purpose of the western democracies is to restrict Soviet influence in world affairs to the borders of the Soviet Union. This fear is probably strengthened by the consistent refusal of the United Kingdom and the United States to come to a definitive agreement while the war was in progress with regard to the Baltic States, Polish frontiers, the post-war position of the Balkan States and other problems of prime interest to the Soviet Union. The fact that the Soviets were able to obtain what they wished in Poland only after vigorous unilateral actions, including the veiled threat of implicating the United Kingdom in the activities of the Polish Underground, whose sixteen leaders were recently tried, must have confirmed the Soviet belief that in negotiations with them, the Western Allies were responsive only to the strongest pressure. The current Anglo-American concern to establish democracy in the Balkan States, which hardly had any experience of democratic forms, while tolerating totalitarian regimes in Portugal, Spain and Turkey must appear to Moscow as an attempt to limit the influence of the Soviet Union rather than as the pursuit of purely idealistic aims.

The fear that at the end of the war the Allies might attempt to deprive Russia of the position it had won is one of long standing in Russian history. The Soviet leaders, who seem to be increasingly conscious of long-term historical factors, cannot but recall the disastrous effect of the Congress of Berlin of 1878, which nullified the Treaty of San Stefano, upon the internal prestige of the Romanoffs, and the fact that there had been no difficulty in 1915 about promising to Russia a dominant position in the Straits.

In 1939 Stalin warned against attempts to force the Soviet Union "to pull other people's chestnuts out of the fire." This warning continues to colour all Soviet thinking about their Allies. The firm insistence of the United Kingdom on relegating controversial political questions until the peace conference must have been interpreted in the light of this warning. The attempt of the United Kingdom to build up particularly intimate ties with the United States and to [88]Voir le volume 10, document 653./See Volume 10, Document 653.

"involve" the latter country in the Middle East, particularly in Iran, and in South-Eastern Europe appeared, in the light of these suspicions, as designed to bolster the bargaining position of the United Kingdom vis-à-vis the Soviet Union.

The Anglo-Soviet Treaty of 1942 was perhaps intended by the Russians as an instrument for bolstering the independent position of the United Kingdom vis-à-vis the United States. Mr. Maisky dropped a remark to this effect when the Treaty was signed, and on occasions when the Russians were excluded from the Churchill-Roosevelt talks, as at Cairo and Quebec, the annoyance of the Soviet press was unmistakable. It is quite clear that the Russians regarded the Treaty as having definite political implications. From the Anglo-Soviet conversations of December 1941 to the Churchill-Stalin meeting in Moscow in October 1944, the Soviets had been suggesting to the United Kingdom a definition of spheres of influence in Europe as between the two countries. On the latter occasion it seemed as if the Soviets had reached this objective. It was then agreed that Roumania was as important to the Soviet Union as Greece was to the United Kingdom. As a result, neither the Soviet press nor Soviet officials made any comment during the Greek crisis in the winter of 1944-45. The present Soviet diplomatic offensive against the United Kingdom can be said to have begun shortly after the Roumanian crisis, when United Kingdom diplomacy sought to protect the position of General Radescu, who was roughly ejected from the Premiership by Soviet pressure. From that time to the present meeting of the Council, the Russians have been increasingly critical of the United Kingdom policy in Greece.

The Soviet attitude, as was suggested above, was particularly exacerbated by the attempt to bring the United States into questions which the Russians would appear to feel are a matter primarily for the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union. Consequently the position of the United States in relation to the United Kingdom was probably studied in Moscow with special interest for any clues it might provide with regard to the firmness or otherwise with which the United States was prepared to back British policy. What Moscow has seen has no doubt encouraged the Soviet view that the United States is not prepared to go nearly as far as the United Kingdom would like in support of the latter's policy.

While the over-all community of Anglo-American interests is probably recognized by the realists in the Kremlin, this recognition is qualified by such facts as the recurring warnings in the United States press, particularly by Walter Lippmann, that the United States should act as "mediator" between the other two Great Powers and should not adhere too closely to the British line. The reorganization of the State Department after the crisis in San Francisco, particularly the dismissal of Stettinius and Grew after vigorous criticism by Lippmann, the New York Herald Tribune, and other newspapers; the United States initiative in forcing the early recognition of the Polish Provisional Government in Warsaw; and the favourable reception in Washington of the Soviet-Chinese agreements are indications to Moscow that the United States is far from unanimous in its backing of the United Kingdom's foreign Policy. The abrupt termination of Lend-Lease and the subsequent negotiations over future United Kingdom commercial policy is no doubt interpreted by the Soviet leaders as evidence of an undercurrent of Anglo-American rivalry, which might be used to their advantage.

As long as the present uncertainty in Anglo-American relations persists, it is doubtful if the Soviets would care to agree to any binding commitments. From the Soviet point of view the reaction of the United States press to the current crisis in London encourages delaying tactics. Major George Elliot reported recently that Washington is not taking nearly as pessimistic a view of the difficulties as the London press. Walter Lippmann has interpreted the crisis as an inevitable process of defining the fundamental relationships of the Allies to one another in terms of their intentions, security and power, which, according to Lippmann, can be solved only at the highest levels.

In this connection the latest available poll on United States opinion on Russia (Fortune Magazine for September) indicates no lessening of United States desire for co-operation. Fortune's "panel of top-ranking executives" in reply to the question "Do you think it is or is not to the long-term advantage of the United States to promote trade relations with Russia?" answered 91.2% in the affirmative with 2.7% "don't know". A surprising majority voted for the extension of the six billion dollars credit to the U.S.S.R.: 30.8% favoured credit through United States Government channels: 49.8% through private banking channels, and 3.4% were in favour of both media — a total of 84% in favour of the extension of credit. The Fortune survey of press opinion from February to June showed a much larger percentage of unfavourable comment on Soviet policies. The adverse comments were on specific issues such as the change in party-line by the U.S. Communists (81% unfavourable), Tito's attempt on Trieste (60% unfavourable), Trial of the Sixteen Poles and the exclusion of the Allies from Roumania (60% unfavourable on both issues). Aside from such issues, however, the Fortune survey concludes that the United States press is "largely favourable to Russia, week in and week out. The over-all comment on Russia on all subjects for the whole of the troublesome period here studied was 60% favourable, and 40% unfavourable. In a country where opinion is churned about publicly as it is in the United States, such a margin, Russians should learn, is a landslide."

There is no way of estimating the knowledge the Russians have of confidential inside opinion within the State Department. We have recently seen, however, a secret report of September 1[†] from the United Kingdom Charge d'Affaires in Washington to Mr. Bevin which stated that on the eve of the postponement of the Bulgarian elections, several of the State Department officials were so concerned over the possibility of a deterioration in relations with the Soviet Union on this question that they were prepared, in the event that the Russians took a firm stand, to advocate that the United States representative in Bulgaria should be repudiated as having exceeded his instructions. In the same report Mr. Balfour quoted James Dunn as denying that the United States had taken the initiative in the Roumanian question.

All these indications of United States attitudes would no doubt suggest to the Russians that the United States is not nearly as concerned about the questions at issue between the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom as the latter might wish. One might hazard the guess that under these circumstances the Soviet tactic in the Council of Foreign Ministers has been to delay decisions on Eastern European issues, by raising issues of greater concern to the United States, such as the principle of trusteeships. For it is clear that if the Soviet Union were to agree to Anglo-American demands in Eastern Europe at this stage, they might lose the bargaining advantage which they now possess when discussions turn to questions of vital concern to the United States, such as problems of United States security in the Pacific.

At the Potsdam Conference, the Russians learned that the question of the Italian peace treaty was of relatively greater importance to the Americans than the Balkan treaties and they seem to have acted upon this knowledge in London. As regards the United Kingdom, the Russians have been pressing hard on the question of Greece. The Greek situation provides not only a facile analogy with the situation in Roumania, but it also has a propaganda value in radical and liberal circles similar to that of the admission of Argentina to the San Francisco Conference.

It seems too early as yet to conclude that a clash between the Western democracies and the Soviet Union is inevitable. Neither side is prepared to wage war for several years to come. It would also appear that the peoples of Europe are more concerned with questions of immediate day-to-day physical survival than with the larger issues of policy. If the possibility of immediate war is excluded, as it seems to be by the facts of the situation, the only alternative is that of reaching agreement on the immediate problems. Such agreement appears even more essential to the Western democratic powers than to the Soviet Union, since only on the basis of an agreement among the Great Powers, can measures of reconstruction, essential to the stability of Western European governments and to their ability to resist the pressure for extremist solutions be taken. The coming winter is likely to be a testing time for the ability of democratic methods to cope with economic problems. In Eastern Europe and in their zone in Germany, the Soviets are supporting measures of economic reform, which, even if they fall far short of what could be accomplished by democratic methods, do nevertheless hold up some hope to the impoverished masses of some measure of immediate well-being and progress in the future.

To conclude, it would seem that the current Soviet attitude is based upon a realization that the Soviet Union has "arrived" as a world power of first magnitude and upon the fear that an attempt would be made to deprive it of this position. The Soviets probably feel that mere diplomatic recognition and condescending admission to a "select club" of Great Powers is not enough to secure their present position. If the United States can have exclusive bases, the Soviets intend to have them also. If the United Kingdom has colonies, the Soviets intend to have full equality in this respect also. If both of these powers have areas where their influence is predominant, the Soviet Union feels justified in claiming a position of equality with them.

The immediate prospect of relations with the Soviet Union is certainly not bright. The adjustment of any group of powers to a completely changed political situation is never easy and can only be reached through a series of crises, which define the new inter-relationships. But the current trends of public opinion in the democracies and the facts of the situation point to an ultimate re-adjustment through the process of bargaining and concessions to the power which is dominant in those areas where the other powers have no means of effective intervention.

Memorandum by Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], October 1, 1945

Mr. Robertson telephoned me from Washington yesterday afternoon to say that the Prime Minister had discussed with the President the attitude to be adopted in the Corby[89] case. This was the only subject discussed between them. The President felt quite strongly that we should go slowly in deciding how to deal with the matter and that no overt action should be taken without further consideration. In general, he agreed with the line suggested in the telegram which was sent to Cadogan yesterday morning.

Messrs. Robertson and Pearson had also discussed the matter twice with Mr. Acheson and had read to him the telegram to Cadogan. He also was in general agreement with the course of action suggested and felt the necessity of further consideration and consultation before overt steps were taken. Lord Halifax was to see Mr. Acheson yesterday afternoon, and Mr. Acheson would take this line with him so that Lord Halifax could report it to London as the view of the United States authorities.

Mémorandum
Memorandum

TOP SECRET [London], October 9, 1945

1. A meeting was held on October 8th in Sir John Stephenson's[90] room at the Dominions Office which was attended by Mr. Norman Robertson and by representatives of M.I.5, and by Mr. Butler[91] and Mr. Bromley.[92] The position before the meeting was that there had been no developments of any kind on the previous evening, and therefore it was necessary that His Majesty's Governments and the United States Government should agree as to the next step. A suggestion had been put forward unofficially by the Foreign Office and "C"[93] from London that the suspected persons in this country, Canada and the United States should be taken in for questioning on some agreed date such as October 18th. Mr. Bevin had not wished to commit himself to this proposal until he had had an opportunity of discussion with Mr. Mackenzie King.

2. The representatives of M.I.5 made it clear that they were anxious for a decision; prolonged delay would result in the trail becoming stale, and they felt that further questionings of Corby could not be expected to produce much more of value.

3. Mr. Robertson explained the reasons which made the Canadian, and he thought the American authorities also, hesitant to proceed with the rounding up and questioning of the suspected persons, with attendant publicity. He was not so much concerned with the direct effect upon relations between the Governments concerned, as with the effect on public opinion, particularly in Canada, and Mr. Dean Acheson had similar misgivings as regards the American public. Mr. Robertson feared that public opinion, including the Canadian Parliament and the United States Congress, would be so stirred by the story of this Russian network stealing our secrets that prejudice would inevitably be brought both to the possibility of sharing with the Soviet government on terms some of our atomic secrets, and to the general prospects of financial and economic co-operation with Soviet Russia.

4. On the other hand, Mr. Robertson had doubts whether the exposure of this Soviet espionage would be sufficient in itself to rally behind the Canadian government or possibly the Governments in Washington and London, that almost universal support which was most desirable, if not essential, in a case of this kind. There had been a tendency not confined to the United States, at the time of the San Francisco Conference and subsequently, to feel that over various issues the Soviet government had scored some publicity successes. In the present case, scientists in Canada, and elsewhere, felt strongly that the atomic processes that they had worked out were of no transcendent importance, and would so inevitably be worked out by other countries in the course of a few years, that it might be mistaken policy for any one nation or group of nations to try to retain them as secrets. It might, for instance, be claimed that we had a war-time agreement with the Soviet Government for the exchange of information about new weapons, and that we had withheld information about this one all-important secret weapon until the weapon was actually ready for use. One serious emanation of the above feeling might be traced in the facility with which the Soviet Government had persuaded our nationals to work for them. Mr. Robertson felt the extreme desirability of not risking a show-down with the Soviet Government, unless the allied Governments concerned were assured of the overwhelming support of their own public opinion, and he was doubtful whether this unanimity could be secured until an offer of collaboration in these questions had been made to the Soviet government which the latter had either accepted or rejected.

5. Mr. Robertson felt that Governments must face the possibility that the arrangements for security and sanctions worked out at San Francisco were already out of date as a result of this new weapon, and that the Great Power veto in particular had lost much of its meaning. The new weapon required a much stiffer form of control than anything contemplated at San Francisco and the Great Power veto was probably incompatible with the degree of control that it would be necessary for the United Nations Organization to impose on all States.

6. It was possible, therefore, that the immediate requisite of the Powers concerned was that collaboration with the Soviet Government should be re-established by admitting them in some way to the results of our researches into atomic power. The preliminary step might be to obtain Russian concurrence in the free movement of scientists between countries and the free exchange of the results of their researches. This would in practice give each country a great deal of information as to what was being done in the others as regards the use of atomic energy, and would be a practical form of control: it would reinforce any scheme of international control worked out between the Governments concerned.

7. Mr. Robertson also threw out the idea that international arrangements as regards Civil aviation might be relevant to the issue. The Soviet Government was not a party to the Chicago Convention; at present her frontiers were closed to foreign aviation, but if the Soviet Government agreed to open them, the freer passage of outsiders would do something to prevent a veil of secrecy being drawn over atomic developments in Russia.

8. The meeting agreed that the views of the United States Government were clearly of great importance. President Truman had said that he thought it necessary to open conversations with a number of Governments on the subject even before the United Nations Organizations was set up. He had never committed himself to the organization being the best body to handle the problem. Mr. Robertson had gathered from an informal talk with Mr. Dean Acheson that the Americans were at the moment strongly impressed by two considerations. First, the prejudice to larger United States-Soviet relations that might be created by publicity over the present espionage business; and secondly, by the suspicions of their own scientists working on atomic energy that its developments in the near future might be many times more frightful than those seen in Japan. Competition in secret was an appalling prospect.

9. It was agreed that the above views needed very careful consideration, with a view, if possible, to the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom and Canada agreeing upon views which they could put before President Truman as regards the next step to be taken as regards the Russian espionage network.

10. It was recalled that the view of the London Government had been that the most straight-forward procedure was the best, viz., to prosecute when possible, or failing that, to adopt whatever course would normally be taken in an espionage case. It was not thought that this would create serious difficulties with the Soviet Government who would, on the contrary, suspect us of weakness if we adopted any of the other courses hitherto suggested. The representative of M.I.5 recalled some precedents confirming this view. The point was also made that if no effective action were taken against the network, and this fact leaked out, there might be serious public criticism of the Governments concerned.

11. The meeting agreed that if the individual members of the espionage ring were to be questioned with prospects of success, action must be laid on soon, and that therefore an agreement between the three Governments concerned was urgently necessary. The first step would be to bring the points raised at the meeting before the Secretary of State and Mr. Attlee.

Le secrétaire d'État par intérim aux Affaires extérieures au chargé d'affaires aux États-Unis

Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs to Chargé d'Affaires in United States

DESPATCH 1248 [Ottawa], October 30, 1945

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to your teletype message WA-5214 of October 10th† concerning the registration of Soviet citizens in Canada by Consular officials of the Soviet Government and to enclose for your information a copy of a translation of an announcement and an accompanying interview which appeared in the Russian language paper Vestnik of Toronto on October 10th.† As you will see this announcement states the intention of the Soviet Government to provide means for the registration as citizens of the U.S.S.R. of persons who were residents of the western district of the Ukrainian and Byelo-Russian Soviet Socialist Republics and who are now living abroad. These plans were discussed informally by Mr. Pavlov of the Consular Department of the Soviet Embassy with an officer of this Department. Mr. Pavlov said that the Embassy had not been authorized to raise the matter with the Canadian Government officially, since the registration was regarded as a normal function of a consular service. He added that a similar registration was now taking place in the United States and in all countries where persons from the territories concerned were resident. He said that he did not know whether the United States Government had been told of the registration in the United States; Soviet representatives there would certainly not feel themselves under any obligation to approach the State Department on the subject, and if they did so, it would be informally, as had been the case in Canada. Mr. Pavlov said that he did not see how any possible misunderstanding or inconvenience could arise from the registration, since the greatest care was being taken to point out to applicants that they were under no compulsion to register, and that no one must apply who had acquired citizenship in another country. Soviet Consular officials, he said, were under strict instructions not to place an applicant under pressure of any kind. Indeed, the object was to discourage registration, since it was being made clear that Soviet citizenship itself did not entitle any person to admission to the U.S.S.R.

The opinion reached in this Department, after due consideration, was that, whatever legal technicalities might be put in question by the registration, the action of the Soviet Government was not in general open to objection. Registration was specifically limited to stateless persons whose position resulted from political changes in their homelands and it did not seem unreasonable in principle that these people should be given a chance to establish their status in relation to some government. Neither was it likely that the registration would affect persons who were naturalized Canadians or intended to become so, and the Soviet representatives were probably quite sincere in saying that they had no desire to disturb settlers who had come to this country with the intention of staying here. It was thought, however, that the wording of the notice, particularly that part which states that the persons concerned "are required to register as Soviet citizens not later than December 31st" might be subject to misinterpretation. It was therefore decided that the Soviet Ambassador should be asked to come to the Department to discuss the matter informally with the Acting Under-Secretary.

When the Soviet Ambassador called on October 24th, Mr. Wrong said that the Department fully understood the objectives which prompted the Soviet Union to arrange for this registration. We thought, however, that he should discuss with the Ambassador one or two details in regard to procedure which were a cause of some misgiving. He had in mind particularly that part of the published notice in which it is stated that persons defined in the announcement are required to register as Soviet citizens not later than December 31st. There were many persons in Canada, particularly Ukrainians, who had come to this country with the object of settling here and who, in some cases, had taken out their first papers for naturalization. The notice as published in Vestnik might appear to these persons to compel them to take out Soviet citizenship and in this way affect their intention to become Canadian citizens. Even to people in Canada who were not directly influenced by the notice, it might seem that the Soviet Union was reaching out to claim persons who, if not Canadian citizens, had every intention of becoming so. Mr. Wrong said that he did not wish to insist that the Ambassador take any action in regard to the notice, but he would be glad if an alteration of the wording could be considered before the announcement appeared in other newspapers.

Mr. Zaroubin said that the wording as used in the notice had been taken from the text of the relevant Soviet Law and that he did not see how it could be changed. Neither did he see how the notice could be the subject of any misinterpretation. Elsewhere in the announcement and in the accompanying interview it was made quite clear that the act of registration was a voluntary one. Furthermore, explicit instructions had been given to Consular officers that they were to discuss at length with each applicant the question of registration and to make clear the fact that there was no obligation upon anyone to register. He also said that care was being taken to make certain that no one who was a Canadian citizen or who intended to become one should be allowed to register. He added that objections to the procedure being followed might arise in the anti-Soviet foreign language press in Canada, but he did not think these complaints needed to be taken into account. Finally he said that if the Department could give him evidence of any occasion on which a misunderstanding had arisen through the wording of the notice, he would be glad to make a change.

Mr. Wrong said that the purpose of the conversation was to prevent any such misunderstanding taking place. Many of the persons who would read the notice were poorly educated and it is quite possible that they would misunderstand the intention of the announcement. For this reason he hoped that the Ambassador would consider at least adding a question and answer to the published interview which would cover the point. Mr. Zaroubin maintained, however, that no misunderstanding could arise but added that if the Department found any evidence that the activities of their Consular officers in carrying out this registration resulted in misapprehension on the part of any person, he would be glad to discuss the matter again.

Mr. Wrong also suggested that the Soviet authorities might be prepared to give the Canadian government a list of those who had registered in response to this notice. Mr. Wrong explained that he was not asking for this list but merely suggesting that it would be a matter of convenience to the Immigration Branch and the Secretary of State if the names of these people could be provided. Most of the persons concerned had emigrated to this country as Poles, and it would be of assistance to the departments mentioned to know who amongst them should now be regarded as Soviet citizens. Mr. Zaroubin said that the registration did not of itself give to the people concerned the right to enter the Soviet Union, which was a question that would require separate consideration. Moreover, the question of the status of any individual would not arise unless he sought to leave Canada; in that case he would be furnished with a Soviet passport and the Immigration authorities would automatically become aware of the fact that he had registered. Mr. Zaroubin added that he would be prepared to furnish the list of those who had registered if there were some law or regulation in Canada which placed the representative of a foreign government under an obligation to provide the Canadian authorities with a list of names of nationals of his country who were resident here. Otherwise he would not feel under the necessity of doing so. Mr. Wrong said that there was no question of there being any regulation by which the Ambassador could be required to furnish this list. The circumstances, however, were special ones, and as a matter of convenience he had asked that the list be provided. It was for the Ambassador to decide whether or not he would accede to the request.

The matter has been allowed to rest at this point, and I expect that the Soviet authorities will proceed with the registration in western Canada when the process has been completed in Toronto and Montreal. I shall let you know of any further developments which come to our attention. In the meantime, I should be glad to learn if you have received any further information concerning the registration in the United States of persons from the western regions of the Ukraine and White Russia, or of the attitude of the State Department towards the activities of the Soviet Consular representatives in this regard.

SECRET

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Government has given consideration to the question raised in telegram Circular D. 112 of September 18th from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, concerning exchange of technical information and intelligence. We were informed that in future the United Kingdom authorities propose to supply intelligence to the Soviet Union on the basis of strict reciprocity.

The Canadian Government has decided to adopt a similar policy for the exchange of technical information and intelligence to the Soviet Union and details in connection with the implementing of this policy are being considered by the appropriate service officers in consultation with members of this Department.

In working out a detailed procedure it would be helpful to have from the United Kingdom authorities some indication as to the means by which this policy is to be applied. We are particularly interested in the practice governing the exchange of information through Service Attachés since our contact with foreign forces is largely through such channels.

It would also be valuable to know what type of information the United Kingdom is considering for this exchange. Is it, for example, proposed on the basis of reciprocity to exchange information classified as secret or under any other security marking?

I should add that the Canadian authorities would not, of course, consider the disclosure of any information supplied originally by the United Kingdom without the authority of the senders of such information.

I should be glad if you would inform the United Kingdom authorities of our decision in this matter and consult them in relation to the questions I have raised.

TOP SECRET [London?], November 12, 1945

A meeting was held this morning at which the following were present:—

Mr. Malcolm MacDonald
Mr. Norman Robertson
Mr. Hume Wrong
Mr. Nevile Butler
Professor Cockcroft[94]

[94]J. D. Cockcroft, directeur, Direction de l'énergie atomique, Conseil national de recherches.
J. D. Cockcroft, Director, Atomic Energy Division, National Research Council.

Mr. Roger Hollis[95]
Mr. Roger Makins[96]

After some discussion it was agreed:—

(a) That it was essential for a decision to be taken during the current discussions.

(b) In order to secure such a decision the Canadian representatives should put down on paper the action which they would propose to take in Canada and which they would like to see taken in the United Kingdom and the U.S.A.

(c) The Canadian representatives would also put down what action they proposed to take in regard to the foreign diplomatic staff implicated in the affair.

2. PUBLICITY — There was some discussion about the handling of publicity, and in particular, of the question whether an official statement should be put out simultaneously with the police action or whether it would not be wiser to wait until it could be seen how much information leaked into the Press. The general conclusion was that it would be preferable to prepare a measured and careful statement dealing with the diplomatic as well as the domestic aspect of the question, which could be made, perhaps in the Canadian House of Commons, shortly after the police action had been taken.

The Canadian representatives said they would prepare the draft of such a statement.

3. There was some discussion as to whether it would be advisable to fix a date on which it was desired that action should be taken. It was agreed that the main purpose of doing this would be to ensure that a decision was taken during the current discussions.

Sir,

I have the honour to report that I am busy getting ready to leave for London this week and consequently have no time to prepare despatches, but there is one subject on which I feel I must give you my comments. That subject is the atomic bomb as a factor in the deterioration of relations between the Anglo-Saxon powers and the Soviet Union.[97]

2. Foreign press comment on the speech which Mr. Molotov delivered on November 6th fastens on the remarks he made about the atomic bomb and atomic energy. The commentators conclude from what Mr. Molotov said that the withholding of the secret of the atomic bomb is the principal factor dividing the Soviet Union from the Anglo-Saxon powers. The drawing of such a conclusion in the minds of the public of other countries is apt to be dangerous. I cannot see how Mr. Molotov could have said less than he did say in view of what President Truman said in his "sacred trust" speech delivered only ten days before.[98] It is comment abroad that has led to Soviet comment about the atomic bomb and not vice versa.

3. The theory of the atomic bomb as the main factor in the current situation was first propogated by Alexander Werth in an article he contributed to the Sunday Times of London a few weeks ago. I have great admiration for Alexander Werth as a journalist but not as a judge of political developments. When his article appeared Mr. Frank Roberts, then Chargé d'Affaires of the British Embassy at Moscow, received a telegram from the Foreign Office requesting his comments. He replied by asking the Foreign Office to imagine what would be the situation if there had been no discovery of the atomic bomb. Did they then think that the present impasse which has developed would not have come to pass? Did they think that if the secret of the atomic bomb was disclosed to the Soviet Union all the present difficulties would vanish? He himself answered the last question by stating that there might be a honeymoon period of about a week and then the difficulties with which we are now faced would reappear.

4. I agree with these views expressed by Mr. Roberts. In fact I spoke to him in a somewhat similar vein before he told me the story of the telegram he received from London and of his reply. The atomic bomb undoubtedly is a factor in the present situation and a very important factor, but it is not the only nor even the main factor. The two most important factors in my opinion are (1) Anglo-American attacks on the Soviet-sponsored governments in Roumania and Bulgaria and (2) the ascendency of the tough school in the United States. It is in relation to the latter that the atomic bomb is an important factor. The inept handling of the question by American public comment and by the United States Government has served greatly to strengthen Soviet convictions about the mistrust and suspicions pervading the international scene. If the Russophobes and the tough school had not been in the ascendency in the United States the atomic bomb would never have become the factor that it has in the current situation.

5. President Truman is correct in distinguishing between the scientific development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes and the secret of the manufacture of the atomic bomb. The latter is a military secret differing greatly in degree but not in kind from the military secrets which the Russians themselves would never think of divulging to anyone. It is only when the possession of this secret is used as a club to reinforce arguments around the council table and to justify the attitude of "the tough school" that their reactions become violent. Little would have been said on the Soviet side if the United States Government had announced at the outset that the secret of the atomic bomb would be brought up for discussion in the Security Council of the United Nations Organization once it was established, but in the meantime discussions would take place between the three countries in possession of the scientific knowledge to decide upon the common policy they would adopt in regard to their responsibilities for this revolutionary development. How much better this would have been than public rejoicing over the reduction of the Soviet Union to a second-class power and the pious declaration about the "sacred trust".

6. The attitude of the tough school is well illustrated in secret despatch No. 2407 of October 10th from the Canadian Ambassador at Washington.† In this despatch Mr. Pearson gives a summary of a telegram from Mr. George F. Kennan, then Chargé d'Affaires of the United States Embassy at Moscow, which Mr. Freeman Matthews showed him. I have very great respect for the ability of Mr. Kennan and for his deep knowledge of the Soviet Union, but he suffers from having been here in the pre-war days when foreign representatives became indoctrinated with anti-Soviet ideas as a result of the purges and subtle German propaganda. He is one of the proponents of toughness as the proper tactics to adopt towards the Soviet Union.

7. In his telegram to Washington Mr. Kennan paints a picture of serious Russian concern over the set-back they received at the first session of the Council of Foreign Ministers in London. I cannot detect any chagrin here over the failure of Soviet tactics. On the contrary I see the Russian people impressed with the success Mr. Molotov achieved in preventing himself from being bullied about. What did the Russian people expect after all they had already gained? The only thing they may not have achieved is the age-long dream of domination over the Dardanelles, but they realise this cannot be obtained except through success in another major war for which they will not be ready for a generation or more. Far from bringing new blood into the Kremlin, as Mr. Kennan predicts, we find the old clique as prominent as ever at the November 7th celebrations, except that Stalin and his supposed favourite in the eyes of the State Department — Zdanov — were conspicuous by their absence. Molotov on the other hand — presumably the scapegoat of the London Conference — was the central figure. So much for the thesis of Soviet stock-taking after the events in London.

8. If we have to talk, like Mr. Kennan, in the parlance of American football I would say that the Soviet team after three brilliantly executed forward passes — Teheran, Yalta, and Potsdam — scored three easy touchdowns. Then with the conclusion of the two wars with Germany and Japan they lost their only good forward passer and their only good receiver, so they decided to stonewall for the rest of the game. The Anglo-Saxon team having possession of the ball decided to try their favourite Yalta formation, directed against the Soviet centre, the Balkans. The Soviet team unfamiliar with the tactics of their opponents in view of the withdrawal of the old quarter-backs, Churchill and Roosevelt, decided to block with their new guards and tackles, — Tripolitania, Eritrea, Tokyo and Procedural Question, who were successful in throwing the other team for no gain. Now with only one down to go the Anglo-Saxons are in a huddle about what formation to try next.

9. I very definitely think that a great deal depends upon the next move by the Anglo-Saxon powers. In my despatch No. 450 of November 8th,[†99] I indicated that I had thought the United States government were moving in the right direction by first of all endeavouring to placate justifiable Soviet — and British — claims to a share in the control of Japan. What is more necessary than anything else, however, is an attempt by the United States to allay Soviet suspicion and mistrust by abandoning the philosophy of the tough school and resorting once more to the Roosevelt touch — even though the master hand is no longer present. In this allaying of Soviet mistrust and suspicion the handling of the atomic bomb secret must play the leading part. I am not one of those in favour of disclosing the actual process of manufacturing the bomb to the Soviet Union unless proper safeguards are given in return, which I doubt if the Soviet Government are in a position to give. I am all in favour, however, of the secret being brought some way into the United Nations Organisation in order to bolster up that body and inspire new trust in international cooperation for peace and security. I believe that this can be done most effectively by referring the whole question to the Security Council to be considered by that body after it is set up.

10. I am sending a copy of this despatch to the High Commissioner for Canada in London.

Not rec[eive]d yet Nov. 26. [signature illisible/illegible]

I think that it is too late to consider the issue of a public statement emphasizing the voluntary nature of registration as Soviet citizens by persons in Canada. It appears that the registration has been completed in Montreal, Toronto, Fort William, Winnipeg and Edmonton, and it may have been completed already in the other two cities in which it was contemplated which are Windsor and Vancouver. When the statement was suggested, registration had been undertaken only in Toronto and was just beginning in other cities.

So far we have not received any complaints of substance about the conduct of the registration. Certain pro-Soviet elements in the Ukrainian community may have brought pressure to bear on their compatriots to register but there has been no allegation of improper conduct on the part of the Soviet officials conducting the registration. It is quite a normal practice for consular officers to establish registers of their nationals in the countries in which they are serving although this particular registration has the unusual feature that it applies only to persons who came to Canada as Poles but are now apparently in the eyes of both the Polish and the Soviet Governments without citizenship in either state unless they voluntarily choose to become Soviet citizens. The matter was discussed several times informally with the Soviet Embassy and this may have had some effect towards ensuring that the conduct of the registration officers was correct.

Unless, therefore, abuses come to light of which we are still unaware, my view is that we should let the matter rest.[100]

There was a discussion of the action to be taken in the Corby Case in the Prime Minister's Office this morning, attended by the Prime Minister, Mr. St. Laurent, Commissioner Wood[101] and Messrs. Robertson and Wrong. The Soviet Ambassador has been urgently seeking an appointment with the Prime Minister before his departure for Moscow, now timed for tomorrow morning, and it had been arranged that the Ambassador should see the Prime Minister this afternoon.

At an earlier discussion on December 1st, the Prime Minister had expressed the view that he should send a message to Stalin via the Ambassador on the revelations made by Corby, requesting an ending of these Soviet activities in Canada. At that time it looked as though the United States investigation into the "Miss Corby" case would take a very long time and might not yield results sufficient to justify police action. Since then, however, further information has been received from Washington, indicating that they have learned of Soviet penetration involving senior officers of the Treasury, the United States Intelligence Services, and the White House. The information is so grave that Mr. Hoover[102] has told Commissioner Wood that he has instructed the F.B.I. to concentrate all their activities on this case. If the accusations are true, there are most impelling reasons, from the point of view of security, for as prompt United States counter-action as possible.

When the Prime Minister was informed of this, he felt that it put a different complexion on the position here, and that it made it most desirable to await the outcome of the United States investigation. It was decided, therefore, that he would not take the initiative in mentioning the matter to the Ambassador this afternoon.

As there was some possibility that the Ambassador might himself take the initiative in demanding the return of Corby, the reply which should be made by the Prime Minister was discussed. It was finally agreed that he should not deny knowledge of Corby's disappearance, but should merely promise to make enquiries into any representations which the Ambassador might make and leave it at that.

Commissioner Wood expressed the opinion that the revelation to the Soviet authorities of our knowledge of the information brought by Corby would hamper the United States investigation and said that Mr. Hoover, he was sure, would prefer postponement.

CONFIDENTIAL [London,] December 5, 1945

Dear Mr. Wrong,

You will be interested in the report of a long conversation which I had with M. D. Z. Manuilsky, Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the Ukraine, who is the Ukrainian delegate to the Preparatory Commission. M. Manuilsky, together with the members of the other Soviet Delegations, was a guest at a cocktail party given by the Canadian Delegation yesterday. As you probably know from your experience at San Francisco, M. Manuilsky is perhaps the most urbane and expansive of Soviet diplomats. He became very affable when Mr. Wilgress [102]J. Edgar Hoover, directeur, Federal Bureau of Investigation des États-Unis.

J. Edgar Hoover, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation of the United States.

told him that I was handling Russian affairs in the Department. He led me into an adjoining room which was comparatively empty and where we sat and talked for about an hour.

The subject M. Manuilsky was anxious to discuss was that of anti-Soviet Ukrainians in Canada. He began by saying many complimentary things about our country. He had been most interested in the report which Professors Bondarchuk and Pogrebniak, who had visited Ottawa, Toronto and Winnipeg after the San Francisco Conference, had made about their visit. They had been most appreciative of the way they were received in Canada and had returned full of enthusiasm for what they had seen of Canadian agricultural methods. M. Manuilsky said that in planning the reconstruction of the Ukraine, the Soviet authorities would aim at creating an economic balance similar to that which Canada appeared to have, i.e. a highly modern agricultural base upon which industry could be built and developed in such a way as not to dislocate the development of agriculture.

M. Manuilsky then went on to say that sentiment aside, relations with Canada were of considerable practical value to the Soviet Union since there were really only two countries which could supply the U.S.S.R. with the materials necessary for reconstruction — the United States and Canada, "perhaps also the United Kingdom, though to a lesser extent." He felt that the question of credits would be solved in due course to the satisfaction of both countries. There was, however, one circumstance which marred Canadian-Soviet relations, and that was the anti-Soviet agitation conducted by certain groups of Ukrainians in Canada. It was difficult for Soviet-Ukrainians to reconcile, particularly after what they had gone through in the last few years, the licence allowed by the Canadian Government to anti-Soviet Ukrainians with the expressions of genuine friendship, of which there were many, and which he himself had witnessed when he passed through Edmonton last summer. M. Manuilsky stated at the outset that he understood and respected our principle of freedom of speech and right of asylum, but he felt that even these principles had certain bounds which should not be transgressed.

I told M. Manuilsky that Canadian officials were also seriously concerned about this problem, although from a different point of view. From the Canadian point of view it was not only a question of international relations, but a broader internal issue of Canadian nationality. The Canadian method of handling national minorities who had recently immigrated into the country differed from the nationality policies of the Soviet Union. We hoped that in due course this immigrant stock would be absorbed into one or the other of the two main ethnic groups in Canada.

This process took time. Every thoughtful Canadian understood that it was impossible for a man who came from another country to divest himself at one stroke of all the emotional associations of his early life. One could accuse him of moral dishonesty if he claimed to have done so. It was therefore perfectly natural for these immigrants to group themselves in societies which maintained the language and folk ways of their native land. Indeed, the Canadian authorities welcomed the existence of these societies since through their various activities they served to lessen the newcomer's sense of isolation in a new country. The second generation acquired naturally the ways of their adopted country and the third and fourth generations were thoroughly Canadian in outlook, but to the first generation of immigrants their native land would always remain a kind of sentimental and idealized symbol. This was especially true of the Ukrainians, most of whom had emigrated owing to circumstances which M. Manuilsky had doubtless known at first-hand. The educated element in this emigration, which provided the natural leadership for these societies, had been brought up in an atmosphere of intense Ukrainian nationalism. The ideal of an independent Ukraine continued to have for them a sentimental value, but the remarkable growth of the Soviet Union had deprived this ideal of all practical meaning.

What worried thoughtful Canadians was the exaggerated importance which was attached in the Soviet Union to this sentimental nationalism. Attacks in the Soviet press, such as Zaslavsky's articles, invested Ukrainian nationalist leaders with a significance which they would not otherwise have. I felt sure that M. Manuilsky's experience in handling problems of minority nationalism would support my contention that a minority national group tended to rally about any cause no matter how bad it might be if it felt that the attack on the cause was an attack upon itself. This had been the effect of Zaslavsky's articles. Those Ukrainian Canadians who were pro-Soviet took their lead from articles in the Soviet press which attacked the nationalist organizations. This tended to rally the nationalists around their cause while their leaders felt that they were making headway when so powerful a country as the U.S.S.R. took such vigorous notice of their activities.

From the Canadian point of view the effect of this controversy was to keep Ukrainian nationalism alive and thus to retard the process of assimilation. I suggested that the solution of this problem would be eased if the Ukrainian nationalists were ignored by the Soviet authorities while the Ukraine went on ahead with its programme of improving the life of the Ukrainian people.

I then asked M. Manuilsky on a purely personal and unofficial basis what concrete steps for solving this problem would he recommend to the Canadian Government if he were an official of that Government and had to take into account the constitutional framework within which it had to operate. M. Manuilsky evaded the issue by stating that if analogous statement were made about Canada in the Soviet Union, the Soviet authorities would deal very severely with the offenders. I said that if the Canadian Government attempted to use any form of repression, such as arrest, prohibition of the right to publish newspapers etc., the issue would become much greater than that of Ukrainian nationalism. The Canadian people would feel that their fundamental rights were threatened and would vigorously resist the Government's action. If any repressive action were taken because of anti-Soviet statements, then all the anti-Soviet elements in Canada would attempt to exploit popular attachment to civil liberties for their own ends and this would certainly have the worst possible effect on Canadian-Soviet relations. M. Manuilsky suggested that at least a strong statement on this subject by the Prime Minister might help to allay the uneasiness felt by the Soviet-Ukrainians. I wondered in reply whether such a statement might not give the anti-Soviet elements an opening for precipitating a public controversy over Soviet-Canadian relations in general. A statement of this sort might well defeat its own purpose.

I added that as a matter of fact the Canadian Government was studying this problem from the point of view of Canadian unity as well as of Soviet-Canadian relations and that it seemed to me that the most effective policy under the present circumstances was to develop good all around Canadian-Soviet relations, in trade, exchanges of information, visits of scientists etc., and to avoid doing anything which might excite strong emotions. M. Manuilsky again asked me to give further thought to this problem with a view to formulating some more positive recommendations to the Government. He himself disclaimed, however, any right to give me any advice on how it should be handled.

I do not know whether I succeeded in convincing M. Manuilsky of the harmfulness of Soviet press attacks on Ukrainian nationalists, but I am glad that I had the opportunity of suggesting to him the complexity of the problem and of outlining the position of the Canadian Government. My impression is that he had not really considered the problem from this point of view, and that, as an old revolutionary, he had thought of it almost entirely in terms of polemical frontal assaults.

Lest my detailed account of the arguments should convey a false impression of acrimoniousness, I might add that the conversation, which was carried on in Russian, was conducted in an atmosphere of great cordiality, and even intimacy. The talk ended with M. Manuilsky expressing his admiration for Mr. Mackenzie King and for the contribution made in this war by Canadian soldiers. On saying good-bye he extended to me a warm invitiation to visit the Ukraine and call upon him in Kiev.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. John Holmes at Canada House.

Yours sincerely,

[LEO MALANIA]

DESPATCH 1420 Ottawa, December 19, 1945

SECRET

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 2629 of November 8th† concerning the registration of Soviet citizens in Canada and to inform you that this registration has now taken place at offices which were opened for the purpose in Montreal, Toronto, Fort William, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Vancouver and Windsor. It is also possible for persons who have not yet registered to do so by writing to the Consular Division of the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa before the end of the year.

2. The registration appears to have taken place without any difficulties having arisen and with very little comment having been made. The Foreign Language Press in Canada has paid scant attention to the registration, and the only comment made in those sections of the Foreign Language Press which are unfriendly to the Soviet Union has been a reminder that the registration is voluntary. There was at one time a suspicion that pressure was being brought to bear on some persons by means of the suggestion that failure to register might affect the security of relatives in Europe, but no specific evidence of activities of this nature has come to light.

3. I am enclosing for your information a copy of an extract from the Toronto Star of December 3rd† containing an interview with Mr. Pavlov of the Soviet Embassy. You will notice that Mr. Pavlov has emphasized in this interview the voluntary nature of the registration and has indicated that no one who does not wish to apply for Soviet citizenship need register. The possibility of issuing a statement of this nature was suggested to the Soviet Ambassador when he called at the Department on October 24th. Mr. Pavlov's interview has helped materially to dispel any misunderstanding which may have arisen out of the terms of the announcement originally made by the Soviet Embassy.

4. In the light of these circumstances it has been decided that no action need be taken or comment made by the Canadian authorities in regard to the registration of Soviet citizens in Canada. Efforts are being made, however, to secure additional information concerning one aspect of this question. The assumption had been made here that persons from the former Polish territories, who are now living abroad without having become naturalized citizens of another state and who have not registered as Soviet citizens will become for all practical purposes stateless individuals. This assumption is based on reports which have been received concerning the Polish-Soviet Treaty of July 6th, the text of which has not yet been made available. I understand that this Treaty provides that persons living in the territories concerned automatically become Soviet citizens unless they apply for Polish citizenship, and that persons from the territories living abroad also are required to opt for Polish citizenship if they wish to remain Poles. On the other hand, it has been reported that the Polish Government will continue to regard as Polish citizens persons from the areas concerned who are living abroad and who do not register as Soviet citizens. The action of the Soviet authorities in Canada in calling for registration on the part of any who wish to obtain Soviet citizenship is further evidence that the persons in question do not automatically become citizens of the U.S.S.R. Inquiries in regard to this apparent inconsistency between the Polish-Soviet Treaty on the one hand and the statements of Polish and Soviet authorities on the other have been made to the Canadian High Commissioner in London and to the Canadian Embassy in Moscow. I shall send you any further information which I receive in clarification of this question, and I should also be grateful to learn of any comments in this regard which you might care to make.

MOST SECRET. Following for Pearson from Wrong. Begins: Reference my immediately preceding message.†

It now seems desirable to address a most secret communication to the Department of State along the following lines: Begins: The Canadian Embassy has been informally keeping the Department of State au fait with developments in the case of Fernando de Kobbe, Spanish Consul in Vancouver, British Columbia. It will be recalled that conclusive evidence of this man's connection with espionage organizations came to light some months ago. Since this evidence involved certain personnel in the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs as well as the misuse of Spanish Diplomatic bags it was felt that strong representations for a thorough investigation of the whole matter with the implied threat of a most disagreeable public scandal might result in a general clean-up of the anti-United Nations activities in the Spanish foreign services as well as in forcing the Spanish authorities generally to take more stringent measures against other Axis activities which are known to be taking place on Spanish soil.

After consultation therefore between the Canadian and the United Kingdom Governments, the British Ambassador in Madrid was instructed to expose the de Kobbe case to the Spanish Foreign Minister, showing photostatic copies of some of the evidence which has come into our hands, asking him for de Kobbe's immediate recall and requesting that a complete investigation into all the circumstances of the case be at once instituted.

Sir Samuel Hoare, on the receipt of these instructions, saw Señor Jordana on Sunday, January 16th, and acted upon them. His Majesty's Ambassador reports that the Foreign Minister was greatly shocked and promised a most rigid enquiry, adding that he would keep it in his personal control. On January 19th, Sir Samuel Hoare saw the Under-Secretary of State who reported that within an hour after the Ambassador's first visit on the matter a telegram had been sent to de Kobbe ordering him to proceed at once to Washington to receive instructions. The enquiry had not so far, he said, produced any evidence of documents having been passed through Foreign Office bags. Special enquiries were being made to determine whether de Kobbe had actually received payments. (The Ambassador has not yet shown to the Spanish authorities the photostatic copies of the $1000 in bills which it is known de Kobbe did in fact receive.)

In the meantime the Canadian Government had learnt about Señor Jordana's telegram of instructions to de Kobbe to report to Washington as well as a telegram from de Kobbe to Señor Cardenas[103] enquiring if he had any information and should he bring his daughter. This latter telegram almost certainly means that de Kobbe is as yet unaware that he is suspect and that he regards Señor Jordana's message as the outcome of his repeated requests for a transfer which he had reason to believe would be favourably considered not later than February. This latter telegram was answered in the course of a telephone call between Señor Cardenas and de Kobbe on January 18th when the Ambassador informed him that he had, as yet, no information from Madrid as to the meaning of de Kobbe's instructions to proceed to Washington and that pending the receipt of such information he, de Kobbe, had better remain in Vancouver.

On January 22nd, de Kobbe received a telegram from Cardenas to the effect that he, Cardenas, had received instructions that de Kobbe was to return to Spain as soon as possible. The Ambassador goes on to say that the S.S. Magallanes must leave New Orleans about February 6th and requests de Kobbe to inform him by wire of the date of his arrival in Washington if he intends to pass through that city en route to New Orleans. Immediately on the receipt of this telegram de Kobbe enquired about railway accommodations. His anticipated route is via Canadian Pacific to Montreal and thence to Washington.

The Canadian Government now proposes to tell de Kobbe (and concurrently Mr. Schwartz, the Spanish Consul General in Montreal will be informed):

(a) that he is no longer persona grata;

(b) that he is not to leave his apartment without notifying the R.C.M.P.;

(c) that he should make arrangements to leave Canada at once;

(d) that he will be informed later about the conditions of his departure and travel.

Before taking this action however, the Canadian Government would be glad to know urgently the views of the United States Government on the question of de Kobbe's admission into that country and the conditions under which he could pass through en route to Spain. The Canadian Government would be grateful if permission could be granted for de Kobbe's admission in transit in order to board the S.S. Magallanes on February 6th in New Orleans. The Government would also be glad to know whether his entry from Montreal and his travelling to New Orleans via Washington would meet the convenience of the United States authorities who will no doubt wish to keep him under surveillance while he is in the country. Ends.

The Foreign Office have repeated their exchanges of telegrams with Madrid to the United Kingdom Embassy in Washington. I think, therefore, that it would be advisable for you to inform the Embassy that the above note is being presented to the Department of State.

Berle further stated that for the present he desired to withhold judgement on question of United States authorities permitting de Kobbe to sail on S.S. Magallanes from New Orleans. MOST SECRET [Ottawa,] January 29, 1944

The former Spanish Consul in Vancouver arrived in Montreal yesterday and leaves for Washington this evening. He is due to sail from New Orleans for Spain on February 6th.

The R.C.M.P. have had no difficulty so far in this case. The search of his apartment was justified by the discovery of the original United States currency notes ($1000.) which came to him with the codes and instructions from the Japanese espionage ring in Madrid. The codes and instructions were not found, however.

There has been some press enquiry about this sudden move which took large headlines in the Vancouver papers. It has been explained, however, that the transfer of a consul is not a world shaking event but rather a quite normal occurrence and that no significance whatsoever need be attached to it.

This de Kobbe case has been an annoying and troublesome one. I feel, however, that its political importance in helping to bring Spain into line and in forcing a general clean-up of her foreign service will be such as to make it well worth the bother and expense.

MOST SECRET. My telegram No. 280, January 31st,† de Kobbe. Following is text of telegram dated January 29th from the British Ambassador, Madrid, to Foreign Office, Begins: I found Señor Rolland[104] when he called on me this evening disturbed over the action of the Canadian Government in placing Kobbe under police supervision. Ministry of Foreign Affairs is most anxious to avoid any public scandal and I feel that we should do so in view of assurances that I have given him on behalf of his Majesty's Governments, London and Canada. I hope therefore that the Canadian Government will, while taking necessary security precautions, avoid scandal and cooperate if possible with Spanish Consulate General, Montreal. I informed Señor Rolland that we had evidence that Kobbe had received 1,000 dollars and told him we would let him have photostats supporting it. He is grateful for offer and would like evidence as soon as possible. He informed me that they had totally failed to find any incriminating evidence about use of Spanish bags.

MOST SECRET. Reference your No. 293 February 1st, transmitting text of Sir Samuel Hoare's telegram January 29th, de Kobbe. Please inform the Foreign Office as follows:

It is understandable that the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs is anxious to avoid a public scandal. We are however somewhat concerned to learn that the Ambassador has given assurances in this regard and we are inclined to feel that it should be made clear to the Spanish authorities that this is without prejudice to any action which we might find it necessary to take should circumstances change to warrant it. It seems to us that the political importance of this case lies principally in the fact that we are in a position to announce the possession of evidence that a Spanish consular officer has received communications and funds from a Japanese espionage organisation operating through Head, Personnel Department, Foreign Ministry of Spain.

Madrid. If circumstances should arise making it desirable to make such an announcement it would be regrettable to find ourselves under any obligation to the Spanish Government not to do so. The police supervision over de Kobbe in Canada was in fact unobtrusive and so far as we know there is here no suspicion that he left the country for any reason other than a normal transfer from one post to another. We understand that United States police supervision will be equally discreet.

Insofar as the Spanish Consul General in Montreal is concerned, he was informed of the circumstances of the case and was told how the R.C.M.P. proposed to handle the matter during Kobbe's passage through Montreal. He gave our authorities his full co-operation and the routine laid down went through without incident. Kobbe is now out of Canadian jurisdiction.

MOST SECRET London, February 9, 1944

The High Commissioner has asked me to write to you with regard to the developments in the Kobbe case. On receipt of your telegram No. 218 of the 2nd February I wrote to Mr. Williams of the Foreign Office, who is dealing with the political aspect of this matter,. . . I enclose a copy of my letter to Williams† which, as you will see, closely follows the lines of your telegram under reference. Before your telegram was received, however, I had, on seeing Sir Samuel Hoare's telegram of the 29th January, spoken to the Foreign Office very much in the sense of your communication.

I saw Mr. Williams again on February 4th and at that interview I told him that the Canadian authorities could not but feel that if, as appeared to be the case, the British Ambassador in Madrid had given definite assurances to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs that we would refrain from publicity in this case while the examination was pending, he had given away a valuable card in the game. Mr. Williams said that he was sure that Sir Samuel Hoare could not have meant in his telegram that he had given any binding assurances to the Spaniards that there would be no publicity, but rather that so long as the matter was being followed up speedily and whole-heartedly by the Spanish authorities we would agree to refrain from publicity.

I said that I felt personally that we had no need to bargain with the Spaniards in a matter in which we held such a strong hand. I added that the Note Verbale which Sir Samuel Hoare had presented to the Spanish Government, and of which a copy was sent to you under cover of my letter of the 31st January,† had omitted any reference to the moderation of the Canadian Government in not prosecuting de Kobbe in the Courts on a charge of espionage. This point, as you will recall, was covered in paragraph 3 of the instructions issued to Sir Samuel Hoare and enclosed to you under cover of the High Commissioner's despatch No. A. 408 of the 10th December.

I said that it appeared to me that the British Ambassador's Note Verbale was milder than had been contemplated in the instructions agreed upon by the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments. Mr. Williams said that he felt that Sir Samuel Hoare's Note Verbale was strongly phrased and that Mr. Eden had also spoken very bluntly to the Duke of Alba[105] about this case. He pointed out that in transmitting this material to the Foreign Office the Canadian authorities had asked that it should be brought to Mr. Eden's attention for whatever action he might see fit to take, and he felt that in the Foreign Office view the best possible use was, in fact, being made of the material in dealing with the Spaniards. I replied that of course the Canadian authorities were quite willing to leave the man on the spot, i.e., Sir Samuel Hoare, a free hand in the tactics he should follow in dealing with the Spanish Government regarding this case but we felt that he should have our views.

Mr. Williams then said, as reported in our telegram No. 347 of to-day's date,† that the Foreign Office would telegraph the Canadian Government's views to Sir Samuel Hoare and would also enquire further into the nature of the assurances which he had given to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs with regard to our abstention from publicity. Despite the Foreign Office assurances I personally remain somewhat dubious about Sir Samuel Hoare's handling of this case and cannot resist the impression that more effective use could have been made of it.

Yours sincerely,

My dear Charles,

I quite agree with your observations on the Kobbe case — it has not been used, I think, nearly as well as it could have been. Hoare's telegram in which he intimated that he had given assurances to the Spaniards in the matter of publicity was an appeasement document if I ever saw one, and I was not surprised that you had drafted a letter to the Foreign Office to this effect even before our reply arrived. I am sometimes sorry that we did not break the thing wide open before Kobbe ever left Canada, as things have turned out, although at the time we felt sure that a sword of Damocles was a more political weapon from the long term view than a public sock in the eye.

SECRET [Ottawa,] March 11, 1944

The Spanish Consul General, Mr. Schwartz, called on Wednesday on instructions from his Foreign Minister, Count Jordana, to convey his Government's appreciation of the courtesy and restraint with which the Kobbe case had been handled by the Canadian Government. Kobbe is now back in Spain, and the Spanish Government claims that it is making the most searching investigation of charges that Axis espionage agents have been using Spanish diplomatic and consular facilities.

Schwartz said that he had formed the impression, in his conversation with Kobbe during the three days that the latter was in Montreal, that the man was innocent.

Kobbe himself had maintained stoutly that he knew no reason why his recall should be requested, denied even having received secret messages from Japanese espionage agents, and said that the incriminating thousand dollars in United States funds which had been found in his apartment in Vancouver had been received through the mail without any covering letter which would indicate its source.

I told Schwartz that I had no doubt that the Spanish Government's investigation would establish Kobbe's guilt, but I could not myself give him any supplementary information on the case. We had presented the evidence to the Spanish Government through the United Kingdom Ambassador in Madrid and it would only confuse procedure to use two channels.[106]

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I am enclosing a copy of a letter from Roberts of the Foreign Office,† outlining recent developments — or rather, lack of developments — in the case against Kobbe.

It seems perfectly clear that the Spanish authorities have no intention of proceeding against Kobbe. As long ago as last March the Ministry of Foreign Affairs said that they would set up a special court to try the case, and now in December they have still not reached the stage of drawing up a statement of charges against him.

I cannot resist the personal impression that the British Embassy in Madrid have been lacking in vigour in their handling of this case. Certainly no use seems to have been made of it to bring pressure to bear upon the Spanish Government in securing further concessions, as was suggested in your despatch No. 945 of September 20th, 1943.† Meanwhile, you will have seen despatch No. 121 of the 7th December from the Dominions Office, enclosing a note from the Spanish Embassy in London dated 25th October, 1944,† in which the Duke of Alba coolly informs Lord Cranborne that Don Fernando de Kobbe y Chinchilla has relinquished his post of Consul in Vancouver in order to be appointed to a post in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Madrid.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

[106]Note marginale:/Marginal note:
OK. K[ing] 15-3-44.

With reference to Mr. Ritchie's letter of 8th December, 1944, concerning the Kobbe case, I am enclosing a copy of a letter from Mr. Garran of the Foreign Office, dated April 13th,† together with a translation of Note Verbale No. 131 from the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs, dated February 14th.†

In his letter Mr. Garran points out that the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs have made little real progress in their investigations into the case. The Ministry take the view that there is insufficient proof as yet that Kobbe ever received the microfilm codes with the letter containing the instructions in invisible ink, or if he did that these were sent to him with his foreknowledge. The Note also asks us for specific information as to whether the invisible writing on the letter, having been developed by the Canadian authorities, was restored by them to invisibility before the letter was delivered. Mr. Garran also reports a conversation by the First Secretary of the United Kingdom Embassy in Madrid with Senor Rolland of the Ministry.

Mr. Garran emphasizes the extent of Spanish obstructiveness. It is the view of the United Kingdom Embassy in Madrid that the Spanish Government is hoping to postpone indefinitely having to send the case for trial before the Courts in order to avoid embarassing exposures which might come out at the trial. They suggest on the other hand that some of the delay might have been due to the ill-health of Señor Rolland. Although Mr. Garran says that the Foreign Office would be interested to see the answer to the specific question about the invisible ink requested of the Canadian authorities, they are not at all certain that even with this evidence the Ministry of Foreign Affairs would engage in a more active prosecution.

On receipt of this letter I had a discussion with Mr. Garran in the hope of securing some indication as to how future steps in this case might be fitted in to general policy towards Spain. I was interested to know whether the United Kingdom Government might be interested in pressing this case as part of their present policy of reminding General Franco that he was in no position to beg favours. It was not a question of receiving formal instruction from the Foreign Office as to what Canadian policy should be in this matter, but rather of securing some informal guidance as to what steps might best conform with Allied policy. Mr. Garran agreed to discuss the legal aspects further with the security experts before communicating with me. It now seems doubtful, however, if the Foreign Office have any clear-cut intentions on this subject. My impression is that they take a pretty hopeless attitude towards a further prosecution of the case because of long experience with Spanish frustrations. As de Kobbe is not likely to be very dangerous to us in the future it might seem scarcely worth the effort to press the case against him further. On the other hand, there are arguments against allowing the Spaniards at this stage to believe that they can successfully get away with condoning such activities.

The Foreign Office proposes, on receiving the information required from us, to instruct their Embassy at Madrid to give the Ministry for Foreign Affairs the answer they asked for about the invisible ink, and to inform them that they already have all the other information at the United Kingdom Government's disposal, and that the United Kingdom Government is astonished that they do not find it adequate and conclusive.

Yours sincerely,

J. W. HOLMES

Dear Mr. Holmes,

I have your letter of 16th May addressed to Mr. Robertson concerning the Kobbe case. It is, as you say, apparent that the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs have no desire to make any real investigation. I note also that the Foreign Office apparently do not regard it as useful to expedite the correspondence since the note verbale addressed to the United Kingdom Embasssy† is dated 14th February.

The particular question asked concerning the secret ink has been carefully investigated and we have received a report on the process by which the secret writing was developed. As a result of this report, we are in a position to say explicity that the invisible writing was restored to invisibility by chemical process before being forwarded.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Read,

With reference to your letter of 5th June concerning the Kobbe case, I am enclosing a copy of a letter of 19th June from Mr. Bromley, Secretary to Sir Alexander Cadogan, to Mr. Bowker of the United Kingdom Embassy in Madrid, conveying the report by the Canadian Government that the invisible writing on the letter in question was restored to invisibility by chemical process before being forwarded. In this communication it is stated that neither the United Kingdom nor the Canadian Goverments find the attitude of the Spanish Ministry for Foreign Affairs adequate and conclusive.

Yours sincerely,

TOP SECRET London, September 8, 1945

Dear Mr. Robertson,

With reference to my letter of the 22nd June to Mr. Read concerning the Kobbe case, I am enclosing a copy of a letter to Mr. Bevin, dated 20th August,† from Sir Victor Mallet, the United Kingdom Ambassador in Madrid, together with the English and Spanish texts of a note verbale from the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs† on this subject. Sir Victor Mallet reports that the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs finally decided that they have no case for proceeding against Señor Kobbe as they do not consider that any satisfactory proof has been given that the secret message or the microfilm ever reached him. He is to be punished only for his administrative offence of having delayed in notifying his superior officers of the receipt of money for an unknown destination. The view of the United Kingdom Ambassador is that the Minister's attitude can only be regarded as profoundly unsatisfactory. However, he considers that in the absence of any further conclusive evidence there would seem to be no alternative but to let the matter rest. In communicating this letter to me Mr. Garran of the Western Department of the Foreign Office stated that the Foreign Office fully shared the Ambassador's disgust at the attitude of the Spanish Ministry, but they also doubted whether any good would come of pursuing the case further. They would like to know whether the Department of External Affairs share this view.

As you are aware, the recent trend of United Kingdom policy towards Spain has been increasingly uncompromising. Every effort is apparently being made to make the Spanish authorities realise that it is not the intention of the United Kingdom Government to forget their attitude in the course of the war with Japan. Although the possibilities of securing satisfaction from the Spaniards seem pretty small, the question might be asked as to whether it is desirable at this particular time to drop our complaint and allow the Ministry of Foreign Affairs even a minor victory.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Holmes,

The position taken by the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the Kobbe case as shown by your letter of the 8th September is unsatisfactry but not altogether unexpected. The evidence would, in any reasonable interpretation, be regarded as complete but there is obviously no means of direct proof that the materials in question were actually in Kobbe's hands.

There appears to be no advantage in asking that the matter be further argued with the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It would, however, appear to be suitable that the United Kingdom Ambassador should, while noting the action being taken by the Spanish Ministry, state that the views held by the United Kingdom and Canadian authorities on this subject remained unchanged.

Yours sincerely,

Sir,

With reference to your despatch No. 13 from San Sebastian dated the 20th August† regarding the case of Señor Kobbe, I have to inform you that the Canadian authorities agree that no good is likely to come from arguing the matter further with the Spanish authorities. I shall be glad, however, if you will inform the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs that the authorities in both Canada and the United Kingdom take note of the Ministry's decision not to pursue the matter further, that they maintain the views which they have already expressed to the Ministry and that they draw their own conclusions regarding this further example of Spanish reluctance to take proper action against an official who has obviously worked in the interests of our enemies.

Sir,

Acting upon instructions received from my Government I have the honour to inform you that I have been authorised to enter into negotiations for an arrangement between Canada and Sweden regarding reciprocal rights for passage and landing in connection with civilian air traffic.

An agreement has recently been reached between Sweden and the United States for civilian air traffic between the two countries. The Swedish Airlines desire to direct this traffic over Canadian territory and would be happy to make such arrangements in this respect as would meet the wishes of the Canadian Government.

The traffic would take place over the Northern route (Ireland — Newfoundland or Labrador — Canada). In case of adverse climatic conditions during a few months of the year it might be necessary to rely upon a route Scotland — Newfoundland or a more southern route (Ireland — the Azores — Newfoundland), but in such case it is not contemplated to take up traffic or mail by the Swedish line from Great Britain and there would be no competition with a Canadian line or the Southern Atlantic route.

An arrangement confirming the two freedoms agreement[107] in the relation between Canada and Sweden would be acceptable to the Swedish Government.

Accept etc.

CANADA-SWEDEN AGREEMENT

At the conclusion of the Canada-United States aviation discussions in New York[108] Mr. Baldwin[109] told me that Mr. Howe did not think it necessary to negotiate an agreement with Sweden for rights of commercial entry. He thought that we should not go beyond the first two freedoms.

I told the Swedish Minister that we did not want to go beyond the first two freedoms (he had already said in a previous conversation that he thought his government did not care much one way or the other whether rights of commercial entry were granted) and pointed out that we could either let the matter be taken care of by the two freedoms agreement or enter into a Canada-Sweden agreement specifically granting the two freedoms. Mr. Wijkman suggested that a separate agreement would be preferable, and I said that we would be glad to have the Swedish Government submit a draft of the sort of agreement they had in mind. After making a somewhat half-hearted effort to get us to do the drafting, he agreed to prepare something. He is now awaiting instructions from Stockholm and we may expect to hear from him in the near future.

PERSONAL Caracas, September 27, 1944

My dear Robertson,

With reference to your personal letter of August 29th,† I have now presented my credentials and have had a little time in which to settle down in my entirely new surroundings.

You know how keen I am, in the absence of a Canadian representative, to do everything possible to help Canadian interests, and even at the risk of your crediting me with an excess of zeal I think I should tell you privately that I am not entirely happy with the state of relations between this country and Canada. There is a great potential market here for British Commonwealth goods and services, which is being gradually collared by the Americans, who are making a big drive just now. The President of Venezuela was, I gather, more hurt by the delay and the eventual failure of his suggestion to visit Canada early this year, than the official despatches tend to show. No Venezuelan has raised this point, but this is what I gather from reliable informants. The President was done proud by the United States Government, and his hospitable reception by the Americans is beginning to produce good dividends in the way of post-war orders, and I am just a little apprehensive that Canada may awake to the situation too late. There is not even a Canadian Trade Commissioner resident here, and it is difficult for one man to cover this country from Colombia. Perhaps for various good reasons Canada is not particularly interested in trade with this country, and if so I hope you will ignore this letter.

Yours sincerely,

PERSONAL Ottawa, October 14, 1944

My dear Sir George:

Thank you for your personal note of September 27th commenting on relations between Canada and Venezuela, which you feel are not entirely satisfactory at the present time. I am sorry to learn that our inability to extend an invitation to the President of Venezuela to visit Ottawa during his visit to the United States had left behind a certain soreness. Unfortunately, the hint that an invitation would be welcome came at a time when our parliament was just beginning its session, and the Prime Minister and senior members of the Cabinet were very much preoccupied with the necessary preparations for it. When the strain of the European war is over, there may perhaps be an opportunity when you can advise us of the visit of some senior figure in the Venezuelan administration to the United States, whom you would consider it helpful for us to invite to Ottawa.

I note also your reference to the possibility of a considerable market for goods from the British Commonwealth in Venezuela, and the current success of the American drive for that market. I have been looking up our trade figures with Venezuela, and find that, within the last three years, our imports have ranged between six and nine millions of dollars, while our exports have declined from almost $1,750,000.00 in 1941 to approximately $750,000.00 in 1943. Shipping difficulties and the strain upon our industrial resources of wartime production have, of course, operated adversely against us in the Latin American market, as they have for the United Kingdom. Yet there is no doubt that Canadian manufacturers are interested in the prospects for postwar trade in Latin America, and I shall pass on to the proper officials in Trade and Commerce your comments on the opportunities for us in Venezuela.

I appreciate your interest in things Canadian, and will be glad to hear from you further from time to time on such topics as you think would be of significance to us.

Yours sincerely,

Sir,

By order of my Government, I have the honour to inform the Government of the Dominion of Canada that the Yugoslav Constituent Assembly, at its first meeting, held in Belgrade on November 29th, 1945, has proclaimed Yugoslavia a Republic, and that the official name of the state will be the Federative Peoples' Republic of Yugoslavia.

On December 1st, the Yugoslav Constitutent Assembly, formed by both houses, the Federal Assembly and the Assembly of Nations, passed an Act creating a Praesidium, which besides other executive functions, will represent inside and outside the country the sovereignty of the nation and the Federative Peoples' Republic of Yugoslavia.

The Constituent Praesidium is composed of a Chairman, six Vice-Chairmen, two Secretaries and a maximum of thirty members.

The Constituent Praesidium appoints Ambassadors, Ministers Plenipotentiary and Envoys Extraordinary to foreign countries upon the recommendation of the Federal Government, and also receives credentials and letters of recall of diplomatic representatives from foreign countries.

Once the Constituent Assembly has accomplished its functions and changed to a regular parliament (Skupština), the Praesidium will act as praesidium of the regular Assembly.

The Constituent Praesidium was elected as follows: President: Ivan Ribar, former President of the Provisory Assembly; Vice-Chairmen; Moša Pijade, Filip Lakus, Josip Rus, Djura Pucar, Dimitri Vlahov and Marko Vujacic; Secretary; Mile Perunicic.

2. I feel strongly that no possible good would be served by attaching conditions which would merely alienate further the sympathies of a Government which there seems no reason to doubt has carried out the will of the majority of the people in proclaiming a Republic.
