Mr. RALSTON: Especially the latter. I commend to him the fact that there is being built up in Canada now a set of officials who are quite efficient in respect of this matter. Some of the difficulties which were necessarily attendant upon the advent of bankruptcy legislation have been done away with, and I believe that efficiency prevails. I trust therefore that he will take advantage of the machinery that exists in connection with this act rather than attempt to break new ground by appointing new officials. He will find, if he does that, that the amount to which he has referred will be very small indeed, because I cannot conceive of any case, except in respect of the boards of review, where there will be any large expenditure of public money required. There seems to me to be a tendency, not only here but everywhere, to increase machinery and I think we have pretty nearly all the machinery necessary in connection with this act.

Mr. BENNETT: With anything that the hon. gentleman has said I am not at the moment quarrelling. One of the difficulties that gave me the gravest concern about the legislation is the very circumstance to which attention has now been directed. There has grown up such resentment against some of the corporate trustees, on the part of those who have had to deal with them, that I say to the committee frankly I was amazed at the vigor of the protest that came to me from time to time, and during the last few months, in connection with matters of this kind. One of them has been discussed in a legislature and one of them was discussed the other day in one of the courts of the country, and in the most vigorous terms the judge said that he intended to report the matter to the superintendent in bankruptcy. My experience has been, in connection with the farming population—that is, in respect of voluntary assignment; and it does not apply to the province of Quebec at all—that they have complained, first, of expense, and secondly, that corporate trustees are without a soul, without any sympathetic attitude towards them at all.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the official receivers?

Mr. BENNETT: I am speaking of corporate official receivers. In the mercantile community you have a different set of considerations. My inquiries led me to believe that those who had been dealing with debt adjustments in some of the provinces at least were so fully seized of the situation, so keenly interested in bringing about some successful issue to their efforts, and so sympathetic with the struggles of their neighbours that we might look to them. In fact, one of the western premiers suggested that we might be able to get along with the aid of the sheriffs, but finally it was pointed out that there was a difficulty in that the sheriff usually has the execution in his pocket.

Mr. RALSTON: He is generally a decent fellow.

Mr. BENNETT: Very; and, though it may sound strange, he is most sympathetic by reason of the contact he has with the poverty and hardships of those against whom he has executions. The view finally prevailed however that this would be dangerous. I will try to bring to the chamber, and to the hon. gentleman's attention, one or two recent letters in connection with the matter to show him how the idea of the corporation acting in the capacity that used to be solely that of the individual has come to prevail during recent years in this country.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think there are any corporate official receivers.

Mr. BENNETT: Official trustee and official receiver have no differentiation so far as we are concerned. We call them official receivers here, but in one case there is a provision saying official receiver or official trustee.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: As a section is to be amended, and section 8 stands, and as new sections are to be added to deal with matters raised by the leader of the opposition, I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. NEILL: Might I suggest that there are some capable men as field supervisors of soldier settlement who might act in the capacity. There are some very capable men who are thoroughly familiar with the troubles of the farmer, and who are acquainted with the situation from the other point of view as well.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

PROVISION TO FACILITATE AND INCREASE EXTENSION OF CREDIT TO FARMERS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 93, to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Additional powers of board.

Mr. COOTE: I understand that loans contemplated under clause 3 are to persons who already have loans from the board. Is that correct?

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. gentleman will see, the purpose is to extend the powers of the board to enable them to take collateral security for loans that are outstanding and then to make compositions as though they were private lenders rather than a public board and to do what the loan companies have been doing, make advances in connection with seed grain and matters of that sort to protect their security. It does contemplate dealing with existing loans.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I believe the Prime Minister is aware that two provinces do not come under the operations of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. I wonder whether he has given any thought to that, or has any suggestion to make as to how the farm loan act will be complementary to the bill we have just passed in such a province as Saskatchewan where the farm loan act does not operate.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact is that we have given considerable thought to that matter. Just how it may be dealt with, we do not see at the moment. The provinces had their own methods of dealing with farm loans; some of them dealt with the question in one way and others in another. The legislation with which we have just been dealing would have application to the provinces whether they had farm loan boards or not, only this measure would not be available for the purpose of finding new capital in cases where compositions had been made and their own board rather than the federal, would have to be responsible for that.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the board at the present time any power to make compromises?

Mr. BENNETT: We think not. My present information is no.

Mr. RALSTON: Have compromises been submitted to the governor in council and made in that way?

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell the hon. gentleman what the position is, because the other day we were asked to provide further information with respect to the situation where the farm loan board is operating. If I give the present position of the loans it might make the matter clearer. The following is a summary of mortgage loans classified by provinces as of March 31, 1934:

Province:	Principal outstanding current
British Columbia	$1,166,741 20
Alberta	3,217,265 84
Manitoba	857,069 28
Quebec	2,791,292 14
New Brunswick	553,903 74
Nova Scotia	271,254 26

Mr. RALSTON: Ontario?

Mr. BENNETT: Ontario has no loan. The following is the statement of arrears:

Province:	Principal Outstanding Arrears
	Under six months	Over six months
British Columbia	$20,456 57	$26,816 01
Alberta	40,590 72	57,495 52
Manitoba	8,829 25	6,465 59
Quebec	28,032 51	24,446 21
New Brunswick	10,136 68	13,659 29
Nova Scotia	3,875 48	4,134 60

The whole amount outstanding for charges in all the provinces is $43,845.84; the amount of interest that is unpaid in all the provinces under six months is $247,328.52 and over six months, $180,201.86. The amount of interest accrued is $209,863.79. The total amount now outstanding is $9,784,064.90.

There are a number of mortgages under which proceedings have been taken and which are still unsettled as at March 31, 1934. The necessity for being able later to make compromises arises out of that circumstance. The statement is as follows:

Mortgages under which proceedings have been taken, which are still unsettled as of March 31, 1934

Province:
British Columbia	.....
Alberta	.....
Nova Scotia	.....
Quebec, Manitoba, and New Brunswick	$21,685 89

That is the amount which is unsettled. The amount in arrears under six months is $400.85 and over six months, $600.93. The charges outstanding amount to $622.70. We have made some advances, but I understand there is doubt as to their exact legality and hence the amendment to the section.

Mr. RALSTON: Did the Prime Minister say that over $200,000 was overdue for interest?

Mr. BENNETT: I will give the figures slowly. The amount of interest due and unpaid under six months in arrears is $247,328.52; over six months in arrears, $180,201.86, and the amount of interest accrued, $209,863.79.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): More than $400,000 overdue interest.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On $9,000,000?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. LUCAS: Did the Prime Minister give any figures in regard to the number of foreclosures, if any, that have been made under this act?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. As regards mortgages under which proceedings have been taken and which are still unsettled as at March 31, 1934, there are none in Alberta, none in British Columbia and none in Nova Scotia. The statement in connection with properties that are now vested in the board by reason of proceedings is as follows:

Real Estate Held for Sale at March 31, 1934

Province:	Number of properties	Investment	Book value
British Columbia	10	$ 58,977 53	$ 55,184 94
Alberta	8	18,505 54	15,504 63
Manitoba	3	9,118 89	6,700 00
Quebec	32	113,905 98	77,491 56
New Brunswick	4	13,992 51	10,500 00
Nova Scotia	3	5,482 14	3,687 34
Total	60	$219,982 59	$169,068 47

1. Actual cost includes the amount of unpaid principal on the loans involved, together with accrued interest and cash outlays to date of acquisition by the board.

2. Under the regulations of the board, no parcel of real estate may be carried at a book value in excess of the actual cost thereof to the board.

That is the position at the present moment.

Mr. LUCAS: Subsection (f) of section 3 says:

—accept and hold such additional and collateral security for loans as the board may deem proper.

Am I to understand from that that if a farmer has given a mortgage to the farm loan board and the value of the property has dropped, the board is to be empowered to compel the farmer to give additional security?

Mr. BENNETT: I know of no machinery by which they can compel him to do it, any more than any loan company can compel a farmer to do it. This authorizes the board to take the security; previously it had not the power to do so. The printed note opposite the section explains the conditions with respect to that.

Mr. LUCAS: Would the Prime Minister explain as to the regulations? I know there are regulations under the dominion act; what about the regulations in regard to the provincial authorities?

Mr. BENNETT: These are matters within the powers of the province, with respect to which happily we are not in control, although they are approved by the board before they come into effect.

Mr. LUCAS: When we were discussing this bill there was considerable said about difficulties experienced in trying to make arrangements with the provincial board. We were told that that was dealt with by the dominion. When we come to the dominion we are told it comes under the province. In other words there is more or less passing the buck. I should like to know if there are any provisions as to the regulations, so that we may know how to deal with those questions.

Mr. BENNETT: I confess I find it a little difficult to see why there should be any trouble in understanding it. The board is a corporation created by this parliament; its powers and functions are those conferred upon it by parliament. The provinces have their relation to the scheme which is involved in the legislation itself. They appoint certain officials; the central authority approves. The valuations are made in accordance with the regulations which have been issued by the central board, and when made they come to the central board for ultimate approval, and if that is given the loan issues. But the primary responsibility as to the inspection of the property and the valuation placed upon it rests with the officials who are appointed by the provincial authority and approved by the central authority. Each one of them is approved by the central authority.

Mr. VALLANCE: There is a question which rather puzzles some of us from Saskatchewan. We have there the provincial farm loan board. Would it be possible for any farmer in Saskatchewan to take advantage of this legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is no, unless the province becomes a party to this legislation. But having their own board, as Ontario has, they may make their own arrangements. As a matter of fact I think they have much of the legislation now in Saskatchewan to enable them to avail themselves of it; they certainly have in Ontario. But the truth, I suppose, is that there is difficulty in obtaining money for farm loans in Saskatchewan under any circumstances at the present time. The province of Saskatchewan created its own loan organization many years ago; in fact one who was at one time minister of finance here had the direction of the board. The present condition of the loans, as far as my memory goes, is that the board is not active; therefore they are not in a position to find new capital. But I believe they have taken collateral security to ensure the province against loss as far as possible. If my memory serves me, the losses have been very substantial.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the Prime Minister say by what method Ontario raises money for its farm loans? I understand loans were made at five and a half per cent and the rate has been recently reduced to five per cent. That is a lower rate than we have been paying under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. I am wondering by what method they were able to get money cheaper than the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: They have not been able to get money cheaper than the dominion. What they have done is hold themselves out as the recipient and custodian of the savings of the people, for which they paid a rate of interest in excess of that paid by the chartered banks. The moneys thus received were loaned on mortgages and the rate was slightly in excess of that paid for the deposits. In Manitoba the same plan was tried and there were 40,000 depositors. Their money had been lent on mortgages and when the people wanted their money the savings department had the promises to pay of the province of Manitoba which had taken the money for their farm loan board and loaned it to the farmers. Inasmuch as there is a vast difference between bank notes and cash on the one hand and farm mortgages on the other in the safety deposit boxes, they found themselves compelled to secure a loan for the purpose of enabling them to meet their obligations. There is a great difference of opinion in the minds of those who are charged with financial responsibility as to whether or not the scheme which for years has been in practice in Ontario is of the soundest. But that is how it is done; my business is to answer the question, and that is the answer.

Mr. LUCAS: I notice in this bill that the dominion is to guarantee the bonds that are to be sold. I was wondering how they are going to accept that responsibility, and whether the post office saving department might not be a great source of cheap money to supply these loans.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is aware that under the provisions of the statute generally the price at which money is obtained by the board is the determining factor as to the price paid by the borrower. The borrower pays one and one-half per cent more than the cost of the money to the board, one per cent being for administration and one-half of one per cent for the incidentals in connection with the maintenance of the business. If Canada borrows at four per cent it can lend at five and a half; if at three and a half per cent, it can lend at five. That is the difference between the two plans to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

On the question of obtaining money through the post office savings department I can only point out that it has not been thus far a savings depository favoured by the people of the country. The entire sum now on deposit in the post office savings bank, if my memory serves me—and I speak wholly from memory—is between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000. It has not increased in recent years, but broadly and generally has diminished, because it has not been a favoured institution for the lodging of the savings of the people. I am told the amount on deposit at the present time is $28,000,000.

Mr. COOTE: The ability of the farmer to repay his loans is determined in large part by the rate of interest which he must pay, and it seems to me that the rate of interest might very well be reduced by the farm loan board now. I believe the dominion government can borrow money at the present time at less than four per cent. If that is true would it not be possible for the farm loan board to reduce the interest rate?

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman had followed what I said a moment ago he would have realized that there is an addition of one and a half per cent as the statute now stands, one per cent for administration charges and one-half of one per cent in connection with the charges of the transaction.

Mr. COOTE: Is that in the statute or is it the policy of the board?

Mr. BENNETT: That is in the statute itself. The result is that borrowings at four per cent have to be lent at five and a half per cent, and borrowings at three and a half per cent would be lent at five per cent. That differentiates the organization from the farm loan board of Ontario, which lends the moneys it collects from the savings deposited in the savings offices, upon which at one time they paid four per cent interest.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Conditions for loans.

Mr. COOTE: If it is intended or hoped that the farm loan board will be able to make loans to people who would like to pay off mortgages now bearing interest at eight per cent there will be a great many cases in which the existing loan is on a piece of land separate from the quarter section on which the buildings of the farmer are located. In the past it has been a practice of the board—I do not know that it is a regulation—to refuse to give loans to farmers unless they put the quarter section on which their buildings were located in with the piece of property to be mortgaged to the board. This makes it very unfortunate in many cases. It simply means that a farmer cannot get a mortgage unless he mortgages his home. The primary purpose of this legislation is to save the farmers' homes for the farmers even though they might have to let go other pieces of land. Under this section I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the farm loan board are compelled in any way to follow that rule. It seems to me it is just a rule they have laid down themselves. Sometimes it is attended with unfortunate results, in that the farmer is perhaps compelled to mortgage his home, which otherwise he would not want to do.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is perhaps fully aware that the policy has been adopted by the board and not by the government. The board has endeavoured to function as free from governmental interference as possible, and in the light of the experience of the past that is the conclusion at which they arrived in promulgating their regulations. They decided that they were not warranted in treating the moneys entrusted to them for lending on any basis that would not, so far as that might be done, ensure their repayment, and they have taken securities on that basis. Frankly that is the policy as indicated by the board when it came into being.

Mr. COOTE: The board was empowered to lend money to enable the farmer to purchase lands, and certainly in some cases it is poor policy on the part of the board to insist that the farmer place his home under mortgage before he can borrow anything. It may be that they would then be compelled to lend a smaller percentage of the appraised value of the land, but so far as I know they have followed that rule. I think in some cases it is a poor rule for the board to follow, and perhaps this is the only opportunity I will have of raising that question while the representative of the board is here with the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing that can be added, except that as a matter of policy that is the rule that has been adopted, and that is all that can be said about it. It might be said, however, that it has been a universal rule in making loans that the property on which the house is built should be included in the mortgage. I know of no case in which that is not the rule of all the companies in the country, in order that there might be a direct incentive on the part of the man who borrowed the money not to abandon the piece of property and let it go but rather, feeling that his home was involved, that he should make an extra effort to pay the loan. Frankly I must say that the policy of the board as far as I could ascertain—and I came as a stranger and inquirer—has been exactly what it would be if it were a loan company, and it has been conducted as such. I think that is a fair way to put it.

Mr. COOTE: I think it has been conducted more conservatively than most loan companies. I could find thousands of quarter sections without farm buildings on which loans have been made by loan companies, but I do not find the same practice being followed by the board. I think the time has come when we might consider changing our laws with regard to the interest rates on farm mortgages, and provide that a man's house need not necessarily go with the mortgage. The position of the ordinary business man who mortgages his business is different from that of the farmer. The business man does not have to mortgage his home; if he goes into bankruptcy he does not lose his home. The farmer is in a different category; if he wants to get an advance under mortgage he must put in his home. If he wants to take advantage of bankruptcy proceedings to get rid of debts he must throw in his home and be forced into the street. Really I think if the government is depending upon the operation of this farm loan board to bring about a reduction in the rate of interest on farm mortgages their practice in that regard ought to be changed, to that degree at least.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: It being eleven o'clock I will not ask that the section pass for the time being; my hon. friend may reserve any further comments that he has to make. I will move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Section stands.

PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. I. D. COTNAM (North Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) if it is the intention of his committee to investigate the price spreads in coal, gasoline and agricultural implements?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I did not quite catch the question of my hon. friend but I understand that he is inquiring if the committee is going to investigate certain additional matters. I think I answered this question the other day when I said that the committee is pretty well loaded up with material at the moment. We are making as rapid progress as possible but there are several important subjects before the committee for investigation and whether it will have time and opportunity to extend its investigations into these subjects is a matter which cannot be determined at the moment.

Mr. MacLEAN: Why not be specific and say coal or gasoline?

Mr. BROWN: Where was the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) a few years ago?

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The first item to be taken up is in connection with item 79 of the customs tariff. I filed the finding of the tariff board with respect to certain items covering nursery stock and I gave notice of an amendment in consequence of that finding, which amendment is to be found in the votes and proceedings of May 29. The amendment reads:

That schedule A to the customs tariff, as amended by resolution No. 3, of April 18, 1934, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 79, 79b, 79c, 81 and 82, the several enumerations of goods respectively and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite thereto and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:—

Item 79—Florist stock, viz:—Azaleas, rhododendrons, pot-grown lilacs; hydrangeas and other pot-grown plants, n.o.p.; rose stock and other stock for grafting or budding, n.o.p.; seddling carnation stock, araucarias, bulbs, corms, tubers, rhizomes and dormant roots, n.o.p; dwarf polyantha rose bushes imported by florists or purchased in bond in Canada for bona fide forcing purposes in their own greenhouses prior to disposal; laurel and holly foliage, natural or preserved, whether in designs or bouquets or not: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Customs tariff—79b. Flowers and foliage, natural, cut, whether in designs or bouquets, or not, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 40 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—79c. Trees, being seedling stock for grafting, viz: apple, plum, pear, peach and other fruit trees, including buds and scions for grafting such trees; peach pits for planting purposes: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—81. Trees, n.o.p., viz.:—

(a) Apple, each: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 6 cents; general tariff, 7½ cents.

Provided that when imported between September 15 and October 5, inclusive, the duty under the intermediate or general tariff rates shall not be more than 3 cents each.

(b) Pear, plum, cherry, apricot, quince, each: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 8 cents; general tariff, 9 cents.

Provided that when imported between September 15 and October 5, inclusive, the duty on cherry trees and on plum trees under the intermediate or general tariff rates shall not be more than 3 cents each.

(c) Peach, including June buds, each: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 cents; general tariff, 6 cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—82:

(a) Grape vines, gooseberry and currant bushes or roots, each: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 2 cents; general tariff, 2½ cents.

(b) Raspberry, loganberry and blackberry bushes or roots; rhubarb roots, each: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 1 cent; general tariff, 1 cent.

(c) Asparagus roots and strawberry plants, each: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, ¼ cent; general tariff, ¼ cent.

(d) Rosebushes, n.o.p., each: British preferential tariff, 1½ cents; intermediate tariff, 3 cents; general tariff, 7 cents.

(e) Trees, shrubs, vines, plants, roots and cuttings, commonly known as florists or nursery stocks, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to move that Schedule A to the customs tariff, as amended by resolutions in committee of ways and means, be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 99c and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Customs tariff—99c. Raisins and dried currants:

(i) Until July 31, 1935 . . . per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 4 cents; general tariff, 4 cents.

(ii) Thereafter . . . per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 3 cents; general tariff, 3 cents.

When in packages weighing two pounds each, or less, the weight of such packages to be included in the weight for duty.

This is extending for one year more the Australian preference.

Item agreed to on division.

Customs tariff—117. Halibut livers, fresh: British preferential tariff; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend was going to give me some information with regard to this item, particularly with regard to the supply of halibut livers for the furnishing of oil required for consumption in the dominion and as to the amount of oil required for consumption in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, as I understood it, the item stood at the request of my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth, his desire being that I should get some additional information, but I am unable to furnish any additional information to the committee as requested for the reason that the items have not been separated and we have no statistics available with respect to this item at all.

Mr. RALSTON: What I wanted to find out was whether or not halibut livers were being admitted free into this country to-day, when there was an ample supply in the country. I have made inquiries and I am unable to get the information at least from the bureau of statistics or the Department of Fisheries. I was endeavouring to get the information from the trade, but I have received no information as yet. Can my hon. friend tell me whether or not halibut livers are produced in this country in sufficient quantity to supply the domestic demand?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I had to seek the same sources of information as my hon. friend, and I have been unable to get a specific answer to the last question he put for the reason that heretofore, as my hon. friend knows, there has been no marketing of halibut livers. So I am not in a position to say whether there is a sufficient quantity available from our Canadian fisheries to supply the market in Canada.

Mr. HOWDEN: I believe that there is a considerable amount of cod liver oil manufactured from halibut liver, and I am interested in knowing if that process is going on in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: Such as has been used hitherto has been imported entirely from the United States. My information is that the use of halibut liver oil is in addition to the demand which hitherto existed for cod liver oil exclusively and that the use of halibut liver oil is increasing quite rapidly.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that representations came from British Columbia for this change in the tariff due to the fact that American halibut livers were being landed at Prince Rupert and were having to pay a duty. I understand the suggestion was made that they could be manufactured in Canada if they were allowed to be admitted duty free. Can my hon. friend tell me whether or not the product will be marketed in Canada or used for export to the United States and other countries.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is not quite right in saying that they have been landed in Canada. As a matter of fact the duty prohibited their being landed. They were shipped by vessel back to the United States or were dumped overboard. I believe the idea behind the request that they should be admitted free of duty is that we might have another industry in Canada developed. The demand in Canada, as I understand it, is comparatively limited and for a time at all events they will have to seek the export market for the major portion of the halibut liver oil produced. My information comes from the trade and is not based on any actual statistics or on a very wide degree of experience. But such is the expectation of the industry.

Mr. RALSTON: My point is that in view of the fashion nowadays, with which I do not agree, to find out whether or not there is a possibility of supplying the home market entirely with homemade products rather than to export products, it seems to me that before changes are made in tariff items affecting natural products we should know whether the natural products which we produce in this country are sufficient to supply the demand for the finished product which is made from them. As I understand it the minister has not been able to get that information and I have been unable to get it, and I find a difficulty in intelligently discussing or voting on the item which proposes a change and proposes to admit free natural products from foreign countries which may come into competition with our own products.

Mr. NEILL: Did the minister say from whom this request came?

Mr. RHODES: It came from the halibut industry on the Pacific coast. I think the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) will be able to give more accurate information on that point.

Mr. NEILL: From the fishing industry or a manufacturing industry?

Mr. RHODES: From the fishing industry, as I understand it.

Mr. MacLEAN: I notice by press reports to-day, and I think it is worth mentioning while we are on this subject, that eel grass is returning in the maritime provinces. I would ask if this is entirely due to the good offices of the present government?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, hon. gentlemen are not at all backward, and I do not blame them, in attributing all the ills of the country to this government. I hope in this instance my hon. friend will not object to giving the government some little modicum of credit.

Item agreed to on division.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to move, Mr. Chairman, striking out item 220 in the present customs tariff. As it stands today the British and United States pharmacopœia are recognized but the Canadian formulary, which is Canada's equivalent, is not recognized and the effect of the amendment I shall move is to include in the tariff item in addition to the words "British and United States pharmacopœia" the words "The Canadian formulary." This request comes to us from the Canadian Medical Association.

Mr. TOTZKE: What is the significance of that?

Mr. RHODES: Item 220 of the present tariff provides:

All medicinal, chemical and pharmaceutical preparations, compounded of more than one substance, including patent and proprietary preparations, tinctures, pills, powders, troches, lozenges, syrups, cordials, bitters, anodynes—

And so forth. I am not reciting the whole item; I am giving the essential part:

Provided that drugs, pill-mass and preparations, not including pills or medicinal plasters, recognized by the British or United States pharmacopoeia, or the French codex as official, shall not be held to be covered by this item.

All that the amendment does is to add to that list the words:

The Canadian formulary. I beg to move:

That schedule A to the customs tariff, as amended by resolution No. 3 of April 18, 1934, be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 220 and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Item 220—All medicinal, chemical and pharmaceutical preparations, compounded of more than one substance, including patent and proprietary preparations, tinctures, pills, powders, troches, lozenges, syrups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences and oils, n.o.p.:—

(a) When dry: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

(b) Liquid, when containing not more than two and one-half per centum of proof spirit: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 40 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent.

(c) All others: British preferential tariff, 60 per cent; intermediate tariff, 60 per cent; general tariff, 60 per cent.

Provided that drugs, pill-mass and preparations, not including pills or medicinal plasters, recognized by the British or United States pharmacopoeia, the Canadian formulary or the French codex as officinal, shall not be held to be covered by this item;

Provided, also, that any article in this item containing more than forty per cent of proof spirit shall be rated for duty at: British preferential tariff, $3 per gallon and 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, $3 per gallon and 30 per cent; general tariff, $3 per gallon and 30 per cent.

Mr. JACOBS: I suppose that is to prove the proverb that a prophet is not without honour except in his own country.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: I have a new item, 296c. I move:

That the following item, enumeration and rates of duties be added to the list of items indicated in resolution No. 3, of April 18, 1934, as for insertion in schedule A to the customs tariff:—

Item 296c.—Magnesium carbonate imported for use in the compounding or manufacture of rubber products: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

This is adding this commodity to the free list.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: With reference to customs tariff item 454, when the committee rises and the house resumes I will file a report of the tariff board giving their finding as the result of a hearing with respect to hookless fasteners and in consequence of their findings I move:

That schedule A to the customs tariff, as amended by resolution No. 3 of April 18, 1934, be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 454 and inserting in lieu thereof the following item, enumeration and rates of duties:—

454—Frames not more than 10 inches in width, clasps and fasteners (not to include slide or hookless fasteners), when imported by manufacturers of purses, chatelaine bags or reticules for use exclusively in the manufacture of purses, chatetaine bags or reticules, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

This amendment merely excludes from the operation of this item slide or hookless fasteners.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—569.

Mr. RALSTON: Is this the hat and hood item?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the minister introducing it now?

Mr. RHODES: When the house was in committee of ways and means before, I moved to amend the item, but the amendment stood at the request of my hon. friend. The amendment is as follows:

That schedule A of the customs tariff, as amended by resolution No. 3, of April 18, 1934, be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 569 and by inserting in lieu thereof the following items, enumerations and rates of duties of customs:

Item 569—(i). Hats, caps, hoods and bonnets, n.o.p.; hat and bonnet crowns and hat, cap and bonnet shapes, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

(ii) Hats, hoods and shapes of wool felt, not to include fur, under regulations prescribed by the minister: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent and, per dozen, $1.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister give me a little information about this? Can he tell me the date of the hearing before the tariff board on the appeal by the importer from the fixing of an arbitrary value for duty purposes by the minister?

Mr. RHODES: I was under the impression that at a previous sitting I had already passed on to my hon. friend a tabulated statement giving the whole chronological order in which the hearings arose.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not seem to have that.

Mr. RHODES: That was my impression and I am so advised by the commissioner of tariff. I have a copy of the findings before me and perhaps I can get the information that my hon. friend desires. I have here a copy of the report of the tariff board which indicates that the reference to the board was made by me on March 6 last, but I regret to say that I have not the list giving the chronological order of the hearings for which my hon. friend asked and which I was under the impression I had sent to him. I certainly brought it into the house for that purpose. I shall look in my desk.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not seem to have it and I do not remember the minister giving it to me, but I have the general agenda in my mind without actual dates.

Mr. RHODES: Did my hon. friend get the statement on jute? If he did, they were pinned together.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not seem to have the one on jute twine either. The point about the matter is that this item was one in respect to which the Minister of National Revenue had attempted under section 43 of the customs act to fix an arbitrary value for duty purposes. It was one of the items as to which it was alleged that the minister had lost the power of fixing an arbitrary value for duty purposes by reason of the amendment of November, 1932. Notwithstanding the fact that the section was repealed in November, 1932, and another section substituted which provided for the exemption of British goods from the power of the minister to fix an arbitrary value for duty purposes, the customs appraiser went ahead and imposed an arbitrary value on hats and hoods. This was appealed to the tariff board. Some time this spring—I have not the date but I think some time before March—the tariff board made an order holding the minister had no power to fix an arbitrary value for duty purposes, in other words, holding that the section of the act of 1932 was effective and that British goods were not to be subject to arbitrary valuation, and ordered, as I understand the matter, that a refund be made to the importer. I want to ask the minister whether the refund was made to the importer following the judgment of the tariff board.

Mr. RHODES: I think my hon. friend is confusing the reference to the supreme court which arose under part II with the present case which is a hearing under part I. Whether that be so or not, I will say to my hon. friend that I shall have to get the information from the Department of National Revenue. I have made no particular inquiry recently but so far as my knowledge goes there has been no refund. I have no definite information on the point and I shall have to get that from the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend is right. I want him to understand clearly that I am not in any way confusing proceedings under part 1 and under part 2. Under part 1 the tariff board has power to make investigation and state facts on which the ministry may make decisions as to whether or not tariff items shall be amended. Under part 2 the tariff board have a judicial power, the same power as the board of customs previously had, to make decisions and to give effect to them. My complaint is that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews) and this government are perfectly willing to take the recommendations of the tariff board under part 1 when they increase tariffs but they absolutely disregard binding decisions of the tariff board under part 2 which do away with arbitrary valuations and in effect decrease tariffs. That is my point in a nutshell. This is a good example of it. Here we have hats, hoods and shapes which are included in an item moved by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) the other day and providing for a specific duty. A short time ago we had the tariff board making an order that hats, hoods and shapes should not be subject to arbitrary valuations for duty purposes. That order was completely disregarded by the government. As the minister says, there has been no refund made to the importers, notwithstanding that the tariff board under the powers given by statute ordered such refund. My hon. friend says: Well, there was a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada as to the powers of the tariff board. Let me point out that that reference is not in connection with hats, hoods and shapes, but in connection with jute twine, and that reference, as I have had occasion to point out before, only settles one question, namely: Had the tariff board power to decide that jute twine did not come under the provisions of the act of November, 1932? It has no reference whatever to what we are talking about to-day, hats, hoods and shapes. The government flouts the tariff board in disregarding the decisions which the tariff board have made under part 2, but seems to be only too happy to take the suggestions of the tariff board under part 1 and provide for increases of duty. I submit that was not our conception of the way the tariff board was to be treated when it was constituted under an act of this parliament. I protest in the strongest possible way against that manner of dealing with tariff matters. If we are going to have a tariff board let us endeavour to follow their rulings, not follow them when it results in increasing duties and forget all about them when they say that duty shall be refunded or that the customs appraiser shall cease to make arbitrary valuations for duty purposes.

While I am on my feet let me say that the customs appraiser in the jute twine case put on an arbitrary value for duty purposes which resulted in effect in an ad valorem duty of 82 per cent. That decision was upset by the tariff board, and when the board came to make a recommendation in regard to duty, instead of 82 per cent which the minister was intent on imposing, they only suggested a duty of 27½ per cent. It shows how tariff mad my hon. friends and the Department of National Revenue have gone. I submit that if we are to have a tariff board we ought at least to attempt to follow its recommendations not only under part 1 but part 2 as well.

Mr. RHODES: I shall not attempt to follow my hon. friend in a discussion of the circumstances surrounding the case submitted to the supreme court, arising out of circumstances which are well known to the committee. It will be time enough to do that after the supreme court has made its finding. I do not even raise the point that the matter is sub judice. But what I do want to point out is that while hon. gentleman opposite may differ from us as to whether their attitude with respect to the tariff is right and ours wrong, the government has in every instance accepted the findings of the tariff board on matters of fact. Without any exception, when they have made findings of fact we have brought recommendations to the house in strict conformity therewith. The reference to the supreme court has not to do with a question of fact; the difficulty arises out of a question of law, as to the jurisdiction and authority of the tariff board acting in the stead of the old board of customs appraisers. That is an entirely different matter. I think it is quite fitting and proper that that matter should be cleared up. But I submit with all deference to my hon. friend that is an entirely different matter from accepting as we have in every instance the findings of the tariff board on matters of fact.

Mr. RALSTON: May I say to my hon. friend that his statement shows that he has misconceived the situation entirely. The decision of the tariff board in the jute twine case was that the minister should not fix an arbitrary value for duty purposes, and a similar decision was made in the hats, hoods and shapes case while in the tinplate case they decided that tinplate was not of a class or kind made in Canada. These decisions were on questions of fact and not of law. Those were so far matters of fact that in the jute twine case an appeal was asserted to the governor in council on the question of fact as to whether or not the arbitrary value on jute twine was the correct value for duty purposes. My hon. friend must not draw that red herring across the trail. The reference to the supreme court was an attempt by the governor in council to get away from the decision on the question of fact by claiming that the tariff board had not the authority to make the order which they did in connection with the jute twine case. But the fact remains that the decisions of the tariff board in all three cases were on questions of fact, namely, what duty should be charged and what was the valuation upon which the rate of duty should be assessed. Those decisions stand unchallenged, because this government, although there was an appeal to them in connection with the jute twine case, have not seen fit even at this late date to decide it.

What do they do? They refer to the supreme court the question whether the tariff board had authority. If they thought they had jurisdiction why did they not meet and decide the question of fact whether the jute twine ought to be valued at a value fixed by the minister and the duty assessed accordingly? What they said was: We will not decide the merits at all, whether A who imported these goods paid too much duty, but we will draw a red herring across the trail, skate around it and submit to the supreme court the question whether the tariff board have jurisdiction. After all the essential question in connection with commerce is, how much duty shall be paid. That is the essential thing from the point of view of the importer, the producer and the consumer, not whether the tariff board has jurisdiction but how much duty shall be paid. This government had the opportunity to decide that question or not to decide it, and they took the course of not deciding it. They referred to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of the jurisdiction of the tariff board, leaving untouched the decision of the board that as a matter of fact the value of jute twine for duty purposes was as it should have been after the act of November, 1932, had been repealed. I say that my hon. friend is wrong when he suggests that this government has followed the tariff board on questions of fact. This government have disregarded the decisions of the tariff board on questions of facts, and rather than face those decisions they have made reference to the Supreme Court of Canada as to the jurisdiction of the board on questions of law. I say that my point stands as I made it unchallenged; under part 1 they have accepted the recommendations of the tariff board as to increases of duty, but under part 2 they have studiously avoided following the recommendations and decisions of the tariff board that duty should be remitted and arbitrary valuations not imposed. Again I say that is not what was intended when the tariff board machinery was set up in this country.

Item agreed to on division.

Customs tariff—1035. Machinery, and parts thereof, and dies valued at more than five hundred dollars each, of a class or kind not made in Canada: when used in manufacturing or producing goods of a class or kind not manufactured or produced in Canada prior to the twelfth day of May, 1923, drawback, 60 per cent.

Mr. RHODES: This is a drawback item which was placed in the tariff in the first instance in 1923. I do not know whether or not my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth is familiar with this item. Due to the lapse of time the administration of this provision has become increasingly difficult, and in addition involves very great expense to the department. It is submitted that because of the lapse of time at this stage the item might be properly removed from the tariff, and my motion is that item 1035 be struck out.

Mr. RALSTON: What industries does it affect?

Mr. RHODES: Any industry at all that makes the contention that it proposes to manufacture a commodity or a piece of machinery which was not made in Canada prior to 1923.

Mr. RALSTON: I understood that it was a drawback item.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, 60 per cent drawback. As a matter of fact I am advised that in some years it cost more to administer the item than the total amount of the drawback involved.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the value of the machinery imported, which is alleged to be subject to the drawback?

Mr. RHODES: I have not the value of the machinery. The best answer I could give my hon. friend is that in the past three years the amount of the drawback has been $78,000, $65,000 and $54,000 respectively. My motion is:

That schedule B to the customs tariff, as amended by resolution No. 4 of April 18, 1934, be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 1035, the enumeration of goods and the rates of drawback of customs duties set opposite thereto.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend say this was recommended by the board?

Mr. RHODES: It is recommended by the department.

Mr. VENOIT: There will be no drawback?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand this it means an increase in the tariff on these items. Previously there was a 60 per cent drawback which is now being refused so that one hundred per cent of the duty will be charged. I do not mean one hundred per cent ad valorem, but one hundred per cent of the duty.

Mr. RHODES: The statement of my hon. friend is quite correct so far as it goes, but he must bear in mind that wherever a bona fide case arises where it is sought to import into Canada machinery which is not manufactured here it is still open to the individual to have the duty remitted by order in council so that the full rights are preserved to the individual who can set up a bona fide case, without opening the door to abuses which have arisen under this item and without permitting blanket use to be made of this drawback.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that the section which permits the importation of natural or manufactured products to be used by manufacturers in Canada? My hon. friend said there was a provision by which goods used in Canada could have the duty remitted on them. Is that the section that provides that either manufactured or natural products imported for the use of manufacturers in Canada can be put on the free list, or have the duty remitted?

Mr. RHODES: No, I had reference to the Consolidated Revenue Act, which provides that under certain conditions the duty may be remitted.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Customs tariff—1049. Bituminous coal: when imported by manufacturers of coke and converted into coke in their own plants; drawback, 50 per cent. Provided that drawback payable under this item is in lieu of drawback payable under any other item.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to move to this item, as follows:

That tariff item No. 1049, as contained in resolution No. 4 of April 18, 1934, be amended to read as follows:

Bituminous coal ... when imported on or after April 19, 1934. and converted into coke in coke or gas plants, 50 per cent. Provided that drawback payable under this item is in lieu of drawback payable under any other item.

Under the budget item the coal had to be imported by the actual manufacturer of coke. This amendment will permit those wholesalers who hitherto have imported coal which they have sold to gas plants to carry on their business as heretofore. If the tariff item had stood as it appeared in the budget it would have had the effect of putting out of business a number of gentlemen who had been in an established business for a number of years.

Mr. VENIOT: Importers?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Do I understand that the only change is to provide that those having existing stocks are not to be affected by the change in item 1049?

Mr. RHODES: No, this means that an importing company or an individual who has been a supplier of coal to gas plants hitherto will be still permitted to carry on his business, whereas under the item as it appeared in the budget he would have been precluded from carrying on that business, since the gas plant would have to import this coal direct.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the old item before me, but did it not apply only to importations by manufacturers?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. The old item read:

When imported after the twenty-fourth day of March, 1925, by proprietors of by-product recovery coke ovens and converted into coke—and so on. My amendment takes out the words "when imported by proprietors" and provides that while coal must be used by the same plants those persons or companies who hitherto have been suppliers of coal to coke plants will be permitted still to import the coal.

Mr. RALSTON: If the old item 1049 did not apply to importers, let us say, as distinguished from manufacturers, why make the new item 1049 apply to them? That is my question.

Mr. RHODES: We are widening the item. My hon. friend will recall that the old item 1049 was confined to those who manufactured coke in a by-product coke oven. It had no reference or application to a large number of plants, largely in the province of Ontario and largely municipally owned, where they manufacture coke as a by-product to their manufacture of gas. Now, the item having been widened, there will be a drawback of fifty per cent to those municipal gas plants where hitherto there has been no drawback at all. Because we are widening the item the amendment of which I speak is moved to take care of the established business which has been in existence for some time in sections of Ontario.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry to delay the committee. I quite understand that when my hon. friend brought down the item he intended to widen its application but to narrow the drawback. The drawback was applicable to more coal but there was a smaller drawback; formerly it was 99 per cent while now it is only 50 per cent. What I want to know now is what is the difference between the amendment now introduced and item 1049 as proposed by the minister in the budget speech. I understood that tariff item 1049 as proposed did widen the item. Does this item still further widen it?

Mr. RHODES: It still further widens it in this sense, that if my amendment were not to carry some established importers of coal who for many years have been in business in the province of Ontario, and hitherto have supplied the gas plants in that province, would be put out of business, and the gas coal would have to be imported direct by the gas plants. My amendment, accordingly, permits coal to be imported as hitherto, through the importing channels, but it can earn the drawback only when it actually is converted into coke in the gas plant.

Mr. RALSTON: Was there not a situation in connection with by-product coke ovens to which the old item applied? Was there no case there in which the importers brought in coal and sold it to the by-product coke ovens?

Mr. RHODES: No, it had no application before. Under the application of old item 1049 it had to be imported by the manufacturers themselves.

Mr. RALSTON: Why I query the matter is this: Previously this drawback applied only to by-product coke ovens, and when imported by manufacturers using or operating by-product coke ovens. The principle which my hon. friend wishes to introduce in the amendment is that not only shall you give the benefit to those manufacturers who actually import for the purpose of using it in by-product coke ovens, but you shall give the benefit to those importers who bring it in for the purpose of sale to those who run the by-product coke ovens. As I understand it, that would have considerably widened the item, but my hon. friend has gone even farther. He has proposed that this drawback shall apply to coal used in gas plants, and in what they call bee hive ovens as well. That is a further concession to American coal. That makes the drawback apply to more coal, but he has reduced the amount of the drawback, and therefore probably the protection in the long run to the Canadian market is about the same. My hon. friend goes another step now and states, "Not only am I going to give a drawback in case of coal imported by manufacturers operating by-product coke plants and gas plants and bee hive ovens, but I will give it in case coal is imported for this purpose by people who are not manufacturers." That, it seems to me, is a second step in widening the application.

Mr. RHODES: I think the better way to put it would be this, that it will not increase the opportunity to qualify for the drawback. All it does is to permit a plant to import its coal through an intermediary. That is all it means.

Mr. RALSTON: Could my hon. friend give me an estimate—I am not tying him down—as to the amount of coal to which the present amended item would apply?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot give my hon. friend figures as to the amount of coal to which it will now be applicable, exactly. I could, however, tell him how much was used and the amount of drawbacks under old item 1049.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend do that?

Mr. RHODES: I could give my hon. friend and the committee a list of the companies and municipal corporations which will participate in the tariff amendment. They are:

The International Coal and Coke Company, Coleman, Alberta Crowsnest Pass Coal Company, Fernie and Michel, British Columbia.
Nova Scotia Light and Power Company, Limited, Halifax.
New Brunswick Power Company, Saint John.
Quebec Power Company.
Board of Light and Heat Commissioners, Guelph, Ontario.
City Gas Company, London.
Consumers Gas Company, Toronto.
Gas Commission of St. Thomas.
Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario. Cobourg.
Ontario Shore Gas Company, Limited, Belleville.
Ottawa Gas Company, Ottawa.
Port Hope Gas Company, Port Hope.
Public Utilities Commission, Kitchener.
Public Utilities Commission, Owen Sound.
Public Utilities Commission, Stratford.
Manitoba Power Commission, Brandon.
British Columbia Electric Railway, Victoria, British Columbia.
British Columbia Electric Power and Gas Company, Vancouver.
The Corporation of the city of Nelson, British Columbia.

Then, I give my hon. friend these figures: In 1932 a drawback was paid on 1,181,675 short tons of bituminous coal amounting to $877,493.88. In 1933 there was an importation of 1,167,240 short tons and the drawback was valued at $866,676.36.

Mr. RALSTON: In addition to the figures showing 1,167,240 tons imported by by-product coke ovens, I find the imported coal used in gas retort ovens in 1933-34 was 570,251 tons, and the coke produced in bee hive ovens in 1933-34 was 55,377 tons. The capacity of the bee hive coke ovens was 431,500 tons, and the capacity of the gas retort ovens in Canada was 302,000. So it seemed to me that there was a possibility of this new item applying to an additional 1,200,000 tons, although the old item applied to only 1,167,240 tons. Therefore it seems to me that the benefit of the reduction of the drawback from 99 per cent to 50 per cent would be more than offset by the increased application of the drawback to double the amount of tonnage. That is the figure I wish to have from my hon. friend. Has he anything to verify this increase of about 1,200,000 tons to which this drawback will apply, under the amended item?

Mr. RHODES: I have not those figures before me. Of course, my hon. friend is familiar with the general purpose we had in mind. We were confronted with this situation: The old item 1049 was brought into existence in 1925 for very good reason, namely, that coke came into Canada duty free, whereas if you wanted to manufacture coke in Canada the manufacturer was penalized by having to pay a duty of 50 cents a ton. As the tariff then stood it was designed to make it to the advantage of the manufacturer to manufacture the commodity which he used. What was done was that item 1049 was introduced to the tariff, giving a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty on coal converted into coke in by-product coke ovens. All that did was to place the manufacturer of coke in Canada on a parity, less one per cent, with the manufacturer in the United States, and it was done for the reasons I have indicated. But in the year 1931 we placed one dollar a ton duty on coke, and removed entirely the reasons which occasioned item 1049 being applied in the first instance. Then there arose the situation that the manufacturer of coke in a gas plant who was selling coke in a given market found himself in competition with coke being manufactured by a by-product coke oven. The gas plant man was paying 75 cents duty on his coal, and the man with the by-product coke oven was not paying anything. That was the situation with which we were confronted. Either we had to widen the item or we had to cut it out. What we did was to split the difference. One reason for this amendment was the thought that it would inflict less hardship upon those who had hitherto enjoyed the drawback and would confer a very marked advantage upon a large number of users who could now enjoy the drawback of one-half the amount. While undoubtedly it will result in hardship to one or two important importers who have hitherto enjoyed the larger drawback, having regard to the country as a whole, we believe the result will be beneficial and it certainly will be more equitable.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I do think that the by-product coke ovens to which the drawback was extended on account of their manufacture of metallurgical as well as domestic coke—

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend must not mention metallurgical coke.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I merely mention that because it came in free.

Mr. RHODES: We are not touching that at all.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I am merely explaining the reason for the extension of the drawback to this particular product. It was comparable to metallurgical coke although up to that time metallurgical coke had not been used for domestic purposes to any considerable extent. When we extended this drawback we felt that it was going to be very helpful in encouraging the manufacture of domestic coke and in decreasing the price of anthracite coal which at that time was selling for $18 per ton. We succeeded in getting that happy result, that is, the price of anthracite coal was reduced very materially. My hon. friend must bear in mind that the by-product coke ovens or the coke plants throughout Canada, many of which he has mentioned, were not manufacturing a fuel comparable to metallurgical coke and that fuel had no appreciable power in the reduction of the price of anthracite. I always felt that if they changed their plants they should be entitled to the drawback. Many of them intended to do so but I assume the depression prevented them from taking this action. I am not objecting particularly to the extension but I feel that if plants like the Consumers Gas Company of Toronto and the gas company of this city changed their plants they should receive the benefit. The only two plants which took advantage of this were those in Hamilton and Montreal. Through experiments carried on in Montreal in connection with the treatment of coal, the plant there has increased very materially its consumption of Canadian coal. This is not true of the Hamilton plant as they do not use any Canadian coal. This change proved to be of great benefit to the producers in Nova Scotia. From an original consumption of five or six thousand tons of Canadian coal this plant has increased to a consumption last year of 150 thousand tons.

Mr. CANTLEY: Two hundred thousand tons this year.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): We had two purposes in view; one was to increase the consumption of Canadian coal, which we did not accomplish at Hamilton, and the other was to have a competitor for anthracite coal which would have a controlling influence upon the price of that commodity to the consumer. I think my hon. friend will agree that those two purposes were accomplished. While the dollar a ton duty on coke referred to by my hon. friend is very helpful to the Hamilton plant, it has not the same effect upon the Montreal plant. My hon. friend has made up his mind to make a test of this matter but I would have preferred if he had left it as it was. I believe it was working very advantageously and accomplishing the two purposes which I have named. It has proved to be a regulating influence upon the price of anthracite, both American and British, and, in the case of Montreal which is within reasonable distance of the coal mines of Nova Scotia, it has brought about an annual increase in the consumption of Canadian coal. I felt that that was something to be desired and I thought it was working out to the advantage of the consumer and of the producer in Nova Scotia. I do not know what the result of this new move will be but in my opinion it certainly will not increase the consumption of Nova Scotia coal. We are not affected in western Canada because the only coke plant in existence there, that at Winnipeg, has been using Canadian coal for some time. I hope this move will not have the effect of cutting down the consumption of Nova Scotia coal and that it will continue to have a regulating influence upon the price of anthracite.

Mr. RHODES: For a number of years my hon. friend was Minister of Mines and he has had very intimate contact with the industry. I differ from him with some hesitancy but I must say that I do not follow him in his argument that by introducing item number 1049 he is going to encourage the use of Nova Scotia coal. I do not think he can sustain that argument. Our feeling has been that that was a blow rather than an assistance to the Nova Scotia coal industry. I am not trying to raise this for the purpose of creating any party atmosphere with respect to this matter and I hope my hon. friend will accept my assurance upon the point. I cannot see how this proposal will affect the Nova Scotia coal industry prejudicially. I may say to him that our object in adopting this method was entirely different. We felt that an injustice had been created as between different producers in Canada of the same commodity.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): It is not the same.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend says that it is not the same commodity. For the sake of argument let us assume that the quality of coke produced in a by-product coke oven is superior to that produced in a gas retort plant. The fact of the matter is that they are both coke, they are both fuel and they sell in the same manner. It cannot be to the disadvantage of the manufacturer of the superior product to be placed in even competition with the man who is producing an inferior product. So far as the manufacturer of the quality commodity is concerned, it seems to me that he is not prejudiced to the slightest degree. I admit that the situation in Montreal is a real one as it presents problems which are not common to any other industry affected by this drawback item. That matter gave me a great deal of concern. In the first place, the dollar per ton duty on coke was of relatively small advantage as they were faced with the free entry of British coke. That was the difficulty in the case of Montreal but it does not apply to the other coke ovens situated inland. Coke is a very bulky commodity and they are not subject to the same degree of competition under the British preferential tariff. Their only competition is from American coke which is subject to a duty of one dollar per ton. As my hon. friend has said we propose to adhere to this proposal and try it out for a year. If we find that any better method can be devised or put through after practical experience, we shall do so. Should any injustice appear in individual cases, for example, with respect to the Montreal coke manufacturing company, we will have to deal with the situation another year.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think the change will in any way increase the consumption of Canadian coal.

Mr. RHODES: Possibly not. I am not alleging that such will be the case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As a matter of fact, I fear it will reduce the consumption. I want to correct my hon. friend with respect to the change in the use of Canadian coal. I know my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Ralston) did not agree with me and he has strenuously fought the idea from its inception believing that Canadian coal was entitled to protection, but I am not quarrelling with him about that. The fact remains that the plant that was within transportation distance of Nova Scotia mines has increased its consumption of Nova Scotia coal annually, and much more so may I say to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in the days since he has been minister than previously because after experimentation it was discovered through the agency of the Mines department and the company's own particular branch that was manufacturing in Montreal that more and more of the Nova Scotia coal could be acceptably added and they have gone on increasing the use of it. The minister has just informed us that it is now 200,000 tons. I did not know that it had reached that amount. It is possible that they will not cut down on that amount but will continue to use that much. I think they are making an honest endeavour to use as much Canadian coal as they can. That is what they agreed to do from the inception of the plant, and we spent a considerable amount of money to accomplish that end. If this were going to help the Canadian coal industry, if it meant that there was going to be more Canadian coal used, I would be all for it, but I do not think it will. However, my hon. friend and I disagree on that point, and time will show what the results will be.

Mr. CANTLEY: There is one thing it will do; that is, it will tend to reduce the importation of coke. There is no question about that. So far as the use of Nova Scotia coal in Montreal is concerned, our difficulty was the unfounded prejudice of people who thought they could not get along without American coal. It took us several years to overcome that prejudice. There was no foundation for it at all. It was an absolute prejudice.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can hardly accept that statement. Part of it is true perhaps, but on the other hand my hon. friend knows perfectly well that the change that took place among the miners themselves in preparing the coal had a tremendous effect on the amount used, and also the methods adopted in the plant itself for converting the coal into coke. Both factors tended to help the consumption of Nova Scotia coal. There is no doubt in the world that the engineers themselves were prejudiced against Nova Scotia coal as compared with American coal, but they have got over that, and I think they are making an honest endeavour to use every pound of Canadian coal that they can in their production.

Mr. CANTLEY: I stick to what I said, Mr. Chairman, that in the first year we had to overcome an absolutely unfounded prejudice. As a matter of fact, in Nova Scotia we have been making satisfactory coke for more than thirty years from Nova Scotia coal without mixing it with anything. We have never had or needed any mixture either then or now.

Mr. BURY: My hon. friend from West Edmonton thinks that the change in the tariff item will not affect western coal. I wish I could believe that that was true, but I am afraid that the increase in the coke that will be produced by bringing in these beehive ovens and gas plant ovens will have the effect of bringing on to the market in Ontario a larger amount of coke and will conduce to the greater use of coke as a fuel, and I cannot see how that is going to have any other than a bad effect upon the efforts we are making in western Canada to get our Alberta coal into some part of the Ontario market. I hope the reduction of the drawback may have some influence in the other direction, but I would deprecate exceedingly any change in the tariff item that would put another obstacle in the way of, or cause any discouragement to the movement of Alberta coal to supply the Ontario market, which the government has already helped so much.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think my hon. friend need worry about that because bituminous coal from Alberta has never come from beyond Kenora.

Mr. BURY: I am not talking about bituminous coal.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the only coal used in making coke.

Mr. BURY: I am talking about the high-grade lignite coal which comes to the western part of Ontario and competes with anthracite and coke, and which now will have to compete with a larger volume of coke. The competition was hard enough when the coke was confined to the products of by-product coke ovens. It will in my opinion be very much intensified if the coke is poured out also from coke ovens, by-product and others, in competition with western coal in eastern Ontario.

Mr. RALSTON: Manufactured from American coal under this drawback.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the minister would give to the committee a statement showing the amount of drawback paid in the last year, giving the names of the companies and the amount in each case.

Mr. RHODES: The drawback paid in 1932-33 and 1933-34 was as follows:

	Drawback paid
	1932-33	1933-34
Steel Company of Canada	$277,541 65	$342,541 43
Algoma Steel Corporation	41,919 40	44,080 81
Hamilton Byproduct Coke Ovens	308,295 07	263,369 65
Winnipeg Electric Company	23,727 98	6,868 88
Montreal Coke and Manufacturing Company	210,608 64	192,926 35
Ottawa Gas Company	15,401 14	16,890 04

That makes a total in round figures of $877,000 in 1932-33 and $866,000 in 1933-34.

Mr. COOTE: I understood the minister to say, when he gave a list of the companies that would benefit from this, that there was one coal company in southern British Columbia and I was wondering why it was not included in the list just given.

Mr. RHODES: I gave to the committee just now, at the request I thought of my hon. friend, the amount of the drawback and the companies that received it under the old item. A short time ago I gave a complete list of the companies who will participate in the benefit arising from the change in the item, permitting them, to the extent of half the amount hitherto available, to get the benefit of the drawback. In that list the International Coal and Coke Company, Limited, of Coleman, Alberta, is included. That is the only Alberta coal company there is, so far as we know.

Mr. COOTE: I misunderstood the minister. I thought he said that they had participated.

Mr. RHODES: No—will participate.

Mr. COOTE: Under the new item proposed, does the coal have to go directly to the gas plant when it is imported?

Mr. RHODES: No; early this afternoon I moved an amendment which would permit the coal to go to the gas plant through an intermediary. This was to protect existing contract suppliers who have been in business for a number of years. It will not affect the incidence of the tariff nor widen it in any way. It serves merely not to disturb and put out of business some coal dealers who have for many years been supplying some of these plants.

Mr. COOTE: I understand the coal could be purchased through the dealer, but does the physical coal itself, when it is imported, go to the dealer's yard, and if so, can it then go to the gas plant and the rebate be paid on it? How will the department administer this? How is it going to be sure that the coal was imported for that purpose?

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. RHODES: I am assured by the officials of the Department of National Revenue that there will be no difficulty in the matter of administration. Even if my hon. friend might have in mind the idea that there might be substitution, I would point out to him that the question of the actual quantity of coke produced would afford an accurate measure of the quantity of coal which was consumed, and therefore of the total number of tons which would benefit by the drawback.

Mr. COOTE: Would this enable the dealer to sell some slack that he was not able to dispose of otherwise, by selling it to some plant making coke and thereby secure the rebate on that quantity of coal?

Mr. RALSTON: Is there any large quantity used by operators of beehive ovens and gas plants which is bought through middlemen?

Mr. RHODES: The amendment that I brought in is designed largely to protect one or two well established businesses in western Ontario which have been supplying the industry hitherto. It is to meet that particular case that this amendment has been introduced. They have the machinery, the wharves and the equipment and they have been in the business of supplying some of these industries for many years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Any importer who sells to a gas plant would have to produce his record of sales in order to get any drawback?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not know whether there is any particular complaint with respect to this, but after all, my hon. friend would have been well advised to stick to the gas plants and their returns.

Mr. RHODES: I am quite free to admit that in practice it may work out that the object we have in mind may not be accomplished, in which event, if I am in this position another year, I shall not have the slightest hesitation in coming to the committee and saying so, but I thought there was a measure of justice in the proposal and I should like to try it out.

Mr. RALSTON: I am apprehensive that cutting the drawback in half and extending the application will result in our paying half the drawback on more than double the number of tons so that the result will be a detriment rather than a benefit to Canadian coal.

Mr. RHODES: The best information I can get is that so far as the treasury is concerned we shall be in about the same position, but we must always bear in mind this factor, that the use of coke is increasing and you cannot therefore measure one year with another with any degree of accuracy. The use of coke is increasing because the knowledge as to its use is becoming more widespread and as people become accustomed to it they regard that type of fuel with favour. It has become increasingly popular for another reason and that is that to-day coke is selling at two or three dollars a ton less than it sold for a very short time ago. The tendency has been for the price to go down rather than up.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: We will take up the gold resolutions.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the resolution proposing amendments to the Special War Revenue Act, introduced on the eighteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four, by striking out paragraphs nine to thirteen inclusive and paragraphs fourteen and seventeen of the said resolution and substituting the following:—

9. (1) That in addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under this act or any other statute or law, there shall be imposed, levied or collected a tax of twenty-five per centum on the premium value of gold deposited for sale at the Royal Canadian Mint produced from ore mined in Canada by producers of gold who in both of the years one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two and one thousand nine hundred and thirty-three and at any time in the six months prior to April nineteenth, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four, paid dividends in cash or stock on preferred or common stock.

(2) That such premuim value shall be the difference between the price of $20·6718+ the ounce fine, established by the Currency Act, and the sale price of gold in the world market converted into Canadian currency at the prevailing rates of exchange, under regulations to be made by the Minister of Finance.

(3) That the amount of the said tax shall be deducted by the Master of the Royal Canadian Mint from the proceeds of the sale of each deposit of gold subject to the tax and shall be paid by him to the receiver general.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the minister should put on record the difference in principle between what is now proposed and what he proposed in his budget speech.

Mr. RHODES: The wording as we now have it provides the equivalent of what was introduced in the budget as a ten per cent tax on gold production. In other words a tax of twenty-five per cent on the exchange premium is the equivalent as nearly as may be of a ten per cent tax on production, with this distinction, that these provisions ensure that the tax will only come from those mines which have been regular dividend payers. For example if a mine paid a dividend in the year 1932, and did not pay a dividend in 1933, it would not be subject to this tax. Only those companies which paid dividends during the years 1932 and 1933 and for the six months' period ending March 31, 1934, will be subject to the tax. The wording, "gold deposited for sale at the Royal Canadian Mint produced from ore mined in Canada by producers of gold" excludes from the operation of the tax placer gold and scrap gold. There is one other feature; that is that the companies which pay the tax will be able to secure credit on this tax to the extent that they pay income tax. Those are the only changes from the original proposal.

Mr. RALSTON: I congratulate my hon. friend on the change he has made. While he says these are the "only" changes, I think they are most vital to the gold mining industry of the country. When I had occasion to address the house after my hon. friend had delivered his budget speech I stressed the point that what my hon. friend should not do was to tax production, but that if a tax must be imposed on the gold-mining industry of the country it should be imposed on profits. Secondly, I stressed the fact that he should not tax mines which were in the development stage. There are plenty of mines which are producing some gold but production and profits from these have in the very nature of things to be plowed back in order that the mine may reach a stable and satisfactory producing position. My hon. friend has met the first point by providing that the tax shall be on the premium and not, as in the original proposal, on the price itself; and by providing further that the tax shall only be paid by mines which have paid dividends, thus taking care of the point that only those mines which have profits shall pay it. In the same way he has met the point that mines which are only in the development stage shall not be taxed, because these mines have not yet started to pay dividends. I think the tax is much more equitable in this form. It is a radical change from what was proposed in the budget. Far be it from me to suggest that my hon. friend has taken any suggestion or hint from this side of the house but still I am glad to note that his proposals meet the points which were made at the time his budget was criticized. May I say that the third point, namely that the tax paid is to be credited on account of income tax, shows how thoroughly and absolutely he has adopted the principle I endeavoured to lay down that only paying mines and only profits shall be taxed for the purpose of raising revenue from this particular industry.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I want to say a word in regard to this tax on gold, particularly with reference to the exemption of placer gold, as provided under the amendment. It will be remembered that when the tax was imposed in the first place it was a tax on the total production of gold, placer as well as lode. That had a very unfortunate bearing on the production of placer gold in my own district. As one who probably comes in closer contact with that class of gold-mining than any other person in the house I would like to explain the effect that a ten per cent tax on placer gold production would have in my district. Since the depression hit Canada we have in the neighbourhood of a thousand men in the Cariboo district producing placer gold individually by rocking on the bars and benches there. Now these men are of a class who are doing their utmost to keep off relief. They resorted to this method of earning a living and undertook this laborious work—because it is hard, difficult work and the returns are very small—and I thought it was rather an imposition on men of that kind to take ten per cent of their total production when they were doing their best to relieve the country of their maintenance. I cannot say exactly what the returns obtained by these men are, but from my own knowledge gained through purchasing the gold from them I would say that during the year 1932 when this operation started practically, I bought something like $10,000 or $12,000 worth of gold and kept pretty accurate track of the amount of work put into the production of that gold. As nearly as I could figure the wages that these men were making from this operation were between 50 and 60 cents a day. Now you can understand that with a thousand men in my district working for such wages through their anxiety to keep off relief, the proposal of the government to take a ten per cent rake off from their production was not very popular. I appreciate very much, as do the placer miners of the Cariboo district, the fact that they have been relieved of that taxation.

[Mr. Ralston.]

In order to show how much it affects the production of gold, last year the total production in Canada with premium added was something like $85,000,000. The production of placer gold is practically confined to the Yukon and British Columbia. The production of placer gold in British Columbia last year was $357,000 and in the Yukon about $1,000,000. Remember that the Yukon production at the present time is taxed by the federal government. I think it is two and a half per cent at the present time, but at one time the federal government levied a tax on twenty per cent on the total production of the Yukon.

I should like to give just a few figures in regard to mining in British Columbia. In 1933 there were 155 new mining companies incorporated in that province, of which 145 were gold mining companies. Most of these concerns, of course, are lode mining companies. Last year the British Columbia government issued 16,000 free miners' licences, the greatest number of such licences ever issued in that province in any one year. That is accounted for by the fact to which I just referred, that so many unemployed men resorted to the bars and benches of the different rivers of that province in order to recover as much of the gold from the gravel as they possibly could. I may say that some of those men who were well versed in the science of prospecting, who knew just where to go and how to save the fine gold, made very handsome profits. The majority of these men, being inexperienced and not knowing how to prospect, where to look for the gold or how to save it after they found it, made very small returns. In addition to those free miners' licences the British Columbia government also issued provisional free miners' certificates entirely without charge, which carried the privilege, for these men who were trying to make their living, of having their claims recorded free and working their claims without charge. So it will be seen by the committee that the government of British Columbia has been working in cooperation with these men in order to give them an opportunity to make a living in that way.

There is just one other point I should like to mention in connection with the expansion of gold mining in British Columbia. The territory which is producing the greater part of this gold is the territory served by the Pacific Great Eastern railway, and the tonnage hauled over that railway last year was greatly increased through the extension and expansion of the gold mining industry. That road hauled 6,472 tons of freight in 1933 as compared with 2,137 tons in 1932, which gives an idea of what the gold mining industry does for the railway serving the territory in which the expansion is taking place.

Let me once more express my appreciation for the modification that has been made in the original proposal, and at the same time I should like to express to the Minister of Finance and the government the appreciation of those who are engaged in that industry in British Columbia.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I, too, should like to congratulate the minister on his amendment. As the provision was introduced it would have put a great many of the smaller gold mines out of business; there is no doubt of that. Undoubtedly it would have hampered the mines giving the greatest amount of employment as well, so I think the minister should be congratulated on having made the change. Undoubtedly the profit tax is the fairest tax that can be imposed, though in my mind I have a doubt as to whether this is a proper field for the federal government to enter. It seems to me that if a tax on gold was to be imposed it should have been imposed by the provinces, because there are only about three of the provinces that are gold producing. However, I am not going to quarrel with the minister on that aspect of the matter; I know how badly he needs revenue, and I am informed that he will get about as much by this method as was anticipated in the proposal first made. I do think this will have a stabilizing effect on the production of mines which have had some difficulty in carrying on and which, as I have pointed out, of necessity must give a greater amount of employment than the mines which now will be affected. I am not so sure about the retroactive aspect of the amendment. Is that not a new departure?

Mr. RHODES: No; there is nothing retroactive in it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I understood that it was retroactive to 1933.

Mr. RHODES: No, that has reference only to companies which paid dividends in that year; it is not a tax on the gold produced. Companies had to pay dividends in 1932, 1933 and the six months prior to March of this year; otherwise they were not taxed at all. That is merely used for the purpose of defining those companies that should pay the tax as and from the 19th day of April. That is all.

I could discuss this matter at length; it is rather an interesting subject, but I will deal with only one point. May I say to my hon. friend from Edmonton that the taxation of the mining industry is one thing that quite properly might be a field of taxation reserved to the provinces, but the tax on the premium on gold is an entirely different thing. The price of gold is fixed under the Currency Act as a matter of statute; its value is determined by the legislation of this parliament, and with all deference I submit that the tax on the premium is peculiarly within the right of this parliament and does not interfere in any way with the right of the provinces to tax the mining industry as such. Their taxation in that respect can be levied if they see fit to do so.

Mr. JACOBS: They can do so now; there is nothing to prevent them from taxing the mining industry, as they probably will in due course.

Mr. RHODES: That is so.

Mr. MacLEAN: The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) stated that in the last few years he had purchased a great deal of gold from miners. Paragraph 10 of this section makes it unlawful for anyone but the producer to ship gold to the mint. From this section I take it that the original producer must transfer his gold to the mint, and that it cannot be purchased by anyone other than the mint. I should like to know from the minister if that assumption is correct.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps I may be permitted to say a word in that connection. Placer mining is in a peculiar position. If the provision that producers must bring their gold to the mint were strictly adhered to it would debar hundreds and thousands of individual placer miners who gather up small quantities of placer gold in the Yukon and in British Columbia. So it is a real convenience to them to give them an opportunity of disposing of their gold on the spot and receiving cash from some individual who is prepared to buy it from them. That individual may gather together a considerable volume of such gold and, in turn, send it to the mint. My hon. friend will observe that the minister may issue a permit which would cover just that case in point. It is an entirely different thing from the gold which comes from a producer such as a company which produces several hundred ounces of gold in a year, as compared with the individual placer miner who produces perhaps only a few ounces.

Mr. MacLEAN: For the information of those of us who are on the outside and do not know the inside story of gold mining, would the minister tell us how the master of the mint knows placer gold from gold mined in other ways?

Mr. RHODES: I am informed it is very easily distinguishable. The gold coming from each mine, as a matter of fact, has distinguishing qualities to an extent that the moment the master of the mint sees a brick he can tell, with a great degree of accuracy, from which mine it has come. There are different colours, qualities and bloom, as the hon. member for Pictou has reminded me. Furthermore, in every case certificates of origin are required.

Mr. MacLEAN: I wish to thank the minister for his explanation and, with other hon. members, to congratulate him upon the amendments. We must not forget that the mining of gold is made possible by the investing public, and in connection with the imposition of a tax of this kind they must be considered. Not only the operators of gold mines and miners of placer gold are interested, but there are people from coast to coast who have put their money into mining ventures and made it possible for these operators and miners to carry on. Therefore, if the change made by the minister brings about a more equitable arrangement, I should like to congratulate him. I do not say he took his cue from the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, but I do say there was a general appeal from people throughout the country that changes should be made, and I think the Minister of Finance was wise in making the change.

Paragraph agreed to.

10. That it shall be unlawful for any person to whom the provisions of this part apply (i) to sell gold produced from natural deposits in Canada otherwise than to the Royal Canadian Mint, except by the consent in writing of the Minister of Finance; (ii) to refuse to sell or refrain from selling such gold to the Royal Canadian Mint at such time as in the usual course of business such gold would be sold, and to provide penalties for violation of this provision.

Mr. JACOBS: I should like to have some information from the minister as to whether the mint purchases old gold, and if so what prices are being paid for it?

Mr. RHODES: The mint does purchase old gold. It is well defined and easily distinguishable as old gold, under the regulations which have been laid down. The price paid is the world price less a charge of one dollar an ounce. I may point out that the gold must be in its original form.

Mr. JACOBS: Old teeth, for instance,—bridges, and that sort of thing, melted down.

Mr. RHODES: No, not melted down.

Mr. JACOBS: They must be handed in in their original form?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. Otherwise the opportunity to drop in the odd five dollar gold piece would be irresistable.

Mr. JACOBS: So that if old gold comes in bars, melted down, it will not be purchased by the mint?

Mr. RHODES: No, it must be in its original form, namely in the form of jewellery, spectacles, watches, rings and so on.

Mr. JACOBS: That is scarcely an original form for gold.

Mr. RHODES: It is the original form of old gold.

Mr. JACOBS: What about teeth?

Mr. RHODES: Well, I do not know whether or not they receive any teeth at the mint, but I have seen large quantities of old jewellery, watches, watch cases, rings, brooches, pins, ear rings, and all sorts of odds and ends.

Mr. JACOBS: The minister does not propose to put teeth in this law, then?

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): Not gold teeth.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I should like to ask the minister if the regulation in regard to the permits issued to banks for the purchase or the handling of this gold will be continued? I am speaking about placer gold.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, it is the purpose to have such machinery as may be necessary to facilitate the carrying on of placer mining and the disposition of placer gold.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): There is no contemplated change in the existing legislation?

Mr. RHODES: No, no change contemplated at the moment.

Mr. JACOBS: I should like once more to revert to this matter of the price of old gold. I have in mind an instance where a person came from the United States bringing a quantity of old gold in bars. It was declared illegal to bring it in, because a declaration was not made at the border. That was the only illegality committed. After he had straightened out his difficulties with the department at Washington this person retained parties in Canada for the purpose of selling the gold. He thought he would be able to do so, gaining the advantage of the premium, but he was unable to negotiate a sale because of the fact that the gold was not produced from Canadian mines. The question of the odd five dollar gold piece ought not to have been considered, because if there were any they would be American, and not Canadian. In that respect, therefore, he did not break the law. Why was it he was not given the regulation amount of $35 an ounce for his gold?

Mr. RHODES: For the reasons I indicated a moment ago, our regulations state that gold shall be submitted to the mint in its original form. This is done for the express purpose of preventing old gold being melted down, and gold coin being added to it.

Mr. JACOBS: Canadian gold coin?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, or British sovereigns, or the five dollar gold pieces of the United States, none of which, as coins, are worth more than their face value.

Mr. JACOBS: Why should we declare a protectorate over American gold?

Mr. RHODES: Because the United States coins are legal tender in Canada. We wish to protect only the legitimate trade, and not that trade which arises out of the opportunity to make an easy dollar.

Paragraph agreed to.

11. That no charges except the charges imposed by the regulations for the receipt of gold bullion at the Royal Canadian Mint shall be made by the Royal Canadian Mint in respect of any gold subject to the said tax, and the costs incidental to the sale of such gold so subject to the tax after its receipt by the Royal Canadian Mint may be paid out of the revenue collected by means of the said tax.

Paragraph agreed to.

12. That all gold exported in the form of ore, concentrates or base bullion produced from ore mined in Canada by producers of gold who in both of the years one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two and one thousand nine hundred and thirty-three and at any time in the six months prior to April nineteenth, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four, paid dividends in cash or stock on preferred or common stock, shall be subject to the said tax, under regulations to be made by the Minister of Finance.

Paragraph agreed to.

13. (1) That the said tax shall apply to gold deposited for sale at the Royal Canadian Mint, or exported, no matter by whom deposited, or exported, if it would have applied had such gold been so deposited or exported by the person who mined the ore from which such gold was produced.

(2) That the said tax shall not apply to gold deposited for sale at the Royal Canadian Mint, or exported by any person if it would not have applied had such gold been so deposited or exported by the person who mined the ore from which such gold was produced.

(3) That a depositor or exporter of gold shall furnish such evidence of the origin of the gold deposited or exported as the Minister of Finance may require and any producer of gold from natural deposits shall furnish to the Minister of Finance such information as he may require.

Paragraph agreed to.

13a. (1) That the said tax shall not operate so as to reduce the amount payable to the depositor or exporter below thirty dollars the ounce fine in currency of Canada.

Paragraph agreed to.

(2) That the amount of the said tax levied in the fiscal year ending March thirty-first, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-five shall be reduced by the amount of income tax payable under the Income War Tax Act by the producer of gold on which the tax has been levied, for and in respect of the calendar year one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four and the adjustment resulting therefrom shall be made when the amount of liability for income tax has been determined after the close of the fiscal period of such producer in respect of the calendar year one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four and for the purpose only of this subsection (2) where the fiscal year of a producer does not coincide with the calendar year, the producer shall make a return to the commissioner of income tax as at the end of the calendar year one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four and a computation of income tax payable on the basis of such return shall be made by the commissioner of income tax in the same manner as if such return had been made under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act and the amount so computed shall be determined to be the amount of income tax payable for the purposes of this subsection (2) and shall be used as the basis of the said adjustment: Provided, that in the case of a producer who derives income through the production of gold combined with other metals or materials, the provisions of this subsection (2) shall apply only to the amount of income tax attributable to the production by such producer of gold subject to the tax.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope the phrasing is sufficiently clear for those who have to operate under it. From the length of the section it looks to me as though this will be a gold mine for lawyers who will have to interpret the section in due course.

Mr. MANION: It was probably drawn up by a lawyer.

Mr. RHODES: I have the hope that the fears of my hon. friend will be unfounded. As a matter of fact, this section has been drafted with very great care.

Mr. JACOBS: All sections are drafted that way.

Mr. RHODES: It has been scrutinized very carefully by the solicitors representing the companies which will be affected. I think perhaps the best evidence I can offer to my hon. friend that it covers the cases I have in mind is that I have as yet had no protests as to the wording.

Mr. JACOBS: That does not amount to much.

Mr. RHODES: I believe it is eminently suited to accomplish the objects which we have in mind.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope it is but I imagine we will not know that it has been drafted with great care until the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has rendered a decision.

Paragraph agreed to.

13b. That the Minister of Finance may make such regulations as he deems necessary or expedient to ensure the carrying out of the provisions and intent of this part, and to determine in any case of doubt whether and to what extent gold deposited for sale at the Royal Canadian Mint, or exported, is subject to the tax, and such regulations shall have the force of law as if enacted in this part.

Paragraph agreed to.

14. That any enactment founded on paragraph one shall come into force on the first day of July one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four, and any enactment founded on paragraph two shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-first day of May, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four.

Paragraph agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: This is the amendment which appeared in the votes and proceedings of May 29. In order to carry out the sequence I would ask you to take up number 15 which will be found in the budget resolutions.

15. That any enactment founded on paragraphs three, four and five of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the nineteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four.

Paragraph agreed to.

16. That any enactment founded on paragraphs six, seven and eight of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the nineteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four, and to have applied to all goods mentioned therein imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have applied to goods previously imported for consumption for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

[Mr. Manion.]

Paragraph agreed to.

17. That any enactment founded on paragraphs nine to thirteen B shall be deemed to have come into force on the nineteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four and shall expire on the thirty-first day of May one thousand nine hundred and thirty-five.

Paragraph agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: I move that the committee rise, report the resolutions, and ask leave to sit again.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 98, to amend the customs tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 99, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 97, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TARIFF BOARD REPORT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I ask the consent of the house to revert to motions in order that I may table a report from the tariff board covering reference number 42, hookless fasteners, in connection with which an item was considered in committee of ways and means.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FUNDS TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS INCURRED DURING CALENDAR YEAR 1934

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 71, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1934, and to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Power to issue notes, for refunding and capital expenditures.

Mr. REID: Perhaps the minister will remember that last year I took up with him the matter of a contract that had been let for the transporting of cars across Burrard inlet. It was drawn to the minister's attention that the contract was exorbitant in price and that perhaps the ferry belonging to the Canadian National Railways which has been lying idle in the Fraser river might be used. Has the minister looked into that and can he give me any information?

Mr. MANION: I did look into that matter at the time and I remember well that the Canadian National Railways management explained it to me quite satisfactorily, but I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend the details now. The management explained that from the standpoint of finances they were ahead in the method they were employing, at least to their satisfaction. I have no doubt that I have all the details in my office, and while I cannot remember them at the moment, I shall be very glad to give them to my hon. friend if he cares to bring the matter to my attention at another time.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Power to aid other companies.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What other companies?

Mr. MANION: Any of the component parts of the system—subsidiary companies.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed from Friday, June 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, respecting shipping—Mr. Duranleau—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed further with this bill I should like to know what the government has decided since last Friday evening. I was not here when discussion on the bill started. As everybody can see, this is a very bulky bill. It is true that it has been considered by the Senate this year and that it has also been before a Senate committee which has gone over it very carefully, as it did also last year, but if it took the Senate all of last session and practically all of this session to be able to appreciate the contents of this bill, I think it is only fair to the members of the House of Commons that the same opportunity should be given to them. But here we are in the dying hours of the session, on the very last lap, and this bill is presented for our consideration. I do not think it is fair to ask the members of the House of Commons at this stage of the session to examine this bill carefully, clause by clause—the clauses are very numerous—and to examine all the rules and regulations and all the schedules that are attached to the bill.

But there is another reason. Although this bill was considered by the Senate last year I have been told that the Senate received many delegations from the pilotage authorities of the various districts throughout the country both this year and last. There are members of the House of Commons who would like to have some knowledge of the discussions that took place over there. Of course we cannot be expected to follow the discussions that take place in the committees of the Senate on the various bills that are later submitted for our consideration, for as hon. members will recall, this year we have had to consider in this house most important legislation, the revision of the Bank Act, which we passed only recently; the companies act, the act creating the new central bank, and many other pieces of legislation of the highest importance.

My attention has also been drawn to the fact that there are in this bill certain rules and regulations which affect the fishermen of the lower part of the province of Quebec and of the maritime provinces, and I am informed that the owners of schooners and other vessels and boats will have to pass examinations and obtain certain classified certificates in order to operate their boats. In our part of the country and in the maritime provinces I am told that a great many of these people will be put at a great disadvantage if this bill is passed, because while most of them have been brought up to the sea a good many of them I daresay on account of their age and physical condition, the condition of their eyesight and other things, may not be able to pass the examination prescribed. If they cannot, they will be put to great expense in engaging the services of a certificated man to put in charge of the ship and the crew.

There are also in the bill certain clauses and rules and regulations which affect the pilotage district of Montreal and pilots of vessels coming from the maritime provinces and up the lakes, and especially affecting the pilots below Quebec. I am told on good authority by the assistant deputy minister, who is a very amiable and also a very responsible and competent authority in these matters, that these rules and regulations will not affect the certificates of pilots who have held their certificates for a good many years, but that they will affect the certificates of pilots in the future. This is a most important matter, and the situation of those pilots should be made clear when the bill is being discussed. I have received numerous communications, requests and petitions from the pilots of the district of Quebec concerning this very matter.

These are some features which right there stare us in the face. I am also mindful that as we proceed with the discussion of this bill other points which will come up for debate may take a considerable time. Last year when a similar bill was under consideration it was not proceeded with because of the serious contentions made in relation to it, but the government saw fit to have a measure passed to protect sailors and others employed in vessels, the pilots being supposed to be protected also. On that occasion the Minister of Marine told us that it was of paramount importance that this measure be put through in order to protect those sailors and others. Now I am told that this bill that was passed last year by the House of Commons and assented to by the Senate did not come into effect. The government was in a great hurry to have the bill passed to protect those people but it did not see fit to pass an order in council to promulgate the bill and put it into effect. Apparently, however, nobody has suffered from the measure not being put into force. The same thing will happen to the present measure, and it might just as well await its birth, origin and light of day for another year. For these reasons it might be laid over this year, as it is now nearly the end of the session. The shipping interests of the country will not suffer any harm if the passage of the bill is delayed for another year, and next session when we reconvene we shall have an opportunity to consider it and be able as members of the House of Commons and as truly representative of the people to give due and full consideration to the legislation. After five months of strenuous work as we have had it is not fair in the last days of this session to ask members to consider all the clauses of this bill and to give it the attention we would like to give, the same as we have given to other measures that have been laid before us in the last few weeks.

It is not sufficient to say that the Senate has considered the bill and reported favourably. I think it was the Minister of Justice who said the other day in connection with a bill concerning lotteries and sweepstakes that the fact that it came from the Senate was not a certain certificate, and the house did not see fit to accept the proposals contained in that measure. It is all very well to say that the Senate is the superior body over all the people in this country, but when an important matter such as shipping comes up, the House of Commons should have the right and full opportunity of discussing every clause, subclause, schedule and anything else connected with the bill so as to be able to vote on it in an intelligent manner. Consideration by the Senate is all very well in certain cases, but we should not always take it for granted that we should pass any legislation just because it comes before us with their certificate.

Last year the question of the constitutionality of this legislation arose. I was not present when the minister spoke the other day, but this bill raises many serious questions with reference to the constitutionality of the law, and I should like to have more cogent and important reasons that we should be asked to put the stamp of our approval on this bill holus-bolus as apparently the government wants us to do, I for one protest against this measure being brought before us in the last days of the session. I remember a few years ago because bills were sent by the former government to the upper chamber in the dying days of the session, the Senate refused to consider them although they had been fully considered and passed by the House of Commons.

I for one would ask the government to reconsider its decision and see whether it would not be well to put over this bill for another year. The government would be well advised if it would have the committee report progress and not have us asked to consider this bill again this year.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Am I right in saying that the Senate has studied this measure in the past two years?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think hon. members have followed the consideration of this bill in the Senate. As I explained when it was introduced and when I spoke on the second reading, last year a similar bill was introduced in the Senate and studied by the standing committee on banking and commerce of that chamber. When the interested parties were before that committee the point was raised as to the power of the Canadian parliament to impose certain duties on British consuls or other officials in other countries when we had perhaps no such authority. So the bill was deferred to this session and we had to arrange with the British authorities in the meantime to settle the point. That was the only question raised last year. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) spoke of the constitutionality of the legislation. I do not think there is now any ground for any fear, all these points have been settled.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How were they settled?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The bill before the Senate last year had to be withdrawn. Practically the same bill with certain amendments was introduced this year, and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce of the Senate, where in turn a subcommittee was set up, where it was studied, I suppose, during two or three weeks. It was then referred back to the full committee on banking and commerce of the Senate, where again all interested parties were heard and slight amendments incorporated in the bill on the representations made. I would refer my hon. friend to the remarks I made on the second reading of the bill as they appear in Hansard of June 8 at page 3812.

The point raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay that the bill should stand over was raised by some of his colleagues last Friday. It was understood then that the government would consider the matter and after having done so and owing to public opinion, we feel we are bound to proceed with the bill. Though the debate took place late last Friday, I have been receiving since then telegrams from interested parties urging the adoption of this measure. I can give my hon. friends the contents of telegrams we have so far received.

Mr. CASGRAIN: From what concerns?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have received a telegram from the National Association of Marine Engineers of Canada, Council No. 8 of Levis, recommending the immediate adoption of this bill. They say:

> Shipping bill as passed by Senate a great improvement and greater protection to navigation in general.

I have received also a long telegram from the Shipping Federation of Canada saying:

> Reference debate House of Commons June 8 re shipping bill: This federation respectfully urges government proceed with enactment this important measure during present session of parliament. Representations from all parties interested this legislation were considered fully by Senate committee last year and again this year; consequently no interests can claim they have been overlooked or have had insufficient time submit their views. Consider any further postponement neither necessary nor in best interests shipping.

Mr. DUFF: That statement is not correct. Who signs that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The Shipping Federation of Canada.

Mr. DUFF: Where?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Montreal.

Mr. DUFF: Oh!

Sir EUGENE FISET: Was it in answer to a telegram of your own?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not at all. These wires have been received as a result of what they have read in the press since last Friday about the debate. The Canada Steamship Lines have also sent a long telegram urging adoption of this bill at this session. I heard my hon. friends last Friday; I heard also the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay and I would say that there are not more than ten or fifteen sections of the bill affected by their statement.

Mr. DUFF: Who says that?

Mr. REID: There are twenty-five at least.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am saying that from the debate last Friday it appears that there are not more than ten or fifteen sections on which there would be discussion or contest. All the other sections of the bill are a reproduction of our present law.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then they are in force now.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They are in the Canada Shipping Act or the load line convention or a reproduction of the safety at sea convention. All these conventions were ratified by this house two years ago and are the law of the land to-day.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend says that only fifteen clauses are in dispute. I ask him if he understands from my remarks last Friday that that is the case.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I would invite my hon. friend to state the sections of the bill that he intends to oppose.

Mr. DUFF: I intend to oppose the whole bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Well, let us suppose so; we must proceed. We can go on clause by clause and my hon. friends will do what they think is in the public interest.

Mr. MUNN: The minister gave a list of requests he had had from different people interested. I would like to know if he has had any representations from the Pacific coast urging that this bill be proceeded with?

Mr. NEILL: Since Friday.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not say that I have.

Mr. MUNN: Say no, then.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Because they did not have time since last Friday—

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): They could wire.

Mr. DURANLEAU:—to do what the others from the east have done.

Mr. DUFF: Did my hon. friend receive any representations from the maritime provinces that this bill should be proceeded with?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that all parties in Canada concerned with shipping are interested in having the shipping laws put into effect, and we have been asked every year that it be done.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): It is funny.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Have the fun you want. Let us proceed, and my hon. friends will have ample opportunity to discuss any sections of the bill.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend has made the statement that the people of Canada are satisfied with this bill. I am asking him a definite question: Since this bill was passed by the Senate,—it was amended in a hundred different clauses by the Senate during two years and at the cost of a large amount of money in bringing a lawyer from Vancouver who did not know a codfish from a mackerel, and they had a lawyer this year who does not know whether an alewife is a fish or not,—since the bill left the Senate has the minister received any representations from the eastern provinces that the shipping and business people in those provinces are satisfied with this bill? I want a definite answer.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can tell my hon. friend that not a single man from the east has opposed the bill that is before the house to-day.

Mr. DUFF: Because they have not seen it. And that, Mr. Chairman, is my objection. What I want is to have this bill go to the shipping and business men all over Canada, whether on the Pacific coast or in Quebec or on the great lakes or the Atlantic provinces. I say this bill should not be forced through parliament, but these people should have a chance to study it. Here we have a bill of 497 pages which nobody has seen, which I say the minister himself has not read completely—

Mr. DURANLEAU: I beg your pardon.

Mr. VENIOT: Lord help you!

Mr. DUFF: Well, perhaps the minister has read it; I must take his word for it. But I have spent a week since last Wednesday and so far have read only 74 pages out of the 497. The minister must have better knowledge than I because he has been to college and I have not, but I say that the people interested in this bill have never seen it and in the interests of the shipping and business people of this country, of the seamen and the fishermen and everyone else, I protest. It is not fair that the minister should ask that this bill be passed without due consideration.

Mr. VENIOT: Last Friday when this bill was before the house certain of us from the maritime provinces on both sides of the house made representations asking that for certain reasons which we considered important this bill should not be proceeded with. It was then suggested, I think by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), that in order to get the bill moving, one section or subsection should be adopted, and then the government would take time to consider whether they should proceed with the bill or on the request of representatives from the maritime provinces withdraw it till next session. Evidently the government has now decided to proceed. In order to justify that action the minister tells this committee that since last Friday he has received from various sources telegrams asking that this bill be proceeded with immediately. I gather that he has received a telegram from the National Association of Marine Engineers of Canada, Levis section. Assume that it be from all the marine engineers of Canada, I do not care what section it comes from or the number, can the minister point out anything in this bill protecting the marine engineers that was not in the old act? He cannot do it. Therefore why should the marine engineers be in such a hurry to have this bill go through? The marine engineers' association of Canada looks after the interests of marine engineers, but we find in this bill section upon section that affects one of the largest industries in Canada, the fishing industry. Has the minister any representations from the fishermen's associations in the maritime provinces asking him to put the bill through in its present form? He cannot produce one line. Let me go further, and I am very earnest in this because I see the danger of almost absolute ruin to certain branches of our fishing industry if this bill goes through.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. VENIOT: I will tell you in a moment. If it goes through in its present form it will impose conditions on the fishing industry of this country with which they cannot comply.

Mr. DURANLEAU: What sections?

Mr. VENIOT: There are many sections. If we are forced to go on with this bill I will endeavour to have those sections amended, but what is the position of any representative of the fishing districts of the maritime provinces to-day, when we have not had an opportunity of consulting with our people, of laying this bill before them, of discussing the dangers they may see and their opinions as to the remedies to be proposed? We are not in a position to consider the bill. If you force us to go on with this bill you force us to attempt to carry out what we believe is in the best interests of the fishing industry, but even with the knowledge we have of that industry we may do an injustice to our people. That is why I feel so strongly in the matter.

The other reason mentioned by the minister had to do with a telegram received from the Shipping Federation of Canada, who, the minister told the committee, represent all interests. They do not. The interests represented by that association from whom the minister received his information are principally the deep water interests, those concerned with communication between Canada and foreign countries and those engaged on the lakes, which are international waters to some extent. They have no authority to represent or speak for the men engaged in the fishing industry in this country, and that is another reason why we do not desire to proceed with this bill. The minister also says the Senate has considered the bill and that all interests were represented before the Senate committee. He read a telegram something to this effect, "In view of the fact that all interests were represented before the Senate this bill should go through." I say that telegram is a lie. It states that all interests were represented before the Senate, but neither the minister nor anyone else can show that one single interest connected with the fishing industry was represented before the committee of the Senate. Therefore why force us to go on with this bill this session when I am convinced that no interest will suffer if it is put off? I am firmly of the opinion, however, that if it is put through in its present form very large interests will be detrimentally affected, and the Lord only knows what the end may be.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I was before the Senate committee for a number of days following this bill while the hearings were going on. I shall not attempt to enumerate the interests represented there, but many interests were represented and many witnesses were heard. During the time I was there, which included the better part of a week, I thought the bill received very careful attention, especially from a large body of men from the eastern provinces.

Mr. DUFF: Who were they?

Mr. HACKETT: The senators who come from the east. To the onlooker they gave the impression that they were not only deeply interested in the work which has been going on there for some three years, I think, but that they were intimately acquainted with it. Furthermore I noticed that the great majority of the sections are non-controversial. A great many of them deal with treaties; a great many of them are lifted out of the old act, and a large portion of the time spent on these sections was devoted to their arrangement, deciding the sequence in which they should appear, rather than in dealing with the purport of any particular sections.

I thought the house might be interested to know the impression obtained by one who followed the proceedings of that committee very carefully. In the heated state of mind in which some hon. gentlemen seem to be

I do not know whether they would care to proceed with the consideration of the bill, but I think if they attempt that course they will find that the controversial sections are very few and a long way apart.

Mr. BENNETT: The government proposes to proceed with this bill. It has been twice before the Senate, it has received more consideration than any bill that has come before parliament for a very long time. It has been given more attention in detail than any measure that has been in either house for a very long period. It is the result of much effort in which the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) participated in 1929 in London, in directing the general principles that should govern this legislation. The bill was drafted, considered by experts, redrafted and considered in committee.

Mr. DUFF: Who were the experts, please?

Mr. BENNETT: They were the gentlemen responsible for its legal provisions. The representatives of the various interests concerned made their statement before the committee. If there are very controversial sections in the bill they can stand as we proceed, and if the amendments suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite are such as appear to be in the public interest we shall be very glad indeed to adopt them. I trust that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) will recall the observations made by his distinguished leader a few days ago with respect to the duties of a member of parliament. In the light of that statement I am sure he will find some difficulty in accommodating his views as expressed this afternoon to those of his honoured leader.

We desire to proceed with the bill for the reasons I have given. We believe it is in the public interest, which is the paramount interest. If individuals find it inconvenient to particular interests we will always consider the public interest and the particular private interest affected, but the public interest must prevail. With that principle in mind we will proceed with the discussion of the bill.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not intend to speak again, but since the Prime Minister has lectured me on my duties as a member I feel that I should make some reply to his remarks. It is true my right hon. leader did refer to the duties a member owes not only to himself but to the country as a whole. I do not need either my right hon. leader or the right hon. leader of the government to teach me any lessons in that regard. I have been long enough in public life to know the duty I owe to my constituents and to the public at large.

[Mr. Hackett.]

This afternoon I am not pleading for my constituents, but I am pleading on behalf of one of the largest industries in Canada. I am speaking for the fishing industry on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and I am backed by representatives from those districts of our dominion. That industry, to my mind, is paramount to any protection this law may afford in connection with deep sea sailing, or the protection of engineers and captains of deep sea vessels. Therefore my opposition to the bill is not parochial. I have in mind the duty which, as a member of the House of Commons, I owe to all sections of Canada. As the principle has been laid down that the lesser must give in, for the benefit of the larger, may I say that to-day I am pleading on behalf of the larger. I am pleading on behalf of the fishing industry of Canada, as compared with the lesser interests of engineers and captains of vessels running from one country to the other. Under this legislation they are fully protected, and they were fully protected under the old legislation. There is no amendment in the new bill which affords protection contrary to that which was given them under the British act, the measure under which we have been operating since 1867. But in the adoption of the present measure as it stands an injustice would be perpetrated against one of the greatest industries in Canada, and as a member of the House of Commons with a full knowledge of my duty to my country and to myself I am pleading on behalf of that great industry, and against the smaller interests connected with marine engineers and deep sea captains.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I regret that this very voluminous document which is of such great importance should be placed before the house at this time, and that at this late hour of the session we should be asked to study it. Hon. members know that we cannot stay here all summer. If, as the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) has said, the other chamber studied the measure for three years, surely that is sufficient indication as to the importance of and the difficulties in connection with the measure. I agree entirely with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as to the advisability of a revision of the shipping act; it must be done. So far as the constitutional point raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) is concerned, I must say that I am of the opinion his fears are not well founded. I think however it is not fair at this late hour of the session to ask hon. members of the House of Commons to consider the bill. It is the result of much work, as the Prime Minister and Minister of Marine have said. Undoubtedly it is a good thing that public business should originate in the Senate, but the fact remains that the country is not used to that procedure, and as a result the proceedings of the Senate are not followed as closely or as attentively as those of the House of Commons. With the exception of those hon. members who have been peculiarly interested in the measure, the country as a whole has certainly not become familiar with it.

Mr. DUFF: They have not had a chance.

Mr. LAPOINTE: On the whole I must agree with hon. members who have said it would be better to give the people of Canada an opportunity to become better acquainted with the bill before we undertake to proceed with it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): We are on section 2 of the bill, and I notice that in this section there are 113 subsections. Does the committee wish me to read every one of them?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, if it is necessary, but I should like to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, respecting shipping—Mr. Duranleau—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 2, subsection 2—"The Admiralty."

Mr. REID: This is a new bill and it contains all the regulations pertaining to the hiring and dismissal of seamen, to hospitals and to all that which concerns the lives of the men on board ship. Would the minister be good enough to tell me if any personal representations were made before the Senate by representatives of the seamen or seamen's institutes?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): From the west coast?

Mr. REID: From anywhere, but particularly from the Pacific coast.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The proceedings of the committee of the Senate were not reported, but I am informed that no representations were made by the seamen on the west coast.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Were representations made to the department by navigation or other organizations in Montreal?

Mr. BENNETT: What has that to do with it? The government is assuming responsibility for the bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: For two or three years representations have been made, both verbally and in writing, to myself and my officials by different shipping associations and navigation interests. In drafting this bill with the assistance of the officials of the Department of Justice, the officials of my department have taken into consideration all the representations received.

Mr. DUFF: What representations were made?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the representations which have been made should be the subject matter of inquiry in this matter. The government assumes full responsibility for the introduction of this bill, which arises from the conferences of 1926 and 1929. This bill is the result of what took place in London in 1929 and is one of the legacies which we inherited. For three years we have been endeavouring to give effect to it, and this is now the fourth year.

Mr. DUFF: I do not think it is ncessary for the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to intervene in this matter. Why does he not go back to mid-Victorian days, to the day of George I or to some time a thousand years ago? I think I am quite in order in asking this question of the Minister of Marine, and I do not think the Prime Minister had any right to interject what he did a moment ago. I have asked the minister if he has received certain representations in connection with this bill and I would like to know what they are. I contend that the fishing and shipping interests of this country are opposed to this bill. They do not know what it is, because they have not seen it, and we are now being asked to pass it in the dying days of the session. It came over from the Senate only five days ago, and I think the people of this country should have an opportunity to study it and decide whether it is right or wrong.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the subsection carry?

Mr. DUFF: No, the minister cannot answer, that is the trouble; he does not know.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I told the committee that for the past two or three years representations have been made to my officials and to myself. Surely my hon. friend is not serious when he asks me to give him the particulars of the representations made. Different associations have made representations in connection with the sections in which they are interested, and as we proceed with the bill and reach the sections in connection with which representations were made, I will give my hon. friend what he asks for if I am in position to do so. But I do not think it is fair to put the question in that way when we are dealing with subsection 2 of section 2, which concerns definitions.

Mr. DUFF: Certainly it is proper for the minister in charge of this bill to tell us what is the object of the bill and what result it is going to have. This is a bill of 497 pages; it has 719 sections, it has 113 definitions and there are 224 pages of schedules. Surely the minister does not expect us to pass this bill when it has been before us for only four or five days. It is all right for the Prime Minister to want to close up this parliament in a few days, and I appreciate that, but—

Mr. BENNETT: I am perfectly indifferent to that.

Mr. DUFF: I beg your pardon?

Mr. BENNETT: I am perfectly willing to stay all summer.

Mr. DUFF: All right, if you cannot go to have a holiday, neither can I, and we will stay. The Prime Minister and I agree that we will stay here until September. But even if we do stay until September, it is not fair that a bill of 497 pages, drafted by a lawyer from Vancouver, an honourable member in another place, in whose name the bill appears but who does not know a codfish from a haddock or an alewife from a hake, should be passed so quickly. This bill was sent here a week ago, and surely the Prime Minister does not expect us to pass it in a few days. Let us be fair about this thing. This bill means a lot to every man, woman and child in the maritime provinces, on the great lakes and on the Pacific coast. Surely the Prime Minister does not expect us to pass this bill in the few minutes taken by the Senate to pass it. Does the Prime Minister want us to do that? Has the Prime Minister read this bill? No, of course he has not. No one else has read it. I have been studying it for a week but how far have I got? Seventy-four pages out of 497. Has the Prime Minister read one page? Has the Minister of Justice read two pages? Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce read ten pages? Has the Minister of Railways read fifteen pages? No. And yet the Prime Minister comes in here to-night and wants us to pass this bill in bulk, without giving it any consideration. Don't consult the fishermen or the sailors on the Atlantic coast or the Pacific coast; don't consult the men on the great lakes; just let us put this bill through so that we can get clear of parliament in a few days. I say, Mr. Chairman, that that is not fair. It has taken the Senate two years to pass this—I will not call it an amalgamated bill—what is it? It is a posthumous bill. It was conceived in sin and born in iniquity, and the Prime Minister wants us now to pass it without the opportunity for consideration. Surely he does not really want to do that, for he does not know what it is all about; he has not read the bill. There are hundreds of clauses in this bill which nobody has seen. The Prime Minister has not read them, and because the Senate passed the bill in three minutes, as they did a week ago, the Prime Minister now wants us to put this bill through. It is true that the bill was considered by a committee of the Senate, but who gave this bill to the Senate? A lawyer from Vancouver and a lawyer from Ottawa. Here is a bill, Mr. Chairman, which deals with the lives and the property of every business man on the Atlantic coast, on the Pacific coast and on the St. Lawrence. Surely the Prime Minister does not want us to put it through in such a hurry.

Let us be fair about this thing. Nobody will suffer if this bill goes over until another session. Nobody will be hurt. The seamen, the masters and the mates and everybody else concerned are not complaining. The Minister of Marine cannot show me one telegram or letter from anybody interested in the business life of this country who wants this bill passed at this session. Why, then, should the Prime Minister or the Minister of Marine want us to pass this bill now? Let it stand over for another session so that the shipping men and the business men can look it over, instead of rushing it through in the dying days of this session.

The Prime Minister says that we can sit here till September. Of course we can, but I would not want the Prime Minister with all his troubles and worries to have to face parliament for another two months. I would give him Wednesday nights off.

Here is an important bill of 497 pages, a bill which affects the shipping people and the business men of this country, and yet the

[The Chairman.]

Prime Minister says: You must pass this bill before parliament prorogues. I say, Mr. Chairman, that before we proceed to do that, the Minister of Marine must give us reasons why this bill is introduced at this stage of the session. Let him tell us what he knows about it. The Minister of Marine cannot give any good reason why this bill is introduced at this moment. I say that with a bill like this, which has not been before the shipping industry of this country, which has not been before the ship owners and before the business men who are interested in shipping, there is only one thing to do, and that is to ask that this committee rise, and say that this bill should not pass now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I would respectfully draw the attention of the committee to paragraph 2 of rule 58, which reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

We are on subsection 2 of section 2 of this bill. It seems to me that the discussion has travelled very far afield, and I would ask hon. gentlemen to stick a little more closely to the section.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, when the bill came up for discussion on Friday evening, the very first clause was allowed to stand without discussion on the understanding that we proceed to section 2 and that then the committee would rise. It was the understanding of the committee that when the bill again came up hon. members would be allowed very considerable latitude on this section. It was the Minister of Finance, I think, who suggested that the committee should rise after calling section 2.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no objection. I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. VENIOT: When the bill was up for second reading, Mr. Chairman, there was no discussion upon it because it was understood that we would have a general discussion in committee, not confining ourselves to any particular section of the bill. Otherwise there would have been a lengthy discussion on the second reading.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would like to ask, so as to clarify the position, how many sections of this bill are reenactments of the Merchant Shipping Act, how many are reenactments of sections from the revised statutes of Canada, and how many are new sections. It seems to me that there are very few new sections, but I do agree that some of those are worthy of very careful consideration.

Mr. DURANLEAU: For the information of the committee, during the recess I counted the new dispositions in the bill and I find that there are exactly seventy new enactments, sections and parts of sections. There may be in all about thirty or thirty-five new sections. The whole bill is a reproduction of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, a reproduction of the Canada Shipping Act, and a reproduction of the conventions which have been the law of the land since 1931, when the load line convention and the international convention for safety of life at sea were approved by this parliament. There are from thirty to thirty-five new sections in all. That is why I said to my hon. friends on Friday evening that if they would take the trouble over the week-end to look over the bill they would find that there were not many controversial sections. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that as we proceed to study the different sections my hon. friends will very shortly come to the conclusion that there is not so much to discuss.

Mr. DUFF: It is very nice of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine to say that I should have spent the week-end in trying to arrive at a conclusion with regard to this bill, but evidently he does not appreciate the seriousness of the situation. My hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asks what new clauses there are in the bill. Let me say to him that the trouble with this bill is that the Marine department are back in the mid-Victorian era. They do not realize what has happened in the last thirty years. This bill is a composite bill drafted by certain officials in the Marine department, with the assistance of somebody else—I do not know who it is—who does not appreciate present conditions. If my hon. friend from York-Sunbury, who asked a question, will listen to me, I say that this is a composite bill drafted by somebody, first by a lawyer from Vancouver who perhaps deserved the money that the government paid him—he spent a year on it—and then by another lawyer. And what did they give him? A bill which is absolutely opposed to the business interests of the people of this country, to the interests of the fishing industry and of the marine industry. This bill takes us back to 1896 and 1906. I do not think the Prime Minister should be asked to father this bill or to say that he knows something about it. He does not. He is a lawyer from Calgary and my hon. friend opposite is a lawyer from York-Sunbury. But surely my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) and my hon. friend from Inverness Mr. Macdougall) and others who go down to the sea in ships and do business on the great waters should be allowed to express their views, and I think our views should be taken into consideration by this government. I would be delighted, if this bill were right, that the house should pass it in bulk just as the Senate did in three minutes. But I say to my hon. friend from York-Sunbury that this bill, this illegitimate child of somebody, for that is what it is to those who have had a chance to study it, is not in the interests of the shipping industry or of the business men of this country. Has my hon. friend from Pictou had a chance to go over the 497 pages of this bill? Has my hon. friend from Inverness read the 719 clauses of this bill?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I have read all the sections of the bill and I want to say that I do not see any section that prejudices the interests of the fishermen.

Mr. DUFF: I am delighted that my hon. friend is such a strong supporter of this government that he will say that, but I want to say to him that if he and the government will take the responsibility for this bill, if he wants to see every fisherman and every mariner thrown on the beach—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: How do you make that out?

Mr. DUFF: That is what will happen. My hon. friend does not know; that is the trouble. Under this bill every fisherman in a boat of five ton registry must have a certificate; every marine captain, every man who sails a fishing vessel or a freighter must have a certificate under this foolish, crazy bill, because that is what it is. If my hon. friend and the government want to take that responsibility, of course I shall lose perhaps $20,000 or $50,000 or $100,000. All right, I can stand that. If my hon. friend wants to be defeated in the next election I shall be willing to sit down right now and pass the bill en bloc.

Mr. BAKER: O. K.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, what does the hon. member who comes from Toronto care? He was never seasick in his life.

Mr. BAKER: I have travelled hundreds and thousands of miles on the sea and have never been seasick.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member must have had a good remedy for seasickness. He must have used Mothersill's. This is a serious matter. This bill contains 497 pages; it has been two years in the Senate and it embodies all the ideas of the Marine department. Of course I admit that the practical men in the Marine department were never consulted about it; the minister cannot deny that.

An hon. MEMBER: Are there any there?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, there is Captain Dixon. Was he consulted about this bill? Was Captain Robertson consulted about this bill? No.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Does my hon. friend know Captain Dixon appeared before the Senate committee and gave all his views on this bill?

Mr. DUFF: My information is that Captain Dixon was not consulted and that Captain Robertson, another practical man in my hon. friend's department, went before the Senate committee on the advice and at the instigation of one of the senators and was refused permission to give information and evidence.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. DUFF: I am not wrong. I am right.

Mr. DURANLEAU: He is misinformed.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I would like to direct the attention of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough to the fact that I represent a few fishermen in my riding and I took the opportunity to go before the committee of the upper house. I was there afforded a wonderful hearing and was enabled by their assistance, without the matter being fought on party lines, to have the bill amended in the interests of my fishermen. It seems to me that there is no cogency in the argument advanced this evening by the hon. member who has just spoken. I am only a junior member of this house while he has been here for many years. As I was interested in the fishermen of my riding I got into touch with the department; I learned that the bill was going through the upper house; I got into touch with the chairman; I was invited to appear before the committee of that body and they were very careful in regard to every provision of the legislation. The Senate is not a hundred miles from this House of Commons, and when any man says in this chamber that he had no opportunity to go before that body he is saying what is not true and is really convicting himself of a neglect of duty.

Mr. DUFF: Of course I do not mind my hon. friend saying that anything I have said is not true; that is only what I would expect from him. But I would like him to tell me what he did before the Senate committee, what clauses he got amended and what clauses that he advocated are in this bill?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I got clause 122, paragraph (b) amended, and I got the right of my fishermen to apply for licences to operate their vessels on the waters of lake Winnipeg. I was assisted in that by members of both parties in the upper house. While I am on my feet I want to thank the upper house for the consideration they gave me. I was also present when representatives of labour were there. I believe Captain Robertson's name was mentioned this evening. He sat beside me in the Senate committee.

Mr. VENIOT: Did he give evidence?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Representations were made by organizations from the western coast, from Vancouver and, in fact, the Senate committee was working on May 24 when most of us were away on a holiday. I cannot speak too highly of the businesslike way in which the bill was handled and the free invitation and opportunity given to everybody who wanted to appear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend not believe it is in this house that he ought to present the case of his electors?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I believe it is in either house when I am given an opportunity to present a case. As an advocate the ex-Minister of Justice ought to know that in any forum in which it is possible for him to appear he should take the opportunity to embrace that privilege.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those of us who were busy before committees could not go there.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend said that due to the fact that he went before another committee in another place he arranged with that committee that clause 122 should be as it appears in this bill. I am going to read clause 122 to show the committee—

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Paragraph (b).

Mr. DUFF: I know my hon. friend is a good member of the house and wants to do his duty by his constituency, but listen to this: this is clause 122, subclause 1:

The minister upon the report of an examiner of masters and mates—

Are there any on Lake Winnipeg?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Yes, quite a few. Lake Winnipeg is larger than lake Ontario.

Mr. DUFF: I will ask the Prime Minister: Are there any masters on lake Winnipeg?

Mr. BENNETT: There are masters of steamers on lake Winnipeg anyway.

Mr. DUFF: The right hon. member means tugboats.

Mr. BENNETT: No, passenger boats.

Mr. DUFF: All right—of small tonnage.

The minister upon the report of an examiner of masters and mates, and upon payment of a fee of five dollars, may grant a temporary certificate as master to an applicant sufficiently qualified by his knowledge and experience to take charge of—(a) a steamship——of not more than twenty tons gross tonnage.

Listen to this, Mr. Prime Minister:

Is that a steamship? Would he like to cross the Atlantic in one? Would he like to go to the orient in one? Would he like to go anywhere in a steamship of twenty tons gross tonnage?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a ship plying in minor waters.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, perhaps it is minor, but the Prime Minister butted into this thing; he butts in when he should allow the Minister of Marine to deal with the matter.

(a) a steamship of not more than twenty tons gross tonnage, and certificated to carry not more than twelve passengers, plying within specified limits on the minor waters of Canada.

(b) A steamship of not more than thirty-five tons gross tonnage employed in fishing operations—

Listen to this:

—(including the carrying of fishermen, their wives and children, and fish and fishing supplies used in connection with their operations) plying within specified limits on the inland waters of Canada.

2. The certificate shall describe such steamship and limits. It may be issued for any term not exceeding one year, but may be suspended or cancelled for cause by the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all on the statute now.

Mr. DUFF: I am reading the statute or the bill. The hon. member for Selkirk said that he did something in the Senate. I would like to know what he did. Will the hon. member please tell us—and perhaps the Prime Minister will elaborate on this—what happened in the Senate in regard to this clause.

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to make only a very few observations, but I should like to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that this bill is a codification of existing legislation with such additional clauses as changed conditions between the enactment of the original legislation and its modifications and to-day make necessary. I hear hon. gentlemen talk about the schedules. There are 272 pages of the bill. The first schedule represents the agreement reached at the international Geneva conference which was signed by the late Albert Thomas, director of the International Labour Office, and the late Lord Burnham. That is a matter to which this country gave its approval. The third schedule is the convention concerning the repatriation of seamen, and that too is an international agreement which this country has accepted. This was done in July, 1926, while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. It is signed by Lord Burnham and Mr. Thomas, late director of the International Labour office, at Geneva. Those two schedules, to both of which this country became a party in July, 1926, are embodied in this bill in accordance with the understanding arrived at that the bill was to contain those provisions.

Then we pass to the fourth schedule which was accepted in 1929 while hon. gentlemen opposite were still in power and Canada was represented, as will be found at page 290, as follows:

The government of Canada:
Mr. Alexander Johnston, Deputy Minister of Marine.
Mr. Lucien Pacaud, secretary in the office of the Canadian High Commissioner in London.

That is the fourth schedule, and it was ratified by parliament last year or the year before.

Mr. VENIOT: Put into effect.

Mr. BENNETT: It was ratified; it became binding on this dominion. All the clauses do not become effective until the shipping bill is passed. If hon. members follow through the pages they will find all these matters that the house has already ratified or dealt with are in schedule 4. The articles in that schedule number in all sixty-six and the signatures are on pages 324 and 325, our country's signatures being those of Mr. Johnston and Mr. Pacaud.

Then we come to the regulations issued under that schedule. All these regulations are matters that this house considered and accepted. They are in their very nature technical; they represent an international understanding or agreement. They are not matters that we are enacting for the first time, but they represent, as I have said, an accord or understanding reached between the various countries. For instance, there are the questions of safety at sea and matters of that kind, the form of certificates that are to be issued. On page 373 will be found the second annex dealing with collisions at sea.

Mr. DUFF: Are these not part of this measure?

Mr. BENNETT: All that has already been accepted by this house.

Mr. DUFF: Are they not part of this measure?

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact the sound signals and matters of that kind are also dealt with in this article. Then you come to the fifth schedule, page 389. In that instance the government of Canada was represented again by Alexander Johnston, deputy minister of Marine. The convention was arrived at in 1930; some hon. members will recall the circumstances in which it was dealt with. That is the load line convention. This house accepted these regulations as international arrangements for the safety of those who travel at sea.

Therefore from page 272 to the end there is nothing that this house has not already accepted. As a matter of fact we are bound internationally by it. Some of the arrangements were made by former administrations, in fact I think it is only fair to say practically all of them; but the regulations were made in part by this administration, as was the duty of this government after they had been agreed to by our representatives. My memory is that the load line convention was agreed to only last year or two years ago.

Now we come to the main part of the bill. It is needless to say that the shipping bill that is the common property of all British peoples was the original shipping act enacted at Westminster. Our shipping act came at a later time and was a modification of that act to the extent necessary to meet our changed conditions. Then when the statute of Westminster was agreed upon, before it had been enacted in fact, in 1926 my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) the Under Secretary for External Affairs, and others including Mr. Read, the counsel of the Department of External Affairs, and Mr. Burchell, of Halifax, met in London and arrived at certain conclusions affecting shipping and other matters. In 1931 the statute of Westminster was enacted. Then it became essential that we should deal with our own shipping act. We did so. It stood. It was considered in the Senate. It stood over. Again it was introduced in the early part of this session and was considered with great attention and care. Now what is it? In the main it is a codification of existing legislation, modified by the circumstances to which I have briefly referred. Take the section we are now dealing with, definitions. Is it meet and seemly that this House of Commons should be listening to what we have listened to with respect to this section? This section in the main, with one or two exceptions, has been in force in this country ever since we have had a shipping law.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the right hon. gentleman give the sections that have been changed?

Mr. BENNETT: They are shown in the bill. I am just coming to that. In order that there might be no difficulty in dealing with this matter we have asked that the origin of the sections should be indicated on the page opposite the printed text. It will be found that in respect to the first section, for instance, attention is directed to the fact that that is section 1, chapter 186, of the revised statutes of Canada.

Now an hon. member has suggested that I have not read the bill. Those of us who attended Dalhousie university will remember the lectures on shipping given by the late Mr. Justice Newcombe, in which we learned that the foundation and basis of Canadian shipping law was the Merchant Shipping Act subsequently embodied in chapter 186 of the revised statutes of Canada.

Mr. DUFF: That is twenty years ago.

Mr. NEILL: Section 1 deals only with the title.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, but what I am pointing out is that the definitions have to be modified by reason of changed conditions.

Mr. NEILL: And the reference is not given on the opposite page.

Mr. BENNETT: No, because you could not give a reference to all the definitions; you would have to travel over a very wide radius.

Mr. VENIOT: May I interrupt?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. VENIOT: In this section there is nothing given on the opposite page to show its origin.

Mr. BENNETT: No, because as I pointed out these are modifications of existing definitions that run through all these acts. In the very nature of things a definitive section can never be said to be already in existence.

Mr. VENIOT: My strongest objection is to some of these definitions.

Mr. DUFF: You are going back to the mid-Victorian era.

Mr. BENNETT: As I said this afternoon, if there is any difficulty in determining whether a definition is adequate, all that has to be done is for hon. gentlemen to say so and that subsection can stand until we have further opportunity to consider it.

That is with regard to the definitions. Now let us commence at part I, of which several of the sections are new. In the very nature of things that must be so, because the changed legislative conditions that have been brought about by our change in status necessitated somewhat different language being employed. Then you have the Merchant Shipping Act, upon which we drew liberally. As everyone knows the effort is to have uniform shipping acts throughout the British Empire, so far as that may be possible.

Mr. DUFF: It cannot be done.

Mr. BENNETT: The provisions are given from which these sections are drawn; you have in every instance a statement of what is new, and if there is any difficulty it is only necessary to state what the difficulty is and it will be dealt with. That is the position. I think in all there are about seventy sections either wholly or partially new, but the arrangement of the sections of course is entirely different in many instances to what it was before, and the grouping and consolidation of sections has been brought about in a manner that it is believed is an improvement as compared with conditions that did exist.

There is nothing difficult or abstruse about this bill except with respect to those matters about which there may be honest differences of opinion. I am not given to suggesting what other men may or may not have done, whether they may or may not have read particular statutes. It is easy to read and not understand; it is easy to read and not be capable of understanding, and there are complicated matters of law—

Mr. DUFF: That means me.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not suggesting that it has reference to anyone; I am merely pointing out the fact. Some of these sections have been the subject matter of litigation, and presumably some of them will continue to be such. As I have said, it may be found that there are some differences of opinion with respect to the new sections, but if there are such differences we shall endeavour to meet the will of the committee in every reasonable way. If arguments are adduced that indicate there should be some changes made, those changes will be made. To use language that has been used already, the effort is not being made to jam through legislation; rather we are endeavouring to discharge a duty which we owe to the other dominions as well as to ourselves, to get this legislation as perfect as possible in order that there may be some degree of uniformity in shipping legislation having to do with ships that are protected at sea under the British flag. That is the position we are endeavouring to establish. I use the words "British flag" in their broad sense. It may be the mercantile flag of Canada in one case, the flag of the United Kingdom in another, the flag of Australia or of New Zealand in still another.

I do suggest to the committee that it is hardly consonant with our idea of parliament to be talking about sections that we have not yet reached and to be denouncing definitions we have not yet considered. We must remember that parliament has already passed some two hundred pages of this legislation in the form of conventions in respect to which we sent our representatives to the nations of the world to sign the name of Canada. This parliament subsequently approved those conventions, and we are now endeavouring to give effect to our international word of honour. That is the position.

Mr. DUFF: The Prime Minister admitted that there were seventy sections in this bill which the committee should consider. I am very much afraid that the Prime Minister is back not in the mid-Victorian regime but in the Dalhousie regime of thirty years ago, and that is where the Department of Marine is. This bill is based on a bill which was passed in this country in 1906. The Minister of Marine and the officials who drafted this bill did not know anything about conditions as they are to-day or they never would have included certain clauses that appear in the bill. I can understand, of course, the Prime Minister realizing and appreciating the fact that in the interests of the empire and of everybody else we should try to pass a shipping bill. No one objects to that. I think my right hon. friend will say this much for me, that I am as anxious as he is to have a proper shipping bill in this country, but the trouble is with his Department of Marine.

In this bill we have many clauses from the Merchant Shipping Act of Great Britain, which are not applicable to Canada, together with the old clauses of the 1906 bill, which are twenty years behind the times. Who drew this bill? What man in Canada who knows shipping as it is to-day helped to draft this bill? Will the Minister of Marine tell me that? Is there any man who knows what the shipping business means to this country who helped draft this bill? The Minister of Marine cannot answer that question. I say this bill is a conglomeration, a composite of the Merchant Shipping Act of Great Britain and a bill we had in this country twenty years ago. The Minister of Marine must get up to date. In addition to the seventy clauses the Prime Minister admitted were wrong, which must be amended—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not admit that anything was wrong. The hon. gentleman surely must have heard what I said.

Mr. DUFF: I did.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. DUFF: Did not the Prime Minister say there were seventy clauses which might be amended?

Mr. BENNETT: It is open to this committee to amend any clause. I said there were seventy clauses wholly or partially new. The clauses wholly and partially new number about seventy. I am not pretending to give the figure exactly; it may be more or less by two or three, but I think there are thirty-seven of one and thirty-three of the other. It is competent for this committee, of course, to amend them all, but I did not admit that any was wrong. If I had thought so I would have said so at once. I know of none that is wrong.

Mr. DUFF: Well, the Prime Minister is agreeing with me, except that we do not use the same language. All I said was that all the clauses, except the seventy, were passed in this house in 1906, which was twenty-eight years ago. Surely the Prime Minister must realize that conditions in this country have changed in twenty-eight years. It is all right for somebody down in the marine department who has handled lumber over in Hull or someone who knows nothing about shipping to say that this legislation is all right. They never consulted any man interested in shipping, to have him appear before the Senate committee. I know the Prime Minister, who is interested in this country, will never get up and say that this bill, this monstrosity covering 497 pages, should pass this parliament without the people who are interested in it having something to say about it. Has the Minister of Marine given us any reason why this bill should pass? He has not. He read from a telegram from some association in Levis, Quebec. What do they know about this bill? Has the minister consulted the mariners of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick? Has he consulted the captains or mates of Quebec? Has he heard from them? Has he heard from the mariners on the Pacific coast or on the great lakes? He has not, yet here is a bill which took two and a half years in another place. And here is what they got—497 pages of nothing; that is what it is—nothing. They bring it down here on the eighth day of June and, as the Minister of Marine has said, they expect me to read this bill on a Sunday morning, when I should go to the Presbyterian church.

Mr. MANION: Do you go to church?

Mr. DUFF: I say to the Minister of Marine that the bill is not fair to the Canadian people. Let him send it to the board of trade of Halifax; let him send it to the board of trade of Yarmouth; let him send it to the board of trade of Lunenburg, or to the board of trade of any other part of the country—Montreal, Quebec, Prince Rupert, or anywhere else; let him send it to those boards of trade; let him ask what they think of this conglomerate bill which does not mean anything, and which will put every mariner who now sails a ship out of business and out on the beach. Is that the object of the bill? Surely the Prime Minister does not wish to do that. With all his faults—and I admit that he has not many—he surely does not want to put the fishermen sailing boats over five tons out on the beach. Does he wish to say to a man who without a certificate has sailed a vessel for the last thirty or forty years, "You cannot sail this vessel any more"? If that man does not sail her, who will sail her? Will the Prime Minister go down and take charge of her? I think quite possibly he could pass the eye test—I know I could not, and the skipper could not. Surely the Prime Minister does not wish to have that condition.

I say this bill could very well stand over until next year, and if at that time the mariners, captains, mates and sailors say there is nothing wrong with it, and if the boards of trade say it is all right, I will be the first man to get up in my place and say, "Mr. Minister of Marine, we will pass this bill in bulk," just as the Senate did, in three minutes. But no one knows what the Senate did with the bill. The only hon. gentleman in this house who had the courtesy to consult me in the matter was the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren). There are several ministers interested in the bill, but the only man who consulted me was the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and he communicated with me through one of his officials. The official consulted me concerning chapter 5, and for several hours we discussed the clauses in that chapter. Speaking modestly may I say it would appear that either the minister of his official had some influence with the committee which sat in another place because I find every suggestion I made is included in chapter 5 of the bill. I wish to congratulate the Minister of Pensions and National Health and to thank him for his courtesy and decency in the matter, because he was the only minister who did so. Of course I admit I do not know much about marine matters, not half as much as people think I know, but the Minister of Pensions and National Health thought I knew something, and as a result he had courtesy enough to consult me. Why did not the Minister of Marine or his officials consult me? Why did they not consult the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), or other hon. members?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Or Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, or the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain). The only minister who had decency enough to consult anybody on this side of the house was the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

I say there is only one proper way in which to deal with the bill: Let the boards of trade of Halifax, Vancouver, Quebec and Montreal have a chance to read it, and if they say they want the fishermen and sailors to be thrown on the beach, then I can stand it as long as the Prime Minister or any other member of his cabinet can stand it.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. VENIOT: No, it is not carried. Let me say to the Prime Minister that I am not opposing the enactments approved by this parliament and based on international conventions. On page 273 and following in this enormous bill, schedules are included which, so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly satisfied should be adopted. But I am opposing any hasty decisions on those very conditions the Prime Minister has indicated, namely changes brought about through changed conditions. Every hon. member knows that conditions have changed, and in so far as the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast is concerned they have changed to a very great degree. Upon the introduction of this bill changes have been made to the original act under which Canadian shipping has operated for the last twenty-five years, and changes which are extremely detrimental to the present conditions of fisheries in the maritime provinces. I speak about the maritime provinces, because I know whereof I speak, and I am prepared to stand behind anything I say in regard to the conditions under which our fishermen operate, and the conditions necessary for their future welfare.

The hon. member for Selkirk has said he went before the Senate committee and obtained certain amendments. He has stated specifically that an amendment was made to section 122 of the Canada Shipping Act. So as to show the injustice and discrimination contained in the bill against the fishermen on the Atlantic coast I intend to quote the amendment the hon. member has indicated. He may say, "You had the same opportunity as I had to appear before the Senate committee." Mr. Chairman, my reply to that is that I was elected to represent my constituents not in the parliament of Canada but in the House of Commons of Canada, and I am stating that this bill should have been brought down in the House of Commons, the place where the people's representatives would be in a position to place the bill before a committee, such as the one which operated in another place, and upon which such occasion we would have had an opportunity to look into the legislation and to ascertain whether or not amendments were necessary. Then, if that reason is not sufficient, may I say that personally I was not physically able to appear before the Senate or any other committee at that time. However, had I been informed of the injustices contained in the bill I believe I should have come to the conclusion that an attempt should have been made on my part to appear.

To show the injustice of the action taken by another chamber in the construction of the bill, what do I find? I find that they amended section 122 so as to give special privileges to the fishermen of lake Winnipeg, privileges which should exist for the fishermen on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Is there not a vast difference between the conditions existing in connection with fishermen on the inland lakes, and those on the sea?

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. I could indicate to the hon. member exactly the same conditions on the Atlantic coast as he claims exist on the inland lakes. Further, I could give a reason why the privileges the hon. gentleman obtained for the inland lakes should exist to a greater degree on the Atlantic coast.

I find that paragraph (b) of section 122 in the bill is as follows:

> A steamship of not more than 35 tons gross tonnage employed in fishing operations (including the carrying of fishermen, their wives and children, and fish and fishing supplies used in connection with their operations) plying within specified limits on the inland waters of Canada.

To these steamships certificates may be granted. Does the hon. member for Selkirk mean to tell me that in certain sections of the Atlantic coast we do not require those conditions? What about the islands along the coast? What about carrying our women folk, as is done on the lakes under special privileges, to the lobster factories to help their husbands in carrying on their vocation? What about the carrying of our fishermen in the inland bays and rivers? Our rivers are inland waters just the same as lake Winnipeg and they occupy the same position under this bill. Yet we are not granted that privilege. There is discrimination there. The hon. gentleman was able to go before the committee of the other chamber and have inserted that discrimination against the maritimes. I do not say that he had that in view; I think he had a broader view than that.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Is there anything wrong with the provision? Does not the hon. member want the same provision?

Mr. VENIOT: I will answer that when we come to the section. I just want to show the carelessness with which this was considered by the other chamber when the amendment was before it. I may be called down for criticizing the other chamber but I am referring to the committee and I think I am within my rights. When this amendment was suggested to that committee they should have looked over the situation as it affected other waters of the dominion. They should have called in those who had knowledge of the conditions in those other waters which are not inland waters. In that way they would have avoided what I consider to be grave injustice and discrimination against the fishing interests of the maritime provinces. This afternoon the Prime Minister said that I should consider it my duty to represent the whole of Canada when I was in this house. What about the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt)? He so far forgot his duty to the rest of Canada that he went there and had parochial legislation adopted by the Senate committee.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I object to that statement, and I think it ought to be withdrawn. This amendment applies to all inland waters of Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, but it does not apply to the fishing waters of Canada.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Why were not you there? Your whole argument is that I obtained what you wanted to obtain.

Mr. VENIOT: What does the hon. member for Selkirk know of the Atlantic or the Pacific? Does he know anything about lake fishing? I doubt it. Did he ever catch a trout or a fish in any of the lakes—or a bullfrog?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I have not got a monopoly of fish or fish stories like my hon. friend.

Mr. VENIOT: That is a fishy reply, and it is the only reply the hon. gentleman can make. I stated this afternoon that this bill could very well be left over for another session and that no interests would suffer. In stating that I am in good company. I am in the company of the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada. I am in the company of the Minister of Marine. I am in the company of the government of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are in bad company.

Mr. VENIOT: It may be bad, but I find myself compelled to be in that company for to-night. I hope it will not be for long.

Mr. BENNETT: It is mutual.

Mr. VENIOT: I am in the company of this very bill. This bill contains a clause which states that it may be put over. Section 719 reads:

> This act shall not come into force until a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette:—

That section gives the minister the power to proclaim only certain clauses and the remainder can be left over.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not the minister, the governor in council.

Mr. VENIOT: The section continues:

> —Provided that he may, in the same manner and from time to time, bring any portion or portions only of this act into force.

I am very sincere in fighting this bill. I feel in all conscience that I should oppose it for all I am worth. The suggestion was made this afternoon that the government would be prepared to accept amendments which we might suggest. While I know a great deal about the fishing industry I am not prepared to do that without consulting those whose first interest is in that industry. I want to lay this bill before them and discuss it with the men who go down to the sea in ships and who risk their lives night and day in the waters of the maritime provinces to earn a livelihood for themselves and their families and to bring untold wealth to the Dominion of Canada. I want to sit down with those men and go over this bill with them. I want to have their opinions on the effect of this and that clause. I want to come back to this house with that knowledge added to the knowledge I possess already and then suggest to the government what I think is necessary to be enacted to benefit the fishing interests of the Atlantic shores. I am not going to move an amendment to this bill. The government accepts full responsibility for putting it through, and I shall go back to my people and tell them what I did in this house and that the government with its strong majority would not listen to us and put this bill through in spite of us. I can play politics with the next man, and I have enough politics to play against this government without undertaking to use this bill. I consider it my duty to voice my opposition on behalf of my people to anything which will be detrimental to their interests. I come from a nautical family. My father was a sea captain, without a certificate in those days. I have learned from him and from those with whom I have been living for the last fifty years what is in the best interests of the fishermen of the country.

I should like the Prime Minister to listen carefully to a suggestion I intend to make. Under section 719 certain sections of this bill may be proclaimed by order in council. I suggest that the Prime Minister or the government or the Minister of Marine put through such sections of this act as are noncontentious and allow those which we consider to be contentious and detrimental to the people we represent to stand until next session. A bill could be brought in at next session amending the legislation of this year and including such sections as are necessary to help the fishermen whom we represent in this house. I hope the Prime Minister will consider that suggestion.

Mr. DUFF: I was hoping that either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Marine would see the reasonableness of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) but if we are going to consider section 2, although we have carried subsection 1 of section 2, I would like to ask the minister what subsection 1 really means. It says:

"The Admiralty" means the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom for the time being, or the commissioners for the time being for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom.

We are an independent nation, perhaps not a nation, but at all events an independent country; why should we be under the sovereignty of the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom? Why should the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom appear in this bill a shipping act of Canada?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend when reading the bill must have seen that the word "Admiralty" is mentioned in certain parts, so we had to define "Admiralty." That is all.

Mr. DUFF: That is not quite sufficient, Mr. Chairman. "Admiralty court" is defined in subsection 2. I can understand that, but what I am asking the minister is why this Dominion of Canada should be under the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom or the commissioners for the time being for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom. How does that come in, in this country? I can understand that there would be references to the Merchant Shipping Act of Great Britain, but as for the Lord High Admiral, we have none; I am the only admiral in this country. Why therefore does the Lord High Admiral appear in this bill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have already told my hon. friend that we refer to the Admiralty in certain parts of this bill and so in the definition section we define "the Admiralty." There is no harm in that.

Mr. DUFF: I do not say that there is any harm in it. I have not had a chance to study this bill, although the Lord knows I have done the best I could. Of course, I admit I am stupid, I admit I am slow, I admit I am ignorant, I admit it is impossible for me in my ordinary capacity to study a bill of 497 pages in four days despite the fact that after I came home from the Presbyterian church on Sunday morning I spent the rest of the day trying to wade through these 497 pages. I took the minister's advice, and although I did not go to high mass on Sunday morning I went to the eleven o'clock service at the Presbyterian church, and as soon as I got home I sat down with this bill. I am sure the Prime Minister will sympathize with me, because he is quite a religious man like myself, when I tell him that all I could get through on Sunday was seventy-four pages. The Prime Minister goes to Chalmers church and I go to Knox church, but I will bet dollars to doughnuts that the Prime Minister did not read this bill on Sunday like I did. He is too sincere: he does not believe in doing business on Sunday. But the Minister of Marine had asked us to read the bill over the week-end and so I waded through it and I got only as far as page 74. I have had the bill now for a week and the best I have been able to do was to get to page 74, section 174.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is more than half of the bill.

Mr. DUFF: No. There are 719 clauses. The minister has not read the bill. He has not looked at it. He does not know what it is all about. There are 719 sections—

Mr. DURANLEAU: Over 700 sections.

Mr. DUFF: I want to keep the minister right on this. He is trying to get this thing into his head but it is impossible because he does not know anything about marine matters. There are 497 pages in this bill and all I have got through so far is to page 74, in spite of the fact that I spent all Sunday till twelve o'clock at night reading this bill.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you have supper?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, a seventy-five cent supper at the Alexandra, after sticking at the bill from twelve to six o'clock and going over seventy-four pages.

I congratulate the minister on the fact that he has been able, as he has told us, to go through this bill, but I want to say to him that it is not fair to bring a bill of this importance and extent to parliament in the last days of the session and ask us to pass it in its present condition. The minister cannot show to this committee that any board of trade or any organization whether of seamen or of master mariners or of fishermen has asked that this bill should pass this session. It has taken the Senate two years to deal with this bill, and I am not reflecting at all on the other chamber in the eastern portion of this building. But why does the Prime Minister force the Minister of Marine to come here and ask that we pass the bill this session? Of course, if the Prime Minister and the government want to commit suicide, if they want to put this bill through, well and good.

Mr. JACOBS: Why should you object if they commit suicide?

Mr. DUFF: I would not like to see the Prime Minister commit suicide.

Mr. JACOBS: I mean politically.

Mr. DUFF: It is too serious. I am not playing politics in this thing at all. Let me refer to chapter 2, if I remember correctly. That chapter, I want to say to the Prime Minister, should be revised in its entirety. The trouble with the minister—not the minister; I should have said with his officials who advised him in this matter, and I apologize—the trouble with his officials is that they are twenty-five years behind the times. They are living in the mid-Victorian era or in the time of King Henry VIII.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend mentioned chapter 2. There is no chapter in the bill. Does he mean part II?

Mr. DUFF: That is splitting hairs, Mr. Chairman. The minister is sailing close to the wind for a man who is a lawyer in Montreal. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister could luff a little and tack on the other side.

Mr. BENNETT: He is proceeding under auxiliary power.

Mr. DUFF: Then he puts his sails down.

Mr. VENIOT: Or double reefs.

Mr. DUFF: The Minister of Marine should not talk that way to an old sea lawyer like myself from the maritime provinces. It is not right for a lawyer from an inland town like Montreal to criticize an old sea lawyer like myself for referring to chapter 2 instead of part II.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is because my hon. friend had not mentioned the section and I wanted to know to what part he referred.

Mr. DUFF: I appreciate my hon. friend's lack of knowledge with regard to this whole matter and am delighted he has drawn my attention to the fact. I am not saying this in a disparaging manner to my hon. friend because I realize he is placed in a very awkward position. For two years another part of this parliament has dealt with this matter and it has been forced on the Minister of Marine. If he and I got together for two or three hours, we could splice the main brace and discuss this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a good suggestion.

Mr. VENIOT: Wait till the sun gets over the foreyard arm.

Mr. DUFF: We might do that. Still, the Minister of Marine does not want to force on this country a bill which as drafted is a conglomerate measure, a bill which mixes up clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act of Great Britain with chapter 186 of the revised statutes of Canada. Surely he does not want to go down in history as the man who put a bill through this parliament just because we are here now on the twelfth day of June and because the measure was passed by the Senate which had no interest in it. There was not a man on the Senate committee who invited anybody there who knew anything about the bill. Who were the witnesses? Will the Minister of Marine tell me who came before that Senate committee? I am not deprecating the work of the right hon. leader of the Senate nor of any other member of the Senate, but I say to the Minister of Marine that the real shipping people, the fishermen, the mariners, the sailors of this country, the business men, never saw this bill, never had an opportunity to go before the Senate and have not an opportunity now to express their views in regard to the matter.

I have no political axe to grind in connection with this question. I was born with a fishbone in my mouth, born by the sea, brought up with fishermen, mariners, sailors. Surely the minister does not want to say that I am playing politics in regard to this, because I am not. I am a Grit, of course, and I am a free trader. I am opposed to this government but I am not opposed to this legislation because it is brought down by this government. I say that it is too serious a matter to deal with hastily; it is a business matter, one that affects practically every man, woman and child in Canada, that affects every sailor, every seaman, every master, every mate, every shipping interest and every business interest in this dominion, because under this measure they will be responsible for what they do in regard to every cargo that is loaded.

Let the boards of trade, masters and mates, seamen, come back here after they read this bill or send their representations and say whether it is a good one or not. If they say that it is all right, so far as I am concerned I shall accept it. In the last four days I have sent seventeen copies of this measure out to people in Nova Scotia. Will my hon. friend say that I have had any opportunity to receive replies? I sent seventeen copies to different parts of the maritime provinces and I want those people, whether the chamber of commerce of Yarmouth, or Halifax, or Lunenburg, or Canso, or Sydney, to give me their replies. I want the boards of trade of those towns to consult the captains, seamen and anybody else interested, and I say to the minister: Why force this bill through now? Nobody is asking for it. I say in all seriousness that in the last three months I have not had one word asking me to approve this or any shipping bill. The people concerned are quite satisfied with the old act because if this new legislation is put into force thousands of fishermen, thousands of sailors and, Mr. Chairman, hundreds in your own constituency of Cumberland, men who have sailed the seas for thirty, or twenty, or ten years, will be thrown on the beach. Is it fair that this party or this government or this parliament should say to the men of Cumberland, of Guysborough and of other places throughout Nova Scotia: You cannot sail your ships?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does that not break your heart, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, it does, because he knows I am right. Is it fair to men who have sailed the seas to Brazil, Hawaii, Rio de Janeiro, that they should be thrown on the beach through this stupid and foolish bill drawn by my hon. friend and by men who never saw salt water? The technical, practical men in the Department of Marine were never consulted about this bill. Who is there in the Senate who knows about the bay of Fundy, the Atlantic or the Pacific ocean? Yet not a practical man was consulted and I say in all seriousness: I do not care; I can stand this if the government can stand it, but heaven knows what is going to happen to them at the next election. If, however, they are going to put this bill through, I am satisfied; let them do it.

Mr. VENIOT: When talking a little while ago on the amendment made to section 112 of chapter 186 I forgot to point out that under the former act temporary certificates were permitted for vessels of less than ten tons, propelled by sail and auxiliary engine. Under this amendment in one instance that provision is extended to vessels of twenty tons and in another to vessels of thirty-five tons, for inland waters, whereas in the coastal service it is confined to vessels with auxiliaries of not over three horsepower; anything above that is classified as a steamer, and full certificates must be obtained for mates and masters. This applies to vessels in our fishing fleet having auxiliaries; although they are in one sense classified as sailing vessels, under this bill they become steamers when their auxiliary is over three horsepower. Yet on the inland lakes it extends to vessels of twenty and thirty-five tons, which require a great deal more than three horsepower auxiliaries to navigate them. They are given that privilege, but we on the Atlantic coast are discriminated against in that way.

Mr. NEILL: There is no doubt whatever that this bill is very much needed. Some of the penal sections of the present act are expressed in terms of pounds, shillings, and pence, which indicates its old origin. I think there was a bill drawn in 1908 or 1909, but for some reason which I have not been able to discover it never was brought into the house. It is perfectly true that members on this side including myself have been worrying the minister for years to introduce an amendment to the act. We have no quarrel with the idea that it is needed; it is only with the manner of its introduction that we find any fault.

Now, it is said that there are not many sections. Even taking the minister's own statement that there are only seventy new sections, that is a considerable bill. However it might not be so serious if it were one readily understood by ordinary members of parliament. But it is not; in some aspects it is highly technical and impossible to discuss intelligently on the floor of this house, and that is why I have always urged that it should be considered in a committee where technical men can come before us and we could have these questions explained. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) said that we should have gone and listened to the discussions in the Senate committee—

Mr. HACKETT: I said I attended them; I did not make any suggestion to others.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He was setting a good example.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member was not suggesting that he did wrong in going there; I think his suggestion was an open invitation to go and do likewise, as in the biblical example. I did not go myself; for one thing I did not know when the committee was sitting, and I have something else to do than attend committee meetings in another house; I have enough to do to attend our own. But I did attend another committee on another occasion when, as the hon. member said, I was treated courteously and heard patiently. I was allowed to make a statement, but I was not allowed to sit in and question witnesses or pass opinions. It would be indecorous; it is not done. But I did the next best thing, as I thought; I sent for the evidence taken before that special committee—it was referred to a special committee and a subcommittee. I sent for the evidence in order that I might inform myself as to the numerous witnesses who according to the minister had given substantial and worthy evidence. The answer was: there was no evidence; nothing had been printed. So how could we inform ourselves? I do not know that anyone gave evidence. I will take the minister's word that some did, but I do not know who they were; I do not know if they were making ex parte statements in their own interest or in the interest of the class they represent. I know nothing to guide me in deciding whether this bill is a suitable bill or not.

I think the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) would not take it amiss if I say that he is very strong on constitutional points. I wonder that he or someone has not taken up this constitutional point, that it does not become us to subordinate our rights of legislation to another chamber. Not that we should be jealous of our dignity, or touchy—not at all; but we should be jealous, and I propose to be, of the rights delegated to us by the people at the last election. They sent us here to represent them in passing legislation, not to accept legislation originating in another chamber, and swallow it holus-bolus and say that because it has received approval there we should just attach our signatures. That method was tried in the case of the railway bill a year ago, but we changed that bill in practically every detail. I think it is not the custom for the British House of Lords to introduce legislation of any substantial nature but to have it submitted with all formality to the House of Commons.

Mr. BENNETT: The rule is that legislation involving public expenditure originates in the Commons. Much important legislation has in times past originated in the Lords. Of the practice at the moment I cannot speak.

Mr. NEILL: Not of late years, I think; it has fallen into desuetude. Public opinion has insisted that the House of Commons is the responsible body, and I for one do not propose to subordinate its powers to any other chamber, however honourable or worthy it may be.

Then we were told that we should have read the bill. It is not impossible to read it, but that would not do us much good. I do not say this bill is wrong; I say I do not know, because there are many features of it on which I cannot form an opinion without technical advice, and there is none obtainable in this chamber. Here is a letter I received —true, it was a year ago—in connection with the bill very similar to this, then before the Senate. I sent it to the Canadian Association of Seamen in Vancouver. Here is part of their reply:

> For three weeks we have had a committee working steadily on each clause, and on rereading the amendments I am of the opinion that we have introduced one or two contradictory clauses, but to make our reading more easily understood, I am enclosing herewith a few comments relative to said amendments.

The few comments consist of four closely typewritten pages, and the original amendments that they suggest make thirty-two closely typewritten pages. They say that having their interests at heart they have had a committee steadily working on it for three weeks; yet we are going to railroad it through by just looking at it and someone reading out some word on the margin like "wharf" or "wreck" and so passing that particular section.

Then I have a letter this year submitting on three pages perhaps thirty suggestions, some of them of a very technical character. I read one the other night and I shall not repeat it, but it is not one on which we could form an estimate without having a technical man before us.

I come back to what I have been urging for the last two years; why not send it to a committee, not necessarily the marine committee, but to a special committee? I believe even yet it would be possible to do it, and in so doing it would get through a lot quicker than by trying to put it through this house in this manner. But the better way would be to leave it for another year and bring it down to the committee early in the session; then we would have the advantage of experience during the recess and could deal with it in an adequate way. My own view is that if the government decide to go on with it—the Prime Minister objects to the term "jamming it through," but I cannot think of any more appropriate term—if they decide to force it through, then I think my attitude should be to wash my hands of it and say that I cannot adequately advise, and the responsibility before the people must be theirs. It is absolutely certain that the bill is not perfect, from the complaints I have here and the number of clauses. I think the proper course would be not to lay ourselves open to the charge of obstructing—we do not want to do that—but simply to say "your blood be on your own head" as far as results are concerned.

Mr. REID: Just after eight o'clock I asked the Minister of Marine whether any personal representations had been made by the Canadian Association of Seamen. My reason for asking that is that the bill has, I believe, 131 clauses pertaining to seamen alone. The greater part of this deals with the very life of the seaman, his property, what happens to him if he gets sick, his wages, his dismissal, what is done if he gets stranded on a foreign shore, his certificate of competency, and everything pertaining to his life on the ship and off it.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. REID: It touches the very life of the seaman, yet no personal representations were made on his behalf in the Senate.

Mr. DUFF: Not one.

Mr. REID: I shall not say they would not have been allowed, but they were not represented when it was before the Senate committee. I must object also to the implication or even the suggestion that a member is derelict in his duty because he does not appear before a Senate committee. I think that would be a bad precedent, especially during this session when there were so many committees in operation. But referring to those 131 sections I doubt if there is any man in this house in a position to know all the conditions affecting seamen. Now that the bill is being put into a new form it should not only be brought up to date but the seamen should be represented before the committee dealing with these matters.

Mr. BENNETT: All those sections were there before.

Mr. REID: I quite agree, and I am glad the Prime Minister mentioned that. One of the complaints made by the seamen was that it was very difficult to get amendments made to the old act. It has been stated that the bill has been copied. That being so it is behind the times. If one looks through the bill he will find the term "steamship," alone used, as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) suggested, but the change to motor power has been omitted. That alone shows that the bill needs revision.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Carried?

Mr. DUFF: No, it is not going to carry.

Mr. BENNETT: By the definition, "steamship" covers a motor ship.

Mr. DUFF: That is the trouble. The government does not seem to realize that a motor boat should not be classed as a steamer. A moment ago I asked the minister why subsection 1 of section 2 should be in this bill. Why should the Admiralty or the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom appear in this bill?

Mr. BENNETT: May I answer that question?

Mr. DUFF: Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: The Admiralty is referred to in this bill, and the definition of the word is the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom for the time being, or the commissioners for the time being for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom. If you have any word to which a meaning attaches in the statute it is desirable to define what that meaning is, according to the country which has that word in its statutes for expressing a given meaning. The meaning assigned to this word is the meaning assigned to it under the laws of Great Britain, and when it is used here it has that meaning.

Mr. DUFF: I quite understand that definition, but I want to know why that should appear in a Canadian statute and where those words are used in the 497 pages of the bill. I have gone through only 74 pages, but I cannot find any reference to the Lord High Admiral —unless it is myself—of the United Kingdom for the time being or the commissioners for the time being for executing the office of Lord High Admiral. I can understand, of course, that we look after our own affairs, that we are daughter in our mother's house but mistress in our own. Is that the correct quotation?

Mr. BENNETT: It is.

Mr. DUFF: I am a great Britisher; I believe only one flag should fly over the empire, but in a Canadian shipping bill why should this subsection be inserted in the definitions when, in the 74 pages I have examined, I can find no reference to the Lord High Admiral, whether it is Winston Churchill or someone else, or the commissioners for the time being for executing the office? I want to know from the minister why that definition is there when no reference is made to the Lord High Admiral in the 497 pages of the bill, as far as I can tell.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend does not affirm that there is no mention of the Admiralty in the whole bill?

Mr. DUFF: I did not say that. That shows conclusively that the minister is more at sea than I am; in fact he is in heavy weather. I am sailing along with all sails set, with the gaff topsails and the balloon jib and everything else going. The minister has his sails reefed.

Mr. BENNETT: Why don't you drop your sea anchor?

Mr. DUFF: Not while the ship is under sail. You only drop the anchor when you are getting near the breakers or the shore. The Prime Minister should tell the Minister of Marine to drop his anchor.

Mr. BENNETT: I said your sea anchor; there is a great difference.

Mr. DUFF: It is used only in a gale of wind—

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point.

Mr. DUFF: —when you put your anchor out to keep your head in the wind. The Prime Minister and I are going to get seasick if we continue this discussion.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): The Prime Minister means to heave to.

Mr. DUFF: That is not heaving to. My hon. friend is a lawyer; for heaven's sake don't let us get into an argument. You heave to with only your foresail set. You are jogging to windward when you pull your jib to windward.

I want to know why subsection 1 appears in this bill. The minister says he has read the bill; he says he did not go to mass on Sunday because he was studying the bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend is joking. I never said any such thing.

Mr. DUFF: At any rate the minister said he did not go to mass last Sunday. Will he tell me why subsection 1 of section 2 is included in this bill, when we are in a free country and we are talking about a Canadian statute? I could understand it if the government wanted to give me a higher title than I have already and call me the lord high admiral instead of just admiral. I would be satisfied; I would take the title whether it came on the king's birthday or at any other time. But where does that appear in this bill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Has my hon. friend any objection to that definition?

Mr. DUFF: I am asking for an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): This subsection has been carried. It is the only one that has been carried, and it seems to me this discussion is out of order.

Mr. DUFF: We had an understanding the other night with the Minister of Finance, who is a very good friend of mine, that we would pass that subsection in order that the business of the house might go on, with the understanding that when the bill came up—if it did, because we hoped that the Minister of Finance would have sufficient influence, being a sailor from the maritime provinces and knowing the shipping business as he does, to see that it did not come up until next session—we would have an opportunity to discuss anything we desired. Since the bill has come up I should like to ask why this subsection appears in the bill. Where is it referred to? The minister says he has read and understands the bill. Surely as a matter of courtesy it would be very simple for him to tell me where this subsection is referred to in any other part of this terrible bill which on account of its bulk I can hardly hold in my hand.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When my hon. friend arrives at the section he will see where the Admiralty is mentioned.

Mr. DUFF: The Admiralty is mentioned in subsection 2. I understand what an admiralty court means, of course, because I have been before it half a dozen times. I should like to know why the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom should interfere in Canadian shipping.

Mr. BENNETT: He does not; it is a definition of the word.

Mr. DUFF: Surely it means something; if it does not it should not be there. I want the minister to tell me what it means and where it applies in the 497 pages of this bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That subsection was carried on Friday last, and my hon. friend is too inquisitive to let this subsection go without discussion this evening. When we started to discuss this bill in committee I began with section 1. Hon. gentlemen opposite objected, because that was the only section that would allow them to say anything at all on the bill. So I left that section aside and began with section 2, subsection 1, which was adopted without any reservation whatever.

Mr. JACOBS: What are we discussing?

Mr. DURANLEAU: At the beginning the chairman of the committee stated that the hon. gentleman was absolutely out of order in the discussion he has been carrying on this evening.

Mr. JACOBS: He has been out of order for an hour and a half; I think he should see the Minister of Health again.

Mr. DUFF: I am afraid the Minister of Marine is losing his temper. I am trying to be as respectful to him and to the government as I can be. I believe the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine should agree with me when I say we allowed the second reading of the bill. Then, I was prepared to consent to the carrying of clause 1, but the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) thought the clause should not be passed, and with the consent of the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Finance we went on with clause 2. We passed subsection 1 of section 2 merely as a matter of courtesy to the government and to the minister. Surely it does not lie in the mouth of the Minister of Marine to say that I am inquisitive. I am not inquisitive; I say that the minister does not know where in these 497 pages to find the words "Lord High Admiral," and he cannot indicate a reference to any such person. When he knows he cannot make such reference, and when he knows that the definition means nothing, he should be more courteous. We have before us a bill which affects Canadian shipping, and as is well known this country has no lord high admiral, and it has no commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom. Why should that subsection be in the bill? The fact that it is in the bill shows conclusively that the minister and the officials who drafted the bill, the gentlemen responsible for it, did not give it sufficient and careful attention. I say that subsection 1 should be expunged from the bill, and I suggest that the minister is not acting wisely when he states that I am too inquisitive. I have too much interest in the bill to be accused in that way. I suggest he has no justification for saying I am inquisitive because I want to know where, in these 497 pages, there is any reference to the Lord High Admiral. The minister states he has read the bill and that he knows all about it. Certainly the officials sitting near him should know something about it. Let him tell me where the Lord High Admiral comes into this Canadian shipping legislation. Will the minister tell me the page, the clause or appendix? He cannot tell me, and yet he says that I am too inquisitive.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The ruling of the chair is that this subsection has passed. If by unanimous consent the house wishes to go back and discuss the paragraph, I have no objection. My record shows however that the subsection has been passed.

Mr. DUFF: Is there a lord high admiral in Cumberland county?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): We must interpret the words "the Admiralty" by the definition appearing in the subsection. The hon. member is simply asking why the words appear.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the subsection carry?

Mr. DUFF: Apparently the Minister of Marine cannot find any place where subsection 1 refers to the bill under discussion. I am surprised that to-night the Minister of Marine takes a different attitude from the one he took on Friday night, upon which occasion we had a very agreeable discussion in which the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Finance, who is now leaving the chamber, took part. On Friday evening I referred in a joking manner to this particular subsection, and I thought the Minister of Finance understood the joke. Then, following my remark I find that at page 3825 the Minister of Finance is reported as follows:

> The suggestion of the lord high admiral of the opposition is entirely acceptable. I can assure my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that there was no idea in the mind of the government to take any advantage, either technical or otherwise, in calling the first section of the bill. I submit that the rights of the house and the committee are preserved in precisely the same manner whether the section is passed or not passed, but I accept without question the suggestion of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The Minister of Finance mentioned section 1.

Mr. DUFF: We were discussing the advisability of helping the government to go on with this legislation, and we agreed to pass the second reading and to go into committee. I think the Minister of Finance will agree with me that there were no strings on what we did. We took the action which is taken in many other instances, whether they be public works measures, or anything else, whereby for the sake of convenience to the government the opposition allows a section to pass, with the understanding that the section may be reopened or discussed when the bill comes up again.

All I am asking the minister is this, and if he cannot answer me, I merely wish him to say so: Why in a bill introduced to this parliament of Canada, a free country which can pass its own legislation, should we include such definitions? It would seem to indicate that the advisers of the minister and of the Senate, those high priced lawyers from Vancouver and the other place, did not know what the bill meant, when they included subsection 1 of section 2 in its provisions. Of course, it was a matter of $100 a day or nothing. It was an easy matter to take the Merchant Shipping Act of Great Britain, it was an easy matter to take the statutes of Canada, and to make a composite act.

Mr. HANBURY: And to take a pair of scissors and a bottle of paste.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, a pair of scissors and a paste brush. That was a very easy matter for $100 a day. The Minister of Marine knows very well that that is what happened. I am not reflecting upon what took place in the southeast corner of this building. I am not objecting to a Tory getting a good job when this government is in power. If I were in power again I would get good jobs for my friends, if I could. I say to the minister that he should not accept a bill affecting the rights, property and business of seamen, sailors, captains, mates and property owners, which came only five days ago from another corner of this building, and then bring it into this chamber and expect us to pass the bill without consulting our constituents, the people in Canada, the boards of trade or the shipping interests. I allowed subsection 1 to pass and hon. members on this side of the house allowed it to pass merely as a matter of courtesy to the government and to my good friend the Minister of Finance. Surely you, sir, or the Minister of Marine should not now say that I should not object to subsection 1 because upon another occasion I thought the words might be used in the bill. However, since that time I have tried to go through the bill; as I say I spent Sunday—and I know as a good Presbyterian I should not have done it—from one o'clock in the afternoon until twelve o'clock at night in a perusal of the bill. I accepted the advice offered by the Prime Minister. I got up in the morning, and after going to church studied the bill from one o'clock until twelve o'clock at night—and I don't know what my wife will say when she hears about it. I did that, and I am serious when I say to hon. members opposite that I have no political axe to grind in opposing the measure. This bill means the livelihood of men with whom I have been associated for the last forty years. Is the Minister of Marine going to say that he will force this bill through? Will the Prime Minister say that, after the promises and the fine speeches he made in the maritime provinces when he was down there in 1930? How will he face them in October, or some time this fall when he calls an election? Can he face the fishermen and the masters, mates, etc., who will be thrown out on the beach, and out of employment? I am just as serious as I possibly can be in this matter. I would not be standing here attacking this bill if I was not serious. I do not object to the Senate sending us this bill as it now is; they did the best they could. I contend that the boards of trade and the shipping interests, the business interests, the fishermen, the seamen, the sailors and the master mariners who are affected by this bill, should be heard. The Minister of National Health was the only member of the government who showed me the courtesy of consulting me. He consulted with me in reference to the poor devils who have to go to hospitals. This is an important bill as it affects not only captains and mates, but seamen, engineers, fishermen, pilots and everyone else. I say to the Minister of Marine: Let us let this bill stand over. No one will be hurt. I am sure the minister will agree with me that if there was any desire that this bill should be passed, I would have heard something about it. Could I afford to stand up here and oppose the passing of this bill if I had received petitions or letters from the shipping interests of this country asking that it be passed? Certainly I could not. Of course, the joke is that I do not know as much about shipping as people think I do, but I do not want to lose that reputation. I have not received one word asking that this bill be passed. No one has seen it. It is all right for someone whom nobody knows to come here from somewhere, but I think my hon. friend must admit that no really practical men appeared before the Senate committee. The only ones who appeared were those who wanted some special privileges. My hon. friend knows that the people interested in shipping on the great lakes are opposed to certain sections of this bill. I am not opposed to those sections personally, but as a man who has some interest in the shipping of this country, I feel I must oppose them. I opposed a bill when the Liberal party was in power some twelve or fifteen years ago, and it was held over. This bill was opposed last year; it was never proclaimed because the Prime Minister realized—he will pardon me for saying this—that the bill was not practical. The bill which I opposed some twelve or fifteen years ago when the Liberal party was in power did not do any good to my party.

I am serious in this. I say to the Prime Minister, I say to the government and I say to the Minister of Marine: Nobody will be hurt by letting this bill stand until next session. As I said a moment ago, I have sent seventeen copies of this conglomerate bill to my friends but it will take them at least two months to study it properly. Let us let this thing go over until next year. I say to the Minister of Marine and to the Prime Minister: Surely there are certain interests in this country which should be protected. There is no necessity to pass this and we cannot pass it. I cannot afford to stand here and let this thing go through as it is unless I am willing to let the government and the Prime Minister take the responsibility. The Minister of Trade and Commerce cut out the subsidies for steamers and many of these men have had to go on sailing vessels. Now the captains of such vessels of over five tons having auxiliary power must have certificates. These men cannot get certificates. I shall not give the reasons why just now, but I will if we are forced to deal with chapter 2. I am not playing politics in this, I am talking for the shipping and business interests of this country. I am not objecting to what the Senate did; I am not objecting to the government putting this bill in the Senate; all I am saying is that the fishermen, the sailors, the pilots, the seamen and everyone else should have a chance to look at this bill. They should have an opportunity to discuss this matter with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Stanley), the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall), the hon. member for Cape Breton-North Victoria (Mr. Johnstone) and the hon. members from Vancouver. I am as much interested as anybody in seeing that the regulations for the safety of shipping at sea are carried out, but I ask that this bill be allowed to stand over so that those who are interested may be heard before next session. If there is no objection by next session, I will be ready to put this bill through in the shortest possible time.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to say a word with regard to what the Prime Minister said in connection with uniformity of legislation. He spoke of the necessity for having this legislation in order to promote uniformity among the dominions. As he correctly said, the history of this legislation is that in 1929 there was a conference on dominion shipping legislation and merchant shipping legislation. The result of that conference was a report which was presented to the imperial conference of 1930. That report recommended an agreement on uniform shipping legislation throughout the empire and an agreement was arrived at and was approved at the 1930 conference and signed in 1931. This agreement laid down the general principles of the uniform legislation and it, of course, contemplated that there would be legislation following the laying down of those principles. I submit that that legislation cannot be uniform unless there is a further conference between the various members of the British commonwealth of nations. It seems to me that we can hardly have uniformity if we start out by passing a Canada Shipping Act all by ourselves and expecting the other dominions to follow. My view is that we would be doing more in the way of uniformity if we held a conference with the other dominions and then passed an act modelled along the lines suggested at that conference.

Mr. DUFF: That is what the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) suggested on Friday night.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, what we have at the present time is general uniformity from the fact that the Merchant Shipping Act is in force all over the British commonwealth. Then all the various dominions have are their own local shipping acts. We have the Canada Shipping Act here. I am told that the hon. member for Pictou has already suggested such a conference and I am convinced that it would be in the interests of uniformity if we did not start off by attempting to lead the procession, as it were, by passing an act and expecting the other dominions to rubber stamp what we do. That is my first point. My right hon. friend has mentioned that there is some sort of pledge, that we have passed our word of honour.

Mr. BENNETT: I was dealing with international obligations.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think we would be violating any word of honour, and I do not believe my right hon. friend intended that his remarks should be so interpreted, by not passing this shipping bill. This bill is made up by the use of the pastepot and by the redrafting of legislation which was already in force. I imagine it was done in both ways. Then in addition to reenacting the old legislation it contains some new legislation. I submit that we cannot hope to have the sort of shipping legislation we should have in this country if we just follow the old British Merchant Shipping Act and our own Canada Shipping Act. The Merchant Shipping Act was originally passed in 1854 before the days of cables, before the days of radio, before the days of aircraft and before the days of various modern aids to navigation. The result is that the Merchant Shipping Act is bound to be to some extent out of date. Amendments have been passed from time to time but no one believes that that act has had the overhauling which it needs in order to make it completely in keeping with present conditions. The delay in doing this has been due to the fact that the various dominions have, following the statute of Westminster, been considering the best way to bring about uniformity in shipping legislation. I submit that notwithstanding all the work that has been done, and I find no fault with the work that has been done in drafting the act, we shall not have an up to date act when we get through with this if we simply adopt the Merchant Shipping Act and fit into it the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. BENNETT: We have to.

Mr. RALSTON: That brings me to my next point. As I understood the Prime Minister, he was suggesting first that we should pass this bill, because it contains what is already on the statute books.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I said there were seventy new sections.

Mr. RALSTON: Dealing with the law that is on the statute books. Why should we pass this act simply to reenact what is already on the statute books? It is there now and we have the benefit of it. It seems to me that we can afford to wait until we bring our shipping legislation into line with that of the other commonwealths before we decide on a brand new act. That is, so far as the legislation which is already in force is concerned, we are not going a step further ahead by rewriting it on the statute books.

My right hon. friend says there are seventy-five new sections. But even some of the old ones can hardly be recognized. I just look at one section, section 113. I know very little about shipping law; I do not profess to have made a close study of it. I have to learn in this school if we have to go through with this bill. Section 113 deals with shipping registry. Apparently that section is a combination of sections 93, 94, 95, 96 and 97 of the old Canada Shipping Act. You will not find it written in the same terms. I would not expect that. I would expect the draftsman to improve on it. But imagine those of us in this committee attempting to figure out whether it contains the old legislation or whether it is a brand new section. That is just one sample. That is a section which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister would include under present existing legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: No, partly new.

Mr. RALSTON: Partly new, all right; but as I understand the principle, it is intended to be practically the same as the old legislation. In addition my right hon. friend says that there are seventy-five new sections. That brings me to this.

Mr. DUFF: Section 113 is not new.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough says that section 113 is not new. I am taking his word and the word of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and assuming that the principle of it generally is already in force and that the drafting of it is new. Now about the new sections? What I am suggesting to my right hon. friend is this: We dealt with the companies act this session and adopted a number of amendments. I do not think my right hon. friend will complain of the way in which we on this side of the house dealt with that bill. I do not think he will complain of the way in which we dealt with about ten other pieces of legislation which have come before the house this session. The only bill that has really been contentious and taken a long time was the marketing act. The other bills have had all the expedition that my right hon. friend could possibly expect, and I am quite satisfied that he will frankly admit that. We had last night the bill dealing with compromises in the matter of farm indebtedness. We have dealt with a farm loan bill, a British and foreign companies insurance act, a Canadian insurance act; a tremendous bill consisting of a remodelling and revision of the Excise Act, and the companies act, which I have just mentioned. Then we have had the complete decennial revision this session of the Bank Act. We have also had the bill to incorporate the central bank of Canada, and in addition the Fruit Act, the Food and Drug Act, the Bills of Exchange Act, and the Admiralty Court Act. We have dealt with all that legislation this session, and now at this late date we are asked to deal with this monumental bill of 497 pages. I submit to my right hon. friend that we are having a surfeit, a gorge of legislation which we cannot possibly digest.

I say to him that with regard to this act we should deal with it as we dealt with the companies act, and have it go to a committee and consider the sections, see what the seventy-five new sections contain, and if the committee can agree on the sections, well and good; but I submit to my right hon. friend that it is very difficult and not the most efficient way to do public business for us to attempt in this committee of the whole to deal with 719 sections, new and old, without an opportunity at least for a preliminary digest of the situation in a committee. I want to ask my right hon. friend even yet, if he will not agree to this bill being referred to a special committee which would have an opportunity to go over it, and if we find that it is not possible to deal with it properly before this session rises, the bill will simply have to stand over until next session. I submit to my right hon. friend that the way we have already dealt with legislation ought to induce him to accept a suggestion of this kind and to make him feel that there is no desire whatever to obstruct this legislation, but that there is on the other hand a real desire on the part of the committee to know something about the legislation which they are passing.

I do not think my right hon. friend any more than anybody else will say that simply because of the fact that the Senate has passed the bill and given it a lot of attention, that is any reason why we should not give it proper consideration in this house. The other chamber had all last year to consider this bill; they scrapped practically the whole of the bill which was drawn, and started out on a brand new bill this year, and now after nearly three months' work this bill is brought down to us. I submit to my right hon. friend that it is very difficult for us to deal with it in this way. It is not a practical way to deal with it, and I ask him in all earnestness if he will not consider the possibility, even at this stage, and before we go ahead with the various sections of the bill, of referring it to a committee.

Let me say to him that if we do pass the bill in the form in which it is we shall not have an opportunity for a number of years properly to revise and bring the bill up to date. We shall have put on record a bill that is more or less permeated with the atmosphere of the legislation which has existed since 1854. We shall probably overlook some vital features in connection with modern navigation and shipping. I think we could have taken care of these things if we applied ourselves to it by taking up a brand new, up to date body of shipping legislation as concurred in by all the other dominions, and I think it would be well for us to wait another year in order to do it.

[Mr. Ralston.]

One last word, and it is this. This is the first piece of legislation that we shall have passed, I think, since the statute of Westminster; I mean directly as a result of it. We have passed trade agreements from time to time.

Mr. BENNETT: And the Naturalization Act, and the Oath of Allegiance Act.

Mr. RALSTON: The Oath of Allegiance Act was a comparatively formal matter, and the Naturalization Act we had dealt with pretty fully before the statute of Westminster. But this is a new departure. For the first time we are passing our own shipping legislation exclusively; doing away with what has been the charter of the seamen's liberty, namely, the Merchant Shipping Act. We are attempting to put on the Canadian statute books what was previously on the British statute books and adopting that as our own. I think we can afford, although it is four years since the statute of Westminster was passed, to go slowly in this respect. This is all-important legislation, affecting not only the sea coasts of this country, but mercantile interests right across Canada. So far as I am personally concerned I would like to see this legislation go through, but if it is impossible to deal with it competently this session I would ask my right hon. friend, first, to consider leaving it over until we have an opportunity of conferences with the other dominions. Secondly, if he feels that that should not be done,—I am not sure that he will not feel that—I suggest that this bill be referred to a special committee until we can see whether it is possible in the time at our disposal to go over the various sections and give them reasonable attention, paying particular attention to the seventy-five new sections which will require considerable work having regard to all the other duties which hon. members of this committee and of this house have to perform.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth made two suggestions: First, that another conference should take place between the different parts of the empire in order to have uniformity of legislation. That conference has already taken place.

Mr. RALSTON: No. I have a copy of the conference of 1929 and of the agreement of 1931, but that was as regards the principles of the legislation. But I am talking about a committee on the legislation itself in order to draft a uniform act embodying those principles.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The different parts of the empire which were represented at that conference did not suggest anything of that kind. Moreover, they all agreed that they would enact legislation along the lines set out in the agreement. These are the words of the agreement:

> His Majesty's governments in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland, having considered the report of the conference on the operation of Dominion legislation and merchant shipping legislation, 1929, undertake to propose any necessary legislation and take such other steps as may be required for the purpose of giving full effect to the provisions of the present agreement with regard to merchant shipping.

So we are putting before parliament legislation that we have undertaken to enact along the lines suggested by this conference in order to preserve for some time to come uniformity in shipping laws within the empire.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my right hon. friend not know from his conversation and reports he has had there was a discussion about having a committee on commonwealth shipping legislation with regard to both admiralty courts and merchant shipping, that is another conference? Does he say he has not heard of that and it has not been suggested? It is not in the report but that is the way, as I understand it, in which the legislation would be adopted.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I have not.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I never heard of that. The agreement is very precise; we undertook to enact legislation along those lines.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister mean to say that the Dominion of Newfoundland has enacted legislation similar to this?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I never suggested that.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a dominion. There were other reasons besides that.

Mr. DUFF: The Prime Minister should not rub that in to me—who, as he knows, was born there,—and the people of that island. Does the minister say that Newfoundland, whether it be a dominion or colony or whatever it may be, has adopted this legislation as it is in this book?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I never made that statement.

Mr. DUFF: The minister tried to infer that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: All I said was that the different parts of the empire, including Newfoundland, undertook to pass legislation along the lines of that which we have before us to-day.

Mr. DUFF: Does my hon. friend want to have this legislation uniform with that of other parts of the empire? What I am saying is that he made use of the fact that Newfoundland had passed certain legislation. I know Newfoundland has not passed any such legislation as the minister is asking us to pass here to-night.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have never said that Newfoundland had adopted such legislation as this. I have only stated that she is a party along with every other part of the empire to the agreement of 1931 to pass legislation along the lines mentioned in this agreement. It comprises almost the whole bill, not word for word or detail for detail, but the lines of the legislation.

Mr. DUFF: Has the minister a copy of the Newfoundland legislation? Will he tell us whether it is the same as this or what difference there is? It is not like this at all.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The only thing I say is that we are putting before parliament legislation along the lines adopted by the conference in 1931.

Mr. DUFF: But Newfoundland did not adopt that; they passed legislation of their own which is not at all like this. Will my hon. friend deny that or affirm it?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I would ask the hon. gentleman to address the Chair.

Mr. DUFF: I was addressing the Chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Newfoundland is no longer a dominion.

Mr. DUFF: The Minister of Marine tried to infer that Newfoundland had passed legislation similar to this. Before we go any further I would ask the Minister of Marine to bring before parliament the legislation which Newfoundland passed since the conference spoken of by the Prime Minister, who tried to make out that because Alexander Johnston and Lucien Pacaud, who know nothing about ships or marine matters, signed certain agreements in London, the sailors of this country should stand behind this legislation and have it put through parliament. That is not right. The Newfoundland government had more sense than to pass any stupid, foolish legislation such as we are being asked to pass to-night and which has been brought down from another part of this parliament.

Mr. VENIOT: Might I ask the minister whether the conference of 1931 which I understand was international, embodied anything that would bind this country to make uniform legislation in so far as coastal navigation within the Dominion of Canada is concerned?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand the minister to say no. Then so far as our coastal regulations are concerned, that is a matter of our own?

Mr. BENNETT: Surely.

Mr. VENIOT: It is in regard to that I am raising the objection. If our coastal regulations and those governing our fishing fleet are embodied in this legislation, let the minister have passed those clauses that come under the jurisdiction, if you like, of the conference of 1931, but in the name of conscience let him give us a chance to consult our constituents in regard to coastal and fishing regulations, let him not impose them on us.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There are no fishing regulations in the bill.

Mr. VENIOT: There are.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I would like my hon. friend to point them out.

Mr. VENIOT: There are definitions as to what a fishing vessel is; there are definitions and clauses defining what a fishing vessel has to do, how she shall register, who shall sail her, who shall be in command, what the sailors shall do. This is right in the bill; the minister cannot deny it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not mistaken.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As to the fishermen, the same law as heretofore is in this bill. I listened to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough a minute ago state that the fishing boats were bound to have certificated masters.

Mr. DUFF: Quite right.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is nothing of the kind in the bill. If my hon. friend will read clause 113 he will see that ships solely employed in fishing are exempted from having certificated masters or mates.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. VENIOT: Does the minister mean to tell me that he can find any one vessel called a fishing vessel that is solely engaged in the fishing business?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Why not?

Mr. VENIOT: Surely the minister does not wish to leave that impression with the committee. They have their fishing seasons and at other times they are employed at something else. If they are employed at anything else; if they are employed in taking supplies to far off fishing districts and are not engaged on a fishing trip, they come under this legislation. Especially do they come under it if they have an auxiliary attached of over three horsepower; then they have to have a captain with a certificate. More than that, they have to have an engineer.

Mr. DUFF: A certificated engineer.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not mistaken, and I do not care where the minister gets his information. This is in the bill, and I know what its application means.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That does not apply to those small boats.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me give the minister an example. The W. S. Loggie concern at Chatham, New Brunswick, one of the largest fishing concerns in the maritime provinces, own a large number of vessels. They have vessels engaged in fishing and at other times the same boats are engaged in transporting their fish coastwise from one factory to another or to headquarters. Those vessels have auxiliaries. Under this legislation no captain of such a vessel can operate it unless he has a captain's certificate. Let me give another instance. Take the fishermen of Miscou Harbour, using vessels of ten to twenty tons. I think the largest about twenty-five. They fish all season; they will fish during the herring season in the spring and in the fall herring season, and after the fall fishing season they are recognized as freight boats; they transport their product to the markets at Chatham, Newcastle, Bathurst and Campbellton—coastal traffic. They have auxiliaries; they would come under this bill, and the captains will have to have a master's certificate.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The same as the present law.

Mr. VENIOT: No, it is not.

Mr. DUFF: It is not.

Mr. VENIOT: Get the old act and read it. If it is the same law as before, two hundred and seventy-five sail in the fishing fleet in the northern section of New Brunswick, the county I represent, are violating the law every day. I know it is not so; there is no use trying to put the like of that over on us, because we have experience.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has suggested that one of three courses might be taken in respect to this legislation. The accuracy of his recital of the historic facts I think no one will question. But we have proceeded with this legislation not idly, just to do something, but because we recognized that there was an obligation upon us with respect to it. We are a maritime community with shores on the Pacific and the Atlantic. When this matter was agreed to in 1931 we prepared a bill, and because of the fact that there are many difficulties involved and we were endeavouring to secure some measure of uniformity with respect to the principles —not the details—I had the draft bill sent to and subsequently discussed it with the officials who are responsible in Great Britain for legislation of this character. Many suggestions were made; some of them we could easily accept, some we could not. Australia has not yet enacted the legislation. I think it is not unfair to say that they expect us to proceed first, because they have coastal difficulties to meet and we have coastal difficulties to meet; but we have in common with them the general principles to be accepted dealing with shipping legislation. Now, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) has very properly pointed out that with respect to coastal matters there is of course no uniformity. With respect to small details as to the size of ships that require certificated masters there is no suggestion about uniformity being necessary; it is not even hinted. But with respect to the large principles that govern the whole shipping business, obviously the largest shipping country in the world being Great Britain, we are anxious to obtain the benefit of their wide experience. If I say to this committee that I had the privilege of discussing it with those who are regarded as the foremost authorities in the world I but state the simple fact. The solicitors who are responsible for the advice to the various departments in Great Britain that have to deal with this matter were good enough to give us the benefit of their judgment; that advice was in the hands of the minister, and when the minister had the act redrafted we had the benefit of all their experience placed at our disposal in the form of a memorandum that would enable us to proceed in the best possible manner. If, as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has suggested, this bill is but the product of the paste pot and scissors, obviously the enactment of it is a simple matter. If on the other hand it is a combination of old and new provisions, as it is, this committee will study carefully the terms expressing the meaning of parliament in the light of the existing legislation both in the Merchant Shipping Act and the Canada Shipping Act that we have had for years. It has been suggested that that can better be done by a special committee than in committee of the whole. The practice in England is to take it after second reading in committee of the whole. We have departed from that practice because sometimes we become very garrulous in committees of the whole and have failed to direct our attention to the particular sections under consideration. In Great Britain it is the practice to go into committee of the whole in respect to measures that are government measures, such for instance as the Home Rule bill, local rate bills and matters of that kind. We have recently departed from that practice. In the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when parliament had to deal with the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk, it did not send the matter to a special committee but went into committee of the whole house. Delegations do not appear at the bar of the house to represent their views; the government of the day assumes responsibility. That was the practice in this house, but conditions changed and it was thought that to refer a bill to a special committee was the easiest way to get rid of some responsibility.

Mr. RALSTON: It was not done to get rid of responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not suggesting that was the hon. gentleman's intention.

Mr. RALSTON: That was not the intention of anyone.

Mr. NEILL: It was to deal with technical matters.

Mr. BENNETT: For technical matters the government must assume responsibility.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the Prime Minister conveyed a wrong impression when he suggested that bills were referred to a special committee to escape responsibility. I do not think that was the intention of the government. I think it was because it was considered a better way to deal with them.

Mr. BENNETT: One of the best instances is the Georgian Bay canal bill.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, take the Bank Act.

Mr. BENNETT: The government of the day attempted to evade responsibility by giving the Georgian Bay canal bill second reading to save its face and sending it to the committee for the purpose of seeing it killed, one man voting for it. That is not the practice in the British parliament. In connection with the Bank Act I pointed out the other day that the practice had grown up of dealing with such bills in the manner followed this session. But with respect to this legislation there is no necessity for sending it to any committee. The government of the day assumes the responsibility for the bill. If tonight we had spent the time in passing sections that have been on the statute books of this country for many years we would perhaps have come to the sections to which the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) has referred, although he had no right to refer to them in committee of the whole until they were reached; and then the arguments he has made and the arguments which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough may make may be sufficiently powerful to induce the government to accept their view, and accept it gladly.

Then there is this further point: one must face actualities at some time or other. We have had this bill now considered for three years, two years in form, one year in the nebulous condition of general principles that were to be observed. We have printed and circulated it one session, then rewritten it, reorganized it in the light of views and criticisms received, and the fact that it has been considered in another place is only some evidence that in its present form it has received the best consideration that the men who were charged with responsibility of dealing with it in committee could give to it. I quite agree with what the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth says, that that is no reason why we should shirk our duty with respect to it. I have never asserted that we should. But there is nothing in the bill that should give this house any difficulty if it will apply itself to the consideration of it in the light of the existing legislation and remember that the new sections are not numerous but are important because they confer upon Canada jurisdiction in matters about which some difficulties might have arisen in times past. We wish this to be upon the statute books. If we are ever going to get shipping bills within the other members of the commonwealth it is desirable that this country should take the lead, not for that purpose but because they look to us to do so, and they know that we have had the benefit of the best assistance that could be given to us in Great Britain. We are merely endeavouring to carry out not a compulsory obligation but an undertaking. The minister has just read from the document which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has in his hand, a statement of what our obligations were in 1931. It is not a compulsory undertaking that all the dominions would do so; we undertook to do something. Now we have done it. At the end of this bill we have provided that it shall not come into force until proclamation. That is, once enacted as a statute it then becomes something upon which attention may be focused and as to which constructive amendments may be suggested. That section also provides that even the whole of the bill need not be brought into force on proclamation, that parts of it may be proclaimed if so desired. That is section 719, which reads:

> This act shall not come into force until a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette: provided that he may, in the same manner and from time to time, bring any portion or portions only of this act into force.

I need hardly remind the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth that this is done to meet the very condition to which I have referred. Conditions in various parts of the commonwealth are not the same, but with respect to the large principles of the measure, when we have enacted our measure we proclaim, we will say, one hundred sections that deal with one particular phase. That has met with general approval, and that is the end of it. Later we proclaim another hundred sections, because they have been approved by the various sections of the commonwealth. Finally we may proclaim the remainder. This section is drawn in this way in an endeavour to ensure that effect shall be given to the undertaking which, while as I say it was not compulsory in its character, involved the idea that we would proceed with some degree of reasonable promptitude to give effect to the promise which was made, namely that we would introduce legislation with respect to shipping on certain principles.

There is one other phase of it which is rather important. The schedules or annexes to this legislation, which cover nearly two hundred pages, represent conventions concluded at Geneva, at London and at other places. They are not conventions which we can disregard. Not only did we sign them; we ratified them. Not only were they ratified by executive action; in the main they have been submitted to and approved by this house.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there anything more needed in that respect?

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the hon. gentleman mentioned that, because if he will take the trouble to look through the bill he will find that the relation of the shipping act itself to the terms and provisions of the various conventions becomes of considerable importance. There are several sections here; I will not take time to turn them up. We find the words, "subject to the provisions of the load line convention," "subject to the convention dealing with labour matters," using the word in the broad sense, because otherwise you can hardly use it in regard to seamen who are under articles, and so on. Broadly speaking, the provisions of the conventions must be considered. Then you have the questions of signals, rules of navigation, radio communication and matters of that kind. These are covered by conventions, and they are woven into the statute. In large part those are the new sections, because needless to say when the first act was written there was no such thing as radio or communication between sea and shore as we know it. Fog signals were not of the character we now have, and in fact the rules of the road have been changed. The load line convention is related also to the provisions of the statute.

Mr. REID: And the salvage of airships.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the hon. gentleman; that was the other matter to which my attention was being directed. Following the loss of the Titanic there was a convention dealing with questions of life boats, rafts, life jackets, life buoys and so on. All these matters, while the subjects of conventions, by this statute are woven into the texture of the law, which the committee will observe is altogether different from merely having a convention which baldly declares what we are to do, without weaving it into the statute itself.

It is for these reasons that this provision is inserted in the statute which contemplates that the statute may come into force on proclamation, not necessarily as a whole but one part and then another part, in order that there may be no inconvenience caused to anyone.

May I remind this committee that there are some matters dealt with in this statute that relate to these conventions, and the interrelation between the terms of the conventions and the statute is such that we cannot, without violating our international undertakings. do otherwise than pass the statute in the terms in which it appears. A moment ago the hon. member for Gloucester said something that greatly impressed me. He said, "If this be so, a large number of people are violating the law," presumably without knowing it. As a matter of fact there has been going on in this country continuously, without knowledge, because of changes that have been made in some of these matters, a disregard of the statute, and I think everyone realizes that substantial effort has been made last year and again this year to try to bring to the attention of as many people as possible the fact that we have assumed international obligations. The ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has been president of the League of Nations Society in Canada. The League of Nations is the organization that promoted these conventions. A moment ago the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) made some reference to matters touching the lives of seamen, their articles, their clothing, their food, their care when ill in marine hospitals, the disposition of their property if they died, and so on. All these matters were dealt with in days gone by in Great Britain by the Board of Trade, and the regulations of that body. In these conventions that we have made we have dealt with these very things, and the statute merely endeavours to relate the convention to the enactments of parliament, which of course is of first importance.

Does anyone suggest for a single moment that anyone sitting on this side of the house, with ministerial responsibility, is anxious to undertake unnecessary labour? Does anyone suggest that most of us have not enough to do? We have a duty to discharge: we may not discharge it to the entire satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite, but we will have to do the best we can. If I had not believed there was an obligation resting upon us to deal with this legislation I would not have introduced it. It will be recalled that reference was made to this legislation in the speech from the throne. The question of introducing it in this house rather than in another place became important in view of the fact that at this session this house undertook the responsibility with respect to the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act, and a committee was sitting that was dealing with matters of great public importance. Under those circumstances we concluded that in another house this bill could best receive, in the first instance, that attention which its importance demanded. While the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was quite correct in saying that a stenographic report of what took place was not kept, nevertheless during the holidays and over the week-ends selected small subcommittees continued to sit and to deal with every phase of the bill. Draftsmen endeavoured to reconcile the various statutes which had heretofore existed with those which it was desired to enact. Suggestions made by those who had to deal with these matters were considered, and the fact is that in recent times no legislation which has been submitted to either house of parliament has received more consideration than this received in another place. I am not for one single moment endeavouring to assert that because that has been done we are relieved of our responsibility, but I do say that with respect to legislation of this kind these houses of parliament have co-equal jurisdiction, and it is idle to suggest that one house rather than another should receive all the measures of an administration. In fact, I believe as days go by it will be found that the other branch of parliament can be more effectively used than it has been. That is my conviction with respect to it. The idea of setting up a select committee—

Mr. RALSTON: I thought it would be the committee on marine and fisheries.

Mr. BENNETT: The idea of referring this bill to a committee I must, with all deference, disregard at the moment. I suggest that to-morrow, after we have dealt with the resolution on the Franchise Act, we should proceed with this bill and continue to proceed with it on Thursday, on Friday, on Monday and until such time as we have made the necessary progress to enable us to deal with those sections about which there is great controversy.

When there is great controversy and difference of opinion with regard to certain sections, while this government must assume the responsibility for the legislation, I promise this chamber that any reasonable suggestions which are put forward will receive not only every consideration, but if in the view of some hon. members of wide experience in this chamber, it is thought that we should change, modify, amend or deal with a section in any way, we will try to the best of our ability to accommodate ourselves to such view. That is so, because in domestic matters no principle concerns us except the well being of the people as a whole, our own people. I think the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and myself are at one as to that, that the broad principles embodied in the agreement of 1931 did not deal with our domestic situation at all, our inland lakes, our inland waters or, for instance, lake Winnipeg, the Red river, the Saskatchewan river, or those major rivers and lakes which constitute the great watershed, including lakes Superior and Michigan and the others. But when we deal with what may be called sea-going responsibilities, on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, we are endeavouring to enact legislation which is prepared to conform to the provisions of international conventions to which we became a party. Whether we acted wisely or not I cannot say, but the late administration as well as the present one must accept the responsibility.

That is all I can usefully say as to the purpose behind and the reasons governing us, and the earnestness of our desire to place legislation upon the statute book not simply to have more work or to supply a gorge of legislation, but rather to do that which we conceive to be our duty to our own people consonant with the obligations of an international character which we have assumed as signatories to various conventions on maritime questions, as well as the obligations which we assumed in 1931.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot speak with the same authority as has the Prime Minister with regard to the international obligations to which he has referred, but I would take it as this House of Commons has approved of, for instance, the load lines convention and these other conventions that it is possible by regulation to put them into force, and thus carry out any convention obligations which we had. I do not think it is absolutely necessary to pass this legislation in order to make effective those conventions practically all of which have already been accepted by this House of Commons and are I think already in force. That is my first observation, affecting international obligations.

With regard to coastal and inland waters, if I understand my right hon. friend correctly the law outlined in the new bill is practically the same as in the old. If that is so it seems to me the statute as it is to-day is sufficient, and there is no necessity for passing any legislation in that respect.

That leaves only that which my right hon. friend termed sea-going responsibilities, affecting deep sea navigation, our responsibilities on the high seas and with regard to seamen, safety of life, and so on. It seems to me those factors fit in with and are part of the agreement to which he has referred and to which the Minister of Marine has referred. I have read that agreement, and it seems to me that before legislation is actually brought down consultation is contemplated between the various commonwealths. I find that article 16 in part VI of the British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement provides:

> The standards of qualification to be required of applicants for certificates of competency and of service shall so far as possible be equal and alike throughout the British commonwealth, and shall not be lower than those at present established.

How can we have uniformity and have them equal and alike unless we have consultation among the different dominions concerned to ascertain what those standards should be?

Mr. BENNETT: After the statute is passed.

Mr. RALSTON: No; that would mean that the only way we could have uniformity is by others passing some kind of statute, and we would have to make our statute uniform with theirs. That is not what this agreement contemplates, neither does it mean that we take the lead and set up a standard for them to follow. I am just trying to point the argument I tried to make, namely that the agreement of 1931 contemplated consultation before our statute was passed. Then, respecting offences on board ship I find in part IX, article 23, of the agreement the following:

> Reciprocal arrangements shall be made for conferring jurisdiction on the lines of section 686 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, with respect to offences committed on board ships registered in any part of the commonwealth.

How can we make reciprocal arrangements without having previous consultation?

Mr. BENNETT: You have to have your statute first.

Mr. RALSTON: I submit not. You have a conference, and pass the statute afterwards. Then, turning to part II, standards of safety, I find the following as article 6:

> While each part of the commonwealth will from time to time determine the standards with which its ships shall be required to comply in all matters relating to safety, every endeavour will be made to preserve uniformity and to maintain the standards at present in force.

You cannot do that without consultation.

Mr. BENNETT: Since then we have an international provision ratified by this house.

Mr. RALSTON: If we have an international provision already ratified we do not need the statute at all.

Mr. DUFF: It is not international. Every British dominion has its own law.

Mr. RALSTON: I suggest this, that notwithstanding what they do in the British House of Commons, we have been dealing through committees with matters such as the one now before us. We dealt with the Bank Act through a committee, and we did the same with the central bank act. My right hon. friend, regardless of constitutional practice, will agree that that is the most efficient parliamentary method of dealing with it. There would be more real progress made if the matter were referred to a committee which could give it intensive study not merely from three o'clock to eleven o'clock, but could sit in the mornings and, if necessary, establish subcommittees.

I am disappointed that the Prime Minister has not seen fit to accept the suggestion, but I have made it in the spirit in which he replied, namely that we are both anxious to get on with the work of the house. I do feel that he defeats that object when at this late date—or, what is supposed to be a late date in the session—he places this voluminous bill on the table of the house and compels us to pass it through committee of the whole.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 13, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES

Mr. GOULET:

1. How many trust companies, loan companies or other companies in Canada are allowed to accept deposits?
2. Are such companies audited by the Department of Finance?

Mr. BENNETT: I direct the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the answer to this question is not within the power of the federal government. The trust companies and loan companies are operating in many instances under provincial charters, and it merely means that we should have to endeavour to secure the information, which I think we should not be asked to do; and the provisions as to audit by the dominion are provided for in the statutes that we have ourselves enacted dealing with loan and trust companies, over which we have jurisdiction. I think the question should be dropped.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suppose the hon. member was referring to federal companies.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he was not; that is the point. I asked about that the other day. The returns furnished to parliament cover that.

Question dropped.

FRENCH MOTTOES ON ROYAL COAT OF ARMS

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Has the government received any communication from the government of Saskatchewan or from any public bodies or individuals of that province, requesting that the French mottoes: "Dieu et mon droit" and "Honi soit qui mal y pense," be struck out of the royal coat of arms?
2. If so, were such recommendations submitted to His Majesty?
3. What answer, if any, was given by His Majesty?

Mr. BENNETT: May I say that until I had seen this question, no suggestion even of what is indicated by the question had ever been brought to my attention. I have asked each of my colleagues accessible, and they tell me they are in exactly the same position as myself.

CANADIAN VALUE OF JAPANESE YEN

Mr. REID:

What was the value in the Canadian currency placed on the yen by the Department of National Revenue for duty purposes on goods coming into Canada from Japan during each month of the years 1932, 1933, and 1934?

Mr. MATTHEWS: $0·4985—This was proclaimed by order in council—(P.C. 2800) dated 7th November, 1931—and prevailed during each month of the years 1932, 1933 and 1934.

MINGAN, QUEBEC., INDIAN AGENCY

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the position of Indian agent at Mingan, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, vacant?
2. If so, why?
3. Were any complaints lodged against the Indian agent in that locality?
4. If so, what was the nature of such complaints?
5. Who lodged such complaints?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Filled temporarily.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. No.
4. and 5. Answered by No. 3.

[Mr. Bennett.]

LOANS TO PROVINCES

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. In the agreements between federal government and the three prairie provincial governments, respectively, for the present year, what is the total amount of loans to each province therein provided for?
2. What is the total amount of federal loans forwarded to each such province up to June 1, 1934?
3. At the rate these loans have been going into Saskatchewan for the month of May, 1934 (see filed loans in Votes and Proceedings), will the total amount allocated to Saskatchewan in the agreement above referred to take care of all urgent and estimated requirements throughout that province?

Mr. RHODES:

1. No such agreements have been made. Applications of the provinces for loans are considered from time to time, having regard to special needs and circumstances.

2. Loans to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, April 1 to June 1, 1934, were $488,000, $5,000,000 and $1,000,000, respectively.

3. Answered by No. 1.

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Before the orders of the day are called I desire to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). The car ferry ss. Charlottetown of the Borden-Tormentine service is now undergoing repairs in Montreal. This service is being carried on by the ss. Prince Edward, which is not equipped like the ss. Charlottetown for the automobile traffic, and as our tourist trade opens July 1 it is essential for the ss. Charlottetown to be back on the service. My question is: When will the ss. Charlottetown resume the service on the Borden-Tormentine route, and are the repairs to the boat being rushed to completion so that she will be on the service before July 1?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): The hon. gentleman was good enough to inform me that he would ask this question. I have made inquiries of the management at Montreal and they assure me that the work is being hurried with all possible speed, and that while the boat has been delayed four days owing to the fact that some other ship which was damaged got precedence because of custom in accidents, at the same time the four days will be the only delay. In other words, the Charlottetown should be ready for service by the 27th, instead of the original date, the 23rd. If it is ready for service on the 27th there is no reason why it should not be on the route by the first of July.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE—APPOINTMENT OF FRANCHISE COMMISSIONER—PRINTING OF VOTERS' LISTS

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the franchise of electors at elections of members of the House of Commons, and to provide for the appointment, salaries, fees and expenses of a dominion franchise commissioner, secretary, registrars, enumerators, and other employees, and to make provision for the printing of voters' lists and other documents.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I should like to offer some explanation in regard to the resolution which you have just read to the committee, Mr. Chairman. As is well known, the present Dominion Elections Act, as it appears in the statutes of Canada, is in the nature of a composite act. It declares the franchise of those persons who are entitled to vote at dominion elections; it also provides for the preparation of voters' lists; third, it provides for the conduct of the election itself.

After an experience under the present act from the time of its original passage in 1921 to the present, I think I am within the judgment of all sections of the committee when I say that the act as it now stands has been proved cumbersome, dilatory and expensive and it has been thought proper to introduce new legislation for the purpose in the first place of having in this country a basic electoral list which will at all times be available in case either of a dissolution of parliament or of a necessity of filling vacancies in the representation in this house as they occur from time to time. Under our present act it requires about sixty days after the dissolution of parliament before the election machinery can all work satisfactorily throughout the dominion and enable us to have a general election. It is true that probably fifty-three to fifty-four days might suffice provided that there be no miscarriage; that all the cogs of the machinery fit accurately and that no mishaps of any kind occur. In the case of byelections the information which I have received from the chief electoral officer is that fifty, or perhaps forty-eight days in a near at hand, compact riding, would suffice for the purpose. It has also come to my knowledge that in the United Kingdom they have a much more expeditious method than we have in this country of bringing on a general election. It is true that distances in the United Kingdom are not very great as compared with those in Canada, but on the other hand they have there a population of over forty million or more than four times as great as ours. I have been told that in the United Kingdom they can dissolve one parliament and seat another in three weeks' time. They have at all times available a final and complete voters' list which can be and is utilized the moment parliament is dissolved.

It has been thought by the government that it would be well to devise some improved method to bring on a general or a byelection in this country in much less time than is necessary at present. The proposal is that the government introduce a bill for the purpose of establishing the franchise of electors for dominion purposes and at the same time of providing for the making and completion of voters' lists which shall be regularly revised and kept up to date and which shall be available at a moment's notice in any part of Canada should a general election or a byelection take place. Under the scheme which is contemplated by the motion now before the committee it is hoped a franchise and voters' list act may be passed through this house and that under the new legislation a general or a byelection may be held in not more than twenty-eight days and possibly in twenty-four or twenty-five days.

The proposal is, briefly, to appoint for the dominion a franchise commissioner who shall have general charge of the franchise and of the preparation of the voters' list; that a basic list shall be undertaken immediately after the prorogation of the present session; that it shall be the duty of that franchise commissioner to appoint in each constituency a revising officer who shall have charge of the preparation and revision of the voters' list in each riding; that the basic list shall be made in the first instance by enumeration. Provision will be made also when the bill is brought down, for the revision of the basic list before the revising officer himself and when the revision has actually taken place and been completed the revising officer will certify the list as revised and return it to the franchise commissioner at Ottawa who shall have custody of all revised lists. This shall constitute the list of voters throughout Canada until there is a subsequent, completely revised voters' list. The suggestion is that the list shall be completely revised every twelve months. The first list will of course form the basic one; subsequent lists will be a matter of correction and revision where names are to be stricken from or names are to be added to the then existing list, but each year there will be a final and complete list deposited at Ottawa. These lists when returned here shall be printed by the printing bureau at Ottawa for use as may be required on the dissolution of parliament or in case of byelections.

Mr. Speaker, I have now made a general statement of the purpose of the bill which it is intended to introduce. There is no very great variation from the present system except in the matter of the appointment of one commissioner to take general charge, one revising officer in each riding and one enumerator, or more if it should become necessary to appoint more, in each polling division. There is a difference in the present proposal in regard to the method which is adopted in urban municipalities. In an urban municipality we have adopted in principle the clause which has for some years been in force under the statute of British Columbia; that provision is that an applicant for registration in an urban division shall sign a statement at the time he applies to be put on the list. The statement is merely that the applicant possesses the qualifications of an elector, but the important feature about the statement is the signature of the applicant. That signed statement will be placed at the disposal of the returning officer in the appropriate subdivision upon polling day and it will be there for the purpose of identification if necessary of a voter who appears there to vote and who may not be known to those who are in attendance at the polling booth. The voter may be asked to sign his name. This system has been in force in British Columbia for a number of years and I understand has worked very well. To a large extent it will do away with what in Ontario we are accustomed to call "plugging" and in the province of Quebec what I believe they call "telegraphing," and for which in other provinces they term impersonation. It is with the idea of doing away with impersonation, or at least minimizing it, that this particular provision will be included in this bill.

There will be another noticeable feature in the bill applying to cities which have mail delivery and where the street addresses of people are known, the voters' list shall be a geographical list rather than an alphabetical list, that names shall be arranged according to streets and numbers, so that one can see at a glance just who and how many are upon the list for each house upon any street. This system is now in vogue in Ontario, and I believe it has worked well. It has been suggested that in addition to a geographical list an alphabetical list should also be made. Well, the question of expense is the only one to give us any concern in that respect. I have had an estimate made of the cost of an alphabetical list, if we decide to have one in addition to the geographical list. It would cost in the neighbourhood of $300,000 extra, which is a serious consideration, although I admit it would be very convenient to have both lists available at the polling booth or during the election campaign.

I do not think I need go further in explaining the general purport of the franchise act which will be introduced in due course. But this I desire to say, that in regard to this measure we have had some conferences with my right hon. friend and the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) whom he selected on his side and my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and myself upon this side, with the idea that we might agree upon a good many clauses in the proposal which will be submitted to parliament in the form of a bill. A draft measure was prepared early in the month of May. It was intended that this draft measure should form the basis for discussion, because I think it would be the view of all parties and all members in the house that in this instance we should produce a measure which will prove acceptable in all quarters of the house, one that is fair and above board in every respect. With that end in view a draft was prepared as a basis for subsequent discussion and conferences. The draft was originally in typewritten form, and I asked the draftsman to prepare a sufficient number of printed copies in order that we might have them available when the conferences took place. Two conferences have taken place, I think the first was on Wednesday, the 23rd of May, and the second on the following Monday. And I must say that in my opinion these conferences proved exceedingly satisfactory. We did not agree upon all points but we did agree upon many points and upon many clauses of the bill. There are still some features for discussion, and no doubt for debate when the bill is introduced. However, there is one point, which I wish to emphasize, namely, that the draft which was under discussion when these conferences took place was purely by way of suggestion, purely as a basis of discussion, to see how far we might agree. It was not intended that these proposals constituted a bill, not even a draft bill, although for the purpose of the conferences a limited number of copies were printed. Two of these copies were handed to my right hon. friend and two retained by me, and I think the other one was retained by Mr. O'Connor who was the draftsman of the measure. At our first conference and as our first decision, we decided unanimously to strike out subsection 3 of section 4, a clause which provided that those who were not familiar with either the English or French language should be disfranchised. We unanimously agreed to strike out that proposal, and it was struck out and has not since been considered as far as I know by anyone.

Our second conclusion—this is a memo I made at the time—was in regard to a clause that provided that Doukhobors should not be entitled to vote. Perhaps before dealing with this subject I had better say a word further in regard to the subject of the French and English language. The house is aware that under the Naturalization Act in this country every person who is naturalized and receives his certificate is entitled to exercise all the privileges of a British subject. But there is also a provision in our Naturalization Act that a man shall not be naturalized unless he is familiar with either the English or the French language. I think it is a matter of some comment that there are in Canada considerable numbers of people who have obtained naturalization certificates and who have no familiarity with either the French or the English language. This has been a matter of comment in the courts of this country, I know it from reading many criminal cases that I have to read. I find that interpreters are constantly employed. Now I have no doubt that the fact of that clause appearing in the Naturalization Act was the reason for placing a somewhat similar clause in the proposed franchise act, which clause, however, by agreement of all parties, has been stricken from the proposal in regard to the franchise measure.

In regard to the section which proposed the disfranchisement of Doukhobors, my right hon. friend immediately raised an objection, and I think we all agreed with him, that that clause could not stand in the form in which it had been drafted. The Doukhobor situation is in itself a peculiar one. It was never intended I think on the part of any one to disfranchise the Doukhobors in Canada, but there were reasons why some special attention should be given to that part of the Doukhobor population which resides in the province of British Columbia. Our experience with the Doukhobors in that province has not been very satisfactory, far from it.

Mr. HANBURY: Only a portion of them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am speaking only of what I know. We have at the present time between five and six hundred Doukhobors on Piers island in a penitentiary established for the purpose of imprisoning men and women who have openly defied the laws of this country. In addition to this we had a very unhappy experience with the same communities when we attempted to take the census in the year 1931. In British Columbia it was found impossible to take a census of the Doukhobor population. They openly defied the law. They refused to give names or to answer the questions, they refused to give any information, they threatened the census enumerators with violence. Finally, after very great and protracted efforts, it was decided that we would have to abandon the attempt, and the census of the Doukhobors in British Columbia was not taken. There was an estimate made I believe, but the statistical information furnished was nil. Under such circumstances a serious question arises as to whether or not the Doukhobors in the province of British Columbia should or should not be entitled to the franchise to enable them to vote for members of this house. We know that by the provincial act of British Columbia which we have recognized in our present Dominion election act, certain races are disfranchised. Japanese who live in that province and have received naturalization certificates in Canada are not permitted to vote under our present law. Neither are Chinese; neither are Hindus, who are British subjects by birth. The provincial law provides that these oriental races shall not vote, notwithstanding that they are British subjects, and this parliament for many years has adopted that principle in the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is an exception with regard to Japanese returned soldiers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, there is an exception with regard to those who served in the forces of His Majesty during the late war. Now the question arises whether the clause in the British Columbia act should not be further extended to include those who have openly defied the laws of this country. That is a matter for the consideration of the house when the bill comes before it, but at the conference which we had it was the general opinion that the clause drafted was not proper and should not be allowed to stand in its present form, though we did not decide on any particular amendment to it. That matter has been left over for further consideration.

On the general principles of the bill I think I may say that we came to some satisfactory conclusions except in regard to perhaps three points. One was in regard to the appointment of a single commissioner, upon which there may be still some discussion. Another was as to the question of a single or double enumeration; that is, the appointment of a single enumerator or two enumerators for the preparation, particularly, of the first or the basic list. I think the other main question upon which we did not reach agreement was the question of an appeal from the revising officer in the riding. It was suggested by my right hon. friend that there should be an appeal to the county or district judge in such cases. The proposal as drafted provided that the decision of the revising officer should be final. There were some other minor changes recommended, and I believe we are prepared to accept them, but they were only as to the matters of detail.

This is as full an explanation as I desire to make at the present time, but the question of disfranchising those who are unable to speak English or French has received a great deal of publicity in western newspapers. Such a proposal was never seriously considered. As soon as the matter came up for discussion it was unanimously stricken out of the bill. I may tell you, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think this is any breach of confidence, that this bill was not presented to the privy council until this week. It has not been thoroughly considered as yet, and I will not be able to introduce it to-day, though I am hopeful that I may do so to-morrow. It is now under consideration. There was no foundation for statements that have been made in the press throughout the west that the government contemplated such a thing. There was only a proposal which the government were considering, and I may say the same with regard to the rumour as to disfranchising Doukhobors. That question was never considered by the government. There were suggestions in the draftsman's copy as I have described, and the conference dealt with it as I have indicated in my remarks this afternoon.

When the bill is presented, perhaps to-morrow or the next day, I think it will be found free from any serious defects. It constitutes a new principle in this country, but I think a sound one. I think it will be justified on the grounds of expedition, of simplicity and of lowering of the cost. It will prove far less burdensome and cumbersome for the candidate than the present law. I think we will find that we can hold general elections throughout Canada in four weeks. There is not the intricate and involved machinery which exists under our present act. There has been a great deal of simplification. Until the bill comes down I need not say any more in regard to it, but briefly I have given an explanation of the motion standing on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, since the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has made reference to the conference which took place between himself and the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and myself and my colleague the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), perhaps I should say a word with regard to the minister's representations in that particular. In a word, though speaking generally, I may say that so far as my recollection of the entire proceedings is concerned, the Minister of Justice has stated the matter accurately.

As the house will remember, I frequently asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when we might expect to have this new electoral measure brought down. Finally, towards the end of April, the Prime Minister stated that very shortly a bill would be printed and that he would see that, as leader of the opposition, I was supplied with a copy. When the bill was printed the Prime Minister had a copy sent to my office, and on the day the copy arrived he stated in the house that it had been so sent. Later in the day, the Prime Minister said to me that he would be pleased if I, together with one of my colleagues, would confer with the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State concerning the measure. The Prime Minister was careful to state at the time that the purpose of the conference was solely that of considering a draft measure with a view to seeing how much in the way of possible agreement might be arrived at in the introduction of a measure of the kind, and that our conference was to be entirely without prejudice in any direction. That is to say, anything that was said at the conference would not necessarily bind the government with respect to its rights in the matter of the final form of the bill and would not in any way limit the opposition or other parties in the house with respect to proposals and criticisms they might wish to make.

When the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) and myself met with the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, we were again advised that the measure before us was a draft measure and that neither side would be committed with respect to any suggestions that might be made or with respect, as I understood it, to any conclusions that might be reached. We were simply to endeavour to see how far our minds might be brought to be as one with respect to the measure as drafted. As the Minister of Justice has stated, the draftsman, Mr. O'Connor, was present at the two conferences that took place, and was consulted with respect to the intent and meaning of different clauses.

On these matters I think there is no point of difference between us. If I have omitted to refer to any phase of either of the interviews which either the Secretary of State or the Minister of Justice would expect me to mention I should be glad to be reminded of it and to say what may seem necessary by way of comment.

In what I have now to say, Mr. Chairman, I presume I must confine myself, not to my remembrance of the draft bill, but rather to what the Minister of Justice has just said in regard to the proposed measure. My hon. friend has intimated that the present elections act is really three measures combined in one, that it is an act with respect to the franchise, an act with respect to the preparation of voters' lists, and also an act with respect to the machinery for the conduct of the elections themselves. He has stated further that the present measure is to take out of the general act as it now stands those parts which relate to the franchise and to the preparation of electoral lists. I see no objection whatever to that step being taken. I believe that will tend in the direction of simplification and, if done by agreement as I believe we should find it possible to do, it should be all to the good in a simplifying and understanding of electoral procedure.

May I deal with the first two main divisions which, I assume, are the only ones we have to consider, namely those pertaining to the franchise, and the preparation of the voters' lists. As I understand the matter, it is the government's intention in other particulars to leave the elections act as it is, and to make only such changes as may be consequent upon what may be decided upon with respect to the franchise, and the preparation of the lists.

As to the franchise, may I say that I do not believe there is a necessity for altering in any particular the franchise as it now stands. I noticed that in his remarks this afternoon the Minister of Justice has not indicated any changes to be made in that respect.

Mr. BENNETT: Except the difficulty in British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister mentions the difficulty in British Columbia; I presume he means the difficulty with respect to the Doukhobors in that province.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is the only possible change in regard to the franchise, and it is a matter which may easily be considered when we have the clause before us. If we leave that matter out of account, and it is understood that so far as the franchise is concerned the new measure will be in all particulars the same as the present act, that will be entirely satisfactory.

The one further matter for consideration or perhaps I should say the one real matter for consideration is the preparation of the lists and the changes which may be consequent thereon. As to the objective, namely the obtaining of a closed list which will be available at any moment for the purposes either of a general election or a by-election, I would say that personally I agree with the Minister of Justice when he states that a closed list is preferable to the kind of lists we have had heretofore, provided that its preparation can be made in a manner which will be obviously fair to all concerned. I believe that such will be the general concensus of view of hon. members in this chamber. After all, the elections are part of the machinery of governments, as such, necessary liabilities arising therefrom should be made as largely as possible a public obligation. I believe it is only reasonable and right that so far as possible the expense placed upon those who are nominated candidates should be made as light as possible, and that other onerous features of a general election, so far as the candidate is concerned, should be lightened as much as possible. I believe they can be lightened very considerably. All hon. members in this house know that in the conduct of elections, with matters as they now stand, to a great extent the burden of the preparation of lists and expenses incidental thereto falls upon the candidate. It is a cumbersome and costly duty, and prevents that amount of attention being given to public issues by candidates which should be given since it necessitates their giving attention to a great deal of the details of organization which, if it can be made such, should be a public liability since it is a matter of public concern. In this regard I believe the present act might be considerably improved.

The Minister of Justice has referred to the preparation of electoral lists in geographical form, and the suggestion has been made that they might also be made out alphabetically. He has intimated, however, that by this considerable additional expense would be entailed. May I say to him that, when one considers the public necessity of having an election conducted as much aboveboard and with as little confusion as possible, the expense is relatively trifling. If the preparation of alphabetical lists as well as geographical lists would help to enable candidates and electors the more readily to ascertain whether or not names are on the lists, and whether or not lists have been properly prepared, I believe there is every reason why there should be both lists. That is a matter, however, upon which I imagine there will not be much difficulty in reaching an agreement.

May I say the justice of a measure of this kind will depend on two things, first the manner in which the lists themselves are originally prepared, and second, whether in relation to the time that a general election is to be held, the preparation is made in such a way as to avoid possible pressure and confusion resulting from the preparation of the lists at the time the election itself is being held. I can see where, if the act were so to be administered that the preparation of the basic list would be taking place at the time that candidates were being placed in the field, and being nominated in a general election which had already been proclaimed, an impossible situation might be developed, so far as confusion and the possibility of mistakes and unfair dealings are concerned. If, however, the basic list, the first list of all, is prepared in advance of the time of the proclamation of an election, and the work completed in its entirety so that an election may be brought on a short time thereafter, it should be all to the good. I think there is everything to be said for having lists completed in a satisfactory way before an election is announced, thereby reducing to as short a period as will best serve the public interest the time necessary for the election itself. I believe that the bill in these particulars can be made acceptable.

The Minister of Justice has referred to the fact that in the preparation of the lists under the measure to be introduced, the government proposes to have but one set of enumerators, or rather that the revising officers who will be appointed by the franchise commissioner, who will be an appointee either by joint agreement or by the government—

Mr. BENNETT: By parliament.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes—that the revising officers will appoint only one set of enumerators, and not follow the practice which was followed in the last enumeration, upon which occasion two sets of enumerators were chosen as a result of a conference between the different political parties. I believe that would be a great mistake, and would be a double mistake because the government is proposing to add a further obligation with respect to the right of voting, namely that of obliging all electors to register or sign their names. They will have to sign a document. I must say that if the obtaining of signatures from voters is to be at the instance only of enumerators, appointed by the government itself, through its officers, there would be in the minds of everyone great reason to suspect the manner in which the lists were being prepared. In fact, I believe I have only to suggest, to make this apparent, what would be the obvious thought in the mind of any hon. member in this house as to what would occur in most cases where the enumerator of one political party went to the residences of persons who belonged to an opposite political party and asked for their signatures to documents to entitle them to vote. If the enumerator happened to be, as perhaps unfortunately many are certain to be partisan political workers, there might be an altercation between the persons asked to sign the document and the enumerator himself. If there is to be any signing of documents, it should be done in the presence of witnesses, and there ought to be at least two enumerators representative of different political parties, who should be obliged to go together, and who would be able and obliged to act and certify as witnesses to the signatures obtained. Otherwise many signatures most certainly will be suspected. A question might well arise as to whether or not an application had ever been signed; as to whether a signature was genuine or not. Each enumerator should be obliged to initial the signatures as they are obtained. If there were two enumerators chosen by representatives of different political parties who were obliged to go together and initial all signatures, I believe many evasions and mistakes and complaints will be avoided.

In addition to these reasons, I believe it will be found necessary in the circumstance of obtaining signatures that there should be one enumerator, if I may use the expression, who will be regarded as a friendly enumerator, one who is in a position to give the assurance that the signing of the particular form presented is really in the interests of the elector himself. I can see where there is going to be a great handicap, and a real difficulty, in limiting the right to vote to those only who have already signed an application for the purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: Only in urban communities. It worked all right in British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has worked in British Columbia, my right hon. friend says, but it will be new in other provinces, and I believe that the utmost industry and care will have to be taken in securing signatures, and in ensuring that as regards everyone, who ought to be included, so far as it is humanly possible to have their names included, that they are included in the lists.

Another feature that the Minister of Justice has mentioned and which I think ought to be very carefully considered is the right of appeal. The minister has said that, as matters now stand, the revising officer will take the lists as prepared by the enumerators, and that they will be the lists for the purposes of the election. The revising officers, let it be repeated, will, if the act remains in its present form, be the sole arbiters. There will be no appeal, no opportunity of having any revision, if a name does not happen to be on or has been erroneously inserted at the time the revising officer sends in the return. I certainly think there ought to be an appeal to a county court judge. If there is not, we will simply be returning to the old condition of affairs where, under the administration of Sir John A. Macdonald, revising barristers were appointed in the different constituencies. To that proposed procedure, it will be remembered by those who recall the times, there was the strongest objection raised in this house by all except those who sat on the government side. If I recollect aright, from a past reading of the debates, this House of Commons was kept in session for several days through objection to just that very feature of allowing revising barristers to have the final say as to whose names were to be on the list and not permitting an appeal to the county court. The Minister of Justice, was not in the house at the time, he came in shortly after but perhaps he will recall the circumstances better than anyone else. It certainly was not until the government permitted an appeal to a county court judge that the long blockade which took place at that time was lifted and the measure finally passed the house. If we are to agree on a measure of this kind, it ought to be possible at this time to take a step that many years ago was found absolutely necessary and in the public interest.

What I have said touches only some of the points that have been mentioned by the Minister of Justice. When we are in committee on the bill I perhaps will have more to say on other features. But I should like to repeat now that such discussion as took place between members of the government opposite and myself and the member for West Edmonton was wholly tentative and without prejudice, and was, I should also say, in entire confidence, a confidence which I believe has been respected by all who were parties to it.

The Minister of Justice has referred to rumours that were afloat in different parts of the country. May I say that I noticed those rumours myself, and, as a matter of fact, it was my having drawn the Prime Minister's attention to the circumstance that the press already appeared to have a copy of the proposed bill, which led the Prime Minister to say he regretted that the press had published something that purported to be this bill, and to say he could not understand how they possibly had got hold of any such measure.

I would also say—I do not know whether I pointed it out at the time to the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State—but recalling that our first interview, was on May 23, that before that interview had taken place at all, I saw in the papers of this city statements purporting to give the government's reasons for obliging those whose names were to be placed on the lists to have a knowledge of the French and English languages, and also referring to the Doukhobor matter. The news item was so worded as to indicate that it had been inspired by the administration with a view to putting forward its point of view. I do not imagine for one moment that such was the case, but the language of the interview is there, and that was before any conference at all had taken place. I think it was unfortunate that what was part of a draft, or may have been thought to have been part of the draft of the measure, has been discussed in advance, but certainly, so far as hon. members on this side of the house are concerned, I believe that any who have referred to that phase of it have drawn their inferences from the common sources which we have all seen, namely the reports which appeared in the press in advance.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested indeed in the explanation which the Minister of Justice gave of the proposed legislation which is to be founded on this resolution. It would appear to me that there are two important points which this house must keep in mind when considering any changes in the franchise act or in the electoral machinery which we may devise for the purpose of expediting elections.

First, we must safeguard the franchise of the electors. That in my judgment is the most important function of this house, and irrespective of the manner in which the lists may be prepared this house must see to it at all times that the name of every elector who is entitled to vote must be placed on the list if he so desires. Any legislation that falls short of that will in my judgment be a retrograde step and detrimental not only to the standing of the members of this house but to the country as a whole.

So far as the other point is concerned, namely, the reduction of the time that is necessary between the issuing of the writs and the day of the election, I believe that that is all to the good. My judgment is that elections in this country in the past have been carried on over too long a period of time, and if we can reduce the time necessary to give the electorate an opportunity of weighing all the circumstances and the proposals of the various parties who may be appealing to them, if the campaign can be confined to the time suggested by the Minister of Justice, about four weeks, that again would be a step in the right direction that I believe would be beneficial to all.

The only other point with which I wish to deal at the present time is this conference that took place between the government representatives and the official opposition. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is a decided move on the part of the two major parties at the present time to ignore third and fourth and even more parties in the field at the present time, and not only to ignore them but to organize against them. In so far as the remarks of the leader of the opposition are concerned, he even went so far as to discuss the possibility of an understanding between the two major parties. In so far as the group in this corner of the house is concerned we wish to register our strong protest against any such proceedings because we recognize the fact that not only in Canada but the world over, because of the difference of opinion with regard to economic conditions, there is a growing tendency for more and more groups and more and more parties to come into the field. This house must recognize that fact, and give those parties and those groups the same standing and the same consideration that they expect to receive themselves.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gardiner) I would remind the house that the action of the Prime Minister in stating that he would send a copy of the bill to myself, with a view to a conference, was made on the floor of the house in the hearing of hon. gentlemen in the far corner as well as of everyone else. At the time I rather expected that my hon. friend would rise and ask why he also was not receiving a copy of the bill; but the fact that he did not do so led me to believe that he had his own reason for not so asking. It is perfectly clear and within the memory of all who were present at the time that any action taken in the matter was taken in the presence and with the knowledge of everyone. More than that, the press reported each time there had been a conference, and on neither occasion did hon. gentlemen in the far corner rise and inquire why they had not been requested to participate in the conference. So far as I was concerned, as leader of the opposition, I was seeking to accommodate the government, as I believe they were seeking to accommodate the house. As to the reasons why my hon. friends may not have wished to be accommodated, of course I cannot say.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I resent these words from the leader of the opposition. We had never been invited to take part in the conference and it is not our part to butt in on the private arrangements of the two political parties.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There were no private arrangements.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This is one of the most disgraceful incidents that have occurred in my recollection in this house,—parties coming together to frame a bill of this importance without consulting a group in this corner who very shortly will be the government of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The loud laugh bespeaks the vacant mind.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is an old chestnut.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I submit that both parties, had they desired that unanimity and cooperation expressed in the opening words of the Minister of Justice, would have been well advised at least to have extended to us the courtesy of refusing, if we were mad or stupid enough to do such a thing. I can assure the government that we are always willing at any time to cooperate with them in the consideration of any measure which they may propose to bring before the house. I think it is an affront to the intelligence of the house itself that this sort of thing has been going on, and it is certainly an insult to the people whom we represent here.

I have this further word to say. If the principle that violation of the law is cause for disfranchisement laid down by the Minister of Justice is to be binding, or is to become a precedent for subsequent extension, then I warn the minister and the government that they are stepping into very dangerous ground which some day will bring trouble upon them and upon the country. Remember, I am not objecting to the disfranchisement of persons guilty of particular and specified types of crime, but if this thing is to be done as the result of a violation of the law, it will be unjust. I submit the thought, Mr. Chairman, for your consideration and that of the house, that if violation of laws is to disfranchise people, the only supporters in the country of a political party would probably be those behind ourselves in this group. That is rather a consideration that might enter into the minds of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What immodesty.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is not immodesty; it is a fact. And if hon. gentlemen would read with more earnestness the evidence given before the Stevens committee they might be convinced that what I have said has a large measure of truth behind it. This matter has been utterly unfair from the beginning. I knew nothing whatever about these conferences; I heard nothing about them, and if there has been any exchange of bills between the government and the opposition, it surely should have been a matter of courtesy on the part of the government to have given us a copy. And since the leader of the opposition is such a lover of liberty and equality, I should imagine that he would have suggested the thought to the government, since they had not volunteered to extend us that courtesy. It is not fair, nor is it calculated to stimulate that spirit of good will and cooperation in the house which is certainly desirable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure the hon. member for Bow River will hardly think it was part of my duty or privilege to extend him any invitations on behalf of the government. My duty consisted in either accepting or refusing—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I made myself very clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman said he thought that I ought to have preferred certain requests. I felt that if any invitations were being issued, and inasmuch as the government was issuing them my responsibility consisted in either accepting or refusing the invitation extended. As regards the question of the hon. gentleman not having had any knowledge of the matter, as I have already pointed out, the Prime Minister's statement was made in this house —and it appears in Hansard—that he was sending a copy of the bill to myself.

Mr. BENNETT: I said it twice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As to my being an advocate of liberty, I have always felt, so far as the C.C.F. is concerned, that from the point of view of liberty they would prefer to make their own requests rather than have me make any on their behalf.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to corroborate, if corroboration is necessary, the statement made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to what transpired in connection with this bill. I stated in this chamber that I proposed to give him a copy of it. I later indicated to him in this chamber again that I proposed to do so, and I did so. I did that because he is the only leader of the opposition recognized by law at the present moment. Which leader was I to select other than the official leader of the opposition? He occupies a statutory position; he is recognized as such, and is provided with certain emoluments as a minister of the crown. Now, which leader of the other oppositions was one to select? The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) has been perfectly fair; he spoke of four or five parties. Was I to send an invitation to the hon. member for Acadia, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), or the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail)? And I was forgetting the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

I did what I fancy any leader of a government would have done under similar circumstances, and I may say to my hon. friends in the southeast corner that the very reason I did it publicly in this house was to afford an opportunity for any statement to be made, if that was thought desirable, by others representing other sections or parties.

I confess that as to the number of parties in this house I have no clear understanding.

In my capacity I know only the official leader of the opposition, who appears in the statute and is provided for therein, and I must treat him as such. And I do. But when you ask me to deal with the hon. member for Acadia to-day, and peradventure the hon. member for Bow River to-morrow, and possibly the member for Labelle or the member for Comox-Alberni as leaders of parties, I find it a little difficult to understand where I am at. Under these circumstances I did what any member in this house in my position would have done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The bill is still before the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. I stood in my place twice and said that I proposed to give a copy to the leader of the opposition, and no observations having been made, no suggestions, as sometimes has been the case in other matters, I thought that probably, for reasons that have been stated to-day, hon. gentlemen did not desire to participate in any discussions of the bill. At any rate, that is the fact.

The difficulties that we have had in dealing with this matter have been accentuated by statements that have appeared in the press. I did make a statement in the house with respect to what had appeared in one of the local papers. I have not yet ascertained the source of that paper's information, but that was based upon what we call our typewritten statement of points that had to be considered, which was subsequently set up in type, in the form these matters have always taken. We did not direct the form; it came to us in the form of a bill. That first one we had before us, and there were other points being pressed upon us.

The draftsman of the bill was asked to deal with all the points that might arise for consideration. Two of them were embodied as clauses not in the bill that it is proposed to submit to the house but in the rough draft of a bill that was discussed at a conference between the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Justice and his associates. The unfortunate telegrams that were sent to western Canada I cannot think were calculated to advance the interests of democracy. In one instance the correspondent of the paper alleged that his information came from official sources. In the other instance he quoted a section of what he said was a bill. There is only one way in which a document becomes a bill and that is on its introduction into the house as such. Since I have been in office I have found drafts of bills that were considered and thought of but that never saw the light of day. I know one many years old that is in the privy council office. These bills were outlines of ideas that were in the minds of some ministers who thought those ideas might be adopted. But until they are introduced into the house, they are not bills in the exact sense of the term. When at this time the government had a draft bill ready which it proposed to introduce, that was made use of to create passions and prejudices in certain quarters against the government and against certain candidates in an election in Saskatchewan. We can, however, eliminate that for the moment; the explanation has been made and it is not necessary to deal with the matter further.

But I have had some difficulty personally with regard to one phase of this question and I think it is a phase to which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has just referred: that is, under this legislation shall a body of lawbreakers who have successfully flouted the law be dealt with when it comes to a question of the franchise? One hesitates to deal with this by name because it is undesirable to mention by name. How are we to use terms so general as to be able to meet the situation? There was no intention of dealing with any sect within any province other than those in British Columbia. The difficulty is that we have for the first time in this country a successful and open defiance of the law, because it was successful, I am sorry to say. I now relate to the committee what I have not done before. When the census was being taken it gave His Majesty's ministers and council a great many hours of difficulty to determine how we were going to deal with this situation. It is very wrong to let people think they can openly and successfully flout the law of Canada; on the other hand, is it worth while to send an armed force of police and others at great expense and with much publicity to overcome this resistance? In the next place, if you overcome their resistance you cannot compel them to give you the accurate information that the census returns require. Finally, we secured the best estimate we could as to the numbers of men, women and children comprised in the colonies and as hon. members know, the house gave to the minister the necessary financial support to establish a special penitentiary on the Pacific coast where there are now, I believe, upwards of five hundred incarcerated.

Just what language should be used and whether such a provision should be made at all, is a matter that has been up for consideration and has been carefully studied, and I say frankly that we have not yet been able to arrive at an adequate solution. The problem is a very difficult one. At one time I thought of asking my colleague the Minister of Justice to leave a blank clause and to indicate what had to be dealt with, but as he very properly pointed out to me, that is not a sound way to introduce legislation. The matter is still giving us much thought and we are meeting to-night for the purpose of trying to arrive at some method with which to deal with it. I have very frankly, without any restraint, given the committee the facts regarding this problem.

With regard to the other point about which so much political capital has been made in some parts of the country, I suppose it must be within the knowledge of many members that we have had many and great difficulties in our courts. The Minister of Justice referred to his difficulty in reading reports of cases. There is the difficulty of securing an interpreter who is conversant with both English and the language of the person who is before the court in either criminal or civil proceedings. As the Naturalization Act provides that the granting of a certificate is predicated upon an adequate knowledge of either English or French, the question has been put to me and, I fancy, to many members on the other side as to what method should be adopted. The draftsman drew that clause for the purpose of having it discussed.

I may say that when I handed the proposed bill to the leader of the opposition I had not even read it in detail; it has not been before council and the bill was not before council until after the discussion in conference took place. It was agreed that council alone could not deal with it, but I say to the committee that it raises a problem of very considerable magnitude. If people go about and try to raise passions and prejudices by saying that parliament is endeavouring to take away from persons the rights and privileges they enjoy, that argues ill for democracy and for its future. If the fact that an effort is made to ensure that there shall be some understanding of the country's institutions, proceedings and matters of that kind by those who exercise the right of franchise, is to be made the reason for arousing prejudices against the government, then of course you do not get very far with improving conditions; that is all there is about that. That is how that matter came up. I fancy there are in western Canada very few lawyers who have not had at some time or another a judge speak to them about this question. At times it has been found a little difficult to proceed because of inability to secure an interpreter who would be able with sufficient mastery of English and the language of the settler to place the matter properly before the court. It must be remembered that these people are British subjects under the naturalization law. Sometimes when we express opinions with regard to some of these matters we are not quite familiar with all circumstances and difficulties with which we have to deal. Those were two problems that were mentioned to the draftsman as having been pressed upon the attention of the government. He made the notation on them in the manner in which the committee has it and it was dealt with at the little conference in the way indicated.

With respect to the matter mentioned by the leader of the opposition as to the two enumerators, I quite appreciate the force of his observation and of his argument with regard to an appeal to a judge. I do not think there will be any difficulty in that connection. The only reason it was left in the form in which it is, that is that it was not dealt with at all, is this: there were two considerations that should be brought to the attention of the committee before it is finally disposed of. One is the question of time; there must be no undue delay with respect to the matter, otherwise there would never be finality with regard to the lists; the other was to provide for simplicity of appeal, if possible without expense. Those two factors must be borne in mind and in addition, if there is a considerable body of appeals, you have the civil business of the district or county court judge to deal with in considering matters of this kind. I speak feelingly about this because under our present statute it became necessary to take appeals on several occasions; there was one instance in which I was interested and the delays were so considerable as to cause great difficulty to members of the house. The effort here—not the effort of the government only but the effort of this house, if they receive the measure which the Minister of Justice will submit to them—the collective effort of this house, without the government having any fixed ideas as to what is best, but hoping that the house itself will express its opinion as to what is best, will be to secure an honest expression of public opinion with respect to matters that are submitted to them at a general or by-election as the case may be. Now, I know the difficulties; I have not run in as many elections as I have without knowing the intolerable expense that candidates are put to in checking up existing lists under present conditions. A few hundred dollars would pay a candidate's entire election expenses in my constituency of West Calgary except for this. But in the last election checking up those lists literally cost me thousands of dollars. It is an exceedingly difficult thing. And I fancy that experience in a big city confirms that. One of my friends told me that in one of the large cities the cost was absolutely prohibitive. Those are the factors that we have in mind. The plan of having the elector sign his or her name was suggested to the House of Commons in 1917 or thereabouts—I am not sure whether to the house or to the government—but it was felt at that time that that would be too cumbersome a thing, and nothing was done. British Columbia adopted that plan and found it worked satisfactorily, because there is room on the sheet signed by the elector for him or her to sign again, so that the question of impersonation can be settled at once by comparison of the two signatures. What the right hon. gentleman has said as to the desirability, nay the necessity of the authenticity of the first signature being established is beyond question.

Mr. MERCIER (Outremont): Has that clause been effective in British Columbia?

Mr. BENNETT: I am told that it has rendered almost insignificant the number of cases in which it had to be used, because they knew it was there.

Mr. VENIOT: It scared them.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the fact of it being there had a deterrent effect. That is my information. I think Hon. Mr. Oliver put it on the statute book. I recall discussions that have taken place with many public men on both sides of politics at various times as to how this situation could be met, and this is the method we have adopted. I but state what is known to many people; I remember being told by a friend of mine that he had seen someone off on the train who had voted forty-seven times that day.

Mr. JACOBS: He took the train at once, did he?

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly did. I merely mention that; it was not in the west. I am bound to say that in the west very little of that happens. I say that in no sense of pride but merely as a statement of fact; I suppose it arises from the fact that we are not very numerous out there and therefore we know one another, the scrutineers are sufficiently acquainted with the people of the district in which they live to know quite well if a person came down to vote in my name who in fact was not myself. I am told for instance that in one election in one of the great cities of this country several leading citizens appeared to vote and found that their votes had already been cast. They call that "telegraphing." Then I was informed not long since that in one of the great cities of the world, not in Canada, complete outfits of stage properties, wigs and clothes, were provided for the purpose of carrying on telegraphing on a very large scale during the whole day of an election. This is an effort to stop that. It has been found effective as a deterrent in British Columbia; I believe it will be here.

On the question of appeal I do not anticipate that there will be any difficulty, providing we surround it with some safeguards that will make it clear that it is not to be used to bring about undue delay. I would like to point out that in England the revising barristers complete the work and do it in a very satisfactory way. Under extraordinary conditions there is provision for appeal—there was, I am not sure about the present law. The revising officers in the counties in England are paid a fairly reasonable stipend. I hope we shall be able to do the work in this country without undue expense, although as I said to the leader of the opposition, and say publicly here, I do not think that we should worry very much about spending a few dollars to secure decent lists in a country like this if we are to make our contribution to democracy. I hold that very strongly.

I have only this to add, that I deprecate more than I can say that an effort should have been made by false statements—because no bill has yet been submitted to this house—to create a prejudice in the minds of people whom we are trying to develop into good Canadians. The best way to develop them into good Canadians is to indicate as clearly as possible that they will be fairly and honourably and honestly treated, but that the same treatment is accorded to them as to others in this country. And secondly I regret, that it should be thought necessary to suggest that because we had to deal with an extraordinary condition in British Columbia, of which I have not yet found a solution that is satisfactory to me at least, that thereby it was thought that we were endeavouring to insert the thin end of the wedge to disfranchise people with whom we were not pleased. I realize the strength of every observation made by the hon. member for Bow River, nevertheless I do think that the peculiar circumstances of this case require that something be done to assert the supremacy of the law against those who have so deliberately, so defiantly and so successfully, flouted it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As one of the younger members of this house, both as to length of service and length of years, I was naturally very much interested in the beautiful presentation of the case by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). Everything he said indicated fairness itself. It was rather unfortunate that it reminded me of an equally beautiful speech by the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) last year on the introduction of the redistribution bill. I have recollections yet of the cold steel that was used on that occasion, and I was wondering if we are due for similar disillusionment following the beautiful speech this afternoon of the Minister of Justice. Any how I know something about closed lists; nobody is going to fool me about them, when they are conducted with one government enumerator. It was because it was so obviously unfair in some cases with some enumerators that the government in 1930 gave the opposition an enumerator. In all my political experience I do not know of the opposition ever being given such a fair opportunity as that. That was fairness in action, not merely in words.

Well now, I would like to look up the history of closed election lists in Canada. We had a closed list in Canada once, in 1896. I remember it well, and it was when the government of that day also had its back to the wall. And it was a dandy closed list. I was a scrutineer at a poll and I know what was done the night before. I would have to look up the election law and see whether that election in the west was held within the law, before I would care to say much more about it. But I would suggest to the ministry that fair words alone do not go very far in politics. I would like them to give us an opportunity to look into this matter; let it ride a little while until we look into the statutes of former years and possibly consult our constituents and see what they think about this. The year 1896 is a long time ago; there are very few people voting to-day who recall what happened then, so I would like this bill not to be rushed too rapidly. Do not let us get into a trance by mere fair words. We got out of any trance we may have been in last year on the redistribution bill mighty quick, and I am prepared to get out of any trance that I may be in now, although I do not think I am in any.

Mr. POWER: Since I was fairly closely connected with the revision of the present act, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may be permitted to make a few observations with respect to the bill shortly to be before the house. And may I say that in doing so I wish to carry on the tradition which was established in that committee, namely that of looking at these problems in an effort to take politics out of elections or elections out of politics, as you may choose to put it. I believe that it is not in the best interests of any party in power to endeavour to take advantage of its majority to bring in legislation which might have the effect of giving to the opposition party or to any opposite parties an opportunity of telling the people of this country that they have been unfairly dealt with in the making up of the lists or in the conduct of the elections themselves. I think it is a sound political axiom that it is to the advantage of an opposition to go into an election campaign with a grievance as to the manner in which they have been treated. That this axiom is sound I think has been well exemplified this afternoon, when the only non-political party in the house has seen fit to take advantage of an apparent oversight in order to begin the discussion of this bill with a chip on its shoulder.

Following the point of view I have laid before the committee may I say that in many respects I think this bill deserves the commendation of hon. members. The first good point is the shortness of the time during which an election campaign will be waged. There is no doubt in the minds of most of us that a campaign lasting fifty-eight days, as is necessary under the act we now have, is far too long not only for the members of parliament but also for the people of this country. They sicken of the discussion of political issues; they become confused and in the end, I have no doubt, make up their minds all of a sudden, without giving to the questions before them that consideration which I think would be given if they had a shorter time in which to consider them. This may sound paradoxical, but I believe that because the time is of such great length the people tend to become confused and do not give the clear, sound, sane judgment which they should on the matters brought before them.

I cannot commend the government too highly on the effort they are making, though it may not be entirely successful, to do away with personation, plugging, telegraphing or whatever it may be called. Perhaps all the members of this house have not had the experience some of us have had in some of the cities of the province from which I come. I think, however, that members from the cities of Montreal and Quebec, and perhaps even from Toronto, will frankly admit that it has reached the point where it is very easy for those who have the organization, those who lack conscience and those who have ability in that direction to cheat the will of the people and elect persons to this parliament who are not entitled to be elected.

Mr. PORTEOUS: That reflects on the house.

Mr. POWER: This may reflect on the house, but we are speaking frankly and discussing this bill from a non-partisan standpoint. Anyone who has taken part in the elections in the cities of my province will agree with what I have said. I am told, though I have no authority for saying so, that this condition exists in some cities of Ontario, but my information is similar to that expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) this afternoon, that the custom of telegraphing, of plugging and so on obtains less and less as one travels towards the west. It may be, as the Prime Minister has said, that the western people know one another better, or it may be that they are not so well versed in the degenerate arts of politics as those of us who have had more to do with them in the past. In any case, it has come to such a pass that to my own knowledge in my own city it has become the jest of the tea parties among the ladies to see who will see to it that so and so's servant girl votes in such a direction. They say so without shame; they take it as a joke, as a farce. It has become a sort of game, like bridge, a game of bluff.

So I cannot speak too strongly or too earnestly on this point. People who are accustomed to carrying on this sort of election campaign, however, will not be easily deterred or defeated. Laws which under ordinary circumstances would deter people from taking the chance of a criminal prosecution are not likely to deter them at election time. In any case, however, because of this first attempt, because the government is endeavouring to the best of its ability to bring in some legislation which will prevent this state of affairs, I am prepared to give this particular phase of the bill my heartiest support.

Now I should like to say a word with regard to closed lists, which I assume means closed lists only in the cities, lists which will be made before the election campaign is inaugurated and which will be closed at a certain date. On those lists the election will be decided. In principle I have always felt that such lists would be admirable. As a matter of fact during the sittings of the committee of 1929 and 1930, as you, Mr. Chairman, and other members who are now in the house will recall, this matter of closed lists was discussed. Mr. O. M. Biggar, former chief electoral officer, prepared a bill covering the whole closed list situation. The idea which he presented to us was that the post offices throughout the country should be used as registration offices and that the moment the writs were issued for an election the lists would be closed. At any time during the year except during the time a campaign was in progress in that particular constituency an individual would go to the post office and make out a form of affidavit; his name would be forwarded to the chief electoral officer at Ottawa, who would return a receipt to the applicant and also notify both or any political parties in the riding in which the man was registered. Meanwhile the list would be printed in Ottawa and kept continuously in print, adding names as they came through from time to time to the chief electoral officer. The objection to this came from hon. members on both sides of the house, and I think perhaps the same objection exists to some extent in the legislation proposed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). The objection was that members of parliament individually would be obliged to set up their own organizations in order to deal with the checking of applications as they were forwarded from the chief electoral officer. This was a matter of some considerable expense to the individual member, and particularly in cases such as we have in the province of Quebec where there are no ward, county, riding or city associations which are prepared to bear the expense of the researches, the inquiries and if necessary the contestation of any names put on the list. That system was rejected unanimously by the committee. There was no question of partisan feeling or party politics and, Mr. Chairman, I know you will bear me out in that statement.

As I understand the Minister of Justice, in connection with the outlined closed list system, as soon as the house prorogues there will be an enumeration, and I assume within a stated time the lists will be closed, and that those lists having been closed will serve for the purposes of any election which may take place until such time as a revision of the list is made, probably next year.

Mr. BENNETT: Next year.

Mr. POWER: Am I to understand there is to be a yearly revision?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what is contemplated.

Mr. POWER: First there is to be a general enumeration of the people. Then, at a stated time the lists will be closed, and then afterwards in each year there will be a revision, not an enumeration. The objection I find to that—it is one which has no bearing whatsoever on party politics, but should, I believe, appeal to every hon. member representing a city constituency—is that it is almost impossible outside of election times, and even during election times, as has been pointed out by the Prime Minister, to get the people on their own initiative to come to register. The Prime Minister has expressed himself as having been obliged to spend large sums of money in order to bring persons to the registration booths.

Mr. BENNETT: To check them up.

Mr. POWER: And in order to check them up; perhaps I misunderstood the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Both.

Mr. POWER: Possibly the Prime Minister meant both. In the part of the country from which I come it costs almost as much to bring people to register, even when the lists are made during an election, as it does to bring them to the polls. I make that statement with full knowledge of the fact that bringing them to the polls is illegal. I say however that it costs almost as much to get those people to register, and perhaps it costs a little more in our province owing to the fact that as the women have not the franchise in the provincial elections they have not yet become accustomed to the exercise of the franchise in the federal elections. If it costs the individual member that much money during election times, I leave it to the imagination of hon. members on both sides of the house to decide what it will cost in a year when there are no elections. Let us suppose that there is an election this year, and that there will be no elections for three or four years to come. Next year, unless almost superhuman efforts are made by political parties or their representatives, it will be impossible to obtain any registration at all. It is a sad statement to make, but the fact is that the people of this country will not look after their own votes. I think that is the experience of any hon. member who represents a city constituency; no doubt he has found that the people themselves will not go to find out whether or not they are registered.

Mr. GOBEIL: That is the case in the provincial lists.

Mr. POWER: It is the case in any lists. The provincial lists are usually made up by municipal councils and in the cities they are prepared by the assessors and certain other people appointed for that purpose. If I understand this legislation correctly, a registration bureau will be opened and it will be the duty of each individual voter of his own accord to come and have himself registered. It may be a reflection on the patriotism of my fellow citizens, but—

Mr. BENNETT: He will be enumerated, he will not have to come. He or she will be enumerated in the first instance, and if by any chance either one is left off he or she may go and register.

Mr. POWER: I comprehend what the Prime Minister has said, namely, that in the first instance he will be enumerated. At this time I am not endeavouring to make any objections to the bill; I am endeavouring to commend those sections which should be commended, and altogether apart from any party interest I am endeavouring to point out to all hon. members wherein we shall be obliged to make some provision to cover the registrations at the second, third or fourth annual revisions in the cities. The Prime Minister has said that he or she will be enumerated in the first instance. But perhaps the right hon. gentleman is not familiar with the fact that in large cities such as Montreal—and this was shown very clearly before the elections committee—there is a movement of twenty-five per cent of the population per annum. So that even though a person were enumerated in the month of July, on the first of May in the province of Quebec a migration of population takes place in the cities, and in the province of Ontario a similar migration takes place in the month of October. There is a movement of at least twenty-five per cent of the population within the city from one address to another address in that city. Sometimes the migration is confined to one within the constituency, but more often it is without. That is altogether apart from young men and women who have reached the age of twenty-one years, from strangers coming into the city, from persons who have been naturalized and persons who for any other reasons have become qualified to vote. Figuring on twenty-five per cent for a four year period, we see that there is a 100 per cent migration, but we cannot figure exactly in that manner because, as hon. members know, some people remain at the same addresses year after year. The migration, nevertheless has been calculated at least twenty-five per cent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But their names would be in the same division. They could go back and vote.

Mr. POWER: Not necessarily. When I speak of the twenty-five per cent migration, I have in mind the example most familiar to me, namely that of the city of Quebec. The division of Quebec West, so ably represented in this house by the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), is just across the street from the division which I represent. There is a continuous migration to and fro. After the first of May those who have been living in the St. Sacrement section of the division represented by the Solicitor General might very well move across the street and live in that section of St. Sacrement which I represent in this house. The same would apply with respect to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), and this movement cannot be controlled.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But they would be on the lists.

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And it would be a matter of only a few months until a new list was prepared. I inquired about this matter as it applies to England. I learned that they have the same difficulty over there, particularly in London. People living in one division move to another. If an election comes along before the second revision they go back and vote in the division in which they formerly lived.

Mr. POWER: But the point I make is that those who have so migrated, although they may be on the lists in, let us say the division represented by the Solicitor General, will not take the trouble to register themselves in the division in which they reside.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will not have to; they will be on the list.

Mr. POWER: They will be on a list, but they will not be on the list in the division in which they reside.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There will be a hiatus there. They will vote where they are on the list until the next revision takes place.

Mr. POWER: I would suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice that that would hardly be the proper way to make a list which is representative of any given constituency. If they will not register the first year, they will not register the second or third year, and when the election comes on they will have been perhaps two or three years away from the place where they were when the enumeration was made. Those people will still be entitled to vote in the electoral division represented, let us say, by the solicitor general whereas they will have been residing let us say, in my division or in that of the hon. member for Quebec East for three years. Unless there is a check made by the individual member of parliament, and at the cost of the member of parliament, there is no way of controlling it. A member of parliament does not want to represent people who have not resided in his division for two or three years or does he want to deprive people who have been residing in his division for two or three years of the right to vote in the place where they live, and unless we can find some means of providing that the government will assist in the making of the second and third and fourth annual revisions, I fear that the object which the Minister of Justice has in mind will be defeated. I am making this point not from any partisan motive because it affects equally all members who represent city constituencies. Almost inevitably it will place on their shoulders a financial burden which it will be very difficult for most of them to bear. It seems to me that if it were at all possible this burden should be borne by the state and not by the individual member.

With respect to some of the other matters which have been brought to our attention by the Minister of Justice may I say that though I have not had any experience of the matter myself the tradition exists throughout the country that the actions of the revising barristers in 1892 and 1896 were such that no one desired that we should return to that system, which made it possible for revising barristers at their will and discretion, and probably at the behest of their political friends, to place on the list or to bar from the list those whom they thought friendly or dangerous. I sincerely hope that the revising officer may have his powers so restricted and curtailed that nothing of this nature will be possible, or that there will be some system of appeal whereby the courts of the country will be called upon to give final judgment as to whether or not a person is qualified to vote. I entirely agree with what has been said by the minister that in this event there should be some arrangement whereby appeals will be expedited. It would be useless to have an appeal to the courts if the procedure was of such a nature that persons who were entitled to vote or persons who for some reason should be excluded from voting could indefinitely hold up the judgments of the court.

There is one more thing to which I should like to make a reference before I take my seat. When we had a revision of the list in 1929 and 1930 an attempt was made by some members of the committee to do away with what we called the hypocrisy of what exists in the election act—those provisions of the act which make crimes where no crimes exist, which make it illegal and sometimes an indictable offence to do things which every one of us knows is being done in every election. I refer to the employment of canvassers; I refer to the payment of the transportation of voters—

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is in the other act. This deals with the voters' list.

Mr. POWER: I do hope that if we have a chance to revise the elections act—

Mr. BENNETT: You will.

Mr. POWER: —that we shall have a chance to efface from our statutes provisions which are more noticeable in the breach than in the observance. What is the use, I ask you, Mr. Chairman, of placing on the statute books laws which will disqualify or annul the election of any member here when every member, or almost every member does his best to evade that law when election time comes. I leave this thought in the minds of the committee, that if there is any way of taking the hypocrisy out of the election act and making it a square, fair and honest one it would be far better for the country as a whole.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Mr. Chairman, during the past three weeks I must have received over three dozen letters from individuals all over the west who have asked me whether there is some diabolical scheme on foot on the part of the government to disfranchise certain citizens of this country. It was therefore with a great deal of relief that I heard the Minister of Justice say that the section with regard to the language qualification would be deleted from the forthcoming bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has not been in any bill and it is not going to be in the bill to be introduced.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: In any case it was spread all over Canada that there was a scheme emanating from a draft bill of the government whereby certain citizens of this country were to be disfranchised at the next election. Personally I do not think that a language qualification is a real criterion by which to measure the intelligence of a voter for I know a great many citizens of Canada who are not able themselves to speak either English or French but who, nevertheless have children in the universities of this country. I know of cases where men who cannot speak adequately either English or French have given to this country at least four or five children who have developed into the finest type of citizen that this country could ask for. I have in mind one of them, a young lady who graduated from Manitoba university a couple of years ago with the highest possible standing that could be given to any student. I know many similar young men and women throughout the whole country. It is not so much on behalf of the old people who cannot speak English or French, although I strenuously object to their proposed disfranchisement, that I am speaking at the present time, but on behalf of their children because if their parents are disfranchised it certainly casts some reflection on these very able young people.

Even if such a language qualification were imposed by the law who would be able to judge whether a man could speak English or French? I can vizualize the hon. member for New Westminster being disfranchised by the man who had the final say in the matter because the latter might claim he could not speak English and who might say to the hon. member: You have not an adequate knowledge of English. You speak with a distinct Scotch burr. A lot of these people who cannot speak English or French are splendid citizens, highly industrious, honest, law-abiding and very intelligent. I know that in 1930 they went to the polls in droves and voted for the present government. I leave it to the present government to say whether or not that was a criterion of their intelligence.

That is all I have to say in regard to this bill. I am very glad to hear from the lips of the Minister of Justice that no such thing is contemplated as a language qualification for voting.

Mr. BROWN: There are one or two things that I should like to say. I am fully aware of the difficulties of providing for an election list that will be satisfactory in all respects. There has been a good deal said about the crookedness with which elections have been carried out in the past but I want to bear this testimony. In the four elections which I have run in order to come to this house I have not had a single complaint to make against a Conservative returning officer or enumerator or against a Liberal returning officer or enumerator. It is true that in some cases mistakes were made. The officers did not understand all their duties and all their instructions, but I think they carried on the elections with perfect fairness. As regards closed lists, we have found in our part of Manitoba that the provision that allowed men to swear in their votes on election day worked very satisfactorily. In my own constituency I never heard of its being abused by either party. I found it particularly satisfactory in regard to young men or young women who had come of age just a short time before the election, and therein I see some hardship if the lists are revised only annually. It is quite possible that a young man or woman might not be of age when the list was finally revised and might therefore be precluded from voting not only at that election but perhaps for a period of five years. I speak with some feeling on this matter, because through a combination of circumstances I was twenty-nine years old before I was ever able to vote. My first vote was cast in the province of Quebec and since then I have been voting in Manitoba.

An hon. MEMBER: Was it a good vote?

Mr. BROWN: Yes, it was a good vote. Some consideration should be given to this, that young men and young women who perhaps are not of age at the time the list was finally prepared ought to be afforded an opportunity, if possible, of having their names recorded immediately after coming of age.

As regards the provision for signing the name on the list, I make no complaint. I think it is an attempt to secure us against that evil of personation on which emphasis has been laid. But, so that we may know these things better when the bill is before us, I should like to ascertain whether the enumerator has to go to the elector to secure his signature or whether it is left to the elector to come to the enumerator. Evidently they have to sign a list of some kind in order to be identified when they come to the poll. However, we shall probably find out these things more definitely when the bill is before us.

Another feature which I hope will appear in the new act is that the provision for removing dead timber from the list shall be a little more satisfactory than it has been in some instances. In Manitoba this was under provincial law. We had for a time a law requiring registration, but the conditions laid down for the removing of dead timber from the list were so onerous that it was almost impossible to convince a judge that these names should not be on the list. I know that names continued to appear on the list six or seven years after they should have been removed, owing to the impossibility of submitting to the judge the necessary evidence. I trust that these points are being taken care of in the new act.

Mr. NEILL: I agree very much with the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Brown). I wish to say a few words on behalf of an element that has not been dwelt on to any extent this afternoon, and that is the large country district. I know little about conditions in the city, for I am not familiar with them: I am talking solely about conditions that prevail in the large scattered areas in British Columbia, in which the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser), the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. Munn) and I are interested.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is right when he says that impersonation has been largely done away with in British Columbia by the system of signing your name when you go to vote, but he is not on such sound ground when he holds up British Columbia as an object lesson as regards the other features of his bill, because he has not copied British Columbia; he has taken only a small portion of their act. Let me show the difference.

As far as I can judge from this legislation, there is to be a revision once a year. That is not the way in British Columbia, although the minister suggested that it was. There is a permanent voters' list in British Columbia, but it is revised every three months, and that makes a great difference, and before the election is held there is a special court of revision. The court is held within a few weeks of the election. I do not remember what the period was in the last provincial election, but it was only a matter of weeks before the election that the court of revision was held. The list formerly was revised every six months but now it is revised at intervals of three months, so that voters can get on the list.

The minister did not advert to the fact that British Columbia makes some provision for the man who has moved and is not on the list in the district in which he resides. We have a system of absentee voting which is not suggested under this legislation. That absentee vote permits a man who has moved from one district in which he is registered into another district where he is not, to vote in the latter. He cannot afford the money to go back to vote in the district in which he is registered and therefore he is allowed to vote in the district in which he is residing, though not for the candidates in that district but for the candidates in the district in which he is registered. The absentee vote is placed in a special envelope.

There is a third point which was highly commendable in the dominion act and which will be done away with now, and that is what is known as swearing oneself in on election day. Suppose an enumerator, through carelessness or malice aforethought or for some other reason, neglected to put a man on the voters' list; or suppose he did not happen to be there at the time the enumerator made up the list. By the dominion act the voter could go on election day and take an oath, provided he got someone on the list to vouch for him, swearing that he had been sixty days within the electoral district and so many days in the particular polling district, and he would be allowed to vote. He was sworn, and if he made a false affidavit he could be followed up and punished. That system has not been abused to any extent worth mentioning. Now, as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) says, the first principle of such legislation should be to see that every man who is qualified and entitled to vote gets his chance; but under this legislation that will be very far from being the case.

One other thought. I see the minister taking notes. I hope he will particularly take note of the question of dealing with transients and also with that of having the revision take place oftener than once a year. I notice great stress was laid on the desirability of shortening the period before an election. When the hon. member for Acadia approved the action of the government he received considerable support from my friends to the right and it seems to be a general feeling that a shorter period is desirable. It is desirable principally for those who live in cities where a man can go and address a meeting of two thousand people every night for a fortnight and thus cover his electors. That cannot be done in a rural district. In my constituency there will be something like 150 polling stations at the next election; there were 108 at the last one. Presumably it is proposed to cover that ground in twenty-eight days. If you count out Sundays, that will mean six and a half meetings every day, which is an absolute impossibility. The average meeting in the riding I represent would run about forty people to each; the very highest would not be more than from 350 to 400 and the smallest would be a dozen, perhaps twenty. You would have to go by launch possibly twenty miles to meet those twenty people and it would be impossible to hold more than one meeting in one little place in one day. It is proposed to compel candidates to cover an area with 150 polling stations in twenty-eight days, or it might be twenty-one days, as the Minister of Justice intimated. How can this be done? Is it fair to the candidates? Is it fair to the member? It may be said that the member has as good a chance as anybody else, but he has not, because his opponent may be busily canvassing the district while we are sitting here. This proposal puts a handicap upon the sitting member.

Again, reference was made to Great Britain. I do not think one could get a poorer illustration in this case than to quote Britain as an example. Compare the vast spaces of the districts in the prairies and British Columbia and then point to Britain as a suitable illustration or something to copy! That was not the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were talking about the marketing bill. Then they found a thousand reasons that on account of the compact, small, and highly populated area, they did not think it was appropriate to use certain standards or principles. This is a case where there cannot be any possible comparison between conditions in Great Britain and those in Canada.

By the way, someone said that it was necessary, and surely it is a sound principle, that people should be or have a chance to be informed before they cast their votes. The only way in which they can be informed, unless by reading partisan newspapers, is by hearing the candidates, and if they did so, they would at least have a run for their money. How can that be done if the election is to be carried out in twenty-four or possibly twenty-one days in an area such as I have mentioned in British Columbia? My district has over 2,000 miles of coast line with little settlements scattered along it. There are only 100 miles of railway in it and most of the travelling has to be done by launch or motor car. I quite agree with the idea that a shorter period is desirable for a city election, but justice must be done; the law must be made to apply to all cases, and I strongly protest against the injustice that will be done in those three instances I have indicated. I shall only repeat that I am thoroughly familiar with the subject so far as my district is concerned and I have no hesitation in saying that this proposal means the disfranchisement of hundreds of electors.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I desire to reserve until the bill is before the house, any remarks I wish to make. I am pleased that the Prime Minister has stated that the questions of double enumerators and of appeals from the revising officer to a judge have not been definitely settled and that provisions with regard to them might be inserted in the bill. As it is not yet ready I wish to emphasize the necessity of incorporating those two features in order to make the bill acceptable to everyone on this side.

I understand the people will be enumerated only for the basic list which will be prepared and then a yearly revision will be made by the revising officer in each constituency without the help of enumerators. That makes it more necessary to have in the law the right of appeal from the revising officer at the yearly revisions.

There is one question I should like to ask the Minister of Justice: Has the question of bachelors who are at the present time employed in relief camps in many parts of the country been considered? Are they supposed to give their votes at the places where they are at present working or will they register their votes at the places from which they came? Has that question been considered at all?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There has been no change in regard to the residence qualification as it appears in the statute to-day. The matter is under consideration. I mean to say that no decision has been made. So far as the residential qualification is concerned, there is no provision for any change, but if these relief camps are going to be in existence for some time, some consideration will probably have to be given to that subject.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. BURY: May I ask with the consent of the house to revert to the order of presenting reports and motions?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The house having reverted to the order for presenting reports by standing and select committees:

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the sixth report of the select standing committee on standing orders and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 100, respecting the St. Clair Transit Company—Mr. Gray.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, respecting shipping—Mr. Duranleau—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Subsections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On subsection 5—British ship registered in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. REID: Stand.

Mr. BENNETT: No, carried.

Mr. REID: I thought it was the understanding that clauses on which there may be a great deal of contention would be allowed to stand.

Mr. BENNETT: But these are only definitions, they have no substantive effect. The rest of the bill depends on the definition given to these words.

Mr. REID: But in connection with some other definitions that affect the port of New Westminster I have some amendments to move.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be time enough when we reach them.

Mr. REID: But this is one of them.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, let us have it.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 2, subsection 6—Builders' mortgage.

Mr. DUFF: Before we proceed any further with this bill I again appeal to the government not to place myself and some other members in this position. We are dealing with one of the most important bills introduced this session, one which I know very little about and for which I do not intend to take any responsibility in the way of accepting either the definitions, the clauses or anything else. I feel that I am not qualified as a member of this house to deal properly with this bill. I do not feel that I can move any amendments to the definitions or the clauses or the schedules without consulting people who know a great deal more about these matters than I do. Consequently if the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) and the government intend to proceed with this bill, as far as I am concerned I make this protest here and now. If they want to go ahead and carry the definitions or the sections or the schedules let them go ahead on their own responsibility.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I make the same protest, Mr. Chairman.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 7 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On subsection 13—Coast of Canada.

Mr. REID: I would probably adopt the same attitude as some hon. members on this side of the house were it not for the fact that I know how difficult it is once a bill is passed to have it reopened and amended. Therefore under the circumstances I cannot allow the bill to pass without endeavouring to have some changes made that I think should be made. I have an amendment to move to subsection 13.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Will my hon. friend permit me to interrupt?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I stated yesterday and I repeat that in my estimation there are not many sections which will prove controversial. I think my hon. friends will agree with me on that when they have read the whole bill. I told my hon. friend that any section that he wished should stand in order to have time to study it and make suggestions I am perfectly willing to let stand. With reference to those that concern the fishermen for instance. I told my hon. friend yesterday that I did not think anything in the bill was hurtful to the fishermen or to men engaged in the fishing industry. My hon. friend said I was wrong. I may be wrong but I say this, that by this bill we do not intend to injure in any way the fishermen or the people engaged in the fishing industry. I am willing to let all the sections which may affect them stand for the moment.

Mr. NEILL: For how long?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Oh well, until Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Mr. NEILL: That is no use.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That will be ample time to study this question.

Mr. NEILL: And to get word from the Pacific coast?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think my hon. friend needs word from the Pacific coast, he knows these subjects perfectly well. We do not want to injure the fishermen in any shape or form. We are prepared to accept any reasonable amendment suggested by my hon. friends.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the suggestion about subsection 13?

Mr. DUFF: The minister is very good to say that he is willing to do anything to help to amend this bill in any way which may be beneficial. He also said there were very few controversial clauses. I am sorry I cannot agree with that; there are a great many controversial clauses. Not only are there controversial clauses which I can see and which the minister can see and which other hon. members of this committee can see, but what I am afraid of is that I have not sufficient knowledge of my own to deal here with any clauses in this bill. I feel that before this bill is considered in this committee we should have the views of people who are vitally interested, both on the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast and the great lakes. There is my difficulty. I say to the minister that I am not going to take any responsibility for allowing any clauses to pass, because as I said I have not sufficient knowledge to say whether they are right and proper or not.

While I am on my feet let me say that since last night I have endeavoured to study a few more pages of this bill, turning from the definitions to the clauses and then to the schedules. In twenty-four hours I have read twenty-five more pages. I am now at page 99. The minister says he is willing to give us a couple of days more. I say that is not long enough. As far as I have gone in these definitions I find twenty-two objections in the definitions alone. Though I have found twenty-two objections in the 113 definitions I am afraid that I may not have found all of them. There are other people in this country who are vitally interested and who, if they had a chance to study this bill, instead of the twenty changes I have in mind might find forty. Take subsection 38 of this section. Does the minister know that a man cannot go to Hudson bay because of that subsection?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear; I was going to speak of that.

Mr. DUFF: The subsection reads:

"Home-trade voyage" means a voyage not being an inland or minor waters voyage between places within the area following, to wit:—Canada, the United States of America, the territory of Alaska not west of Cape Spencer, Newfoundland, Labrador, St. Pierre and Miquelon, in the course of which a ship does not go north of the 60th parallel of north latitude or south of the 36th parallel of north latitude.

Let me ask the Minister of Marine if he knows where the 60th north parallel is. As the minister knows, a parallel is like a half moon; at one end you can go to Greenland, but you cannot get past Cape Chidley into Hudson bay.

Mr. WHITE (London): I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Is he now in favour of the Hudson bay route?

Mr. DUFF: I was never in favour of the Hudson bay route, so far as building the railway was concerned. Every day I live I am more opposed to it, and I think more people are coming to believe that it never should have been built in the first place, and that we should not have spent $50,000,000 of the money of the people of Canada on it. But so far as the Hudson bay route is concerned my hon. friend and I are in the same position; he voted and I voted money for that purpose. Each of us was foolish, if I may be allowed to include him in the same category with myself.

I have these ninety-nine pages littered with my memoranda. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) is worried about this matter; no doubt he would like to move some amendments, as it is his duty to do. I am afraid that if the minister should adopt some suggestions of mine they may interfere with some of the other clauses in this bill or some of the definitions. Let me go a little further with regard to the sections I have read in the ninety-nine pages I have covered; let me count up and see how many I think are not right and should be amended.

An hon. MEMBER: Dispense.

Mr. DUFF: I will not dispense. I am taking my own time; if you do not like it, instead of sitting behind the curtain, get out. I have the floor, and I am going to take my own time in this committee. As a marine man interested in this legislation I have a perfect right to give my views. If my hon. friend has no views to give at least he might do me the courtesy of listening, as I always listen to him. I have not been able to go into all these clauses, but there are many that I think should be amended.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are they?

Mr. DUFF: I cannot tell what they are; it would take too long. There are at least twenty-five clauses with which I am not satisfied, at any rate. I say to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine that it is not fair to expect me, with my insufficient knowledge, to deal with this matter properly. In spite of the fact that this matter has been before another part of this parliament for two years; in spite of the fact that certain lawyers have endeavoured to draft it into proper shape, I say to the minister that it would be a mistake to put this act into force or carry any of these definitions or sections without giving the people of this country who are vitally interested in the matter a chance to state their views. Because I do not feel qualified to agree to any of these definitions or sections, so far as I am concerned I must sit here in my place and let somebody else carry them if they feel they should be put through as they now appear.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for New Westminster made some reference to the difficulty of reopening a bill after it was passed, with which we are well acquainted. I am willing to bet him the price of a hat, however, that if we pass this bill now in its present form there need be no fear but that it will be reopened next year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to say just a word in support of the contentions of my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). I have received certain representations from the Vancouver Chamber of Shipping in regard to many of the sections of this bill. I believe there are some eleven or twelve changes which they suggest in the particular section we are now considering, and I may add that in their communication they ask that the bill be well considered before being passed by the commons. They also ask that the other points in their memorandum, which are of equal importance, be considered before the bill is passed.

Mr. BENNETT: Did they see the final bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My information is that these representations were sent to the Senate last year, when bill J was before the Senate committee. I do not believe the representations were endorsed by that committee, but I am asked by a very important organization on the Pacific coast to raise these questions in committee. For instance, they want to add further definitions with regard to entry, goods, ship owner, warehouse, warehouseman, wharf, wharfinger, scow and so on. They want to re-define grain. They want to re-define the word "voyage" in section 3. They want me to discuss sections 116, 136, 156, 192, 209, 280, 366, 373, 528, 700, 721, 723 and so on. I do not suggest that I agree with all the representations made by this organization but I am supporting the contention of my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough that these representations have come to us from very important shipping organizations and federations throughout the country, and I believe at least they should receive the careful attention of this committee. In connection with this memorandum I should like to ask the minister if he would be good enough, if I leave the memorandum with him, to indicate the objections if any which he or the department may have to these representations as they affect the various sections of the bill. Possibly in that way we may be able to somewhat expedite the progress of the measure, and the representations which it is my duty to bring before the committee will have received full consideration.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have no objection to the suggestion of my hon. friend, but I should like to point out that some Vancouver associations were heard by the Senate committee. I believe some of the points raised by my hon. friend were brought forward there and discussed, and either accepted or refused. I know the Vancouver Chamber of Shipping sent representations almost similar to those suggested by my hon. friend, and the Merchants' Service Guild of Vancouver was heard by that committee also, or forwarded a memorandum containing what they suggested by way of amendment to the bill. I have no objection to letting the sections referred to by my hon. friend stand when they are called, and in the meantime we might look over his memorandum and see what we can do under the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to read to the minister what this organization say:

> During the 1933 session a bill to consolidate and amend the Canada Shipping Act, known as Bill J, was introduced into the Senate. This was a very extensive piece of legislation and received full and careful study by shipping interests here who, after six months hard work, prepared a submission. . . . These were sent to the hon. Minister of Marine, but in the interim the bill was withdrawn from the Senate owing to slight defects of which you are probably quite aware. For this reason our submissions never came before the Senate committee on banking and commerce to whom the bill has been remitted, as it had in the meantime been withdrawn.
> Apparently the hon. Minister of Marine has not thought fit to take cognizance of our suggestions as we find that the bill as reintroduced, now known as Bill E, to the Senate, has been changed only in one or two very minor respects in conformity with our recommendations.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think this statement is not correct, because all the representations received in the Department of Marine either by myself or by my officials were put before the man who was in charge of the drafting of Bill J, and moreover all the memoranda were placed before the Senate committee for study. For that reason I do not think the statement in the document to which the hon. member has referred is fair to my department.

Mr. DUFF: Is the minister referring to the gentleman who gave the interview in Vancouver and said with regard to this bill he would simply use scissors and a paste pot? Is that the person to whom he is referring?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I never saw the report about any interview of that kind.

Mr. DUFF: Well, it is true; he said that.

Mr. REID: Yes, Mr. Griffin, who drew up the bill, said he came to Ottawa with paste and scissors, because after he had been here and made the suggestions to the minister he wrote an article for the Province newspaper, a copy of which I have in my hand. But when the minister says only a few changes might occur, I must draw his attention to the fact that Mr. Griffin, the lawyer who was brought to Ottawa, said that most of the bill was drawn on the basis of the old country act.

Mr. DUFF: Which is not applicable here.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend must agree that the bill now before the committee is not Bill J. It has been entirely remodelled. As a matter of fact it was remodelled during the recess, and produced before the Senate as Bill E in the present session. Bill E was studied by the committee on banking and commerce, and was remodelled to so great an extent that it had to be reprinted. For those reasons I say that we have not Bill J before us.

Mr. REID: On that point, I should like to refer to two clauses in the bill which I believe were in Bill J, are now in Bill E, and which are very important. I refer first to the measurement of ships, which, I understand, is laid down by the Board of Trade of England and which are in the present bill. Then there is the matter of the definition of voyages, which I understand is the definition given by the Board of Trade, or contained in the British Shipping Act. I understand that in Bill E. we have adopted the words "home-trade voyage," the same as defined in the board of trade articles in Great Britain. Those subsections were in Bill J and are in the bill before us.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If the hon. member has any objection to those sections we will let them stand and see what can be done about it.

Mr. REID: I do object and I am drawing the minister's attention to the fact that what you are stating to the committee is not exactly correct, and am indicating that much of that which is now before the house has been copied from the British Shipping Act or the Board of Trade articles, and so has an important bearing upon the shipping of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member said he had some objection to subsection 13. What is the objection; what is the trouble?

Mr. REID: I have this objection to subsection 13, that inland waters such as those of the Fraser river, where for a distance of over eighteen miles salt and fresh water combine, are not defined in the bill. If one turns to subsections 35 and 41 he will find that Montreal is mentioned, and the seacoast of Canada shown in subsection 13, but the harbour of a port like New Westminster is not mentioned and should be. The words "inland waters" of the Fraser river should be in that definition.

Mr. BENNETT: The coast of Canada does not mean the inland waters; the hon. gentleman must take the definitions as we proceed with them. The coast of a country means simply what it says, namely the sea coast, the salt water bays, the gulfs and harbours on the sea coast of Canada. We must keep in mind the relative jurisdictions of the provinces and the dominion. The coast of the country is the contour following the parts touching salt water. There are other definitions dealing with the other points.

Mr. REID: The representations were made to me by a man well versed in shipping, and one who has had life experience in shipping matters, and he says that as a matter of international law a question might arise.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, unfortunately he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. REID: We will agree to differ on that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry to say that, because this definition cannot be modified without making it silly. The coast of a country is simply the coast of a country, not the rivers, or anything else.

Mr. REID: If the Prime Minister would look at subsections 35 and 41 he would see there definitions given concerning certain ports, and also ports on the salt water.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another thing altogether.

Mr. REID: It is complementary to subsection 13. That shows the difficulty we are having here in committee when we attempt to put amendments. I have here a legitimate amendment concerning the port of New Westminster, and the Prime Minister just throws it out and says it is not necessary. If that is the way I am to be treated I shall have to join the others in their protests.

Mr. DUFF: Do not take any responsibility for it at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe it was yesterday the Minister of Marine made the observation that he had had communications in the form of telegrams from some marine organizations asking that the bill be passed or pressed forward. Could he tell me the names of those organizations, and from whom he received the communications?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I gave the names yesterday. There was the National Association of Marine Engineers, Council No. 8. I had a communication from the Shipping Federation of Canada, an organization with branches throughout the dominion.

Mr. MITCHELL: From council No. 8?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, that was the other one. I received a wire from the Canada Steamship Lines, Limited, and a telegram from the executive council of the Canadian Navigation Federation, St. Lawrence division. The last communication I received was as follows:

> Respectfully submit very important shipping bill should go through and become law this session.

This telegram was signed by Mr. C. B. Hamelin.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am interested in the National Association of Marine Engineers, and I should like to know whether that organization spoke for the national association or for only one of the councils.

Mr. DURANLEAU: For one of the councils.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are eighteen councils.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They spoke for No. 8.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are seventeen others.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I stated that yesterday.

Mr. MITCHELL: A communication from one of them would not mean anything. I have communications from the national council asking for many amendments to the bill.

Mr. REID: Would the minister tell me how many of the 149 amendments sent by the Canadian Association of Seamen were adopted?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say offhand, but I know that they were very carefully considered and dealt with by the committee, who received the advice of the officials of my department.

Mr. REID: My information is that none of them was adopted, that they asked for personal representation and a chance to speak on matters which affected their very lives.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If none of them was adopted I suppose it is because the committee or subcommittee felt that they should not be embodied in this bill.

Mr. REID: Why should not the seamen have an opportunity to make personal representations when the safety of their lives depends on the provisions of this act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister received any representations from the Pacific coast that this bill be passed at this session?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I told the committee yesterday that I received these wires yesterday because these people had read in the papers the debate of last Friday when my hon. friends opposite insisted on having consideration of this bill postponed until next session. Of course, on the Pacific coast they had not yet read the debate in the papers—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are not as far away as that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They may have read short news items, but not the full debate of last Friday that appeared in the eastern papers.

Mr. DUFF: I could not find in the eastern newspapers a report of the full debate of Friday.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend did not read the Montreal newspapers.

Mr. DUFF: I did. I read the Montreal Star and the Gazette.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Their Saturday editions had a full report of the debate on Friday.

Mr. REID: In regard to the load line convention Canada is following her own course because Great Britain has a special act of fifty-four pages dealing with the load line.

Mr. BENNETT: That illustrates, Mr. Chairman, what I was trying to point out yesterday. If my hon. friend will read the load line convention he will see that it is international in character, and that it was signed by Great Britain, Canada, and the other nations of the world. It was ratified by this country, and Great Britain's is exactly the same as ours.

Mr. REID: My authority for that statement, now that it has been questioned, is the man that drew up the bill, Mr. Griffin. I have an article here by him in which he says that our load line is entirely different.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend is mistaken. Mr. Griffin never wrote this bill. He wrote Bill J.

Mr. DUFF: With scissors and paste.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 14 and 15 agreed to.

On section 2, subsection 16—Construction regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: The definition in this subsection refers to the load line convention. If my hon. friend from New Westminster will look at the appendix he will see the convention.

Mr. DUFF: Is the Prime Minister aware that in spite of the fact that Great Britain signed the load line convention a number of her colonies have not accepted it and will not accept it?

Mr. BENNETT: I tried to point out to the hon. gentleman yesterday that this is not a colony. I tried to point out further that the load line convention was executed, as he will see, by turning to the appropriate page—I gave it to him yesterday—by the representatives of the various countries listed from pages 389 to 394. The load line convention, 1930, appears in the bill beginning at page 389. He will see that it was signed on behalf of Canada by its representative, Mr. Alexander Johnston, Deputy Minister of Marine, and by the government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The names of the representatives of the United Kingdom are set out on page 391, Admiral Oliver, Captain Bate, etcetera, etcetera. It was also signed by the representatives of the governments of Greece, Norway, Mexico, Latvia, Japan, Italy, Iceland, France, Cuba, Chile, Belgium, Australia, India, Denmark, the Free City of Danzig, Spain, the Irish Free State, United States of America, Finland, New Zealand, Paraguay, The Netherlands, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Sweden and Soviet Russia. They agreed and signed the convention which was submitted for ratification to this house and which is binding upon us as well as the other countries to which I have referred.

Mr. DUFF: The Prime Minister did not quite get the import of my remark. What I said was that there were certain British colonies or dependencies—I was not referring to Newfoundland but I had in mind a British possession which has not adopted and does not intend to adopt this load line convention. In fact, I am seriously considering changing the registry of certain vessels I am interested in to that country so that I shall not be put to the expense of spending anywhere from $500 to $2,000 for something which in my opinion and the opinion of the other owners is not necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: Either the hon. gentleman does not seem to be willing to understand or he has not followed what has been said. This international convention was a convention which met in 1930; it was before the election of that year. Mr. Alexander Johnston represented the Dominion of Canada, and this house has ratified that convention. If the hon. gentleman desired to protest, the time to have done it was then, not now. This bill merely incorporates into the structure of the Shipping Act the provisions of that convention, which are binding upon us now because of the action that has been taken.

Mr. DUFF: Again we seem to be at cross purposes. I did not object to this parliament ratifying this convention, and even if I did not object I am not going to be held responsible for what this government or the previous government did with regard to it.

What I said was this: My right hon. friend had said that this was an international matter, and I took it that he was conveying the impression that all the dependencies and colonies of certain powers had adopted this load line convention, and that consequently it was being incorporated in this statute. I pointed out that there are certain parts of the British Empire which, according to my information, have not adopted, and are not going to adopt this convention, and my hon. friend from New Westminster confirms my statement by saying that not only are certain dependencies not adopting this convention, but that Great Britain herself is not doing so.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose it is unnecessary for me to say that Great Britain has done so, and her signature is here in common with ours. It is only necessary to go and look at the convention in the library, if the hon. gentleman desires to do so; he will find it there.

Mr. DUFF: Again may I say to the Prime Minister that I am not going to allow him to get away with that. I have read this convention perhaps more times than he has because I am vitally interested in it. I have had to read it in order to comply with the regulations imposed on me and other ship owners by the Marine department of this country. But in spite of the fact that Great Britain signed this convention in 1930, four year ago, just as Canada did, why has not Great Britain brought down legislation in 1931 or 1932 or 1933 incorporating this load line convention in her statutes? But instead of that, as my hon. friend from New Westminster has told us, Great Britain has not incorporated this convention in her statutes.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 14, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury) presented the eighth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the consent of the house I move that the report be concurred in.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I dissent from that request.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the motion will have to stand.

Motion stands.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE—APPOINTMENT OF FRANCHISE COMMISSIONER—PRINTING OF VOTERS' LISTS

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Under the order of introduction of bills I had hoped to introduce to-day the bill of which notice was given yesterday, namely the Franchise Act. I regret that I am not in a position yet to do so, but I hope to do so to-morrow. Having regard to the discussion which took place in the house yesterday upon the resolution, I may say that it has been decided to appoint two enumerators in each polling subdivision for the purpose of the first enumeration. Just how these enumerators will be appointed has not been definitely decided, but the principle will be maintained of consulting the wishes or obtaining the views of the sitting member on the one hand, and of the defeated candidate on the other hand, and where there was more than one defeated candidate, of the one who had the highest number of votes.

On the other clause, in regard to appeals from the decision of the revising officer, it has been decided that there shall be an appeal to the county or district judge in those provinces which have county and district judges, but as all provinces are not alike in respect to their judicial conveniences some difficulty has been experienced in drafting a suitable clause. When the bill comes before the house I may have to ask the assistance of some of the legal members from the various provinces in regard to difficulties which might arise. The principle in that case will be to limit the time as far as possible and to simplify the proceedings by way of appeal and make them informal and expeditious. I hope to bring down the bill for presentation to the house to-morrow or it may be Monday.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The assurance which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has just given will meet I am sure—as he has seen—with the general approval of the house. Might I inquire, seeing that the bill is not yet finally printed, whether the government has included a clause which will oblige revising officers to notify the electors as to where they are to vote? If not, would the government take into consideration including such an obligation? I believe official notification to electors is something which would avoid much in the way of expense to candidates and would really constitute a substantial improvement.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They do it in cities.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the suggestion is worth considering, but the expense would be very considerable if every elector on the voters' list has to be notified where he votes. It has never been the custom heretofore. All I can say is that I shall bring the suggestion before my colleagues.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I might just add this word—I know a discussion is not in order. Viewing the matter in its true light, elections are a necessary part of the machinery of government, and for that reason it seems to me the state itself should meet any legitimate unavoidable expenses incidental to securing a complete and fair election; that expenses incidental to a necessary service to the voter should not be made an obligation on those who may be nominated as candidates. Unless a provision of that kind is included those who may become candidates or their supporters will have to bear the expenses of notifying electors where they are to vote. With lists prepared by the state official, notification of the place of voting is something which really ought to be regarded as also a part of the necessary expenses of elections.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is another practical difficulty. The revising officer would not be in a position to notify the people more than as to the subdivision in which their names are registered, because until the writ of election is issued and returning officers appointed no one knows where the polling places will be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some arrangement could be worked out, whereby this obligation might be made a duty of either the revising officers or the returning officers. With the franking of notices, the expenses ought to be comparatively little.

Mr. POWER: The polling places were made permanent under the legislation now in existence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, no.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

REVENUE POST OFFICES—APPOINTMENTS

Mr. BROWN:

1. How many postmasters have been appointed in the last two years to offices where the revenue is less than $3,000 per year?
2. In how many of these cases were returned soldiers applicants for the position?
3. In how many cases were returned soldiers appointed?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. 1,474—Vacancies caused by reason of death, resignation, change of site, reopenings and new offices.
2. 301.
3. 219.

*FEDERAL AID TO HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION IN ONTARIO

Mr. AHEARN:

1. Has the government of Canada given to the government of Ontario any commitment to share in the cost of any road or highway construction or maintenance already undertaken in 1934 or to be undertaken before December 31, next?
2. If so, what is the estimated total sum of such federal commitments?
3. What is the total estimated cost of the projected work under the joint scheme?
4. What sum pertains solely to the trans-Canada highway?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this question, the orders in council that have been passed under the new Relief Act have been brought down, and there is no further information to be given than is covered by these orders in council.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, respecting shipping—Mr. Duranleau—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 2, subsection 16—Construction regulations.

Mr. REID: Might I ask if we passed subsection 13?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Subsection 13 is passed.

Mr. BENNETT: Last evening the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) made a statement with respect to the action taken by the British government, which I indicated I thought was hardly in accordance with the facts.

In 1932 the parliament of the United Kingdom passed the Merchant Shipping (Safety and Load Line Conventions) Act, 1932, 22-3 George V, Chapter 9, and by that statute it is provided that it might be extended to colonies; and on the 10th of May, 1933, important sections of the act were made applicable to Bahamas, Barbados, Bermuda, British Guiana, Cyprus, Fiji, Jamaica and dependencies, Kenya, and Mauritius. The convention is incorporated in the statutes of Great Britain as found in the preamble to the act and in the second schedule, just as is being done here.

Subsection agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Any objection to all the other subsections in this definition section?

Mr. REID: Are you attempting to pass all the definitions en bloc, is that the suggestion? If that is the intention, of course we might as well not take any further interest in the bill. I thought an undertaking was given that when this bill was before the committee representations would be listened to. Now are we to be told that we are protesting and trying to block the bill if we try to get an explanation?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): We shall not do that if there is any objection.

Subsections 17 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. REID: Would the minister state as a matter of information how much money was paid to Martin Griffin last year, and what was the expense of drawing up this bill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the information with me. I think the exact amount paid was tabled a few weeks ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has that to do with it? It has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. REID: That is your interpretation of it; I have my own reasons. You are just butting in. You should have been here yesterday.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsection 20 agreed to.

On subsection 21—Dangerous goods.

Mr. REID: Is there a list of dangerous goods mentioned?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is a point that will be covered by regulation approved by order in council.

Mr. REID: According to my information the Board of Trade in Great Britain have all the dangerous goods specified.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 22 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

On subsection 26—Foreign voyage.

Mr. REID: I would ask that this section stand.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I would ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment to clarify this definition, striking out all the words after the word "means," and inserting the words:

a voyage extending beyond the area of a home trade voyage and not being an inland or minor waters voyage.

Mr. DORION: I move that subsection 26 be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

"Foreign voyage" means a voyage extending beyond the area of a home trade voyage and not being an inland or minor waters voyage.

Mr. REID: I think this section should stand; this definition is too important to be put through quickly. The definitions of foreign and home trade are the two most important definitions in the whole section, so I think the subsection should stand for further consideration.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the subsection stand?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understood that my hon. friend had some objection to the definition of a home voyage?

Mr. REID: Yes, I had, but I am not getting a chance to put my explanation forward. This bill is before the whole committee, but when we get up to try to improve it we are told that we are trying to block it and shouted down. I am trying to get some changes put in which I think should be inserted. Surely I am within my rights as a member in doing that without being accused of blocking the bill. This is a very important subsection.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Do I understand that the hon. member wishes this subsection to stand?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Subsection stands.

Subsections 27 to 30 inclusive agreed to.

On subsection 31—Grain.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with this definition I have some representations from the Vancouver Chamber of Shipping. They suggest the deletion of the present definition and the insertion of the following:

"Grain" means corn, wheat, rye, barley, oats, peas, rice, paddy, pulse, seeds, nuts or nut kernels, and all other grain.

They further add:

It is the opinion of the chamber that the words used in the Merchant Shipping Act should be included, together with the words which have been in the Canadian act for many years.

Mr. DURANLEAU: What is the association?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Vancouver Chamber of Shipping.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Just a moment ago I received a wire from the Vancouver Chamber of Shipping, and they seem satisfied with the bill as drafted.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman will find that this definition is more comprehensive than the one he suggests. The word "grain" has the generic meaning, and these other words are included to remove any doubt. Once or twice we had the same difficulty to meet, and I think the hon. gentleman will appreciate the necessity of not trying to make the definition too exact, and making sure that it does include certain named grains.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister send me that telegram? If he does not mind I should like to put on record what it contains. They say their amendments were rejected by the Senate, but they want the legislation passed this session and suggest that their amendments be given further consideration at a later session. That removes my responsibility.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 32, 33 and 34 agreed to.

On subsection 35—Harbour or port.

Mr. REID: Stand.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. REID: I will endeavour to explain why I should like this subsection to stand. Yesterday when I moved an amendment to the definition of subsection 13 perhaps I should have elaborated my remarks in that connection. If I may say so, subsection 13 is correlated with subsections 35 and 41. Subsection 41 deals with navigable fresh waters and subsection 35 designates salt water. That was why yesterday I endeavoured, in connection with subsection 13, to have New Westminster or the Fraser river included. The fresh water and the salt water are clearly defined in subsections 35 and 41.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman of course realizes that those exceptions are made because these are ports that have been long established under particular statutes. Vancouver is not mentioned; neither is Saint John or Halifax, or other harbour commission ports. I suggest that possibly the hon. gentleman might take his representations to the minister, who tells me that he would be glad to receive them. Then if there are any difficulties we can perhaps meet them later.

Mr. REID: If the subsection stands I should be very glad to make those representations.

Subsection stands.

Subsection 36 agreed to.

On subsection 37—Home trade ships.

Mr. REID: This subsection should stand.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely there cannot be any difficulty about this subsection. It states merely this:

"Home trade ships" are ships engaged in home trade voyages.

There may be some difficulty about home trade voyages but there cannot be about home trade ships.

Mr. REID: I understand that this subsection was copied from the British act, and that in that act there are two definitions, one pertaining to a foreign voyage, and the other to home trade. Home trade in the British act does not mean trade simply around the British Isles, but includes trade going as far as Lisbon, French ports and other points in the particular section. We have embodied in this subsection the term home trade appearing in the British act. I suggest that home trade when it relates to foreign trade is a very important point. My information is that under our home trade system a ship leaving the port of Vancouver and, for the sake of the discussion, going to Montreal would be engaging in home trade just so long as it remained on the Pacific coast. But if it went through the Panama canal and up to Montreal it would be engaged in foreign trade. That is the information I have before me. I understand the term "home trade" is copied from the British act.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no reason why subsection 38 should not stand, but surely there is no reason why 37 dealing with home trade ships should stand. The definition of home trade ships could not be changed in any way, no matter how long it stood.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 38—Home trade voyage.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): In connection with subsection 38 is it intended that vessels engaged in home trade voyages shall not enter the waters of Hudson bay? I should like an answer.

Subsection stands.

On subsection 39—Hull.

Mr. CANTLEY: With all due deference to the compiler of the bill I would suggest that subsection 39 is not properly worded. It reads as follows:

"Hull" means the body of a vessel including the masts and rigging and all parts of its structure.

I submit that it should read:

"Hull" means the body of a vessel including the structure, spars, rigging and tackle.

I suggest that the word "spars" is much more comprehensive than the word "masts", because there are spars in addition to the mast. I believe, further, that rigging and tackle should be included in the term "hull".

Subsection 39 stands.

Subsections 40 to 88 inclusive agreed to.

On subsection 89—Sailing ship.

Mr. MYERS: I should like to say a word about subsection 89. May I draw the minister's attention to the fact that down around the maritime provinces we have a number of small sailing ships ranging from 50 to 150 tons. Although they are sailing ships, most of them are fitted with auxiliary engines. Am I right when I say that there is nothing in the bill to interfere with them operating as they now are?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member will notice that in the last part of the subsection appear the following words:

And which, in addition, is provided with mechanical means of propulsion.

Mr. MYERS: But only with an engine of three nominal horsepower.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: But that is actually brake horsepower.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest the minister should give some consideration to the clarification of this definition. The last clause might be amended to read "So as to include". I believe that is the idea, namely to include a vessel having mechanical power of not more than three nominal horsepower.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the word "and" should be "or".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not quite sure as to what the amendment should be but I do suggest that at the present time it does not read correctly.

Mr. DUFF: It is all wrong. The whole thing is wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe the word "or" should be used.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest the minister should give some consideration to the wording. Then, may I make the further suggestion that they raise the ante.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Do you wish to have it stand?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am merely making representations; I do not care what happens to it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Something has been drawn to my attention which, it seems to me, should be mentioned to the committee. I have before me a copy in English of Bill E of the Senate, an act respecting shipping, as passed by the Senate on May 31, 1934. I have, also, the French version of Bill E, Senat du Canada, Loi concernant la marine marchande. When I compare the French and English versions of the definitions we are now passing I find they do not correspond. For instance, in the English version I find in subsection 88 the words "Safety radiotelegraph certificate". Then, I find that subsection 88 in the French version is as follows:

(Translation) "Chairman" (président) means the Chairman of the Board of Steamship Inspection (8).

Mr. CHEVRIER: Would the hon. gentleman look at definition 16 in the French version?

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) had read the explanatory note which is at the bottom of the first page, he would have found the following:

The definitions are arranged alphabetically. At the end of each is found the number of the corresponding definition in the French version of this act, the alphabetical order being necessarily different in the two languages.

Therefore, we are following the alphabetical order of the French definition. The same applies to the English definitions. That is why the numbers do not correspond.

Mr. BENNETT: There are certain difficulties in the French translation. When the English copy was finished the French translation was entrusted to Mr. Montigny, and it has been observed that there are several discrepancies between the English and the French sections. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has brought it to the attention of the committee because it had to be done sooner or later. The French version has been sent back to Mr. Montigny for correction.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I point out that if hon. gentlemen will look at the end of the subsections they will note the number of the corresponding definition in the French version. For instance, the corresponding French definition of the English definition of Safety Radiotelegraph Certificate in subsection 88 will be found in subsection 16 of the French version.

Subsection stands.

Subsections 90 to 93 inclusive agreed to.

On subsection 94—Ship.

Mr. REID: Might I point out to the minister that there are two definitions, one of ship, and the other of vessel. I do not think the definition of "ship" goes far enough. When we get to section 3 the word "vessel" is used. "Ship" is defined as including every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars. That might mean that to come under the definition of "ship" a vessel has to be self-propelled, but out on the Pacific coast we have what are called log barges. The logs are piled on top of one another to the height of perhaps eight feet. A patent was obtained for this type of barge. I do not think it would be included in this definition.

Mr. BENNETT: The definition of "ship" covers it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I suppose that the situation my hon. friend speaks of has existed for years.

Mr. REID: No. At the moment I do not remember the exact name of the type of barge I am speaking of but it was patented a few years ago, and before you can use that type for towing logs you must obtain permission from the patentee. The booms of logs are piled one on top of the other, and these rafts travel quite a distance. They are different from any other form of navigation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I hope my hon. friend will be satisfied when I tell him that this definition has existed in the British law and in our own law for years, and we have never had any trouble over it, so I do not think it will be necessary to make any change.

Mr. REID: I do not doubt that it has been in the British law.

Mr. DURANLEAU: And in the Canada Shipping Act. It has been the law of the land for years, and there has never been any objection or complaint.

Mr. BENNETT: The definition covers every kind of vessel.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 95 to 98 inclusive agreed to.

On subsection 99—Sick mariner.

Mr. CANTLEY: There is some mistake in this definition. It says:

"Sick mariner" includes any person employed on board any ship in respect of which the duty has been paid.

That must be a mistake. I suppose what is meant is any person whose services on the ship are being paid for. It is not right as it is. Some of the lawyers can fix it up.

Mr. CHEVRIER: And afterwards somebody will complain about the translation.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay has been.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. REID: Suppose a ship comes in for the first time with a sick mariner whose dues or tolls are not being paid for, how is he taken care of?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is the responsibility of the master of the ship. The word "duty" is the word employed in the sections.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 100 and 101 agreed to.

On subsection 102—Tackle.

Mr. CANTLEY: There is something lacking here. It says:

"Tackle" used in relation to a vessel means the tackle ... used on board a ship for the loading and unloading thereof.

But that is not the only tackle used. The ground tackle is just as important as any other tackle, and it is not referred to here at all. I think this clause should be amended to include ground tackle.

Mr. BENNETT: The word has a limited meaning attributed to it for a purpose. When the word is afterwards referred to, it will be found that is the only meaning attributable to it. That is the reason the limitation is imposed upon it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This definition was adopted last year in chapter 52. It comprises the tackle on the ship only, not tackle outside the ship.

Mr. REID: Why is the tackle used outside the ship not also included? A man may be injured by tackle not on the ship, by tackle not only on a wharf but on a lighter on the other side of the ship. I think this definition should be amended to include tackle outside the ship.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think that men injured on the wharf would be taken care of under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Mr. REID: It may be a sailor on board the ship who is injured by tackle on the shore.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We will let the subsection stand if that is the wish of my hon. friends.

Subsection stands.

Subsection 103 agreed to.

On subsection 104—Tug.

Mr. REID: The definition reads:

"Tug" means a steamship used exclusively for towing purposes.

What about a tug that is used exclusively for salvage purposes and may not be doing any towing at all?

Mr. DURANLEAU: If a boat is employed for salvage purposes she is not a tug. She is an ordinary ship.

Mr. REID: They may not be technically described as tugs but that is the common name used.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Under the law a tug is a vessel employed exclusively for towing purposes. Even though other boats may have the form or appearance of a tug, they are not called tugs officially.

Mr. REID: Is a definition for salvage given in the bill?

Mr. BENNETT: There is no definition but there is a section dealing with it.

Mr. REID: I notice the definition for timber is left out of this bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The reason is obvious.

Mr. REID: What is the reason?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It does not need any definition; what a timber is is well known.

Mr. BENNETT: I think vessel is sufficiently defined to meet the hon. gentleman's difficulty. He would have seen this if he had looked.

On subsection 113—Year.

Mr. REID: The bill last year defined "young persons" but it does not seem to be taken care of here.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My information is that that phrase appears in only one section and is defined in the section itself.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 3—Vessels not yet registrable may be recorded.

Mr. REID: Throughout the bill there are only the two words "vessel" and "ship" used and I note here that every vessel is to be registered. The definition of vessel is:

"Vessel" includes any ship or boat or any other description of vessel used or designed to be used in navigation.

I should like to know if a person building a scow would have to register that scow? It would appear to me that a scow would have to be registered according to that definition, and I don't believe they should.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The word "vessel" is applied to ships which are not completely built. When they start construction we call them a vessel for recording purposes.

Mr. REID: That is my point. According to the definition, "vessel" includes any ship or boat or any other description of vessel used or designed to be used in navigation. A scow is used in navigation. These scows are used quite extensively on the Pacific coast and according to this definition, under section 3 a builder or owner of a scow would have to go and have it registered.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They are not bound to do it unless it is over ten tons capacity.

Mr. REID: They have large scows on the Pacific coast which have a greater capacity than ten tons.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend knows that a scow is not a ship because it is not propelled by any power; it is a vessel.

Mr. REID: Davis raft were the words I was trying to remember. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said that "vessel" and "ship" would take care of it all. According to the definition a vessel is any ship or boat or any other description of vessel used or designed to be used in navigation. A scow is used in navigation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: A scow is a vessel.

Mr. REID: It will be necessary to have a scow registered, according to that definition?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This section is to cover the recording of ships when building is started. Although a scow is called a vessel, it will not need to be recorded. This section is to permit the recording of a ship during the course of its construction in order that security may be taken on that vessel. When it is built and launched, it then becomes a ship.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the suggestions forwarded by the Vancouver Chamber of Shipping, the following definition of scows was given:

"Scow" means a vessel having no rudder and no sails or other means of propulsion and having a deck without hatches or openings save such as are provided for the purposes of ventilation and inspection, and which carries no cargo under her deck.

I understand that that definition was rejected by the committee in the other place.

Mr. REID: In spite of what the minister says, we must take the definition of "vessel" which is given, and that definition includes any ship or boat or any other description of vessel used or designed to be used in navigation. A scow is used in navigation and I am asking the minister if, under section 3, a man who is building a scow would have to have it registered?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am told by the law department that a scow would not have to be recorded. In connection with the remarks of the hon. member from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), my information is that these suggestions were studied carefully by the subcommittee of the Senate. That committee came to the conclusion that the definitions which appear in this bill cover the whole point. I am told that these vessels are only employed on the Pacific coast.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Which section of the bill makes an exception in the case of a scow? I think my hon. friend is entitled to an answer.

Mr. REID: The definition of "ship" includes barges, but the definition of "vessel" is entirely different. Vessel is mentioned in section 3 and in order to get a definition of the word, we must go to the interpretation clause.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friends have any other definitions to suggest we are quite prepared to examine them.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Section 3 states, "every vessel, which is about to be built or is being built." "Vessel" is defined as including any ship or boat or any other description of vessel used or designed to be used in navigation. Such a vessel would have to be built already while section 3 refers to a vessel about to be built or being built. There are hundreds of such things throughout this bill. Somebody will be complaining about the translation but you cannot translate something that is not proper.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend may be more expert than I am in marine matters or the construction of ships, but my information from the legal department is that only ships over ten tons will have to be registered, under this legislation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That has nothing to do with the registration. Clause 3 reads:

Every vessel, which is about to be built.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Vessels have to be recorded before they are registered.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzzie.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: But the minister forgets that the definition of "vessel" is:

"Vessel" includes any ship or boat or any other description of vessel used or designed to be used in navigation.

If it is used, it must have been built, yet clause 3 reads:

Every vessel, which is about to be built.

Mr. REID: With all deference to the minister, apart from what he says we are going by the bill; the bill is our guide and after it has been passed it will be the guide and law for all shipping. This definition should receive a great deal of consideration because the words "vessel" and "ship" are defined in the bill and under clause 3 it is required that every vessel about to be built or equipped in Canada shall be recorded. I ask the minister whether under this the owner or the builder or a person about to construct a scow would first of all have to have it registered.

Mr. MYERS: I believe subclause 107 of clause 2 would be improved if there were added at the end of it the words "other than scows."

Mr. REID: Scows or barges.

Mr. MYERS: I know on the Atlantic there are hundreds of barges which are used by dredging companies and which carry from thirty to forty tons. This addition might clarify the matter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): We are dealing with clause 3 which refers to a vessel that is not yet a vessel. It is on the stocks; it is not yet finished and it cannot be registered.

Mr. REID: But I was drawing the attention of the committee to the fact that a person about to build a scow or barge would under this clause have to go and have that scow or barge registered.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No. If my hon. friend will read the first three or four lines of the clause he will see that it applies only to a construction which will become a ship and then be registered. The clause reads:

Every vessel, which is about to be built or is being built or equipped in Canada and which, when completed, launched and/or equipped will be a ship registrable in Canada as a British ship.

So my hon. friend will see clearly that this applies only to ships in course of construction.

Mr. REID: This just shows, as I have stated previously that this bill should be considered by a small committee. I am glad the minister mentioned the word "ship." The word "ship" under the definition includes a barge. First of all you have a vessel about to be built. When it is built it becomes a ship and therefore comes under subclause 94 of clause 2, which defines "ship" to include a barge. The definition of "ship" is:

"Ship" includes every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars. . . . It shall include every description of lighter, barge or like vessel used in navigation in Canada however propelled.

Your own words, Mr. Minister, confirm what I am saying.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will notice that the second sentence of subclause 94 of clause 2 is only for certain parts of the act:

"Ship" includes every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars.

Then:

For the purpose of part I—

This is only for part I—

—(recording, registering and licensing) and sections 649 to 654 inclusive of this act (limitation of liability) it shall include every description of lighter, barge or like vessel used in navigation in Canada however propelled.

My hon. friend will see that the definition of "ship" applying to smaller vessels is only for the purposes of certain parts of the measure.

Mr. REID: For the purpose of part I, which is recording, registering and licensing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I further point out to the minister that under clause 367, Bill J, it was suggested to the minister last year that the words "other than scows" be inserted, because otherwise it would mean that scows would under that clause be liable for the payment of sick mariners' funds although no scows require as a rule to carry crews. This was pointed out to the minister a year ago.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We will let subclause 107 of clause 2 stand.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): We have passed subclause 107 of clause 2. We have passed everything down to part I of the bill. Now we are dealing with clause 3 of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let clause 3 stand.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If there are any definitions that conflict with clause 3, surely, even if they have been passed we should have a right to return to them.

Section stands.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Ownership of recorded vessels remains unchanged until bill of sale recorded.

Mr. CANTLEY: I want to bring before the committee a case in regard to this. I do not know whether this is the proper clause, but I would like to ask the minister whether any duty is imposed upon the registrar, when ownership is changed to another port in Canada, to give notification of the change of ownership to the registrar of the port to which the ownership has been changed. My reason for asking that is this, if the committee will pardon me for bringing in a personal matter. Twelve or fourteen years ago I built a steel vessel in New Glasgow which I operated for some time. Later I sold her while she was lying in Boston through a broker, a former Nova Scotian, who conducted a ship brokerage business there for many years. I went to the custom house in Pictou, saw the registrar of shipping, and made the usual declaration of change of ownership. That change of ownership was registered on the shipping register of the port of Pictou. The new certificate of ownership was issued in the new owner's name, on his statement that he was a citizen of Toronto, Ontario. He kept the register on board the ship as by law he had to do, but never registered the ship in the port of Toronto where he said he resided and where he said he wanted the vessel registered. Afterwards the ship was seized as a rum runner, and a few days later the Halifax Chronicle published an item to the effect that the vessel had been seized and that by application to the registrar's office in Pictou they had found the owner was Thomas Cantley, New Glasgow, M.P. for Pictou. At that time I was a member of this house. This ship made history inasmuch as she was the first vessel that was seized by the United States authorities after Great Britain agreed to the twelve mile limit. My question to the minister is: In that case, should the registrar of shipping in Pictou, after closing of the register there, not have transferred the certificate of change of ownership to the registrar's books in Toronto? If not, is there any provision in the act now before the house that will take care of such a case? I submit it is a matter that should be rectified. I ask the minister to take it into consideration.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think there is any provision in the bill that would put on the owner the obligation to declare change of ownership in another port than the port of registration.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister can understand what is involved. Many things may happen. The new owner may obtain credit in view of the fact that apparently the vessel is still owned in Pictou still registered there whereas in fact it has been removed from the registry in Pictou and should have been put upon the registry in Toronto. That I submit, should be remedied.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We shall take into consideration the suggestion made by my hon. friend and report at the next sitting.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I call attention to the wording of the section:

(1) For the purposes of the provisions of this part of this act which relate to recording of vessels the owner of every recorded vessel which is being built shall identify it by painting on a board, maintained near the place in the yard of the builder where the vessel is being built, on a dark ground, in white or yellow figures.

Did anyone ever hear of a vessel being built on a dark ground!

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): That section has been carried.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Well, I think it should be changed and worded properly. I am not going to be a party to such a ridiculous statement.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That means light letters on a dark board.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then why complain about the translation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That has been the law of the land for years.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let us change it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In French it says "fond sombre."

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Qualification for owning British ships.

Mr. REID: I think an explanation should be given why the word "British" has been substituted for the word "Canadian." I hold as high a regard for Britain or the name British as any man in this house, having been born there, but coming to this land which I have adopted I believe the time has come when we should be proud enough to use the word "Canadian." I think an explanation should be given why all through this bill the word "British" is used instead of the word "Canadian."

Mr. CASGRAIN: "Canada first" policy.

[Mr. Cantley.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not sure if this is not to accord with the convention between the different parts of the empire. All British subjects have a right to register ships in Canada.

Mr. REID: But since the statute of Westminister I thought we were starting off as an independent young nation and calling ourselves Canadian.

Mr. DURANLEAU: But in matters of ships and their registration all British subjects are on the same footing.

Mr. REID: That does not answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the hon. member will find the answer in the definition of "British ship" in the interpretation section:

(5) "British ship registered in Canada" and "ship registered in Canada" means a ship registered in Canada either under the provisions of this act or under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts before the coming into force of this act.

My interpretation is that the word "British" is used to secure uniformity, and include both classes of vessels, those registered before the coming into force of this act and those registered under this act.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On section 19—Port of registry.

Mr. REID: I think it is hardly fair that British ships registered in London should operate all the time in Canadian waters. I think British ships working and making a profit in Canada should be registered in Canada. There are many steamship companies operating here which have their ships registered in London, and certain favours accrue to them thereby. I am of the opinion that any ship owners who have ships trading on our Pacific or Atlantic coasts, and whose ships are used exclusively in those waters, should be made to take out registration in Canada.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Perhaps my hon. friend does not know that it is an imperial agreement between all parts of the empire. It is reciprocal. Our Canadian ships have the same privileges in any ports of the empire that other British ships have in Canada.

Mr. REID: I would not protest so much but I know in regard to the Canadian Pacific Steamship Company whose ships are registered in London that they bring out masters, engineers and men from Great Britain and employ them on those ships to the detriment of our own men. They refuse to accept our men and refuse to accept certificates of competency of our seamen. I believe that apart from any imperial agreement a British ship doing business solely in Canadian waters should be compelled to register in Canada. I think it is only right.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That question would not come under this section. It will come elsewhere in the bill.

Mr. REID: Then we will come to it later on?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 19 to 32 inclusive agreed to.

On section 33—Endorsement of change of ownership on certificate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: On some sections there are no notes indicating whether it is the old law or whether they are new sections. There is nothing to show whether there is any change in the British or Canadian acts.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think this enactment will be found in our statute, chapter 186 of the revised statutes of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The new sections are marked, are they not?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 34 to 43 inclusive agreed to.

On section 44—Effects in law of a builder's mortgage.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I note that this section 44 is a new one. Does it contain any improvements; if so, what are they? Could the hon. minister explain the reason for such a change?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This section takes the place of about fifteen sections which were in the old act.

Section agreed to.

Sections 45 to 52 inclusive agreed to.

On section 53—Transmission of interest of mortgagee.

Mr. VENIOT: Do you not think we would make a little more progress if some of our friends on the opposite side took a little more interest in this bill? There are only about ten of them in the committee, considering this bill to which such absolute objections have been made from this side of the house. They have not enough courtesy to attend and support their own bill. They have to depend for the passage of a measure of this kind on the members who have protested strongly against it. I think members on the other side are showing very little courtesy to the minister by leaving him alone. If hon. members on this side had gone out there would not have been a quorum, and the bill could not have been proceeded with.

Sections 54 to 88 inclusive agreed to.

On section 89—National colours for ships, and penalty on carrying improper colours.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Chairman, I shall ask the Right Hon. Sir George Perley to move:

That after the word "shield" appearing in line twenty-nine of subsection 1, the words "of the coat of arms" be inserted.

Undoubtedly those words have been omitted in error.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 90 to 93 inclusive agreed to.

On section 94—Deductions for ascertaining tonnage.

Mr. REID: I notice that certain exemptions are put in for tonnage, and I am wondering what is to be done about the forecastle, bridge space and shelter decks. Are they taken care of in the bill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: These are exactly the same measurements as are mentioned in the Merchant Shipping Acts.

Mr. REID: Does that answer my question? Tonnage is an important feature in this bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The places mentioned by my hon. friend are included in the tonnage.

Mr. REID: They should be excluded. We are dealing with exemptions. I find in subsection 1 the words "deductions shall be made from the space."

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand this is the under deck tonnage and the spaces mentioned by my hon. friend are included in that tonnage.

Mr. REID: Subsection 1 reads:

In measuring or remeasuring a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage, the following deductions shall be made from the space included in the measurement of the tonnage, namely,—

And so on. I do not see any mention of the forecastle bridge space or shelter decks, although other points in the ship are mentioned in subsection 2.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There are no exemptions for the spaces mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. REID: Should there not be? You are exempting:

(ii) any space used exclusively for the working of the helm, the capstan, and the anchor gear, or for keeping the charts, signals, and other instruments of navigation, and boatswains stores; and

(iii) the space occupied by the donkey engine and boiler, if connected with the main pumps of the ship; and

(iv) any space (other than a double bottom) adapted only for water ballast; and

(b) In the case of a ship wholly propelled by sails, any space set apart and used exclusively for the storage of sails.

Yet there is no provision for the exemption of the forecastle, the bridge space and shelter decks. It shows how important these sections are and I am surprised that it is being passed so quickly. There will be many errors in it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This is the law which has been in existence for years.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Can we not improve it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: In existence both in Canada and in Great Britain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But people have been complaining about it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Can we not improve it?

Section agreed to.

Sections 95 to 99 inclusive agreed to.

On section 100—Deck cargo.

Mr. REID: I notice that there is a change in this instance. In subsection 1 of section 100 I find the words, "carries into Canada as deck cargo." I am of opinion that the section should stand, because it deals with the dues placed on a ship.

Section stands.

Sections 101 to 105 inclusive agreed to.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

On section 106—Licences to ships not required to be registered.

Mr. REID: This section should stand for further consideration, because I believe it affects the fishermen.

Mr. DURANLEAU: How does it affect the fishermen? What is your suggestion?

Mr. REID: At the moment I have not drafted my amendment, and I should like the section to stand until I can give it further consideration, because it has a bearing upon the fishermen.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am told it costs nothing to the fishermen, and that they do not have to apply for a licence.

Mr. REID: They have not to apply?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, it does not affect the fishermen at all. That is my expert opinion.

Section agreed to.

Sections 107 to 113 inclusive agreed to.

On section 114—Ships to be provided with certificated engineers.

Mr. REID: Why is the word "steamship" used throughout the act? There is no mention of any auxiliary ship or vessel.

Mr. DURANLEAU: "Steamship" is a Canadian expression; "steamer" is British. The Senate came to the conclusion that they should use the word "steamship" instead of "steamer."

Mr. REID: I note that in a subsequent section a certificate given to an officer acquainted with a steamship qualifies him for a motor-driven vessel, but an expert in motor-driven vessels is not qualified to become an officer on a steamship.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsection 101 of the definition clause reads:

"Steamship" or "steamer" (except as may be provided under the load line rules) means any ship propelled by machinery, and not coming within the definition of sailing ship.

The words are interchangeable in the definition.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Has the minister received any requests from the engineers for a modification of the regulations in regard to the number and class of engineers who shall be employed on vessels?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, there were requests from the association.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Have they been met?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Their representatives were heard by the Senate, where the point was discussed at length, and I am told their suggestions could not be accepted.

Section agreed to.

On section 115—Grades of certificates of competency.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is the meaning of lines 2 and 3 on page 56, reading:

(d) Sailing ship;
(e) Fore-and-aft rigged sailing ship.

They are both sailing ships; why the distinction?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The sailing ship is the squaresailed ship. That is the general term.

Mr. CANTLEY: They are both sailing ships.

Sections 116 to 120 inclusive agreed to.

Section 121 stands.

Sections 122 to 129 inclusive agreed to.

On section 130—Recognition of certificate.

Mr. REID: I would like to have moved an amendment to this section. In explanation I would draw the minister's attention once more to the fact that engineers and first and second mates have been refused employment on board ship at the port of Vancouver and the port of New Westminster because the captain or those in authority would not recognize the certificate of competency issued by the Canadian authorities. It is all very well to say that this is a reciprocal matter, and that what another country does we will do, but I repeat that ships registered in Great Britain and plying between the Britsih Isles, Vancouver, and the Orient have consistently refused to accept Canadian officers because they had not certificates issued by the British Board of Trade. I think it should be made mandatory in this clause that a certificate of competency issued under the authority of the Minister of Marine or other competent authority in Canada shall be accepted for engineers and first and second mates on British vessels. I think that is only fair. I could cite case after case of men being refused because they did not hold a certificate from the British Board of Trade, and not only were they refused but men were brought out from Great Britain to fill those positions, and the excuse given was, "We are very sorry, but we cannot engage you because you have not papers recognized by the Board of Trade, London." I would like to move an amendment to this clause. It is a very serious matter, and I think now is the time to remedy the situation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will ask that this section stand, but I am afraid that as this is a reciprocal arrangement it comes under the British commonwealth agreement of 1931. I would suggest to my hon. friend to send in his amendment and we will consider it, and if it is possible to incorporate such an amendment we will do so.

On section 143—Shipping masters.

Mr. REID: Has the minister given any consideration to the issuing of certificates to shipping masters? In certain ports it would seem as though anyone can be appointed as shipping master whether or not he has any knowledge of ships. This bill is providing regulations for captains, mates, engineers and so forth but there is nothing in connection with shipping masters. I think these men should undergo some examination. I know of one case where the harbour master is also the shipping master and is paid as such.

Mr. DURANLEAU: These officers are appointed by the government and the government takes the responsibility in connection therewith. Before an appointment is made we ascertain if a man is qualified for the position.

Mr. REID: Is shipping master and harbour master the same?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

On section 163—Agreement with crew.

Mr. REID: Has the minister given any consideration to having agreements made between the masters and crews of home trade ships? There are ships engaged in home trade on the Pacific coast carrying between three and four hundred employees and according to this section they would be exempt from entering into any agreement with the crew. On the other hand a much smaller ship not engaged in home trade would have to have an agreement.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will see that this is covered by section 167.

On section 168—Agreements with crew of inland water ships.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is a clerical error in this section which will have to be corrected. I will ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to move to strike out the word "eight" in line 45 and substitute the word "nine" therefor.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move accordingly.

Sections 169 to 178 agreed to.

On section 179—Engagement of seamen out of Canada.

Mr. REID: Can the minister give any assurance as to reciprocal arrangements in connection with the engagement or hiring of seamen? Will action be taken so that British ships registered in London and plying in Canadian waters will engage Canadian seamen? It is all very well to have a reciprocal arrangement, but so far it has been one-sided in favour of British ships operating here and registered in London.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As my hon. friend knows all agreements among the different dominions have to be enacted in a statute of each dominion. We undertake to enact as we are doing now with the understanding that the other parts of the empire will do the same.

Mr. REID: I do not think the minister has fully grasped my point. Great Britain is at present taking certain action in favour of her own seamen on her own ships operating in Canadian waters. My question is: Why cannot we do the same thing in Canada now and have reciprocal arrangements with the British ships?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will understand that we can control our own ships but we cannot control ships other than our own.

Section agreed to.

On section 180—Rating of ablebodied seamen.

Mr. REID: I think this clause should stand because as it reads it loses sight of the fact that a man may have been engaged on, say the Canadian National ferries for two or three years and on certain classes of fishing boats. In this clause his service is defined that before he is entitled to the rating of A.B., it shall count as sea service only up to a period of two years on decked deep sea fishing vessels and the rating of A.B. shall only be granted after at least one year's sea service on a trading vessel in addition to two or more years' sea service on board of decked fishing vessels. I think that clause should be given greater consideration.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Has my hon. friend any amendment to suggest? If so, I will let the clause stand and consider the amendment he proposes. I am informed that this clause applies only to deep sea ships and cannot apply to ferries.

Mr. REID: I know. Perhaps the minister did not get my point. There are seamen engaged on ferries travelling, say between Port Mann and Vancouver island who get as much experience as a man on board a decked fishing vessel, as the decked fishing vessel may be operating in exactly the same waters. The clause does not cover men who may have served, shall I say, apprenticeships on board those Canadian National ferries.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Let the clause stand.

Section stands.

On section 181—Discharges before shipping master.

Mr. REID: I must at this time draw the attention of the minister to a serious state of affairs which is not taken care of in this clause which, I believe, refers to the discharging of seamen at certain ports. I have a case where a man was engaged on a ship in Vancouver going to Montreal and on reaching Montreal was discharged and left stranded. Under this clause I believe provision is made to take care of a seaman stranded on a foreign shore or, say in Great Britain but there is no provision to take care of a seaman who may be stranded by a Canadian ship in any port in Canada. A striking case occurred last year. The man went on board the ship in Vancouver in good faith; the boat was carrying lumber to Montreal, and when he reached Montreal he was fired and left stranded.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think that is taken care of somewhere later on in the bill but I will let the clause stand for the present.

Mr. REID: I have looked through the bill as carefully as I can but cannot find such a provision. The matter should be taken care of.

Section stands.

On section 182—Certificate of discharge.

Mr. CANTLEY: Is there not a change or omission in the last line of subclause 1 of this clause in regard to the statement on a seaman's discharge certificate? It reads:

But not containing any statement as to his wages or the quality of his work.

The practice has hitherto been that on the discharge of a seaman he has been given a certificate of discharge with four letters on it: "O," "G," "V.G."; "O" meaning ordinary; "G" meaning good, and "V.G." meaning very good. He was entitled to have those letters appended to his certificate of discharge, but so far as I can see that is not provided for here.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Subclause 1 of clause 182 has been taken from the Merchant Shipping Act.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think that should be looked into. I do not think it is right.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We will let the clause stand.

Section stands.

Sections 183 to 268 inclusive agreed to.

On section 269—Official logs.

Mr. CANTLEY: Is there any change in this section?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, this is from the Canada Shipping Act.

Section agreed to.

Sections 270 to 278 inclusive agreed to.

On section 279—Employment of children on board ship.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have one or two minor amendments to this section in order to clarify the wording. At line 13, after the word "no" insert the words "child being a." At line 20, after the word "no" insert "young person not being a child and being a." On page 115, line 1, after the word "no" insert "young."

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move accordingly.

Amendments agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 280 to 283 inclusive agreed to.

On section 284—Sanction required for discharge of seamen out of Canada.

Mr. REID: I think this is the section to which I should have referred a moment ago when I spoke with regard to seamen who were stranded in ports in Canada. This section reads:

The master of a ship registered in Canada shall not discharge a seaman at any place out of Canada (except at a port in the country in which he was shipped)—

Mr. DURANLEAU: Let it stand.

Mr. REID: I think this section should stand.

Section stands.

Sections 285, 286 and 287 agreed to.

On section 288—Expenses of medical attendance in case of injury.

Mr. REID: I think in connection with this section it would be advisable to look into the question of compensation. Under the present shipping act the seaman is cared for in regard to illness, death, discharge and so forth, but there is no provision for compensation. A case occurred last year in which a man engaged on a government ship lost a finger. He might easily have lost an arm or a leg, and this brings up the question of men who are injured at sea, with no provision being made for compensation. This man was on the William J. Stewart; when nearing the British West Indies he met with a serious accident to his hand. Although he asked to be put ashore in the British West Indies he was not allowed to go to the hospital there because the ship was carrying a skeleton crew. The ship returned from the British West Indies to Collingwood, Ontario, and from there it went to British Columbia. This seaman was discharged at Victoria, and was promptly given the benefit of the provisions concerning medical attention and so forth. He applied to the compensation board at Vancouver, but his application for compensation was turned down because he did not come under any compensation laws of any province. That seaman is minus a finger as a result of obeying the commands of the master of that ship. Although his hand was badly injured he carried on his work because the ship did not have enough men on board; it had only what is called a skeleton crew. There is no provision at all for compensation to seamen; the matter is very serious, and now that the act is being revised I think some section might stand in order to see if it is not possible to provide for compensation to seamen.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that in the circumstances mentioned by my hon. friend the seaman would come under the different compensation acts of the different provinces, but at any rate we will let this section stand in order to see what may be done.

Mr. REID: That is not the information I have from British Columbia. That case came before the board and I understand they refuse to take care of seamen, especially those travelling to foreign ports.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We will let the section stand in order to obtain more particulars from my hon. friend about this case.

Mr. REID: It emphasizes the point I made earlier in the discussion, that representatives of the seamen's union should have been before a committee, either of the house or of the Senate, to give their views with regard to wages, hiring and firing, and so on.

Section stands.

Sections 289 to 298 inclusive agreed to.

On section 299—Proper return port.

Mr. REID: I believe this section has a bearing on the discussion we had previously. The last part of the section reads:

> Provided that in the case of a seaman shipped in Canada the return port shall be in the same province in which he was shipped unless otherwise agreed to by him as aforesaid.

[Mr. Reid.]

That has a bearing on the case I drew to the minister's attention in which a man was engaged in one part of Canada and discharged in another.

Section stands.

Sections 300 to 303 inclusive agreed to.

On section 304—Minister may rent and equip premises for hospitals.

Mr. REID: What hospitals are designated?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This part of the act comes under the Department of Health. I am informed the section would include hospitals in every part of the country.

Mr. REID: The section refers to the "minister." I presume it refers to the Minister of Marine.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The hon. member will notice that subsection 54 of section 2 states:

> "Minister" means the Minister of Marine save in part V of this act (sick mariners and marine hospitals) where it means the minister named by the governor in council to administer that part.

Up to date it has been under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Health.

Section agreed to.

Sections 305 to 312 inclusive agreed to.

On section 313—Pilotage district of Montreal.

Mr. REID: Would the minister explain why certain pilotage districts are specified?

Mr. DURANLEAU: For a great many years that has been the law of the land.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not an answer.

Section agreed to.

Sections 314 to 327 inclusive agreed to.

On section 328—Age limit for active pilot.

Mr. CANTLEY: Sixty-five years is not a fair age at which to retire a pilot. I think the minister should let the section stand.

Mr. DURANLEAU: What are my hon. friend's views?

Sir EUGENE FISET: One hundred years.

Mr. CANTLEY: I would say seventy-five years, but it depends altogether on the man. It is quite unfair to retire an active man at sixty-five years. There are first class pilots on the St. Lawrence who are seventy-five years of age.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will note that in the section there is a provision whereby a pilot reaching the age of sixty-five years can, up to a certain age, renew his licence from year to year.

Mr. CANTLEY: I had not noticed that this clause said so.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I suggest it does. I find in it the words:

Every licensed pilot shall, on attaining the age of sixty-five years, produce and deliver up his licence to the pilotage authority which issued it and such authority may grant him a new licence for one year, and so from year to year, until his seventieth birthday, provided he is declared capable of performing his duties as a pilot by a medical officer appointed by the pilotage authority.

Mr. CANTLEY: I would suggest that the minister make the figures seventy years in the first instance and seventy-five years in the second.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall ask to have the section stand. I do not deny the merit in my hon. friend's suggestion, but this is a very important matter. The safety of navigation is an important feature, and I should like to consult experts in the matter.

Section stands.

Sections 329 to 337 inclusive agreed to.

Sections 338 and 339 stand.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Why?

Mr. DORION (Translation): To add the word "Quebec" after the word "Montreal" in the second paragraph of section 338 and in section 339.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): When will the amendments be discussed?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): We shall come to an understanding in this respect.

Sections 340 to 370 inclusive agreed to.

On section 371—Application of pilot funds.

Mr. CANTLEY: Is there any change in regard to the pilotage funds in the ports of North Sydney, Sydney or Halifax?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No change at all.

Section agreed to.

Sections 372 to 405 inclusive agreed to.

On section 406—Radio-telegraph installation.

Mr. REID: Is there any provision that home ships shall carry radios? Paragraph (a) of subsection 1 reads:

All passenger ships and other ships of sixteen hundred tons gross tonnage or upwards, registered in Canada plying on international voyages shall, unless exempted under the provisions of this act or of the regulations made hereunder, be fitted with a radio-telegraph installation complying with the provisions of article thirty-one of the safety convention and shall carry such operators with such qualifications as are prescribed in the regulations issued hereunder;

There are many ships carrying passengers which go far afield and I think these ships should be made to carry radio. I remember one instance, that of the steamship Princess Mary which struck a rock going up north. Surely vessels of this size should be compelled to carry radio.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the point is covered by the following subsection.

Mr. REID: I am not familiar with navigation on the lakes but I think radio should be compulsory on such ships.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Subsection 2, paragraph (b) reads:

This subsection shall also apply to all other steamships of five thousand tons gross tonnage and upwards going on any voyage which is or which includes a voyage of more than two hundred nautical miles from one place to another place: Provided, however, that the governor in council may exempt from the obligations imposed by this paragraph any ship or class of ship if he is of the opinion that having regard to the nature of the voyage in which the ship is engaged or the season of the year or other circumstances of the case, the providing of a radiotelegraph installation or the operation thereof is unnecessary or unreasonable.

I think that covers the point.

Mr. REID: Does the minister think that the minimum tonnage of 5,000 tons is sufficient? A ship of that size is quite large, while the ships I am referring to are probably three or four thousand gross tons.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the first part of subsection 2 covers the point. It reads:

All passenger steamships, whether registered in Canada or not, which are not within subsection one of this section

(i) carrying or certified to carry fifty or more persons, including passengers and crew, and going on any voyage which is or which includes a voyage of more than two hundred nautical miles from one place to another place; or

(ii) carrying or certified to carry two hundred and fifty or more persons, including passengers and crew, and going on any voyage which is or which includes a voyage of more than ninety nautical miles from one place to another place; or

(iii) carrying or certified to carry five hundred or more persons, including passengers and crew, and going on any voyage which is or which includes a voyage of more than twenty nautical miles from one place to another place;

Mr. CANTLEY: All these radio regulations are new and I think we had better call it six o'clock in order that we may have a little time to consider them. I should like to know if these regulations were arrived at after consultation with the British Board of Trade.

Mr. DURANLEAU: All these enactments were adopted by the convention of the different parts of the empire held in 1931.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): When the committee rose at six o'clock, clause 406 was under discussion.

Section agreed to.

Sections 407 to 435 inclusive agreed to.

On section 436—Certificates of convention ships to be produced to customs.

Mr. REID: Are there any load line regulations in connection with ships on home trade voyages?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think so.

Mr. REID: What clause? I notice these load line regulations pertain to vessels on international voyages.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We will let this clause stand. I think the load line convention concerns voyages outside Canada, but there may be some clause concerning home voyages, and I will give the information to my hon. friend when my assistant deputy minister is here. He is not here yet.

Mr. REID: I hope the minister will find the clause. I have looked for it but I cannot find it. It is important I believe to have load line regulations for home trade voyages.

Mr. DUFF: There is no such thing as load line regulations for home trade voyages.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As to the query of my hon. friend, my information is that when our ships go outside Canada the load line convention regulations apply.

Mr. REID: If a ship leaves Vancouver for San Francisco with lumber, would there be any load line regulations touching that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The load line convention would apply.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. HEAPS: Would it apply on the great lakes?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Mr. HEAPS: Why would it not apply on the great lakes?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Because the imperial agreement specifically exempted inland waters.

Mr. HEAPS: As a matter of protection to navigation on the great lakes, would it not be advisable to have the same regulations apply to vessels plying within the confines of the dominion?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The Department of Marine has had this question under consideration for some time but it is waiting for an agreement with the United States because those are international waters.

Section agreed to.

Sections 437 to 441 inclusive agreed to.

On section 442—Loading of timber.

Mr. REID: Does the minister know whether logs are included in the definition of timber here? I asked that previously and he said he thought timber was generally understood.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Logs are included under the word "timber."

Section agreed to.

Sections 443 to 453 inclusive agreed to.

On section 454—Helm orders.

Mr. REID: Is there not some change since last year—the word "starboard"?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is a small change in the wording of the present section, yes: the words "steering order" have been added.

Section agreed to.

Sections 455 to 465 inclusive agreed to.

On section 466—Inspection of ships' tackle.

Mr. REID: Were those regulations put into effect last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Mr. REID: We were told that measure had to go through because you were going to put it into effect. I am particularly interested in this section. I understood last year that it was very important that those provisions should go through, and now we are told that they are not in effect.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My officials have worked on those regulations for over a year. When they were completed about three or four months ago they were distributed to interested parties all over Canada for study. The department have been receiving since answers and suggestions, and I am told they expect to receive two or three more. The moment they are completed they will be approved by order in council and put into effect.

Section agreed to.

Sections 467 to 502 inclusive agreed to.

On section 503—Wreck.

Mr. REID: Can the minister tell the committee why this portion of the act is not made reciprocal? It deals with aircraft found derelict, but an airplane might assist a derelict or disabled ship.

Mr. DUFF: Do you want the airplane to tow the wreck in?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will see on reading the section that it applies to airships when they come within our territory.

Section agreed to.

Sections 504 to 543 inclusive agreed to.

On section 544—Shipping casualties.

Mr. REID: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the wording of subsection (a):

Whenever any ship is lost, abandoned, stranded or damaged in any of the inland waters of Canada or on or near the coasts of Canada, or on a voyage to or from a port in Canada.

That is a definition of what is termed a shipping casualty. There is no definition covering the rivers; the inland waters and coasts are mentioned. Supposing a casualty occurs in the Fraser river say twenty miles from the sea. Would that be termed a casualty under the act?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will notice that in the definitions his point is covered. I refer him to subsection 41 of section 2:

"Inland waters of Canada" means all the rivers, lakes and other navigable fresh waters within Canada, and includes the river St. Lawrence as far seaward as a line drawn from Father point to point Orient.

Section agreed to.

Sections 545 to 560 inclusive agreed to.

74726—252½

On section 561—Power of court of investigation.

Mr. REID: I see this section gives the court power to investigate into and cancel the certificates of a master, mate or engineer. Does that apply to a master, mate or engineer on any ship, British or foreign, or just on British ships registered in Canada ?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think it applies to other ships when they are in Canadian waters.

Mr. REID: Supposing a British ship registered in Canada had an accident and the court of inquiry considered the liability of the master, the mate or the engineer, and their certificate was cancelled. Would that man be allowed to go on another British ship, or on the same one, in Canadian waters?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Our courts have power to suspend or cancel while the holder is in Canada a certificate granted by another dominion.

Mr. REID: But would that have any effect when he reached Great Britain?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend will see that under the law the certificate is suspended or cancelled and report is made to the proper authorities of the dominion where the ship is registered.

Mr. REID: Then I suppose it would be up to Great Britain to say whether or not they would accept that ruling?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is for Great Britain to accept it or not, but the holder of the certificate cannot act in our waters if his certificate is suspended.

Section agreed to.

On section 562—Certificates of another part of His Majesty's dominions.

Mr. CANTLEY: How long is this suspension to be for? Is it to be indefinite or for any particular period?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It may be indefinite.

Mr. CANTLEY: That is not satisfactory. Can the man go up again for examination and obtain a new certificate, or is he debarred forever?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, if he applies and qualifies he can get his certificate back.

Mr. CANTLEY: I submit the clause ought to intimate as much.

Section agreed to.

Sections 563 to 567 inclusive agreed to.

On section 568—Certificates cancelled or suspended in other parts of His Majesty's dominions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, does this not seem to be a hardship? It would appear from the section that a Canadian who is a master could have his certificate cancelled or suspended by reason of an investigation in another dominion. A few moments ago the minister, replying to the hon. member for New Westminster, stated that he did not know whether Great Britain would recognize a suspension or cancellation from a court or commission in Canada. By section 568 the minister will adopt a cancellation or suspension which would arise by reason of an investigation in another part of the British commonwealth. In my view that arrangement is hard on Canadians.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The hon. member will notice that the provision is not imperative. The section states that—

The minister may adopt and carry out said cancellation.

That means that if after having examined and studied the record and the judgment rendered by the court outside of Canada the minister is convinced that a proper judgment was rendered, he may maintain the cancellation of the certificate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But it would still be a court in another country which would suspend or cancel the certificate of a Canadian citizen.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, it means that the final judgment as to the effect of the cancellation in Canada will be rendered by the minister, after having studied the whole proceeding. Surely if he thinks that the proceeding was not fair or the judgment has not dealt fairly with the mariner, the minister would not be bound to maintain the cancellation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Some ministers do not enjoy the confidence of everybody.

Mr. VENIOT: This is a new section; where did the idea come from?

Mr. DUFF: It is imperialism.

Mr. VENIOT: Where did the request for the new section come from? This clause was never in any of our shipping legislation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is no mention in the bill as drafted, but I think it comes under the imperial agreements.

[Mr. Cantley.]

Mr. VENIOT: I thought so. Is there reciprocity?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friends will find the provision at page 7 of the British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement.

Mr. VENIOT: Please read it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It reads:

The court on formal investigation shall be empowered to cancel or suspend a certificate of competency or services granted by the administration of another part of the commonwealth only as to affect its validity within the jurisdiction of the part in which investigation is held, but the administration by which the certificate was granted may adopt such cancellation or suspension.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not the same.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I contend it is absolutely fair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, it is not.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not the same, at all.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Upon the return of a Canadian mariner who while abroad was guilty of certain offences meriting cancellation or suspension of his certificate when on a British ship in another part of the commonwealth, the minister will look into the record and conduct a review of what took place abroad. If he finds that the judgment was justified I see no objection to his maintaining the cancellation or suspension.

Mr. VENIOT: I have no objection to that, provided the arrangement is reciprocal, and the same treatment is given in another British country to a Britisher whose certificate has been cancelled here. But the paragraph the minister read from the convention does not agree with the section now under consideration, and there is no reciprocal provision.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend would read the agreement he would find it is reciprocal; it must be.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But the agreement is in force only when legislation is adopted in the various dominions.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is adopted when legislation is accepted to ratify or to give effect to it, and it may be given effect to under certain conditions. In the present instance the only condition is that the minister may or may not suspend or ratify a suspension or cancellation, and I say that very little safeguard is provided.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The imperial agreement is to the effect that every part of the British Empire should adopt the same legislation or legislation along the same lines.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why not indicate that arrangement in the statute?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is the agreement. If other parts of the empire do not follow the agreement, surely we will do otherwise; the government would not give effect to the section or would come to the house for a change in our law. At the present time we are taking the lead, being the greater dominion, and are adopting the legislation based on the imperial agreement. We expect that all the other parts of the empire will follow.

Mr. VENIOT: Is there anything in the bill which, for instance, gives power to a Canadian court to cancel for misdemeanour the certificate of a captain coming from England on an English ship? Is there anything giving any court in Canada the power to cancel the certificate of such a man for misdemeanour on the high seas, accident, or for any other reason? I can see nothing. If there is no such provision we have no right to have the section before us in our statutes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Section 562 covers the point the hon. member has raised. It is as follows:

> Any court holding a formal investigation pursuant to this part of this act may cancel or suspend a certificate of competency or service granted by another part of His Majesty's dominions so far only as concerns its validity within Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: That is it exactly—"within Canada."

Mr. DURANLEAU: Other parts of the empire have no greater power with respect to our mariner's certificate.

Mr. VENIOT: If it is cancelled in England, the validity under this legislation is null and void, even in Canadian waters, until the Canadian minister has made an investigation. The section states that the Canadian minister "may" maintain the cancellation. Therefore if he does not maintain the cancellation it should not take effect. But he has power to maintain or not to maintain the cancellation, as he sees fit, and no such provision exists in the British act.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will readily understand that so long as the minister has not maintained the cancellation abroad, the certificate of the mariner is in force in Canada, and the judgment or finding of the court abroad has no effect in Canada. It is left to the minister to decide whether or not he should maintain the cancellation in Canada, and exactly the same kind of legislation is supposed to be adopted by other parts of the empire.

Mr. VENIOT: If they do not adopt it, will the minister change this section?

Mr. DURANLEAU: In connection with this reciprocal arrangement the same law should be adopted by every part of the empire.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But it would be so easy for the government to insert the words: "provided the certificate has been cancelled or suspended in a part of the British dominions which has adopted a similar provision." That would be very easy to do.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think there is some protection in the last section of the bill. It is as follows:

> This act shall not come into force until a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette: Provided that he may, in the same manner and from time to time, bring any portion or portions only of this act into force.

If some parts of this legislation are not enacted in other parts of the empire we may never proclaim them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are 719 sections; surely there will not be 719 proclamations.

Mr. REID: Suppose the captain of a British ship operating in Canada came before the court, so long as that vessel was operating in Canadian waters would we have full jurisdiction to cancel the certificates of the captain, mates or engineers?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, we have, so far as Canada is concerned.

Section agreed to.

Mr. CANTLEY: I want to revert to section 562. We are rushing through these sections so fast that we are having no opportunity to read them, let alone give them any consideration. In section 562 we are abrogating our rights in regard to our certificates to our own captains and leaving those rights to a court in some point other than the dominion. Then we come to section 568, a new section, and we find there again that the certificates of Canadian captains may be cancelled by a foreign court, and we adopt the section without giving our own captains a hearing. I submit that is not god citizenship or good Canadianism. Then, although we have not yet reached clause 570, may I say that it reads as follows:

The minister shall not order a rehearing in Canada in connection with a shipping casualty in respect of which a formal investigation has been held in another part of His Majesty's dominions.

I say that that section should read absolutely the other way, and should say, "may order" instead of "shall not order."

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for Pictou is quite right. Under section 569 the minister may order the rehearing of an investigation which has been held in Canada, if there is new evidence, or if for any reason he believes there has been a miscarriage of justice. But when the cancellation or suspension has been the result of an investigation in another country, under section 570 the minister shall not order a rehearing in Canada in connection with a shipping casualty in respect of which a formal investigation has been held in another part of His Majesty's dominions. That is a discrimination not only against Canadians but against Canadian courts and Canadian investigations, and the minister will be powerless when there has been an investigation outside of Canada. When it is a Canadian investigation he has the power of ordering a rehearing. Surely my hon. friend from Pictou is right. These are provisions which seem absolutely uncalled for.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not content to allow a Nova Scotia captain who has sailed all over the world to be demoted by somebody in Hongkong or Ireland or some other part of the world. The minister should not abrogate his rights in that way.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The minister does not abrogate his rights because there is one thing he can do, and that is to ignore the judgment of an external court.

Mr. CANTLEY: Surely we are masters in our own house.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The minister has only one thing to do, and that is to ignore the judgment and then the certificate is still valid in Canada.

Section 570 to which the ex-Minister of Justice referred is a new section. I understand that it also is a provision in the British commonwealth agreement of 1931, and the reason probably is that when a misdemeanour has been committed outside of Canada it is very difficult to have a rehearing in this country because the witnesses are far away and an inquiry would be very expensive.

[Mr. Cantley.]

Mr. VENIOT: It goes beyond a misdemeanour.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I want to remind my hon. friends that the provision is absolutely reciprocal, being part of an agreement arrived at by all the different parts of the empire.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But it will be reciprocal only when similar legislation is enacted by the other parliaments, and I am doubtful whether Australia, for instance, will enact legislation giving to a court in Canada the right to cancel Australian certificates, because Australia is pretty jealous of her rights.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Australia was represented at that conference.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But the legislation has not gone through the Australian parliament.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is well understood, and it was so stated when the bill was introduced, that Canada is the first of the dominions to enact the provisions agreed upon in the conventions. The intention of this government is to put in force reciprocal agreements only when the other parts of the empire have adopted similar legislation. If they do not do so we shall see that our law is changed. But in this bill we are setting an example and inducing the other parts of the empire to adopt the same legislation. They have already agreed to do it. The conventions have been duly signed by the representatives of all the dominions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know, but parliament is master in each of those countries.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If we do not accept section 568 or section 570 we are setting aside the convention that was accepted by Canada and the other parts of the empire.

Mr. VENIOT: The other parts of the empire have not adopted any of this as yet.

Mr. DURANLEAU: But we have agreed to pass this legislation and the other dominions are waiting for this legislation in order to follow.

Mr. CANTLEY: If the minister agreed to do that he did something he had no right to do. Parliament has the last word as far as we are concerned.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I did not agree myself; the representatives of Canada agreed.

Mr. CANTLEY: Then they agreed to more than they had any right to agree to.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have no objection to allowing the section to stand.

On section 595—Appointment of harbour master.

Mr. REID: I think there should be an amendment to subsection 2. It should read, "no licensed pilot or harbour master shall be appointed to act or shall act as harbour master or deputy harbour master of any public harbour, unless he first surrenders his licence." I think this amendment should be made as we now have harbour commissioners who have been appointed harbour masters.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Acting in both capacities?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: On the western coast?

Mr. STEVENS: Where?

Mr. REID: New Westminster, I believe.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. REID: No, I am not. I would not rise if I did not know about this. Because of certain circumstances I would not like to go into the matter at this time but I shall be glad to give the name to the minister.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I know what my hon. friend means. The gentleman is ill.

Mr. REID: For that reason I do not like to bring it up publicly.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend is mistaken. The gentleman he refers to is a commissioner but he acts as manager of the harbour on behalf of the commission. He is not a harbour master in the sense of a harbour master appointed under this legislation.

Mr. REID: I think perhaps the minister is correct.

Sections 596 to 608 inclusive agreed to.

On section 609—Regulations respecting grain cargoes and deck cargoes.

Mr. REID: Why is it that only grain and deck cargoes are designated?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This section has been taken from the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. REID: That may be true, but I should like to know why only two types of cargo are referred to. What about a wheat cargo or any other type of cargo? This section does not take care of all cargoes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am informed that it is the rule to adopt regulations in connection with these two types of cargo.

Mr. REID: Only?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, because they are particularly dangerous.

Mr. REID: You have the power to make regulations concerning the carrying of dangerous goods. Dangerous goods may be carried below deck just the same as flour, apples, eggs or butter.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Under this bill dangerous goods means those goods which are dangerous in themselves, like explosives, but this type of cargo is not.

Mr. CANTLEY: Referring to subclauses 2 and 3 of clause 609, am I to understand that if a vessel loads a cargo in the St. Lawrence and subsequently calls at Pictou or Sydney for bunker coal, an officer may go aboard and investigate the question of the deck load or the storage of the cargo after the ship has been at sea for four or five days? What is the object in that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course the intention is that this clause should apply to a cargo coming from outside to a port in Canada; it is not intended to apply to a cargo leaving Montreal for Pictou, for instance, because such a cargo is supposed to have been examined in Montreal, in a Canadian port.

Mr. CANTLEY: With all due courtesy I do not think that is the meaning of the clause. If a vessel arrives from overseas safely in a Canadian port, what is the necessity of an officer going aboard to investigate her cargo? I do not think the minister's explanation is the correct one.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is in the case of damages to a cargo.

Mr. CANTLEY: It may be.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is to ascertain the condition of the cargo when it arrives in the Canadian port.

Mr. CANTLEY: That is a question for the underwriters.

On section 628—Annual return of port warden to minister.

Mr. REID: Can the minister explain why it is that the returns made by harbour masters are made at the end of the fiscal year while those of the port warden are made at the end of the calendar year? Why should the date of making returns not be the same?

Mr. DURANLEAU: These are the dates at which reports have always been made in the past. We have only reenacted the Canadian statute.

On section 631—Certificate to be evidence.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Is it only the number that we are passing or is it the whole section? It seems to me that we are simply passing the number. I think the sections should be read in committee in order that members may, at least, follow them. It is simply childish; we should be more in earnest in considering this bill and should not only adopt the numbers, as we have done this afternoon and evening.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): What is the number of the section?

Mr. DORION (Translation): The same procedure prevails in penitentiaries, everything goes by numbers.

On section 637—Collisions.

Mr. REID: In subclause 3 does the word "regatta" cover sports and races put on by fairs? The subclause reads:

> The governor in council may make rules or regulations relating to the safety of life or limb on navigable waters during regattas and marine parades.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, it is for the safety of life.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I desire to call the attention of the committee to subclauses 4 and 5. This is government by order in council with a vengeance. Subclause 4 reads:

> The governor in council may by order or regulation provide for the government and regulation of any body of water defined or described therein and may provide for the enforcement of such order or regulation.

That is as general as any language can be; it covers any rule or regulation whatever in connection with any body of water described in the order. Then subclause 5 states:

> Any rule, regulation or order so made may provide for a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars—

And so forth. Surely the minister should give the committee some explanation which would justify us in passing such arbitrary and drastic legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The marketing bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is worse than the marketing bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will ask that these stand.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Subclause 4, 5 and 6 stand. Shall the remainder of the clause carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Section 638 agreed to.

On section 639—Observance of regulations.

Mr. REID: In connection with this we come back to the old question of the definition of "ship" and "vessel." The clause reads:

> All owners and masters of vessels and rafts.

It will be remembered that in the interpretation clause the words "ship" and "vessel" have different definitions. The word "ship" has a clearer definition than the word "vessel." Here it just designates "vessels and rafts." I wonder if it should not be "ships, vessels and rafts."

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend knows that "ship" is included in the term "vessel."

Mr. REID: I do not believe "raft" is defined. A question may arise regarding rafts.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think it is necessary to define the word "rafts" because everyone knows what it is. It is logs bound together.

Mr. REID: The Davis raft that I was speaking of, used on the Pacific coast, is entirely different from anything in any other part of the world. I do not think the shipping interests of Great Britain have ever seen a Davis raft and they would not have any idea what it is.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course we have to give the ordinary meaning to the word "raft." A Davis raft would be included because it is a raft.

Mr. REID: I do not think the present section is wide enough.

On section 640—Provisions as to collisions, etc.

Mr. CANTLEY: The clause reads:

(1) Where, by the fault of two or more vessels, damage or loss is caused to one or more of those vessels, to their cargoes or freight, or to any property on board, the liability to make good the damage or loss shall be in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was in fault:

I should think there might be a collision with only one vessel at fault, not necessarily two.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This section apportions the liability when there is fault on both sides.

Mr. REID: Is there a different registry allowed for ships in different parts of the British colonies or dominions? Because I see in subsection 3 (a):

—in the case of a British ship registered elsewhere than in Canada, according to the law of that part of His Majesty's dominions where the ship is registered;

I thought they were all to be the same.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This enactment has been reproduced from chapter 186 of the revised statutes, but according to the imperial agreements the rules must be the same in every dominion.

On section 663—British ships only may engage in coasting trade.

Mr. BROWN: The proceedings this afternoon and evening have been somewhat monotonous, with only an occasional interruption from the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid).

Mr. REID: Oh, Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BROWN: I cannot allow this clause to pass without calling attention to it. It deals with coastal shipping and is of special interest to us who live on the prairies because it is intended to affect—

An hon. MEMBER: Prairie schooners.

Mr. BROWN: —shipping on the great lakes. The course of the government in this matter has been rather peculiar. It has been devious; we would really like to know what the government intends to do. Two years ago the government brought in a bill—I think it got as far as first reading and was then withdrawn; at any rate was not proceeded with—the intention of which was to give to Canadian vessels the monopoly of carrying Canadian grain on the great lakes. They probably thought it wise at the time to withdraw that bill, but last year they tried another tack. In the Bill J that was brought in last year they tried to put it across by a few changes in the definitions. The coasting trade of Canada was defined thus:

"Coasting trade of Canada" means the transportation by water or by land and water of goods or passengers from one place in Canada to the same or another place in Canada, whether or not such transportation is direct or via a foreign port outside of Canada and includes any part of such transportation.

The last part of that definition was added in order to take care of the particular situation that the government wanted to bring about. In section 932 of the Canada Shipping Act the coasting trade of Canada was defined as including:

—the carriage by water of goods or passengers from one port or place in Canada to another port or place in Canada.

Attention was drawn to that matter, and then the government decided to bring about the desired end by another method. So a bill was brought in last year restoring the old definition of coasting trade, making the change in what would correspond to section 663 of this act, which says:

No goods shall be transported by water or by land and water, from one place in Canada to another place in Canada, either directly or by way of foreign port, or for any part of the transportation in any ship other than a British ship.

That bill passed the house in face of opposition from this side, with the support of hon. members from the west representing farming constituencies who managed to convince themselves, or at least who seemed to convince themselves, that there was no danger to the grain interests in this clause. That bill passed the house, but it was not proclaimed by the government, and again we wonder what the real intention of the government is in this matter.

These particular sections form a part of the bill now before us. I do not suppose there is any use in continuing to debate this matter at any length, but I should like to repeat in a general way the objections we from the west take to this clause. Everyone knows that for the last two or three years the price of wheat has been at the lowest point in history, though it is not quite so low as it was a year or two ago. A great deal has been said in the past month or so with regard to relieving the burdens of the farmers. The famous marketing act ostensibly was devised with that purpose in view. It seems to me a much more sensible procedure would have been to consider some of the other difficulties the farmer has to meet. In my judgment it would have been much more sensible to reduce the cost of production, which could be done in a number of ways. It might be done by modifying the high protective measures that have been placed against some of the things used by the farmer, such as the ten per cent duty on barbed wire, the twenty-five per cent duty on cream separators and the twenty-five per cent duty that now applies to practically all lines of farm machinery, whereas previously the duty ranged from six to ten or twelve per cent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What section is the hon. member discussing?

Mr. BROWN: I am discussing this bill as it affects the farmer, and I am indicating that since it is essential that production costs should be lowered this is one of the ways in which the government might approach the matter. However, I quite understand that hon. members opposite, especially those representing farming districts in the west, do not like to have these things brought to their attention. As we see it this bill is calculated to put the carrying of grain on the great lakes into the hands of a Canadian monopoly. As we see it, it is essential that we should preserve what we have at present, that is, Buffalo as a strategic point at which to have wheat placed, whence it can be carried either via Montreal—and a great deal does go that way—or via New York. It means a great deal to the shipment of wheat to have a choice of routes, and we consider anything that will jeopardize the shipment of grain via that route to be a menace to the well being of the farmers.

It may be very interesting to note that wheat that has gone by that route sometimes has brought a higher price than wheat that has gone via the Canadian route. I took some interest in this matter, and shortly after coming down here at the beginning of this session I wrote the bureau of statistics to find out how much wheat had gone via the United States route and how much had gone via Canadian ports since the Ottawa agreements came into effect. The bureau of statistics gave me more information than I asked for, and here is what I find. The figures are given month by month from November, 1932, to December, 1933, with the price received for the grain in each month. The totals are as follows: Shipped via Canadian sea and river ports, 104,917,854 bushels; via United States ports, 50,883,301 bushels. The amount of money received for the grain shipped via Canadian ports was $62,428,-715, and the amount received for wheat shipped via United States ports was $31,396,-715. I was interested to see just what that would amount to per bushel. To my amazement I found that the wheat shipped via United States ports brought 61·7 cents per bushel, while the wheat shipped via Canadian ports brought only 59·5 cents per bushel. I could not understand those figures, and I wrote the bureau again to find out just at what point the price of wheat was fixed. In reply I had this letter:

> I have your letter of the 12th instant with reference to the memorandum mailed you on the second respecting Canada's exports of wheat to the United Kingdom via Canadian sea and river ports, and via the United States.
> As regards the value, I wish to point out that the value of exports of Canadian merchandise is the actual cost or the value at the time of exportation at the points in Canada whence originally shipped.

In my second letter to the bureau I had stated that I was anxious to know if we could possibly arrive at it what effect the six cent preference had on wheat shipped via United States ports. In that regard, in the same letter they said:

> We have no record as to the amount of wheat going via American ports that receive the benefit of the preference. With reference to the diversion of wheat shipped to the United Kingdom via the United States, I wish to advise that according to United States in transit figures, a very large percentage of Canadian wheat shown in Canadian trade statistics as exported to the United Kingdom via the United States border ports, is diverted while in transit via the United States, to other destinations, chiefly the continent of Europe. The percentage varies from year to year. For the calendar year, 1931, however, of the total amount of Canadian wheat shipped via United States Atlantic ports, about 27 per cent was destined for the United Kingdom, and in 1932, 17 per cent. There are no statistics available as yet for the year 1933. Then, again, it must be remembered that a considerable amount of Canadian wheat exported to overseas countries via the United States is rerouted from United States lake ports for shipment via Canadian ports chiefly the port of Montreal. For the calendar year 1933 the amount of rerouted wheat from United States lake ports for shipment via Canadian ports, amounted to 4,915,433 bushels.

So that while that figure is of a considerable size, the fact remains that the great bulk of the wheat recorded as having been shipped via American ports actually went that way. The point to which I wish to call the attention of hon. members is this: I am not able to explain—and if any hon. member can, I should like him to do so—why it is that the wheat we shipped to the United Kingdom via American ports brought us a higher price than the wheat shipped via Canadian ports. While I cannot explain that, there is one point which does seem perfectly clear, and that is that the six cent preference we were supposed to get on our wheat is not worth the snap of a finger.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And never was.

Mr. BAKER: Would we be better off without the preference?

Mr. BROWN: If anyone can give any other explanation for it I will give him the opportunity to do so.

Mr. BAKER: Would we be better off without the preference?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just another piece of humbug.

Mr. BROWN: I do not say we would be better off without it, but we are certainly no better off with it. That is the situation, despite the fact that we heard a lot of talk about a sheltered market for a large proportion of our wheat.

Mr. BAKER: Would you vote against a preference?

Mr. BROWN: I think the hon. member had better discuss subjects he knows something about.

Mr. BAKER: I do know something about it.

Mr. BROWN: I wish to protest against this section of the shipping bill, although I have not the slightest expectation that my protests will in any measure be effective. I am speaking for the farmers of the prairie provinces to whom the cheapest possible rates for the shipment of their wheat are absolutely essential. Even half a cent per bushel may mean a great deal to them, and on their behalf I wish to protest, as I did last year, against the enactment of this section. I therefore move:

That subsection 1 of section 663 be amended by striking therefrom the words, "either directly or by way of a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation."

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member (Mr. Brown) has quoted from a communication he received from the bureau of statistics in which, if I caught his reading of it correctly, he indicated that for the 50,000,000 bushels of wheat exported from Canada via American ports the return indicated 61 cents a bushel, while for the 104,000,000 bushels exported from Canada via Canadian ports the return indicated 59 cents a bushel. That I think was in round figures his observation, and he deduced from that the conclusion that it is in the interest of the western wheat grower to export his wheat from Canada via American ports. He has asked, and I think quite properly, if there is any explanation for the difference in those figures. I think I can indicate to him, and to anyone who will give the matter careful and impartial thought, certain factors that enter into the situation. It is I think not difficult to explain.

In the first place, it will be noted that the point of shipment there recorded is in all probability Port Arthur or Fort William. I have similar figures in the report of the board of grain commissioners but covering a different period of time, so they do not synchronize exactly with the figures quoted. The point of departure, however, is Port Arthur or Fort William. Apparently we have no record in the figures given of what the grade of wheat was. It is obvious that grade No. 1, for instance, would bring a much higher price than grades 2, 3 or 4. I think perhaps the major portion of the wheat so exported would be grade No. 2. The first factor is the grade of the wheat, and there is no record of the precise quantity of the various grades that were included in those two different parcels.

The second point I would indicate is this, that not only is there a difference in grade, but the shipments cover the whole period of the year. The wheat exported from United States ports, for instance, might have been shipped largely during a certain period and not so much during another period, or the period and quantity may have varied; and as the price of wheat varies from day to day and week to week—we had some very sharp fluctuations last year, particularly last summer, in the middle of the calendar year—here again you have not a constant factor but a varying factor.

The third point I would suggest to my hon. friend, and this is perhaps the main cause of it, is that Europe, due to the very high protection it has had against incoming wheat from any part of the world and the stimulation given to the production of soft wheat in its own territory, is buying very largely No. 1 grade in order to get the strongest wheat for mixing purposes with their flour. Therefore it is reasonable to assume that the largest portion of the export of No. 1 wheat went to European ports and not to British ports. I think with these three factors in mind it is not hard to understand the variation in the price of wheat as coming from those two different sources. But in any case one could not possibly base a definite argument or conclusion upon the result obtained merely by dividing the quantity of wheat into the total amount received therefor.

Mr. HOWDEN: If I may interrupt for a moment, is it reasonable to suppose that all the better grades of grain would be shipped through American ports?

Mr. STEVENS: There is no doubt that a very substantial portion of No. 1 will go on a route that will carry it chiefly to the continent. I do not think that can be questioned, because I have had occasion very frequently in the last year or two to examine into that feature. Furthermore, the diversion of the wheat exported from American ports is undoubtedly to the continent more than it used to be. Because of the six cents preference there is a tendency that the largest portion of the wheat going to the British Isles will go through Canadian ports, but other wheat might be exported through American channels.

Turning to the hon. gentleman's argument and to his amendment, I do not share his view as to the damage that this may do to the exporter of wheat. I am quite certain that it will not result in anything of the kind, and I think I can give some very reasonable answers to that apprehension on his part.

So far as this clause is concerned it is simply putting into effect in Canada precisely what is the law in the United States. No Canadian vessel can go to Duluth and carry grain to Buffalo, nor can a Canadian vessel go to Duluth and carry grain to Port Colborne in Canada, and then from Port Colborne back to Oswego or some other American port. All we are doing by this clause is simply saying that when wheat is carried from Port Arthur to Port Colborne or Montreal or some other Canadian port it shall be carried in a Canadian vessel, or if it is carried to an American port and then transshipped back to a Canadian port it shall be carried in Canadian vessels. That is exactly the law of the United States, and it is not in any sense doing violence, shall I say, to competition on the great lakes.

The next point is this. Any wheat that is carried from Port Arthur to Buffalo can be carried by a United States or Canadian vessel as in the past. There is nothing in the world to hinder American vessels from entering into that trade. They can do so just as freely as they wish.

Further I would point out this to the committee, and this is without a doubt a very serious matter to Canada, that during a number of years prior to 1930 a tremendous stimulus was given to the construction of vessels and their introduction on the great lakes both on the part of the United States and on the part of Canada with the result that to-day we have on the great lakes tonnage—my hon. friend the Minister of Marine perhaps has more accurate information—that I believe is double what is required for the service. That is a lamentable condition. So there is no difficulty about competition on the great lakes so far as shipping is concerned. There is an overplus of shipping on the great lakes for our requirements.

In the next place during all the years down to say 1930—I am speaking without the figures under my hand, because I did not know this was coming up, otherwise I would have had them here; but I think my memory is correct—the general run of the rates on grain from the head of the lakes to Montreal, ranged from eight to eleven cents. Since that time the rate on grain has gone down until at one time last year it was $2\frac{3}{4}$ cents, which is away below the actual cost of carrying it, but say the rate was from $4\frac{1}{2}$ to $6\frac{1}{2}$, or $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents, as it was for a very short time. It is now being carried at a rate of about six cents. Now six cents is a very fair and equitable rate; indeed in the light of the rates of a great many years it is a low rate.

Someone has kindly handed to me a statement which I put on Hansard a year or two ago giving the rates from Fort William to Montreal since 1923. This is the average rate by years:

Year:	Average rate cents
1923	10·45
1925	8·30
1926	8·94
1927	7·80
1928	8·40
1929	8·35
1930	8·05

I think we can say that in 1933 the rate would probably average around 5 or 5½ cents. In the years prior to 1930 which I have mentioned the rate ran from about 7·80, or almost eight cents, to 10·45, or 10½ cents. That was the average from year to year prior to 1930.

Mr. HOWDEN: I had a recollection that after our first legislation was enacted the rates were increased on the lakes.

Mr. STEVENS: Which legislation?

Mr. HOWDEN: The legislation giving Canadian vessels practically a monopoly between Canadian ports.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry my hon. friend is in error there because that legislation never went into effect. As a matter of fact, the rates were never lower than last year. They were lamentably, recklessly—shall I say—low. But a fair rate, as hon. gentlemen will see, would be a six cent rate. I think possibly you may have lower rates than that at times. The point I am making is that there is an abundance of shipping on the great lakes.

As far as our American neighbours are concerned, Canadian vessels cannot go over there and carry grain or other cargoes in the same way that American vessels have been permitted in part to do on this side, and all that this legislation is doing is to synchronize our legislation with that of the United States, and giving to the Canadian carrier the opportunity of carrying the goods for Canadian ports, while still preserving to the exporter of the west the right to ship his grain to Buffalo or any other American port he wishes by American bottoms or Canadian bottoms. So I think there is no danger to the exporter of a lack of competition or of any penalizing of the farmer by way of an increased rate. The minister in charge of the bill will speak for himself and for the government, but while I am on my feet I may say that personally I could not find myself justified, in the light of the knowledge I have, in supporting the amendment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will the minister tell the committee why the government did not put into force the act that was passed last year?

Mr. STEVENS: I think I can answer my hon. friend. This shipping act was then in the process of revision. It was, as my hon. friend knows, revised last year to a substantial degree, but it was not brought into this house. During the year, however, very definite progress was made in its revision, and it was therefore thought inadvisable to proclaim the old act. There was a provision in the act of last year making it subject to proclamation, and it was thought inadvisable to proclaim that act until we had fully revised this shipping act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is it likely that the government will exempt this section by proclamation when the rest of the act is brought into force?

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Justice could answer that question. I presume he will correct me if I am wrong, but I should say that when this bill passes it will take the place of the amending act of last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Any section can be exempted by proclamation if the government sees fit.

Mr. BOWMAN: In answer to the question whether those sections will come into force when this shipping act is proclaimed, might I refer to section 665, which provides as follows:

> The governor in council may, from time to time, by order in council declare that the foregoing provisions of this part of this act shall not, for the period specified in such order in council, apply, either throughout Canada or in any specified waters of Canada, to the ships or vessels, or to any specified, ascertained or ascertainable class or number of the ships or vessels, of any foreign country.

There is a special provision covering sections 661 to 664 inclusive.

Mr. STEVENS: Section 665 is a permissive clause.

Mr. BOWMAN: Quite so. While I am on my feet I should like to refer to sections 4 and 5 of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act. This act contains special provisions with regard to the rates which may be chargeable. Section 4 contains provisions for the receiving and tabulating of charges, and states in part:

It shall be the duty of the board to receive and tabulate all such tariffs and rates as may be filed with the board—

And further on:

—and to consider and report to the minister from time to time any facts which may come to the knowledge of the board and which tend to show that there is a deficiency of cargo space,—

On the event of a deficiency section 665 might be invoked and foreign vessels allowed to participate in the trade. I should like to refer to the next section of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act, which states:

When in the opinion of the board the toll, charge or rate which any company, owner or person charges or intends or proposes to charge for the carriage of grain as aforesaid is unreasonable or excessive, or amounts to an unjust discrimination against any person, company or class of persons as compared with the tolls or rates for similar traffic between Canadian and United States ports, or between one port and another in either of said countries, the board may prescribe such maximum rates as it may consider reasonable.

The board referred to there is the board of grain commissioners. The section continues:

The maximum rates so prescribed may vary or be limited in their application according to the time or season of shipping, and the board shall indicate in its order fixing such maximum rates whether the same are to prevail until further order or the period or periods during which they are respectively to prevail.

If the rates charged for grain on the lakes are excessive, under the provisions of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act just quoted, the board of grain commissioners may step in and fix what they consider to be reasonable rates. There is also a further provision in the Customs Act which may be invoked in the event of the rates being too high. Without taking the time to read all of section 298, I may say that it provides for the regulation of the coasting trade by the governor in council under such circumstances as to it may seem advisable and proper. It seems to me that there are sufficient safeguards in the Customs Act, in the Inland Water Freight Rates Act and in section 665 of the Shipping Act to prevent vessels carrying grain on the lakes from making excessive charges. When they do that a maximum rate may be fixed by the board of grain commissioners. In my opinion there is ample control and sufficient protection given to shippers by the sections to which I have just referred.

[Mr. Bowman.]

Mr. VALLANCE: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has just stated that the rates this year were probably the lowest we have had for many years. Would those low rates not be largely due to the short crop in the west this year? If we get back to normal times and grow a normal crop have we any assurance that after this bill is put into operation and the competition on the three way route is eliminated, we will not have a combination of Canadian shipping which will have the shippers of western Canada at their mercy?

Mr. STEVENS: I am glad my hon. friend has asked that question. I do not think there is any danger of that happening. One reason is that which I have indicated already, the surplus of shipping. This is an enormous surplus and far beyond anything that was warranted. There was a regular plethora of lake shipping construction in the years just prior to 1930. In addition, there are those sections of the act to which my hon. friend referred and which were not at the moment in my mind. The administration of the Inland Water Freight Rates Act is under the board of grain commissioners and, of course, myself as minister. That act gives a very definite control. This control was exercised over two years ago when the Canadian and American shipping raised the rate for a short time to seven and a half cents. We stepped in and immediately fixed a maximum rate of six and a half cents, if I remember rightly, which was later reduced to six cents to Montreal. The board of grain commissioners keep a constant watch on the situation, and should any occasion arise, that control can be exercised. In the present bill there is a clause whereby the governor in council may step in and suspend that particular part, or the same thing may be done under the Customs Act. This matter does not pass out of the control of the government, even when parliament is not sitting. When parliament is sitting, of course we can deal with it in parliament if it is so desired. First, there is the economic protection because of the large quantity of shipping, and then there is the protection afforded by the Inland Water Freight Rates Act and the Customs Act.

Mr. VALLANCE: This particular section is for the protection of Canadian operators of lake shipping?

Mr. STEVENS: I would not like to agree with that interpretation. I would say that it is to put Canadian shipping on a fairly equitable basis with its competitors on the great lakes, namely, American shipping, without doing any harm to Canadian interests.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is that not the reason advanced by every country in the world when it puts restrictions on business and trade—"you do so and so and I will follow suit. You put on a quota and I will put on a quota. You put on an embargo and I will put on an embargo." Is that not what is raising the devil with the whole world's trade?

Mr. STEVENS: That is not quite right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It certainly is. Has my hon. friend heard that old nursery rhyme? It goes like this:

Tit for tat,
Butter for fat,
If you kill my dog
I'll kill your cat.

That heathen sentiment is what has got the whole world by the ears. I thought my hon. friends opposite were cured of this delusion but they are like the porcine that was washed, and still went back to her wallowing in protection. It is true that those safeguards mentioned by the hon. member are there, and they were put there, by the way, by a Liberal government, who at the time were jeered at for their pains. Nevertheless on general principles I am astonished to hear the hon. member, who is supposed to be a little more broad-minded on this matter than the average of his colleagues, enunciating such a policy, not in broad daylight but in lamplight or electric light or whatever you like to call it, without a blush on his face.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very proud of it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Anyway, on general principles I shall vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. BROWN: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated that this is only putting Canadian ships on the same plane as United States ones in relation to coastal trade. He pointed out that Canadian ships could not go to Duluth to carry grain to Port Colborne and then carry that grain back to Oswego. I suppose that is a fact, but I venture the assertion that there is not very much grain going from Duluth to Port Colborne and then to Oswego.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interrupt my hon. friend? Certainly I am not suggesting that that was an equitable comparison; I mentioned it merely at random as an indication of the application of the principle.

Mr. BROWN: I understand that quite well, but it is a case where one can assert a principle that has really no practical application. The fact of the matter is that the trade in Canadian wheat from the great lake ports to Buffalo, thence via New York in some cases and via Montreal in others, is tremendous. It is a unique situation for which, I imagine, it would be very hard to find a parallel case elsewhere in the world. Because of that we wish to preserve the situation as it is. I do not, however, propose to carry on the argument any further; I know the intention of the government but I would point out of course that the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not undertake to answer what I said in relation to the six cent preference. Some hon. members opposite have had a beautiful vision of a ship loading wheat at Port Arthur for Britain and then of a ship loading wheat in Russia having to pay six cents a bushel duty to get into Great Britain. That is a beautiful picture but the idea simply does not work. The Prime Minister admitted that we would never get a higher price because of the six-cent preference. He spoke simply of a sheltered market and under the quota the sheltered market has all gone.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It will be remembered by the committee—and this has already been stated by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown)—that this question was discussed at some length last year when this provision and some others were brought in by way of special legislation which, however, has never become law owing to the fact that it has not been proclaimed. Now we are again confronted with exactly the same situation.

I may as well say quite frankly that so far as this legislation affects directly the people of my part of the country, this is the only part of the bill in which we are primarily interested, although of course as members of parliament we are interested in all phases of the bill which will affect any part of Canada. But this in particular affects our own people and those whom we represent. No one perhaps knows better than does the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) the customs and practices under which wheat shipments are carried on; as a matter of fact he knows this so much better than I do that I would hesitate to express an opinion, but it is fairly well known that, as has been stated by the hon. member for Lisgar, a unique situation obtains in respect of our wheat shipments and in regard to the port of Buffalo. That city is used as a storage and distribution point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member desires to maintain that position.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We understand it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Buffalo is used as a storage and distribution point from which wheat may be shipped through any port of Canada or the United States. As I understand this part of the bill, it will be of dual effect. It will at once limit the amount of competition on the great lakes so far as our freight rates on wheat are concerned. It will eliminate not wholly but partly United States competition in shipping on the great lakes. It will do something else; it will militate against Canadian ports which lie below Buffalo because under this part of the bill, if we assume that Canadian wheat has been shipped in a United States bottom from Canadian ports to Buffalo for transfer and reshipment, it will then be impossible, no matter under what conditions of marketing or shipping and no matter what the desire of the shipper may be, for that wheat to return to a Canadian port for final shipment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It can, in a Canadian bottom.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I said: If it had been shipped in a United States bottom from, say Fort William to Buffalo, it would be impossible for it to be shipped from there to a Canadian port for final shipment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In a United States bottom, but not in a Canadian bottom.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: But this clause states that goods cannot be carried either directly or indirectly in other than a British vessel, which means a Canadian or British vessel.

Mr. BOWMAN: They can go from Buffalo to Montreal in a Canadian boat.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was merely calling the attention of the committee to this: if it is assumed that the first leg of the trip has been made in a United States bottom and has been broken at Buffalo, it will be impossible in a British or United States boat to carry the wheat to some other Canadian port as part of that trip.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is in error. The same grain can be handled the balance of the trip in a Canadian bottom.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It will be considered as part of the original trip?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and that will not do violence to this provision at all. The grain could not be carried from Fort William to Buffalo in a United States vessel and then from Buffalo to Montreal in a United States vessel, but it could be carried from Fort William to Buffalo in a United States vessel and then from Buffalo to Montreal in a Canadian vessel.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That phase of the matter was not made at all clear last year; the impression was left that once grain had been shipped to Buffalo in a United States vessel it would be impossible for it to be shipped in any vessel back to a Canadian port. To my mind there is no value in any further discussion of this matter, to consider freight rates of past years because it must be pointed out that during all these years and up to the present United States competition has been in force and such freight rates are no criterion as to possible rates where competition is eliminated as this legislation has not so far been put into force.

Mr. VALLANCE: It will be the maximum.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Freight rates on the great lakes have also been a determining factor so far as rates from Vancouver and other points are concerned, because it has always been pointed out that wheat at least, being a commodity international in its character and where every fraction of a cent of additional cost must be paid by the producer who ships the grain, will naturally follow the cheapest route, whether western or eastern, whether to Buffalo, Port Colborne, Montreal or any other port; and the cheapest route will set the price very largely for all the other routes by which grain is shipped. Wheat is also in a singular position in this respect, perhaps beyond all other commodities, that every fraction of a cent of additional cost in the handling and shipment is reflected at once in a reduction in price to the producer. The price is set in Liverpool or the markets of the world. Every fraction of a cent which it costs to carry it to that market is taken from the amount which the producer receives. So the route by which and the conditions under which his grain is shipped are of direct and vital interest to the producer of wheat. Frankly, may I say, we look with some trepidation upon any action or act which removes any competitive factor in the transportation of our wheat. We are not inclined to trust too much to statutory protection, to the powers of the grain commission to regulate, or any other form of control, because however effective that control may be, we know that one of the most effective forms of control, and one which under this act will be removed in some degree at least, is that which comes into operation through competition of other means of transportation. The slightest restriction or limitation of that competition may be—I do not say necessarily will be—may be reflected in the price that the farmer receives. And may I say that under present conditions, or under any conditions, the manifest duty of those whose interest—for this we have sometimes been accused, and we accept the accusation—whose interest is primarily although not solely that of the farmer producer, is to make certain to the best of their ability that no additional costs are placed on the transport of that commodity, and that no controlling factor is removed and no injustice done. It is not that the western farmer would not prefer, the cost and other things being equal, to have his grain carried in Canadian bottoms. He would. But he cannot afford to pay for that sentiment, and he cannot afford to take the chance of an increase in cost through the removal of that controlling factor. We know quite well that owing to the composition of the house and for other reasons our protest can be only a protest, but we make it in the hope that being seized of the situation, and in view of the forebodings with which the farmer views this bill, the government will see to it that by every statutory power at their disposal, under section 165 and other sections, under the Inland Water Freight Rates Act and other acts, every means will be taken when this competitive protection is removed to see that the farmer and producer does not suffer.

I shall not waste the time of the committee in dealing further with this matter, but I desire to associate myself with those to my right who have already given voice to the views of the western farmers in stating our doubt, our trepidation with regard to this part of the bill, which, no matter what may be said, no matter what other regulations may be in force, no matter what other powers of control may be at hand, does remove one of the most effective factors in the control of the transportation cost of wheat and therefore of the price which we may receive.

Mr. MICHAUD: The question raised by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) in submitting an amendment to this clause has been emphasized by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Speakman). The broad question which has been indirectly raised is that of the routing and transportation of western grain. These hon. gentlemen claim that they cannot afford to pay for sentiment. I submit that there is a part of this country and a class of people in this country who have been paying for sentiment for a long time, and have not yet complained. This amendment raises the question of the routing and transportation of grain and indirectly the question of trans-Canada transportation, and the use of Canadian ports either on the Atlantic or on the Pacific. I submit that the people of the west should now begin to think of paying a little for sentiment in this country. We in the maritimes are paying for sentiment. We have been supporting the west; the millions of dollars which have been furnished to the west in the last three or four years—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MICHAUD:—that have been guaranteed are contributed to by the east for sentiment. If these western farmers and wheat growers would think for a moment of what the people of the east have to pay to maintain the transportation systems, both rail and water, they would I believe be satisfied to pay at least half a cent or a cent a bushel more for transporting their wheat by an all-Canadian route, either by water or by rail. I cannot subscribe to this amendment, Mr. Chairman, and if it were possible to make the section a little stronger, to make it an absolute prohibition so that western people could not ship grain by any other than Canadian ports and Canadian railways or ships, I think we would serve the country well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a Canada first policy.

Mr. VALLANCE: A few evenings ago I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) make some such statement as that of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Michaud), and I took it upon myself that night to tell the Prime Minister—and he did not need telling—just what contribution the west has made to eastern Canada. If hon. members are going to talk now of our paying for sentiment, let me say that we have done nothing else ever since we have been in the west. Take the tariff, for instance; on everything we have to buy it is tariff, tariff, tariff. My hon. friend talks about paying for sentiment. I object, Mr. Chairman; I do not care who says it, whether it comes from this side of the house or the other or any corner of the house, as long as I am able to stand on my feet I propose to say that that is not true, and that the west is not prepared to pay any more for sentiment than we have already paid. There is no sentiment in this. My hon. friend asks: Why don't you compel all Canadian wheat to go through Canadian ports?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): The best way.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, but suppose the United States government said that any wheat going into Buffalo could not be carried out of Buffalo in a Canadian bottom, what action could the government take?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Wait and see.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would you take the action that is now suggested? Do you see what you are starting?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Address the Chair.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Chair would not reply, I am addressing the minister through the chair, as I would like to have a reply. We are now taking a stand to prevent American bottoms from taking wheat from Buffalo to the port of Montreal or any other Canadian port. Suppose the United States should say to us: You shall not take any wheat, either American or Canadian, from the port of Buffalo to anywhere. What action would you take?

Mr. STEVENS: The suggestion my hon. friend makes is of course a complete violation of all known international shipping practice. It is recognized that coastwise trade is the business of a country, but it is also recognized that the movement of goods out of one country's port to another country's port is open shipping. Of course any country could take the stand that no shipping from another country should enter its ports, but that would be a complete violation of international amity in regard to transportation.

Mr. VALLANCE: Let me ask one question. Is wheat the only commodity that is shipped to United States ports that cannot be shipped back to Canada in United States bottoms?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly not. The only reason wheat comes into the question is because wheat happens to be the major cargo in this case. That applies to anything you like to mention, oats, barley or anything else. There is no coal moving and I suppose there are not many other cargoes, but if there were it would apply to them as well.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Mr. VALLANCE: So that when we come down to it the western grain grower is the one who has to pay through the nose in the application of this act.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman opposite who spoke last said there was no sentiment in this matter. There is no doubt of that so far as he is concerned, but if you want to see an exhibition of pure selfishness I commend you to the speech of the reverend gentleman from Lisgar (Mr. Brown). For ten years I listened to hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power, bellyaching about the Hudson bay railway, and finally we spent $60,000,000 to build that railway and grain storage elevators there. Why don't they use them? Why are they coming here to-day wanting to send grain through United States ports? Have our ship owners on the great lakes no rights? Are they not Canadians and entitled to some consideration? Then hon. gentlemen opposite spoke of what we have done for the west, as though we had no right to mention it at all. Why, we have given the west $30,000,000, $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 in the last two or three years to relieve the situation there. Apparently that counts for nothing at all. Now the hon. member for Lisgar comes along; he will not employ a Canadian vessel at all. We must send all our grain through United States ports, and he deludes himself with the idea that he gets a better price by sending it that way than by sending it through Canadian ports. He cannot prove it; indeed there is no foundation whatever for that suggestion. If the hon. gentleman had his way all the ships that have been built on the great lakes, largely to relieve the situation of which he complains, ships which are now lying idle in the St. Lawrence river by the score, would be wiped out. Then he would find, before he was very much older, that when the Americans had complete control they would make him pay through the nose for every bushel of wheat they carried for him and his western friends, and possibly they would ultimately force the bulk of it to be sent through that more or less impossible channel that cost $60,000,000 to construct.

Mr. BROWN: I am sorry this question has been raised as between east and west.

Mr. CANTLEY: Perhaps you are, but you raised it.

Mr. BROWN: I am sorry my hon. friend who is a new member of the house has discussed the question which has been threshed out here again and again; evidently as yet he has only the maritime point of view. In general terms I should like to say that whatever the east has done for the west has been repaid over and over and over again.

Mr. BAKER: How?

Mr. BROWN: It has been repaid over and over again.

Mr. CANTLEY: We have only your unsupported testimony on that point.

Mr. BROWN: The billions of bushels of grain that have been raised in the west during the last thirty years have kept alive the industries of eastern Canada. But for that there would have been no industries in eastern Canada. I do not want to discuss this matter further; I am sorry that it has been introduced. There was no occasion for it.

Mr. CANTLEY: It was you who introduced it.

Mr. BROWN: No; all I asked was that the routes we already have should be maintained, because the western farmer is not in a position to even run the risk of having to pay higher freight rates than he is paying at the present time. That is all we are asking in this amendment.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): This is purely a political speech of the hon. member.

Mr. BROWN: It is nothing of the kind.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): There is not one word in this act that will make the western farmers pay one cent more for freight on their grain. You are just saying this sort of thing for the benefit of the Liberal press in western Canada.

Mr. VALLANCE: I object to the statement made by the hon. member for Saskatoon. We have threshed this thing out on the floor of this house year after year ever since it was first suggested, not only when there was an election in the province of Saskatchewan. I should like to ask hon. members from that province and from all the western provinces who are sitting behind the government whether they are in agreement with regard to this clause. If this thing goes through and is put into operation you will have the maximum freight rate on the great lakes at all times, and you will eliminate one-third of the competition there to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, you will. You are not going to prevent an American bottom from going to the head of the lakes and returning to Buffalo, but you are going to prevent it from going from Buffalo back to any Canadian port. In many years fifty per cent of the Canadian wheat goes through Buffalo.

An hon. MEMBER: Too much.

Mr. VALLANCE: Probably it is. It goes that way not because of sentiment but because of economics.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Fifty per cent went via New York in the years you are talking about.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, it did not. There is no place on the American continent where Canadian wheat can be assembled so readily as it can be done at Buffalo. All that is necessary to prove that statement is to look at the great expenditures that Canadians have made at Buffalo in order to take advantage of the routes out of that port.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who made the expenditure? The grain growers themselves did.

Mr. VALLANCE: We did; there is not a dollar of government money invested in Buffalo to-day. It is the money of the Canadian growers, paid through the nose to the grain trade.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): The wheat pool.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, and the grain growers' company and many of the other interests in Winnipeg. The minister said the lowest rate we ever had was the rate of two and three-quarters cents per bushel this year. If you eliminate this competition we are going to be subjected to the maximum rate.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): As one coming from the province of Saskatchewan I want to dissent from what has been said. In the view of some hon. gentlemen Buffalo may be the cheapest and best place to assemble wheat from western Canada, but I would remind hon. members that hundreds of millions of bushels of Canadian wheat are passing to the British market through the ports of Vancouver and Churchill. This is an entirely new situation which has come into existence in the last two years. Evidently my hon. friend does not know what is happening in Canada. He just sees the country from the point of view of his own constituency, nothing more. When my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) was speaking he said all the west was subject to these rates from Fort William. I venture to say that half the grain from his own district goes to the market through Vancouver, and it will continue to go in that way. Then so long as we have that competition between two of our own ports, which we have paid for and which are supported by us, what on earth is the good of talking about raising rates somewhere else? Last summer they lowered rates in order to kill Churchill, and they succeeded. Let them raise the rates, if they dare, and they will build up Churchill. Go to it. It will prevent Churchill from being destroyed, and will save for the western farmer the best port in Canada. If the eastern Canadians do not like to meet our competition, they will have to take the consequences, that is all. I am not afraid of eastern Canadian competition, or competition on the great lakes. We will build up our own trade in our own way, as we have been doing it in the last two years. If the hon. member for South Battleford wishes to laugh about it, he may do so, but we are going to build up trade in that way. I have every sympathy with eastern Canada, because, thank God, I was born in the east. But I live in the west; we have to meet western conditions, and they may as well make up their minds to do so because we are not going to be defeated in our efforts to build up the trade of that country.

Mr. BROWN: The last speaker indicated it would be a good thing by law to force all Canadian grain through Canadian ports. Suppose the Americans did that, what would become of Canadian grain going through the port of Montreal?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The last speaker from the province of Saskatchewan has reminded me that the grain from my constituency and that of the greater part of Alberta goes through the port of Vancouver, and not across the great lakes. I am aware of that fact. But I am aware of this fact, too, that the rates on any one of these routes is a factor in setting the rates for any one of the others, and that the rates through Vancouver are at least partially set by the competition supplied by the great lakes, by Churchill, by rail to Montreal, and every other route. It is a matter of balance and competition between one point and another, and no one point can hold itself independent of the conditions at the other point. The rates are set in that way.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Precisely.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: May I suggest to the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) for whom I have great personal regard, that this is not a political question, nor, so far as I am concerned, is it raised as a matter of political policy or political advantage for the Liberal press. If my hon. friend would listen to my friends sitting to my right I think he would readily appreciate at least this fact, that I am not persona grata with the Liberal party or supporting Liberal members at the present time, just as I was certainly not persona grata with the Conservative party when the Liberal party was in power. At that time I was accused of being a Liberal, because I cooperated with the only party in parliament competent to do anything. Now I am accused of being a Conservative, because I cooperate, again, with the only party in parliament competent to do anything. I will cooperate with any government prepared to do anything in Canada's interests, so that no one can accuse me of being for the Liberal party. I am, however, speaking from the point of view which is not only my own but that of the majority of the people whom I represent and who, as has been suggested, ship via the port of Vancouver but are vitally affected by everything which takes place, and by every competitive or non-competitive factor. We are dependent upon and subject to the influence of what takes place at every other point, and I do suggest that one of the most potent factors in regulating the cost of transporting our Canadian wheat has been the competition by American bottoms on the great lakes. I deplore that fact. I deplore the fact that at times during the past years Canadian bottoms have not seen fit to give greater competition. May I point out also that I fully appreciate and understand the policy of the government, namely that within the confines of Canada, and to the degree to which the government of Canada is competent to effect that end, the different ports of Canada shall each be given an advantage within Canada. And as each is given an advantage it is the desire of the government that all will be on a parity, and on a higher parity than would otherwise exist. I understand that. But I understand this also, that perhaps beyond any other commodity in Canada wheat is purely and completely international in its character. It cannot be controlled by any purely Canadian action. It is predominantly sold on the world market, and the domestic price is a subsidiary factor dependent entirely upon the world market. Again differing from any other article, every fraction of cost in removing wheat from the producer to the ultimate market in the old world is deducted from the price received by the producer. It stands in a class by itself.

It cannot be benefited and it may be injured by any purely national action in respect to it. That is why I suggest that the government should consider very carefully the full effect of its action. If this provision is put into force I suggest that the government at all times keep in mind the application of every possible control, statutory, regulatory or any other form, which will prevent the farmers who are already suffering sufficiently from suffering any additional handicap through the removal of competitive factors on one of our chief channels of trade.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): The hon. gentleman is all right and he is all wrong. He is right when he states that competition sets the freight rates. He has said that the competition on the great lakes will fix the rates in Vancouver.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Will be a factor in fixing the rates.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): All right. The rates in Vancouver will fix the rates on the great lakes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Also a factor.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): All right. As soon as those rates are increased Vancouver will have more grain to ship. Last year I believe 120,000,000 bushels went through that port. Let them take another 120,000,000 bushels away from Fort William, and where would shipping on the lakes be?

Mr. VALLANCE: Would it cost the farmer a little more?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): No, not a cent. The farmers out there are shipping through Vancouver because it has the cheapest rate, and that competition will keep the lake rates down. As soon as the rates are raised, down will go the shipping.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have one personal observation to make, and I shall have finished. I come from a portion of Saskatchewan which I may describe as being on the shed. In other words, the rate to Vancouver is to us always the same as it is to the east, and my people are most interested because of the very point raised by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman). If you are going to make it possible to apply the maximum rate on the lakes you are going either to increase the shipments to Vancouver or increase the rates of shipment to Vancouver. There is no part of western Canada, taking the meridian of Alberta and Saskatchewan, that is more vitally interested than that portion. I represent a part of that country, and I feel keenly on this matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When this matter was under discussion last year and the year before I stated that I had no harsh feelings towards the maritimes. As a matter of fact, I should like all Canadian produce that now goes via American Atlantic ports to go via our maritime ports. Even if the cost might be a trifle greater, in normal times I would not mind that extra cost if it were only say half or quarter of a cent. But when we are losing money on every blessed bushel we raise, every quarter of a cent means that much more loss to us. Last year we had magnificent crops in the district from which I come, yet we lost money. Well now, to ask us simply for sentimental reasons to lose a little more is something which is hard to swallow. I think too much of our maritime friends to quarrel with them, because I love that country,—its history, its people, its tradition and the story of the early Acadians and British settling there. I am not going to quarrel with them now; do not make any mistake about it, because I do not feel that way. But I do feel that the government has been derelict in its duty in not settling this question about Canadian wheat going to the United Kingdom via Buffalo. What in the world was the sense of making an agreement here in this building without knowing what were to be the conditions under which grain was to enter the United Kingdom via Buffalo, whether it would be subject to the six cent duty or not? As a matter of fact, this government forgot all about it. I doubt if the question ever was raised in this building at the time the agreement was being made, and it was not until the hullabaloo was set up when the grain started to go via Buffalo that the government grew alarmed, and when the question was put up to them they were afraid to decide it—let the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) correct me if I am wrong. Had the question been settled at the outset whether our wheat could go via Buffalo and thereby escape the tax of six cents duty when it entered the United Kingdom, because it is a tax—there is no preference about it; it is a question of taxing or not taxing the grain when it enters British ports—there never would have been any trouble about it. But the government neglected to settle that question at the time of the bargain, and naturally it then became a question whether the grain should go by our maritime ports and please the people of the maritimes or go via Buffalo and please the people of the west. The answer of the government and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce always was: This is a question for the British people to decide; it is their problem; we have nothing to do with it; it is they who gave the preference and so on, and so forth. But is that the case? It is not the case. It is just as much our problem as it is the problem of the British people. If the doctrine that it is the British people who have the say on this matter is correct, it is the British people who have the say on the bacon question, on the cattle question, on the tobacco question and on all the other questions that were dealt with at the Ottawa conference. There was every reason why there should have been a specific understanding at the time of the bargain. The question should never have been left open to cause differences amongst ourselves, because the maritime people naturally want our grain to go that way; we just as naturally do not want to pay any more by having it go that way, and to go that way would mean losing a little more money on every bushel we ship. I would like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to show cause why the government cannot settle this question with the British government. We have had the cattle quota question up recently, and that question should never have arisen, but it did arise and an agreement was come to about it and a quota decided upon. Why cannot this government sit in with the British people and decide whether or not our wheat can go via Buffalo direct to the United Kingdom without any handicap? It is their duty to do it.

Mr. STEVENS: That was settled long ago.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not settled.

Mr. STEVENS: It certainly is.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is settled on the basis of every cargo on its merits.

Mr. STEVENS: It has been settled, and it has been explained a dozen times. Any cargo that has a through bill of lading, which is a perfectly proper and ordinary thing, is declared by the British authorities to be duty free.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That may be so, but my understanding from the press, and my hon. friend should know better than I because all I had to go on was the press reports, is that every cargo is settled on its merits or demerits. Some go straight to the United Kingdom and get the exemption from paying duty, and some do not. If the question is really settled I would like to know it because there would be no use in talking about it any more. If the minister would say that we cannot ship to the United Kingdom via Buffalo, that would end the matter. But we would then know where the responsibility lies. It would not be with the British government alone but with ours also; do not make any mistake about that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: After having listened to all this discussion, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say that the government cannot accept the amendment of my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown). We are compiling in this statute all our existing laws concerning shipping, and we are simply asking the house to reaffirm in these sections what was adopted by the house at the last session, after careful study; this legislation was submitted by the government after strong representations had been made from all sides. We heard the Canadian mariners and the Canadian ship owners, who represented to us that when foreign ships were carrying grain or other goods on the great lakes from one Canadian port to another Canadian port our Canadian bottoms were tied up by hundreds along the shores of the great lakes and our Canadian mariners were standing idle on those shores looking at foreign ships and foreign mariners carrying and handling our Canadian grain in foreign bottoms. All these questions were studied very carefully, and the house came to the conclusion at the last session that this coasting law should be adopted in order to put our Canadian mariners and our Canadian bottom owners on the same footing as the Americans.

This very question whether this law would bring an increase in transportation rates on the great lakes and thereby injure our western farmers was very carefully studied, and it was only after we had ascertained that we had a great surplus of Canadian bottoms on the great lakes, and that we were sure that there would be enough competition to protect the farmers of the west, that we came to the conclusion that we should introduce the legislation of last session. I do not see why Canadian bottoms could not carry Canadian grain at the same rate as foreign bottoms, if not at a lower rate. If we had thought for a moment that this legislation would have for its effect an injury to our farmers we would never have brought it down. There is no question about that. But after very carefully studying the question we have come to the conclusion that we should embody in this bill the legislation which was very properly enacted at the last session.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That does not exempt the question from discussion.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course not.

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to on division.

Sections 664 to 704 inclusive agreed to.

On section 705—Power to exempt foreign ships from certain provisions.

Mr. REID: Would it be possible for ships, say from Japan, operating on the Pacific coast, to receive exemptions under this section?

Mr. BENNETT: Exemptions from what?

Mr. REID: The section reads:

Where the governor in council is satisfied that ships of a foreign country—

And so on, and:

—the governor in council may direct that any such provisions of this act, as aforesaid, shall not apply—

Mr. DURANLEAU: If a country has reciprocal legislation, their ships may receive exemption.

Mr. REID: If they exempt Canadian ships, they may be exempted?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 706 and 707 agreed to.

On section 708—Jurisdiction of courts over foreigners belonging to foreign ships restricted.

Mr. REID: This section states that no judge, magistrate or justice of the peace shall entertain or act upon any complaint or information by or against any person belonging to or connected with any foreign merchant ship. Would that mean that a sailor on a United states ship which happened to be in the port of Vancouver could not have a case heard for wages or injury?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in our country; that is an American ship.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They must give notice to the consul.

Mr. STEVENS: That is what the consul is for.

Section agreed to.

Sections 709 to 719 inclusive agreed to.

On the schedules.

Mr. BENNETT: These schedules represent conventions, international and national, which have been agreed to and ratified by parliament.

Mr. DURANLEAU: An amendment is necessary in connection with page 454. I will ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to move that the words, "Ottawa: Printed by Frederick Albert Acland, law printer to the King's Most Excellent Majesty" at the bottom of the page be struck out.

Mr. STEVENS: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedules as amended agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 15, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE—APPOINTMENT OF FRANCHISE COMMISSIONER—PRINTING OF VOTERS' LISTS

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 101, an act respecting the franchise of electors at elections of members of the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM FOR MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I hold in my hand the Montreal Gazette of Thursday, June 13, 1934. On the first page I find this news:

Ottawa relief plan calls for 6 million here. New post office and custom house in program.

And there follows a report of an interview given by Mayor Camillien Houde to the Montreal trades and labour council and the building trades council in which the mayor is reported as follows:

I understand that most of the items you name are already on the federal program—not the C.N.R. however. In all I think between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000 will be spent here.

I would like to ask the government if the mayor of Montreal had authorization from the government to make such a statement.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think, Mr. Speaker, it is quite apparent from his statement that he had no such authority.

SOCKEYE SALMON TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as to whether representations have been made to the United States in regard to the treaty passed here in 1930 relating to salmon. My reason for asking that question is that nothing has been done by United States interests, and there are interests in this country that are in doubt as to what further progress can be made by Canada.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think I intimated to the house already this session that the matter has been the subject of discussion between the state department and the Canadian minister at Washington. It was hoped at one time that some action would be taken by the United States Senate to ratify the treaty, but no action has been taken up to the present.

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): A day or two ago the Prime Minister mentioned that he was holding back the program of construction of public works until the pending provincial elections are over. Might I ask him if he will arrange to see that the program is presented to the house before the results of the elections are known?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Barring accidents I shall ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) to present it on Tuesday.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENTS SUGGESTED BY LABOUR REPRESENTATIVES IN VIEW OF JOINT OPERATING SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I would like to ask another question of the government. I was informed some time ago that the representatives of the employees of various railways in this country have approached the government presenting a brief and memorandum suggesting certain amendments to the Railway Act, in view of the operations as now being carried on under cooperative conditions. I would like to know if it is the intention of the government to bring in amendments to the Railway Act in accordance with the wishes and representations so made, before the end of the session.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman is aware, I think, that at the meeting with the representatives of the railway employees it was intimated that it was not probable that we would open the Railway Act this session. The Minister of Railways is not here at present, I think further representations were made to him recently, and I am not in a position to indicate what conclusion he may have arrived at. If it is necessary to open the Railway Act at all, the matters mentioned by the hon. gentleman would be dealt with. I regret that in the absence of the minister I cannot say definitely whether that will take place.

TARIFF BOARD

DECISION OF SUPREME COURT AS TO RIGHT TO MAKE RULINGS ON POINTS OF LAW AND FIXING OF VALUES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews). Has any decision been handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the tariff board jurisdiction?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): In reply to my hon. friend's question I may say that we received notice this forenoon that judgment has been given on the question submitted. I have not yet received copies of the judgment, but I have before me a memorandum showing the answers returned by the supreme court to the questions submitted. They are as follows:

1. Has the tariff board as constituted under chapter 7 of the statutes of 1932-33 authority to determine questions of law as distinct from questions of fact?

No.

2. Has the tariff board authority under said act to determine that the orders of the Minister of National Revenue aforesaid, fixing the values for duty of such goods, under the authority of section 43 of the Customs Act as enacted by chapter 2 of the statutes of 1930 (second session), prior to the enactment of chapter 7 of the statutes of 1932-33, were annulled and ceased to be effective from the date of the last mentioned enactment in respect of goods entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff?

No.

3. When the tariff board acts under the provisions of part II of the said act, are its decisions as to the value of goods for duty purposes subject to the approval of the Minister of National Revenue?

Yes.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the answers just read by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to the questions submitted to the supreme court might I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if it is the intention of the government at this session to bring in legislation which will help to ensure that the representations made at the time the Ottawa agreements were passed will be given due effect. As I read the answers, they would appear to run counter to what at the time was stated to be the intention of the government with respect to at least one of the purposes of the tariff board.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, they are not. The decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada are wholly in accordance with the representations and statements made at the time the Ottawa agreements were concluded.

I am glad to avail myself of this opportunity to clear up misrepresentations—I trust they were not deliberate—with respect to the meaning of the Tariff Board Act. When the statute was before this house I stated and restated that this was to be a fact finding body. No member of this house has any doubt about that; if he has he can consult Hansard. The supreme court has decided that the board had no power to determine questions of law, but only questions of fact. I have never been able to understand just why any other view was entertained. The second question was, "Has the tariff board authority under the said act to determine that the orders of the minister made under the old statute were not binding" and the court held that the statute we passed rescinding section 43 in its operations, as promised, did not operate with respect to orders made before that statute was passed. That is all. I resent even the suggestion that every promise made has not been implemented to the full with respect to those agreements. The promise was that at the earliest possible date consistent with financial conditions we would rescind the power conferred upon the minister to fix the value for duty purposes of goods coming from Great Britain. In 1932-33, by chapter 7 of the statutes of that year, we did pass an act that had the effect of making it no longer possible for the Minister of National Revenue, under section 43, to fix the value for duty purposes on goods imported from Great Britain. There is no power now in the minister to fix the value under section 43 of goods imported from Great Britain; the statute rescinding and destroying that power as it formerly existed was enacted by this house and the Senate and given the royal assent. But there were outstanding two or three orders fixing values, and the tariff board decided that those orders were invalid although they had been passed prior to the date of the amending statute that removed from the minister the power to fix values. The supreme court has decided that those orders were not thus made invalid. That is that.

It is a little difficult to understand why there was any doubt as to the next question. It was merely that the statute provided under part 2, which substitutes the tariff board for the old customs board so that they may not sit in judgment upon themselves, that the same power that was possessed by the customs board should be retained, and that power is still retained by reason of the answer given to the third question. In other words, unless the statute is repealed or amended by parliament it does not by implication, through the creation of a new board instead of the customs board, result in the amendment or repeal of that section of the statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister if the impression to which he refers was not held pretty generally in England? If I am not mistaken the impression in Great Britain was due largely to remarks made by Lord Hailsham with respect to his understanding of the functions of the tariff board in protecting British exporters and the rights secured to them under the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no right to enter into a debate on this matter, Mr. Speaker, but I have seen no statement made by Lord Hailsham that is at variance with what was decided by the supreme court. I do not think for a single moment that he had any idea that there was any doubt as to the fact that this was a fact finding body and not a court of law to decide questions of law, that the customs board had really divested itself of its jurisdiction by statute, and the jurisdiction that it formerly had was thereby vested in the tariff board. I am not unmindful of the fact that many misrepresentations have arisen in England with respect to the tariff board and other matters, but I am also aware of the source from which such misinformation was disseminated.

Mr. JACOBS: May I ask if the decision of the supreme court was unanimous?

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot answer that question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I understand that it was unanimous.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course we cannot discuss this matter now, and it is not my purpose to defend the views of the distinguished chairman of the tariff board, who no doubt will avail himself of the lecture he received to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not lectured him. I resent that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend has plainly stated that he cannot understand why there has been any doubt held by anyone as to this interpretation. The chairman of the tariff board held a different view of the matter from that entertained by my right hon. friend.

WATERWAYS TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I find in the United States press reports to the effect that negotiations are being opened between the United States and Canada for a new treaty concerning international waterways. I should like to know whether there is any accuracy in these reports.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have not received any information that would induce me to believe that negotiations for a new treaty were in progress. That is all I can say at the moment. I will make inquiries, but I have not been so informed.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 97, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Stamp tax on postal notes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Minister of Finance if the bill is based in its entirety on the resolutions which were very fully discussed when the house was in committee?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. RHODES: This bill deals only with the resolutions which have been passed, arising out of the budget, with the exception of one or two changes which deal entirely with administrative matters. There is no change in substance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there are any new features would the minister direct our attention to them, and in that way possibly save some time.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask the Minister of Finance for an answer to the question I raised about affixing stamps to money orders. Is it necessary to affix the stamp or to have the stamp printed on the corner.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, upon inquiry I have found that this wording is precisely the same as has obtained hitherto. The word "affixing" does not mean that there must be an actual physical addition of a stamp upon a document, but that the printing or embossing covers the word "affixing."

Mr. VENIOT: If it were embossed I would not object, but it is not embossed. However, my reason for asking the question was that I wanted to clear up the matter as to the question of revenue between the Post Office Department and the Department of National Revenue, so that we would be able to distinguish the amount of work done by the Post Office Department entitling it to that revenue. I say now that they are doing no work, and that the revenue should be credited directly to the Department of National Revenue. The printing on the corner of post office orders, money orders or postal notes is not done by the Post Office Department. It is paid for outside the department, and therefore that department does nothing to earn that amount of money. It should be credited to the proper department.

Mr. RHODES: I take no exception to what the hon. member for Gloucester has said. In fact, he might go a little farther and deal also with the question of the use of postage stamps, instead of excise stamps, which run into a very considerable volume of money, and he would portray a picture which is not accurate with respect to the revenue of the Post Office Department. However that is a larger question which will have to be dealt with later.

Mr. VENIOT: It is a false picture.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Excise tax on unstamped packages of cigarette paper or cigarette paper tubes.

Mr. RHODES: Section 3 is new, but it is purely administrative, and provides for the affixing of stamps in the event of dealers having goods in hand.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—Drawback.

Mr. RHODES: This is a new section, but dealing with a purely administrative matter. It is to broaden the payment of drawback on goods exported, and to assist Canadian manufacturers in competition on the world's market. The reason for not exempting fuel is that this is used in the plants to supply heat and power, and it is almost impossible to allocate the division of fuel, first, as between heat and power and, secondly, as between domestic and exported goods. It is thought that to make a provision for drawback in respect to excise tax would meet with considerable controversy as to the correct proportion, and it would be difficult if not impossible to administer. This is a broadening of the item.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Additional penalties.

Mr. RHODES: This is new. The only change in this instance is to make it clear that a penalty may be applied to a taxpayer in addition to the interest on outstanding arrears. It has been a question in some quarters whether when such interest is called a penalty a taxpayer who is delinquent in payment may be required to pay any other penalty for default than the interest, and the present section is designed to clarify the point.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Officer may make inquiry.

Mr. RHODES: This is also administrative. At the present time there is no authority provided in the act for the examination of certain businesses. In order to ensure that the taxes imposed by the act were being properly paid, while there has been no opposition made as to the inquiry upon the part of the department, it is thought wise to have a legislative provision so as to prevent any difficulty arising in the future.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Penalty for collecting excess sums.

Mr. RHODES: This is new, also. In a word, the provision contained in the section is that if any person collects a sum larger than that which he remits to the crown, the additional portion collected must go to the crown.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Time limited for prosecutions.

Mr. RHODES: This is a new section. It is designed to permit the department to take action against defaulters or those who have falsified records in connection with taxes, under this act, within three years after the offence was committed. Without some similar proviso section 1142 of the criminal code precludes action in a case where the last falsification or fraudulent entry was made more than six months before it was discovered. As the departmental auditors do not audit the records of taxpayers as frequently as that nor is it possible for them to do so, the department is debarred from taking criminal action against defaulters, owing to the section of the criminal code referred to, a section which definitely limits such action to within six months from the time that the matter about which complaint has been made arose.

Mr. VENIOT: I think three years is too long. Why not make it two?

Mr. RHODES: I would take no exception to limiting the period to two years, except that I may point out that there is a similar provision in the Customs Act which names a period of three years, and there is always the overriding consideration that there can be no injustice done to the honest person.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Definitions.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to section 122, coming under part XV. I received a wire this morning stating that there had been certain increases in the mint charges in regard to placer gold. Could the minister tell me what those charges are, or how they have been increased.

Mr. RHODES: There has been a service charge imposed, applicable only to gold other than that with respect to which the premium tax of 25 per cent obtains. The cost of handling of small parcels of gold is much greater per ounce than the cost of handling gold in large quantities at the mint. It is therefore provided that a service charge of one dollar per ounce shall obtain in the shipments of gold of fifteen ounces or less, but where the shipments are fifty ounces or more the service charge is 25 cents.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Might I ask further if the change in the imposition of this charge is as a result of the tax that was levied on gold, or was it imposed before?

Mr. RHODES: No, Mr. Chairman. There has been a service charge since March 19. It does not arise of necessity out of or have any relation to the tax on gold as introduced in the budget, but it is felt to be a fair service charge having regard to the disproportion as between the revenue derived from the shipments of gold which are not subject to the gold tax so called.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I know I am not exactly in order, Mr. Chairman, but there is one other question I wanted cleared up. Last year we had a good deal of congestion and delay in getting returns for our gold when it was shipped to the assay office at Vancouver. It has been alleged that there were certain reductions made in the staff of that office about the time of the peak of the production, and I should like to know from the minister if there is anything in that charge.

Mr. RHODES: The difficulty does not arise, nor has it arisen, because of any action or lack of action on the part of the department in Canada, but delay very frequently arises through our having to await the assay returns when the gold is sold in the United States. In this connection may I also point out that the service charge of which I spoke a moment ago covers not only the cost of handling so far as the royal mint in Ottawa is concerned but the costs to which we are put on account of shipment charges, insurance, and an assay charge in the United States where the gold must again be assayed before payment is finally made.

Section agreed to.

Sections 17 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 98, to amend the customs tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

On section 1—"Proof."

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, following the inquiry put to me by the right hon. leader of the opposition, I beg to inform the committee that there is nothing contained in this bill which is not based upon or arises out of the resolutions which have already been passed in ways and means.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 99, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Income.

Mr. LUCAS: Some time ago a statement was made before the committee that a certain gentleman was receiving $5,000 per week upon which he was not paying any income tax. I would be glad if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) could give us an explanation as to how he evaded the tax and if any amendments are being made to the act to deal with that situation.

Hon. E. N. RHODES Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) will appreciate the delicacy of the question he submits in so far as it pertains to an individual. I may say to him that assuming there were sums received by an individual by way of instalments on a surplus in a company and which were really in effect an income, I believe the amendments which we have in the present bill will be ample to safeguard the treasury and give assurance that there will be no possibility of evading the proper payment of income tax by calling the payments something other than income. I will indicate that section when we come to it.

Mr. LUCAS: I thank the hon. minister for his statement because I think this instance has created a great deal of ill feeling throughout the country.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Surplus distribution taxable.

Mr. RHODES: I ask the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) to look at this section. I may say to the committee that this section has been devised with very great care and in the light of the experience of years in the department. I have the hope, based upon the assurance which they have given me and the interpretation which has been placed upon this section by the Department of Justice, that its provisions will be ample to cover the case he indicated.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the provisions be retroactive?

Mr. RHODES: No, they will not be retroactive. My hon. friend and the committee will recall full well some of the observations which have been made with respect to the retroactive features not only of this act but other taxing legislation. Apart from the injustice per se of retroactive legislation of this character, it involves the opening up of transactions which have been closed and concluded by the department and it creates difficulties of an administrative character which are almost insuperable. For these reasons it was thought that it would not be wise to ask for a retroactive feature in this section.

Mr. HANBURY: I understand that all legislation in connection with income tax is retroactive to a certain extent. Legislation passed in one year is effective on the previous year's business or income and I assume that this section will be retroactive to that extent and apply to the income either for 1933 or for the expired portions of 1934.

Mr. RHODES: The retroactive feature of which my hon. friend speaks has always been inherent to our income tax legislation since the date of its inception in 1917, and it would be a matter of great difficulty to avoid that feature. That phase of retroactiveness is not disturbed, altered or interfered with in any way by the amendment in question. When I spoke of it not being retroactive, I spoke in the sense that a transaction once having been closed and the tax paid we could not go back and bring it up again. That is an entirely different matter.

Mr. JACOBS: The minister has assured us that this section 10 which we now have under review has been drafted with a great deal of care. Are we to assume that the other sections have not received the same grave attention from the draughtsmen?

Mr. RHODES: I would not want that interpretation to be taken from my having laid emphasis upon the fact that this section had been drafted with great care. I made that statement in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) who made a particular point and perhaps I laid emphasis upon it by reason of the fact that this is a rather novel phase of income tax legislation. So far as I am aware, all the sections of this bill have been drafted with equal care but at the moment I happened to be dealing with this one particular section.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like to have one point perfectly clear in my mind in connection with the time to which this particular section will apply. I am assuming that it will apply to the period of taxation since the filing of the last return by the person who might be involved in this particular transaction.

Mr. RHODES: My statement to the committee a short time ago was made after conference with the commissioner of income tax and I believe it is technically correct as it stands. But I did not refer to the variation in the degree of truth as exemplified by David Harum who said there were two kinds of truth, jury truth and gospel truth.

Mr. HANBURY: Which type is the minister's?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that this, not having hitherto been regarded as income under the terms of the act, will not be treated as income for the last year upon which income tax will be levied this year. In that sense it does not have a retroactive feature, it will only become operative from the time of its enactment. I hope I have made myself clear.

Mr. HANBURY: My particular point is this. This legislation is effective now?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. HANBURY: Assuming that the parties responsible under this particular section file their income tax returns as from the first of January, 1934, will it affect the particular income covered by this clause, from the first of January, 1934, until this date?

Mr. RHODES: No, for the reason that this was not income. It has only been made income in virtue of section 10 which we are now passing.

Mr. HANBURY: That was the point that appealed to me, and that is why I wanted to have it cleared up, because the minister did say that it would be retroactive to some extent and I did not think it would be.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I was interested to hear the minister say that this section would cover such instances as were outlined by the hon. member for Camrose. I would endorse the thought too that this should be made retroactive further back than the first of January. I remember that what I believe was called the business profits war tax act was passed a year or possibly two years after it was made operative. I recall that the business men in my own town had considerable difficulty making up the tax levied on them—as I say, I am not sure whether it was one or two years after the money had been earned and spent. However, they were required by federal legislation to make up the tax to the federal treasury. It seems to me that if the act could be made retroactive in that case, to collect taxes from honest business men, it is only fair that the minister should devise ways and means of collecting the tax from such individuals as have evaded it. The instance has been cited of a person collecting more in one week, and paying nothing to the federal treasury, than many people collect in the entire year, and yet they have to pay income tax.

Mr. RHODES: I take no exception to the desires expressed by my hon. friend from Kindersley but I must point out to him that in the year 1930 this house passed an amendment to the Income Tax Act which not only made it possible but actually extended an invitation to people to evade the income tax, which they did to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars. We are now taking a further step towards trying to repair the damage done at that time. If it were possible to pass an act which would meet an individual case such as my hon. friend no doubt has in mind, well and good; in that event we should be absolutely justified in applying the retroactive feature, in equity although not in strict legal right. Unfortunately however you have to devise a law of general application; it cannot be restricted to individuals; and when you devise a law of general application you run into numerous cases where moneys have been disbursed in conformity with the law and the tax paid to the extent the law called for. These transactions have been closed, the estates wound up, people are dead or have moved away and property is dispersed; so that it would be a physical impossibility to apply a law of that character; otherwise I would endeavour if it were at all possible to do so to devise an amendment which would meet the case my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. HEAPS: May I remind the minister of the matter I raised a few weeks ago regarding the exemption of those who contribute towards unemployment relief funds. I suggested that amounts so contributed should be exempted from the income tax, the same as contributions for charitable purposes. The minister said he would consider the suggestion sympathetically and look into the matter to see whether such exemptions could be made under the present regulations. May I ask him what steps he has taken in the matter.

Mr. RHODES: As a result of the representations made by my hon. friend I went into the matter with care with the commissioner of income tax. I looked over the regulations and found that, although my sympathy went out to him, in view of the object he had in mind, the fact was that if we attempted to devise regulations which would permit the avoidance of taxation to meet the case in point, assuming for the sake of discussion that it was an eminently worthy one, we should open the door to numerous cases of violation which might come technically within the wording that we might provide but which would be in effect an invitation to an evasion of the tax. Much therefore as I regret having to do so, I must inform my hon. friend that it is not possible by way of regulation to meet that specific case.

Mr. HEAPS: We are assuming now that too many people are dishonest in making out their income tax statements. But there is another point that suggests itself here. These very people to whom I have been referring give a fairly large proportion of their wages to help their fellow members when unemployed, so as to keep them off public relief. This is a voluntary obligation they undertake, and the chances are that another year they will refuse to assume this obligation to maintain members of organizations on relief, with the result that such persons as are helped by these voluntary contributions will hereafter become recipients of public relief. That is another way of looking at the matter. The government has been saving a fairly large sum of money through the amounts contributed voluntarily in this way, and the answer which the minister gives is rather disappointing, because I am afraid it may have the effect I suggest. I believe that had the minister given to this suggestion the same careful consideration that he gave to other classes, he could have found ways and means of exempting these people from taxation.

Mr. RHODES: I can assure my hon. friend that I gave just as much consideration, if not more, to the case he has submitted, for the reason that it is one that naturally arouses one's sympathy, which is not so as regards the incident mentioned by my hon. friends from Camrose and Kindersley. I venture to say however that if the hon. gentleman were in my place, charged with the responsibility that attaches to a ministerial office, he would have come to precisely the same decision as I was compelled to come to for the reasons I have indicated. The statement I originally made holds with respect to this case, but I may point out to my hon. friend that he weakened rather than strengthened his case when in his second remarks he referred to the fact that this was a passing phase that would obtain only for a year or two. It would be very bad legislation to attempt to put something permanent into the form of a statute which was admittedly designed to cover an ephemeral case.

Mr. MUNN: I have a question to ask the minister, and while it may not be under this section it has reference to taxation. A year ago an amendment was passed for the purpose of collecting a tax on bearer bonds. There was a regulation to identify the bond, but I have reason to believe that some of these bonds were handed in by different people. For instance, John Brown —I am not referring to our hon. friend here— might take in bonds that belong to some other person. I am told that has been done. I would suggest that while this bill is being dealt with perhaps that point could be covered, have it arranged that not only the bearer of the bond be identified but the absolute owner be identified at the bank.

Mr. RHODES: The case indicated by my hon. friend is clearly one of fraud. The statute must of necessity assume that the law will be properly observed. The case he mentions is one for the criminal court. May I point out that until the department becomes thoroughly experienced in dealing with these certificates some little delay is bound to occur, and possibly a slip here and there. When I say that at the moment there are in the department over two million of these certificates, it will be apparent that the mere physical act of sorting and allocating and computing them involves a tremendous amount of clerical work. I have no doubt there will be instances of the law being evaded, yet slowly but surely the strings will tighten, and the individual who thinks to-day that he escapes will find out one or two or perhaps three years hence that his escape was imaginary and not real; ultimately he will be called upon to pay the full amount of the tax that the law calls for.

Mr. MUNN: I have been told by tax auditors that they knew of cases of evasion. It seems to me there might be some tightening up by the Finance department. While I am on my feet I would ask if the minister can give the committee figures or an estimate of what amount of money that little amendment meant to the exchequer of Canada.

Mr. RHODES: The five per cent tax as a whole brought in somewhere in the neighbourhood of $4,800,000 last year. I have no doubt that that sum will be increased proportionately as the years go by, because there are always difficulties in administering a new act which covers so much ground and involves so much accounting and has so many ramifications. But even that sum is an indication of the merits of the proposals put through a year ago. I may point out that you cannot make a perfect act, you will always find men who are criminally inclined and who can evade almost any law in part. I think for instance of the tax on cheques. At one time cheques below $5 were exempt. One individual of some substance, and who is regarded as a good citizen, when he had a $15 account to pay was at pains to issue three $5 cheques. You will have those cases and it is difficult to legislate so as to avoid them. They do not indicate a weakness in the law, I would rather incline to the view that they indicate a weakness in human nature which we must always take into account.

Mr. MUNN: One more word. The minister mentioned that it involves a large amount of extra work but he will agree that it gives employment, and the government has been very well paid for it.

Mr. RHODES: Oh, yes.

Mr. NEILL: Would it not save a lot of that trouble if in future no bearer bonds were issued? Is there any particular reason why there should be bearer bonds? If there were not it would save an infinity of trouble.

Mr. RHODES: That suggestion is worthy of consideration, but it would tend to a frozen situation with respect to bonds which would make financial transactions very difficult, not being negotiable. I am afraid it would be almost impossible to comprehend a situation of that character.

Mr. NEILL: Registered bonds are negotiable now, you have only to sign a transfer.

Mr. RHODES: They are not negotiable in the sense of passing from hand to hand. They require the same formality as any other transaction, an entry both ways. I shall be glad to give consideration to the suggestion but I doubt very much if it would be feasible.

Mr. NEILL: A man does not pay his debts with a hundred dollar bond. Bonds are only sold through a bank. There would not be as much trouble in transferring them as there is in making out the certificate every time you get a coupon cashed and it would do away with all the chances of evasion.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Advances to nonresident corporation without compensation.

Mr. HANBURY: I notice that this and many of the succeeding sections refer to people and companies outside of Canada. I was wondering if the minister could make a general statement covering the situation and also advising whether the legislation is reciprocal with other countries.

Mr. RHODES: It is rather difficult to make a general statement. While these sections are general in effect, I may say that they have arisen because of some cases met with in actual experience, where attempts have been made to evade the law by a subsidiary company lending its money to the parent company without interest; also in connection with the five per cent tax, which was only applicable in cases where the payment was in Canadian funds. We soon found that in certain instances, in order to avoid paying that tax, companies made provision for their payments to be made in foreign funds. We are amending the act to meet that case as well.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Nonresidents deemed to be carrying on business.

Mr. HANBURY: I notice we are going to tax nonresident companies doing business in Canada. The question arises in my mind as to what method we are going to adopt to collect the tax. Assuming that the salesman for a United States company comes into Canada and does business, we now propose to charge them income tax. How we are to collect the tax is what concerns me at the moment.

Mr. RHODES: In practically every instance these companies have assets in Canada or have receivables in Canada or they wish to continue in business in Canada. So that in any one of the three cases, or a combination of them, there is a situation which enables the department to ensure that it will receive the tax in precisely the same way as it would in the case of a Canadian company.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. HANBURY: Does the government possess any particular information as to what companies are doing business in Canada? Would they get that through the present income tax offices, or would they have access say to the customs department for that information?

Mr. RHODES: The department has a very comprehensive tax roll which pretty well covers the ground. I have no doubt that from time to time an individual or perhaps a company may be found that is not on the list, but sooner or later they arrive there.

Mr. HANBURY: For example, assume that some companies in the United States are selling lumber in Canada, they may sell a greater or less quantity. Is it the intention of the government to watch the sales of such products coming into Canada and collect income tax on that basis?

Mr. RHODES: If they have agents or an agency or employees in Canada, then the department would apply the tax. I might point out to my hon. friend, who has had experience in these matters, that any business worthy of the name is bound to make its presence apparent, either through office telephones, the receipt of telegrams or in other ways. All these sources of information are available to the department and are combed and watched very carefully.

Mr. HANBURY: I wonder whether it is the purpose of the government, where a foreign company has agents in Canada, regardless of the volume of business that may be done by those agents, to have a return filed with the department as to the amount of business done by each agent.

Mr. RHODES: No, in practice what happens is this : The department gets in touch with the company and has the company, through one agent or through its own officers at the head office, file the necessary income tax form.

Mr. HANBURY: I am just a little cloudy as to this feature. Would that result in every foreign company doing business in Canada having to file a return with the income tax department?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, if they have an agency or place of business in Canada.

Mr. HANBURY: I would point out to the minister that practically every company doing business in Canada has an agency in some form. It may be a commission or a salaried agency, but they have agencies of some kind; otherwise it would be very unlikely that any business would result. Just for a moment I am going to ask the minister to visualize every company shipping goods to Canada filing a return with the Canadian government, and the effect that will have on the interchange of business between Canada and other countries. I assume that if this legislation is not reciprocal at the present time it will be only a very short time until that situation results. I feel that it will be only a very short time until all producers in Canada will be filing returns with the various governments all over the world with which they have to do business. To me that is an impossible situation. I believe my opinion of this particular section would be that the cost of procuring the information and of administering the act would be much greater than the income that would be received, but even if that were not the fact I think the interference with international business that this will bring about will create an impression that we in Canada cannot afford to create at the present time.

I do not like to refer to the policies of the government; I realize that they have difficulty in procuring funds, but I do believe the government should very seriously consider or reconsider any suggestion that is going to interfere in any way with the exchange of our goods with the other nations of the world. We have enough difficulties to-day. I am not anxious to see goods kept out of Canada; I am much more anxious to see goods go from Canada. I look for reciprocal regulations on the part of other nations when we expect their nationals to file returns with the Canadian government and to pay taxes in Canada as well as in their own country. I believe the minister would do very well to reconsider this legislation before he puts it on our statute books.

Mr. RHODES: It is practically a truism that any form of taxation interferes with business; we can start from that promise. It seems to me the only consideration, apart from the necessity of revenue and of fair application of the tax, is to be found in the answer to the query as to whether a tax in itself is fair.

I do not agree with my hon. friend that this form of taxation will interfere with business any more than any other form of taxation. May I point out in the first place that the general principle of this taxation is found in practically every country. Furthermore the occasion which led us, in the first instance, to apply the five per cent tax was that we found foreign countries benefiting through their treasury receiving a portion of the revenue which properly should come to this country. It does not cost the individual company or taxpayer any more to pay five per cent in Canada than it would to pay that amount in some other country. As a result of our taxation of last year we have diverted to the Canadian treasury sums of money which hitherto have gone by way of taxation into the treasuries of foreign countries.

So far as interfering with foreign business is concerned, may I point out to my hon. friend that subsection (3) of section 14 provides:

> The governor in council shall have power to exempt from the operation of this section the income in whole or in part of residents of any country which enters into reciprocal agreement with Canada to exempt the income of residents of Canada earned in such country.

The very wording of that subsection will indicate to my hon. friend and the committee that we had in mind the desire not only not to interfere with but to make it convenient to expedite business transactions as between people in this country and people in foreign countries.

Mr. VENIOT: This is a revenue tax?

Mr. HANBURY: I had particularly noted the reciprocal provision in subsection (3) just mentioned by the Minister of Finance. The only interpretation I can place upon this clause is that it is a further attempt on the part of this government to deepen the channel by which they are going to direct business to certain countries and away from other countries. There can be no other interpretation placed upon it. We will enter into reciprocal agreements with those countries with which we wish to do business, but those countries with which we do not wish to do business we will make subject to this income tax. Evidently no consideration whatever has been given to the fact that foreign companies doing business in Canada and selling their products to consumers in Canada, if they are to pay a tax to the Canadian government, must and will add that tax to what the Canadian consumer must pay. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance also if he can tell this house of any precedent for this legislation.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, the fears of my hon. friend are entirely unfounded. He will be surprised to know that this proposal did not emanate from the government at all; it emanated from the commissioner of income tax. Because of his experience, and because of his advice, which was accepted, the government, of course, is only too happy to sponsor this proposal. It has no reference to trade at all; it is purely a question of taxation, and it recognizes a principle which we have recognized hitherto in our own statutes. With all due deference to my hon. friend I must say that I do not understand his apprehension either with respect to the question of trade or that of policy. Certainly when I first discussed this matter with the officials of the department that view was not present in my mind, but the action was taken solely with a view to making our taxation proposals uniform and fair and to bring into the treasury every dollar which could properly be brought in. It was done for those reasons, and those reasons alone.

Mr. HANBURY: I directed a question to the Minister of Finance which I believe he has answered in the negative. I asked him as to whether or not there was in any other country any precedent for this legislation?

Mr. RHODES: The commissioner of income tax informs me that this principle is found in the taxation of practically every country, and so far as it obtains with respect to the principle of double taxation it has been recognized through the fiscal committee of the League of Nations, and has been the subject of action by them.

Mr. HANBURY: I am glad to have the assurance from the Minister of Finance that the commissioner of income tax is the culprit in this particular case because I consider that this is culpable legislation. Under the circumstances I should be pleased if the minister would allow the section to stand.

Mr. RHODES: I have no objection to allowing it to stand, but I may say that the government will insist upon its passage. When I mentioned the commissioner of income tax I did not refer to him with the intention of evading any responsibility but merely for the purpose of disillusioning my hon. friend from the hallucination under which he seemed to be labouring, namely, that there was some dire purpose in this legislation. Otherwise I should not have mentioned the name of the commissioner of income tax. I assume full responsibility—and so does the government—and unless my hon. friend has some special purpose in asking that the section stand I would ask him not to insist. Of course, if he has reasons I will accede to his request without any hesitancy.

Mr. HANBURY: As I have not been disillusioned I should prefer to have the section stand.

Section stands.

On section 16—Transfers to minors.

Mr. BOURASSA: May I ask the minister if the same principle he laid down with regard to the section dealing with what I may call disguised revenue will apply? In other words, shall this be made retroactive in the sense that the revenues derived heretofore on values transferred in the past will fall under this section?

Mr. RHODES: Of course my hon. friend is aware of the purpose of the section.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: It is to prevent evasion, but it will not be retroactive. It will apply only to those instances which happen after the passage of this legislation, in precisely the same manner as was the case in connection with section 10.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is, to transfers made after this is passed?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

The house resumed from Friday, February 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 6, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act—Mr. Duranleau—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose on February 23, we were discussing the question as to whether or not power should be given to constables or fishery inspectors or customs officers not only to seize wrongly or incorrectly labelled canned fish, but also to confiscate them with a right of appeal to the minister in favour of the party aggrieved. Strong objections were made against the provision giving a power of confiscation to the officers and in the light of the discussion a new clause has been drafted to cover the points at issue. I believe the amendment is satisfactory to those hon. members who objected. I shall ask one of my colleagues to move it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Move it yourself.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The section as amended would read as follows:

27. Any can of fish or shell fish that bears any false or misleading mark or that is incorrectly labelled or marked and not labelled or marked in accordance with this act, or with the regulations made thereunder, may be seized by an inspector or by any customs, excise or police officer, or by any constable, and shall be confiscated to His Majesty by any two justices of the peace, or by any magistrate having the power of two justices of the peace, if it is found that the label or marking is intended or calculated to deceive.

In other words, we are taking away from the officers the right or power to confiscate, and giving it to two justices of the peace or a magistrate having the powers of two justices of the peace. I move that section 1 in the bill be amended by deleting section 27 appearing therein, and substituting therefor the words I have indicated.

Mr. NEILL: I think the purpose of the amendment is quite right but I would point out that the minister has left out the first three lines of the section. If you are going to delete the whole section, and not merely amend it, you will have to put in the first three lines beginning with "Section twenty-seven," or if you are just going to amend it, the amendment will begin with "27."

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, starting from the number "27."

Mr. BOUCHARD: Would the minister inform the committee how many prosecutions have been taken in the past under this law. Were there many causes of complaint?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think there were some prosecutions, but the law as it now exists is not stringent enough. As my hon. friend knows, there are many kinds of salmon fish. There are, for instance, six species of salmon: sockeyes, red, pink and white springs; cohoes; steelhead; pink, and chum, and some of these species are worth two or three times as much as others, as my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni is well aware. Hence the temptation to label inferior quality goods wrongly. We think that this legislation is absolutely necessary. Up to date we have been able to control canned fish retailed on the market in Canada, but we could not do anything with regard to exported goods, and by this legislation we are seeking to prevent the export of falsely labelled canned fish. I think that is in the best interests of our market abroad.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Are there any special police officers to enforce this legislation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, our fishery officers.

Mr. VENIOT: The latter part of this amendment reads:

—confiscated to His Majesty by any two justices of the peace or by any magistrate having the powers of two justices of the peace if it is found that the label or marking is intended or calculated to deceive.

How are you going to prove the intention? I have no objection to the words "calculated to deceive."

Mr. GUTHRIE: That expression occurs in many sections of our criminal code. The justices will have to be convinced there is the intent and that the label is capable of deception.

Mr. DURANLEAU: And the intent is derived from the facts, and it is for the justices to decide.

Mr. VENIOT: I observe by the explanatory note that you can prevent the retail selling of canned lobsters, for instance, but what about wholesale selling under this bill? If a case of canned lobsters is sold wrongly labelled will that be considered wholesale or retail?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This enactment will cover both.

Mr. VENIOT: Not according to the explanatory note.

Mr. DURANLEAU: At the present time the law provides protection against the retail selling of falsely labelled canned goods, and this enactment is to prevent also the wholesale selling and the export of falsely labelled canned goods.

Mr. VENIOT: It will prevent both?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 95, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

On section 1—Part IV added.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I might offer a word in explanation of this bill, Mr. Chairman. To sum it up, it is to permit constables of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to make provision for their widows and children solely out of contributions made by them. This will be part 4 of the Mounted Police Act. Part 3 provides that a constable after a certain service shall receive a pension for himself. Part 2 provides that officers shall receive pensions and that on their death their widows and children shall receive one-half the amount that the officers would have been entitled to. But we have no provision whatever in our law with respect to the widows and children of constables, and the proposal is that constables be permitted to create a fund under the control of the government, and that out of that fund pensions be paid to the widows and children in accordance with the table set out in this bill.

The whole amount is contributed by the men themselves. These tables have been prepared by actuaries in the Department of Insurance, and by the officials of the treasury, and the proposal has been reported as actuarially sound and as being able to carry itself. But there is an express provision in the bill that no moneys shall be paid out of the public funds of Canada in respect of this measure. The fund must carry itself.

Mr. REID: While my question does not come under this bill probably, it comes under the minister's department. I would ask if it is the policy of the department to pay special officers as well as to allow them to receive moieties of fines? Where an officer is told by his commanding officer to look after the Excise Act, does he receive pay as well as part of the moities?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The officers do not receive the moieties, they go into a trust fund.

Mr. REID: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a practice which has occurred, I understand more than once in British Columbia. This particular case happened in May. Two officers of the force first sold a man some liquor and then laid an information against him. They were severely reprimanded by the magistrate who called it conspiracy of a most diabolical nature. That may be rather strong language but I think such a practice should be discontinued. We have cases where under cover men are sent out to endeavour to purchase drinks but in this case the officers deliberately tried to sell liquor to a man and laid an information. This incident occurred at Richmond in May of this year, and I think such practices should be stopped.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: The members of the police would receive no part of that fine if an award was made, that would go into the trust fund. I will report the remarks of my hon. friend to the commissioner for his consideration.

Section 77 agreed to.

On section 78—Minimum contribution.

Mr. VENIOT: Do the patrol boats come under the Department of Justice or the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The patrol boats in the preventive service come under the mounted police.

Mr. VENIOT: This may be a little out of order but I ask the committee to excuse me while I draw the attention of the minister to something which I think should be remedied immediately. On the eleventh of this month a foreign vessel came into the harbour of Shippigan and called for a pilot. There are two licensed pilots at that port, one of which has a boat and the other has not. The pilot owning a boat made for the steamer to pilot her to the wharf but the patrol boat Vigil came in and took the other pilot who had no boat out to this steamer. I do not think our patrol boats should be used for this purpose. I am giving the name of the boat so the minister can look into the matter and prevent this occurring in the future. It is not fair that boats in the government service should be used for the accommodation of pilots or private individuals.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I shall have an inquiry made into the incident and when I receive a report I will submit it to my hon. friend.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Is there any provision whereby a man dismissed from the service will have his contribution confiscated?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a general provision in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act under which when a man is dismissed for misconduct or wrongdoing he loses what he has paid in. If he is relieved for sickness or anything of that kind he gets his money back.

Section agreed to.

Section 79 to 85 inclusive agreed to.

On section 86—Payments to and from consolidated fund.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a misprint in line 39 which should be corrected. The word

"may" should be added after the word "made." This clause would then read, "and investments so made may from time to time be sold."

Mr. REID: Is there any provision to take care of a man who may be taken into the force from a provincial force?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under the agreements with the provincial governments there is a provision to cover that.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is the time served with the provincial government counted towards the pension of a man absorbed into the new forces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is, but he would have to make an adjustment in cash.

Mr. LUCAS: I understand that the pensions received by constables or their dependents come entirely from contributions made by the constables themselves, the state not contributing anything. I should like to know why these constables are placed in a different position to the ordinary civil servants, in connection with whom the state makes a contribution?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know that I can answer that question. This scheme was worked out by the members of the force themselves as a self-supporting fund. I could not state why any distinction is made.

Mr. VENIOT: Does not this affect only the dependents?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This affects only the dependents.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member was talking about the constables.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the case of a civil servant, the dependent receives one-half.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 70, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

On section 1—Regulations by governor in council.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Chairman, while there has been considerable discussion on this bill and especially in connection with the second amendment, the first amendment has not yet been considered. It is for the committee to decide whether we shall continue with the second amendment first or take them in order.

Probably it is well to begin with section 1 in the regular order. This amendment makes provision for regulation by order in council to add to or take from those names that appear in schedule A, the number of diseases or symptoms of diseases, and to add to or take from the list of remedies—material it is called there—of various kinds found in the act, such as sera, remedies of a poisonous nature, and so forth. The object of the amendment is to give flexibility to the administration of the act. No doubt from time to time increase in scientific knowledge renders changes desirable, and this amendment empowers the minister to recommend changes in consequence of such developing knowledge.

Mr. CHEVRIER: When this bill was introduced the minister explained that the object was to bring the Food and Drugs Act into conformity with what is usually called the P.P.M. Act, that is to say, the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act. I have no quarrel with that purpose; indeed, the last time the committee sat I intimated that I agreed with that principle. But I made certain observations that I am now going to repeat, with all deference to the minister, for whom I have the kindliest feeling, and whom I must thank for the courtesy he has shown me in allowing me to discuss the matter with his very efficient officials. To my mind this is not the proper way to proceed at all. The Food and Drugs Act is a very important piece of legislation, and so is the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act. We have passed may important measures this session, but this act relates to national health, and I submit that we ought to give this whole matter all the consideration to which it is entitled; not that I wish to imply that the minister and his officials have not given it proper consideration, but in this committee it should receive greater attention than the procedure which we are about to adopt contemplates.

In order to bring this act into conformity with the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, I suggest that the latter act in its entirety should be revamped. It has not been touched for many years, and the procedure now proposed will not bring the Food and Drugs Act into conformity with the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, because in that act there do not appear any dispositions similar to those which it is sought in this amendment to introduce into the Food and Drugs Act.

National health is of course of very great importance, and I wish to discuss certain phases of this bill. In the first place, section 1 provides that subsection 1 of section 3 of the Food and Drugs Act shall be amended by:

adding to or removing from the list contained in schedule A hereto such abnormal physical states....

First of all, I would point out that there is no place where I or anyone else can go to determine what an abnormal physical state is; that is something that is purely in the estimation either of the minister or of his officials. There is no definition either in the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act or in the Food and Drugs Act of what constitutes an abnormal physical state. And further by:

—adding to or removing from schedule B hereto such material—

Now, "schedule B hereto" contains no "material;" it is only the nomenclature or description of the abnormal physical states. The hon. member for St. Boniface hands me a schedule from the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, and in that act there is no schedule B. The section reads:

Subsection 1 of section 3 of the Food and Drugs Act, chapter 76 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is amended by adding thereto the following paragraph immediately after paragraph (h) thereof.

The Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act is not chapter 76 of the revised statutes, and in the Food and Drugs Act there is no schedule wherein "material" is defined. In that respect therefore the section is badly drawn. In the second place, there is nothing that defines material. "Such material;" what material? What is material? That ought to be defined somewhere. It is "such material, as may be deemed by the minister to be necessary in the public interest."

I submit with all deference and kindliness that this is going much too far. It is indeed going much too far. I understand it is a matter of national health, and with the general principle of the bill I have no quarrel, but I think we are going much too far afield by giving power to the minister whereby at any time he may remove from or add to or otherwise deal with the schedule listing these abnormal physical states. Surely if an abnormal physical state develops in a certain locality it does not demand immediate medical intervention, it is not a state of war, it does not necessitate that the cabinet sit at once and deal with it, it does not require that the minister should at once add to or subtract from the list. This proposal means disruption of the whole pharmaceutical trade. People have been in the habit of dealing with certain medical products, and all at once that is to be stopped, with no provision here, although there may be something in a corner of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act to say upon what terms it may be done and what kind of notice will be given or to what interests and what rights will be safeguarded. Suppose the minister finds another abnormal physical state and lists it in this schedule and then prohibits the sale of certain medicines which may be sold to-day for all abnormal physical states not mentioned in the schedule. Then the whole thing is topsy-turvy. So I submit that so far as that is concerned the amendment goes much too far and that that section should not be concurred in.

Mr. MacLAREN: To which one does the hon. member refer?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I refer to section 1 of the amendment. If the minister wants to insist upon certain things to make this act conform with the other, surely he is going much too far in asking for that power. Not that I fear that he will not administer it in the public interest, but that it will be creating untold hardship for those who deal in these products. To put it clearly, if the schedule goes through as it is—and I hope it will not, because I shall submit certain amendments, and the minister should decide that cancer—to take an extreme case—should come out of the schedule, immediately that would disturb the trade. Suppose the minister should say that grippe should be included in that schedule, there is no notice given to anybody, then all those who have prepared specifics for that ailment immediately fall under the law. The minister, I think quite properly, has given notice that this bill shall not come into force until January 1 of next year. In all kindliness let me say that there is no great rush to put this measure through; why not let it stand until the next session of parliament, and in the meantime notify those interests which may be affected to make representations if they desire? If the minister does that I believe he will get much better legislation than if he tries to put this bill through now, because as I see it there is not one particle of all this that will bring this Food and Drugs Act into conformity with the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act. Even if it did I submit it is wrong in practice because the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act should be revamped from top to bottom.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think the hon. member for Ottawa is unduly exercised in this matter. I do not think his many objections rest on very substantial grounds. There has been no hurry about putting this bill through the committee. It is, I think, four weeks since it was first brought forward, therefore hon. members have had opportunity to read and discuss it, which they have done. Many have taken that opportunity with myself. It has been brought particularly to the notice of those members who are of the medical profession, and one of the pharmaceutical societies. So in fact these amendments have been before the house for a considerable period. Judging from the letters that have reached me the general public is pretty well informed on the matter. I see that there has been some little confusion in the mind of the hon. senior member for Ottawa. For instance the Food and Drugs Act and the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act are entirely distinct. Some of the remarks the hon. member has made apply to the Proprietary and Patent Medicine Act but do not apply to the bill now before the committee. In his reference, my hon. friend is applying schedule B to schedule A, which of course, has nothing to do with it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is what I say, it is wrongly worded.

Mr. MacLAREN: Excuse me, if my hon. friend will read that small two page amendment he may see something there that will help:

> The said act is further amended by adding the following schedule thereto as schedule A and by substituting the heading "Schedule B" for the heading "Schedule" in the schedule to the act as it now stands:

As a matter of fact, in printing the Food and Drugs Act some few years ago there was only one schedule, therefore it was not necessary to specify or distinguish one from another. There is a schedule now in the act and under the amendment it is proposed to call it schedule B. My hon. friend is quite correct in saying that in schedule A there is nothing in reference to material. But that is not what we are speaking about; in schedule A we are speaking of these conditions and pathological states, and then schedule B comes with a list of material. I think my hon. friend will admit that there was a little oversight.

As regards conformity, I do not want to stress it too much. The amendment is an endeavour to advance health measures in the country. It has in view the protection of the public so that an individual who happens to be diseased shall not depend on some so-called remedy that he should not depend on. There is a considerable degree of conformity or uniformity that would be obtained in the event of the amendment passing. It does this; it inserts a similar list of diseases and conditions in the two acts.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the minister point out where those diseases appear in the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act?

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not have it here.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Neither have I.

Mr. MacLAREN: You have it there under another act; it is identical in the two acts. Under the Patent Medicine Act the list of those diseases and conditions is established by order in council.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But where is it in the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act?

Mr. MacLAREN: It is established by order in council under the act, and I say the list is identical with the list my hon. friend has before him under the other act. I can produce the order in council if necessary.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is no good to me. It may be in the order in council, but no one has the opportunity of looking up all orders in council, and that is what I object to. Under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act there may be a whole series of orders in council, rules and regulations hidden in some corner. There may be efficiency in the department, and I know there is, but there is no uniformity. That is why I plead with the minister to bring forth an act which will enable us to find what we want. The minister knows that any time anything is required you must go down to the department, where you are shown a typewritten list of new rules and regulations, which are not published. Very few people have the opportunity of seeing those rules. If those twenty odd diseases and abnormal physical conditions listed in the schedule had been put in the act, everyone would have known about it, but now no one knows where to look.

Mr. MacLAREN: My officials state that under the patent medicine act those diseases are enumerated by departmental regulation. I said that was done by order in council. However, whether it is done by order in council or by the minister—

Mr. CHEVRIER: We do not know where to find them.

Mr. MacLAREN: My hon. friend could have asked for them. I will see that he gets copies by the first mail.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was told that this was to make one act conform with the other, but it does not.

Mr. MacLAREN: My hon. friend will have all the information he wishes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: After the act is passed.

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, but very soon after. It is not proper to describe this as a hole in the corner business at all. If there is one thing necessary with regard to public health it is publicity. We are trying to do something in the proper way; our object is to inform the people, and there is no hole in the corner business about it at all. Now, coming back to this point, I say there is a considerable degree of conformity brought about by this amendment, by adopting the same list of diseases and conditions that now exists under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act. That is a material gain. What is the reason for all this? It has been found that in some cases when the manufacturer or seller of a patent medicine has been stopped from selling it under the one act he has proceeded to sell it under the other, and we wish to have the same list apply to both acts so that we may have uniform administration. Especially I wish to direct attention to the fact that the amendment explains this situation. When my hon. friend refers to material it does not refer to diseases but to actual remedies which are enumerated there.

Mr. HOWDEN: I do not see any great cause for confusion in this legislation. The minister has told us that the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act forbids the sale of drugs or remedies having to do with certain diseases, and that certain individuals have been avoiding that law by purchasing or selling these articles under the Food and Drugs Act. I think the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act is absolutely correct in forbidding the sale of stated remedies under label for the alleviation and cure of a great many, in fact most, of the diseased conditions that we find in schedule A, which is a new schedule being inserted into the Food and Drugs Act. On the other hand I do feel that to forbid individuals to purchase certain remedies for more or less trivial conditions is rather an arbitrary stand to take.

Mr. MacLAREN: What are the trivial conditions?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. HOWDEN: If the minister will just give me a moment I will run over the list. On the other hand, after looking over this list I find that there is no danger in the world of people seeking to buy remedies, or of others attempting to sell them, for a great many of the conditions set out in this list. There are one or two conditions with which I must confess, though with some hesitation, the regular practice of medicine has had seemingly but slight success, and for which various patent remedies—call them quacks if you like—seem to have been able to afford the relief we have not been able to bring about. I would mention first epilepsy, to which I propose to refer at a little greater length in a moment.

Now let us look over this list of diseases for which no one is permitted to import, manufacture, offer for sale, advertise by any means whatever or sell any remedy which is supposed to relieve or cure the conditions enumerated; let us consider the conditions one by one, starting with alcoholism. The only danger to an individual seeking relief from alcoholism by remedies that might be prescribed by a druggist, who is the only individual who would prescribe remedies, is that he might get rather too heavy a dose of one of the hypnotics. There is an extremely remote danger that he might get a sufficiently heavy dose to put him out, but the danger is very slight. Ordinarily speaking, the remedies the druggist would sell for the relief of alcoholism would cause no great danger. They would not do very much good, nor would they do much harm, so that the person buying the remedy would be no farther ahead and he would be out only the price of the remedy.

We now come to appendicitis. When a person has an honest to goodness attack of appendicitis he does not monkey with it. He is genuinely sick, and of that fact there can be no doubt in the world. He is not going to run to a drug store when the pain in his side is causing him such agony that he can scarcely bear it, and under those circumstances he will not be asking for a cure from a druggist. If the person affected knows he has appendicitis he is certainly not going to bother with a drug store and, believe me, if the druggist knows it is appendicitis he will not offer any relief. He will chase that person to the best doctor to be found, and will have him go as fast as possible. So, as far as appendicitis is concerned this measure is ineffective, and it is all bunkum to assume that anybody suffering from appendicitis will take a chance with patent remedies or common salts.

Then we come to arteriosclerosis. Well, just how a druggist or a layman is going to know when a person is suffering from arteriosclerosis I cannot guess. It takes a pretty fair doctor to diagnose this disease, which is commonly known as hardening of the arteries. I should not think there would be a great deal of danger of anybody running to a drug store or to anybody else and saying, "here, sell me something to cure my arteriosclerosis." In that respect the legislation is a joke.

Now we come to blood poisoning. Well, I grant you that the laity, the people generally, have the idea that every little infected wound they may have on their hands or their toes, together with a few streaks running up their arms or legs, constitute blood poisoning. But that is not so. Those conditions are called lymphangitis, or inflammation of the lymph channels, and if very much aggravated or neglected that condition might possibly lead to blood poisoning. But blood poisoning is a condition in which there are live, active, microbe organisms in the blood. For that reason it is a severe and serious disease, and when a person is suffering from it he shakes and shivers in his bed sufficiently to rattle the windows in the bedroom. A person suffering in that way is not going to go to a druggist and ask for relief. That also is a joke; there is no question about it. If a person is suffering from blood poisoning he will employ all the doctors he can afford in order to see what chance he has to live.

The next disease mentioned is Bright's disease. About two-thirds of us have Bright's disease after we reach the age of forty or fifty years. Of course, we may have it in lesser degrees, but if it appears in severe or aggravated form the less medicine that is taken the better, and when a person has a serious attack he does not bother with a druggist. He is panting for life and for breath, and he will call a doctor. The only remedy I can imagine a druggist would dare sell a person suffering from Bright's disease would be Epsom salts, or something like that, and if they did not do him any good they would do no harm. For those reasons I cannot see that this bill can have much effect so far as Bright's disease is concerned.

Then we come to cancer, and at this point we must pause to consider. A person may have a little sore on the corner of his mouth which has been neglected and which may develop into a cancer. The sore may appear at the corner of his eye or he may have had a sudden difficulty with his digestion. All these conditions might come out of a perfectly clear sky. Then, a woman may develop a sore on a nipple, a breast or other places. There is no danger of her going to a druggist. She may go to a quack doctor and have an arsenic plaster put on, or something of that kind. But there would be no danger of her going to a druggist and asking for relief for cancer. It is my implicit belief that if a person knows he has cancer he will not go to a druggist and ask for a remedy but will consult the best doctor he can find or can afford to employ and receive the best advice he can pay for. I believe a druggist would not have the nerve to sell a remedy for cancer. He could not possibly do so.

Now we come to diabetes. It is not difficult to tell when one is suffering from diabetes. We are not giving a medical clinic and we shall not discuss this disease at length, but I cannot imagine anyone with honest-to-goodness diabetes tampering with his welfare to the extent of going to a drug store for relief. Then, in these days we have the Banting remedy of insulin, and for that reason diabetes is viewed from an entirely different standpoint. There was a time when this disease was considered beyond help, and in drug stores here and there and all over all sorts of patent remedies were sold to effect cures. But because of the scientific advances made in connection with this disease, and the discovery by Sir Frederick Banting, that condition has been stopped. For those reasons diabetes may be scratched off the list.

Now we come to diphtheria—and in this instance we have a case no one should monkey with. Here is a time when no one should monkey with a druggist. This is one disease which could be left on the list, and we could call it diphtheria, sore throat or whatever you like. Just as soon as a child has a real honest-to-goodness sore throat, get a doctor. Call a sore throat diphtheria, and get a doctor, and we would have less deaths. I would say we could include ordinary sore throats, and prevent druggists from selling remedies for infectious sore throats, whether they be diphtheria, tonsilitis, scarlet fever, Ludwig's angina, or anything of the kind.

Now we come to dropsy. Dropsy is a symptom, not a disease and occurs in connection with Bright's disease, heart disease, liver disease and all sorts of diseases in which the limbs, and preeminently the legs, swell up to a point where, by pressure from a finger, pits may be formed. Here, again, if a druggist had the hardiness to prescribe for dropsy, and decided to prescribe Epsom salts which he likely would do, he would probably be suggesting about as good a remedy as he could in any case.

And now we come to the next important one, namely epilepsy. I said a little while ago that unfortunately the medical profession has had no success with epilepsy. We have prescribed all sorts of medicines. We have performed counter depressions on the brain and taken out a piece of the skull. We have done all sorts of things. Here and there we have effected a cure, and here and there our efforts have been fruitless. But there are individuals, quacks if you like—and I do not call them that disrespectfully, because I believe in rendering unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's—who have evidently found means to relieve epilepsy. As a medical man with thirty years' experience I believe in letting people get relief or cures where they can get them. If a doctor cannot give it to them, let them go where they can get it. That is my policy. It might be worth the while of this committee to listen to a letter or two that I have. I have half a dozen, but I shall not read them all. This one is an appeal to the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, and it says:

Dear Sir,—

It was brought to my notice that a new Canadian law has been proposed, which will make it impossible for a person to obtain treatment for epilepsy attacks except through a physician. I refer to the bill sponsored by the Hon. Dr. Murray MacLaren, Minister of Pensions and National Health. Now I myself have suffered from epilepsy since 1923. I tried the home doctor and others, spending hundreds of dollars in vain. Then I used the treatment from the Western Medical Corporation of Chicago—

I do not know anything about them personally:

Now I am feeling fine. If this new law comes into force I understand I cannot buy medicines from any concern either in the United States or in Canada. This would mean that I cannot get my medicine and would probably mean worse than death to me, as epilepsy works on the brain.

That is true, Epilepsy developing in early years usually leaves a fumbling, feeble brain after the child grows up, and the longer you have epilepsy the foolisher you get.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is a circular letter is it not? I think I see one or two in other hands.

Mr. HOWDEN: I have four letters under individual signatures from four different individuals.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have that same letter here.

[Mr. Howden.]

Mr. HOWDEN: It is true that a circular letter has been sent from some firm.

Mr. STEVENS: The one my hon. friend has just read is a circular letter. I remember getting one with the same wording.

Mr. HOWDEN: I shall be happy to hand it over to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and read another. Hon. gentlemen around me tell me they have all got these letters. I hope they are not all the same.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will the hon. member read that letter himself? I think he can read it better than I can, and I have so much to read on the subject already.

Mr. HOWDEN: It was to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that I sent the letter so that he could look at it and see if it was a circular letter. Here is another letter addressed to Mr. Olof Hanson. It reads:

Dear Sir,—

I am writing about the new law which has been proposed to make it impossible,—

They do not sound the same:

—for anyone to buy medicine for epilepsy attacks either in United States or Canada except through a physician.

I take epilepsy attacks myself, and I have been to the best of doctors as far east as Winnipeg, Manitoba, and never had one doctor that could help me in any way. Dr. James in the United States is the only man that could put out a prescription that would stop my attacks, and if I do not get my medicine in a short time I'll be unable to work. Then what will happen to my wife and family, as I'm a married man? The medicine I get from Doctor James is not a patent medicine. It is a prescription from the doctor himself.

I am asking, Mr. Chairman, that the disease epilepsy be removed from this list. I have two other letters here, and gentlemen behind me and to my left say that they have other letters. I want to say this and I say it in all sincerity, that I have myself endeavoured to the best of my ability to cure epilepsy, and in one or two cases in about twenty I met with success. In one or two cases it cleared up. I have known it to clear up without any medicine at all. For God's sake if people have their lives ruined and racked by this disease of epilepsy—the minister may laugh if he likes, but it is no laughing matter—

Mr. MacLAREN: Does the hon. member say I was laughing? I was not.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was referring to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was laughing at the breach of decorum in this house.

Mr. HOWDEN: I have heard of more serious breaches of decorum than that. I am sincere in what I say, and I say in the name of heaven—

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is better.

Mr. HOWDEN: —if people are suffering from epilepsy and can get no relief except through taking medicine or going to quack doctors, let them get it that way. We have no business to deny them relief from this worse than dread malady, and so far we have not been able to give them the relief which they crave. So I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that epilepsy be struck off the list, and that these sufferers be allowed to get their medicine where they can so long as they can get relief.

Now as to erysipelas. Erysipelas is something that should not be tampered or fooled with, but I think there is little danger of one suffering from erysipelas losing much valuable time because it spreads so rapidly and the individual becomes so prostrated with illness in a short time that he will not temporize very long with tomfool measures; he will call in a physician on his own account. There is no need to put that disease on the list.

I do not know what to say about gall-stones, kidney stones and bladder stones. No one is likely to go to a druggist and ask for relief from these troubles, or if he did the druggist might take it upon himself to prescribe an opiate, and very likely that is the only thing he would prescribe. But if he has honest to goodness attacks of gall stones, he does not know himself what it is until he sees a doctor—how does anybody know, unless he has consulted a medical man, whether he has a gall stone, a kidney stone, or a stone in the bladder? If he does not know what he has, it is not very likely that he is going to ask someone other than a medical man for relief from this condition. I do not see the force of putting those diseases on the list because certainly a person with an attack of gall stone, colic or real colic is not going to temporize with drugs. He will be yelling his head off until the doctor comes along with a hypodermic syringe and gives him some relief.

As to gangrene, a part that becomes gangrenous is intensely painful. It becomes very red at first, then blue, then black. It is usually terrifying enough in its phenomena to drive any person to call in a doctor if there is a doctor to be had. If any person knows he has gangrene he will not seek patent remedies or any light measures to relieve him. There is no question in the world but that he will by some means or other obtain the advice and assistance of a medical man.

As to gastric and duodenal ulcers, people who are suffering from these would often be safer to stay away from the doctor, because it is not always certainly known when a person has a gastric or duodenal ulcer, and it is not always certain what is the best treatment. The only symptons would be a very aggravated form of dyspepsia. I suppose anybody with a very aggravated form of dyspepsia might go to a druggist, and if he asked for something for a gastric or duodenal ulcer the druggist might give him a little sodium and bismuth, which would certainly do no harm. But sooner or later he finds his way to a medical man. When he does so he may get a diagnosis or he may receive the relief which he desires. I cannot see any real reason why this should be allowed to remain on the list, except that if a person goes to a druggist or a chemist for a remedy for gastric or duodenal ulcers, the chemist should be forced to send him to a medical man. The same thing applies all down the list.

In the case of goitre, a druggist may take it upon himself to prescribe iodine of potash, or he might prescribe iodine in some form. He may suggest that the goitre be painted with iodine, but that would not do the patient very much good. Iodine of potash might relieve the patient but I cannot see much danger in allowing this disease to remain on the list. If the patient has an aggravated goitre which upsets his nervous system or if his breath is shut off he will soon call in a doctor. Until that time arrives there is no great danger.

Many people have heart disease without knowing it. When the time comes that they realize they have it, there is no question about the matter. They are not going to temporize with either a quack or a druggist, they are going to see a medical man in an effort to get the needed relief.

The next is high blood pressure. The point in connection with the entire list is: How is an individual to know he has got blood pressure without consulting a medical man? How is he to know that he has infantile paralysis without consulting a medical man? How is he to know he has lockjaw? By the time he has lockjaw he will surely know it, and a medical man will not be of much use to him. In the case of locomotor ataxia there is no danger, but there may be some in the case of obesity. An individual may temporize with a lot of drugs which would do him no good. The next are pleurisy, pneumonia, ruptures and scarlet fever. I do not see a great deal of danger in any of those but scarlet fever. The average individual becomes so sick with scarlet fever that he seeks a medical man. There are a few cases which are so mild that they are not detected and there is great danger of the spreading of the infection. If such a case is not sufficiently severe to make itself known to the individual or to his family, it is not very likely that a druggist would notice his condition. In such a case an individual is not going to go to a druggist or a quack and ask for a remedy for scarlet fever. In the case of severe scarlet fever there will be no temporizing, the individual will call in a medical man.

There is no danger with spinal meningitis, but there is some in connection with trachoma. Trachoma is chronic granulated eyelids and there is danger not only to the individual's eyesight but through the spreading of the disease to anyone who might use the same towel or wash-cloth. Tuberculosis, tumors, typhoid fever—I do not see much danger in connection with any of those. In connection with venereal disease there is a great deal of danger. While it is not very often that an individual will apply to a druggist for the relief of this disease, this is one disease which should be left on the list. It should be underlined with a heavy line. Any druggist who takes it upon himself to prescribe for venereal trouble should be severely punished. Venereal disease is one of the conditions which is undermining the health of the nation and it should receive more attention than it is receiving from the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is why they cut off the grant.

Mr. HOWDEN: I suppose so. This legislation if adopted will create a definite and decided hardship to a class of invalids whom the doctors have been unable to assist, a class of invalids who have been able to get relief by other means, a class of invalids to whom this parliament or anybody else has not the right to deny relief so long as they can find it. For these reasons I appeal to the minister to have epilepsy taken off the list. The class of remedies sold to these people may do them no good, but they do them no harm. We medical men cannot do them any good and for this reason I think epilepsy should be left off the list.

I have nothing but endorsation for the provision that the minister shall have the authority to add to or remove from schedule B such material as he may assume to be necessary in the public interests. The schedule reads:

[Mr. Howden.]

Preparations of strophanthus, digitalis, ergot and any other vegetable preparations for which biological tests are deemed necessary.

That responsibility might well be placed in the hands of the minister. The schedule continues:

Preparations of pituitrin, thyroid, adrenalin and any other animal tissue preparations.

There is not much danger that any individual is going to submit to a hypodermic injection of something about which he knows nothing. I do not intend to read the balance, but I see no reason why the minister should not have entire control. The absurd part of the bill is this long list of disease conditions in connection with which people are not to be allowed to apply to other than medical men for relief. I do not consider that there is any danger but that ninety-nine per cent of the people suffering from these diseases will appeal to medical men for relief.

Mr. MacLAREN: Apparently all the different sections of the bill are being discussed and in order to clear the situation I should like to place before the committee an amendment which I propose to move to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): Is the amendment to section 1?

Mr. MacLAREN: To section 2.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I think we are all mixed up. The minister is proposing an amendment to section 2 but we have not yet dealt with section 1.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is quite correct, but we are not dealing with section 1.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): Section 1 is before the committee.

Mr. MacLAREN: I did not want this discussion to continue on the whole bill until the committee had before it this amendment.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Why does not the minister read the amendment himself and then propose it when we reach the section?

Mr. HOWDEN: I was discussing the bill at large, making a comparison between the two bills. I was discussing the reason this legislation had been brought into the house and was basing my remarks not on any particular section but on the whole intent of the bill.

Mr. MacLAREN: Perhaps I had better read the amendment which I shall propose later on:

6a. No person or company shall import, offer for sale or sell any remedy represented by label or by advertisement—

Those are the two points—by label or by advertisement.

—to the general public as a treatment for any of the diseases, disorders or abnormal physical states named or included in schedule A to this act or in any amendment to such schedule.

That does not exclude the importation of any drugs intended for sale to physicions, nor does it prohibit the advertising of any of these remedies for physicians.

Mr. VENIOT: Does it prevent the sale of these drugs by drug stores?

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot reply comprehensively, yes or no. Drug stores can sell these remedies to physicians or physicians can prescribe them through a druggist.

Mr. VENIOT: Suppose I have been treated in the past by a physician who has informed me that a particular medicine will do me good. I go and ask a druggist to sell me that medicine, without telling him precisely what I want it for. Is the druggist permitted to sell it? I am interested in this matter, personally interested, because I am interested in the drug business, and I want to know whether I am violating the law or not. The largest drug store in northern New Brunswick is under the jurisdiction of my son, who is a medical doctor, and of his brother, who is a pharmacist.

Mr. MacLAREN: You are a doctor yourself.

Mr. VENIOT: Not a medical doctor; I cannot give a prescription. I want to know, in the interest of the business, whether we are violating the law or not.

Mr. MacLAREN: Whether you are violating the law if this bill is passed?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: Under this proposed amendment these remedies can either be manufactured in Canada or they can be imported from abroad.

Mr. VENIOT: By a druggist?

Mr. MacLAREN: By anyone. The point in regard to labelling is an important one. One of the essential points is the labelling or the advertising of a remedy as a remedy.

Mr. VENIOT: For a specific disease?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes. These remedies can be admitted into Canada or they can be manufactured in this country and can be sold by druggists on the prescription of a medical man.

Mr. NEILL: Only?

Mr. MacLAREN: Let us take, say, the remedy for epilepsy. If that is being imported or is being sold without the label anyone may buy it, but it must not be sold labelled as a remedy for epilepsy, nor may anyone advertise it as a remedy for epilepsy. It can be obtained through physicians or it can be bought provided the label does not signify that it is a remedy or treatment for epilepsy.

Mr. VENIOT: Suppose I go into a drug store and say to the druggist, "I am suffering from a certain attack and I want such and such a remedy for it." I name the remedy and the bottle does not contain a label. Can I get it if I name it to the druggist?

Mr. MacLAREN: If you name the remedy itself?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: Without the label?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: Certainly, unless it contains a lot of narcotics.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand that. Here is another question. Suppose a person is suffering from rupture, and without any recommendation from a doctor or any prescription he goes to a drug store to purchase a belt or whatever the necessary appliance may be. Is there anything in the act to prevent him from doing so?

Mr. MacLAREN: Nothing whatever. I may point out to the hon. gentleman that this does not deal with any appliance at all. One can scarcely credit it, but from time to time advertisements appear claiming a remedy for rupture; that is to say, there is a certain ointment or something that is rubbed over the area, and that is the treatment.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ST. CLAIR TRANSIT COMPANY

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton) moved the second reading of Bill No. 100, respecting the St. Clair Transit Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. GRAY: In view of the fact that this is not a new bill but is merely an amendment to one section of an existing act, and in view of the lateness of the session, I move:

That standing order No. 104 be suspended and that the Speaker do now leave the chair in order that the house may now consider in committee of the whole Bill No. 100, an act respecting the St. Clair Transit Company.

Mr. SPEAKER: That motion can be made only by consent.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I do not think I can consent. My understanding is that this ought to go to the standing orders committee.

Mr. GRAY: It has been there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know, but under standing order 101:

No motion for the suspension of the standing orders or any rule respecting a petition for a private bill will be entertained, unless the same has been reported upon by the committee on standing orders, and the committee in its report shall state the grounds for recommending such suspension.

I do not want to delay the measure, but I think the course proposed would be irregular. This bill I believe raises the question of an international tunnel or bridge.

Mr. GRAY: The extension of the charter of an international bridge. It has been fully discussed with the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The committee has plenty of time to consider this in the ordinary way.

Mr. GRAY: No, because under standing order 105 a week's posting is required if I do not get consent to consider it now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the hon. member bring his motion up on Monday when the Prime Minister is here?

Mr. GRAY: I would much prefer to move the suspension of rule 105, so that the bill might be considered forthwith by the committee.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then the hon. member will have to give notice. I cannot agree to it; I would if I could, but I cannot.

Mr. GRAY: It could be referred to the private bills committee; I could move the suspension of standing order 105 so that it would not require a week's posting.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no objection to its going to the private bills committee in the most expeditious manner possible.

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. GRAY: Then I move:

That standing order No. 105 be suspended in order that the committee on miscellaneous private bills may consider forthwith Bill No. 100, an act respecting the St. Clair Transit Company.

Motion agreed to.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 70, to amend the Food and Drugs Act—Mr. MacLaren—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Regulations by governor in council.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask again that the minister let this clause stand until such time as the whole of the act can be reconsidered.

Mr. MacLAREN: Do I understand that the hon. member asks that the first section stand?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I simply repeat the suggestion I made this afternoon, that in view of the tremendously large powers that are being sought, an opportunity ought to be given to those interested in this matter to appear so that the whole matter may be discussed.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am not prepared to do that.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Limitations upon recommendations for self-treatment.

Mr. MacLAREN: It will now be in order to move the amendment I spoke of.

Mr. STEVENS: I will move it.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment reads:

That clause 2 be amended by adding thereto the following as section 6a:

No person or company shall import, offer for sale or sell any remedy represented by label or by advertisement to the general public as a treatment for any of the diseases, disorders or abnormal physical states named or included in schedule A to this act, or in any amendment to such schedule.

Mr. MacLAREN: I might explain again that this amendment to the amendment meets some objections that have been made. It gives more liberty, is less restrictive. It enables these remedies to be sold on the prescription of medical men. It enables them to be sold provided there is no label specifying that it is a remedy for any of these diseases set forth in schedule A. I know it meets with less objection from some than the previous amendment.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I think the minister is making a mistake. Is it not that the amendment he proposes is a substitution for paragraph 6A of section 2? The motion should be "that paragraph 6A be deleted and the following substituted therefor."

Mr. MacLAREN: Quite so; that is the amendment.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is not what is being done.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It seems to me the present section should be struck out and the amendment substituted for it.

Mr. MacLAREN: Quite so. The motion is that section 6A mentioned in the bill be struck out and the amendment substituted for it.

Mr. NEILL: No, you are striking out section 2.

Mr. VENIOT: The intention is to amend 6A of section 2. You delete section 2 entirely and put in this new section.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall that carry?

Mr. RALSTON: What is the substitution?

Mr. HOWDEN: If I understand the matter aright we objected to this section 6A when it was before us the other day. We objected to the words "manufacture," "advertise," and so on, and in the amendment those words have been deleted. Otherwise the paragraph is very much as it was before.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is not my interpretation of it. For instance, now it is simply restricted to the sale to the general public. As I understand it the motion is to strike out the addition to the act, section 6A as originally printed in the bill, and substitute the proposed section.

Mr. NEILL: Section 6A is not a section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): All I have before me is:

2. The said act is further amended by adding thereto the following section immediately after section 6 thereof:

Then the amendment proposes the new section 6A.

Mr. REID: Would you mind reading the proposed new section again?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The amendment reads:

No person or company shall import, offer for sale or sell any remedy represented by label or by advertisement to the general public as a treatment for any of the diseases, disorders or abnormal physical states named or included in schedule A to this act or in any amendment to such schedule.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the matter is quite clear. My motion is to insert a new section in the act. It is to be inserted between sections 6 and 7, and we are naming it section 6A. Nothing is to be stricken out; it is simply the addition of a new section to the act.

Mr. RALSTON: If the chairman would just add to what he has read the words "that section 2 be amended by striking out paragraph 6A thereof and substituting therefor the following," we would have the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. gentleman is right. So far as the original act is concerned it merely adds a new subsection.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. The amendment now reads:

No person or company shall import, offer for sale or sell any remedy represented by label or by advertisement to the general public as a treatment for any of the diseases—

And so on. I submit that under the Interpretation Act the words "or company" are superfluous. The amendment should read, "no person shall import" and so on. We want to get at the meaning of this amendment. I take it that bottle must have on it some kind of label. There is nothing in the definition of the Interpretation Act about what a label is. We do not know whether the label must be on the bottle, on the carton or inside the carton quite apart from the bottle itself "—represented by label or by advertisement to the general public." Does that mean that no person or company shall import, offer for sale or sell any remedy represented by a label to the general public, or does it mean that no person or company shall import, offer for sale or sell any remedy to the general public? Apparently that means that on that label there must be no representation or advertisement to the general public. Is that right?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, it is limited to remedies for those diseases or conditions specified in the schedule.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Quite so, but on those remedies that affect any of the abnormal physical states mentioned in the schedule there must be no label or representation or advertisement to the general public. Is that right?

Mr. MacLAREN: Not representing it as being a remedy or treatment for the diseases specified in the schedule.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Or by advertisement to the general public. What is an advertisement to the general public? I understand that the intention, though it is not expressly stated, is to limit the advertising of remedies used for these specific cases to the medical profession. If that be so where does the general public start and where does it end? How are you going to determine what is an advertisement to the general public? Apparently I cannot advertise in the daily newspapers any remedy that may be used as a treatment for the abnormal physical states mentioned in the schedule.

Mr. MacLAREN: Of course you can, if you are addressing it to the medical profession.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I gathered that that was the intention, but what is said in this house in the discussion of the bill as to what the intention of the minister may be cannot be used as evidence before the courts. I have to have a clear expression of what the intention and effect of the law may be, so that when I appear in a court the judge, or the person charged with the interpretation of the statute, will know exactly what it means or will have some means of ascertaining the fundamental intention. The minister has said what he means, but the amendment is not clear.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is stated in the amendment.

Mr. STANLEY: Read the amendment from the first.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The amendment reads:

> No person or company shall import, offer for sale or sell any remedy represented by label or by advertisement to the general public as a treatment ...

And so on. Now, that is all right, but there is no definition as to what "the general public" may mean. The minister says that I may advertise it to the medical profession, but the amendment does not so indicate. I can advertise to the medical profession in various ways. I understand the minister to mean that I may take to a daily paper in Ottawa an advertisement for one of these remedies advertised as a treatment for some abnormal physical state and have such advertisement inserted so that I would be advertising to the general public remedies for all of these abnormal physical states, provided that I put at the top, underneath or at the corner of the advertisement the words "This advertisement is directed to the medical profession only." I understand that that is the intention. I understand further that I may advertise in a so-called or genuine medical review which may be directed, as is usually the case, to the medical profession. I may advertise in the Lancet, the English periodical devoted almost exclusively to the medical profession, any of the remedies to be used as a treatment for any one of the abnormal physical states mentioned in the schedule. My own impression is that if I were to advertise in a dental or pharmaceutical review I would not be advertising to the general public. But where is the line to be drawn? What is the determining line? I cannot advertise in the daily press without the insertion of some restrictive words, but if I can advertise in a medical review, then what is a medical review? I have before me one of these reviews; I shall not mention the name of it, but in it appears an advertisement of a uric acid eliminator, a well known French product, and such specific ailments are mentioned, as gout, lithiasis, neuralgia, rheumatism, arteriosclerosis and obesity. If the bill and schedule become law in their present form, in view of the fact that this publication is not an ordinary review but is directed to the general public, the manufacturers of the product in question will have to eliminate the words "arterioclerosis and obesity." Although this remedy is not one used exclusively for these ailments, yet it is a solvent used in a case of arteriosclerosis as a uric acid eliminator and in a case of obesity as another sort of eliminator. I ask the minister this: If I put in the advertisement the words, "This advertisement is directed to the medical profession only," may it circulate among the general public as an advertisement for arteriosclerosis and obesity?

Mr. MacLAREN: If it is directed to the medical profession, yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But I want to find out when it is directed to the medical profession and when it is not directed to the medical profession.

Mr. MacLAREN: The answer is, when it says so—that is all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It would have been much better if the statute had been made clear. But if the minister states that tomorrow I may go to one of the daily papers and advertise a remedy for the treatment of one or all of the ailments mentioned in the schedule, and I can do that simply by putting a line at the top of or underneath the advertisement saying, "This is directed exclusively to the medical profession" that arrangement may be all right, but I suggest it is not a proper way to do business.

Mr. STANLEY: Where will you sell your product?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is why I say there is no reason for the inclusion in the schedule of quite a large number of these so-called abnormal physical conditions. The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), differing from other opinions which have been expressed, says that a certain number of these ailments are not abnormal physical states. They should be excluded. The difficulty is that one cannot advertise to the general public any one of these remedies as a treatment for the abnormal physical states mentioned in the schedule. But I want to know where I can do it. I believe I have made myself clear.

Mr. MacLAREN: Wherever you consider it to your advantage, that is the answer. There are medical journals without number, and there are periodicals and, if you wish, the press. This amendment is intended not to be extreme but to be a moderate measure, and not to go too far in advance of general opinion. Therefore an advertisement to the profession is allowed or allowable in any form you wish.

Mr. HOWDEN: I intimated to the committee this afternoon that I thought this legislation was to a great extent farcical. Many forms of disease are mentioned for which no one would think of advertising cures before the general public. So far as those forms of disease are concerned, I believe we may put them out of our minds; we do not need to go over them again. In the case of quite a number, however, there is potential danger in druggists or proprietary people advertising remedies. All these particular forms of disease I have in mind certainly require the attention of a skilled physician. However, to my mind the whole discussion circles around the one disease which I discussed at length this afternoon and in connection with which we as medical men have had but scant success in the matter of treatment. The amendment states:

> No person or company shall import, offer for sale or sell any remedy represented by label or by advertisement to the general public ...

And so on. We know of one firm at least which has been successful in treating by mail a malady in the treatment of which medical men have had very little or no success. A number of people throughout the dominion are suffering from that disease, and at the present time they are apprehensive that this legislation will remove from them the possibility of obtaining the medicine for the relief of their condition. The amendment plainly says that this medicine shall not be advertised to the public. How then shall other victims who will suffer from this disease in the future be relieved, or how will they be informed of the fact that there is a remedy that can relieve them? If the remedy cannot be advertised I do not see how they can learn about it.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Get a good medical man.

Mr. HOWDEN: It is true that there are a lot of good medical men, but there are a few conditions that medical men have not been able to control entirely, and this is one of them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do you want the sufferers to go to quacks?

Mr. HOWDEN: I have no interest whatever in any quack company or quack doctor, but if any quack doctor is able to give relief for a condition where I cannot give relief, I say more power to him.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Have you ever met one who could?

Mr. HOWDEN: I have met many cases, and for that reason I say without hesitation that if this legislation is enforced it will be positively unfair to a number of epileptics in this dominion. I have no personal interest in any epileptic but I like to see people in any such condition treated fairly and given a chance; for it is well known that if the disease is allowed to run on for a number of years without relief it affects the mind and the sufferer becomes feebleminded.

Mr. MacLAREN: I had intended to wait until we reached the schedule before saying anything with reference to any of the diseases listed, but I feel I should not delay, and that I should say something about epilepsy.

Mr. HOWDEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have had communications and reports on different diseases, and recently I have received from members of parliament and others a considerable number of letters with reference to the administration of a certain remedy for epilepsy. So far as I can tell, and I think this applies to all of them, they originated at the request of a medical firm in Chicago, the Western Medical Corporation. I should like to read this communication to the house. It is a letter on the heading of the Western Medical Corporation, and the directing physician is Harry L. James, M.D. The letter is dated May 25, 1934, and this particular letter is addressed to a lady. It reads:

Dear Miss,—

Do you know that a new Canadian law has been proposed to make it impossible for you to obtain treatment for epilepsy attacks except through a physician? This means that you could not buy medicines from any concern in the United States or in Canada for epilepsy attacks.

I think that is correct so far as it goes. It is correct if it were labelled; it is not correct if there were no labels on it. The letter continues:

This matter was brought to our attention by one of our Canadian customers who was greatly disturbed at the possibility of not being able to obtain our medicines should the bill be passed. We refer to the bill sponsored by the Hon. Doctor Murray MacLaren, Minister of Pensions and National Health, now in its second reading.

It occurred to me that all of our Canadian patients might not be aware of this impending legislation. Therefore I suggest that if you feel the passage of this bill might seriously affect you because you could no longer obtain medicines from us, it would no doubt be a good plan to write to your representative in the dominion House of Commons—

That has been duly done.

—asking that the disease epilepsy be removed from the list. You might also add that you consider it a grave injustice to be forced to go to a local physician for treatment.

Immediate action is no doubt necessary if you are to cause the removal of the disease epilepsy from the list of diseases contained in the bill.

Will you let us hear from you as to what answer your representative gives you?

Sincerely,
Harry L. James, M.D.,
Directing Physician.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the name of the company?

Mr. MacLAREN: The Western Medical Corporation. So far as I am aware, all the letters and copies of letters that have reached me or the department have been sent on the invitation of the Western Medical Corporation through their directing physician.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I never got one.

Mr. MacLAREN: It was not necessary in my hon. friend's case.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not suffering from epilepsy.

Mr. MacLAREN: There, Mr. Chairman, you have the fons et origo of all this trouble about epilepsy; and the corporation makes its appeal attractive by the distribution of a three dollar coupon to all those who are buying these medicines

I would like to say, for this is rather important, that the formula is on these bottles when they are sold under the act. The remedy is luminal, and for many cases of epilepsy that is probably the most suitable and effective remedy, but I saw a letter not long ago in which the correspondent said he had been taking luminal and it was not useful, and that he got the medicine of this company and it was just the thing. The ordinary trade term for this remedy is luminal, but there are at least two other long scientific names, and if they are used, naturally the general public are not aware that it is luminal they are taking, and yet it is the same thing. The remedy I say is luminal, and it is quite a good remedy as a palliative in epilepsy. But epilepsy is due to different causes. I grant you that in many cases it is idiopathic, that there is no discernible cause for it, but in other cases that is not so. It may be due to arterial degeneration, or to luetic infection, or to injuries. Strangely enough I have a letter before me from a woman who writes that she had received a fractured skull from a kick by a horse, and she was taking this remedy for epilepsy. That was essentially a case for examination by a surgeon or physician, not a case for treatment by correspondence with a doctor a thousand miles away.

Mr. HOWDEN: She might have had Jacksonian epilepsy and had the epilepsy as a result of the kick on the head.

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot say as to that. I am giving her statement, that she had epilepsy, that she had a fracture of the skull caused by a kick from a horse. There is no mystery about these things, and I believe many of them would be wise if they took the same thing. They can go to a druggist and get it themselves if they desire without there being any advertising or anything else. This matter has been brought to the attention of the public in this way. I do not know that one can blame him for following his business instincts, but our object is to try to protect the public and see that they do not incessantly and continually take something which they may not need. I agree that a cure for epilepsy is not known but sometimes it disappears although in other cases it becomes worse. I think all cases should receive skilled attention. All we are saying is that these things shall not bear labels and be advertised. To that small extent we are trying to protect the public.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Would the minister be kind enough to answer one question for me? He stated a moment ago that as long as a product was not labelled for the cure of a disease it could be sold to the general public in any drug store.

Mr. MacLAREN: Absolutely.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Could a man sell a drug advertised in a manner similar to the letter which the minister read provided the bottle was not labelled? Is there anything in the proposed amendment which would prevent a manufacturer from sending out circular letters of the kind which the minister read, provided he does not label his bottle as a remedy for a disease listed in schedule A? This is what the druggist wants to know. I have received sheaves of telegrams from pharmaceutical associations all the way from Toronto down to Quebec asking me to ascertain if there is anything in the present law or in the proposed amendment which would prevent a druggist or a pharmacist or a manufacturer from advertising a product so long as he does not label the bottle. That is the first point. Second, is there anything in the law or in the amendment which prevents a manufacturer or a druggist from advertising a product as long as the advertising or the sample bottle is addressed direct to the medical profession? If the minister can clear up those points, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. MacLAREN: My answer to the first and third questions is that it would be allowable under the act. As to the question whether or not a druggist could advertise, I should like to know what it is he wishes to advertise. He must have something to advertise.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Suppose it is advertising a product to cure epilepsy.

Mr. MacLAREN: He could not do that.

Sir EUGENE FISET: But he could do that to the medical profession?

Mr. MacLAREN: Absolutely.

Mr. CHEVRIER: How could he do that to the medical profession, in a medical review or in a newspaper?

Mr. MacLAREN: In both.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He could do that in a newspaper provided he labelled his bottles in some way. I should like to get the proper phraseology in order that there may be no misunderstanding when I advise a client. What phraseology must the advertiser or the manufacturer of a product use in order to protect himself when he is advertising in a daily newspaper?

Mr. MacLAREN: He could do it, but you are speaking about something that is not done.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There has been no need to do it up to the moment.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is not done. All these things appear in medical journals, but I grant you it could be done. That is not the way to do it and that is not the way it is done. He could address it to the medical profession and say: This is the remedy that Doctor James prescribes for epilepsy.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let me get this thing right for my own personal information. Here is an advertisement. Under the term of this amendment it could not appear in a daily newspaper because it refers to arteriosclerosis and obesity, and those diseases are referred to in this schedule. Will the minister tell me what phraseology I could use for this advertisement in order to put this product before the general public and advertise it as it is being advertised in this magazine?

Sir EUGENE FISET: Head it "for the medical profession only."

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am asking the minister, and I think he can answer.

Mr. MacLAREN: The minister will answer with great pleasure. What is the name of the product the hon. member is speaking of?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is an advertisement for urodonal. It states that it is a uric acid eliminator. Then it goes on to say what it is good for, and among other things it mentions arteriosclerosis and obesity.

Mr. MacLAREN: State that it is for the medical profession.

Mr. CHEVRIER: All I have to do is label it to the medical profession and then the officers of the department would not prosecute?

Mr. MacLAREN: That is right.

Sir EUGENE FISET: In order to relieve my anxiety I should like the minister to confirm one statement. Should an individual advertise, either in a publication or by private letter or even on a bottle label, if that was addressed to the medical profession would he be interfered with by this amendment or by the present act?

Mr. MacLAREN: It would not touch that.

Mr. LUCAS: I received a letter from a person in my constituency which is somewhat along the lines of the letter read by the minister. It states that one of the family is afflicted with epilepsy and had been unable to obtain any relief except through the remedy prepared by Doctor James of Chicago. These people were protesting strongly against the passage of this amendment. As I understand the amendment, it will mean that anyone troubled with epilepsy must secure this remedy through a prescription by a medical man. I should like to know if a person could import this remedy from Doctor James so long as it came in without a label?

Mr. MacLAREN: Certainly.

Mr. LUCAS: Supposing it did come in without a label, what would the customs department do? Would they allow it to come in?

Mr. MacLAREN: Certainly. The difficulty has been in tracing these things once they got into the country, but an individual could order through the customs provided the label did not state it was a remedy for epilepsy. Of course the ingredients would have to be mentioned on the label.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was very glad to hear the minister state quite definitely a few minutes ago that luminal is what this Doctor James of Chicago is sending to his patients. Luminal is a well known hypnotic and we medical men have been using it for ten or twelve years. Phenobarbital and luminal and a number of other allied products have exactly the same effect upon the human economy. I cannot state definitely that I have ever prescribed luminal for epilepsy but I should think that the medical profession at large has been in the habit of trying all these sedatives and hypnotics in an endeavour to control the malady. This afternoon I had on my desk four letters from different parts of Canada—and hon. members intimated at the time that many of them had also received these letters—in which the writers stated quite definitely that after treating with medical men for a considerable time without any result whatever they had obtained relief from attacks of epilepsy. If relief has been given through the use of the drug luminal then it is a mighty good thing for us to know, and perhaps Doctor James will lose his business forthwith. But in the event of luminal not giving the desired results, I should certainly hope that this Health department of the dominion would not put it beyond the power of people to obtain the remedy that has brought them relief in the past. I have no other interest in it in the world; I am a medical man and I like to see disease relieved where possible, so that I have no other interest except the relief of sufferers from epilepsy. The minister stated a moment ago that this remedy could be brought in if the label were removed. That I suggest is a roundabout way of getting the remedy to a sick person, but still it is better than no way at all, and if it is possible for these epileptics to obtain whatever will relieve them from their malady, provided the label is removed, that satisfies me for the time being.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Sale, etc., of compound vinegar, etc., prohibited.

Mr. MacLAREN: The difficulty of distinguishing on the one hand between cider vinegar and vinegar derived from wine and, on the other, acetic acid which may be obtained by distillation of wood and other materials is considerable; hence in different manufactures such as pickles if the synthetic vinegar is used it is very difficult to detect it from the proper domestic vinegar, and this section affords protection, so that people will be assured that they are obtaining cider vinegar. That is the object of the amendment; it is not allowed to be on the premises of manufacturers.

Section agreed to.

On schedule A.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are a few of these abnormal physical states which in my opinion should not be in the schedule. I fully appreciate, as I have told the minister repeatedly, the fact that in a number of instances people ought to be protected against themselves, and the vast majority of the physical states mentioned in the schedule should remain, I think. The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) this afternoon reviewed them, and though I have not the competency to review them all I know some of them. Take arteriosclerosis, for instance. Everyone knows that that is hardening of the arteries, and once they have started to harden there is no cure.

But certain solvents may be used which will give considerable relief and restore to the arteries a certain degree of elasticity. The minister has said that certain remedies which heretofore could be used only as specifics might, by some side issue, be used for some of these physical states, and that clears up the situation to some extent. I must repeat however that the word "influenza" should be struck out. Ordinary people do not regard grippe and colds as influenza, although many of those who are dealing in matters of this kind like to give these maladies high sounding names; and unless they are advertised to the medical profession, then these remedies may not be advertised. I think another one that ought to come out is the supposed abnormal physical state of obesity. I quite realize there are two kinds. I know that in certain instances people have been led to believe that a certain quack medicine would bring them back to a sort of normal state, but owing to the peculiar cause of corpulency or obesity due to the deficiency of the thyroid gland medical treatment is absolutely necessary; the so-called eliminators would be useful but would aggravate the condition. But inasmuch as there are two kinds of remedies, one based on thyroid extracts and the other based on diet, the distinction should be made so as to enable those who sell certain laxatives and salts to advertise them as a relief for that type of obesity, which does not result upon thyroid or pituitary deficiency and the like. I should like to see the word "obesity" taken out; at any rate it ought to be qualified in some way. If the minister would confine it to obesity that comes within the endogenous class, namely, where there is thyroid deficiency, I would agree with that; but in the other kind, usually called exogenous obesity, which simply results from autointoxication, bad food or bad elimination, the remedies in this class ought to be allowed. If the minister would qualify in some way the word "obesity" then I should be in perfect accord with the bill and I should say he ought to be commended for having to that extent improved the conditions under which the national health of Canada is maintained.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like to meet the wishes of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) but I do not see how I can. There are more than two varieties of obesity; there are four or five anyway. The hon. member has referred to thyroid deficiency, but there are forms due to other defective glands in the system. And further, as to the remedies that are used for obesity, the thyroid perhaps we will agree has to be used with considerable discretion, but there is another that occurs to me, that is what is called nitro compound. It has produced unfortunate results, so much so that its use is not permitted in certain countries. Obesity in elderly people is rather a formidable condition. If one is relying on the exclusion of thyroid and nitro compound and using aperients or laxatives in moderation I am afraid it is something that will soothe them but will do them no good. I think it is proper that the name should be retained.

Mr. REID: The explanatory note states that the purpose of this bill is to bring these two acts into conformity, and that under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act certain remedies may not be sold. I should like to ask whether in the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act there is the same proviso regarding importation. We are providing here that no person or company shall import, but in looking over the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act I could see no provision regarding importation.

Mr. MacLAREN: No; that is taken care of by departmental regulation under the act. The list is the same in both acts.

Mr. HOWDEN: I should like to urge upon the minister and the department that they enforce the strictest possible measures against the sale by druggists and quacks of measures for the condition last named on the list. It is much more seriously fraught with danger than any of the other diseases mentioned, so far as I can see. The strictest possible means of enforcement should be employed to control promiscuous prescribing for this condition.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall make a note of that. As far as advertising is concerned, which is the principal danger, it is being carefully watched.

Schedule A agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: I have been asked to move:

That the following be added to the said bill as section 5:—

"This act shall come into force on the first day of January, 1935."

Mr. MacLAREN: The reason is obvious; it is to meet the convenience of people and allow them to get rid of stock and all that.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported; amendments read the first and second time and concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. NEILL: No, next sitting of the house. There is an important amendment and we have not yet seen it in print.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 53, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

On section 1—Tentative standard samples of western grain.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As I have a few remarks to make perhaps I may as well make them at this stage. When the committee on agriculture and colonization completed its labours a statement was apparently given to the press indicating that the decision arrived at had been unanimous. That is not quite correct. I know I was agreeable to doing almost anything for the present in the way of getting rid of this question that would improve the situation and improve the bill that the minister had introduced. It had been a source of controversy at home and abroad for the last four years or more. The alternative to doing what we did was to keep up the controversy, and that did not seem to be advisable or in anyone's interest, particularly the interest of the wheat growers of the west. To that extent I was agreeable to the amendments made to the amended bill. The controversy that I refer to was carried on by a number of gentlemen who I think should have known a lot better. One of them was Mr. Short, president of the Canadian Millers' Association, and the other two were Doctor Tory and Doctor Newton. The first remark I would make with regard to the evidence and to the change in the amended bill is that the minister did not carry out the recommendations of his board of grain commissioners in bringing the bill before the house at all, because we find on page 6 of the last report of the board of grain commissioners that the following report was made to the minister by the board on the 8th of January, 1934:

> Amendments to the Canada Grain Act
> The board has continued to investigate the effect of allowing garnet wheat to be placed in No. 2 Manitoba northern wheat. We are substantially in agreement that garnet wheat should be given an independent classification, but in view of the present low price of wheat and the difficulties of the wheat producer, we are of the opinion that it might not be advisable to proceed with changes in the classification at the present session.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

That is a very concise and understandable recommendation, but the minister proceeded to disobey it and to introduce the amendments to the Canada Grain Act now before us. It was not made apparent at any of the meetings of the committee by any of the witnesses as to just why the minister departed from the recommendations of his advisers, the board of grain commissioners, who are recognized not only as capable but very honourable men who have the whole grain trade at their finger tips. An attempt was made to some extent by the two gentlemen themselves to show why they had changed their minds, though they did not exactly say they had done so. The evidence they produced to warrant a change, however, was very slim indeed.

If the minister was not governed by the advice of the board—as certainly he was not—on whose advice did he act, I wonder? In the Montreal Gazette of March 6 I find an interview given by Mr. Short, the gentleman to whom I have referred. I believe he is reported too fully for me to read the whole interview, but apparently he took a flying trip to Vancouver before he went to Montreal. I have no doubt he went there on business, but so far as the public were concerned his chief business was to carry on propaganda against garnet wheat. I believe we had one complaint about garnet wheat from Vancouver, from the harbour board or someone in that vicinity. Then, as Mr. Short travelled eastward via Calgary, on the Canadian Pacific railway, further convenient and illuminating interviews were given, all derogatory to garnet wheat. He represented the poor downtrodden wheat growers of the south as carrying the northern growers on their backs. As he came on to Regina he emitted more of these interviews, equally damaging to garnet wheat and equally straining the truth and drawing a mighty long bow. He reached Winnipeg and there were more interviews, and I have before me his final peroration on the dangers of garnet wheat:

> The over-all average quality of Canadian wheat is materially reduced by the lower grades from the northern areas, which primarily result from the variety of lesser quality and earlier ripening wheats sown, noteably garnet.
> A recent article by James McLeash in the Winnipeg Free Press, said Mr. Short, sounds a timely note of warning to Canada in pointing out the steadily developing aggressive agricultural policy of the Argentinian government.

The Argentine government clearly foresees the imperative need of quality standard as a prime essential to successful wheat marketing in the future, and is bending every effort to raise the standard of the crop by the elimination of various varieties of wheat which affect adversely the general average standard.

"There is no doubt," he continued, "that the method of grading in Canada in the recent years, which has developed through the varieties of lesser quality wheats grown, notably the northern areas, has reduced materially the margin of superiority which characterized Canadian wheat compared with other wheats.

Incidentally I may say that is not correct.

Unless some steps are taken to prevent the steady deterioration in the average quality of our crop, our own situation taken in conjunction with that of other countries such as the Argentine, which is improving the quality of its crop, will naturally result in narrowing the margin of superiority of the Canadian crop over its competition to an uncomfortable minimum.

That is not correct, either. I would not like to say how many miles it is from being correct.

It is surely axiomatic that a price premium can be maintained only in strict relation to quality superiority. It is well within the realms of probability that the slow movement of this year's crop in no small measure involves the question of relative quality in respect to relative price. It is a fact that at the present time there are several millions of No. 2 northern wheat at the Pacific coast for which it is extremely difficult to find buyers because of the heavy admixture of the inferior northern grades.

There was no such evidence as that given; the contrary was the case. There was no congestion of No. 2 that could not find buyers. One gentleman said there was, but two or three others challenged the statement.

A definite and aggressive wheat policy is urgently needed, not as a party platform and, in consequence, a political football, but as a national program.

The light is not as good for reading as I would like to have it, but Mr. Short continues on that line, getting worse as he goes on. That interview was given on March 6 and the bill was placed on the order paper on April 9 or 10, just long enough afterwards for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to have the thought put into his mind by Mr. Short expressed in the form of a bill. The fact that these two events occurred so closely to each other is not proof positive that one was the cause of the other, but at all events we have seen that the minister has not followed the advice of his advisers, his own board of grain commissioners, while he had an opportunity at least of following this other advice. I do not know whether there was some additional advice from some other source than Mr. Short; all I do know is that the minister did not follow the advice of his very competent board of grain commissioners.

Well, I do not know what they are there for unless it is for that purpose. When that board was appointed in 1929 we thought our problems were over with regard to the Grain Act; we thought we would not need any more commissions, because we had a competent board of practical men who would be able to keep the ministry, whoever they were, in pretty close touch with the requirements of the country in this important respect. I have one or two notes before me. They are not very long, but I should like to point out that we have made the change in the amended act to mean that it was not to go to the standards board to be bandied about a third time by that institution, but that the government was to take the responsibility as they are now doing of grading garnet wheat along the line of statutory grades, and giving it the same status as the other statutory grades, namely No. 1 northern and No. 2 northern. There is a vast difference between that procedure and sending it back once more to the standards board, a body which had already tried the case and adjudicated upon it, once ex parte and a second time with Doctor Newman in attendance to tell his side of the story. The minister had the remarkable audacity after those two experiences to ask this House of Commons to refer this knotty question back a third time to the standards board, thereby escaping the responsibility himself of making the change. The committee thought otherwise, and this amended bill is the result. But in order to avoid further propaganda by these experts in the propaganda and plagiaristic line to whom I have referred—I have named the three gentlemen—I do not know what assurances we are going to have that as soon as this bill has passed further propaganda will not be set up by Mr. Short and others to drive garnet out of No. 3 northern. According to the recommendation of the committee there will be No. 1 C.W. garnet, No. 2 C.W. garnet, and the lower grades will come in their respective regular grades. There is nothing to hinder Mr. Short from waking up some morning with the determination to drive garnet off the map and out of the country, and to start up another hallabaloo. He knows how to do it. I feel like taking my hat off to any person who does a thing well, even if I do not approve of it. I must say I have never seen a more successful propagandist than

Mr. Short, unless it be Doctor Tory and his satellitic colleague, the other gentleman to whom I referred.

So it would seem that we are not altogether out of the woods, unless the minister can do something with two of these gentlemen who are officials of his and servants of the crown. In many respects they are very good servants but they have a mania for promotion, propaganda and limelight. I suppose that is a prevalent disease. It seems to me that sometimes it is quite contagious, and we have to take great care lest we contract it ourselves. I will say this, that if the action of the government and of the committee results in driving garnet out of the country—and I anticipate it will; I have never had any illusions about that—then a great wrong will have been done our prairie northern hinterlands and its people. No wheat has yet been found which was graded outside of the regular Manitoba grades and lived more than three or four years afterwards. That is a serious contemplation. One gentleman has been knighted—I refer to Sir Charles Saunders—for establishing and setting up garnet along with three other varieties of wheat. Is someone going to qualify for knighthood by killing it?

Mr. STEVENS: He did not set up garnet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I beg the minister's pardon; that is the claim.

Mr. STEVENS: No, he did not set up garnet. He discovered it, put it on the shelf, but did not issue it. When his successor came in and found the wheat, he issued it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is exactly where Sir Charles Saunders found marquis.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but he did not issue it, and my hon. friend knows that very well.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know more about the whole thing than my hon. friend does.

Mr. STEVENS: I know that, too.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The whole question was discussed in the newspapers on the day Sir Charles was knighted. He was given credit for establishing marquis, ruby, reward and garnet wheats.

Mr. STEVENS: He never issued garnet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is there.

Mr. STEVENS: On the shelf.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is exactly where he found marquis—on the shelf.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He cannot claim both ends of the deal.

Mr. STEVENS: No, his successor found it on the shelf.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is a continuity about all this cereal research work ever since the late Doctor William Saunders came to Canada. He was the originator of all this breeding and development of Canadian wheat, and the real one, too. He has done a great work for Canada. At any rate, the minister should not feel snuffy about it because it may be that if he succeeds in killing this wheat which Sir Charles established or, at least, had something to do with, then there will be possibly one person knighted for establishing it and another, possibly the minister or Mr. Short, knighted for killing it. That seems to be contradictory.

I would suggest to the minister that he should bring this whole question of the recent conflict between the staff of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce to the attention of the cabinet. That was the chief reason which actuated the efforts and decision of the committee, namely to put a stop to the everlasting bickering between the officers of those departments, not to mention their respective ministers, to the discredit of the government and the discredit of us all. They are all good men, but what can we expect when we have a hydra-headed department of agriculture presided over by two ministers? You cannot expect anything else; so long as there are two capable and strong minded men you are bound to have not only friction between them but friction between their respective staffs. If the government wish to follow up some of their reforms, and especially the reforms in connection with price spreads, mass buying and business ethics, they might very well consider the ethics of the departments of Agriculture and Trade and Commerce, and the conflict going on between those departments, one which has not been engendered by themselves alone, because it is a legacy handed down for the last thirty years. As a matter of fact, for the last fifty years the Department of Agriculture has been presided over by two heads. For thirty years it has been controlled by the ministers of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce, and for the preceding twenty years the Minister of Inland Revenue had a hand in it. As a matter of fact, it was the Minister of Inland Revenue who in the first instance introduced and sponsored the Grain Act in the House of Commons. That was the department which had to do with tobacco, whisky and so on. So that in Ottawa for many years the Department of Agriculture was just a minus factor in this respect in this social and political centre of Ottawa, and that is where it stayed during all those years. I believe, Mr. Chairman, if we are to cure the present difficulty and avoid similar difficulties in the future, the sooner we get all of agriculture under the Minister of Agriculture, the better it will be. I do not know of any country in the world, and particularly other countries on this continent—and they would be more comparable, particularly the United States—where there are two heads to the Department of Agriculture. I will say that that condition is not the fault of the minister, and I will say further that neither he nor the Minister of Agriculture is in a position to agitate for a change, because they would be open to the charge of having created a commotion within the ranks of the cabinet. That is why, being outside of the cabinet, I take this opportunity to make the suggestion, a suggestion which I hope will not be unpleasant or unwelcome to the government.

I should be surprised if the government were not aware of the fact that this embarrassing situation should continue for as short a time as possible. Such a condition does not promote good results, but develops the opposite. We know about the flair that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has developed for agriculture. We know about his little venture in connection with the Yorkshire geldings, for instance. We hear about his other venture when he took a shot at a bunch of dairy cows, and conceived the idea that it would be a good idea to send them to Australia. We hear about the Percheron mares, and about his raising Ned all around. These are substantial reports which come to me and seem almost as authentic as the famous "Yorkshire geldings."

If the Prime Minister were here I would ask him to suppress this state of affairs in the interests of agriculture. This is not the first time that we have had bickerings and backbiting at the heads of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. I will ask you, Mr. Chairman, if there would have been any trouble about garnet wheat if there had been only one head. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) has been opposed to these changes all along, and no wonder because about two-thirds of his constituents are garnet growers, so you can quite understand his anxiety about the matter. It is very creditable to him: for the sake of seeming harmony he and his staff decided to compose their differences with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his staff by adopting this bill as a substitute for the other one which the Minister of Trade and Commerce brought down. The Minister of Trade and Commerce looks half cross at me, but if he wants to say anything he will have lots of chances after I am through. But those are the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, under which I at all events would agree to anything almost for the present rather than have constant haggling and scrapping between the ministers, both of whom are no doubt trying to do their duty in their respective spheres, with their staffs also doing their duty in their spheres. This condition of affairs, where there is constant haggling and scrapping, should not be tolerated for one minute longer than it is necessary to change it.

I have nothing to add further if the bill is as it left the committee, and I presume it is. There is a chart here that would be very useful if the minister distributed it. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, how we are going to deal with this bill properly unless it is reprinted. This chart that I have here shows the grades, and if there are no other charts for distribution I should be glad to pass this around.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Mr. MOTHEWELL: Are these charts showing the grades attached to the bill, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): They are attached to the bill.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 9.40 p.m.

Monday, June 18, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1934-35

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1935, was presented by Right Hon. Sir George Perley, read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

RUSSIAN GASOLINE

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is it true that a ship containing a cargo of Russian gasoline is moored in Montreal harbour at the present time?
2. Is it true that the parties in charge of such ship are offering such gasoline at 7 cents per gallon?
3. Is it true that the authorities are delaying the unloading of such cargo, and what reasons are advanced for the delay in unloading?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

1. Not so far as known to Department of National Revenue.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

PRICE SPREADS

Mr. SEGUIN:

In view of the revelations arising out of the "Stevens" inquiry with respect to the enormous profits which certain companies have made as a result of their dealings with the tobacco growers, shall the government put a stop to such a state of affairs, in the interests of the grower and the consumer?

Mr. BENNETT: I should think this question should be stricken out. No report has been made, and the matter is still before the committee.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MINGAN INDIAN RESERVE

Mr. VENIOT (for Mr. Casgrain):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, letters, and other documents exchanged between the Department of Indian Affairs and all persons in the province of Quebec, with respect to the administration of the Indian reservation at Mingan and the Indian superintendent in that locality, since the year 1930 to date.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—LAKE ST. JOHN

Mr. DUGUAY:

For a copy of the schedules of works approved by the federal government under the Relief Act, 1933, for the county of Lake St. John, showing the dates on which such schedules were received and approved, the accounts received with respect to each schedule, the dates on which such accounts were received and the dates on which payment of same were made to the province.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Justice when the house may expect to have English and French copies of the Franchise bill?

[The Chairman.]

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I have a copy of it; it is down now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has not been distributed. I understand the copy has come only in English.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The French copy is here, too.

Mr. NEILL: I inquired a couple of hours ago, and was told that the English copies would not be ready until to-morrow morning.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I got my information from the clerk only a few moments ago stating that they were available now.

DOMINION COMPANIES ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 64, respecting dominion companies.

Mr. CAHAN: I move that these amendments be concurred in, and at the same time I wish to add that if after I have given an explanation hon. gentlemen wish to discuss these amendments in detail I shall ask leave to withdraw my motion and move the house into committee. The bill has been carefully considered by the select standing committee of the Senate on banking and commerce. For three days I attended the meetings of that committee. The changes which have been suggested do not change the purpose or intent of the provisions of the bill, but after careful consideration of the bill and of suggestions which were made to the committee by correspondence and otherwise certain valuable amendments have been proposed and unanimously adopted by the Senate. I would refer hon. members to item No. 21 appearing in the notice printed in the votes and proceedings of Friday, June 15, where the suggestion is made to strike out on page 36 line 32 of the bill, the words "knowingly and wilfully." That is an error either in printing or transcribing. The amendment made by the Senate was to strike out the two words "knowingly and." We had made a similar deletion in another section, and the Senate thought that this section ought to conform to our previous amendment.

The main amendment, however, appears at page 430 of the votes and proceedings. The bill prescribes heavy penalties, heavier than have heretofore been imposed in any companies act in Canada, and, after consideration of the whole bill, the Senate thought the bill should be amended to conform to the provisions of section 372 of the English Companies Act of 1929. For that reason they proposed and adopted an amendment to this bill in conformity with and following verbatim this section 372 in the English Companies Act. The new section as amended will read as follows:

"207. (1) The persons to whom this section applies are directors of a company or corporation; managers of a company or corporation; officers of a company or corporation; persons employed by a company or corporation as auditors whether they are or are not officers of the company or corporation.

(2) If in any proceeding for breach of or non-compliance with any of the provisions of this act or breach of or non-compliance with any of the provisions of the letters patent, supplementary letters patent, special act, or by-laws of a company or corporation, against a person to whom this section applies, it appears to the court hearing the case that that person is or may be liable in respect of such breach or non-compliance, but that he has acted honestly and reasonably, and that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including those connected with his appointment, he ought fairly to be excused for such breach or non-compliance, that court may relieve him, either wholly or partly, from his liability on such terms as the court may think fit.

(4) Where any case to which subsection two of this section applies is being tried by a judge with a jury, the judge, after hearing the evidence, may, if he is satisfied that the defendant ought in pursuance of that subsection to be relieved either in whole or in part from the liability sought to be enforced against him, withdraw the case in whole or in part from the jury and forthwith direct judgment to be entered for the defendant on such terms as to costs or otherwise as the judge may think proper."

The commission which had under review the English Companies Act thought that in view of the heavy penalties there imposed a certain discretion should be given to the court trying an offence in respect of which these heavy penalties were imposed, so that if such alleged offender had acted honestly and reasonably and if having regard to all the circumstances of the case he ought fairly to be excused for such breach or non-compliance, the court may relieve him either wholly or partly from his liability on such terms as the court may think fit. The Senate were unanimous in support of that provision. Personally I think that under the circumstances it is just and should be accepted. That is the only material change which, through Senate amendments, has been made to the bill. I move that the amendments be concurred in.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister indicate again the section from which the words "knowingly and" have been struck out?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, I would refer the hon. member to page 36, line 30 of the bill. The hon. member will recall that the committee of the whole in this House of Commons struck out those words in a similar section. Subsection 2 now reads:

If any director, manager, or other officer of the company knowingly and wilfully authorizes ...

And so on. The words "knowingly and" were struck out because the word "wilfully" implies knowledge. The Senate thought this section should conform to the section with which we dealt previously.

Mr. RALSTON: The other section is No. 67, I believe?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, I think that is true; it is to effect conformity with section 67 and with section 72.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

FARMERS'-CREDITORS' ACT

The house resumed from Monday, June 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 92, to facilitate compromises and arrangements between farmers and their creditors—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, subsection 3 of section 2 stood. There was an amendment to add the words, "if so determined by the court," so that it would not follow as a matter of course that failure on the part of the farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal would be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy, but that it should be determined by the court. I think the amendment has been put through.

Mr. COOTE: Will you please read the amendment, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The amendment was carried, as I understand it, the other day. The amendment that has just been handed to me is the same. It is that subsection 3 of section 2 be amended by adding at the end thereof the words, "if so determined by the court."

Mr. COOTE: I really feel that the section ought to be amended by striking out subsection 3. I do not know whether the Prime Minister would consider doing that, but I think that is really the way the section should be amended. If subsection 3 is to remain in the section, I doubt whether the amendment moved by the Prime Minister is definite enough. I do not think there is anything in the act to guide the judge as to the basis on which he shall make his decision as to whether the farmer shall come under Part I of the Bankruptcy Act if he fails to meet any of his liabilities. Once any farmer makes a proposal for the composition or arrangement of his debts he will very likely be compelled to go through with it, and if the arrangement that he suggests is not acceptable to any of his creditors any one of them can have the matter referred to the provincial board of review. On this board there is to be a judge, a representative of the debtors, and a representative of the creditors. There is no doubt at all as to the view which the representative of the creditors will take in almost every case. I think we can take it for granted that the representative of the creditors will naturally seek to have the farmer bound to pay under the arrangement the very maximum which he thinks it is possible to get. It is very difficult indeed to get a person to represent the debtor's viewpoint as faithfully as the representative of the creditors will represent their viewpoint. We know that from experience.

Mr. BOWMAN: Why should that be so?

Mr. COOTE: That has been our experience in the past. The debtor's representative looks at it more in a disinterested way. That has been our experience. I have seen men on the debt adjustment board who it seemed to me in some cases were inclined to favour the creditors' case more than the debtor's; at least they would lean that way. The judge, I think, in most cases is apt to adopt a legal or technical attitude and to be bound by the law. I do not think a judge's experience particularly fits him as a rule, for seeing all the difficulties from the debtor's point of view. The debtor will not be present personally, I take it, before the board of review. Any such arrangement can be brought before the provincial board of review and once the board of review has given its decision the act says that there is to be no appeal from it, and the farmer is bound to sign any documents or papers which may be drawn up in connection with carrying out the arrangement which has been determined by the provincial board. That being the case I think we should be very careful to safeguard subsection 3. It reads now:

In any case where the affairs of a farmer have been arranged by a proposal approved by the court or confirmed by the board—

That is the board of review:

—Part I of the Bankruptcy Act shall, notwithstanding section 7 thereof thereafter apply to such farmer and failure on the part of such farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy.

The farmer for the rest of the time that he continues to farm, and it may be all his life, will be in a different position with regard to bankruptcy, from any man who has not had such an arrangement of his affairs. The very first year after the arrangement he might have a crop failure; there might be a drought, or the man might be sick and be unable to work his farm, and then immediately he comes under Part I of the Bankruptcy Act if so determined by the court. That is, his failure to carry out the terms of the agreement will be an act of bankruptcy, if so determined by the court. Even under the best of circumstances it seems to me that if this is to be determined by the court there should be some basis laid down to guide the court so that it would know on what principle to base its decision.

First of all I would like the Prime Minister to consider striking out subsection 3. I cannot see that striking it out would weaken the act in any way. I do not think it would affect the farmer's liability to pay his debts for he would be in the same position as any other farmer who could be compelled to pay his debts. But if there is a good reason for exempting farmers in general from Part I of the Bankruptcy Act, I do not think that failure to meet any of his obligations under this arrangement should immediately make that farmer subject to the terms of Part I of the Bankruptcy Act.

If the Prime Minister will not agree to striking out subsection 3 I suggest that he might enlarge the amendment he has proposed, to read something like this:

Provided that such failure was not caused by crop conditions or depressed prices or, without being restricted by the foregoing, by other causes over which the debtor had no control.

If those words were added to the subsection it would be a guarantee to the house that the farmer would not be forced under part 1 of the Bankruptcy Act through, as I have said, a crop failure, depressed prices or other conditions over which he had absolutely no control. If it is the purpose of this bill to keep a farmer on his farm, I think we should either strike out this subsection or amend it as I have suggested. I should like to know if the Prime Minister would not consider changing subsection 3 in the manner I have suggested.

Mr. BENNETT: The basis of this legislation would be destroyed if that subsection were taken away. Section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act exempts a farmer from its provisions; this bill gives him the benefit of those provisions without assigning or without being adjudicated a bankrupt. Having secured an arrangement and an extension having been agreed upon or settled by the court of review, if there is nothing in the provisions to indicate that failure to observe the arrangement made shall constitute an act of bankruptcy, then the whole basis of the legislation disappears. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot have the benefit of the Bankruptcy Act under our jurisdiction to deal with property and civil rights without having a corresponding obligation that the failure to maintain the agreement arrived at shall constitute an act of bankruptcy. I was impressed with what was said the other day by the hon. gentleman opposite and to my right and realized that it was perfectly sound to provide that crop failures, climatic conditions and depressed prices should be factors to enter into the determination by someone as to whether the default is excusable or inexcusable. If excusable, then it does not constitute an act of bankruptcy; if inexcusable, it can be determined only by a judge in any event. I am sorry to say to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) that that is as far as I can go and still maintain the jurisdiction of this parliament to deal with contracts, property and civil rights and questions of arrangements made between creditors and debtors.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to know where there is anything in the bill to indicate to the judge whether he should determine that a man should come under Part I and whether his failure should be deemed an act of bankruptcy. We have the Prime Minister's (Mr. Bennett) statement, but as far as I can see there is nothing in the bill to indicate to the judge that that is the intention of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not desire to prolong the discussion unduly but I endeavoured the other day to point out to the committee that Part I of the Bankruptcy Act deals with bankruptcy and receiving orders. Section 3 gives a long list of what constitutes acts of bankruptcy. The judge, in determining whether or not he should adjudicate a defaulting party to this agreement as a bankrupt, would consider the whole condition of the applicant or the insolvent. The fact is that in every one of these cases that will have to be dealt with an act of bankruptcy has been committed, otherwise this would not apply. He is now getting away from the results of that act by availing himself of the provisions of this bill. If a judge so determines that he shall be given a second chance, the inevitable result follows only when that determination has been made by a judge.

Mr. REID: When a farmer makes a composition under this bill and endeavours to set himself up again to continue his life on the farm, he would probably apply to the farm loan board. I was wondering what would happen in those provinces where there is no farm loan board. Would a man in that case be able to come under the provisions of Bill No. 92?

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly would come under the provisions of Bill No. 92 but his ability to secure money would depend upon the provincial body which was functioning instead of the dominion body in that particular province. That would be a matter between the farmer and the provincial body because the farm loan board would not be transacting business in that particular province. Judging by what has been said in some communities, it is not improbable that he would be able to secure more generous terms from the provincial body than he would from the dominion board, although I am not expressing an opinion in that connection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like the Prime Minister to make something a little more plain to me. I should like to know what will be the effect of the amendment and how the section will read when the amendment is incorporated.

Mr. BENNETT: This bill is based upon the assumption that without assigning or being adjudicated a bankrupt a farmer unable to pay his debts may avail himself of what I would call the general provisions of bankruptcy, that is, arrive at an arrangement with his creditors by which they would not be able to proceed against him during the life time of the agreement or while its provisions were being met. On the other hand, he will be enabled to keep himself free, shall I say, from suit by having execution issued against him or anything of that sort. The act as it reads provides that in the event of his failure to discharge his obligations under the compromise agreement, by reason of that fact he would be a bankrupt and the provisions of Part I of the Bankruptcy Act would apply to him, even though he were a farmer. Objection was taken to that the other day and it was pointed out that great hardship might be worked in the event of climatic conditions preventing a farmer from reaping a harvest or depressed prices preventing him from making a profit. I suggested that we add to the subsection such words as would prevent him from being ipso facto a bankrupt. He could be adjudged a bankrupt for failure to discharge his obligations under the compromise agreement only if the court so determined. In other words, default on his part to carry out the compromise agreement should not in itself render him a bankrupt; a judge would have so to determine before he would be a bankrupt in law and in fact. Having endeavoured to enable the farmer to secure the benefits of the Bankruptcy Act by interfering through legislation with contractual obligations, with property and civil rights, the basis of this legislation is that it shall not be a permanent incentive to him to escape the discharge of the obligation which he has thus undertaken, but rather that his ability to do so shall constitute an act of bankruptcy. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, thank you.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think that the amendment which is suggested accomplishes the purpose which the Prime Minister has in mind. The section states that if a man has entered into an arrangement with his creditors and has undertaken certain obligations as part of that arrangement, he will then be subject to Part I of the Bankruptcy Act. It is not his failure which subjects him to Part I of the Bankruptcy Act but the fact that he has made a proposal. It then goes on to state that the failure of the debtor to carry out the proposal shall be deemed an act of bankruptcy. The Prime Minister suggests adding the words, "when so determined by the court." Now I submit that those words do not add anything at all to the section, because Part I provides for acts of bankruptcy being taken into consideration by the court, and you always have to have the court determine whether an act of bankruptcy has been committed. I think therefore that the section as it reads now, and even with the Prime Minister's amendment, will mean that a man who has entered into a proposal and undertaken certain obligations becomes liable under Part I of the Bankruptcy Act, and that provides that certain things are acts of bankruptcy and involve the determination of the quality of those acts by the court itself. So I submit that adding the words "when so determined by the court" does not get us further along the road which the Prime Minister desires to travel.

The other point I want to make is this. I doubt whether after all this is beneficial to the persons for whose benefit the act is being passed, even if the Prime Minister went further and made it clear in his amendment that the failure of the debtor to carry out one of the terms of the proposal should not be deemed an act of bankruptcy unless the court, in the exercise of special discretion, so decided. It seems to me that the insertion of words making it clear that the failure to carry out the proposal is not necessarily an act of bankruptcy will make creditors that much more reluctant to afford credit to the farmer. They will say, "What happens is this. We give credit to the farmer. We know there is an act in force which permits of compromise but we know further that even after he has agreed to the terms, or after the board of review has ordered that it shall be effective, the farmer has no incentive to carry it out, because even if he does not carry it out his failure may not be deemed an act of bankruptcy." I question therefore whether, in the interests of the class whom we are trying to benefit, the insertion of some clause negativing the idea that failure to carry out the obligation is an act of bankruptcy will be useful and beneficial to those for whom its remedial provisions are intended.

Mr. BENNETT: As to the first point made by the hon. gentleman, he will realize that it is absolutely essential that in some way the jurisdiction of this parliament be established. We are now dealing with a farmer who has not assigned and who has not made any application, nor has anyone else made any application, to have him adjudicated a bankrupt. How does the jurisdiction of this parliament arise? We have exclusive jurisdiction over bankruptcy, the provinces over all matters that affect his ordinary life—buying credit and matters of that sort. We say that once he makes an agreement we will give it the authority of this Bankruptcy Act in order that, with the blessing of this act, our jurisdiction may be clear. In any case where the affairs of the farmer have been arranged by a proposal approved by the court or confirmed by the board as hereinafter provided, Part I of the Bankruptcy Act shall, notwithstanding section 7 thereof, apply to such farmer. That is to say, when we have given him the benefit of the act by effecting a compromise which has been approved either by the court or by the board, he is then in fact a bankrupt who is making a distribution of his property over a term of years; that is, by making it productive to pay his debts, and therefore he is subject to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. That does not mean anything except to say that he is a bankrupt, which is the basis of his making application. But when you proceed from there on, you will see the reason why the objections made by those opposite and to my right have some force. We get the act applied notwithstanding section 7. Now section 7 is of course well known to all members of the committee. It says that:

> The provisions of this part shall not apply to wage earners or to persons engaged solely in farming or the tillage of the soil.

So that the farmer cannot under any circumstances, under section 7, be made a bankrupt. That is clear law. Under these circumstances, how are we to arrange for a compromise for him? It is perfectly obvious that, at common law, unless everyone agrees, anyone may maintain an action and secure execution against him, because there is no such thing as a majority ruling with respect to the determination of extension of time or deed of composition. How will you make it apply? There is only one way, and that is to use the Bankruptcy Act, over which this parliament has exclusive jurisdiction; and the only way to do it is to bring the farmer within its powers. But you do not bring the farmer within its powers, to enable him to be convenienced by it, unless the arrangement he proposes, which he has agreed to or which has been approved, falls down. That is the reason the words are there. First we have a proposal and an acceptance, and approval (a) by the court, or (b) by the board of review. That means a compromise which at common law would not be effective for the reason we all know as lawyers; unless everyone agrees there can be no such thing as compromise between debtor and creditor. Then we save him by saying that that makes the provisions of Part I, to which I have referred, applicable to him. The long list of acts that constitute acts of bankruptcy as against him do not apply under section 7, but we bring him under the provisions of Part I, for the reasons I have indicated, and then say that failure on the part of such farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy. To limit the harsh operation of that, the suggestions made the other day, it seems to me, are sound, and therefore we add "if so determined by the court." That is, an act of bankruptcy shall not be an act of bankruptcy unless so determined by the court. The hon. gentleman as a lawyer knows, perhaps better than I do, how difficult it is to deal with this problem—that is, to afford an opportunity for a compromise, to afford an opportunity for agreement for a compromise, that does not involve agreement on the part of the creditors, which is the common law rule and can be made effective only by the Bankruptcy Act. The farmer heretofore has not been a part of it. He now comes into it, but he comes into it only after his compromise has been approved by the court or by the board of review.

That is the reason why this matter, which is the very foundation of this jurisdiction, is not easy; and if the hon. gentleman has any suggestions to make which will meet that situation any more effectively than it is met here, I shall certainly be glad to consider them, because this is a matter that has given us, naturally, a great deal of worry. I do not like to repeat myself so often, but I cannot reiterate too strongly that this is the difficulty: on the one hand, no compromise at common law is possible unless everyone agrees; and on the other hand bankruptcy contemplates a compromise, a distribution of the property of the insolvent among his creditors. Having arrived at a conclusion and brought them all together, where the court approves, if it is a majority agreement, or where the board of review approves, we say, "You are now under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act," and then follows this statement. But he cannot, for ten or twenty years, keep on laughing at his creditors. We know there are difficulties, and we desire to meet the views as expressed and to make the court the tribunal to determine whether or not what has been done in the way of default constitutes an act of bankruptcy. If it were entirely free from difficulty, I certainly would not have had the paragraph which we have here; but in order to give the farmer the benefits of the Bankruptcy Act, without subjecting him to bankruptcy in the first instance, to enable him to overcome the common law by compromise through the method I have suggested, we have drafted this section.

Mr. RALSTON: My thought was that clause 2, subclause 3 was put there for the purpose not of getting jurisdiction over the subject matter but of providing some sort of incentive to the farmer who had once made a compromise indicating to him he could not do this again and that after he had made his compromise he had to live up to it or be subject to the provisions of the bankruptcy act.

Mr. BENNETT: That is partly true.

Mr. RALSTON: That is why it seems to me, if that was the only purpose of subclause 3, it goes further than the Prime Minister intended. The clause brings the farmer under the Bankruptcy Act for the purpose not only of defining what shall be an act of bankruptcy but of giving a creditor the right to apply for a receiving order in view of the fact the farmer has not paid his bills, one of them being the undertaking he has entered into under the proposal. I thought the jurisdiction was covered by clause 6 which says that a farmer who is unable to meet his liabilities as they become due may do so and so. That, it seems to me, was the well known definition and test whether a man was bankrupt: If you found a man in that condition, parliament had jurisdiction by reason of the fact he was not able to meet his liabilities as they became due.

Mr. BENNETT: But the Bankruptcy Act does not apply to him—my hon. friend has put his finger on the point—until the compromise arrangement is completed and approved either by the court or the board. That is the whole point.

Mr. RALSTON: I understood clause 6 was the operative clause which provided that a farmer who was not able to meet his liabilities as they become due might make a proposal for a composition—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: —that the Bankruptcy Act does apply—

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. RALSTON: —only to such a man and that the act was made applicable by reason of clause 6. Subclause 3 of clause 2 was inserted, as I thought, for a totally different purpose. That is why I pointed out that that subclause had gone much further than the Prime Minister intended and that was the reason he was putting the rider on so that it would read:

> Failure on the part of such farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy—

And then the addition:

> —if so determined by the court.

I still think the addition of those words does not affect the purpose which the Prime Minister has in mind because it seems to me Part I of the act cannot apply unless there is a determination by the court; that is to say, the act of bankruptcy is proved to the court and the court decides whether it is an act of bankruptcy. The subclause says that failure on the part of the farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy, with the addition by the Prime Minister of the words "if so determined by the court," but I think he would have to go further and say that notwithstanding there was failure on the part of the farmer it should not be deemed an act of bankruptcy unless the court, taking into consideration all the facts and circumstances and working on an entirely different principle from that on which a judge in bankruptcy generally works, decided it was an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the event of the secured creditors being willing to give an extension of time to the debtor can any non-secured creditors press the farmer into a position he does not want to attain, for instance, into bankruptcy? In other words, can a non-secured creditor press a farmer into bankruptcy even though the secured creditors are willing to negotiate with him?

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid I have failed to make myself clear to this committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, the matter is pretty complicated to a layman.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree with that. If the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth is unable to follow me I would not expect a layman to do so, and I attribute the failure to myself and not to others.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: First may I point out that the foundation of this whole matter lies in the fact that by common law there can be no compromise by a debtor with his creditors unless all his creditors are agreed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Secured and unsecured?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, secured and unsecured. I should like to make that proposition so clear to the committee there can be no doubt about it; in other words, if ninety-nine per cent of a debtor's creditors agree to a compromise, that does not effect a compromise and the remaining one per cent may bring an action, secure judgment and issue execution. That is point number one. Number two is that under the law as it now stands farmers are not under section 7 subject to Part I of the Bankruptcy Act. Number three is that this bill endeavours to meet the situation without putting the farmer into bankruptcy in the first instance and uses the machinery and power of parliament under its exclusive jurisdiction over bankruptcy to assist in making effective a compromise in which all the creditors do not join and need not join because of the character of the proceeding. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth is quite right in saying that clause 6 says what might be done; that is, when the farmer is not in a position to pay his debts and desires to make a compromise, his creditors are convened and they put forward a scheme of settlement or compromise.

Mr. RALSTON: Without bankruptcy.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is the point I am trying to make. That compromise would under the common law have no value in the world as being effective among the creditors and clause 2 is the one where we have to provide the jurisdiction required. Even at the risk of wearying the committee I should like to read this. Clause 2, subclause 2 reads:

> Unless it is otherwise provided or the context otherwise requires, expressions contained in this act shall have the same meaning as in the Bankruptcy Act, and this act shall be read and construed as one with the Bankruptcy Act, but shall have full force and effect notwithstanding anything contained in the Bankruptcy Act, and the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act and bankruptcy rules shall, except as in this act otherwise provided, apply mutatis mutandis in the case of proceedings hereunder including meetings of creditors.

I can quite understand the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth assuming that subclause 3 was being used for the purpose he suggests, but I want him to study it for a moment. It reads:

> In any case where the affairs of a farmer have been arranged—

That is the operative word there.

> —by a proposal approved by the court or confirmed by the board as hereinafter provided—

It is quite clear that unless we bring that within the Bankruptcy Act, the common law prevails and the compromise has no value.

Mr. RALSTON: I go back to clause 6.

Mr. BENNETT: But clause 6 has no reference to the Bankruptcy Act; it only enables the conference to take place.

Mr. RALSTON: It has reference to the state of bankruptcy.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, what by law is one of the states of bankruptcy. After the proposal has been made and approved by the court or board, we have to have something to give authority and power to that settlement to make it legal as against the common law that there can be no compromise. Therefore we say that the provisions of Part I apply and section 7 is no longer operative. The farmer's failure to discharge his obligations under that compromise agreement might continue for a very long time; it might continue without any action being taken, but the suggestion was made the other day of safeguarding this in some way and so we say that that shall not constitute an act of bankruptcy unless so determined by the court.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Supposing a farmer has obligations to meet and he can meet them only in part; can the mortgagee or the people to whom he owes money apply under this measure to the board of review in order to bring about a compromise or composition, and if they can apply, after that application is made and the composition is brought about, does that man, although not desirous of being a bankrupt, automatically become one unless the court takes all the circumstances into review?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the case; if the hon. gentleman will look at clause 6 the situation is just the reverse: the farmer makes the proposal. Clause 6 reads:

> A farmer who is unable to meet his liabilities as they become due.

There are other provisions to which reference was made the other day, but the basis of the foundation of jurisdiction is that the farmer makes an application for a composition.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But under this act he is the only one who can make application?

Mr. BENNETT: Circumstances may arise, as we will see in the bill, in connection with difficulties and differences arising in which a creditor can make a further application, but not the original application.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then may I ask the Prime Minister this question. Under certain circumstances, as I understand the bill, the people to whom the farmer owes money can make an application, and the composition is arrived at?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: His creditors cannot apply under the act?

Mr. BENNETT: The jurisdiction rests with the farmer and not with the creditors.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The farmer has to make the first move under this bill?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: I think it is quite clear that the farmer makes the first move under this bill, but after the farmer makes his proposal eventually the provincial board has power to make an arrangement and the farmer has no option but to accept it. He must sign any papers he is ordered to sign.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then he becomes bankrupt.

Mr. COOTE: No, he does not, but he places himself in the position that if he fails to meet any of the payments which he is obliged to make, that shall be deemed an act of bankruptcy under Part I of the act. That brings me to the statement made by the Prime Minister. I think he made it very clear that the reason for putting in the words he suggested was that if the failure to meet the payments as arranged was due to crop failure or climatic conditions, then the farmer should not be considered a bankrupt, because those were conditions over which he had no control.

Mr. BENNETT: He might not be considered a bankrupt; the court would have jurisdiction.

Mr. COOTE: Those are the reasons the court would take into consideration for refusing to have him deemed a bankrupt. But if that is the reason for inserting these words I really think some suggestion to the judge should be included as well, as to why he should not determine the man to be a bankrupt. There is nothing in the act to guide the judge in refusing to give an order directing that the man is a bankrupt, and I think the amendment I have suggested should be inserted for that purpose. My amendment is that after section 3 we add the words, "provided that such failure was not caused by crop conditions or depressed prices or, without being restricted by the foregoing, by other causes over which the debtor had no control." As I understand it that would leave it to the judge in rendering a decision to say, "Parliament wishes me to be guided by the conditions laid down in the statute. Has the failure of the farmer to meet his obligations arisen through crop conditions or from other causes over which he could have absolutely no control?" In that way I think we would lay down a basis on which the judge could render a decision. It seems to me there is nothing in the act at present to suggest to the judge that if crop conditions were bad he should refuse to adjudge the man a bankrupt.

As I understand the act, and I should be glad if the Prime Minister would correct me if I am wrong, once a proposal is made the provincial board may make the final arrangement. It may be quite different from the proposal of the farmer in the first instance, but on the application of any creditor the provincial board can review the case and decide on the terms of the compromise, and the farmer must accept those terms. Of course the creditors must accept them too, but in making these adjustments no leeway seems to be left to the farmer; it is not anticipated that he will have any equity other than what he is going to pay for under the compromise. It seems to me that unless the farmer has more protection than he is given here he may say, "I might far better remain as I am and still enjoy the privilege of living in my own home, because my only reason for making this compromise would be to try to assure to myself the privilege of living here."

Mr. BENNETT: His exemption is not taken from him by bankruptcy.

Mr. COOTE: No, and his exemption cannot be taken from him by a court of law, but I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether this legislation in any way invalidates the debt adjustment legislation in the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it would not be competent for us to validate or invalidate it. May I repeat, even at the risk of being tiresome, that legislation enacted by a legislature somehow must fall within the provisions of section 92 of the British North America Act, and be exclusively within the jurisdiction of that legislature. Legislation passed by this parliament somehow must fall within the provisions of section 91, either under the specific heads enumerated or the broad general terms of peace, order and good government in Canada. If we passed an act to attempt to validate what has been done by a province it would be a contradiction in terms, for if the exclusive jurisdiction rests with the province and exclusive jurisdiction rests with parliament—there are two or three matters in which there is concurrent jurisdiction, with which I need not deal—it would follow that an attempt under our exclusive power to validate something that exclusively belonged to a province would be a contradiction in terms.

Mr. COOTE: Has the board of review power to lower the interest rate on a mortgage or other debt that now exists, which the farmer must pay for the years covered by the new agreement?

Mr. BENNETT: I should say the answer would be no; that is dealt with by section 17. My hon. friend is talking about future interest?

Mr. COOTE: Yes. The farmer now has a mortgage bearing interest at eight per cent, we will say. Under this compromise the principal of that mortgage may be reduced, but would the board have power to say that the rate of interest should be five per cent or six per cent or any rate other than that set out in the existing mortgage?

Mr. BENNETT: After the decision of the supreme court the other day it is not contemplated, except to the extent mentioned here, that they may deal with secured and unsecured creditors as well. It does not contemplate the board having power to break a contract, with the exception of the provision under section 17 dealing with the question of interest.

Mr. HANBURY: That would only apply to secured creditors or those having security; it would not necessarily apply to unsecured creditors, who might get any rate of interest or no interest whatever, as the board might decide.

Mr. BENNETT: Offhand one would say, considering the kind of cases that will have to be dealt with, that here the whole arrangement is predicated on the ability of the man to pay. There need be no plan at all. If the board concludes that the man will never pay they should not make an arrangement. This is predicated on the assumption that the man has indicated, by his past history or by his present surroundings and conditions, his ability to pay something. He makes a compromise accordingly, and from what was said the other day by the representatives of the secured creditors, I feel quite certain that in their anxiety to keep the man upon the security, upon the land, they will be most generous in their attitude towards interest rates. Many of them, as I explained to the committee the other day, have already reduced their interest rates, indicating their earnest desire to keep the farmers on the land. I suppose no one wants to keep the man on the land any more than the people who loaned the money to him; surely that would be the case. They are the people who want him to stay there. He wants to stay there, for one reason, to have a home, to make his living and to pay his debts. And they want him to stay there in order that their security may not become useless.

I say to the hon. member for Macleod that we have not undertaken, and I hope parliament will never undertake, to do what is regarded to be of the utmost danger. I will put it this way, that there are those who would say that it would be invalid for us to do it. I tried to explain that, ordinarily, parliament has jurisdiction over interest, but once a contract is made between a farmer and a loan company, or an insurance company, or his neighbour to pay a given rate of interest, that contract is then solely under the exclusive jurisdiction of the province, being a matter of property and civil rights. There are those who say notwithstanding that fact we have a right to say that although one of the terms of the contract is that he shall pay seven per cent we may say that hereafter he will pay only three per cent. But I think legal opinion is that it is not competent for us, that it is no longer a matter of interest, but that it is a matter of a contract between one citizen and another citizen or—if you wish to accept my illustration—between a citizen and a company. And there is no jurisdiction on the part of this parliament then, to interfere with such contract. We think that we have gone as far as we can in section 17. In fact, I do not know whether or not some of my legal friends think that section 17 is wholly within our powers; I think it probably is. We have gone as far as we think we can, to be certain. To suggest that this parliament can pass a statute and say that a contract between Smith and Jones by which Smith agrees to pay Jones five per cent can be changed to an agreement to pay one per cent, in the view of legal men with whom I have discussed the matter is to suggest something that is not within our power. I do not know the view held by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth but I may say that is the general view among legal friends with whom I have discussed the matter. It would be within the power of the province to do it, and, of course, it would amount to confiscation. The privy council has decided in the Florence Mining case that that is a matter within the competence of a provincial legislature. In that case the mine was taken from one person and given to another, and they were denied the privilege of going to court and issuing a statement of claim. It was held by the privy council that that was a constitutional and valid exercise of the powers of a provincial legislature. My view is that it is not competent for this parliament to interfere with property and civil rights, after a contract has been arrived at.

Mr. NEILL: Do you consider section 17 is within our power?

Mr. BENNETT: I say section 17 is, we think, within our power. We believe it is. I think section 17 is valid, because it refers only to interest and to matters arising solely out of it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My right hon. friend must think it is valid or he would not have it in the measure.

Mr. BENNETT: There are doubts. We think it is.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It may be what may be termed a line question.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: I may have misunderstood the Prime Minister, but I thought he said that this parliament had no power to change a contract. From his remarks I drew the inference that we had no power to reduce mortgage interest from eight per cent to five per cent. But I understood it was intended that under this legislation, the provincial board would have power to render a decision in regard to the composition of a farmer's debt, and one of the things it was expected they should do was to write down the capital debt, even in the case of secured creditors. I wish to have that point cleared up.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member did not misunderstand me. We have provided in section 3, the one with which we are now dealing, that under certain circumstances the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act shall apply. Last session we enacted some legislation by which we did provide for adjustments with respect to secured creditors. It was contended by very able members of the legal profession that that was beyond our competence. The supreme court unanimously decided that that was within our jurisdiction. I do not know whether the case is to be taken farther or not, but as the law now stands these provisions are predicated upon that decision. As the law now stands we have framed these provisions, and they were framed so as not to be considered in this house until after judgment was given. If the judgment had been adverse I am afraid I should have had to modify them. They do, in terms apply to secured and unsecured creditors, and if the hon. gentleman has before him the statute passed at last session he will see how far we really did go.

Mr. COOTE: If I am correctly informed, in almost all cases where reorganization might be effected under the legislation passed last year the interest on bonds and other securities would be reduced, and it seems to me they are being reduced under the authority of the legislation passed last year.

Mr. BENNETT: But they are not compulsorily being reduced. That is what I have been trying to say to the hon. gentleman.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. COOTE: The bankruptcy court has power to reduce. Not being a lawyer I may be labouring under considerable difficulties. But I should like to be clear in the matter. If we have power to legislate giving the bankruptcy court or any bankruptcy machinery the right to reduce the principal of a debt, surely we have the power to give them the right to reduce the rate of interest which is to be paid by a debtor under a new arrangement. I just wish to find out whether the provincial boards, when they made those final settlements between debtors and creditors which are binding upon all parties, have any authority or power in law to fix a lower rate of interest, which the farmer is assuming under the compromise, than was said to be payable by him under the original contract.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There is only one point with which I should like to deal. I am sure the Prime Minister will understand our position. As he said, this matter is somewhat involved. Many of us are in the unfortunate position of being laymen, and yet we will be called upon to explain all the minute details of this legislation to those people in our constituencies who may be interested. It is for that reason, among others, that we are endeavouring to ascertain an exact understanding of the legislation.

As I understand it, with respect to the provincial legislation a farmer will have the choice between remaining under the present provision for provincial debt adjustments and coming under the provision of this new federal legislation. He cannot have both. In other words, if he elects to enter into composition under the provisions of the federal legislation he thereby loses any opportunity he may have had to continue under the provincial legislation. I believe that point may have been in the mind of one of my colleagues when he suggested that this legislation would invalidate the provincial legislation. I cannot see that it would do that, but I believe it would give an alternative to the farmer. He could come in under either the provincial or the federal, but he could not come under both. Once he has come under the federal legislation he has placed himself under the terms of federal bankruptcy law, which would override any provincial legislation.

The one point, however, in which I am keenly interested, and which has been discussed at great length, is the question of protection afforded to a debtor after a composition has been entered into and after, for reasons under or beyond his control, he has failed to comply in full with those conditions.

The Prime Minister, realizing the situation, introduced an amendment to-day so far as possible to cover the point. But the difficulty I have in my mind is this: As I understand it the amendment—and I agree with the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, although it may be presumption on the part of a layman to state whether or not he agrees or disagrees—but so far as I understand the Bankruptcy Act such protection is provided under that act, itself. This goes a little farther than does the act. What I have in mind is this. It is possible, if not probable, that any court before which such a case might be brought might conceive itself bound by the statutory definitions of what constitutes insolvency, and might therefore merely determine whether or not in view of those statutory definitions the debtor was insolvent and therefore subject to Part I of the Bankruptcy Act. I was wondering whether it would be possible to enlarge the section somewhat along this line, that in its determination the court should not be bound by the statutory definitions of insolvency but should have full discretion in dealing with the matter. Otherwise it does seem to me—I speak subject to correction—that the average court would feel itself bound in such a case by the statutory definitions laid down in the Bankruptcy Act itself. That act defines what bankruptcy and insolvency is, and I think that the average judge will feel that he has no choice in the matter except to decide whether the farmer was actually insolvent according to the act itself.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman from Red Deer has put the case very clearly from his angle. I can only say to him that if he will look again at subsection 3 of this bill, and then at section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, and then at section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, he will have these matters before him. Section 7 says that a farmer shall not be subject to the Bankruptcy Act. Section 2 defines what are acts of bankruptcy. Now this statute says that in the event of a farmer failing to discharge the obligations which he has undertaken, section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act shall no longer apply to him, and failure on the part of the farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy. There has to be failure to carry out any of the terms of the proposal. It has nothing to do with section 1 or section 2 or anything else. It makes it referable only to this one single thing. He cannot be made a bankrupt under section 2 because that is precluded by section 7, but section 7 does not apply when there is failure on the part of the farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal. That is what we say in this bill, that failure to carry out any of the terms of this proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy if so determined by the court.

My hon. friend from Macleod suggests that we add words to the effect that it shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy if the farmer's failure to carry out the terms of the proposal should be caused by climatic or economic conditions. Now we have a rule of law, whether it is sound or not, and I suppose laymen will doubt its soundness, that when you mention specific things you thereby exclude the others, and it was because of that I thought it desirable to leave the matter so wide and so clear that when a judge looks at, say, the six terms in the proposal—one relating to production, for example, one with relation to cultivation, one relating to residence, one to the taking of moneys that come from the sale of the crop for tax purposes, and so on—that a breach of any one of these terms shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy; if so determined by the court. That is an entirely different thing from the Bankruptcy Act. It is an application of it. Under this statute we say, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, that when the proposal has been approved by the court the operative provisions of the Bankruptcy Act apply when there has been default, shall I say, in any one of the terms of the agreement. Instead of trying to anticipate what the terms would be and what default would be we simply say "if so determined by the court." If there are other words that make the farmer's position safer I am most anxious to adopt them, but I must keep in mind that if I undertake to specify certain things I have excluded those I do not mention, and we may run up against that difficulty in the very first case, whereas, as it stands now, it applies to every possible contingency that can arise in connection with default in relation to any of the terms of the agreement. If there are wider words to be used to indicate a greater discretion, I am content to use them, but frankly I do not know what they are.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That was the only point in my mind, that the farmer would be subject to Part I of the Bankruptcy Act as soon as the proposal was made, and if he failed to comply with the terms of the agreement the Bankruptcy Act would apply and he would be subject to its terms. Apparently I have not been able to make myself clear, but the one point I had in mind was this:

If the farmer breaks one of the terms of the agreement would the board have any discretion in applying to that case, say, the ordinary rules of insolvency and bankruptcy? Would they be able to say: This man is insolvent because of something beyond his control, and therefore the act does not apply to him, and therefore he should not be deemed insolvent? My impression is that as it stands they would not be able to say that, but would simply ask themselves: Is the farmer insolvent under any of the definitions in the Bankruptcy Act itself? If so, he must be declared a bankrupt and a receivership may be applied for.

My hope was that it might be made quite clear—frankly as a layman I would hardly care to suggest the words to be used—that the judge would be unhampered in his discretion and beyond applying the statutory definition of insolvency he would be able to take into account all these mitigating features and be able to say: There has been a crop failure and therefore we shall not declare you an insolvent, and you will not be open to a receivership. My only desire is to make certain that absolute discretion is given to the court in such cases so that no judge would feel himself bound by the strict letter of the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. BENNETT: The Bankruptcy Act does not apply to this section.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I understood the Prime Minister to say that just as soon as the farmer made the proposal he lost his immunity under Part I of the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. RALSTON: As soon as the proposal is confirmed.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes, as soon as it is confirmed by the court and accepted by all parties the farmer loses his present immunity under Part I of the Bankruptcy Act and is then like any other citizen, but he could not be declared a bankrupt until he failed in the performance of one of the terms of the agreement; but having so failed, then under the amendment which has been moved by the Prime Minister it remains for the court to determine whether the man shall be declared a bankrupt in the ordinary sense of the word and be subject to a receivership.

My point was, and it is so essentially important that I repeat it, that it should be made quite clear in the act that after all the preliminaries have been gone through and the man has failed in one of the terms of the agreement, the court in making its determination shall be able to take into account the mitigating circumstances—hail, for instance, depressed prices, climatic conditions—but without indicating these conditions in the bill, and indicating only that the discretion of the court is absolute in such matters.

Mr. RALSTON: The Prime Minister has mentioned what I said, and I just want to be careful with regard to one thing. I rather think the Prime Minister gave an indication that he felt that after Part I of the Bankruptcy Act applied, the only act of bankruptcy which could be invoked against a debtor was his failure to carry out any of the terms of the proposal. I do not think that is correct, and I think perhaps the Prime Minister used wider terms than he intended to use in that respect.

Part I of the Bankruptcy Act applies in full as soon as the terms of the proposal have been approved, and Part I of that act specifies what are acts of bankruptcy. There are no less than ten different situations which are there mentioned, and under some of them might come a failure to carry out the terms of the proposal. The others are quite apart from that. It seems to me that a farmer, having once agreed to a proposal and having had it confirmed, is subject to a creditor applying under the terms of any one of those clauses in section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act to have him put into bankruptcy. To add to what the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman has said, once a judge has before him the fact that there has been a failure to meet an obligation under the proposal I cannot see that he will have any discretion in the matter. Under subsection 3 he must find that the debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy. If anything more were needed and if a creditor were insistent, he could sue the farmer on the instalment of the payment or whatever it might be under the proposal, and obtain an execution against him, have the execution stand unsatisfied for fourteen days after the seizure of the goods, and then proceed under subsection (e) which provides that a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy.

> If he permits any execution or other process issued against him under which any of his goods are seized, levied upon or taken in execution to remain unsatisfied until within four days from the time fixed by the sheriff for the sale thereof, or for fourteen days after such seizure, levy or taking in execution.

Under that subsection it seems to me that there would be very little question but that the judge would be impelled to find that an act of bankruptcy had been committed and that, therefore, the debtor was in bankruptcy. It seems to me that the genus of subsection

3 of the bill is this: The debtor is within the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court the moment his proposal has been broached and that would give the creditor the right to take action under one of the clauses of section 3 of the bankruptcy act. I would point out that Part I of the Bankruptcy Act does not apply to compositions or arrangements. A farmer would be under the composition and arrangement sections of the Bankruptcy Act because he is not excluded from those by section 7. Part I applies to acts of bankruptcy, petition and receiving order and interim receiver. Having made a proposal and had it approved, in my opinion the farmer would be subject to all the provisions of the the Bankruptcy Act for all purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose lawyers have differed, hence they have lived.

Mr. RALSTON: That is why we go to the privy council.

Mr. BENNETT: We will see that this does not get that far. Subsection 2 provides that the Bankruptcy Act applies mutatis mutandis but that where there is any conflict between the Bankruptcy Act and this statute, this statute shall prevail. That is, this statute shall supersede the Bankruptcy Act. Section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act has no reference at all to this legislation. If I were asked to name the points upon which I would regard a farmer bankrupt, and if it were desired to do it without any regard to this statute, I would do it under (f), which states that a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy when he ceases to meet his liabilities generally when they become due. In this case his liabilities are specifically indicated in the agreement which he has undertaken and, therefore, he comes within this. However, the point which I have apparently not succeeded in making clear to the committee is this: To found jurisdiction is one thing, to exercise it is another. To found it we must do it on some basis of fact, not of law, and that basis of fact must be that the farmer himself has applied to his creditors to adjust and compromise his obligations. That is a condition precedent to everything; that starts the thing. I think we are all agreed about that. When, having done that, he is able to make an arrangement and ultimately it is settled by the board of review, the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act apply as provided by section 2, that is, the extent to which they are not at variance with this statute. Where they are at variance, this statute prevails. Subsection 3 reads:

> In any case where the affairs of a farmer have been arranged by a proposal approved by the court or confirmed by the board as hereinafter provided, part I of the Bankruptcy Act shall notwithstanding section 7 thereof thereafter apply to such farmer and failure on the part of such farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy.

The hon. member's remarks have brought about some doubt as to whether or not that is abundantly clear, although in my mind it is clear enough that the only act of bankruptcy would be the failure to carry out the compromise provided by this bill. That is the whole genius of this legislation. Subsection (f) of section 3 states that the failure to pay liabilities generally as they become due constitutes an act of bankruptcy while this legislation deals with the agreement or proposal. The whole purpose was to make it clear that that was the only provision which would apply, namely, the provision regarding failure on the part of the farmer to observe the terms of his agreement and which, under the general provisions of section 3, would constitute an act of bankruptcy. If subsection 2 is applied to the whole statute I think it will be found that the court would construe those words to mean that an act of bankruptcy must be an act which arises out of the failure to comply with the terms of the agreement. If there is any doubt as to that I should like to have it made abundantly clear.

Mr. COOTE: Do not the first five words of subsection 3 really mean that the farmer would immediately come under the Bankruptcy Act?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the Bankruptcy Act is amended by this bill and this bill has supremacy over the main act. Subsection 2 deals with that and I ask my hon. friend to look at it. It states that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act shall, except as in this act otherwise provided, apply mutatis mutandis in the case of proceedings hereunder including meetings of creditors. Instead of reenacting the whole thing, we take advantage of the Bankruptcy Act but with respect to this particular thing, we deal with it specifically. If there are words which could be introduced to make it abundantly clear, I am perfectly willing to add them as I am anxious that there should be no doubt about it. I think we can meet the last point raised by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I would not care to undertake to mention all the circumstances which would release a farmer but I think we could use these words: "Unless in the opinion of the court such act was due to causes over which the farmer had no control."

Mr. HANBURY: I think that would limit it.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to meet the views of the hon. members if they think it is in the interests of the farmer to say, "over which he has no control." However, I do not think it would be quite as good as leaving it entirely in the discretion of the judge. The hon. member for Red Deer seems to think that the judge might not be aware of all the circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: He might feel himself bound by the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 3 does not apply and I should like to have it clear that it does not if there is any doubt about it. The only act of bankruptcy which a farmer can commit after he has made an agreement is to make default in his agreement. My hon. friend has stated that that is in contravention of the provisions of section 7. Subsection (f) deals with a man who ceases to meet his liabilities generally as they become due but in this case new liabilities have been created under a compromise agreement and the failure to discharge those would constitute an act of bankruptcy. That is the only thing, but if there is any doubt or if it is felt that it should be made more clear, let us put in the words to make it clear beyond peradventure.

Mr. COOTE: The point I was trying to make was that there is nothing to indicate to the judge why he should not give an order.

Mr. HANBURY: The very fact that it is referred to a judge is sufficient justification.

Mr. COOTE: I do not know why; there may be several reasons. I think the judge himself must always decide even though the act says that certain things constitute an act of bankruptcy. I should like to suggest certain words which were given to me by a lawyer with whom I discussed the matter. The reason I mentioned crop failures and climatic conditions was that they were specifically mentioned on the floor of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned them.

Mr. COOTE: I would suggest that after subsection 3, which states that the failure of a farmer to carry out the terms of a proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy, these words should be added, "provided that such failure was not caused by crop conditions or depressed prices and, without being restricted by the foregoing, by other causes over which the debtor has no control." Perhaps this would circumscribe the authority of the judge but so far as I am concerned, I would prefer to have these words in. This is the reason which we would give to the judge for refusing to issue an order. These are causes over which the farmer has no control. We do not intend to protect the farmer indefinitely if he will not make some effort, where the conditions are favourable to his doing so, to meet his liabilities. But if there should arise conditions over which he has no control, and if it is impossible for him to meet all the conditions under the agreement, then I think we should make it clear to the judge why we should not issue the order. I should be very glad indeed if the Prime Minister would adopt some suggestion of that sort.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to adopt any provision that nullifies the whole purpose of the act. I do not wish to destroy the foundation on which it is predicated, and it is predicated on the assumption that only by bankruptcy can we do what is proposed. Most lawyers will agree to that without difficulty.

Mr. RALSTON: I think section 6 is sufficient.

Mr. BENNETT: If I were arguing in a court I could make it clear that you have to have something further than that. As my learned friend very properly says, section 6 is put there for the purpose indicated; but we have something else in mind as well. We wish to declare that we have jurisdiction, by providing for bankruptcy; because bankruptcy as a legal fact and as a fact known to all persons are two different things. For instance, I may be a bankrupt; you may say, "Bennett is bankrupt." But I am not bankrupt in the technical sense of that term until the proper proceedings have been taken.

Mr. RALSTON: You have only committed an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. BENNETT: Something that may make me subject to the Bankruptcy Act. The farmer is exempt from it. Now we will let him compromise, which is a violation of the conditions of the common law; and to maintain our jurisdiction and keep him from being sued I make the declaration in section 3, so that the condition of his being sued cannot arise at all. Then, I say, having obtained all the benefits being provided for here, and being protected in this way, if he makes default there must be some limit somewhere; and we overcome that by saying that a judge shall determine it. The hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) suggests that we might meet the situation by providing that it should not be so determined unless it were for causes beyond the control of the farmer. That would mean climate and the general conditions of the world. But, it seems to me, there is a danger in specifying such conditions. I have not practised my profession actively for some years but I think the rule is that if you specify you run the chance of excluding those conditions which you do not specify.

Mr. RALSTON: You would have to begin with acts of God.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and the king's enemies, and various forces of that kind. I remember being interested long years ago in a matter of this sort, and because we undertook to specify we found ourselves in difficulties. And that is so here.

Mr. HANBURY: There is one point I have not clearly in my mind in connection with bankruptcy. When a firm goes into bankruptcy a trustee is appointed and he may carry on the business and incur new liabilities which take precedence over his trust. Assuming that there is a similar condition here and that new liabilities are incurred, will they take precedence over the composition, and, if they do take precedence over the composition, could not the new creditor then take action and force the debtor into bankruptcy?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is only fair to say that this act does not contemplate that condition arising.

Mr. HANBURY: But is it not possible?

Mr. BENNETT: No; there is no trustee in this case. This contemplates the man continuing himself; that is the purpose of the act. The Farm Loan Act contemplates some possibility of his being able to get new capital, but it does not contemplate such a contingency of receivers' certificates taking priority over the original creditors. Will the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) be good enough to look at the section for a moment, to see whether or not, to remove any doubt, the use of the word "only" after the word "and" and before the word "failure" in line 17 of subsection 3 is desirable, so that it would read:

> And only failure on the part of such farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy.

Does the hon. member think that this would meet one of the difficulties mentioned here?

Mr. RALSTON: The first point I made—

Mr. BENNETT: I am leaving that out.

Mr. RALSTON: My first point is that you may be making it harder for the man you are trying to benefit. Perhaps the words "but only failure" might be preferable.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder whether the Prime Minister would accept an amendment somewhat like this. He said that something of this kind was suggested by the hon. member for East Edmonton: "Provided that such failure is not due to causes over which the farmer has no control." I suggest that there should be something of this kind to guide the judge, to give him some idea as to why the matter has been referred to him for decision. Personally I should prefer the wording I suggested before, but if the Prime Minister does not see fit to adopt it he might consider the suggestion I have just offered and which he said was what was proposed by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury).

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for East Edmonton suggests: "Unless in the opinion of the court such act was due to causes over which such farmer had no control."

Mr. COOTE: That is the idea.

Mr. BENNETT: That is as as far as we can go without bringing ourselves within the rule that to mention specific causes is to exclude others in the same class. The suggestion is that, in order to meet the situation, the word "and" in line 17 be struck out and the words "but only" substituted therefor: "but only failure on the part of such farmer to carry out any of the terms of the proposal shall be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy." We shall have to add the words: "provided that such failure shall not be deemed to be an act of bankruptcy unless in the opinion of the court such act was due to causes over which the farmer had no control."

Mr. HANBURY: Not sufficient control; he may have some degree of control.

Mr. BENNETT: No effective control.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Would that not be for the judge to determine?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Am I to understand that the words mentioned by the Prime Minister are being added? I should like to see them added, because I think they make it abundantly clear and give the judge absolute discretion. I approve the suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That should pretty well cover the point. Under the former amendment all that the court could determine was whether the farmer had fulfilled the obligations of his agreement; that being determined, no mitigating cause could be taken into account. Under the present wording some discretion is given.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the committee bear with me, listen to this and see if it meets the situation? After the word "bankruptcy" add:

Provided that such failure shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy unless in the opinion of the court such act was not due to causes over which such farmer had no control.

My hon. friend suggests "effective control." "No control" are words used in law and they have been construed by the courts. Will that meet the views of the committee?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Or "causes beyond the control of such farmer."

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Justice suggests:

Or "causes beyond the control of such farmer."

That may be better.

Mr. HANBURY: The question of control would still be within the opinion of the judge, would it not?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Then it might read:

Provided that such failure shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy unless in the opinion of the court such act was not due to causes beyond the control of such farmer.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Mr. Guthrie moves that subclause 3 of Clause 2 be amended by striking out the word "and" in the seventeenth line and substituting therefor the words "but only" and by adding the following after the word "bankruptcy." the last word of the subclause:

Provided that such failure shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy unless in the opinion of the court such act was not due to causes beyond the control of such farmer.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that covers it.

Mr. RALSTON: Just to make it a little clearer might I suggest that the word "if" be substituted for "unless" and that the word "not" be struck out. Then you would strike out two negatives and have the positive declaration, "if in the opinion of the court such act was due to causes beyond the control of such farmer."

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the hon. gentleman; that makes it better.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. LUCAS: There is another point on which I should like a little information. I understand that a farmer who is insolvent will not come under the provisions of this bill. This morning I handed the Prime Minister a letter I received from a farmer who declared that he was hopelessly insolvent, and who wanted to know if this bill would give him any assistance. To-day a farmer who is insolvent requires from $100 to $150 to go into bankruptcy. Many farmers simply cannot raise that money, and I was wondering whether under the provisions of this bill, by which we are providing without cost official receivers and boards of review for the benefit of those farmers who may come under the act, these insolvent farmers might not have their cases reviewed so that, if they are found to be hopelessly insolvent, they might be put through bankruptcy without the cost that is now entailed. These men cannot raise the money necessary to go through bankruptcy and they find themselves chained, as it were, almost as slaves. They are unable to get rid of this debt and start up afresh. I am sure that if some means could be provided whereby they could be relieved of this burden many of them would make a fresh start with at least some hope of making a livelihood.

I want to congratulate the Prime Minister on bringing in this legislation. I think it is very badly needed and will afford a great deal of relief to those who are able to come under the provisions of the bill. But I think hon. members, especially those from western Canada, will agree that many farmers in the west are hopelessly insolvent, and they will not get relief so long as they remain in that condition.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason I answered the hon. gentleman as I did with respect to the case which he suggested might come within the provisions of the statute was that I had regard to subsection (9) of section 12, which reads:

The board may decline to formulate a proposal in any case where it does not consider that it can do so in fairness and justice to the debtor or the creditors.

In the case suggested by the hon. gentleman the debtor indicated that he owed $6,000 or $7,000 and had no assets at all. In that case obviously no plan would be formulated; I think that is reasonably clear, but there is no doubt that every farmer in occupation on the land may make application. The farmer starts it; it is for him to determine whether or not he shall do so and thereafter, as mentioned in section 6, the matter follows the course I have already indicated. I do not see that anything further can be done for bona fide farmers than is being done under this act.

Mr. LUCAS: I wondered whether, through the officials set up under this bill, such farmers could not go through bankruptcy without a charge of $150, which it is impossible for them to raise.

Mr. BENNETT: The farmer cannot be put into bankruptcy, nor can he receive the benefits of the Bankruptcy Act unless he comes within this act. Section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, as it stands to-day and has stood for many years, prevents the farmer from taking advantage of that act.

Mr. LUCAS: Unless he applies for it?

Mr. BENNETT: No, he cannot become a bankrupt.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I think the last speaker is referring to this as the Bankruptcy Act; I think the point he is trying to make is that a great many farmers will not have money with which to pay counsel.

Mr. BENNETT: They do not need counsel in this case.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think the point is quite clear, but I do not see how it would come under this act which is to keep farmers on the land rather than to help them off it. Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that under the terms of the Bankruptcy Act at the present time a farmer could not make a voluntary assignment?

Mr. BENNETT: A voluntary assignment is another thing altogether.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think that was the point the hon. member for Camrose had in mind, that those who wished to go into voluntary assignment were unable to do so because they could not meet the cost of $100 or $150 which is involved under the present act. The suggestion, in which I certainly concur, was that some machinery might be provided, possibly using the officials established under this act, by which the official trustee would be able to carry out the voluntary assignment so that the man could be placed in bankruptcy without the necessity of meeting the charge that has been mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact the statute of limitations is the best cure for most cases of that kind. As it now stands this act could not deal with those cases.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Valuation of securities of secured creditor.

Mr. GUTHRIE: With regard to clause 8, a new clause has been drafted. I beg to move:

That clause 8 as printed in the bill be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

8. Whenever a proposal relates to the rights of a secured creditor or of a person who has acquired movable or immovable property subject to the right of redemption, such creditor or person may value his security and shall be entitled to vote only in respect of the balance of his claims after deducting the amount of his valuation provided, however, that no proposal shall be approved by the court which provides for the payment to such secured creditor or such person on account of such security of any amount in excess of his valuation, or for granting to him any new security for an amount in excess of his valuation.

The only change in the clause is the addition after the word "creditor" in the second line of the words:

Or of a person who has acquired movable or immovable property subject to the right of redemption.

And in the next line the addition of the words "or person" after the word "creditor."

Section as amended agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Am I to understand that legal machinery is provided by which the farmer may take advantage of this act? Are there any provisions in the act giving the farmer legal aid without expense to him, in order that he may secure the benefits afforded under this act? For instance, we have provided counsel for returned soldiers applying for pension; is something like that being done under this act? I think that was the point brought up by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas); I think he had in mind that there would be a great many farmers without ready money available with which to employ counsel. I wondered if there was any provision for legal aid for the farmers and, if there was not, if the government would consider that point.

Mr. BENNETT: I made it very clear—the hon. member could not have been in the chamber—that this act was framed in very simple terms. All a farmer has to do is indicate that he is unable to meet his obligations; then the official receiver who is appointed for each constituency takes up the matter and the costs incidental to it are charged against the consolidated revenue fund. The farmer escapes any costs.

Mr. REID: Did the Prime Minister look into the question as to whether or not those people under the farm loan board or soldier settlement board could take advantage of this legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: I am not clear as to whether they could or not, without divesting the crown of some of its present authority under the act. I did endeavour to present the matter to one of the officials of the Department of Justice, but I did not succeed in doing so because he was otherwise engaged at the time. I think, however, that it would be extremely doubtful as it now stands.

Mr. NEILL: Would it not be desirable?

Mr. BENNETT: Well, that brings the crown into the position of dealing with a question of compromises, having already remitted $85,000,000 in connection with these matters. But I do not think that at the moment it is desirable. I am not sure, but that is my present view.

Mr. COOTE: May I refer to a matter which was mentioned by the hon. member for Selkirk? I believe there really is some necessity in certain cases to have counsel for the farmers, if we expect any great number of them to take advantage of the legislation. It is true that the farmer may make his own proposals for the composition of his debt, but it is also true that any one of his creditors may appeal to the provincial board. The board then has power to review the whole case and to fix the terms of the composition or arrangement. As I said before, the farmer must accept that arrangement. On the board of review there will be a representative of the creditors. We can take it for granted that the creditors will see that they have high priced and very capable men to look after their interests. But I do not see how we can ensure that there will be representatives for the debtors who will take the same intelligent interest in their cases. Such a person could not be as well posted in the cases of individual farmers. The representative of the creditor would be well advised because in every case the creditor concerned would take the trouble to see that counsel was well advised and that his case was well presented. But I am afraid that the representatives of the debtors will not be in that fortunate position, even if they wanted to do the very best they could for the debtors.

A remedy for this condition may appear to the Prime Minister to be somewhat difficult, and he may think we are asking too much. I believe however that in many cases the debtor will be in the hands of counsel, just as applicants for pension are in the hands of counsel when they come before the pensions board. I should be very glad indeed if the Prime Minister would give some consideration to the proposal to make it possible for the farmer to have the advantage of counsel.

Mr. BENNETT: My own view is that the farmer would be infinitely better if he presented his own case before a tribunal than he would be with the aid of counsel. He will make the statement of what he has got, what he can do, and demonstrate his capabilities and capacity to meet the situation which has arisen. If he cannot get more sympathy from a court than he can get from a lawyer, I greatly mistake his position.

Mr. COOTE: It would be all right if the farmer could appear before the board of review, in the event of that board travelling around as does the pensions board. In that way the farmer could appear before the board and state his own case.

Mr. BENNETT: We contemplate that.

Mr. COOTE: I did not understand that that would be done. I do not suppose that the board of review will see the farmer or hear his own side of the case. It would have nothing but the farmer's statement, and the case presented by the representative of the debtor who, perhaps, might act in a hundred cases. He would represent the cases of hundreds of debtors, and I do not think he would be able to look after the debtors' interests as well as the representative of the creditors would look after the creditors' interests. Unless the judge happened to be a man inclined to take the human view of a case I am afraid that the decisions, in the great majority of cases, would be inclined to favour the creditor rather than the debtor.

Preamble agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of what was said the other day as to the superior court of the province of Quebec being neither a district nor a county court, I move:

That section 5 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

5. (1) In the case of any assignment, petition or proposal in the province of Quebec, the superior court of the judicial district where the farmer resides and in other provinces the county or district court shall have exclusive jurisdiction in bankruptcy subject to appeal as provided in section one hundred and seventy-four of the Bankruptcy Act.

(2) The superior, county or district court judge shall exercise the powers vested in the registrar by section one hundred and fifty-nine of the Bankruptcy Act.

(3) The prothonotary of the superior court and the clerk of the county or district court shall perform all the duties of the registrar, except his judicial duties.

It is contemplated that if necessary the court may move from place to place for the purpose of dealing with these matters.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 5 as amended agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be remembered that the right hon. leader of the opposition asked that we add a clause at the end of the bill to provide that a report be made by the minister to parliament of the expenditures under the act, so that we might be able to have the matter in mind. It will be observed that under section 16 the Minister of Finance is charged with the responsibility of administration. With that in mind I move:

That section 16 be amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

2. The minister shall at the end of the fiscal year prepare a report of expenditure incurred and of proceedings taken under this act shall lay the same before parliament forthwith, or if parliament be not then sitting, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

Mr. NEILL: The amendment requires a report only as to expenditures made. Would it not be desirable to have a general report as to the working of the legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: I would call the hon. member's attention to the words "proceedings taken."

Mr. NEILL: I was mistaken. I thought it was a report as to expenditures only.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 16 as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. BENNETT: Next sitting.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. COOTE: I do not wish to object to it being read, but I should like to have an opportunity to read one of the amendments presented to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: Very well, next sitting.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

PROVISION TO FACILITATE AND INCREASE EXTENSION OF CREDIT TO FARMERS

The house resumed from Monday, June 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 93, to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Fraser (Cariboo) in the chair.

On section 5—Conditions for loans.

Mr. REID: I have a suggestion to make to the Prime Minister. Those who are under this act will not be able to take advantage of Bill No. 92 which we have just passed, according to the interpretation that was given by the Prime Minister, and I think some consideration should be given to those who are carrying the load under the farm loan act, and if at all possible the interest rate should be reduced. We have a federal post office savings bank in this country paying 2½ and 3 per cent interest, and I do not see why that money could not be loaned to the farm loan board, the two interest charges amounting to 4½ or 5 per cent. No farmer can afford to pay 6 per cent. I make that suggestion on behalf of those who are carrying the load and who do not come under the bill we have just passed. This bill gives to the farm loan board further security but very little help to those who are burdened with loans they have obtained under this act.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is that you cannot get money to lend on farm loans in this country at 2½ or 3 per cent. The farm loan act provides that the moneys loaned should be loaned at 1½ per cent more than is paid for the money. If the money is borrowed at 3 per cent the farm loan board lends it at 4½ per cent. The farm loan board is not the government by any means, nor is the government the farm loan board. The farm loan board exercises an independent jurisdiction and makes its loans without reference to the government or anybody else, but the government has so far bought about ten million dollars of securities issued by the farm loan board to put it in funds to make the loans. The provision here is to enable an increase in the sum to be loaned in order that we may take care of those who have no capital, and we are dealing with that in section 9, making it a little more specific than it now is about supplementary advances.

I can only say that it would be quite impossible to take the money out of the post office savings banks and lend it on farm loans. If we did we would have a situation in this country that other countries have had, namely, frozen assets with which to meet the demands of depositors for their money. As it now stands, we have to maintain ten per cent in gold, metallic coverage, for post office savings, and that has been the law in this country for a very long time in order that post office savings may always be available to depositors who desire to get them. Depositors have to give so many days' notice of their intention to withdraw.

Mr. MacLEAN: In connection with this bill and the bill we have just been considering I am afraid there is not very much relief being afforded to the farmers of Prince Edward Island because the farm loan act has never been made operative in our province. Many of our farmers would like to obtain some new money at a lower rate of interest, but I think in this bill or in the other bill it is provided that a farmer can obtain immediate assistance in the way of an additional loan through this act only if he is paying an interest rate of over seven per cent. Is not that correct?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not it. Section 17 of the act we have just passed is what the hon. gentleman had in mind.

Mr. MacLEAN: Down in Prince Edward Island seven per cent is the highest rate of interest that is charged on any mortgages out at the present time, and possibly a lot of mortgages are out at six per cent, so the provision in this act whereby only those who are paying an interest rate of over seven per cent can avail themselves immediately of its provisions would not be of very much help to our farmers even if the act were brought into effect in our province.

There is another point. It is really too bad that this legislation cannot be made effective in all the provinces. I do not suppose parliament can force any province to adopt the legislation, but an effort should be made to treat every province alike, and every inducement should be held out to the local governments to embrace this legislation. If anything could be done to induce the province of Prince Edward Island and others who are not under the scheme to come in, it would possibly help out if, as I have said, the rate of interest mentioned in the bill were changed to suit maritime conditions.

Mr. LUCAS: I think the time is coming when drastic action will have to be taken to bring about a lower rate of interest, because agriculture cannot continue to carry on at the present rate of interest or even at six per cent. I had a letter this morning protesting against this legislation if the interest rate is going to be on a six per cent basis. They are now paying six per cent to the farm loan board, and there is an amortization clause whereby they pay an extra two per cent, so that if a farmer is to keep up his contract he has to pay eight per cent. I think everyone is agreed that eight per cent cannot be paid, especially under the conditions that have existed for the last few years. If the farmer gets behind in one of his payments, he is charged eight per cent on the overdue account. Bill No. 92 which we have just passed will no doubt bring a great deal of relief by the composition of debts, but in my opinion, if it is to be a success, the farmer must be in a position to meet the new arrangement, and his ability to do that will depend largely on the rate of interest he has to pay.

I might add that a more sympathetic attitude on the part of the farm loan board, especially provincial boards, is very much needed. I confine my remarks in that respect entirely to the provincial boards because I have always received very courteous treatment from the commissioner and the officials in Ottawa, but I cannot say the same of the provincial boards. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction with their administration.

Twenty years ago the United States sent a commission to Europe to study rural credits. Mr. Harvie Jordan, who was one of the commissioners, after a study of the situation, said:

> Every European country for the past half century had given every possible assistance to the development of agriculture.

He found that in Europe farmers secured loans at four per cent while commercial loans ran from five to six per cent. That is just the reverse of the practice in this country and the United States, where commercial loans are made at cheaper rates than agricultural loans. In 1894 France passed the first fundamental law creating machinery for agricultural credits. Two years later, when the charter of the Bank of France expired, it was renewed only on condition that the bank advance to the government forty million francs free of interest to be used in subsidizing rural credit banks. It also stipulated that the bank should pay annually a sum calculated at one-eighth of its circulation, said sum to be not less than two million francs, for the same purpose. We are extending the charters of our banks for another ten years and I was wondering whether a clause of that kind should not be inserted. It was stated also by Mr. Harvie Jordan that loans to agricultural cooperative societies in Europe were made at rates as low as two per cent. As I stated before, the farmer in Canada cannot continue to pay the high rates of interest which are being charged.

While I am on my feet I should like to refer to the complaints being made with regard to the administration of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. We are amending this act and I think we have some right to say under what regulations or under what conditions the provincial boards shall carry on. Farmers complain that they do not even get copies of their mortgages. As the Prime Minister knows, very often payments in western Canada are made by the delivery of grain. In the last few years when a farmer got behind the board demanded that he should sign a contract to deliver one-third or some other fraction of his crop. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction in connection with this delivery of grain as to what authority the board has to hold or sell the grain. I know of one case in September, 1931, where the board seized three hundred acres of crop for the payment of $294. When the crop was threshed the farmer had 4,300 bushels of wheat and 3,300 bushels of oats besides his green feed, and yet the whole crop was tied up from September to November. Through his solicitor the farmer delivered 1,000 bushels to the sheriff on November 14. At the price of grain prevailing on the day the tickets were delivered, this represented sufficient to cover his payments. Instead of selling this grain, the board held it and acknowledged receipt on December 4, two weeks later, when there had been a further drop in the price of grain. In January they wrote to the farmer to find out what he wished done wtih the grain and he wrote back stating that he expected to get the price prevailing on the day the grain was delivered. The grain was held for eight and one-half months during which time the price continued to drop. It was finally sold by the board at a considerable loss to the farmers. I took up this case and after a great deal of negotiation an adjustment was recently made of approximately $100. I am doubtful whether this man is going to be satisfied as there was a period of two weeks during which a considerable drop occurred in the price of grain.

I have another case where a farmer delivered grain in April of this year on the understanding that if, when it was sold, it did not bring in enough, he would pay the difference. The board wrote back saying that they would not accept any responsibility for the sale of this grain. He wrote back and said that that was quite satisfactory, that he wished to sell it himself. However, when the rise in prices occurred about two weeks ago the board sold the grain, but it still did not bring sufficient to pay the farmers' debt. I believe the price to-day is higher than when it was sold, even allowing for the recent drop in prices.

When the board accepts grain I think there should be some definite understanding with the farmer as to how and when it is to be sold. This would eliminate a great deal of controversy and misunderstanding. I understood the Prime Minister to say a while ago that he had no responsibility for the provincial boards, but this act has been created by this parliament. I understand that we are going to guarantee these bonds and surely we should have some right to say how the act shall be administered by the provincial boards.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing that can be added to what has been said so frequently during the last few weeks regarding interest rates. An earnest effort has been made to reduce interest rates in this country by inducing the banks to pay a lesser rate on deposits, but there has been considerable difficulty because of the fact that trust and loan companies under provincial charters are receiving deposits and paying an interest rate in excess of that paid by the chartered banks. This difficulty has been overcome to some extent, but it still prevails.

The hon. member has pointed out that in the conception of the Canadian Farm Loan Act it was assumed that much of the administrative powers would be left with the provincial bodies. Each province has its own registration laws and particular regulations touching the registration of documents, how mortgages are to be created and concerning the signatures of a man and his wife, and matters of that sort. Some have the old fashioned idea of a mortgage under which the fee or title to the property is transferred to the mortgagee with the right of redemption. Others go under the Torrens system whereby a mortgage constitutes a charge against the property. All these matters were in the mind of this parliament when it enacted the farm loan act, so that cooperation between the provincial and federal authorities is essential to its success. In a broad and general way I think it may be said that they have worked fairly well, although there are exceptions. I know of many cases myself to which objection could be taken, but when the explanations were received they do not appear to be nearly as bad. Acting in my own personal capacity and not in any official capacity, I have complained several times with respect to what I conceived to be the attitude taken by some of the provincial boards. After the depression some of them apparently became very fearful in connection with their record of the amount of loans and were unduly apprehensive as to collections and perhaps pressed their debtors very hard, in my judgment too hard. I gave the figures the other day which were supplied by the commissioners as to the amount of principal and interest in arrears, and judging from the observations made, most hon. members of the committee thought it was a rather large sum.

In connection with the taking of grain for the purpose of meeting obligations, I need hardly point out that two great cases in this country deal with the obligations of those who take securities. One noted case that went from the Yukon to the privy council against one of our banks dealt with the question of sale of securities at a low market, and there is a much more recent case. The board is no more immune than any other lender from the rule that it must exercise reasonable care and diligence in the marketing of wheat which it receives, and if it failed to do so it would be liable. But that would be in the absence of agreement. There is always difficulty. Of course, whenever it happens that a man's grain is sold on a rising market and it goes higher a few days later, he is perfectly satisfied that his creditor should have held the grain until it had reached the highest price. But if it falls then he is equally censorious of the creditor for not having sold it when it reached the high point from which it departed on the day he complains. These are but manifestations of human nature to which we are all subject, and most of us have been through the unpleasant experience of seeing our securities sometimes sold for less than we thought they were worth to pay our debts. Sometimes we have had to do it ourselves and sometimes others have done it for us. I can only say that the rule is quite as applicable to the board as to any other lender who takes a security to protect himself against loss and under proper circumstances there is no doubt that the appropriate remedy against the board would be in the hands of the debtor.

Mr. LUCAS: My point was that the board should have some clear understanding with the farmer, when they accept the grain, whether the wheat should be held, whether they should use their judgment, or just exactly what would be done. In one case they held it and in another case they sold it.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: It is the same principle of law as with respect to the broker who has no stop order and does not sell except on his own judgment. Sometimes, if the market is rising rapidly, there is great complaint because he did not hold long enough. If the market suddenly goes down there is complaint because he should have sold when it was at the top point. I agree that there should be a hard and fast arrangement between the mortgagor and the board, when grain is taken; there should be a direction to sell at a fixed price which is the subject matter of agreement. I shall speak to the commissioner, directing his attention to what has been said to-day in that regard.

Mr. COOTE: Is the differential of 1½ per cent in the rate of interest fixed by law or is it a rule of the board?

Mr. BENNETT: I am not sure whether it is a regulation. I think it is in the act.

Mr. NEILL: It is in the act.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni says it is in the act, and he is an authority on the act.

Mr. COOTE: I have the act from the library but I have not had time to go through it. I have not found it in the marginal notes. If it is in the act I should like the Prime Minister, before passing the bill out of committee, to consider the advisability of changing that section, because I think that 1½ per cent under certain circumstances is too high. The differential which the board must receive depends very largely on the amount of business it is carrying on. If the board were lending a larger amount of money, one per cent ought to be ample. I should like to see this change made in the act, either reducing the rate to one per cent or leaving it in the hands of the governor in council to fix from time to time.

The importance of reducing interest rates on farm mortgages is difficult to exaggerate. The loan value of any land under this act is going to be determined by its productive capacity; in other words, on the prospective net earnings of the farmer. It is going to depend on the value of the commodities which can be produced on the farm, less actual and necessary costs. That is to say, it is the farmer's margin over his costs, and the rate of interest in reality fixes the loan value of the property. Let me make that clear.

Let us say that the margin which the farmer has is estimated at $120, and suppose he has a loan of $2,000 drawing interest at the rate of eight per cent. The interest is $160, so that no additional loan is possible, under this act, to that farmer. At seven per cent the interest would be $140 and no new loan is possible. If it were six per cent the interest would be $120 and still no new loan would be possible. At a rate of five per cent the annual charge would be $100 and there would be a surplus available to pay interest on a larger loan. In other words, it would increase the loan value of the farmer's property to the extent of $400. So that with a net income of $120, at five per cent, the loan value of the property is $2,400; at six per cent the loan value is reduced to $2,000; at seven per cent the loan value is $1,700, and at eight per cent, $1,500. The rate of interest payable on the farm mortgage might in reality be said to fix the loan value of the property, and I think I am right in saying that a reduction in the rate of interest is the most important factor in working out this whole scheme. For that purpose I am now discussing the two acts together, the farm loan board act and the measure now before us.

I urged in the house before, when this legislation was being considered, that action should be taken by law to reduce the rate of interest on farm mortgages to a certain specified rate. Personally, I should be in favour of five per cent. I believe the Prime Minister said that there was represented in farm mortgages the sum of $726,000,000. I think we are safe in estimating that of that amount $300,000,000 is at eight per cent and perhaps $300,000,000 at seven per cent. If you reduced the rate of interest to six per cent, that would effect a reduction in interest charges of $9,000,000 annually, and at five per cent the total interest burden would be reduced $15,000,000. If the rate were fixed at five per cent the reduction which would be effected in the annual interest charge on farm mortgages would amount to a total of $15,000,000. I mention this to show that I am not overemphasizing the importance of this matter, and it is involved in section 5 of the bill, which deals with the amount that may be loaned on mortgage.

The value for loaning purposes is going to be fixed very largely by the rate of interest which is payable on farm mortgages. I am not unmindful of what the Prime Minister said before. He intimated that he had given consideration to this suggestion, but one reason why he could not see his way clear to take the action proposed to reduce the rate of interest was that some companies had issued debentures some of which were payable in the old country at a rate of five per cent, and that obviously these companies could not continue to pay five per cent on such debentures if they themselves were allowed to collect only five per cent. I suggest that he could deal with that situation by amending the farm loan board act in such a way that these companies could come to the board with debentures bearing four per cent and get the money necessary to pay off the debentures which they owe in the old country.

Mr. BENNETT: Where would they get the money?

Mr. COOTE: The Prime Minister is able to get plenty of money when he needs it; he is always able to get any money that is necessary.

I would not urge this if the matter were not so important. I believe a reduction of the rate of interest on farm mortgages effecting $726,000,000 of investments would be one of the best steps we could take to reduce the rate of interest on all obligations. It would be one factor in bringing down the rate of interest payable by the Dominion of Canada and by every province when they go into the market to borrow money, and it would be one factor in bringing down interest rates generally.

As I have said in the house before, it is not the size of the debt that matters so much as the rate of interest which the debt carries. As a farmer I can pay five per cent on a mortgage of $8,000 more easily than I can pay eight per cent on a loan of $5,000. There are in Canada thousands of farmers paying eight per cent on mortgages, and so far as I can see, this legislation is not going to bring them any relief to many of them. For various reasons these farmers are unable to go anywhere else to get the money to tender to the persons now holding the eight per cent mortgages; they are not yet in the position where they are absolutely insolvent and can ask for a compromise on their debts, and even if they did we were told in the discussion on the other bill that the board has no power to reduce interest rates even on obligations where a compromise is arranged.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that that might be a part of the compromise without being a specific reduction.

Mr. HANBURY: A question of agreement.

Mr. COOTE: I understood the Prime Minister to say that the board of review under the other bill had no power to reduce the rate of interest. I hope the creditors will agree to a reduction. I think in passing this legislation we are making a mistake in that we do not say that the board has power to reduce interest rates. I did intend to argue under clause 17 of the other bill that perhaps a clause might be inserted in that bill to reduce by law the rate of interest on mortgages. Some people may say that that is unfair, but we are dealing with actual conditions; the farmer, out of his year's income, is not in a position to pay that rate of interest. It has been said repeatedly in the house; it has been said by members of the cabinet that farmers cannot continue to pay rates of seven, eight or eight to ten per cent. I know insurance companies that have reduced the wages of every one of their employees but that are still insisting on collecting their eight per cent; they are not willing to say to the mortgagor: Conditions have changed so that we realize you are not in a position to pay the eight per cent; we will make it even seven. Let us admit that the problem is difficult, but the situation is so desperate, and, I may say, in many cases conditions at present are so impossible, parliament would be well advised to deal with the matter, and I think it would be quite within our rights to do so.

With regard to the legal aspect of the question, I think I read the opinion given by all the attorneys general in Canada who replied to a questionnaire sent out last year by the banking committee, and if I remember correctly every one who expressed an opinion said that the dominion government had power to legislate in regard to interest rates even on existing obligations. There is only one way, I suppose, to determine a case like that, and that is to pass the legislation and see what is done about it. I thought that this afternoon when we were discussing matters which were brought up on the other bill. We could pass the legislation and if anybody cared to test its validity in the courts we could soon get a decision as to whether the legislation was ultra vires. I should like again to urge the Prime Minister to take some action to reduce, by legislation, interest rates generally.

To deal with the other question I raised, that is the differential, I really do not think there is any differential fixed in the act, but I speak subject to correction. I am now quoting from the farm loan act of 1927. Section 7, paragraph (e) deals with the rate of interest.

Mr. BENNETT: Paragraphs (e) and (f) are the ones that deal with the problem.

Mr. COOTE: The section reads:

> The interest rate on loans under this act shall be such a rate in excess of the interest rate yielded at the time of issue by the last series of farm loan bonds issued by the board as shall be sufficient, in the judgment of the board, to provide for the expenses of operation and for the necessary reserves for losses, or if no such bonds have been issued, such a rate as in the judgment of the board will be yielded by the farm loan bonds when issued, increased by provision for expenses and reserves as aforesaid.

I take it for granted then that the differential of one and a half per cent is simply a rule of the board.

Mr. NEILL: Paragraph (f).

Mr. COOTE: Paragraph (f) reads:

> Every farm loan shall be repayable in equal annual or semi-annual instalments of principal and interest at the option of the borrower; and the amount of such instalment or instalments payable in any year shall be a fixed percentage of the amount of the loan, such percentage to be the rate of interest mentioned in the mortgage increased by either one per cent or two per cent of the amount of the loan as the borrower may elect.

I think that provision is simply for the amortization of the principal, so that it would seem that the differential of one and a half per cent is only a rule of the board and not fixed by the act itself. To effect a reduction needs action only by the board, and I think in the present case it might be a matter of government policy to consult the board with a view to having that differential reduced.

I would urge the Prime Minister to take whatever action is necessary to have the interest on loans made by the farm loan board brought down to five per cent. I do not think agriculture can pay a higher rate. We hope in passing these two bills we are taking a really worth while step to deal with this farm debt, and perhaps I should say, farm credit problem. Even at five per cent our farmers will be paying much higher rates than are paid by farmers in many countries. In Denmark the credit societies are borrowing the great bulk of their money at four per cent or less. They did have a large amount outstanding at four and a half per cent, but if I remember correctly, legislation was introduced about two years ago to assist them in converting those four and a half per cent bonds to bonds bearing interest at four per cent, and government action in Denmark has certainly been used to reduce the rate of interest payable on all farm mortgages.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 5—Conditions for loans.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if we could have an explanation as to why the loan is limited to $7,500, when under another section it is proposed that the board may take a second real estate mortgage and also a chattel mortgage?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will remember that under the provisions of the farm loan act the maximum amount that might be loaned was $10,000. In view of the present situation as to values it is believed by officials of the board that the provision limiting the maximum loan to $7,500 would be in the interests of both the borrower and the lender, in this case the farm loan board.

Just before recess the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) was making a strong appeal for a reduction in the rates of interest. I need not go over the ground that has been covered so many times this session, but when I say to him that the government has used every means within its power, short of legislative action to which I shall refer presently, to bring about a reduction in interest rates, I think I am stating what is within the knowledge of all. Just what has been accomplished in that regard is also fairly well known, and the price at which money has been loaned to this dominion recently is some indication of what I have stated. I just put this position to the committee and to my hon. friend. He suggests that this parliament should enact a statute declaring that the interest rates on all outstanding mortgages should be reduced to five per cent; that is, that the rates that now are in excess of five per cent should be reduced to that figure. I say to him that to do so would be hurtful beyond words to the credit of this dominion, and I do not think there is a single member of this committee who does not realize what would be the effect of the arbitrary action of this parliament in reducing the contractual rate to five per cent.

What are we trying to do? On the one hand we are trying to maintain the credit of this country at the highest possible level; on the other hand we are endeavouring to secure all the money we can to meet maturing obligations and also to secure fresh money for needed development. In this very bill there is a provision permitting us to increase the amount of money to be raised by the farm loan board by the sale of bonds. I put this to any hon. member, including the hon. gentleman who has just spoken: Does he think we could borrow any money at all outside of Canada—and it would be very difficult in Canada—if by an arbitrary action we declared that all mortgages bearing interest of more than five per cent should have the interest rate reduced to five per cent, depriving those who in good faith have contracted with borrowers of an income, as he suggests, amounting to several million dollars? Just tell me what the effect would be upon the farmers themselves. The farm loan board would not be able to borrow more money; that is clear. I doubt if the people of Canada would want to loan money to the board. When I suggested to the committee the other day that two enterprises in Canada had borrowed on debentures in Scotland and elsewhere sums of money in one case amounting to $30,000,000 and in the other case to $29,000,000, at the surprisingly high rate of five per cent, as I learned for the first time a few weeks ago, I merely indicated that this was a factor that had to be considered, because they loaned the money at a higher rate than that at which they borrowed it.

During the discussions that have taken place during the last few months between the government and the representatives of the loan companies I have been greatly taken with the attitude of mind of those representing the lending companies. I recall the words used by one such representative, as follows:

> In their own interest, the companies do not want the good farmer to abandon his farm or to be sold out; in fact it is the worst thing that can happen to a company at the present time. Therein lies the strongest assurance that can be given that mortgage companies will do their part in compromise arrangements.

Then he used these words:

> As a concrete instance of what is even now being done, I am informed by one loan company that at their weekly board meeting yesterday they dealt with 46 renewals of mortgages in the three prairie provinces. They were all cases where the mortgagor was in arrears for interest, sometimes for a considerable amount. Every renewal was granted, with a reduction in the rate of interest to seven per cent; the arrears of interest were partly waived and the balance capitalized so that the farmer is now given a fresh start with his account in good shape. In addition, further advances were made where necessary for seed or similar necessities.

Then he gives a few extracts from the reports of their inspectors. I mention that to this committee because, in our anxiety to assist, by taking extreme positions sometimes we may harm those whom we desire to assist. We have a condition in this country that has not been brought about in a single day or year, but which has come about after a long series of years. We have made loans to the farmers, amounting to over $700,000,000, as I pointed out when this bill was first brought to the attention of the house. Parliament did not intervene in those days to fix a rate of interest at a rate lower than might be contracted for. To-day the legal rate is five per cent, but parliament has not imposed upon those who borrow a restriction or prohibition in the exercise of their contractual powers or rights. The result is that a considerable number of mortgages outstanding bear rates of interest in excess of seven per cent, and this was well known to Canada and the Canadian people when it was being done. In the days of buoyant prosperity no one complained about contracting to pay eight per cent; in fact it is well known that sometimes offers of more than eight per cent were made. As a result we are now inheriting a condition. Having inherited that condition we now say that it is beyond our power to emerge from our difficulties unless parliament intervenes and lessens the amount that we must pay to discharge our obligations.

I do not know how many of you read the speech of Mr. John Buchan at the assembly of the Church of Scotland, of which he is high commissioner. He said that at the bottom of all our trouble is fear, which he described as the father of despotism. I made some reference to that on Saturday last. Therein, it seems to me, lies the genesis of much of our trouble. We have made promises. We have executed contracts. We have assumed obligations. With every word that the hon. member for Macleod has said as to the low prices of commodities influencing our ability to pay, we must not forget that the student of history will point out that in days long since past the obligation was to pay ten per cent, twelve per cent, fourteen per cent and fifteen per cent. Without parliamentary intervention or the destruction of contracts it is amazing how the difficulties were met and overcome in the past. The lowering of interest rates; the adjustment of difficulties; the compromise of obligations we have endeavoured to assist in every way within our power, but when you suggest that any government of Canada should arbitrarily say that all mortgages outstanding in this country bearing interest rates of more than five per cent should have those rates reduced to five per cent, and in the same breath suggest to me that we should get more for the farm loan board, I say these are mutually destructive, because if carried out the one will make the other impossible.

Only a few days ago, the day I was absent, I was struck more than I would care to say to this committee with the high reputation that this country enjoys because thus far it has declined to become a party to the destruction of its contractual obligations, and has maintained the position it has taken and met its obligations in the terms of its contracts. I say to my fellow Canadians here to-night that nothing could be more inimical to our credit, nothing could be more destructive to our high reputation and nothing more calculated to menace the very, shall I say, permanent improvement of this country, than that we should listen to what is urged by some in that regard. It is so easy and so popular to raise the cry, "Why don't they cut the interest? Why don't they destroy our contracts?" Mr. Chairman, there is an old saying, a very old one to which I shall refer; I am sure the classic mind of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) will recall the words, "Swift is the descent to hell," and once started upon this course what must be the result? I just leave that with the committee, because I do not purpose again to reargue the matter. It would be so much easier for one to court popular approval in certain quarters by simply saying, "Certainly, we are going to cut these things; we are going to destroy these contracts; we are going to pay no attention to obligations created in the past, but we will just think of the present and of the future." One could get more votes that way, and would please more people. If any hon. member suggests that I am not fully advised of the economic conditions of those who have to pay, and that I have not a clear appreciation of the difficulties they have to overcome and, in many instances, their inability to do so, I can say only this, that he is entirely in error. If any hon. members assume that I have not as much knowledge as they have about the matter, they are wrong. I know about the hardships and the difficulties. But what we did through the bill considered this afternoon was to go to the absolute limit of our constitutional jurisdiction, without destroying our credit. And to-night what we are endeavouring to do is to ensure that there shall be a little fresh capital available to make a start, and that some safeguard shall be provided to prevent the very thing we are trying to do from having the effect of destroying our power to do that which we seek to do.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I have been very much interested in this bill to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act, which is a companion to the bill we passed this afternoon. As such it must afford relief to a number of farmers throughout our country in order that they may get that for which they have been looking so long. There was a great deal of discussion this afternoon on the bill which now stands for third reading, and I must confess that I am fairly well seized as to the meaning of that piece of legislation. If I understand it correctly it means, first, that if a farmer finds himself in distressed circumstances he may go to the receiver, and the receiver may say to him, "Let me have the number of your creditors, and their names." Then with that information before him he states, "We will take your case into consideration and, if the situation warrants, we will call the creditors into conference so that we may have a clear understanding of the whole situation." Then, having done that, and there comes a time when all the creditors do not agree, they will say, "We will submit this case to the court of review," upon which occasion the court of review makes the final decision as to whether or not there is a clear case. It seems to me that is absolutely clear, and ought to be a fair arrangement for the farmers. After having gone that far the farmer may find himself unable to meet his obligations, and he states that he has been unable to meet them; the court of review has then no jurisdiction over him, in which event he goes to the bankruptcy court. I believe that is a correct understanding of the situation. After all this has been done, this bill, which I have described as the companion bill to the one discussed this afternoon, takes effect, and through its operation it is intended if possible to relieve the farmer.

We will suppose that a farmer owes $4,000 and finds that he is unable to pay it. Where will he get that money? My deduction is that it is intended he shall get the money through the farm loan board mentioned in the bill before us. During the last few years I have had some experience with the Canadian Farm Loan Board. I do not know what the experience of other hon. members has been, but in the province of New Brunswick, and in my own constituency particularly, I want to state frankly that we have submitted a large number of cases to the Canadian Farm Loan Board at Ottawa, cases approved by the provincial board and in that respect different from those to which reference was made this afternoon. These cases have gone before the board at Ottawa and time after time have been turned down. I submit that to-day the Canadian Farm Loan Board is simply a collecting agency; it is no longer a lending power. If through the bill before us, which gives additional powers to the Canadian Farm Loan Board to lend on stock and on other securities offered, we get no farther than we have got in the past few years, we will not go very far towards providing money to assist the farmers in their agricultural pursuits. I believe hon. members know that in the past few years the Canadian Farm Loan Board have not done more than could have been done by a collecting agency.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): I suggest that the hon. member is quite out of order; in fact, all this discussion in my view has been out of order. We are now discussing section 5, which has nothing to do with the general principle of the bill. With all due deference to the hon. member I suggest he should confine himself to the subject under discussion.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I presumed that section 5 of the bill was wide enough to permit my going into the whole matter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): Section 5 of the bill limits the amount of money the board may lend. I shall read it.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I beg your pardon; I can read it. That is exactly the point with which I was dealing. I was referring to the amount of money to be lent, and I am very sorry that I did not impress you, Mr. Chairman, with that fact. So far as this bill is concerned it is entirely of the same pattern as the one we passed this afternoon, and the question of lending money is absolutely relevant, I submit. If the farmers cannot get loans from the farm loan board to relieve them in their present distress, they cannot get very far.

If I understood the Prime Minister aright, he said this afternoon he was not sure that borrowers under the Canadian Farm Loan Act and under the Soldier Settlement Act could obtain money under this act. Is that correct?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): That was my understanding at least of the Prime Minister's remarks. If we are going to relieve the farmers we must see that they get a lower rate of interest. I agree with the Prime Minister that that lower rate of interest cannot be brought about by this parliament, but at the same time I submit that if the Canadian Farm Loan Board could get its money at three and one-half per cent it could lend to the farmers of this country on a basis of five per cent. If there is one thing that is burdening the farmers more than another it is the high rate of interest.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): Again let me draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this section has nothing to do with interest. The hon. gentleman is absolutely out of order.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): What has the section to do with, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): I offered to read it to the hon. gentleman a minute ago, and he said he could read it himself.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I do not think I am so dense that I cannot read it. It says:

5. Paragraph (a) of section seven of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

"(a) Loans shall be made only on the security of first mortgages on farm lands up to fifty per cent of the board's appraised value of such lands and twenty per cent of the permanent insured improvements thereon:

The farm loan board has had authority under the old act to lend up to fifty per cent of the value of a man's farm lands. There is a further provision that no one person and no two or more persons having joint or several ownership shall have by way of loan more than a certain amount. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, if I have digressed from the section before us but I had a few observations to make in connection with the lending of money to farmers, and if this is not the right time I shall reserve my remarks until a subsequent section.

Mr. SPENCER: I was interested in the very able case which the Prime Minister made with regard to keeping up the credit of Canada. But there are two distinct sides to that subject, one of which I do not think he stressed enough. If Canada is suffering at all with regard to credit it is because fifty per cent of her people who are on the land are facing a serious financial crisis, and I think it is just as necessary to pay attention to the huge losses that have been incurred by those who have lost fifty to sixty per cent of their commodity wealth as to the possible losses of the financial wealth of other people.

I should like to say a word or two in support of the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat with regard to the administration of the loans of the Canadian Farm Loan Board. I have had an enormous correspondence in regard to this matter in the last two years, and I regret to say that I have never had a letter which has been complimentary to the administration of these loans.

I want to congratulate the government on Bill 92, which may prove to be one of the best pieces of legislation which has been passed by this house to help the farmer to get back on his feet. But if the bill now before us is intended to be complementary to Bill 92, very serious changes will have to be made in the administration of the farm loan act. Not only are the officials of the board collectors at the present time, but they are collectors in the roughest sense of the term. I hold in my hand a letter I received this morning—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to a ruling I made a few moments ago. I must rule the hon. gentleman out of order.

Mr. SPENCER: I do not want to go against your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but the type of collection in the last few years has been one of the worst, and it has been done at a time when the farmer is in a very serious financial condition through no fault of his own. It has been nothing less than brutal, to say the least.

Mr. COOTE: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, this bill received its second reading with practically no discussion, and in such cases it is usual to allow a certain amount of discussion on the principle of the bill when we are in committee. That is the common practice in this house, and it is very unusual for the chairman to insist upon every member of the committee keeping strictly to the clause under discussion when there has been no debate on the principle on second reading. I think it will facilitate the work of the committee and of the house to allow that much discussion. Certainly the question of interest is involved in the question of the amount of money the board may lend, and that is one of the questions dealt with in this section.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): I think the hon. gentleman is well enough acquainted with the rules of the house. All I have to do is to quote subsection 2 of rule 58 which reads:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The hon. gentleman is sufficiently acquainted with the rules to know that a general discussion is not in order when the committee is discussing a section of a bill, and I submit that hon. gentlemen would assist the business of the house by complying with the rules.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, a thing I very rarely do, I submit that when the committee is dealing with a clause which applies specifically to the conditions under which loans may be made and to the limitations upon those loans, is the very time to discuss all the conditions surrounding the loan—the way the loans are made and how they are collected. To my mind there could be no clause on which a discussion of interest rates and of the general policy in respect to the issue of loans would be more relevant than on the one now before us, which deals with the power of the board to make loans, the limitations placed by the board upon such loans, and generally the conditions under which loans are made. It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that we are very much in order in discussing this particular phase at this time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): I do not want to limit the discussion on a question of this kind, and if the committee desires to permit hon. members to ramble on as they have, it is all right with me.

Mr. WILLIS: I take it I would be in order if I spoke in connection with section 5. This reads:

Loans shall be made only on the security of first mortgages on farm lands ...

And so on. My point is that while this section says that they shall be made, the Canadian Farm Loan Board has refused to make any loans within the district which I represent. No matter what the security is, no matter what the buildings are, no matter what the character of the individual may be, no matter what his record may be with regard to that which he has produced, the Canadian Farm Loan Board has thought it unwise to lend within that district. Generally speaking, these loans run over a number of years. In the years 1925, 1926, 1927 and 1928 this district produced perhaps the best crops in Manitoba. For a period of three or four years since that time there have been no crops in the western section of that area. The regular mortgage companies which hold mortgages within this area have refused to continue to lend. At a time when we expected we should get some assistance from the Canadian Farm Loan Board, they have adopted precisely the same attitude and have refused to lend. It seems to me that this board from the point of view of policy, from the point of view of the Canadian people and from the point of view of good business has not adopted the right attitude by saying that because there have been no crops for two or three years they will not advance any money. Particularly is that so when no consideration is given to the past record of the farmer and particularly so because these mortgages, generally speaking, run for a period of twenty years. I take it that this was not the purpose of the setting up of the Canadian Farm Loan Board. I readily realize that the government has no control over the policies of the farm loan board, as it is an independent body set up for that purpose. My criticism is with regard to the judgment of the farm loan board and its adoption of that attitude. Why is it that a farmer who produced twenty-five or thirty bushels to the acre in 1928, who has good buildings, who has a good record as a farmer, whose lands, machinery, cattle and horses are unencumbered, should not be permitted to get a loan? He may be a good man; he may have good possibilities, but this farm loan board has completely blocked out that area and said that no loans shall be made irrespective of the individual, his security or his possibilities. In my opinion that was not the purpose for which the Canadian Farm Loan Board was set up. If an area produced good crops from 1925 to 1928, it is quite reasonable to suppose that it will produce good crops from 1935 to 1938. The farm loan board was willing to make loans in this area up to 1928 at a time when there were poor crops in other areas, but when those other areas are having fair crops and this area is having none, they refuse to make loans. It seems to me that the policy of the board is open to very severe criticism in connection with the way they have handled this situation. I say it is not good business and it is not the purpose for which the board was set up. In my opinion the purposes for which this board was set up are not being carried out by the present management.

Mr. LUCAS: Paragraph (a) of section 7 of the present act states that:

—mortgages taken as security for farm loans and remedies thereunder shall be in all respects subject to the law of the province in which the farm land mortgaged is situated.

Under section 5 of the bill paragraph (a) of section 7 of the act is being repealed, and as I understand the substituted paragraph, it will mean that any loans now taken out will not be subject to the law of the particular province in which the land is situated. I understand that private companies making loans come under the laws of the province in which the loans are made, and I should like to know why the farm loan board should not be placed in the same category.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) must be ill advised as there is no change in the law. Section 7 is being amended and in lieu of the existing paragraph (a) a new paragraph is being substituted. This paragraph does not deal with the matter to which the hon. member has referred, it merely limits the amount to $7,500. It is not necessary to provide that mortgages taken as security on a farm shall be in all respects subject to the law of the province in which the farm land mortgaged is situated, because that is a matter implied; it is a matter of law. It was put in the original act, but it was really unnecessary.

Mr. LUCAS: Does the Prime Minister say that there is no change?

Mr. BENNETT: Except as to the amount.

Mr. LUCAS: I notice the last sentence in the explanatory note reads:

> This provision, in view of the extension of loaning operations provided in Part II of this bill, is not included in the amended subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely, but it does not change that.

Mr. BROWN: I have no criticism to make of the general purpose of this bill and the other bill providing for the possibility of a farmer making a composition to his creditors. If the intentions can be carried out, no doubt the results will be good. However, I am just a little doubtful as to whether it will be possible for farmers to make any great use of either of these bills. This section provides that loans shall be made only on the security of first mortgages on farm lands up to fifty per cent of the board's appraised value of such land and twenty per cent of the permanent insured improvements thereon. If a farmer takes action under the other bill and has his mortgage reduced to a given amount, I think it will be found in many cases that that amount will be more than the amount at which any appraiser would value the lands under present day conditions. Land is not productive to-day because it will not pay the cost of working it. Many farmers have mortgages of from $5,000 to $6,000. Suppose a farmer makes a composition and his mortgage is reduced from $6,000 to $4,000; I believe that those in charge of the operations of the farm loan board will find that $4,000 is too large an amount and will only lend the farmer about $2,000. That will leave the farmer in a position where it will be impossible to take advantage of either of these bills. As I say, I have no criticism to make of the government for their endeavour to solve this problem; I am fully aware of the difficulties which confront them, but I cannot help thinking that the situation which I have depicted is one that is very likely to happen: Some of the machine companies a year ago made a very good offer to their debtors; they offered to take $100 in payment of $112 of debt. That was very good for those who could take advantage of it; but if a man did not have $100—and it was not much easier to get $100 than $112—the offer was not of much use to him. I am just afraid that in many instances some such situation will develop in the actual working out of these two measures we have been considering, good though they may be in intention.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Would it not be possible to have some appeal from the final decision of the Canadian Farm Loan Board? I realize that there will be a great responsibility on the government of the country, but on the other hand I do submit that under the circumstances, in view of the fact that provision is made for appeal from the marketing board as well as in all other acts that we have passed, there ought to be an appeal from the decision of the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was somewhat relieved when the Prime Minister said that there was no change in that feature of the act which brought loans made by the farm loan board under provincial protective legislation such as the debt adjustment and moratorium acts. Is the Prime Minister quite certain? If he is, then the explanatory paragraph is entirely misleading. Section 5 states that paragraph (a) of section 7 is repealed "and the following is substituted therefor," and that substitution deals with the amount of loan which may be made upon first class mortgages. The explanatory paragraph reads:

> The present paragraph (a) of section 7 fixes the maximum loan on first mortgage security at ten thousand dollars. This amendment reduces the amount of the maximum loan to seventy-five hundred dollars to conform with the maximum of the advances on first and second mortgage security fixed by section 9 of this bill.
> The present paragraph (a) further provides that "mortgages taken as security for farm loans and remedies thereunder shall be in all respects subject to the law of the province in which the farm land mortgaged is situate." In virtue thereof, the board has been subject, in the handling of its loans, to the provisions of all provincial debt adjustment and moratorium legislation. This provision, in view of the extension of loaning operations provided in Part II of this bill, is not included in the amended subsection.

So that it would appear to be deleted from this part of the act. But the Prime Minister states that in spite of that deletion, as a matter of common law it will fall under the protective legislation in the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I should make it somewhat clearer than that. The law of the province as to the form of mortgage and all rights and remedies of the mortgagee governs, of course. The debt adjustment act, as a matter of legal opinion, has no reference to it; but in view of the language used in the section, an argument has been built up that the parliament of Canada conferred jurisdiction upon them. That was never intended to be so, because, to be perfectly frank with the hon. gentleman, it is believed by many of those even responsible for debt adjustment acts that they are ultra vires of provincial legislatures in matters of this kind; hence it is they have been very anxious that some such act as that which was passed this afternoon should have been on our statute books. For it is quite obvious that it is a form of bankruptcy that is being carried on under the guise of provincial legislation, and this section as amended leaves it not open to controversy on the ground set up, namely, that the federal power made the mortgages subject in all respects to the law of the province; and they said that one of the respects was the debt adjustment act, which in our opinion is not an argument based on sound law. I should have made that more lengthy explanation but I thought, from the way the hon. member for Camrose spoke, that that was what he had in mind. I am glad to have had occasion to make this more extended explanation.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I assume then that the only part of this explanatory paragraph which is misleading is that which states that by virtue of the second part of the original subsection (a) the loans made by the farm loan board did come within the purview and under the authority of provincial protective legislation such as the debt adjustment and moratorium acts.

Mr. BENNETT: Rather than have long, complicated lawsuits the matter is dealt with in this rather than in the other way.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Purchase of bonds by minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 8 contains two blanks; one is as to the amount of the bond held at any one time by the minister on behalf of the dominion, being not more than $....., and the other provides the extent of the guarantee. At the present moment there is authority conferred on the board to borrow from the dominion Minister of Finance up to $15,000,000. Substantially $10,000,000 has thus been dealt with, leaving practically $5,000,000, and it would occur to me that if the word "forty" were inserted it would leave $30,000,000 that might be utilized in that way; and the guarantee, if conditions improved and the credit of the country warranted, should be substantially the same sum. But I am willing to consider any suggestions made by the committee as to what in the opinion of the members would be the best figure to use. My motion would be that the word "forty" should be inserted after the word "exceed" and before the word "million" in the first subsection, and in the second there should be inserted the words "thirty million."

Mr. YOUNG: Has any estimate been made of the probable demand?

Mr. BENNETT: I intimated to the house the other day, in a long series of figures I placed on Hansard, what the condition was. If conditions improve, as they have in some sections of the country, it is probable that it will obviate the necessity of any sums being provided except for the purpose of implementing undertakings under the adjustment act, and this would be more than ample for that purpose, at least for the next year.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The great agricultural province of Saskatchewan has its fair share of farmers in debt and unable to carry on, and who do not come within the purview of this federal farm loan act. We have provincial legislation whereby farmers have been able to get loans up to, I believe, a maximum of $9,000,000 or $10,000,000, but in recent years the provincial government has been unable to get money to make further loans. Here we are extending the scope of this legislation from $15,000,000 up to $40,000,000. Is there not some way whereby, if money cannot be advanced directly from the federal farm loan board to finance individual farmers in Saskatchewan, the provincial farm loan scheme of Saskatchewan can be financed from this, so that farmers in that province may at least be on an equal footing with the farmers in other provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows perhaps that there are those who used to assert that they were much better off under their act than they would be under this. I do not know just what steps might be taken to meet that situation. When the bill has been finished in committee and stands for third reading I will go over it again and if we can think out any plan by which what has been suggested can be done we shall see that in another place a clause is added to the bill. This question has been giving us a considerable amount of thought but it is not as easy as it appears to arrive at a solution. The farm loan board does not operate in Saskatchewan and we cannot select some other instrumentality that will make advances and over which we ourselves would have control.

Mr. SPENCER: Is Saskatchewan the only province that has not made use of the Canadian Farm Loan Act?

Mr. VALLANCE: It cannot.

Mr. BENNETT: Ontario does not.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): My understanding of this clause is this, and I would like to ask the Prime Minister to verify it: If the board is able to borrow money at three and a half per cent, it will lend it to the farmers of Canada at five per cent. Am I correct?

Mr. BENNETT: Substantially that is right as the law now stands. The amortization fund of two per cent to which an hon. member referred this afternoon is two per cent on account of the principal; it has nothing to do with the interest. I think this afternoon I directed the attention of the committee to the matter. It will be recalled that the appraised value is the value for productive purposes and the interest rate was to be, as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) read this afternoon under paragraph (e) of section 7, a rate that would return the interest on the money borrowed and provide for the expenses of operation and the necessary reserves for losses, or, if no bonds were issued, such a rate as in the judgment of the board would be yielded by the farm loan bonds when issued, increased by provision for expenses and reserves. At the present time the board has fixed one and a half per cent in addition to the going rate. If therefore, three and a half per cent money was secured, that money would be lent at a maximum of five per cent.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): It has been moved by the Prime Minister that the word "forty" be inserted before the word "million" in line eleven, section 8 of the bill and that in the fifteenth line the words "thirty million" be inserted before the word "dollars."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why is it forty in the first case and thirty in the second?

Mr. BENNETT: The forty million dollars includes the thirty million outstanding obligation plus the additional contemplated.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Further loan may be made.

Mr. BENNETT: I have an amendment to move to this clause. If the committee will be good enough to look at it they will observe that the first mortgage loan is limited in practice to a maximum of less than fifty per cent of the appraised value of the land plus twenty per cent of the value of the buildings, and with the further advance it will be seen that the total advance would be approximately sixty per cent. I am therefore changing the figures so that subclause 2 of clause 9 will read:

> The aggregate of loans made to any one borrower under the provisions of this act and of the Canadian Farm Loan Act shall not exceed two-thirds of the appraised value of the land and buildings in respect of which security is taken and shall not exceed at any one time the sum of $7,500. The amount advanced under this section shall not exceed one-half the amount advanced on the security of the first mortgage.

It will be observed that the clause read "one-third." That would have brought about a condition that we are trying to avoid rather than create. The amendment may be made in one of two ways, either substitute the new subclause or change the wording. The amendment will be to strike out the word "one-third" in the thirty-fourth line of clause 9 and substitute therefor the word "one-half".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Just in this connection, in comparing the clause we are just passing with clause 3 of the first part of the bill, I am afraid there might be some contradiction, not in law but in practice. Under clause 3 of the first part of the bill we provide that the board may accept and hold additional collateral security for loans as the board may deem proper. In answer to a question that was asked whether the farmer might be forced to offer this additional security, the Prime Minister said: no, as a matter of his own choice. But from such experience as we have had I am not certain that it will be because, although strictly speaking it may be a matter of his own choice, if a farmer falls into arrears of payment the board might well suggest this would be carried forward and no action would be taken if the additional collateral were given. That having been done—and I am afraid it may be done in a good many cases unless there is a little more leniency shown in administration—farmers who have loans from the board at present would be debarred from securing those additional loans on live stock and personal property which are contemplated in the latter part of the measure. Of course that would not apply to new loans made because they would be made definitely under present conditions, but it might readily apply to a large part of the eight or nine millions now outstanding if the board exercises its power in that way.

Mr. BENNETT: I can give no assurance how the board will exercise its powers, but the words in clause 3 must be read with the words that follow: "May deem proper."

And "deem proper" means proper under the terms of this legislation, that is as to the advances the board makes. The limitations imposed in clause 9 of course prevail and it will be observed that the interest rate on this loan will be only one per cent more and not one and one-half, than is paid for the money; that is because of the character of the loan the clause so provides.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was reading paragraph (g) which is the second paragraph in clause 3 and that covered the very point I had in mind. It is to enable the board to—

> Make such composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement with any borrower on his loan as the board deems advisable.

It would simply put it into the power of the board in case of any farmer who was unable to meet his obligations promptly to insist on receiving this additional security. The additional security being covered by an existing loan, the farmer would be precluded from receiving the additional loan contemplated in the second part of the bill. That was the point I had in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: I know of no way whereby you can substitute an act of parliament for a man's own judgment in connection with a matter of this kind. Either he signs or he does not; there is nothing in this measure to compel him to sign.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There might be a refusal on the part of the board to carry him if he did not sign.

Mr. BENNETT: That is one of the contingencies that must always be contemplated.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Loans to mortgagee.

Mr. BENNETT: I intend to move an amendment to this clause. The other day I promised that we would look it over a little more carefully. It will be observed that subsection 1 provides for loans to the mortgagee on the security of the assignment of the first mortgage in any province in which the board is empowered to make loans. Then instead of subsection 2 we propose the following:

> Whenever a proposal for a composition, extension or scheme of arrangement made under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has been duly approved, the mortgagee shall be eligible for a loan which shall be disbursed to the farmer for such purpose in connection with the proper operation of the farm lands covered by the first mortgage and in such instalments as may be agreed to by the board.

That is to ensure that the money thus advanced goes for the purposes for which the new loan is made. It is not intended to designate them here; they are such as may be agreed upon by the farmer and the board. Then there is an amendment to be inserted as subsection 8 immediately after subsection 7, as follows:

> The provisions of section five of the Canadian Farm Loan Act for the issue of capital stock and subscriptions therefor shall not apply with respect to loans made under this section.

This amendment is proposed for reasons that were given the other day by one of the hon. members of this committee. Then we further propose the insertion of the following as subsection 9:

> The governor in council may make advances to the board out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund for the purposes of this section and the board shall, for such purposes, be deemed to be the agent of the crown and any securities taken by the board shall be so taken on behalf of the crown.

I know my hon. friends opposite have strong views with regard to this procedure, but for reasons which I mentioned the other day it seems to me that in the first instance we cannot do better than this. After this has been in operation during the next fiscal year we will be able to predict what is to be done with some degree of certainty. It will be recalled that we have a control over all the moneys because they are raised under a preceding section and are dealt with in a report made by the farm loan board. It is also the intention to renumber the present subsection 8 as subsection 10.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. COOTE: Might I ask if all the loans made by the farm loan board bear the same interest rate?

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is that there was a slight reduction in the rate after they secured the last block of money, before the depression, but I would not care to give a definite answer to that question. I have not the means at hand of securing the information, but I will get it and send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the Prime Minister would allow me to refer to the other act. Did he specify that the previous act would apply to men holding land on agreement for sale?

Mr. BENNETT: Looking at the context of it I was advised that it did so apply, and in this act, in order that there might be no question about it, the agreement for sale is added. I am advised by the law officers that there is no doubt about it, but if the hon. gentleman has any doubt we can add the words.

Mr. COOTE: Under subsection 4 might I ask if the Prime Minister can say whether he anticipates that the rate of interest charged by the farm loan board might be reduced to five per cent on all loans made after this?

Mr. BENNETT: I would be hardly fair to the hon. gentleman if I made a statement of that kind, for reasons which I think he quite understands. There is no reason why I should not say to this committee that the price of money varies so greatly almost from week to week that you cannot tell at what rate the country may be able to sell its bonds. For instance, shortly after our last loan, owing to foreign disturbances and news that reached the London market, a small loan for £10,000,000 went to a discount of three-sixteenths. The fluctuations take place so suddenly that they cannot be anticipated. It would not be fair to myself or to the committee to say what I thought might or might not be the result of future efforts to secure money at lower rates. If the money can be loaned at five per cent I can tell my hon. friend that we shall be only too glad to so do.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Separate accounts to be kept.

Mr. RALSTON: Might I ask the Prime Minister, with reference to the amendments to section 9, whether the original farm loan act provided that the money should be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament or out of the unappropriated portion of the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. BENNETT: That does not arise under that section. There is provision for a report each year, which report as the hon. member knows is laid on the table of the house. That does not come under section 9, because this is a new fund created for this specific purpose.

Mr. RALSTON: How are the moneys provided in the original act?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will remember that the board had power to issue and sell bonds known as Canadian farm loan bonds; to make long term loans; to hold real estate, and so on. We were to subscribe a certain amount of the capital, not to exceed $5,000,000, which was the first capital the company had. After that they sold their bonds entirely to the Minister of Finance; there have been no public issues so far. The moneys have been borrowed by the country and advanced to the board. Five per cent was to be subscribed by the province and five per cent by the borrower; the rate of interest was to be approximately five per cent, and the bonds were to be for thirty-five years. There is nothing further than that.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought the amendment provided for funds under Part II of this act, regarding supplementary advances, being paid out of the unappropriated portion of the consolidated revenue fund, and I was wondering why these funds were not provided as in the original act, namely through the sale of bonds.

Mr. BENNETT: That is how it is hoped the money will be secured later. You see, it is limited to one-quarter the amount of the mortgage, and the officials thought that the only method by which they would be certain of being able to have the money, in the event of difficulties such as I have indicated, would be to make it a charge against the consolidated revenue fund. It would be a little difficult to issue bonds for the purpose of securing money to be advanced on the equivalent of chattel mortgages. And so, in order not to leave that impression too strongly, that we have engaged in that business, we make it a charge against the consolidated revenue fund, in the first instance, but it is for only a year, and limited to one-quarter the amount of the mortgage. I believe it is one-quarter, at any rate.

Mr. RALSTON: The right hon. gentleman knows what I am referring to. He knows that the right hon. leader of the opposition has always felt that these funds should be provided by vote, and that moneys needed for purposes of this kind should come from moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose, not out of the unappropriated portion of the consolidated revenue fund. I was wondering if the Prime Minister had considered that point, and if it would be possible to have that provision in here, because we can estimate somewhere near the amount of money which would be required.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact I directed the attention of the committee to this point. I am familiar with the views entertained with respect to it, but as I said the other evening, we could have ascertained the fact with respect to old age pensions with much more certainty than we can in the present instance. I did feel that in the first fiscal year of operation we would have to have some little leeway in order to make it effective. I have no desire to depart from what I consider to be sound practice. The section as amended would read:

The governor in council may make advances to the board out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund for the purposes of this section and the board shall, for such purposes, be deemed to be the agent of the crown and any securities taken by the board shall be so taken on behalf of the crown.

That is so far as possible to protect advances, as I think the hon. gentleman realizes, for the purpose of putting the farmer on his feet. We thought there should be that much security given to the crown for the advances thus made. I do not feel in a position to make an estimate.

Section 12 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. BENNETT: Next sitting of the house. We shall now proceed with the shipping bill.

Mr. NEILL: May I call the attention of the government to the fact that this is not one of the items mentioned on Friday night?

Mr. BENNETT: I was so informed.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is any objection, we will take supply. There are some items which could be disposed of.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Loan to Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, repayable on demand with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council, upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine and to be applied in payment of:

(a) Deficits in operation of the company and of the vessels under the company's control, during the year ending December 31, 1934, $1,020,000.

(b) Capital expenditure in connection with vessels under the company's control during the year ending December 31, 1934, $222,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister give a brief statement with regard to the West Indies steamship service?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railway and Canals): I have not that information before me, because I did not expect we would be going on with the estimates tonight. However, these items have been before the committee on railways and shipping, and have been very carefully considered. If there is anything the hon. gentleman would like particularly to ask, I shall try to give him the information. I should not like, however, to make a general statement without knowing what he wishes.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister tell us about the amount of the deficit?

Mr. MANION: This is the exact figure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Were those all approved by the committee?

Mr. MANION: Yes, they have all been before the special committee, and this is the deficit required.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: There is an item standing with respect to penitentiaries, and the Minister of Justice gave an undertaking to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and the member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) not to proceed with it in their absence. I think I had better give notice that we will proceed with that item on Friday next so as to leave no doubt as to that.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health is confined to his room so we cannot take up any items of that department. There are two miscellaneous items that we might take up. One deals with radio. We might go on with that because there is another radio item in the supplementaries when there will be an opportunity to discuss radio matters.

MISCELLANEOUS

Canadian radio broadcasting service, $1,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Was this estimate before the radio committee?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I know that the radio commission explained to the committee all the expenses they are incurring. Their expenses for the past year also appear in the report which was tabled in the house a considerable time ago. I believe they were short some $25,000, and an item in the supplementary estimates for the last fiscal year for $25,000 was already approved by the house, I think it was for expenses incurred in connection with the broadcasting of American programs.

As to the item before us, it is covered by the licence fees collected after expenses have been deducted. My hon. friend will also see in the supplementaries an item of $250,000 also covered by licence fees collected.

Mr. RALSTON: So the total licence fees collected are $1,250,000?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes. The net revenue for the last fiscal year will be around $1,150,000, or $1,200,000, but that amount would include the balance that remained over from last year. The law provides that all the licence fees collected should be appropriated to the commission.

Mr. RALSTON: There is a very small matter which I should like to mention to the minister. I know that in Montreal a number of men are constantly going around to houses asking to see radio licences. They do not call once only, but two or three times. I would ask the minister just what the arrangement is with these men and why it is that householders are troubled in this way.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Since the first of April we have been allowing the house to house collectors for radio licence fees twenty-five cents per licence. A great number of citizens prefer to have the collector call to going to the post office or to some dealer or bank to get their radio licence.

Mr. RALSTON: Is each collector allotted a certain district?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, I think the supervisor in Montreal allocates the districts to the different collectors.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there no way of arranging for the house where the licence fee has been paid to be crossed off the list so that these collectors will not be calling more than once at a house where the licence fee has already been paid and where the licence is on hand?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is very difficult to check the lists up accurately from day to day to show who has paid and who has not paid the licence fee. We have a fairly good system, although ocasionally a collector may call at a house where the licence fee has already been paid. In such a case the collector looks at the receipt and reports.

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to ask the minister to look into the matter because I know one house where the licence fee was paid and men called three times after that, asking to see the licence. The licence fee was not paid to a collector but was obtained through the post office. There is some duplication there that makes it troublesome for the householders who have paid their licence fee. I think the department should arrange some system whereby those who had procured a licence from the post office or other central place would be marked off the list so that they would not be called on.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend will give me the particulars I shall be very glad to look into the case and see that it does not occur again.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Were all the details of this item investigated by the radio committee?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the committee reported yet?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would suggest that we hold over the item in the supplementary estimates for radio if this is to go through to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: We will. There is an item of $250,000 in the supplementaries for radio, and it is not intended to curtail the discussion on that by passing this item.

Mr. REID: Last year I drew the minister's attention to the fact that people who live in cities such as Vancouver or New Westminster are able to obtain the services of radio interference inspectors, and I urged that the same service should be given to people living in the rural parts. Complaints have come to me from rural parts that they cannot obtain the services of interference inspectors. I understood from the minister last year that there was just a certain number of them. I draw his attention to the matter again this year, and would urge upon him that those who live in the country, even if it is only a few miles out, have just as much right to this service as people who live in the city.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have given instructions to every station that the interference inspectors shall give the best possible service in the rural districts as well as in the cities, but of course the rural districts, being further away from the station, cannot get as quick a service as those cities. I am sure that our employees are carrying out my instructions but I will see if some further improvement cannot be made.

Mr. VENIOT: Might I call the minister's attention to a complaint so that he can transmit it to the radio commission? Something seems to be radically wrong with the radio service in northern New Brunswick. We can get New Carlisle quite easily but we cannot get Saint John or Fredericton unless they are hooked up on a dominion wide service, and then we can get them only through New Carlisle.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall draw the attention of the commission to the point raised by my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The Canada Grain Act, including management, operation, maintenance and equipment of elevators, administration of, $1,810,571.10.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is not here this evening but there is an item in the supplementary estimates which will permit of any discussion which may be desired. This item has been discussed at some length, and it is in the hands of the committee as to what action shall be taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it is understood that this matter may be discussed in the supplementaries, we might pass it.

Item agreed to.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Unemployment relief, $2,100,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This item is also covered by another item in the supplementaries so there will be ample opportunity for discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item relates to unemployment relief. As the public works construction program is still to be brought down, I think this item should stand.

Mr. BENNETT: This item relates only to special soldier unemployment. I suggest that this matter could be discussed under items 297 and 298 of the supplementaries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know some hon. members desire to discuss the absence of a clear line of demarcation between the relief granted to returned men and general relief. I thought as regards relief there was supposed to be a line of demarcation between the two. If the Prime Minister will undertake to say that on the supplementary items we may discuss the whole question of relief, whether it relates to returned men or to unemployment generally, I see no reason why this item might not be allowed to pass.

Mr. BENNETT: I think item 297 is broad enough to cover all discussion which may be desired. If it is not, so far as the government is concerned, they will make it so.

Item agreed to.

PENITENTIARIES

Amount required for cost of administration, construction, purchase of land, supplies and equipment, maintenance and discharge of inmates at Kingston, St. Vincent de Paul, Dorchester, Manitoba, British Columbia, Piers Island, Saskatchewan and Collin's Bay penitentiaries, $2,833,850.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Justice undertook that penitentiaries would not be discussed until the hon. member for Kingston City and the hon. member for Southeast Grey were in their places. However, item 289 deals with penitentiaries and can be made the basis of any discussion which may be desired with respect to this matter. We could undertake to debate this on Friday in order to give the two hon. members an opportunity to be present.

Mr. REID: I should like to know if the department has given any attention to the question of hours in the penitentiaries. The minister will remember that I brought up this matter last year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have a report on that matter but I do not have it before me this evening. When the other item is called I will give my hon. friend the information he desires.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would it be possible to set a definite day for the discussion of pensions?

Mr. BENNETT: We are ready to accommodate ourselves to any day the hon. gentleman suggests. It was my purpose to take up the insurance bills on Wednesday.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would Thursday be all right?

Mr. BENNETT: I see no reason why it should not.

Mr. RALSTON: It will not be before Thursday?

Mr. BENNETT: Not before Thursday.

Mr. RALSTON: It is understood that we are to have the opportunity to discuss pensions without limitation to the two items which appear in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. BENNETT: It is understood that on those items all matters relating to pensions may be discussed in all their phases.

Resolutions reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1935, the sum of $135,756,833.73 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 109, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1935.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Lachine canal—to provide for a contribution by the Department of Railways and Canals, in accordance with the agreement of 1930, of one-third of the cost of the construction of a tunnel for vehicular and tramway traffic under the Lachine canal at Wellington street, Montreal, such cost not to exceed $2,356,170, $785,390.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some Montreal members might wish to speak on this.

Mr. BENNETT: We will let it stand.

Item stands.

Contribution to the railway grade crossing fund on account of the obligations of the fund in connection with the Hamilton viaduct, $500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any desire that this item should stand?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for East Hamilton might like to say something about it.

Item stands.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Grant in aid of the four hundredth anniversary celebration of the landing of Jacques Cartier and to assist celebrations at Gaspe, Three Rivers, Ottawa and Niagara, to be disbursed under the direction of the treasury board, $100,000.

Mr. VENIOT: This item is for the celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the landing of Jacques Cartier, and I notice that $100,000 is to be distributed in Gaspe, Three Rivers, Ottawa and Niagara. I do not wish to oppose the granting of this amount but I would call attention to the fact that the place of Jacques Cartier's first landing, in what is now known as the Dominion of Canada, was not on the Gaspe coast but at the entrance to Bathurst harbour. According to the description given in history of his peregrinations in the straits of Northumberland and the bay of Chaleur, he landed first on what is now Canadian soil at the entrance to Bathurst harbour, now known as Caron Point. I do not think the government should have left Bathurst out entirely in the distribution of this amount. I want it to become a matter of general history that the fact is as I have stated.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to meet loss on exchange, subject to approval of the treasury board, $320,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This item I submit with some regret, but there is no method I know of by which it can be obviated. Our contributions to the League of Nations and payments abroad have cost us a very considerable sum of money during the last year. It aggregates the enormous sum of $320,000 to take care of arrears in connection with exchange and to provide for the next fiscal year: Some of the nations of the world have experienced great difficulty in connection with the depreciated currency of their countries and the payment of their servants abroad, and this is the smallest sum that will take care of the situation. I may as well tell the committee frankly that this is a large sum, but there is no other way of getting out of it and discharging our obligations in terms of the gold franc.

Mr. RALSTON: There is nothing else than loss of exchange.

Mr. BENNETT: Those are the exact figures computed in the Department of External Affairs and given me by the Under Secretary.

Item agreed to.

To provide hereby for payment to the province of New Brunswick of the amount at credit of its debt allowance account, $529,299.39.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any reason why we should not proceed with this item?

Mr. VENIOT: It is only the withdrawal by New Brunswick of the amount of its deposits since confederation, although I think the province should have left that nest egg there.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the arbitration expenses, "I'm Alone" case (revote), $4,700.

Mr. BENNETT: There is some likelihood of there being a termination of this matter during the year 1934.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports of the dominion, etc.—further amount required, $25,000.

To provide for payment to William Caven, formerly dominion inspector of excise, compensation and expenses for services performed after his retirement, in connection with the revision of the Excise Act, $1,500.

To pay a compassionate allowance to John M. Leblanc, a former member of the preventive service who suffered injury while on duty on patrol boat No. 3, $2,000.

To provide for the administration of the Income War Tax Act, 1917, and amendments thereof, and authority for this purpose to create positions and make appointments, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This item of $25,000 represents the requisition made by the Department of National Revenue for the extra sum required to enable them to collect revenues. The next item deals with assistance given by Mr. Caven, formerly dominion inspector of excise, in the preparation of the Excise Act which was before the house the other day. The next item refers to a former employee who was injured on board a patrol boat. He would have received this sum under the Workmen's Compensation Act had the provisions of that act applied. That is the advice given the department with respect to the matter. The next item, as will be seen, is the sum required by the income tax branch for the administration of the Income War Tax Act for the purpose of enabling them to give effect to the provisions of the law as they now stand. We had a larger sum the previous year but it was not expended and this amount is required. If the committee thinks it does not require further information than that, we might pass the items; otherwise I should be glad to let them stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The only point about the item is the withdrawal from the provisions of the Civil Service Act of the staff administering the Income War Tax Act. I understand they have never come under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure the leader of the opposition that there is no change in that regard, for reasons of which he is fully aware. You have to get for part of the time chartered accountants and men of that character. They do not work continuously during the year; they work for a given length of time and then are reemployed later. In the stress of time of payment they are employed in large numbers and at other times in fewer.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—

Secretary of State—amount required to pay the expenses of litigation relating to the recovery of payments made on reparation account, $6,000.

Mr. CAHAN: This is required to pay an estimated amount of expenses of the litigation now pending in order to recover certain amounts which it is alleged were obtained by false representations in connection with payments of reparations. I need not stress the matter; I think all hon. members understand the application of this item.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—

Public Archives—further amount required, $51,620.

Mr. CAHAN: Of this, $7,000 is required to compensate employees who are engaged in the Archives office in Paris in respect of the depreciation of our currency when their salaries are paid in francs. Those employees receive very small salaries, hardly a living wage, and when the franc was reduced by forty per cent exchange they were nearly on the street, so I wish to pay that $7,000 loss on exchange. There are one or two small items, but the other large item is in connection with the balance of the payment in respect of the acquisition of the two portraits concerning which I laid orders in council on the table a short time ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to take exception to the purchase of these portraits, but I should like to draw attention to the special pleading of the Secretary of State in his order in council. He has sought to have it appear that the government had made this purchase largely because the previous administration had had some negotiations in connection with a possible purchase of the paintings. I may say the fact is that the previous administration did not purchase the paintings, so that the responsibility for their purchase as well as the full credit for it must fall to my hon. friend.

Mr. CAHAN: I accept it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are both historical paintings which ought in my opinion to belong to the nation, but I do not see that the fact that Lord Durham in his report on the rebellion of 1837 made mention of Papineau and Mackenzie had anything to do with the purchase of the Durham portrait. That is set forth in the order in council or in the statement given to the press.

Mr. CAHAN: Nevertheless, when the dominion archivist recommended the purchase of those paintings I was informed that during the preceding regime an effort had been made to make the purchase but that the figure at which they were held was so high that the purchase was not completed. The judgment of the right hon. gentleman in a matter of that kind weighed very heavily with me and I so represented to council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to remind the Secretary of State that from a reading of the order in council or the published statement one would think that because the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) happened to be the grandson of Louis Joseph Papineau and I the grandson of Mackenzie, he had purchased the pictures.

Mr. BENNETT: It is just possible he did.

Mr. CAHAN: I was influenced very much in another matter because the right hon. gentleman is the grandson of his grandfather. I may state now that the extreme language of the oath of allegiance which is preserved to this day was first adopted by the legislature of Upper Canada at a time when the grandfather of the right hon. gentleman, having been a member, had been expelled. That oath was prescribed apparently for the express purpose of keeping him out of the legislature. The fact of his expulsion and the fact that this extreme form of oath, which was not found anywhere else in the British Empire, was prescribed and exacted under those circumstances constituted a strong argument in my mind in favour of effecting its repeal at this late date, after a lapse of nearly a century.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After having had the satisfaction of witnessing hon. gentlemen opposite move to repeal that particular oath and also of having had the satisfaction myself of joining with them in the vote to have it repealed, I am more strongly convinced than ever that there is such a thing as eternal justice.

Item agreed to.

Labour—
International Labour Conference—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This provides for additional representation at the conference at Geneva and merely covers the expenses at a given rate at which such representation is made. It was claimed that this being the year in which the labour delegates and their advisers and employers and employees were also represented, this represents the sum of money to enable them to go.

Item agreed to.

Labour—
To reimburse Mr. Joseph MacDonald, Winnipeg, Man., for a claim against the Dominion government, equivalent to one-third of his expenditure in connection with a relief scheme which the city of Winnipeg authorized him to undertake in 1921, $5,345.47.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an item that the minister merely reported had been going on year after year in connection with a case in which a man named Joseph MacDonald claimed that he should get one-third of an expenditure which was actually made under the direction of the city. The province paid its third; the city paid its third and we have not paid ours. He claimed that he was entitled to it. He sued the city and lost. Claim has been pressed for this for many years. The minister brought it up and recommended that it should be paid.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was there any arbitration?

Mr. BENNETT: The amount is not in question; the question was as to whether he really should get it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suppose this is not an item on which the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would wish to speak. If the Prime Minister will take the responsibility of going ahead with it I shall be glad to share it with him.

Item agreed to.

Public printing and stationery: plant, repairs and renewals, further amount required, $6,800.

Mr. CAHAN: We had no vote for repairs last year—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Item agreed to.

Mines and geological survey: geological survey: for exploration, surveys and investigations, wages of explorers, topographers and others—further amount required, $24,300.

For publications of English and French editions of reports, maps, illustrations, etc.—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not suppose I can usefully add anything in connection with these technical items. The permanent officials say these amounts are necessary in order that they may discharge their duties. One item is for printing reports, maps and so on of the geological survey, while the other item arises from extra expenditures made in the northwest territories in the vicinity of the pitchblende deposits from which radium is extracted.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there anything in this item for aviation?

Mr. BENNETT: So far as my memory serves me the answer is no.

Item agreed to.

Department of Marine: meteorological service, including magnetic observatory, etc.—further amount required, $14,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This stands in exactly the same position.

Item agreed to.

Department of the Interior: Dominion Observatory: expenses connected with the dominion observatory at Ottawa — further amount required, $2,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. gentlemen will be familiar with this item. This $2,000 is to take care of the extra expenditures that were necessary in order to make this observatory efficient after the reduction of staff became effective under last year's order in council.

Item agreed to.

International Boundary Commission: expenses connected with the maintenance in a state of effective demarcation of the international boundary—further amount required, $12,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This deals with matters for which we have voted funds from year to year. This amount provides for the expenses of the demarcation of boundary lines between the United States and our own country.

Mr. REID: Would the Prime Minister allow this to stand until the minister is here?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Item stands.

Public works—Saskatchewan—
Arcola—purchase of building, $4,500.
Broadview—purchase of property for public building, $4,000.
Gull Lake—to purchase building for post office, $10,000.
Kerrobert—to purchase building for postal purposes, $7,000.
Kinistino—to purchase building for post office, $7,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Possibly this requires a little explanation. The chartered banks have been reducing their branches in western Canada to some extent; where there were two banks now there is only one. These buildings were offered at extremely low prices, and after having them inspected the minister recommended that we avail ourselves of this opportunity to secure public buildings at a very reasonable price. I might just tell the committee frankly how that happened.

Mr. TOTZKE: Does that apply to all the items?

Mr. BENNETT: No, just where you see the purchase of property.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Have they been before the price spreads committee?

Mr. BENNETT: No, but they have been before the committee for making bargains without conscience with those well able to stand any loss.

Item agreed to.

Ontario—harbours and rivers—
Blind River—dredging—further amount required, $2,500.
Little Castor river and Annable creek—contribution to the municipality of the township of Winchester towards dredging Little Castor river and Annable creek, the provincial government to contribute a like amount, $8,000.
Spring creek—contribution to the municipality of the township of Lochiel, Glengarry county, towards the cost of dredging Spring creek, the provincial government having contributed a like amount, $5,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Previously I directed the Prime Minister's attention to a very small work in Nova Scotia, and my right hon. friend said he would examine my representations and endeavour to meet them either in the supplementary estimates or in the public works program. I note that no provision is made here, so I am hoping—

Mr. BENNETT: I think with all confidence the hon. gentleman may rely upon the fact that it is there if it is not here.

Mr. VENIOT: I am sorry the Minister of Public Works is not in his place.

Mr. BENNETT: The item can stand if the hon. gentleman so desires.

Mr. VENIOT: No; the minister may see my remarks in Hansard and give me the information. I understand there is nothing in the supplementary estimates for harbours and rivers in the province of New Brunswick; therefore the minister has not put in anything for the dredging of Tracadie harbour. I understand the dredge has been lying idle there for the last two or three years but that now it is being put in shape in order to be removed to some point in Prince Edward Island. I regret this very much, because the work at Tracadie is very important and if the dredging that has been started is not carried to a conclusion the fishermen of that section will have no protection in carrying on their industry. There is a breakwater costing $176,000 which cannot be utilized until this dredging is done. I hope the government will see its way clear in the bill that is to be introduced perhaps to-morrow, dealing with public works throughout the dominion, to include something for the completion of the dredging of Tracadie harbour.

Item agreed to.

Indians: to provide for payment to the Long Plain Indian Band for lands taken by the Department of Indian Affairs to establish a reserve for the Sioux Indians who formerly resided in the municipality of Portage la Prairie, $14,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is to pay a band of Indians for land taken from them.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police: compassionate allowance to Mrs. Madeline Mary Shoebotham, formerly the widow of the late Superintendent, P. M. Shoebotham of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $810.

Mr. BENNETT: This is merely a small item for compensation.

Item agreed to.

Department of the Interior: to provide for necessary improvements on landing fields and air harbours at Fort Smith and Rae, N.W.T., $3,000.

Grant in aid of Shackleton expedition to Ellesmere island, $1,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The first item refers to improvements to be made at those two far northern ports in order that the airplanes carrying the mails may land with as little danger as possible. The second item has to do with the Shackleton expedition, of which members of the committee doubtless have read. That expedition is going into the far north, and the request was made to the Department of the Interior, if the information obtained was to be made available to the dominion, that they should contribute $1,000. The thousand dollars is thus contributed to the expedition.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Lands, Parks, etc.—

To provide for the building and equipment of a mining recorder's office at Cameron Bay, Great Bear Lake, N.W.T., $5,000.

To provide for the expenses incurred under the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, 1921, and under the agreement between the dominion, Ontario and Manitoba, confirmed by the Lac Seul Conservation Act, 1928, for the construction of a dam at the outlet of Lac Seul and its operation by the Lake of the Woods Control Board, moneys expended to be reimbursed to the dominion by the province of Manitoba under the terms of paragraph 8 of the Manitoba transfer agreement, $20,000.

To provide for the expenses incurred under the Lake of the Woods Convention, 1925, for Canadian participation in legal proceedings in the United States incidental to acquiring a flowage easement over lands bordering on Lake of the Woods in the United States, two-thirds of the moneys expended to be reimbursed to the dominion by the provinces of Manitoba and Ontario under the terms of the agreement of November 15, 1922, $10,000.

Mr. BENNETT: It depends entirely on the committee as to whether we should proceed with these items. I can give the explanations with respect to them. There has been a considerable amount of activity up near Cameron bay, on Great Bear lake, in the Northwest Territories, and it has been thought desirable to erect a building for the mining recorder. Only a small building is required, but as it will be removed some distance from the railhead it will cost about $5,000. Then, as hon. members will observe, the next part of the item is connected with our statutory obligation, in reality our treaty obligation, in connection with Lac Seul and for the expenses incurred under the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, 1921. The next part of the item has to do with the recent legal proceedings which terminated successfully for the contention of the dominion as to the basis upon which compensation should be assessed for those whose lands were affected by the rising of the water in the lake of the Woods district. The contention made by the Department of the Interior and by certain interests in the United States was sustained in the courts of that country. The principle upon which the assessment is to proceed is the ordinary principle of compensation, and not of some special value attached to these particular lands because of their alleged usefulness for particular purposes.

Item agreed to.

Federal district commission—to provide for maintenance and improvement of properties under the control of the federal district commission—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman is aware that arrangements have been made to ask the federal district commission to take over certain work done by the Department of Public Works in this city, as the federal district commission has, shall I say, done the work much more satisfactorily than it could possibly be done by various persons attached to the Department of Public Works. They have the office, the equipment and the machinery.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I assume that we should wait for a better attendance in the committee before proceeding to the items concerning the marketing act and the franchise act, because there might be some further discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, those items might be allowed to stand.

Mr. BENNETT: Then there is to be an opportunity on item 361, under the Department of Trade and Commerce, to allow a discussion to take place with respect to the Grain Act. I do not know whether there is any special interest in the other two items under that department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They had better stand.

Progress reported.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) (for the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) moved the third reading of Bill No. 70, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: I gathered yesterday that the discussion on the shipping bill was to go on to-day, but this evening the hon. member for Comox-Alberni indicated that he did not wish to go on to-night, and for that reason we shall not. To-morrow we will continue with the shipping bill. I promised we would introduce order No. 31 to-morrow, and that we would move the house into committee of the whole on the resolution on which to found a bill. Then we will take shipping, and there are some introductions of bills and some third readings. We will endeavour to get rid of as much as possible appearing on the order paper.

Mr. RALSTON: When will the Prime Minister be considering item No. 30 on the order paper, respecting Bill No. 72, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932?

Mr. BENNETT: I propose to take it on Wednesday. I had set it down for to-morrow, but there was a conference between some of those interested in it, and as a result we will take it on Wednesday.

Mr. SPENCER: When will the Prime Minister go on with the Bank of Canada Act?

Mr. BENNETT: I want to get that to the Senate as soon as I reasonably can. I believe we can take that also on Wednesday.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Tuesday, June 19, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That for the remainder of the session all private bills when presented be read a first and second time and referred forthwith, and that standing order 105, respecting the posting of private bills, be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMITTEE REPORT AND AMENDMENT THERETO

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that the eighth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce be concurred in. It will be recalled that this report was presented on Thursday last. Unanimous consent not having been given at that time the matter stood as a notice of motion. I now desire to make the motion for concurrence, chiefly for the purpose of having approval of the house so that the proceedings may be printed.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to anything contained in the report of the banking and commerce committee. I believe the committee did its work most diligently on the two bills which formed the greater part of their activities, namely Bill No. 18 respecting banks and banking and Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Bank of Canada.

There were two matters dealt with by the committee which I believe were not considered as fully as they should have been. The first is the preamble to Bill No. 19. That preamble states the purpose for which the bank is set up, and I believe greater consideration should be given to it. When I make this statement I am not criticizing the committee in any way. The time at the disposal of the committee was limited, and I know there was a feeling that these bills should be put through the committee stage in good time so as to enable consideration by the house and by the Senate.

As is stated in the report in which concurrence is now moved certain other matters were considered by the committee, namely, the resolution by Major Power asking for an investigation into certain specified items. The last one, particularly, was not given the consideration which I am sure it deserved. This item asked for an investigation into the relationship between the banks, or any of them, and the pulp and paper industry and the extent to which the uncontrolled extension of credit brought about over-capitalization and over-expansion and the subsequent disorganization and near bankruptcy of an industry dealing in some of the most valuable of our natural resources. Then it goes on to ask that certain witnesses be called, and asks that counsel learned in the law should be secured by the committee to assist in the investigation into this particular matter. If I remember correctly the house authorized the committee to employ counsel, but the committee did not see fit to do so when the matter was further considered.

I feel that this matter is a very important one and deserving of further investigation. I should like to urge upon the house that the committee be instructed to give further consideration to it. I know there is a disposition on the part of some hon. members to say that we should not attempt even to suggest to a committee which might sit next year anything as to the nature of the work in which it should engage, but if the committee of this session feel it has not thoroughly investigated the matter, and that it is worthy of further investigation. I believe we would be failing in our duty if we did not state our opinion to the house for the benefit of the committee next year. Without taking up further time of the house I wish to move:

That the eighth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce be not now concurred in but that it be recommitted to the said standing committee with instructions that they have power to amend the same so as to recommend:

That at the next session of parliament the said committee be empowered to consider the degree to which the extension of credit by the Canadian chartered banks brought about over-capitalization and over-expansion in major Canadian industries involving the most valuable of Canada's natural resources; to investigate the role played in that disorganization by the overzealous salesmanship of self-styled investment bankers; to investigate any other matters relating to the capitalization or financing of these major industries; to consider the regulation of credit and currency, the control and protection of the external value of the national monetary unit and the basis, if any, which should underlie that unit, the influences which cause fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment and the proper monetary action necessary to mitigate those fluctuations and, generally, the promotion of the economic and financial welfare of the people of the Dominion of Canada; with power to send for persons, papers and records and with instructions to report from time to time to the House of Commons any recommendations which, if parliament should so decide, should be referred to the executive committee and/or the board of the Bank of Canada for consideration and such action, as in the premises, might be deemed necessary to attain the objects set out in the preamble of the act to incorporate the Bank of Canada; and with instructions that counsel learned in the law and such other persons as the said committee may designate be appointed to assist the committee in the above inquiries.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) is not in order as this house cannot direct what shall be done by the house at the next or any future session of parliament. The question is on the main motion.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Speaking to the motion, Mr. Speaker, may I quote paragraph 2 of the motion moved in the banking and commerce committee by my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power), that the committee inquire into:

The general policies adopted by the chartered banks to combat the effects of the depression, and to what extent the said banks are responsible for the drastic deflation from which the country suffered and is still suffering.

Last year the rate of interest paid by the banks to depositors was decreased by one-half of one per cent. In return the banks were supposed to decrease the rate of interest to be paid by municipalities on the loans advanced to them by the banks, but before that happened, the banks raised their rate of interest to the municipalities by one-half of one per cent, and then later removed that one-half of one per cent, with the result that the municipalities are paying exactly the same rate of interest as they did before, and the reduction of one-half of one per cent paid by the banks to depositors has served only to cover the losses sustained by the banks. So by paying less interest to the depositors it is now the privilege of the banks to increase their reserve funds and to cover their losses. If banking matters are still to be studied by the banking committee until the end of this session I take the liberty of drawing the attention of the members of that committee to that very important fact.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As a member of the committee who asked for delay when the report was first submitted by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) I desire to state my own personal position.

I am quite in sympathy with the sense of the amendment that has just been moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), but I quite agree with Your Honour's ruling that it is possibly out of order. At the same time I desire to state that if at another session I am in my place, I certainly intend to move that an investigation be pursued along the lines contained in the amendment of the hon. member for Macleod.

The first point raised by him was a discussion of the preamble of Bill No. 19. I maintain that we are still entitled when Bill No. 19 comes before the house, to-morrow possibly, to discuss that preamble both in principle and in detail.

The second point raised by the hon. member was the resolution that was moved in the committee on banking and commerce by my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power). I do submit that the committee was handicapped and hampered in its investigations of the six subclauses of that resolution by the unwillingness, if I may use that polite word, of the committee to grant us counsel as we requested on the first day of that investigation. I do still think that the amendment that was moved by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) to have other industries added was very much in order and very much required by the sentiment of the country at the present time. I agree that possibly it may be more in order to move at the next session of parliament that this investigation be pursued.

I must express my own personal disappointment at the reception given by the banking committee to some of the suggestions that were made from the minority groups in that committee. At the same time I wish to express here my sense of appreciation of the fairness and the ability and the courtesy of the chairman of that committee during its recent deliberations.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to add a word to what has been said by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and to take a somewhat similar attitude to that which he has taken. May I also join with him in paying a tribute to the ability and courtesy and fairness of our hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) who so ably presided over the deliberations of that committee.

Mr. DUFF: Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts!

Mr. POWER: Personally I must add to what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that I regret that the members of the committee did not consider it advisable to provide the committee with counsel in order to inquire further into matters which were the subject of the resolution which I proposed in the committee. It is not for me I suppose to apologize for the manner in which the inquiry was conducted, but may I say that from the very moment that it became clear that counsel was not to be permitted, this investigation no longer became an investigation but a polite discussion as between the bankers and some members of the committee. It was obviously impossible for one who is not familiar with all the phases of the banking situation and whose profession does not lend itself to a thorough study of financial conditions in this country to examine or cross-examine leaders of industry and finance in this country with any degree of knowledge. We did the best that we could under the circumstances, and if more information of value to the public and to the committee in its deliberations was not made available, it is due I think largely to the fact that we were not assisted by counsel, accountants and others who would have been able to make a more searching investigation. I should say that in my opinion which may not perhaps be shared by other members of the committee, we did at least bring to light certain facts which were in the public interest and show that though perhaps the professional bankers who appeared before us are men of high standing and character and have carried on their duties as bankers conspicuously well, there are still some defects, if I may use that term, in our banking system and those defects should be studied by those interested in the finances and the financial and economic welfare of this country in order that sooner or later—preferably sooner—they may be remedied.

As to some of the other questions which were brought to our attention and which were studied, mainly the question of interlocking directorates, I have only to point to the admission of the bankers themselves. Both Sir Charles Gordon and Sir Herbert Holt stated that if the power which they had in their hands were in the hands of someone else who in their opinion was less desirous of consulting only the public weal and not their own selfishness, that power would be a very dangerous one. This admission, or statement if you like, was made by Sir Charles Gordon and was confirmed by Sir Herbert Holt. I think this goes a long way towards justifying those who stated in this house that one of the dangers to the body politic was the great control, power and influence which certain prominent industrialists had over the financial and economic welfare of the country.

Hon. PETER VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, before this report is adopted I should like to know if it is the last report of the committee?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: I desire to take advantage of this occasion to refer to an incident which took place before the subcommittee of the banking committee which sat in Montreal. As I read the report a reference was made by Sir Herbert Holt to the development of horse power and the building of newsprint and pulp mills in New Brunswick. He made a statement with reference to Fraser Companies Limited and the premier of New Brunswick. He did not name the premier but I happened to be premier from 1923 to 1925 and had considerable to do with the initiating of the development of water power in that province, especially at Grand Falls. While Sir Herbert Holt was not definite in the statement he made, if he had in mind the connecting of myself as premier of the province with any transactions of Fraser Companies Limited in the development of horse power, I desire to dissociate myself from that reference. So far as Fraser Companies Limited and myself as premier of New Brunswick at that time are concerned, they had nothing to do with the action I was prompted to take in connection with the development at Grand Falls at that time.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have just one word to say in reply. I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) for their kind expressions with reference to myself. I should like to say also that the subject matter of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) was considered very fully by the committee. While there was no unanimity, I think I am within the judgment of the members of the committee when I say that it was considered very fully. The members of the committee thought that no useful purpose would be served by adding a rider of that character. The hon. members for Macleod, Vancouver Centre and Quebec South have referred also to the failure of the committee to implement the authority given by the house to employ counsel. May I say to the house and to the country that this matter was considered very fully and the decision arrived at was that considering in a committee of fifty there were twenty-two members who were lawyers of high standing and with considerable knowledge of public business, the employment of counsel was unnecessary. I think it is the considered judgment of the committee that by this action we saved the taxpayers of this country a large sum of money. One word more. I did not understand that Sir Herbert Holt had any reference to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) in the statement he made.

Motion agreed to on division.

DOMINION NOTES ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I propose to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the Dominion Notes Act. I gave notice yesterday to have this placed on the order paper for to-day. This notice appears in votes and proceedings and I should like to make this motion and give a short explanation before moving the resolution which stands in the name of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart). These two matters are related. With the consent of the house, I should like to move for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Dominion Notes Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Explain.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, in view of the pending establishment of the Bank of Canada which will take over the dominion note issue, it is necessary to introduce in this house a bill which will repeal the present Dominion Notes Act and provide for a strictly limited interim elasticity in the note issue, the necessity for which occurs out of circumstances surrounding this period of transitional issue and the new conditions incident to the establishment of the Bank of Canada. Section one of the proposed bill will provide that $120,000,000 of dominion notes may be issued with twenty-five per cent gold coverage and that any issue in excess of that shall be covered to the extent of one hundred cents on the dollar.

Possibly the house may be interested in knowing something of the present condition of our note issue legislation. I had occasion during the session briefly to direct attention to this and I do not propose to review this matter in full. Under the Dominion Notes Act, which is chapter 41 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, dominion notes may be issued against a twenty-five per cent gold coverage or backing. Above this amount dollar for dollar in gold is required to be held by the Minister of Finance as security for the redemption of these dominion notes. It will be observed that the amendment substitutes $120,000,000 for $50,000,000. In addition to that we have the Finance Act which provides, as is known, for advances of dominion notes being made to the chartered banks on the strength of such approved securities as may be deposited with the Minister of Finance. The Finance Act, as is well known, is chapter 70 of the revised statutes of 1927. Then, in 1915, by chapter 4 authority was given for the issue of $26,000,000 of dominion notes. These notes have been issued and are outstanding; $16,000,000 of them are issued against certain railway securities, and the balance of $10,000,000 has been issued without any specific security.

On the basis of the legal provisions, the dominion's note circulation on May 31, 1934, showed outstanding dominion notes amounting in the aggregate to $171,110,949.69, issued as follows: Under chapter 4 of the statutes of 1915, to which I have just referred, covered by railway securities to the extent of $16,000,000, and not specifically secured as to $10,000,000—$26,000,000. Under the Finance Act, being chapter 70 of the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1927, an issue of $38,444,000; advances made to the banks, secured by deposit of approved securities and under the Dominion Notes Act, being the chapter with which we are now dealing, chapter 41 of the revised statutes of 1927, there was outstanding, May 31, notes to the amount of $106,666,949.69, making a total issue of $171,110,949.69, as I have just indicated.

On the same date, the gold held by the Minister of Finance was reported as follows: Against notes as required by the Dominion Notes Act, chapter 41 of the revised statutes, $69,166,949.69; in excess of the statutory requirements to which I have just referred, $371,002.46—I will not repeat the statutory requirements—and the gold to which I referred yesterday, held in reserve as security for the deposits in the post office savings banks, $2,294,958.85, the statutory requirement being that 10 per cent of gold should be held against such deposits. That makes the total gold held, $71,832,911. If we eliminate the gold that is held for the savings bank deposits, we have a percentage of gold against paper issue of $40\frac{6}{10}$ per cent; that is, for every dollar of outstanding notes at the end of May, the country held $40\frac{6}{10}$ cents in gold.

Now, the most important change to which I am directing attention this afternoon is to authorize the issue of $120,000,000 of notes instead of $50,000,000 as now authorized. The $120,000,000 will be covered by 25 per cent of gold, and above this amount the 100 per cent provision will still apply. In this connection I will trespass upon the time of the house to read again the resolution which was adopted last year at London by the World Monetary and Economic conference. On the recommendation of the subcommittee on technical monetary problems, the conference of sixty-four nations unanimously adopted the following resolution relating to gold reserves to be held by the central banks—D in the report:

> That in order to improve the working of a future gold standard greater elasticity should be given to central bank legal cover provisions; for instance, in so far as the system of percentage gold cover is applied a minimum ratio of not more than 25 per cent should be considered as sufficient; similar elasticity should be achieved by appropriate measures where other systems are applied. However, such changes must not be taken as an excuse for unduly building up a larger superstructure of notes and credits; in other words, the effect of this resolution should be to increase the free reserve of central banks and thereby to strengthen their position.

That is the end of the quotation. It will thus be seen that the proposal I have just suggested to the house, which the proposed legislation enacts, is in accordance with the prudent recommendations of the world conference. In fact, we are providing a margin of reserve in excess of that deemed sufficient by the conference. I offer this comment in advance to dispel any possible doubt in the minds of those who may regard the proposed action as unorthodox or as a departure from the accepted canons of sound monetary practice. Now I shall give the particulars to the house.

The gold coverage under the old and new proposed arrangements is to be calculated as follows: Total dominion notes outstanding on May 31, 1934, as I have already indicated, $174,110,949. Gold held against the notes at $20.67 per ounce, that is, at the statutory figure—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): $171,000,000; the Prime Minister said $174,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: No. Gold held against notes at $20.67 per ounce, which is the statutory value at present provided, $69,537,952, making the present percentage of gold to notes, as I have just indicated, 40 6/10 per cent. The amendment which I am now offering to the house provides for a maximum increase of the present outstanding issue of $52,871,003. The total possible issue, therefore, under the amendment that I submit, would be $223,981,952. That is on the basis, of course, of the present advances under the Bank Act, which I have already indicated amount to something over $38,000,000. The present gold holdings, as I have just indicated, at $20.67 per ounce, would give us 31 per cent of coverage in gold, even with the increased issue that I have indicated. But if we value the present gold holdings at the present market rate of $35 per ounce, we should have the value of our gold at $117,746,895; and the revalued gold would thus be 52½ per cent of the entire issue provided for by this legislation.

I think it is unnecessary to say to this house that that is a very, very large reserve to have against the issue of paper, of dominion notes. Now, the calculation on the basis of the revalued gold is intended merely to indicate to the house the substantial gold reserves that are held at the present moment and will be held against the increased issue to which I have referred.

I now further indicate to the house the possibilities which the Bank of Canada will have when the transfer of the note issue takes place and after revaluation is effected. In the United States, as is known, they have revalued their gold so that at the moment the reserve of gold held in that country under the new valuation is between $8,000,000,000 and $9,000,000,000. When our revaluation is effected here as I have indicated, if we exercise the power that I am seeking by the legislation submitted to the house, of issuing $120,000,000, we shall still have 52½ per cent of gold coverage on all the paper thus issued.

In the second place, I desire to point out in these calculations no reference has been made to the gold of the chartered banks which is to be transferred to the Bank of Canada. Next, I desire to indicate that the Dominion Notes Act so amended is only to operate until the Bank of Canada Act is in force and the bank is established, at which time, of course, as is well known by hon. members who have been following the legislation, the dominion note issue will be taken over by the new bank under legal requirements as to gold reserve less stringent than those which the present amendment proposes. I need hardly remind the house which has been engaged in passing the legislation, that under the provisions of the statute the bank will be called upon to hold 25 per cent in gold of all the notes that are issued as well as 25 per cent of the deposits which may be made with it under the circumstances provided for in the bill itself, that is by the chartered banks or by the nation itself as the case might be. I mention this because while some hon. members are of the opinion that I err on the conservative side in connection with this legislation, this is to fill the gap between the time when the new bank begins to function and the rising of this house; that is, we must make provision for the situation that develops between now and the time the new bank comes in, and we have dealt with the matter as indicated by this legislation. I think it may be said that the effect of the amendment will be to provide an element of elasticity in the note issue, which element of course is to be one of the outstanding features of the central bank and one which we believe will be of the utmost value to the dominion.

The next point I desire to make in regard to the amendment has to do with the necessity of making some provision for our credit situation during this transitionary period. Hon. members are all aware that the dominion notes provide the greater part of the base on which our commercial credit structure is reared. One of the banks the other day in the committee said that they had holdings, I think, of $40,000,000 worth of dominion notes. The reserves of the banks are largely held in dominion notes and in fact the statute requires that 40 per cent of the reserves shall be so held. The result is of course that the base of our credit structure is in dominion notes. That has been so and under the new legislation the notes issued by the new bank will constitute that base. In the past when the banks have needed to strengthen their position they have, in order to meet any situation that they thought required treatment or consideration, merely secured advances under the provisions of the Finance Act. That act of course will be repealed and in fact this afternoon I am submitting an amendment providing for its repeal when the new bank begins to function. It will therefore be apparent that the banks in that transitionary period may feel some hesitancy in utilizing the Finance Act, knowing it will cease to operate when the new bank begins to function. To meet that situation it is desirable to provide for greater elasticity in our credit structure and also to enable the banks by that means to meet any growing demands that may come from industry if there is an improvement in economic conditions. I think it may be said that the provisions of the proposed measure will afford that ample foundation, which business may demand for our commercial credit structure during the transitionary period. When business was at a low ebb the requirements were very much limited; as business increases the demand for credit and currency becomes greater and in order that there may be no question as to the sufficiency of the provisions of our legislation during this transitionary period to meet the situation, I have offered the amendment in question.

But I propose also to deal with another phase of the matter that this measure will assist, namely, the program of public works to which I shall presently refer. Before doing that, however, I desire to point out that the amendment submitted to-day in the new bill contemplates the purchase of silver by the Minister of Finance in accordance with the London agreement to the extent of 1,671,802 fine ounces for the year 1934 and the payment therefor by the issue of dominion notes. Of course it will be within the memory of members that the purchases during the succeeding years, 1935, 1936 and 1937 are to be made by the new bank and not by the Minister of Finance. Then, as I have just indicated, the bill that I now ask leave to introduce provides for the repeal of this statute when the proclamation is issued bringing into force the statute that creates the Bank of Canada. A similar bill with respect to the Finance Act will also be offered to the house this afternoon.

In addition to that the Public Works bill that I will announce to-day is one of the means by which the provisions of the act as amended may be utilized. While each, of course, must be considered independently of the other, the fact is that the two measures are mutually supplementary and are part of a policy primarily concerned with the restoration of sound business conditions in the dominion. With these all too lengthy explanations of the provisions of the bill that is proposed to be offered to the house I now move for leave to introduce Bill No. 110, to amend the Dominion Notes Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FINANCE ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 111, to repeal the Finance Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill I think I have already indicated. It becomes effective only upon the Bank of Canada Act being proclaimed and the bank beginning to function as a central bank in this country.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REPEAL OF STATUTE OF 1915

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 112, to repeal chapter 4 of the statutes of 1915.

He said: This bill, which is complementary to the other, is to repeal chapter 4 of the statutes of 1915, which authorized under the conditions I have indicated the issue of additional dominion notes. That, of course, will have to be repealed, for when these two statutes have been repealed the dominion will have to provide the central bank with three per cent bonds, the return from which of course will inure to the benefit of the dominion under the provisions of the statute, but it is done as a matter of bookkeeping to provide for the new institution taking over the responsibilities and obligations to which I have already referred.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FARMERS'-CREDITORS' ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 92, to facilitate compromises and arrangements between farmers and their creditors.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

PROVISION TO FACILITATE AND INCREASE EXTENSION OF CREDIT TO FARMERS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 93, to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Yesterday when we were in committee of the whole on this bill the Prime Minister who was sponsoring the measure indicated that on the third reading he might be prepared to state whether there was any possibility of extending the legislation to help a province like Saskatchewan. I would like to remind him again, as the sponsor of the bill and the leader of the house, that the situation under discussion is one that merits consideration. Just recently I had correspondence with a farmer in my own district who purchased land during the era of high prices at $40 per acre. He has been unable to make any payment. Recently he was offered the land at $10 per acre if he could raise the money to pay it in cash. He got in touch with our provincial farm loan board and was advised that they were unable to advance any money. That is one case, which might be multiplied hundreds of times, in which farmers who are in financial difficulty, if they could get some money could readjust their finances so that they would have some heart to carry on. I realize that our province is operating under its own scheme. I recall when the federal farm loan scheme was put through the political complexion of our federal government was the same as that of our provincial government. Yet our provincial government saw fit to carry on under their own scheme. At the present time however they have not the money to carry on, and they are unable to raise the money at as low a rate as this federal government is able to raise it. The thought I had in mind was that if the money which is raised for this scheme could be used to help out our provincial scheme I am sure it would be a great boon to a great many struggling agriculturists in the province of Saskatchewan, and I should like again to ask the Prime Minister if there is any method whereby he thinks such a measure might be made helpful to that province?

Mr. BENNETT: While I have no right to reply, I believe with the permission of the house I have the right to answer a question. I can say only this, that the same conditions obtain in the province of Ontario as in the province of Saskatchewan. Neither province has accepted the provisions of the Farm Loan Act. And the only method, so far as we can at the present time discern by which the benefits of the compromise statute might be made available in Saskatchewan would be by loans made to the province for that particular purpose. That phase of the matter has engaged our attention, and no definite conclusion has been arrived at.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like now to proceed with order No. 8, an act respecting shipping. I have to leave the chamber for a short time, but presently I shall move the committee up, and take up the resolution at any time which suits the convenience of the right hon. gentleman.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, respecting shipping—Mr. Duranleau—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 2, subsection 26—Foreign voyage.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When this subsection was allowed to stand a few days ago I had an amendment to move for the purpose of clarifying the definition of a foreign voyage. The section as amended would read as follows:

"Foreign voyage" means a voyage extending beyond the area of a home trade voyage, and not being an inland or minor waters voyage.

I believe this definition is clearer than the former one.

Mr. REID: Will the term "home voyage" take care of a ship leaving the port of Vancouver and going via the Panama canal to Montreal? The minister will remember that I discussed this matter the other day, and pointed out that Canada had adopted the definition of "home trade" as it appears in the British Merchant Shipping Acts, and I indicated that a vessel leaving the port of Vancouver and going to Montreal would be designated as a foreign-voyage vessel.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I shall indicate in a moment or two, the definition of a home trade voyage does not take care of the situation described by the hon. member. The term "foreign voyage" is not based on geography, but is based on the dangers of the sea. A ship making a home trade voyage should not go outside the two hundred mile limit from the land or from the shore, and if a ship were to leave Vancouver for Montreal, travelling via the Panama canal, it would have to take to the deep sea at a point far beyond two hundred miles from shore. It is designated as being on a foreign voyage and there must be considered the strength of the ship, the life saving apparatus and the certificates of masters and mates.

Mr. REID: As it is not my wish to delay the committee any more perhaps I would do well to make a general statement. As I pointed out earlier in the previous discussions, this is a very serious matter. A ship leaving the port of Vancouver and going to South America is in no more danger than one going through the Panama canal and up the Atlantic coast to the port of Montreal. Previous to this I understand that a home trade voyage would include a ship leaving the port of Vancouver and going to Montreal. The present legislation will necessitate a change of certificates and many changes which I suppose the committee has not time to discuss.

I shall, in a few general statements, outline my objections to the bill. The sections which I object to and which were allowed to stand dealt with questions as to whether or not ships should be designated British or foreign, the load line, the point as to whether or not a ship should be designated a vessel or a boat, the recording of ships, the certificate of masters, mates and engineers, safety regulations, and reciprocal arrangements affecting the accepting of certificates. There are, I would again point out, 130 sections dealing with seamen,—wages, dismissal, sickness, and every condition under which seamen may be employed or engaged. My protest on former occasions and again to-day is that no personal representations from the seamen has been heard. Then, there are certificates of pilots and examiners. I am very sorry indeed that the minister has not seen fit to embody the amendments suggested which were allowed to stand over. I again protest against the one now under discussion, because it affects ships loaded with lumber, and other cargoes, leaving the ports of Vancouver or New Westminster.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether or not you will allow a general discussion on the amendments, but as the hon. member for New Westminster has opened the matter probably the atmosphere would be cleared if a few general observations were made.

Some days ago I voiced my regret that the government had decided to proceed with this bill. Since making those observations I have received a number of letters supporting my contention and saying that the various shipping interests, vessel owners and seamen have not had time to consider the bill and for that reason would desire to have it stand over. However, as I have stated I do not intend to make any further protest. In view of what I have heard since the introduction of the bill I intend to deal with certain amendments, and if the minister will agree I intend to make only one speech, and that one will be very short. If he is content I shall send him my suggestions with regard to certain amendments which I believe might be incorporated. I shall deal with the whole matter in a few moments and then leave it to the government to decide what they will do. The minister has moved that clause 26 of section 2 be amended. Now clause 26 as it appears in the original bill "E" from the Senate reads:

> "Foreign voyage" means either a voyage between a place in Canada and a place not in Canada other than a place within the limits of a home trade voyage or a voyage between places not in Canada and not all within the limits of a home trade voyage.

It would take a Philadelphia lawyer, let alone a sailor, to tell what that means, and the minister recognizing that the language was not clear arranged with one of his colleagues on the other side of the house to move an amendment, and here is the amendment:

> "Foreign voyage" means a voyage extending beyond the area of a home trade voyage and not being an inland or a minor waters voyage.

Why, Mr. Chairman, should we introduce into that amendment of the minister's any reference to a minor waters or inland voyage? Surely nobody who knows anything about the sea will require to have in mind in dealing with this section either a minor waters or an inland water voyage. I am going to suggest to the minister what I consider a real amendment to this clause. I am not going to move it; I am simply going to suggest it. It is expressed in real sailor language, in words that every sailor can understand. Not only will every sailor and mariner understand it, but I am sure that my hon. friend from Pictou will agree with me that it is a proper definition so far as this bill is concerned of what a foreign voyage means. We do not want in this bill language which nobody can understand except perhaps a lawyer or somebody else living a thousand miles away from the sea. What we want is language that a sailor can understand, and therefore I suggest to the minister that clause 26 in section 2 read as follows:

"Foreign voyage" means a voyage between Canada, and a port east of the 60th degree of longitude and south of the 5th degree north latitude, and north of the 65th degree; and a port west of the 125th degree of longitude, and south of the 5th degree north latitude, and north of the 65th degree.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Nobody will understand that.

Mr. DUFF: I can quite understand that my hon. friend coming from a farming district in Manitoba does not understand it, but let me put it in simpler language so that even the Minister of Marine will understand it.

My hon. friend from New Westminster has raised the question of a home-trade voyage which is defined in subsection 38 of section 2 as follows:

"Home trade voyage" means a voyage not being an inland or minor waters voyage between places within the area following to wit:—Canada, the United States of America, the territory of Alaska not west of cape Spencer, Newfoundland, Labrador, St. Pierre and Miquelon, in the course of which a ship does not go north of the 60th parallel of north latitude or south of the 36th parallel of north latitude.

The other day in speaking on this clause I called the minister's attention to the fact that a vessel sailing from Nova Scotia to Hudson bay would be going on a foreign voyage, according to the definition I have just quoted. Surely Hudson bay is in Canada. If any part of this country is in home waters, surely Hudson bay is. But under this definition of a home-trade voyage a ship could go to Greenland because she does not go north of the 60th parallel of north latitude, but she could not go to Hudson bay without being considered to be on a foreign voyage. I say, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that subsection 38 of clause 2 should be amended. That is the subsection that defines a home-trade voyage, and I say that it does not give us the best definition. In my opinion the old reference to a "coasting" voyage was much more understandable than the words "home-trade" voyage. And under section 73 of chapter 186 of the statutes of 1927, being the Canada Shipping Act, a coasting voyage is defined as follows:

[Mr. Duff.]

"Coasting voyage" means a voyage between any port or place in Canada, and any other port or place in Canada, or in Newfoundland, Labrador, or St. Pierre or Miquelon, or any port or place in the United States of America or Mexico or Central America or in the West Indies, or on the eastern coast of South America not further south than forty degrees south latitude; or on the coast of the territory of Alaska, or of the western coast of South America not further south than forty degrees south latitude.

My hon. friend the member for New Westminster asked the minister to consider whether a home-trade voyage should not include a voyage from Vancouver through the Panama canal to Halifax, but the minister in his answer, if I understood him aright, did not agree with that. But under the act which is in force now a vessel could go to Buenos Aires on a coasting voyage or any other place in South America not further south than forty degrees south latitude. But in this bill which has come to us from another place I notice that according to the definition given in subsection 38, if a ship goes south of the 36th parallel of north latitude, it is a foreign voyage. That is, under this definition a ship cannot go to Buenos Aires and be considered on a coasting or home-trade voyage. No, it can only go as far south as cape Hatteras, and where is cape Hatteras? Cape Hatteras, as everbody knows, is only a stone's throw from the Delaware river in the United States of America. Surely if we are going to have what is called a home-trade voyage, it at least should include places where Canadian ships go in the regular course of their business in carrying on the trade and commerce of this country and with other countries.

I agree with the minister that perhaps the old act went too far in allowing a vessel to be considered on a coasting voyage when it went not further south than forty degrees south latitude, which would include Buenos Aires. I am not going to argue with the minister whether it should be a home-trade voyage or a coasting voyage, but I do submit to the minister that a home-trade voyage in the proper sense of the term should mean a voyage between ports in Canada and other ports in Canada, and I am sending my suggestion across to the minister. But in subsection 38 of section 2 the minister goes outside of Canada. He goes to the United States, a foreign country. He goes to St. Pierre and Miquelon or to Newfoundland and Labrador. Surely, Mr. Chairman, a coasting voyage is a much more appropriate name than a home-trade voyage, but I am not going to quarrel over that with the gentlemen in the other chamber or with the minister. I am going to suggest an amendment to the minister which I shall send over to him, that subsection 38 of clause 2 should read as follows:

"Home trade voyage" means any voyage not being an inland or minor water voyage, between places within the areas following, to wit:—Canada, the United States of America, the territory of Alaska, not west of cape Spencer, Newfoundland, Labrador, St. Pierre and Miquelon and the West Indies, in the course of which a ship does not go north of sixty-five (65) degrees parallel of north latitude or south of five (5) degrees parallel of north latitude.

What does that suggestion mean, Mr. Chairman? It means that Canadian ships could go north into the territory of my hon. friend from Nelson, up to Hudson bay, and still be on a home-trade voyage, but it would be a foreign voyage under the clause that stands in the bill because if a vessel goes north of the 60th parallel of north latitude that is considered a foreign voyage. I trust that the minister will accept my suggestion that the north latitude be extended from the 60th parallel to the 65th parallel, which would allow vessels to go to the Hudson bay and still be on a home-trade voyage.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amendment I have suggested will eliminate entirely the latitude in the north.

Mr. DUFF: I could have made it seventy degrees or one hundred degrees, but that would not have made any difference. I am very glad the minister has adopted my suggestion. As I explained the other day, with the subsection remaining at sixty degrees, no vessel could go to Hudson bay on a home trade voyage. There is no need to take out the latitude altogether. I would suggest that the minister adopt my suggestion and make it the 65th parallel instead of the 60th. Also, instead of having it the 36th parallel of north latitude, which is cape Hatteras, he should have it the 5th degree of north latitude.

Subsection 110 of this section gives a definition of the West Indies. It reads:

"West Indies" includes the West Indies, the Bahama and the Bermuda islands.

I am going to try to show the minister why subsection 38 should extend from the 36th degree of north parallel down to the West Indies to the 5th degree. If we are going to include the Bahama and the Bermuda islands, I think we should take in more territory. The Bermuda islands are 700 miles from St. Kitts, the nearest West Indian island. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) knows this. Home trade voyages should include both places where our Canadian merchant marine and our Canadian National steamships and the ships from Nova Scotia go. I suggest to the minister that the latitude given in section 38 should be extended to the 5th degree north latitude. The hon. member for New Westminster has suggested that a vessel should be able to leave Vancouver, go down the Pacific coast, go through the Panama canal and come up to Halifax or Montreal on a home trade voyage. I am sending over to the minister a copy of my suggestions in connection with subsection 110. I am suggesting that it should be amended to read as follows:

"West Indies" includes the West Indies, the Bahama and the Bermuda islands and British Guiana.

If the West Indies and the Bahama islands are considered as a home trade voyage, British Guiana should be in the same position. I hope the minister will consider my suggestion.

I have a further suggestion to make in connection with subsection 38 of section 2. Apparently the gentleman who drafted this bill felt that he had to earn his money. I do not blame him because if I had been drafting it I would have made it twice as large and used perhaps twice as many words. There is no need for all this verbosity in these clauses. I suggest that subsection 38 should be amended to read as follows:

"Home trade voyage" means any voyage between five degrees of north latitude and sixty-five degrees of north latitude, both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

I think this covers the suggestion of the hon. member for New Westminster, and it is certainly more simple. Let us go to Hudson bay if we want to; let us go through the Panama Canal to the Pacific coast. Why have all this verbosity? Let us cut out all this nonsense and have a clause which sailors, mariners and shipping men can understand. May I suggest laughingly to the minister that he should have asked me to help with this thing. I could have framed a simple clause which a sailor, a captain, a merchant or anybody else could understand. Let us adopt something reasonable and fair; let us have something which the people of the country can understand.

I have dealt with subsections 26, 38 and 110 of clause 2. I shall now deal with subsection 89. As it appears at present, this section reads:

"Sailing ship" (except as may be provided under the load line rules) means a ship propelled wholly by sails, and includes a ship in excess of five tons, gross tonnage, provided with masts, sails and rigging sufficient to allow her to make voyages under sail alone, and which, in addition, is provided with mechanical means of propulsion, the power of which does not exceed three nominal horse power.

Such a section is very much against the best interests of this country. In this day and age sailing ships are equipped with means of propulsion outside of masts and sails, and I am going to suggest a change in this subsection. I am sending over a copy to the minister. I am suggesting that subsection 89 of section 2 be amended to read as follows:

"Sailing ship" (except as may be provided under the load line rules) means a ship wholly or in part propelled by sails,—

The present definition is a ship propelled wholly by sails, and I say that that is not in the best interests of the country. My suggestion continues:

—and includes a ship in excess of ten tons, gross tonnage, provided with masts, sails and rigging sufficient to allow her to make voyages under sail alone, and which, in addition, is provided with mechanical means of propulsion, the power of which does not exceed ten nominal horse power.

It will be noticed that in speaking of other means of propulsion I have increased the nominal horse power from three to ten. If the business of this country prospers and we are able to develop our fisheries, we will need a large number of vessels partly propelled by sails but which in addition will have auxiliary power. If the minister is going to encourage men on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts to build vessels for use in the fisheries, their horse power must be sufficient. I ask the minister to accept my suggestion and provide that in addition to a sailing ship meaning a ship propelled wholly or in part by sails, it shall mean one which is provided with mechanical means of propulsion, the power of which does not exceed ten nominal horse power.

Mr. Chairman, I continue with your permission. As I said at the beginning, I do not want to make half a dozen speeches.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I have not called the hon. member to order because of his introductory explanation, but the discussion is out of order. However, I have no objection if the committee desires to proceed in this way. Section 2 is under discussion and the hon. member is dealing with the various subsections of another section.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I would rather let my hon. friend make his full statement.

Mr. DUFF: I am trying to save time, because once I sit down I am not going to get up again. I want to discuss the implications of section 113, in regard to which I sent over to the minister a suggestion I have to offer on this important matter. Section 113 comes under Part II, and my own idea is that Part II is the most important part of this act; and while I am not under section 2, I submit that section 113 deals with some of the definitions that come under section 2. Now, section 113 is a very long and complicated provision, dealing with all sorts of things, and my idea is to make it concise. Instead of having all this tomfoolery and nonsense about pleasure yachts, ships solely employed in fishing, passenger steamships not exceeding five tons gross tonnage, barges or other vessels, and so on, we should have a concise definition such as I am going to propose. I sent over to the minister a section which I think would simplify the whole matter. I propose that section 113, subsection (1), be amended to read as follows:

Every British ship, except ships under 150 tons registered tonnage, and which does not have engines of more than ten nominal horse power, when employed in the trade of Canada, shall be an exempted ship.

That simplifies the whole thing and does not refer to pleasure yachts or fishing vessels or anything else. It simply proposes that every vessel under 150 tons registered tonnage, whether propelled by steam or by ten nominal horse power, shall be exempted from the necessity of having certificated masters and mates. That I submit is a much better clause and one which would meet the desires of those who are engaged in the fishing industry or who have to sail the seas, men who have been sailing vessels for ten, fifteen, twenty and thirty years, without any certificate. If this bill passes, with section 113 as it now reads, these men will not be able to sail their ships; they will have to have certified masters, which is impossible. More than that, they will have to have certified engineers to sail a fishing schooner or a barge or any other kind of vessel. My amendment, from line 25 of section 113, subsection (1), will read:

shall, when going from any place in Canada, be provided with masters and mates duly certificated, according to the following scale:

That means that every vessel over 150 tons must have a duly certificated and qualified master and mate.

(a) In any case, with a master holding a certificate of the proper grade and class;

(b) If the ship is a passenger ship, and certified to carry more than forty passengers, or is a foreign-going ship of over 150 tons, registered tonnage, with at least one officer besides the master, holding a certificate of the proper grade and class not lower than that of first mate.

Under this bill as it now reads there are at least one hundred and fifty men in Nova Scotia who have sailed ships to Oporto, Bristol, England, Barcelona, Italy, Greece, Bahia and Pernambuco, as well as other places, who will not be allowed to do so in the future. These men have been sailing ships for anywhere from ten to thirty years; they are well qualified. But if they had to pass an examination they could not do so, any more than I can teach my little grandson his lessons when he comes from school and says, "Grandpa, will you tell me how to spell this, that and the other." It is impossible, and surely the minister and the government do not intend to throw these men out of employment. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) knows as well as I do that there are men in Nova Scotia who have been going to sea for thirty and forty years without certificates, in vessels under 150 tons, and I suggest that if in paragraph (b) which I have just quoted, as I suggest it be amended, we substituted 150 for 100 it would meet the situation not only on the Atlantic but on the Pacific coast as well. Surely the minister will see the necessity for such a provision, instead of passing this bill as it stands, which would result in throwing hundreds of fishermen, sailors, masters and mates out of employment, because they have no certificates and will simply have to go on the beach. They will be without employment.

Why did not the person who drafted this bill follow the British act entirely? Why did not this gentleman from Vancouver with his paste pot and scissors cut out the whole Merchant Shipping Act of Great Britain? Why did he take part of the British act, part of the Canadian act and God knows what else and jumble it all together into this conglomeration? Let me point out to the minister that under the British act to-day a man without a certificate may not only sail a sailing vessel but he may sail a steamer as large as the Empress of Britain, without a certificate.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Do you think it is right for a man without a certificate to sail a boat as large as that?

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend is four inches shorter than I. Does he mean to say that he cannot navigate his way from the main entrance of this building to this chamber as well as I can? It is the same thing. What I say is that under the British act a captain may sail a steamer as large as the Empress of Britain, without a certificate, provided that no passengers are carried. Not only that, but a steamer that size can carry a mate and engineers without certificates, so long as there are no passengers on board. Surely no one will deny that our home trade waters are just as treacherous and the conditions just as strenuous as they are around the British Isles. If the minister will look at the definition of home trade voyage, so far as Great Britain is concerned, I think he will come to the conclusion that if the British government and the British people, in order to encourage their merchant marine, are willing to allow vessels to be sailed, under certain conditions, without certificated masters, mates and engineers, there is no reason why section 113 of this bill should read as it does at the moment. I suggest therefore, in addition to amending section 113 as I have proposed, that section 117 be amended to read as follows:

Certificates of competency as engineer be granted in accordance with this act for the following grades:
First class engineer.
Second class engineer.
Third class engineer.
Fourth class engineer.
Probationary engineer.

To-day there are at least 150 young men, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five, who are on board Nova Scotia vessels propelled by auxiliary power, and these men, if this bill goes through as it stands, will be thrown on the street. They will not be able to sail those vessels. I would like to know who is going to sail them? Has the minister any engineer to send down? What about Mr. Griffin of Vancouver or Mr. O'Connor? Will they provide the engineers or will the nineteen senators in the other house who hardly ever saw salt water and who put through this bill, send engineers to man those ships either in Nova Scotia or on the Pacific coast? That was my reason for asking in the first instance that the bill should stand over so that people throughout the country might study these clauses and the minister might get their views with the result that next year he would come before the house with a bill that would be a right and proper one in the interests of shipping and of the people of this country. Therefore I say that in clause 117 the words "temporary engineer" should be changed to "probationary engineer," so that young men in machine shops, young men who can handle these crude oil or gasoline engines that are used to run these vessels need not have to go through a long rigmarole and have a lot of government officials go down and put them through a severe test and examination with the result that they cannot pass it and consequently cannot take charge of the engines in those steamboats.

Clause 118 is another to which I am going to refer. Clause 118 as it stands at present reads:

Every British subject who—
(1) served as a master or mate of a foreign-going or home trade sailing ship of over seventy-five tons, gross tonnage, before the first day of January, 1931, for a full period of twelve months within ten years immediately preceding the date of his application for a certificate of service.

Whoever heard of a foreign-going vessel of seventy-five tons gross register? Who put that into the bill? Was it the minister or the deputy minister or one of his officials who inserted in the bill the provision with regard to a foreign-going vessel of seventy-five tons? I know, of course, a man named Jacobs crossed the Atlantic in a dory some thirty years ago and somebody is now trying to cross the Atlantic in a small boat, but whoever heard of a foreign-going vessel of seventy-five tons register? The whole thing is ridiculous. Is it any wonder that I get warmed up about the matter? Who advised the minister? Who advised the leader in the other part of this parliament to allow that clause to go through? A vessel of seventy-five tons going on a foreign voyage! The thing is ridiculous. The minister should have the committee rise now and report progress instead of going on with this bill. This is a new clause. By whom? By Mr. Pastepot and Mr. Scissors, or who was it that drafted the clause? I am going to suggest to the minister that clause 118 be amended to read as follows:

Every British subject who—
(1) served as a master or mate of a foreign-going or home trading sailing ship of over one hundred and fifty tons registered tonnage, before the first day of January, 1931, for a full period of twelve months within ten years immediately preceding the date of his application for a certificate of service—

And so forth. I will not read the other part of the clause. If a man wants to sail a ship of 400 or 500 tons and go on foreign voyages, it is all right for the minister and his department and parliament to say that that man should have some kind of certificate, but there are in Nova Scotia—and I presume the same thing applies to the Pacific coast—small vessels with two or three masts which, after fishing all summer, take a cargo of coal from Sydney to St. John's, Newfoundland; they load fish for Oporto or the West Indies or Pernambuco, and surely the minister by this new bill and new clause inserted by somebody who did not know anything about shipping conditions in this country, will prohibit men like Angus Walters, men who can sail ships, from doing so if they have not a certificate. It is true, as the minister knows, there is a simple examination, but one of the requisites is that a man who may have sailed a ship for ten, twenty or thirty years must pass an eye test. How in the name of heaven can men do this at forty or forty-five years of age? We have all been to the optician to get glasses or our eyes examined and the first thing he does is to put a card on the wall about ten feet away. He says: "Can you see those big letters?" Then: "Can you see the smaller letters?" And then: "Can you see the still smaller letters?" The same thing applies in the eye test of the Minister of Marine under this legislation. An old salt who can see five miles from the crosstrees, who can go aloft and without his binoculars see five miles in the distance on the horizon, is taken into a little room ten feet by twelve and has to or is asked to read a card as you and I have to do when we go to get our eyes tested on Sparks street. Who can do this? I am sure the government is sincere when it wants to see trade increasing and prosperity in this country, but surely the way to bring this about is not by preventing from sailing these ships men who have sailed the seas for years and years, who are well equipped to sail these vessels and who have nothing against their character or ability to navigate in any part of the world. Yet under clause 118 every man who cannot pass the eye test cannot sail a ship of more than seventy-five tons register. Who would want to go to sea on a foreign voyage in a seventy-five ton ship? I would not and I do not get seasick either.

As regards clause 122, the minister could very well eliminate "minor waters of Canada" and replace that with "waters of Canada," and strike out "twenty tons" and replace that with "one hundred and fifty tons." Paragraph (b) could be struck out altogether. Why under that provision should he make fishermen and others pay a fee of $5 for a temporary certificate for only one year? Why any fee at all? Why should these men who sail little boats have to pay the department a fee of $5? I know we are hard up; we need money; we need greater revenue in this country, but surely the minister and the government are not going to take it out of the sailors and fishermen who are struggling along with three dollar mackerel, two-fifty herring and four dollar codfish. Let us cut out that provision that they must take out a certificate, pay a fee of five dollars, and then have a certificate for only one year. Why not make the certificate for ten years or for life so long as the man has good behaviour?

This shows that whoever drafted this bill did not know what he was doing.

With regard to clause 125 I have no objection to the provision "not more than twelve passengers." The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) will be interested in this. Let the minister strike out the provision "four nominal horsepower" and insert in its place "ten nominal horsepower." Give the people on the great lakes, the people anywhere in Canada a chance if they want greater power, stronger means of propulsion in their boats. Why keep them down to four horsepower? The thing is ridiculous and the minister should make that "ten nominal horsepower," internal combustion engine other than by steam. With regard to the steam may I suggest to the minister that this should read "not more than twenty nominal horsepower." In that case there would be a reasonable clause in the bill, a clause which the men on the great lakes who sail those little steamers will appreciate, a clause which every man in this country will appreciate; but whoever drafted this bill and these clauses did not know what they were doing or what the interests of the country demanded. I say to the minister that before he asks us to adopt the clauses now standing he should change them in the way I and others have suggested.

Now, in conclusion let me say that in chapter 186—

Mr. DURANLEAU: What section?

Mr. DUFF: I have not the section, but under the old law vessels using internal combustion engines are not subject to inspection. Then why are they brought under this bill? In what way has navigation in Canada been affected by the use of the internal combustion engine? I say the change is not necessary, and I agree with the hon. member for Pictou who the other night strenuously objected to certain of these clauses because of the phraseology. I do not know who drafted them; surely it was not the Prime Minister. Although he looks after nearly all the legislation of this government, he would not use such phrases found in some of those clauses. I say to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Marine that I have no particular objection to the rest of this bill, other than Part II. No one is going to be hurt much by the other parts, as far as I had a chance to study it, but I do say that Part II of this bill should go into dry dock, should be repaired from stem to gudgeon, should be overhauled from truck to keelson. I have no objection to gentlemen learned in the law sitting in in order to draft in proper legal terms the ideas of practical men who know the cathead from the dog-watch and the glory hole from the lazarette. But I do object to these legal men trying to draft an act without consulting with people who know their business. I suggest to the minister that this bill should stand until next year. Call in Captain Mitchell of Halifax, a practical mariner, call in Captain Lindsay of Vancouver, both of whom have sailed the seas in foreign ships for a great many years, and get their ideas of what is necessary in regard to certificates for foreign voyages. Call in practical men who have sailed the seas in coasters and fishing vessels for many years, captains of freighters, and fishermen either on the Pacific or the Atlantic, men of experience who have sailed for years without certificates, consult with them and you will get a bill of which this government and this parliament will be proud; not a bill which cannot stand the light of day, and of which as I said criticism is already coming in. I have received so much already that I cannot possibly deal with it. I plead with the minister and the government to let this bill stand so that Part II may be redrafted in order that every man in this country who is interested in shipping or vessels may be protected, and men who earn their living on the sea shall not be ostracised or put in a position where they cannot sail their ships, or young men who want to go to sea will not be discouraged by some fancy educational test which none of them can meet.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have to recognize that my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has done considerable work in studying this bill. Last week he contended that he had had no time to study it, but I see now that he has perused the whole bill. I fully recognize the experience of my hon. friend in marine matters and I appreciate his knowledge. But as he expressed himself he tended to show that he is the only man—

Mr. DUFF: Oh no, that is not fair.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —who knows something about marine law.

Mr. DUFF: I object to that, that is not fair; I did not say I was the only one who knew anything about marine matters.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, I say we can infer from the statement of the hon. member that no one but himself—

Mr. DUFF: I can understand the minister inferring that, because he knows a good deal less than I do.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is no doubt about that, but I do not think it was necessary for my hon. friend to make the statement he has just made.

Mr. DUFF: You should not have made the first one.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I would remind my hon. friend that this bill has been studied by experts for over two years; in the Marine department we have the best experts who have been studying it for two years with the assistance of legal advisers. I do not know if my hon. friend has done the same with respect to the amendments he has suggested, but if he drafted them himself I think he will admit it is rather dangerous for a layman to attempt to draft the sections of a bill such as this.

Mr. DUFF: I can assure my hon. friend I had no legal advice, it was purely a matter of common, horse sense.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend says he drafted those amendments himself?

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Then I shall proceed with the clauses that stood last week, and I have some amendments to propose which have been studied, and which I think will cover some of the points raised by my hon. friend. I urge my hon. friend to be careful before suggesting amendments drafted without the help of legal advice, because it is a very difficult job even for a legal adviser who has some knowledge and experience in marine matters.

Mr. DUFF: Might I ask my hon. friend what legal gentleman who had any knowledge of marine matters helped to prepare this bill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The first bill drafted was drafted by my assistant deputy minister and my officials under him with the help of Mr. Martin Griffin, K.C., of Vancouver, one of the outstanding lawyers of the west in marine matters.

Mr. DUFF: But he says he used the paste pot and scissors.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I was in the department and I know what Mr. Griffin did and I know what my officials have done for two years. My officials state that these amendments cannot be accepted, they would not fit the rest of the bill at all.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Why?

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: For many reasons.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Could the minister explain?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We shall see as we come to the various sections.

Mr. VENIOT: I have already stated that I did not intend to go any further in my opposition to this bill. I would like very well to have kept my promise in that respect but when I hear the minister say that this bill was prepared by experts with knowledge of legal terms connected with marine matters I must say that if those experts cannot give any better exhibition of their knowledge of marine conditions in different sections of Canada than this bill they never should have undertaken to prepare such a bill. I have no fault to find with the experts in the department over which the minister presides; they are competent in carrying out the duties they have to perform, but when anybody in the Department of Marine or the Department of Fisheries, especially the Department of Marine, will undertake to say that this bill does not do an injustice to the fishing industry of the maritime provinces he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. DURANLEAU: In what respect?

Mr. VENIOT: That is the reason I am now rising—

Mr. DURANLEAU: In what respect?

Mr. VENIOT: In every respect.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Tell this committee in what respect.

Mr. VENIOT: A few days ago I told the minister and this committee that there were sections which could be amended by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough or by myself. We could suggest amendments to some of those sections, but there were other sections which we knew were working injustices but which we would not dare, even with our knowledge of the fishing industry, to undertake to amend without first having the opportunity to consult the people interested. That is the reason I have asked for delay in the passage of this bill; that is the reason I have asked the government if they are determined to force it through, and whether or not they would not delay, for this session at least, bringing into operation the first part of the bill. They have authority under one section of the bill to take that action. I received no satisfactory answer to my request, nor did I receive any guarantee that that would be done.

I agree with the statement of the minister as to the preparation of amendments without the help of legal talent. However, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough did not suggest that no lawyer should be called in. As a matter of fact he said he had no objection to legal minds being consulted so that the suggested amendments might be framed in proper legal phraseology. He knows that neither he nor I is in a position to place the suggested amendments into proper legal language without first having the cooperation of legal minds. Therefore we are not suggesting that the amendments should be accepted in the exact terms in which they now appear; all we want is to have an acceptance of the subject matter of the amendments. These suggestions come from men who know what the conditions really are, and they know that if the bill passes in its present form it will operate not to the advantage of, but rather to the disadvantage of, the fishing and freighting industries of the maritime provinces. That is the reason we are opposing the bill, and that is the reason I have risen in my place to-day to ask that the passage of the bill be postponed. No interests would suffer. Give us an opportunity to consult our people, to lay the whole matter before them, and to come back next year bringing with us suggestions to meet the conditions. In that way the bill could be put through in a proper manner. If any interests might suffer by the non-adoption at this session of the bill now under discussion I would hold my tongue, but I say to the minister—and he knows it—that if action on the bill were postponed no interest would suffer. If the government are determined to put the bill through in its present form, then I ask them to take advantage of the power they have under the bill whereby they may not bring into effect those sections affecting coastal freighting and fishing interests of the maritime provinces and the Pacific coast. Do not bring them into operation, but let them stand under the old act until such time as we may consult our people and, coming back here next year as their representatives, lay our opinions before the House of Commons.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, after the unparalleled latitude you have allowed other members in this discussion—unparalleled in my experience, at any rate—I presume you will extend to me the same opportunity to wander all over the bill.

I am not surprised that the absurdities and contradictions in the bill have led the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) to depart from the decision he made a few days ago to wash his hands of all responsibility, to let the government put the bill through the house, and to leave them wholly responsible for it. I wholly agreed with that stand, and I proposed to follow it. However, as he and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) have departed from that decision I shall follow their example, and speak for but a short time indeed, to place on record a wire I received yesterday.

I agreed with hon. members who took the stand that it was hopeless to try to amend this bill, due to the extended and intricate nature of the sections, the wide variety of subjects covered, and the basic fact that the government, without any reasonable excuse so far as I could see, refused to send the bill to a committee where we could have sat around a table, had the advantage of legal experts and technical experts about whom the minister has been talking—an advantage which we certainly would have required—and we would have heard the arguments and settled the matter.

The idea that a layman cannot formulate an amendment is pure nonsense. The committee could function, and could decide along laymen's lines what they wanted done. The committee would adjourn, and the lawyer in the department could be present to draft appropriate amendments for the next sitting, when he would find whether or not the amendments agreed with the ideas in the minds of the members. That has been done scores of times, and it is useless to suggest that it could not be done again. I remember sitting on a committee which framed the old age pensions legislation. I believe there were only four of us, and a lawyer. Within certain limits indicated by the government, he would ask us what we wanted, draft the section and bring it down next day. That legislation although a new departure, stood the test of a great deal of criticism until the present government messed it up with a lot of ill-timed regulations.

With a great deal of what the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has said, I agree. With some of his statements perhaps I might not agree. With a good deal of what he has said I do not know whether I can agree or not, because I simply do not know about all those matters. I am quite appreciative of the fact, however, that he does know about these matters, and that on a committee his presence and knowledge would be of great value in arranging the details of various sections. But the minister has no intention of sending the bill to a committee, and never had. He has no intention of leaving it for another year, and never had. What is the use of wasting time urging him to do so? I do not purpose wasting either my time or that of the committee.

The minister has said he will now introduce some amendments. That is remarkable when we recall his remarks upon the introduction of the bill and upon second reading. In his view the shipping bill was the last word in legislation and could not possibly be improved upon. I was reminded of Moses going up to the mountain and coming down with the ten commandments.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I stated as a whole it is a remarkable piece of legislation.

Mr. NEILL: It is a remarkable bill, all right; I admit that, and I suggest that time will demonstrate how remarkable it really is. We will be sitting here next session—those of us who are fortunate enough to return—and we will be amending this bill. However I am not going to waste the time of the committee by any further observations, but shall proceed to quote the telegram I have before me. Hansard indicates—and if the minister wishes I shall quote it—that he said that a committee sitting in another place heard all people interested in this matter. In fact, I think the Salvation Army was about the only body which was not heard. If there was anybody or anything which had an interest in the bill, it was heard. Then, later on in reply to a question put by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) we find the minister stating that the seamen from Vancouver had not been heard. At a later point he admitted they had not been heard, but said they had presented a brief. Still later that statement was contradicted. At a later point he referred to telegrams, but notwithstanding the request of an hon. member on this side of the house to read those telegrams, he did not do so. He apparently read selected excerpts which gave the impression in one case that the whole engineering bodies of Canada were behind it, but upon being pressed by the hon. member for Hamilton we found that it was only one-seventeenth of those bodies, only one council out of seventeen, which is a very different thing.

I just want to quote a wire that I have received from an important body in Vancouver, the Canadian Merchant Service Guild of Vancouver, which the minister said had been fully heard. It is a long wire and I am pleased to say that it was not sent collect. It is addressed to myself and reads as follows:

Hansard eight June. Received on the sixteenth; thanks. Your statements properly taken but nominal horse power only one reason—

By the reference to nominal horsepower they are no doubt referring to the quotation I made with reference to someone who wanted a change in the nominal horsepower.

—only one reason why practical and honest advice should be secured before passing Bill E.

That is not my sentiment; it is the sentiment of this body interested only in their own affairs, and they say that practical and honest advice should be secured before passing this bill:

Example: Two vessels identical motor engines quoted in registry shipping Shean eighty-four and Czar eighteen nominal.

The telegram goes on:

Majority vessels now driven motor engines defined by makers and users brake horse power but no provision for such made in act being another proof act is already fifteen years obsolete and impractical in many respects.

They say that we are fifteen years behind the times as regards the proposed bill itself. The telegram continues:

Please concentrate on elimination subsections (b) and two of section one twenty, being rank discrimination against coasting inland and minor water masters and mates who have upheld the highest traditions of the sea.

That is the section that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough quoted in connection with the qualifications of officers.

Such legislation can serve no good purpose except to satisfy some childish whim or prejudice and would destroy that higher statutes—

I think "standing" is meant:

—which the proponents of the act apparently do not understand. Please endeavour have coasting limits not less than ten south instead of thirty-six north to permit Canadian officers and ships to trade between eastern and western Canada ports through Panama canal. Copy our brief mailed Minister Marine and Senate twelfth April will reach you Wednesday. Meantime use this telegram as required.

Canadian Merchant Service Guild.

If that last sentence had not been there I would have hesitated to put that somewhat drastic criticism on Hansard, but they are apparently quite willing that it should be so used. This brief was mailed to the minister. It is the first I have heard of it. Did it reach the Senate committee? We do not know. The committee did not print its evidence. The minister is going to say, "Yes, it was submitted." I have no doubt it was and that the only consideration it received was whether it should be pigeonholed under the letter "C" or the letter "G," being the first letter of the name of the man perhaps or of the association. We have no record before us that the brief was considered. We have only the minister's statement that it was ever received at all. Certainly it was not considered by any member of this house. At any rate this substantial and important representative body of seamen are, to put it mildly, very far from satisfied with this bill when they talk about its needing practical and honest advice. The act is fifteen years obsolete in its wording, they say, and impractical in many respects. Certainly the statements that we have heard from the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough do bear out, so far as my limited knowledge goes, much of what they say.

I turn to section 120. That is the section dealing with certificates not valid. It says that these certificates will not be valid after a period of five years.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Will my hon. friend allow me? I am sorry that my hon. friends have not allowed the minister to proceed with the amendments he was to propose to the committee. I have an amendment here to strike out that subsection limiting the life of a certificate to five years, and I am going to ask the committee to consent to another provision giving the minister the power to make an inquiry and set aside a certificate if the certificated mariner is found upon investigation to be incapable of performing his duties and still persists in following his calling when he has a life certificate.

Mr. NEILL: I am very glad indeed to hear it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As to the nominal horsepower question, there will be a definition of "sailing" vessel proposed when we come to the section but may I say here that nominal horsepower is the standard way of calculating the power of an engine all over the empire, and we felt it was better to follow the standard way throughout the empire rather than have a way of our own.

Mr. NEILL: I am pleased indeed to hear what the minister says.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend understands that it is only for legal purposes, because it is well known that one nominal horsepower means about twenty brake horsepower, or rather the reverse, twenty brake horsepower means one nominal horsepower.

Mr. NEILL: The "break" just made by the minister indicates his ignorance as well as my own in regard to these technical matters. I am very glad indeed to hear that the minister is going to make these changes. It indicates the advisability of adhering to the ordinary rules and going through this bill section by section instead of allowing us to talk all over the lot as we have been doing. Apparently, according to the terms of this wire, it is the custom for motor driven engines to be described by the makers and users in terms of brake horsepower, not of course steam engines, and that is what these people are referring to. I am quite willing to wait until the different sections come up to hear the amendments the minister has to propose, but that again illustrates the extreme advisability of sending this bill to a special committee where these questions could have been argued out. The Canadian Merchant Service Guild sent their brief to the minister on the twelfth of April, making their suggestions, and now the minister tells us that he has amendments to move. Why not have put them in the bill in the first place? I think that in the other chamber there has been a complete lack of a proper understanding of the subject they were dealing with, or they have ignored the representations that have been made by these people. If their representations are to be given effect to now, why were they not given effect to in April? I am glad that the changes are being made but I do not believe that they will be sufficient to make the whole bill workable, and I do not propose to take any responsibility for this bill. Let the government pass this bill if they wish, and let them take the responsibility. If there are to be any changes, I shall be glad to hear them when we come to the various sections.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am sorry my hon. friends are making general statements about this bill, and trying to show that very important changes are being made in the existing law. I should like to put on record a comparison of the present law and section 113 of this bill, to show that there is practically no change in the exemptions.

Mr. DUFF: Why not simplify the matter?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Section 113 of the present bill requires that every ship except those mentioned in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f) shall have certificated masters. Section 93 of the Canada Shipping Act provides:

> No ship registered in Canada, over one hundred tons registered tonnage, shall go to sea from any port or place in Canada on any voyage not being a coasting voyage, unless the master and first mate or only mate thereof have obtained and possess valid certificates.

Section 94 requires that every sailing ship registered in Canada of over 150 tons registered tonnage, and every steamship when employed in the coasting trade or plying on any Canadian water, shall have a certificated master. The act provides for certain exemptions under section 98. What are those exemptions? Under the Canada Shipping Act, the first exemption is for pleasure yachts. There is the same exemption in this bill.

Mr. DUFF: Why exempt pleasure boats?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am only making a comparison between the present act and this bill.

Mr. DUFF: That does not do any good.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The next exemption in the bill is for ships solely employed in fishing. The exemption in the existing act is for ships employed solely in fishing. The next exemption in the act is for steamships of not more than five tons gross tonnage. The exemptions in the bill are for passenger steamships not exceeding five tons gross tonnage and steamships not carrying passengers and not exceeding ten tons gross tonnage.

Mr. DUFF: Did the minister ever see a steamship of five tons gross register?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am only making a comparison. My hon. friend has stated that this bill is entirely different from the existing law as far as certificated masters are concerned, and I am attempting to show that that is not the case.

Mr. VENIOT: It is the case.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The next exemption in the existing act is for barges or other vessels having neither masts, sails nor rigging, and not being steamships. The exemption in the bill is for barges or other vessels having neither masts, sails nor rigging, and not being steamships—exactly the same thing. The next exemption in the existing act is for "sailing ships engaged in the coastwise trade of not more than one hundred tons, registered tonnage, propelled by auxiliary power other than steam, employed partly in fishing and partly in the carriage of freight." The exemption in this bill is for "home-trade, inland waters or minor waters sailing ships not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons register tonnage." I have an amendment to suggest to the definition of "sailing vessels" which will help the situation. As a matter of fact, the exemptions in this bill are perhaps greater than they are under the existing law.

Mr. DUFF: No.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: With reference to the difference between a foreign and home-trade voyage. The bill defines an inland voyage, a minor waters voyage and a home-trade voyage. Is it not sufficient to say that a foreign voyage is one outside of those three definitions? As I said before, the difference between a foreign and a home-trade voyage is not based on geography, it is based on the hazards of navigation. The same principle is applied all over the empire.

Mr. DUFF: Let me say to the minister that the hazards of navigation are not nearly as great on a foreign voyage as they are on a home-trade voyage.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The hon. member has made his statement and I would ask him not to interrupt. He stated a moment ago that there was not the same rule in England, but I claim that exactly the same principle applies there. The definition of a home-trade voyage in the Merchant Shipping Act would cover, for instance, certain voyages from England to Germany or France where there are no great dangers or hazards. A voyage from Vancouver to Montreal would be a "foreign voyage" on account of the hazards of navigation, because it would necessitate a ship having to take the deep seas before reaching the Panama canal, in which case the hazards of navigation would be greater.

Mr. DUFF: No, they are not.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Such a ship leaving Vancouver would have to go more than two hundred miles from the coast, it would have to pass through the Panama canal, up the Atlantic coast and then up the St. Lawrence to Montreal. The experts claim that such voyages should be made only by ships having sufficient strength to make a deep-sea voyage and carrying the same life saving apparatus and the same certificated master. These rules are for the protection of life at sea and I think my hon. friends are wrong when they want to define a home-trade voyage as one between two ports in Canada. I should like to proceed with the sections which have not yet been adopted and if my hon. friends have any suggestions to make, I shall be glad to hear them.

Mr. VENIOT: What does the Canada Shipping Act give as the definition of steamship?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is given in section 73, subsection (i) and reads:

"Steamship" or "steamer" includes any ship propelled wholly or in part by steam or motive power other than sail or oars.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not the same as the definition given in this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: It means the same.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Subsection 101 of section 2 of the bill reads:

"Steamship" or "steamer" (except as may be provided under the load line rules) means any ship propelled by machinery, and not coming within the definition of sailing ship.

I am not an expert in this matter, but I think my officials know something about it, and they assure me that there is no difference between the two.

Mr. VENIOT: Under definition 89 a sailing ship is described as so and so, and when you come to the last part of subsection 89 you find the following:

and which, in addition, is provided with mechanical means of propulsion, the power of which does not exceed three nominal horse power.

Mr. DURANLEAU: In this regard I have another definition to propose:

"Sailing ship" (except as may be provided under the load line rules) means a ship propelled wholly by sails, and includes a ship not in excess of 150 tons, gross tonnage, provided with masts, sails and rigging sufficient to allow her to make voyages under sail alone, and which, in addition, is provided with mechanical means of propulsion other than a steam engine.

I think this definition will cover the whole point.

Mr. VENIOT: Then you will have to change the definition of 101.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Why?

Mr. VENIOT: Because the moment you depart from rigging, under 89, and insert a certain horse power, even if she is under 150 tons, she becomes a steamship.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Definition 101 states very clearly that the vessel shall not come within the definition of sailing ship.

Mr. VENIOT: Under the present definition, 89, if she has a nominal horse power of over three horse power she becomes a steamer and is no longer a sailing ship.

Mr. REID: The minister has read some of the sections and has pointed out that there is little difference between the old act and the new. I understand that the old definition of a home-trade vessel was divided into three parts, but under the present provision there are only two definitions. Heretofore a boat could leave Montreal or Vancouver for Buenos Aires provided it did not cross the ocean; it would then be a home-trade voyage. But under the present definition of home-trade voyage no boat will be allowed to do that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If the hon. member will look at the existing act he will see that the definition of home-trade ship refers only to the signing of seamen.

Mr. REID: Under the old act the definition of home trade voyage would allow a ship to leave Vancouver, New Westminster or Montreal and go to Buenos Aires provided it did not directly cross the ocean. Now, by the new definition, a home-trade vessel though it may operate twenty or thirty or even more miles out from the shore, will not be allowed to leave Vancouver and go to Montreal, say, with lumber or any other cargo. As regards hazards at sea, there is just as much hazard leaving New Westminster or Vancouver and going to Los Angeles or Panama as there is in going through the Panama canal and coming up the other side.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The definition of home trade under the existing act refers only to the engagement of seamen. Section 124, subsection (c) reads:

"Canadian home trade ship" includes every ship registered in either of the provinces, employed in trading or going from any place or places in any of the provinces to any other place or places in any other of the provinces.

Mr. REID: What is the definition of coastal trade?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This definition is included in part III, which deals with seamen only.

Mr. REID: I must come back to this point, because it will affect ships leaving either the Atlantic or the Pacific coast for ports in Canada. I cannot accept the minister's statement in regard to hazards, because there is just as much hazard going to the Queen Charlotte islands and other places as there is crossing the Atlantic. A man has to be a real sailor to go to Queen Charlotte islands. There is just as much hazard going from New Westminster to Los Angeles—I believe they go seventy-five miles from shore—as there is coming up on the other side, and I see no reason why going through the Panama and coming up the other side of Montreal should bring a vessel within the classification of foreign and not home trade voyages.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend will compare the existing act with this bill he will find that while there may be a difference as to certificated masters, there is no change as regards the strength and structure of ships.

Mr. REID: There is quite a difference. The minister read clauses from the Shipping Act to bear out his contention, and I say that he is failing to take into account one most important feature that has a bearing on Canadian ships.

Mr. DUFF: I thought I made it clear that under chapter 186, the old act, instead of being called home trade voyage it was called coastal voyage, and I read to the committee the definition of coastal voyage, which extended to 40 south latitude. That goes as far south as Buenos Aires. The minister says that is not correct, and I would ask him to have his officials look it up; I forget just now what the section is.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think I said what the hon. member stated.

Mr. DUFF: The minister said that the old act was not any broader than this. I say that under the old act instead of being a home trade voyage, it was a coastal voyage, something every sailor could understand, and it extended to Buenos Aires. That would take in what my hon. friend said. In order to meet the minister's views I was willing to bring it up to five degrees north latitude which would be in the latitude of British Guiana where the Canadian National steamships, the ships of the Minister of Railways, go every fortnight. Surely that is a fair compromise. The minister says that a home trade voyage is the same under the old act as it is under this. What does he say besides that? The minister will not say that I am trying to be too critical with him. He says that foreign voyages are more hazardous than home trade or coastal voyages. I do not know who advised the minister, but let me say that the worst voyage a vessel can make is from the bay of Fundy through Long Island Sound to New York. I would rather cross the Atlantic ten times than go from the bay of Fundy to Boston or New York, and yet that is a home trade voyage. Still the minister tries to tell the committee that a foreign voyage is more hazardous than a home trade voyage. Surely somebody is misleading him. I do not want to waste my time here; I desire to go home and to do some business, but I say to the minister he should move that the committee rise because he has been badly advised by his officials when he says to any intelligent man not only on the floor of the house but elsewhere that a foreign voyage is more hazardous than a home trade voyage. That is not the case.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is not what I said.

Mr. DUFF: The minister said that a foreign voyage was more hazardous than a home trade voyage. A home trade voyage is ten times as hazardous. Did the minister ever leave Halifax and go to Canso or leave Vancouver and go up the inside channel to Prince Rupert? I would rather leave Vancouver and go to Hongkong than go to Prince Rupert. Let us get down to brass tacks. How are we going to trust our officials if we are going to be told tommyrot like this? I do not want to be too critical; I do not want to say that the minister does not know anything about the bill, but what I have said shows conclusively that the bill should stand. It was considered for two years in the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Order. We are dealing with subclause 26 of clause 2.

Mr. DUFF: I am dealing with foreign voyages.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman's observations are wholly foreign to the clause.

Mr. DUFF: Well, I have heard the Prime Minister in previous remarks just as far away from the point as a home trade voyage would be under this clause. Instead of subclause 26 with which we are dealing and the strange amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), I made a suggestion to the minister before the Prime Minister came in and I believe he will agree with me in his heart if he does not outwardly. I said that subclause 26 instead of reading as it does should read in this way, and I will read it so that the Prime Minister may hear me. I will first read what it says in this wonderful bill which came from another place:

"Foreign voyage" means either a voyage between a place in Canada—

That might mean up in lake Winnipeg, for instance.

—and a place not in Canada—

That might mean anywhere else.

—other than a place within the limits of a home trade voyage or a voyage between places not in Canada and not all within the limits of a home trade voyage.

Did the committee ever hear such a stupid, ridiculous definition as that? That clause alone cost the country some $10,000 with those wonderful legal men who, the minister told us, drafted this bill. Then the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, which is far removed from the stormy waters of the Atlantic or the Pacific, moved the following amendment to this subclause:

"Foreign voyage" means a voyage extending beyond the area of a home trade voyage—

Where else would it be? This is taken for granted.

—and not being an inland voyage or a minor waters voyage.

Is that not a great suggestion coming from the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency? Before the Prime Minister came in, I did not move but I suggested that subclause 2 of clause 2 be amended to read:

"Foreign voyage"—

I am delighted to see the Prime Minister in his seat.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that he is not listening to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DUFF: Is it nice to say that?

Mr. BENNETT: It is nice to say that.

Mr. DUFF: This is what I suggested:

"Foreign voyage" means a voyage between Canada, and a port east of the 60th degree of longitude and south of the fifth degree north latitude, and north of the 65th degree—

That is on the Atlantic coast.

—and a port west of the 125th degree of longitude, and south of the fifth degree north latitude, and north of the 65th degree.

There I have given a simple amendment in nautical terms which every sailor, every mariner, understands, and not a clause like the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency nor like what was in the bill which the Prime Minister said must go through this house this session in spite of the fact that it came down here only a few days ago. That is a simple suggestion to clear up the matter. If I were playing politics I would say: Let the bill go through; there would not be a mariner or a sailor or a business man vote for the government at the next election if this bill goes on the statute books. But the matter is too serious for that; there are thousands of men interested in shipping and all I am trying to do is straighten out certain clauses which I have had time to consider so that the bill will be reasonable and clear and will not be a conglomeration of pastepot and scissors as it is as drafted by the legal gentleman who spent two years in preparing it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I would call the hon. member to order again.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has referred to me and therefore I think it well for me to say how clearly the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency indicates what is desired. There are three kinds of voyages; home voyage, foreign voyage, inland voyage. The home voyage is defined in the statute and the amendment moved makes it clear that it is any voyage other than a foreign voyage or an inland voyage.

Mr. DUFF: Or a minor waters voyage.

Mr. BENNETT: Can one get anything clearer than that?

Mr. DUFF: It is as clear as mud.

Mr. BENNETT: By excluding the other named voyages, necessarily the term "home voyage" includes all other forms of voyages. Could anything be clearer than that? Instead of fixing it by latitude and longitude, you fix it by the form of voyage, and all forms of voyages which a ship may take other than those named as excepted shall be home voyages. Does the committee wish anything clearer than that?

Mr. DUFF: I would think we would deal with the foreign voyage first and then necessarily use those terms outside of the foreign voyage. The minister has got it all twisted; he is going backwards; he has reversed his engines and is going back half speed. I say the foreign voyage should be the voyage designated. I also say that if the Prime Minister's statement is right a man who wants to make a foreign voyage has to look up this act and see what a home-trade voyage means and then what an inland voyage means and what a minor waters voyage means. So that before he gets through he will be trying to get up the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa river over the mountains and the Lord knows where he will get. Why not put it in simple language that a sailor can understand? Why all this nonsense about other than a home trade and inland water voyage? Who ever heard of such ridiculous nonsense in a definition?

Mr. DURANLEAU: In defining these different kinds of voyages we are proceeding in the way which has been adopted by England for centuries. If you look at the Merchant Shipping Act you will see that England defines a minor waters voyage, an inland waters voyage, a home-trade voyage and a foreign voyage. In England the home-trade voyage includes all kinds of small voyages, on inland or minor waters—all are included in home-trade voyages—and then the others are the foreign voyages. In this bill we have minor waters voyages; inland waters voyages and home-trade voyages defined very clearly. Then we say all other voyages will be foreign voyages. I think that is clear.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend said a moment ago that the English act defines minor voyages and so on, and a moment afterwards he turned right around, went on another tack and said the only thing in the English act was home-trade and foreign voyages. If the minister is going to change his views in even half a second on this thing how can we expect him to know much about the other sections? He told us deliberately a moment ago that in the British act there were minor waters voyages and inland waters and home-trade voyages, and because he realized he made a mistake he turned around and said, No, pardon me, there are two definitions in England, home-trade and foreign. That is the trouble with this whole bill; the minister has not studied it.

The CHAIRMAN: (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Order.

Mr. DUFF: What is wrong with that?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Everything is wrong. We are on subsection 26.

Mr. DUFF: We are talking about voyages. I am quite in order.

Mr. POULIOT: In order to have some understanding about a foreign voyage one must know the line of division between interior and exterior waters, especially in the St. Lawrence river. For a long time I have been asking the government what is the line of division between interior and exterior waters in the St. Lawrence river. I was told that no change had been made. I understand that the "exterior" waters come like a V in the gulf of St. Lawrence and river St. Lawrence. I would like to know from the minister what the line of demarcation is.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that in the bill there is no definition of interior or exterior waters; the terms used are "inland waters of Canada," and they are defined in subsection 41 of section 2:

"Inland waters of Canada" means all the rivers, lakes and other navigable fresh waters within Canada, and includes the river St. Lawrence as far seaward as a line drawn from Father Point to Point Orient.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, but the Royal Canadian Mounted Police gave certain instructions to their men some time ago, and I asked the government why there was a change. Instructions were given first for the men of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to stay within a certain line. Afterwards other instructions were given, and then new instructions were given in accordance with the first instructions. I would ask the minister why that line has been changed, and at whose request.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think there is any change in the law as to that line. I understand my hon. friend means in the St. Lawrence river. I think it was the same line before, from Father Point to Point Orient. I have no knowledge of any instructions given to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as to the limits of our inland waters. If my hon. friend refers to a special case I shall be pleased to have the particulars and to investigate it, but I do not think there was any change in regard to the limits of our inland waters in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall not insist any further at the moment. I will take it up at eight o'clock and see in Hansard the precise answer given by the government. The point is I could not get any information about the change in the line dividing interior and exterior waters, but what I know is that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have given instructions to their men which were entirely different from former instructions, and I wondered what was the reason for that change. If there is a line it cannot be changed at the will of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. If that line is good for the merchant marine it is good as well for the police. Navigation within that line is inland shipping, and outside of it is foreign shipping. Therefore it is a most important line of demarcation, and we are entitled to have all available information about it. It is of the utmost importance because when the ships go outside of that line they are no longer under the jurisdiction of Canada; they are sailing under international law. Therefore it is most important to have that information. I shall be more precise about it at eight o'clock.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION AND IMPROVEMENT OF CERTAIN PUBLIC WORKS AND UNDERTAKINGS THROUGHOUT CANADA

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister, for the Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the expenditure of certain sums of money for the construction of and repairs to public works and for dredging and improving harbours and rivers throughout Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: I assume it is the wish of the committee that the bill to be founded upon the resolution should be presented as soon as possible, because the details are more important than the subject matter of the measure itself. It contemplates the expenditure of something less than $40,000,000 for the purpose of public works undertakings throughout the dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The details I suppose I am not expected at this time to indicate, further than to say that in a large way by the expenditure of the moneys in question it is proposed to give employment to as large a number of persons in as many walks of human activity as may be possible. As I intimated to my right hon. friend the other day, if the resolution is passed I propose to move the first reading of the bill, and when the bill is in committee the fullest possible opportunity will then be afforded for criticism and suggestions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The resolution indicates the nature of the bill, and the Prime Minister to a certain extent has indicated the extent of the moneys to be spent. I agree that the details constitute the feature of the legislation of greatest interest, and I imagine little good can be served by discussion of the resolution in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will hon. members be given an opportunity to make representations with regard to certain work in their respective communities?

Mr. BENNETT: It is only fair to say that when the bill is in committee of the whole I expect many criticisms will be offered from many sources.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And suggestions.

Mr. BENNETT: Suggestions also.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 113, to provide for the construction and improvement of certain public works and undertakings throughout Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a second time?

Mr. BENNETT: Next sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the bill been printed?

Mr. BENNETT: No; I intended to say to my right hon. friend that the bill is not yet printed. I was not able to have it printed because for the last few days the Minister of Public Works has been away, engaged in patriotic work for his country. I desired to leave it until the last minute before completing it. I completed the bill itself this morning—the schedules he had had prepared for some time—and the bill will go to the printing bureau to-night. I believe I could send my right hon. friend a typewritten copy, and I shall endeavour to get a schedule for him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume the bill also is intended for patriotic purposes?

Mr. BENNETT: I can assure my right hon. friend that when he looks at it he will regard it as being the acme of patriotism, inasmuch as communities which have little claim except their adherence to the time honoured tenets of the great party which he has the honour to lead, have not been forgotten.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, respecting shipping—Mr. Duranleau—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Section 2, subsection 26, agreed to.

On subsection 38—Home-trade voyage.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I should like to have this subsection stand for the moment.

Subsection 38 stands.

Subsections 35, 39 and 102 agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 100—Deck cargo.

Mr. REID: From the bill of last year these words have been inserted, "carries into Canada" as deck cargo. Now that affects the measurement of foreign ships, and it would affect lumber shipments from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Those words have been inserted in this bill.

Mr. REID: But it affects the measurement of ships, and it will affect Canadian ships carrying lumber from one of our coasts to the other. When a ship leaves one coast it will be a foreign vessel, and this section says:

If any ship, British or foreign, other than a home trade ship—

enters a port in Canada—

Mr. DURANLEAU: If a British ship was bringing a cargo of lumber to Montreal, for instance, she would have to pay duty.

Mr. REID: I do not think the minister caught my point. We have two definitions of ships; there is the foreign ship and the home-trade ship, and in section 100 you are excluding the home-trade ship. The section reads: "British or foreign" ships, so it has a relation to subsection 35 of section 2. If a ship leaves one port on the Pacific coast and goes to a port on the Atlantic coast it would be a foreign-going ship and would come under section 100.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is right.

Section agreed to.

On section 120—When certificates not valid.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I move to amend this section, Mr. Chairman, by striking out paragraph (b) in subsection 1, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

(b) after an inquiry if the minister is satisfied that such holder has become permanently incapacitated in respect of the performance of his duties as a master or mate, as the case may be, such an inquiry shall be held in a like manner to an inquiry held under the provisions of section 572 of this act.

In other words, we are deleting the paragraph which limits the life of a mariner's certificate to five years. Under the amendment the certificate of a mariner will be for life, but the minister will have the power to institute an inquiry in a particular case. For instance, if it was reported to the minister that a master who had a certificate as such had become incapacitated by sickness or permanent disability, the minister would have the power to ask for an inquiry, and after the inquiry to suspend or cancel his certificate.

Mr. VENIOT: Have you also power to reinstate him ?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I should think so. If the minister has the power to suspend or cancel he has the power to reinstate. This, however, is to cover cases of permanent disability. If the inquiry shows that it is only a temporary incapacity the minister has no power to cancel the certificate. It is only in cases where the incapacity is permanent.

Mr. REID: How does that affect subsection 2, reading, "Every certificate of competency or service as master or mate" and so forth?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, I move also, Mr. Chairman, that subclauses 2 and 3 be deleted.

Mr. NEILL: Does not the minister think he has sufficient power of inquiry under section 572? He is given there full power to investigate when a complaint is made of any condition of incompetency or misconduct, so why is the new clause needed? I think section 572 gives him all the power he wants.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, I have been studying this point very carefully since last week and section 572 does not cover this point.

Mr. NEILL: Under section 572 you can hold an investigation into incompetency.

Mr. DURANLEAU: But section 572 does not cover the case of incapacity from sickness or other causes.

Mr. NEILL: Is not incapacity the same as incompetency?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think so. I have discussed the matter with experts and we came to the conclusion that incompetency or misconduct are the only cases covered by section 572. There is no harm in inserting this provision for an inquiry into cases of permanent incapacity.

Mr. NEILL: I think we are entitled to give the minister credit for making this change. It is a very great improvement and will be appreciated by a whole lot of men who have been very anxious about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Cancellation will not take place unless the disability is permanent. But if the disability is only temporary will the minister have the power to suspend temporarily?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We considered that point. We want to cover certain particular cases where a master, for instance, is paralyzed or otherwise incapable of performing his duties and persists in continuing to act as master. We have found cases of that kind. It is only in extreme cases that we intend to intervene.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): There is a further amendment to strike out subsections 2 and 3 of section 120.

Mr. NEILL: The last subsection states "unless the holder of the same at the time of renewal is a British subject." Are we going to do away with that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Paragraph (a) covers that point.

Mr. NEILL: I am talking about subsection 3, which refers to a British subject.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That subsection refers to the renewal of a certificate, and these are life certificates.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 121—Certificates to remain in force.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have a slight amendment to move to make this section conform with the amendments to section 120. I move that the words "subject to the provisions of the next preceding section" be added before the word "certificates" in line 41, and that all the words after the word "issued" to the end of the section be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 130 agreed to.

Sections 180 and 181 agreed to.

On section 182—Certificate of discharge.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have an amendment to move to subsection 1. Under the section as it now reads, when a seaman is discharged the certificate of his discharge is not supposed to contain any statement as to his wages or the quality of his work. If the section were to remain as it is now in this bill, when a seaman would be discharged and would ask for a certificate of good conduct or of competency from his master, the master would answer that under the law the certificate must not contain any statement as to wages or the quality of work. I am moving that the words "unless requested by the seaman" be added at the end of the subsection. The subsection will then read:

(1) The master shall sign and give to a seaman discharged from his ship, either on his discharge or on payment of his wages, a certificate of his discharge in a form approved by the minister, or any form approved by the proper authority in that part of His Majesty's dominions in which the ship is registered, specifying the period of his service and the time and place of his discharge, but not containing any statement as to his wages or the quality of his work unless requested by the seaman.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think that amendment would mean that a master would not have to give a certificate unless asked by the seaman. I think it qualifies the whole subsection and not merely the last clause.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think it can be argued that these added words refer to the whole subsection. There is a comma after the word "discharge".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 284—Sanction required for discharge of seamen out of Canada.

Mr. REID: Did the minister consider the suggestion I made regarding seamen who were engaged at one port in Canada and discharged at another and left destitute?

Mr. DURANLEAU: In the case of a seaman hired at Vancouver and discharged at Montreal, the law does not provide for any assistance. He is still in Canada and he has his recourse against the master; he is treated like any other citizen. This section protects only seamen discharged outside of Canada.

Mr. REID: It would take only a very simple amendment to take care of men stranded in Canada. It is all very well for the minister to say that a seaman can go to the courts, but many of these ships are registered and a seaman stranded in Montreal or elsewhere has little chance of recovery without knowing who are the proper owners of the ship. If we are taking care of seamen stranded on foreign shores, I think we should take care of those who are stranded in their own country three thousand miles away from home. I quoted a case which occurred last year where a man was left in Montreal after having been engaged in Vancouver.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to add a word to what has been said by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). Several cases have arisen during the past few years, some in connection with Canadian National ships. I believe that after intercession with the authorities the sailors stranded in Vancouver or in Montreal, whose home was in the other city, were at the expense of the Canadian National afterwards returned to their home port. It is only fair that that should be specifically in the act.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is supposed to be only a matter of agreement between the master and the seaman. It seems to me that a Canadian seaman is at home in any place in Canada. There are seamen's associations in all parts of the country to take care of any seaman who is discharged in a Canadian port. The case is different when the seaman is discharged outside Canada, and that is why the law takes care of him.

Mr. REID: Section 284, subsection 1 provides that:

> The master of a ship registered in Canada shall not discharge a seaman at any place out of Canada (except at a port in the country in which he was shipped), unless he previously obtains ...

What objection could there be to inserting "shall not discharge a seaman at any place out of Canada or in Canada"? I suggest that you strike out the words "out of Canada"; that would meet the whole situation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The minister may, in the form of agreement between masters and mates impose upon the master certain obligations with respect to the protection of the seaman discharged in any port in Canada, but I do not think that should be embodied in the law. In this section we are protecting the seaman when he is outside Canada and who may be in great difficulty.

Mr. MacINNIS: But a seaman might be in great distress in Canada as well as outside, and if the minister can by imposing on the master certain obligations which are not provided for in the act, and if it is fair to impose those obligations, why not put them in the act in the first place and so save trouble?

Mr. REID: A seaman stranded three thousand miles away from his home port would have greater difficulty in getting home than a man stranded one hundred miles away, if he were stranded in say Seattle, because in that event he would come under the British consul, being in a foreign country. Yet he would be only one hundred miles from his home port. Now you have provided in this act for a man who finds himself in that position, and when we appeal to the minister to take care of a seaman stranded three thousand miles from his home he says that it cannot be done.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Ridiculous.

Mr. NEILL: If the minister will not give way on that, I will call attention to another error that should be looked into. The section provides that the master shall not discharge a seaman at any place out of Canada "except at a port in the country in which he was shipped." That should read, I submit, "except at the port." He may have been shipped in Liverpool and he might be discharged in London, or if in Australia there might be thousands of miles between the port at which he was shipped and the port at which he was stranded. This exemption applies to "a" port; apparently any port will do. I think it should be the port at which he was shipped.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The intention is exactly what my hon. friend says. The moment the owner of a ship discharges the seaman in his own country we feel that he has satisfied the conditions. We cannot expect a ship to go very far from its port to discharge a seaman, and the moment he is discharged in his country that is satisfactory. All parts of the empire at the convention discussed the matter and they were all satisfied with this provision.

Mr. NEILL: Is that in the British act? Is there not provision for a master paying the seaman's fare to the port at which he was signed on? I cannot understand that the British law would allow a man to be discharged a couple of thousand miles away from the port at which he was shipped. I always understood that he had to be landed at the port from which he started.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Section 30 of the Merchant Shipping Act contains the same provision.

Mr. NEILL: But is there not a provision in such a case for his being paid railway fare to the port of origin?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Section 30 of the Merchant Shipping Act declares that the master of a British ship shall not discharge a seaman at any place out of the United Kingdom except at a port in the country in which he was shipped.

Section agreed to.

On section 288—Expenses of medical attendance in case of injury.

Mr. RALSTON: Before we discuss this section I would call the attention of the minister to a purely formal amendment that should be made in section 167, subsection 2, unless he has a note of it. It refers to the superintendent.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have an amendment.

Mr. RALSTON: It should be the shipping master.

Mr. REID: Did the minister consider the question of compensation to see whether it is possible, either by an increase of one cent or by some other means, to take care of sailors injured through the loss of a limb or otherwise?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I said to my hon. friend the other day, in such an event the seaman should be taken care of by the compensation act of the province. I do not think we can deal in the shipping act with the question of damages.

Section agreed to on division.

Sections 299 and 328 agreed to on division.

On section 338—Exempted ships.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Chairman, previous to passing the two sections 338 and 339, I wish to make a few comments. At page 47, French version, of a report tabled in the house, Sir Alexander Gibb expresses himself as follows:

> The existence of good pilots is of profound importance to Canada, and particularly on the St. Lawrence route, which has only with difficulty been established as one of the great highways of shipping. The Department of Marine has devoted a great amount of thought to the lighting and buoying arrangements and other aids to navigation—and with outstanding success. It is essential, therefore, that the pilotage also should be closely controlled by government.
> From the evidence I obtained, it is clear that the standard of St. Lawrence pilots is, on the whole, high; and the administration of this branch of the Department of Marine has a reputation for strictness.

Under the former act ships coming from the province of Ontario and having to go down the St. Lawrence river from Montreal to Quebec and from Quebec to Father Point were obliged to provide themselves with pilots. According to the new act under consideration, pilotage service will not be required between Quebec and Father Point. I contend, sir, that the pilotage between Quebec and Father Point is as dangerous and difficult as that between Montreal and Quebec, in connection with coastal navigation.

Navigation between Quebec and Father Point can only be guided by compass, or by beams of light cast from lighthouses located along the coast. Often, if not generally, fog prevails in the lower St. Lawrence river, so that navigation is very difficult. If navigators, without any previous experience, are permitted to navigate the lower St. Lawrence river without a pilot's licence, navigation in those waters will become difficult. I fear, especially, that when this bill has been sanctioned, such as it is drafted, we shall have acicdents. Moreover, the past has shown that many accidents which happen in the lower St. Lawrence river, could be traced to the fact that certain vessels were not provided with men possessing the required qualifications to pilot them.

Pilots are required to possess particularly those from the lower St. Lawrence river between Quebec and Father Point, special qualifications and the navigation regulations in connection with the pilotage of those waters are entirely different from those required from persons who navigate on the Great Lakes or between Quebec and Montreal.

I again state, that special qualifications are required for pilots of the Quebec district. They must be acquainted with the rules governing ocean navigation and a more thorough knowledge of navigation is expected from them than from those who navigate the Great Lakes. Therefore, if this bill is passed in its present form, we shall have navigators without any knowledge of the lower St. Lawrence river, not having passed any test required from pilots, and such persons will be placed in charge of vessels who will have to meet, to pass or be passed by other vessels in charge of experienced seamen who were obliged to pass difficult tests.

I submit, sir, that the Quebec section should be placed on same footing as that of the Montreal section. Namely, vessels which navigate along the coast between Quebec and Father Point should be placed on the same footing as those navigating between Montreal and Quebec. I am not a sailor myself, however, from what I have heard, I gather that navigation is more difficult between Quebec and Father Point than between Quebec and Montreal. Between the latter two places, the channel is very narrow, but it is lighted day and night, it is so to speak buoyed throughout, while the Channel between Quebec and Father Point does not possess the same advantages. Moreover, between Quebec and Father Point, it very often happens that vessels are obliged to anchor and wait for the high tide. If navigators who have no experience of the lower St. Lawrence river are permitted to meet and pass vessels provided with pilots, it is clear that accidents will happen. For the good name of that part of the St. Lawrence river, we should place the section between Quebec and Father Point on the same footing as that between Quebec and Montreal and we should therefore add the word "Quebec" after the word "Montreal" in sections 338 and 339, in order that seamen who may have to navigate the lower St. Lawrence river will have no fear of meeting vessels in charge of persons who have had no experience of these waters.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I do not always have an opportunity of agreeing with the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion). However, I think that many of his suggestions, this evening, should appeal to the house. I have had a little experience in this connection—perhaps not as much as some, however, I have acquired a little since I represent in this house a maritime county. A number of representations have been made to me, with reference to section 338, by pilots who have had a wide experience, especially, by those who are required to pilot ships between Queber and the lower St. Lawrence. These pilots wish to be granted the same advantages and privileges as those of the Montreal district. I think that an amendment to that effect was moved in the Senate.

I deem it my duty to bring to the attention of the house an excerpt of a letter, dated May 31, 1934, from Mr. Cyrille Pouliot, special pilot for the Cunard line:

> I request to oppose with the greatest energy and vigour section 338, clause (ii) which grants certain unwarranted exemptions, as they will be the source of most severe accidents and, unfortunately, with loss of life. I have included in this letter a list of a number of accidents which took place in our section when no pilots were on board such vessels.

Those are, I think, the accidents to which my colleague for Quebec-Montmorency referred, a few moments ago. Such, for instance, the accident to the Empress of Ireland; in 1914, five miles outside the pilotage limits, at Father Point, the collision occurred with the ss. Storstad and 900 lives were lost. There was no pilot on board. Take the case of the General Wolfe vessel, in 1910, which was sunk at Murray Bay when a collision occurred with the ship Arranmore. No pilot was on board. Loss of life. Has not been refloated.

It was decided, about 1917, that colliers of the merchant marine plying between Sidney and Quebec would take no more pilots on board and that the captain would himself steer his ship. Hardly had such a decision been taken that the ss. Warrior grounded at the "St. Roch crossing." The same night, the Canadian Recruit which had no pilot on board was sunk by the Maskinongé in the Patch channel. The wreck remained there, and later a C.P.R. steamship tore its hull on it. This wreck having become an obstruction and a constant danger, the government expended very large amounts to remove it.

There is also the case of the steamship Montmagny. This government vessel collided on September 18, 1914, with the ss. Lengham, in the de Beaujeu channel. The ship was proceeding down the channel on the wrong side. It tried to cross over but was struck and sunk by the Lengham. Its hull is still there. There was a loss of life. No pilot was on board.

A tug was sunk by the ss. Batiscan at Madame island, in 1914. It was on the wrong side of the channel and when it tried to cross over, it was struck and sunk. This time again we had to deplore the loss of life. No pilot was on board.

The Christine, another vessel, was sunk by a submarine at Saint-Jean, Island of Orleans. Its hull which is an obstruction, still rests in the same place. There was one loss of life in this accident. No pilot was on board.

There is also the case of another ship, the Hochelaga. In 1926, this vessel of the Dominion Coal Co., was proceeding up the river on the wrong side of the channel without a pilot. It suddenly tried to cross over and was struck by the vessel Leopold D. The Hochelaga was blamed for this accident by a decision of the admiralty court.

There are other cases of like disasters and a more complete list could be given, if necessary. I think these are sound reasons to prove that the privileges granted to the pilots of the Montreal district should also be granted to those of the Quebec district. I shall not quote all the comments which were made to me as regards the reasons in favour of granting these advantages to the pilots of the Quebec district. I simply wish to quote the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Cyrille Pouliot, who is a regularly appointed pilot of the Cunard line. I am personally acquainted with him, he is a very efficient man in his profession, that is why I take the liberty of submitting to the committee his views. He states:

> If this Bill E passes, we, the pilots, can no further guarantee the safety of vessels as against the danger of collisions.
> We shall, perhaps, be obliged, at times, to ground our own vessels, in order to protect life. If it is intended to repeat the disaster of the Empress of Ireland with its 900 losses of life, it is only necessary to adopt this bill E. The government will not be able to contend that it was not warned by practical men.

We have but to let the bill pass in its present form and allow the vessels coming from the great lakes, Sidney or elsewhere, to proceed to Quebec, without the services of pilots and the unfortunate accidents such as those I quoted will reoccur.

Certain arguments are put forth by people who contend that it is unnecessary to have pilots. They are generally put forth by captains in charge of vessels coming from the Great Lakes and, while on their way to Montreal, take a rest when going through the canal. They have the services of pilots when proceeding from Montreal to Quebec and, arriving at Quebec, they contend that they can easily steer their vessels to and fro in the lower St. Lawrence. They argue that after a number of trips, having already had the assistance of pilots, they have a sufficient knowledge of the routes and ports to enable them to dock at Clark city, Shelby or other similar ports, with the same facility as pilots. As I have just shown in my remarks in connection with the various accidents that have occurred—and as the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) also stated—in certain cases when it is a matter of steering in one direction or of leaving one of these ports below Quebec so as to proceed to the open sea, it becomes much more difficult for a captain whatever may be his qualifications or his efficiency or his acquired skillfulness, he is exposed to all the dangers of meeting vessels or ships coming from the high sea.

When responsible and large companies take advantage on each trip of the services of pilots so as to protect the life of citizens and the goods they carry, it is only just that other companies, who carry on coastal trade and make use of the river route, be tied down to the same regulations.

There is another question. If other unfortunate accidents happen owing to the fact that no steps were taken to compel these companies to take on pilots below Quebec, I think that insurance companies will increase their rates and this in the long run will rather be detrimental to the various companies instead of being beneficial to them. There would be no harm done, sir, in granting to pilots of the Quebec district and those below Quebec, the same privileges as enjoyed by pilots between Montreal and Quebec. I think that this is necessary and that we should insist that these vessels which proceed from Montreal to Quebec and vice versa, and those that navigate between Quebec and the ports on the northern coast and also as far as Father Point, should have a pilot on board.

I am aware that such an amendment was moved in the Senate and discussed. It is unfortunate that it was not adopted. I do not think that it has any chance of passing this house, because generally when a bill comes from the Senate it is passed such as it is. It would be better to reconsider such a decision. The question is sufficiently important to reconsider it from the viewpoint of safety and protection to life, in case of accidents.

Mr. RALSTON: I generally agree with my deskmate (Mr. Casgrain) and I should like to agree with the very moderate presentation which he and the hon. member who preceded him have made of this case. But I venture to say that their submission only shows that when one concession is made it leads to another. We have never had compulsory pilotage between Quebec and Montreal. This bill provides that there shall be compulsory pilotage between those ports. That is a considerable hardship on shipping, particularly the shipping of the part of the dominion from which I come, operating up the St. Lawrence. Now having obtained that, my hon. friends—and I do not blame them; they present the views of those who have made representations to them—now propose that shipping shall have an additional burden placed upon it by having pilotage made compulsory below Quebec. Never since confederation, and that is quite a long time, has there been a compulsory provision affecting the lower portion of the river. Perhaps my hon. friends do not realize what a heavy burden they seek to impose on shipping, and particularly on the products of the province of Nova Scotia. I speak especially of the coal trade. I know one company which has eighteen vessels, which make an average of about twenty trips a year; this means 720 trips back and forth between Quebec and Father Point.

Mr. DURANLEAU: What company?

Mr. RALSTON: Dominion Coal Company. It would mean the imposing of a $65,000 burden on the Nova Scotia coal trade if compulsory pilotage were enacted applying to the pilotage district below Quebec. That is a substantial handicap. The government is endeavouring to assist in the marketing of Nova Scotia coal in central Canada by affording subsidies in connection with transportation, and it seems to me that if compulsory pilotage were imposed it would be giving with one hand and taking away with the other. While my hon. friends are perfectly justified in presenting the cases of the men whom they represent, at the same time we must remember that the trade of this country should have some consideration as well. Not since confederation have we had compulsory pilotage there, and as we all know that the route is being improved constantly, it seems to me that the argument for compulsory pilotage between Quebec and the mouth of the river is getting weaker all the time.

Further let me point out that the next section, 339, is rather ominous. As one who wants to see the coal trade of Nova Scotia developed I must say that I have some apprehension in regard to that section, which provides that the pilotage authority may make the pilotage district below Quebec compulsory. That threat is always hanging over the Nova Scotia coal trade. My hon. friend has suggested that it is safer to take pilots. I do not know anything about these matters except what I am told, but I understand that below Quebec there are only two dredged channels and that they constitute a very small portion of the route, and outside of that it is open water. The suggestion is made that currents and fog are encountered, but I submit that the masters of our vessels are quite as competent and have as much experience with currents and fog as any pilots they could get, with all respect to the gentlemen whose case is being presented here and without detracting in the least from their qualifications. I understand that it is also suggested that the pilots know more about depth of water. Anyone knows that a man operating a coasting vessel has to familiarize himself with conditions as to depth of water, and most coastwise vessels are of light draft anyway. Notwithstanding that my deskmate urges it so strongly, I have emphatically to record my sincere protest against any extension of this compulsory pilotage feature, and any further imposition of an increased burden on the coal trade of Nova Scotia.

Mr. CANTLEY: I wish first of all to thank the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) for what he has said in regard to this matter. As he has pointed out, since confederation we have never had compulsory pilotage below Quebec, and we do not intend to have it now. I would also point out that these pilots are employed practically seven months of the year and are idle the remaining five. They are among the best paid classes of labour in this country, and they ought to be jolly well satisfied with their positions.

Mr. DORION (Translation): I admit, sir, with the two hon. members who have just preceded me in this debate, that since Confederation pilotage is not compulsory between Quebec and Father Point for vessels of Eastern Canada.

Mr. CANTLEY: Speak in English, if you wish the majority of the house to listen to you. You can speak in English quite as well as in French.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Both languages are official.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am aware of that.

Mr. DORION (Translation): However, by section 338, there was added, to the provinces already exempted from pilotage, the province of Ontario. The danger does not arise from vessels coming from the maritime provinces but from those which do coastal trade on the Great Lakes and are ignorant of the regulations affecting navigation on the St. Lawrence river. Therefore, our objections—and I think that they are those of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain)—are not directed so much against vessels in the lower St. Lawrence as against those coming from the upper St. Lawrence river. Therefore, the act should be amended in such a way as to not make pilotage compulsory for vessels of the maritime provinces, but only for those of the upper St. Lawrence river.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): If I may add a word, I think that the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency has struck the nail on the head. It is not so much the vessels of the maritime provinces which are a source of danger, because those who steer them are excellent navigators, but the danger lies with the vessels coming from the Great Lakes. Their captains contend that, after a few trips in the lower St. Lawrence and having called at certain ports, they are able to enter and leave such ports and, moreover, they are as competent as pilots, navigators and captains of the lower St. Lawrence river. I contend that such is not the case. I admit that, in some instances, the captains and pilots of the maritime provinces may be as well qualified as those who pilot the vessels from Father Point to Quebec; but where the difference lies is that vessels from the Great Lakes, which navigate under different conditions are unable, relying only on those who man them, to acquire sufficient knowledge of those waters to safely steer the vessels under their charge and prevent all accidents and damages which they are liable to meet on their course.

According to the information I have furnished the house, a moment ago, in almost every accident, the vessels had no pilot on board. I think, sir, it is not asking too much, and such an amendment should be conceded to us.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have only a word of explanation in answer to my hon. friend's remarks. The only amendment to the existing law consists in the addition of the word "Ontario" to the words "Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or any other or others of them," and the words "and any port in the United States on the river St. Lawrence or the great lakes." Under the existing statute a ship leaving Pictou, for instance, and coming to Montreal had no pilotage dues to pay in the district of Quebec, but the same boat leaving Pictou for Toronto was bound to pay pilotage dues in the district of Quebec, although in a great many instances it did not use the services of a pilot. We thought there was an anomaly in this regard and all the companies engaged in home trade between the different provinces of Canada insisted that that anomaly should disappear, and because of that we have added the word "Ontario." That is not very important.

I have heard the reading of a letter from one of the pilots in the district of Quebec. It seems to me that he is very pessimistic. He has indicated that if there are no pilots on home-trade ships or on ships doing business between the Canadian provinces there will be a great number of casualties on the lower St. Lawrence from Quebec down. I say that that gentleman does not help the reputation of our great St. Lawrence river.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He is one of the best pilots, and is always retained by Cunard.

Mr. DURANLEAU: All the shipping companies engaged in this business running between the maritime provinces and Montreal, Toronto and great lakes ports have for years appeared before the department asking for this amendment. The Quebec pilots were heard before the committee which sat in another house, and were defeated. I think they were properly defeated. We have to consider the expenses incurred on the St. Lawrence from Quebec down to increase our aids to navigation, and the matter of giving the best service to navigators. There are only two points where there may be some danger, and those points are now well known by all navigators coming from the maritime provinces or from the great lakes; I speak of the traverse, and that part near the island of Orleans. The hon. member will recall that we have two channels at Quebec. Last fall the north channel was inaugurated. It has a depth of 32 feet 6 inches, and probably by the end of this season will be 35 feet deep. So that below Quebec, by the use of those two channels navigation is considered safe. I believe the section is only doing justice to those companies carrying on a business between the different Canadian provinces. I may say that all the companies interested have accepted the amendments, and in that statement I include even the amendment concerning the pilotage district of Montreal, rendering pilotage compulsory between Quebec and Montreal. Surely my hon. friends cannot make a comparison between the boat channel from Quebec down with the channel from Quebec up to Montreal. They cannot do it, and all the companies interested agreed on that point. As a matter of fact our experience has shown that although pilotage was not compulsory between Montreal and Quebec on those voyages between the different provinces of Canada, over ninety per cent of the ships have used the services of pilots. If we have rendered pilotage dues compulsory in that district of Montreal it is because we want to render navigation safer in that part. The ship owners have shown, by their experience, that they needed pilots between Montreal and Quebec. I may say all these companies were represented before the committee. I have received a long letter from the Shipping Federation of Canada, representing the Dominion Shipping Company, which carries coal for the Dominion Coal Company; Paterson Steamships Limited, Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited, Canada Steamship Lines, Hall Corporation of Canada, Sarnia Steamship Company and subsidiaries, Eastern Steamship Company and the Unit Transit Company. They all accept the amendments for the district of Quebec and the district of Montreal. Under these circumstances I think the section should remain as it is. Navigation is protected under section 339. The governor in council may at any time by order in council impose compulsion as to pilotage if it is considered necessary. I think that is enough protection for the pilot and for the safety of navigation on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, I would point out to you that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Count the house.

The assistant clerk having counted the house:

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith) (Cumberland): There is a quorum present.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Subject to the rights of parties in this house, Mr. Chairman, if there is not a quorum, I shall proceed with my remarks.

Mr. HEAPS: The quorum is now going out, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency in the course of his remarks referred to certain parts of the report of Sir Alexander Gibb regarding the ports of Montreal and Quebec. We have heard of that report very often. I do not know if I am in order in bringing it up, Mr. Chairman, but the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency based his case on parts of that report. So far we have seen only the face of that report but nothing tangible in the way of implementing its conclusions. If I may be permitted a digression, I would ask the minister if he will be in a position before the house prorogues to let us know when the recommendations of that report regarding a merger or amalgamation of the ports of this country may be expected to be carried out.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not prepared to say at the moment that before the end of the session I will make a statement as to any legislation implementing the report of Sir Alexander Gibb. But we have already profited by that report in many respects, not through legislation, but in our practices, in the construction of harbour facilities, for instance, and in many other respects.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I understand that the report recommended that all the ports should be amalgamated under one board or commission which would have supervision over them. The bill we are now considering covers shipping in general, and as shipping affects the ports all over the country, my question may be regarded as pertinent. I asked the minister this question because I know that in the province of Quebec and in other parts of the country the report of Sir Alexander Gibb has been well received to a certain extent. I do not say that the people are favourably inclined to accepting all of his conclusions, but they were looking forward to the government implementing to a certain extent his report, or at all events, doing something about it. The government paid a great deal of money to get that report made, and we were told it would do a lot of good, that it would help to cut costs and improve conditions. That is the reason I bring this matter up.

Mr. DUFF: I was very much interested in what the minister said about the great shipping companies being favourable to this legislation in regard to pilotage in the St. Lawrence. I was still more interested in what the member for Quebec-Montmorency said this afternoon. He was very much interested in foreign voyages then, and now to-night he is interested in the St. Lawrence river. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the Quebec pilots should be protected, and any ship coming up the St. Lawrence river should be prepared to pay pilotage to these men who risk their lives in bringing ships up the St. Lawrence. I was surprised that the minister and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency should get up in their places in this parliament and argue that there was no necessity for ships coming from Nova Scotia or coming down the lakes from Fort William to pay pilotage, and it was all the more surprising in view of the fact that the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency was so strong this afternoon in support of the clause to amend the shipping act in regard to foreign voyages. He represents a district where there is a number of pilots, and now he is supporting the minister and the minister is supporting him in advocating that no pilotage should be paid.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 339 agreed to on division.

On section 343—Ship not complying with previous section.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is a clerical error to be corrected in this section. I move, Mr. Chairman, that in line 17 the words "liable to pay, to the pilotage authority of the district, a sum" be struck out. They were obviously inserted by error and do not make sense with the rest of the section. The section will then read:

> Every such ship which fails to comply with the provisions of the last preceding section shall be liable to pay, to the pilotage authority of the district, a sum not exceeding the amount of pilotage dues which would be payable for piloting such ship.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Mr. Manion moves to strike out the words in line 17, "liable to pay, to the pilotage authority of the district, a sum."

Mr. DUFF: The Minister of Marine and not the Minister of Railways and Canals moved that amendment. I would be quite satisfied if the Minister of Railways and Canals had moved it, but the fact is the Minister of Marine did so.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is the difference?

Mr. DUFF: Let us have this thing in order.

Mr. CANTLEY: The hon. member said he was not going to speak again.

Mr. DUFF: I would be quite satisfied if the hon. member for Pictou would get up and move this amendment. We should have this thing in order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): There is no name on the amendment as I have it.

Mr. DUFF: The minister moved it.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 391—Form and particulars of inspection certificate.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is a small amendment to be made here in connection with the numbers in the fourth line of the section. I move to strike out the words "six hundred and sixty-one or six hundred and sixty-two" and insert in lieu thereof the words "three hundred and eighty-nine or three hundred and ninety."

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I must again call your attention to the fact that a minister cannot move an amendment; this amendment must be moved by the Minister of Railways and Canals or the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. MANION: I will move it.

Mr. DUFF: I should like to know if the Minister of Railways and Canals godfathers this amendment.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I said so.

Mr. DUFF: Will you please stand up and say so?

Section 570 agreed to on division.

On section 637—Collisions.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is a small amendment to be made to subsection 4, to strike out the words "body of water" in line 37 and substitute in lieu thereof the words "part or parts of the minor waters of Canada." This amendment is proposed to limit the power of the governor in council.

Amendment agreed to on division.

On section 654—Tonnage how calculated.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have a small amendment to move to subsection 2 of section 654. I move to strike out the words "scheduled" in line 13 and insert in lieu thereof the words "contained in the eighth schedule." If the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has any objection, I will ask my colleague the Minister of Railways and Canals to move this amendment.

Mr. DUFF: I want to make this regular. It is altogether irregular that the minister should move amendments to his own bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The Minister of Railways and Canals moved it.

Mr. DUFF: The minister moved it and he asked me if I had any objection. I request the Minister of Railways and Canals to please get up and move the amendment.

Mr. MANION: As a matter of fact a minister piloting a bill through a committee may move his own amendments. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough is wrong in saying that he cannot.

Mr. DUFF: That is not right.

Mr. MANION: I remember last year looking into this question very thoroughly. I was piloting the railway bill through at that time and I moved many amendments myself. The other day in the committee, the Minister of Finance moved many amendments with the consent of the chairman. It usually is the custom when a minister is piloting a bill through the committee that he does not move his own amendments, but he has the right to do so. However, I am very glad to move this one.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister know what it is all about?

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes. I have studied this very deeply. Like my hon. friend, I spent last Sunday studying the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 702—Stevedores and trimmers.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There are a number of clerical errors which will have to be corrected by amendments. I move to insert the words "this part of" after the word "under" in subsection 2, line 14. I move to strike out the word "act" in line 3 of subsection 5 and insert in lieu thereof the word "part". I move to strike out the words "of this act" in subsection 6. I move to strike out the words "of this act" in line 11 of subsection 7. I move to strike out the words "of this act" in line 18 of subsection 8; to insert the words "this part of" after the word "which" in line 19; to insert the words "this part of" after the word "which" in line 21; to strike out the word "act" in the same line and insert in lieu thereof the word "part", and to strike out the word "act" in line 23 and to insert in lieu thereof the word "part".

Mr. DUFF: This is all out of order. Surely, Mr. Chairman, you are not going to allow the minister to get away with this? If there are any amendments to be moved they should be moved by another minister or another hon. member. This afternoon the minister told me that no one but a lawyer should make amendments to this bill in order that they might be legally drawn up. The minister now comes in and moves seventeen amendments to one section and he has no right to move these. I want to ask the minister what this section is about and why these amendments are necessary. Either the Minister of Railways or the hon. member for Pictou should move these amendments. Perhaps the hon. member for Pictou would be more qualified to move them. I submit that the minister has given the whole story away when he finds it necessary to move seventeen amendments to one section. The whole thing is out of order. Unless the amendments are moved in the proper manner they should not be put to the committee.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend stated that I said that no one but a lawyer could draft the sections of this bill. I did not go quite as far as that; I simply asked my hon. friend if he had had legal advice in drafting the amendments he suggested this afternoon. I was supported in that statement by some of my hon. friends opposite. The drafting of any bill is a very difficult job for one not versed in the law. Of course, a man of practical ability like my hon. friend is a great help to the legal mind in the drafting of such a bill, but I suggest that the actual drafting should be under the direction of a lawyer. My hon. friend says that there are some seventeen amendments. As a matter of fact, it is about the same error repeated in seven or eight places, superfluous words; and they are only clerical errors, absolutely. Last week I requested officers of the Justice department to go over the bill carefully and note any possible clerical errors. Having carefully examined their report, I suggest it is proper to adopt these slight amendments.

Mr. DUFF: The minister tells us that his department employed a gentleman of the legal profession to draft the bill. The taxpayers paid that gentleman some $15,000, and then the bill was before another chamber for two years, and that cost the country another $50,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: More than that.

Mr. DUFF: And after that the bill was placed in the hands of another eminent legal gentleman who was paid by this government $50 a day for the whole session, which must have amounted to $3,000. Now the minister says that last week he had to go to the Justice department to find out whether a certain clause in the bill which he now brings before us was right or wrong, and he admits that this clause was not right. The minister admits that after this government spent thousands of dollars in the preparation of this bill, in 1932, in 1933 and in 1934, certain clauses of it had to be submitted to the Minister of Justice or his department, and we are told that the Department of Justice is of the opinion that this particular clause should be amended in certain respects. Did the minister ask the Department of Justice to give its views on all the sections of the bill? If that department is of the opinion that certain changes are necessary in one clause—fourteen or fifteen changes—then the same thing may be true of all 719 clauses. The whole thing is wrong. Only paste and scissors—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Order.

Mr. DUFF: Why order?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The hon. member is absolutely out of order.

Mr. DUFF: Why?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Because his remarks have no relation to the section under discussion.

Mr. DUFF: What is the section?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The section is 702, with amendment.

Mr. DUFF: The minister says that he had to go to the Department of Justice in connection with this clause. I am pointing out that this government employed learned counsel in Vancouver and paid him $100 a day for practically a whole year. This learned solicitor, after going over the bill, admitted himself that he used the paste pot and scissors.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The learned solicitor in question did not put this bill into print, and the amendments made before the committee are merely to correct errors made in the printing of it. I cannot see therefore that the hon. member's remarks have any relevancy to the amendment.

Mr. DUFF: It is not to correct errors in printing; that would be typographical. What we are trying to do is to correct the mistakes of the minister or of his legal advisers, or whoever it was that suggested these clauses. The minister has admitted that in this clause alone a number of amendments are necessary and I say that is sufficient to condemn the whole bill, because it shows conclusively that he has no right to force the bill on the people before it is properly considered.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the amendments carry?

Mr. CASGRAIN: On division, and we are very kind to let it go at that.

Amendments agreed to on division.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend will admit that if, after having perused carefully the whole bill of 500 pages only a few clerical errors were found, perhaps ten or fifteen, this bill has been carefully drafted.

Mr. DUFF: I did not say I perused the whole bill. I said that of 497 pages I perused 124, and the minister has no right to say I perused the whole bill. I say now that he himself has never perused the whole bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am sorry, but my hon. friend did not understand me. I said that after we had perused the bill, as our officials have done since last week, we found a few clerical errors like these.

Mr. REID: Was section 704 allowed to stand?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It was carried.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the amendment?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amendment is that subsection 1 of section 2 be deleted and that subsection 2 be renumbered subsection 1, and that there be inserted as subsection 2 the following:

"Agreement with the crew" has the meaning as indicated in section 163 of this act.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I would like in a few words to explain the reason for the amendment. The definition of "the admiralty" was in the bill before it was amended, because the word "admiralty" appeared in certain clauses of it. When the bill was amended in the other house, the word "admiralty" disappeared from the sections, but the definition remained, in order to make no change to the numbering of all the definitions, one hundred and thirteen in number. As some of those definitions are referred to in a large number of clauses by their number, corrections would have to be made in a large number of clauses, and so they thought they should leave that definition because it was of no importance whatever. But I think it is better to delete this definition and insert the one I have just read defining the words "agreement with the crew." In this way there will be no change in the numbering of the definitions.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Marine and anybody else connected with this bill, whether it be the government or somebody else, have come to the conclusion after perusing this legislation that as I suggested a fortnight ago no reference is made in it to the definition that—

"The Admiralty" means the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom for the time being, or the commissioner for the time being for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom.

It is all very well for the minister after I suggested this a fortnight ago to say now that he is willing to cut out this subclause. This proves conclusively that the whole bill has never been properly considered by the ministry or parliament or this definition would never have been inserted. Why should a Canadian bill, a bill introduced in this parliament, whether in another place or here, refer to the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom? This proves conclusively that somebody fell down on the job. The minister this afternoon was very careful to tell us about what wonderful officials he had in the Marine department; but I say that the officials are not worth their salt or they would never have allowed the minister to come before parliament and be placed in the embarrassing position into which he has been put in the last fortnight and especially to-night when he had to admit on the floor of the house that in the 497 pages of this bill there is no reference to the Lord High Admiral or the commissioner for the time being for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom.

The minister, I suppose on the advice of his officials, has moved that a certain clause take the place of this one. That is not a reasonable clause to insert there and just at this juncture I will suggest a better one. The minister must admit that these subclauses are inserted alphabetically. Let me explain what I mean. The first definition is "the admiralty—Ad. The next is "Admiralty Court"; the next "Board", and it goes on A, B, C. The minister wants to insert in place of the definition of "The Admiralty" under A, something about seamen. If he wants to justify his officials and justify his high priced lawyers who for two years have been sweating over this bill and making a mess of things; if he wants to justify the nineteen gentlemen in another place who never saw salt water; if he wants to justify anybody, let me suggest to him that instead of the definition about the seamen and instead of the definition of "The Admiralty", he insert a definition of "this act". I am doing this just now without consulting a solicitor or anybody learned in the law. Perhaps the chairman will help me out because he is one of the most eminent lawyers in Nova Scotia. Instead of putting in this foolish clause about seamen, which is entirely out of order because all these definitions are inserted alphabetically, let him make this subclause 1 of clause 2 read: "'This act' means an act respecting shipping". That will get the minister out of the hole and his officials out of the mess they are in and bring, them back again sailing in clear water. Let the minister stop this talk about seamen because we must have a certain method of procedure in regard to this bill. Will he accept the suggestion from me that instead of inserting a clause which means nothing at all he put in the marginal note of subclause 1 the words "this act" and then go on to say:

(1) "This act" means an act respecting shipping.

That covers the clauses of Bill E and is much better than the amendment he moved, although I presume his officials have been sweating for ten days in an endeavour to find something to take the place of this subclause with regard to the admiralty and the Lord High Admiral, which should never have been in the bill in the first place if the minister had been properly advised, and if his officials had been the proper ones they would have never allowed this to come before parliament, thus placing the minister in the embarrassing position in which he has found himself in the last fortnight.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was there any reference to the admiralty or the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom in any of the clauses of the bill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not in the bill as amended.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The only reason I am asking this is because the bill was submitted to us with that definition in the interpretation clause. There must have been some reason for putting that in. Like my confrere, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, I am much surprised; after a bill had been considered for practically the whole session before the other house, had been studied there last year also and had been studied as extensively as that the minister will readily admit it is most remarkable that in the last minutes before this bill is to be adopted we are told it is better that we should eliminate that clause and replace it by another. Surely the minister, whom I know to be a shrewd lawyer, who has a high standing at the bar, who was our batonnier and of whom we are all proud, will admit that we have some justification for our criticism of the bill.

Mr. REID: If this amendment carries, it will practically complete the bill and I think it does away with subclause 1. Before this happens, as it affects the engagement of seamen, let me make a last appeal to the minister regarding a clause—

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend would care to wait, I have one or two more amendments.

Mr. REID: All right.

Mr. DUFF: I must ask the minister now to take time to consider what I have suggested. If he is going to delete this subsection 1 which refers to the admiralty and which he admits should never have been in this bill, he should put in some clause which relates specifically to this part of the bill. The amendment the minister has offered is not necessary.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Why?

Mr. DUFF: Because it is not, that is the reason. I say that it would be much better if the minister would take my suggestion—

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amendment may not be necessary, but it is desirable.

Mr. DUFF: It is not desirable. The minister is only putting this subsection in because he has to delete another.

Mr. CASGRAIN: To fill a gap.

Mr. DUFF: He admits now that this bill came from the august body in another part of this building, after being considered by two high-priced lawyers which must have cost this country some $30,000—

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Mr. DUFF: And in this bill there is no reference to the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom. If we had a lord high admiral of Canada I could understand it and would not object, but it refers to the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom for the time being or the commissioners for the time being for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom. If those high-priced lawyers and the officials of the marine department and everyone who has been associated with the minister made this mistake in the very first subsection of this bill, what must we expect from the 497 pages of it? The minister wants to delete this section and put in another one with regard to seamen. I say that is not in order. What we put in this subsection should conform to the alphabetical arrangement of these interpretation clauses. The minister's amendment does not fit in alphabetically. He tries to persuade us that he is saving money by taking out this section and making subsection 2 subsection 1 and so on instead of reprinting the bill. But he is not doing that at all. All he is doing is trying to save the face of either the hon. gentlemen in another house, or the high priced lawyers the minister had to deal with this bill, or some of his officials. My suggestion is that the minister's amendment should not be carried in order to save the face of those lawyers or those officials, but that clause 1 of section 2 should refer to this bill. It is a very simple thing; just say that this act means an act respecting shipping as contained in Bill E. I submit that it is much better than the minister's amendment. I am sure his official must have stayed up nights trying to find something to take the place of this foolish reference to the Lord High Admiral and the commissioners for the time being executing that office in the old country.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is just to fill in a gap.

Mr. DUFF: The minister's officials have sweated over this and the minister himself has got grey-headed over it, and now he takes out the admiralty and instead of proceeding in the order of A, B, C, D, he is putting in its place an interpretation regarding seamen which should appear at about subsection 90. The minister surely should accept my suggestion.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes while I try to deal with my hon. friend the Presbyterian elder from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff)? This afternoon my hon. friend although entirely out of order continued to speak for some considerable time. When his attention was called to the fact that he was out of order he said that if allowed to continue he would not speak again during this day. I am reminded of a story concerning a man in the old country who was elected an elder of the church. On his way home he saw his cow in the field and he said to her: "Betty, ye are no' a common coo the noo; ye are nothin' less than an elder's coo." Now my hon. friend has recently been elected an elder of the Presbyterian church of his home town, and I submit in view of that he ought to be a little more careful in regard to keeping promises he makes, particularly in this honourable house.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. DUFF: No, Mr. Chairman, it cannot carry in view of what my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) has said. There is one principle in the Presbyterian church which requires that a man must be honest and sincere in his convictions. My hon. friend and I agree, except in this, that my hon. friend, who now occupies the chair of the Prime Minister—

Mr. CANTLEY: No, you are wrong.

Mr. DUFF: Well, the chair of the Minister of Justice. I am sure I would be delighted to see him move up there; in fact I would like to see him move up into the other house. The other night my hon. friend was the greatest critic of this bill. He told us that the phraseology of certain sections was absolutely wrong. Yet this afternoon and to-night as a sheep before her shearers is dumb so my hon. friend, openeth not his mouth. Why? Because the Prime Minister or some other influence or magnet has drawn him over into the seat of the Minister of Justice and now he tries to tell us that this bill should go through. My hon. friend knows very well that this bill is all wrong. He knows that there are clauses in it which he as a shipping man—and he knows a great deal more about shipping than I do—could not approve. He knows that Part II should be changed; he knows that this bill should not go through the house hurriedly—

Mr. CANTLEY: Stick to your promise.

Mr. DUFF: That is not quite fair. I admit that perhaps I have fallen from grace, but my hon. friend has fallen a number of times even if he is now sitting by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who of course knows more about grace than either my hon. friend or I. I want to say to my hon. friend that this is a very important matter, and he knows it, a matter in which every man who goes down to the sea in ships is interested. The other day when I called the attention of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice and the attention of this committee to the fact that there is no mention of the Lord High Admiral in this bill, no mention of the commissioners for the time being for executing the office of the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom, in spite of the fact that the Prime Minister is perhaps better informed and has a greater memory than any other man in this parliament, yet he could not find in the 497 pages, the 719 clauses, or the schedules of this bill where the Lord High Admiral and the commissioners for the time being for executing his office are mentioned. He tried to find it, and I appreciate his effort, but to-night we have the minister admitting that there is no such thing in the bill. Why should there be? This is a bill of the Canadian parliament; we have no lord high admiral; we have no commissioners of the admiralty in this country. It just proves conclusively that this whole bill has been badly drawn. In spite of the fact that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine had this man Griffin come from Vancouver at $100 a day, just as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has a $150 a day man in this other committee of his and has other lawyers at $100 and $50 a day—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Order, please. That has nothing whatever to do with the clause under consideration.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I certainly am in order in discussing the motion of the minister that this subsection be deleted. I am giving reasons why this clause should never have appeared in the bill. In spite of the fact that high priced lawyers and officials of the Marine department have been worrying over this bill for the last two years, the lawyers inserted the clause in the first place. The minister told me a fortnight ago and told this house that he had read the bill, and yet he now wants to delete the clause, in spite of the fact that only a week ago the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice sat in their seats and looked over the bill, and could not find any clause or part of it in which the Lord High Admiral or the commissioners of the admiralty were mentioned. I say the amendment he has moved concerning seamen is not in place, and I suggest he should add a simple clause in order to conform with the alphabetical order of the bill. Hon. members will note that the definitions are indicated alphabetically. For instance, the first subsection deals with the admiralty, and then comes one dealing with the admiralty court. Then there is a subsection dealing with the definition of the word "Board." Definitions follow in their alphabetical order, namely, C, D, E, F, G. But to-night the minister wants to make a statement about seamen in the first subsection. I suggest that in order to save his face, and in order to save the face of the government who paid out thousands of dollars to bring this conglomeration of nothing before parliament, the minister could insert in the clause the words "'This act' means every clause in this bill E regarding shipping." I make this suggestion to the minister. I know he will not agree with it; he will take the advice of some official who does not know what he is talking about. Of course the minister will not take my advice, and I do not care whether he does or not. No doubt this bill will go through, because the Prime Minister is determined to push it through. It certainly is not a very great credit to anybody to put through a bill like this. The present bill will be passed as the first legislation based on the convention of a few years ago. All right, if the minister wishes the bill to pass, he may have it passed. But the men interested in shipping will wake up to-morrow morning and they will look at the amendment the minister is moving to-night, an amendment which is not even alphabetically correct, and express their disapproval. The minister admits there is no mention in the act about the admiralty or the commissioner. Why does he not put in the simple amendment I have suggested, and simply say, "'This act' means every clause in this bill E regarding shipping."

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On section 2, subsection 38—Home trade voyage.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have one or two observations to make, because I believe section 120 passed when I was not in the chamber, and I may make some observations on this subsection. It has been brought to my attention that a change has been made in the description of a home trade voyage, and it is possible that some of the certificates of coastal captains may suffer thereby. I have discussed the matter with the assistant to the deputy minister who has given me some assurance in the matter, but I should like to have a definite statement from the minister who is piloting this bill through the House of Commons. I should like to know that those who have their certificates as coastal captains qualified to take ships up to the Labrador coast, or down to the Bermudas, will not be prevented from operating those boats. I have in mind the Clarke Steamship Company. I was told that with the description indicated the certificates would be issued to coastal captains with certain limitations. I should like to be properly posted. It may be that the law would apply only to the new certificates issued in future. I notice that section 120 provides for a renewal at the expiration of the period of five years. My point is as to whether or not they will be renewed in accordance with the terms of the present legislation, or the terms of the act as it stood previously.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That part of section 120 has been deleted.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It has been deleted?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, the part limiting the life of the certificate to five years has been deleted. The certificates are not in any way affected by this bill. It affects only the future.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do I understand that when old captains with coastal certificates come back and ask for renewals those certificates will be renewed in accordance with the terms which prevailed when they were issued?

Mr. DURANLEAU: They have a life certificate. They do not need renewal, except in the event of loss of their certificate. I have an amendment to subsection 38 of section 2. I move that the words, "north of the 60th parallel of north latitude or" be stricken out from lines 47 and 48, and that at line 49, after the word "latitude" the words "or through Bering strait" be added. The question as to the Hudson bay route has been raised. By the amendment, except on the west side, the limiting line to the north is deleted. On the west side the only limitation is that a home voyage boat could not pass through Bering strait.

Mr. DUFF: If the minister can be so generous, why does he not make it the north pole? Why mention Bering strait? Certainly there is no necessity to make it Bering strait. Of course the minister would not accept my suggestion because he would not consider it proper. In moving this amendment, however, he admits that I called to his attention and the attention of the government the fact that there had been a mistake made in naming the sixtieth parallel. Now he comes along, and instead of accepting my suggestion of substituting the sixty-fifth parallel of north latitude, he mentions Bering strait. Why not go the whole distance? Canada owns the north pole; she owns all the territory north of Hudson bay. Why does the minister, on the advice of his officials I presume, not accept my suggestion? Oh, no, they could not do that, of course. That would be altogether too much to ask. That would be very humiliating to the minister and to the government. My suggestion was made to-day to increase the northern latitude to the sixty-fifth parallel, and I believe it is better than the Bering strait suggestion. Does the minister know where Bering strait is? How far north is Bering strait. What parallel is it in? Surely if any person has pluck enough to pilot a vessel to the north pole the minister should not expect him in a home voyage, to go no farther than Bering strait. Why not make it zero? Why say Bering strait? Why do the officials talk about Bering strait? Will my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce look at the map, and if he does he will find that it does not affect the Pacific situation. It is surely much better to move the parallel from 65 to 70, or whatever it is. It just shows, Mr. Chairman, that the minister's officials are not advising him properly. I am going to ask the minister either to accept my suggestion and make it the sixty-fifth parallel or let this clause stand until to-morrow so that his advisers may advise him what is right. Why talk about Bering strait? The only thing a navigator knows is the parallels of latitude and longitude. What is the latitude in Bering strait, for instance? The minister is looking at the map. Will he please tell me—I have not a map before me—what is the latitude of Bering strait? We have now six men crowding around the minister looking to see what latitude Bering strait is in. Will the minister please tell the committee what latitude it is in? Why will not the minister accept my suggestion to move the parallel from sixty to sixty-five, which is the proper nautical way to do it. and that would make a voyage to Hudson bay a home-trade voyage? But the minister on the advice of some official in his department, who has no doubt stayed up nights trying to give advice, says that he is going to make this home-trade voyage to Bering strait. Why does he not accept my suggestion?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Just a word of explanation. The question of the Hudson bay voyage was raised in this house and we thought we could allow a voyage on the Hudson bay route as a home-trade voyage, under regulations passed by order in council. The parallel sixty has been eliminated because there is no other voyage to the north on the Atlantic side, and we did not see any reason why we should limit a voyage on the Atlantic side to the sixty-fifth parallel. But on the west coast, after considering the matter, a ship going through Bering strait and as far as the Mackenzie river, let us say, would have to go across deep water, across the sea, and then it becomes a foreign voyage where the hazards of navigation are greater. That is why the limitation on the home voyage on the western coast is the passage of Bering strait. I do not think my hon. friend can have any objection to that, for he knows perfectly well that Bering strait is between the sixtieth and seventieth parallels, and if he will read the amendment I am sure he will find it is quite proper under the circumstances.

Mr. DUFF: The minister admits that I am right. He says that Bering strait is between north parallels sixty-five and seventy. Why then does he not accept my suggestion to make the parallel sixty-five both on the west coast and on the east coast? Why name Bering strait? If I want to leave Nova Scotia and go to the north pole I will go further than the sixty-fifth north parallel.

The minister says that the Mackenzie river voyage would be a foreign voyage. Surely he does not mean that. No voyage in Canada, and of course the Mackenzie river is in Canada, is a foreign voyage. The minister is being badly advised. I say that all he has to do is to accept my suggestion. I am the one who brought it up, because, due, I will not say to the stupidity of the lawyers who drafted this bill, but to lack of knowledge of the members of the committee in the other house, they deliberately in the clause which we have to consider in this bill limited the home-trade voyage to the sixtieth parallel of north latitude. That means that a voyage to the Hudson bay would not be a home-trade voyage. Once you get fifty miles away from cape Chidley on the Labrador coast you are outside of the home-trade limits, and you are on a foreign voyage. The hon. member for Nelson agreed with me in that because he immediately asked the minister that this clause should stand for further consideration. Let us be fair about this thing. Why should we not make this clause read in a proper manner? Why should we say Bering strait? The suggestion I made to the minister this afternoon was that the home-trade voyage should include Canada, the United States, Mexico, the territory of Alaska, Newfoundland, Labrador, St. Pierre and Miquelon and the West Indies, in the course of which a ship does not go north of the sixty-fifth parallel of north latitude. No ship wants to go north of that, and the minister admits that Bering strait is within that definition. Why does the minister not accept the suggestion I made? Surely he must admit that I have a little knowledge of marine matters. I do not want to embarrass the minister. I am trying to help him. But just because the officials of his department have made a mess of this thing the minister will not admit that a mistake has been made. I say that it is not right for him to come in and move this amendment. He admits that the clause is wrong because he wants to amend it, and I say that he should accept my amendment and that the north latitude should go to the sixty-fifth degree, and so far as the south latitude is concerned instead of going to cape Hatteras it should go down to British Guiana which is five degrees north of the equator.

I am simply trying to be fair, Mr. Chairman. The minister must admit that I have no axe to grind. There is no politics in this thing, because if there were, I would simply let the bill go through holus bolus and then go out and say to every mariner in this country that this bill is a mess, and I would show them why it is wrong. All I am trying to do is to show the minister that this clause drawn up by somebody, I do not know whether it was his officials in the department or someone else, is all wrong.

Let me draw the attention of the committee to the definition of a coasting voyage under the old act. A coasting voyage is being changed by this bill to a home-trade voyage. Now under the definition of a coasting voyage under the old act a ship could go on a coasting voyage down as far as Buenos Aires. But under a home-trade voyage, where does the minister want a ship to go? Not to Buenos Aires, not to Pernambuco, not to British Guiana, not to the British West Indies, not to Bermuda—no. Where? To cape Hatteras. Is that fair? Why this distinction? What does it mean? I call the attention of the Minister of Railways particularly to this matter because the hon. gentleman wants the Canadian merchant marine and the national steamships to make money, and I say to him and to the Minister of Marine and to this committee that this clause, instead of reading the thirty-sixth north latitude, which is cape Hatteras, should read the fifth north, which includes the West Indies and British Guiana. Why does not the minister accept my suggestion? I do not want to talk all the time about this thing, but surely the minister, instead of taking the advice of his officials who stayed awake nights trying to give him advice, should admit the reasonableness of my argument. Let the home-trade voyage go down to British Guiana where the Canadian National steamships go and where the vessels from Nova Scotia go. Why say that they can go only as far as cape Hatteras? Whoever heard tell of a Nova Scotia vessel going to cape Hatteras? She may pass the cape but she does not stop there. However, a vessel may go to British Guiana or to the Barbadoes or to St. Kitts or Bermuda. In order to justify the position taken by some of his officials the minister refuses to accept my suggestion. I am not talking politics, I am talking business when I say that a ship has a proper right to be considered on a home-trade voyage when she leaves Vancouver to go down the western coast to Panama, then through the canal and up to Halifax. Instead of referring to the Bering strait, which does not mean anything, the minister should use the sailor's term of latitude. I contend that the sixty-fifth degree will meet the objection raised by the hon. member for New Westminster. Under the section as it now is no ship could go into Hudson bay on a home-trade voyage; it would have to be a foreign voyage. Let the minister be fair and decent about this thing. He should not mind his officials. I admit that they have made mistakes, but this parliament is more important than the officials of the Department of Marine. I say to the minister that he should adopt the suggestions which I gave this afternoon. Such a voyage should be permitted to the sixty-fifth parallel of north latitude and down to the fifth. This would mean that a ship could go the Hudson bay and down as far as British Guiana. Such an amendment would be in the interests of the seamen and the shipping of this country.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Does the minister intend to amend subsection 38?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amendment is before the committee.

Mr. NEILL: I should like the minister to tell us what led him to make such a substantial change in the coasting area allowed to this class of certificate. The present limits are forty degress south and it is now proposed to change them to thirty-six degrees north. That makes a difference in the trading area, so to speak, of 4,400 miles. As the minister is aware from the telegram I read this afternoon and from hon. members who have spoken, the men concerned on the Pacific coast ask that this should be made 10 degrees south, or at least far enough south to permit Pacific Canadian coasting ships to use the Panama canal. Can the minister give us any explanation as to why it was thought necessary to treat these men as if incompetent? Is there any objection to changing it to allow them to get through the Panama canal?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This bill does not affect the certificate of a master.

Mr. NEILL: Who does it affect?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Those who have their certificates at the present time are not affected. The reason for the change from forty degrees south latitude to thirty-six degrees north is the hazards of navigation. A ship starting from the St. Lawrence and going down to Buenos Aires, which is only about thirty-six degrees latitude, would have to pass through the deep sea and would encounter hazards of navigation. This is done in order to protect life at sea. Any ship having to go upon the deep sea must be considered as being on a foreign voyage.

Mr. NEILL: If these men are fit to go down to thirty-six degrees north, it seems to me they are equally fit to go a few degrees further south. Do I understand the minister to say that this ruling will not apply to men who have existing tickets as long as they live?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, as long as they live.

Mr. NEILL: Where does the minister find that in the bill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend will find that under section 121 existing certificates are protected.

Mr. NEILL: Existing certificates may not be interfered with, but the area in which they can be used is interfered with.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My information is that the area is not affected.

Mr. NEILL: I think the scriptures say: Oh, Lord, we are indeed fearfully and wonderfully made. I do not think we could find a better description for this bill.

Amendment agreed to.

On subsection 89—Sailing ship.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is an amendment to be made to this subsection. I move to strike out the whole of subsection 89 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(89) "Sailing ship" (except as may be provided under the load line rules) means a ship propelled wholly by sails and includes a ship not in excess of one hundred and fifty tons gross tonnage, provided with masts, sails and rigging sufficient to allow her to make a voyage under sail alone, and which, in addition, is provided with mechanical means of propulsion other than a steam engine.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 167—Agreements with crew of home-trade ships.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I move that the word "superintendent" in the second line of subsection 2 be deleted and the words "shipping master" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is quite proper that we should adjourn.

Mr. BENNETT: There are outward and visible manifestations of a state of mind in this chamber.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is an outward and visible sign.

An hon. MEMBER: Some victory.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Some victories may be bought at a high price; remember that.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Wednesday, June 20, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Ninth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Stinson.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No 114, to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No 115, respecting the election of members of the House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: How about Ontario?

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, before attempting to explain the bill I must thank my hon. friends opposite for the kindly greeting they have given me.

Mr. HANBURY: For the last time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I have no fear on that score. This bill becomes necessary, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the franchise bill which is now before the house. This bill as introduced will repeal the Dominion Elections Act. It removes from it all the clauses which have now been transferred to the Franchise Act and reenacts those clauses in another form according to their numbers. The one is consequential upon the other.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Are there any changes involved?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are some changes. When the bill is introduced my hon. friend will have a chance to examine it. My idea is to have it printed for distribution at once.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the changes?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are some changes which are absolutely consequential upon the changes in the Franchise Act. The only other change that I need mention is the repeal of the section whereby returning officers were appointed by the chief electoral officer under the present law. The bill proposes to revert to the old system and the returning officers will be appointed by the governor in council.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Political appointments.

Mr. BENNETT: They were last time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time, on division.

REPRESENTATION ACT, 1933

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 116, to amend the Representation Act, 1933.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As hon. members are aware, the Representation Act passed last session does not come into force until the dissolution of parliament. The present bill enables work to be done in connection with the appointment of returning officers prior to the dissolution of parliament. The ridings have been rearranged and many will disappear and if time is to be saved it will be necessary that power be given to take certain steps in advance of dissolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to say that the bill which he is now introducing will not come into effect until after the dissolution of parliament?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. The present Representation Act does not come into effect until dissolution. Constituencies have been changed throughout Canada and some of the old ones will disappear and new ones will come into being. There is only one clause in the bill which I am now introducing and I might as well read it. It reads:

Provided that for the purpose only of authorizing and enbling the appointment pursuant to the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, of returning officers, this act shall be deemed to be now in force.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Inasmuch as the Minister of Justice has mentioned dissolution, might I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett)—

Mr. BENNETT: This is not the time or place for that question; it should be asked on the orders of the day.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) whether the French copies of these bills are ready for distribution. We have noted recently that the French revision of bills has been delayed, so that we are unable to follow these bills in our own mother tongue.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question No. 1.

Mr. DENIS: I want a reply to my question.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Would the hon. member be kind enough to explain so that we may reply immediately?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Do you not understand French?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I understand that the hon. Solicitor General wished to have the questions put in a legal form. Can we not express ourselves in French without having recourse to a legal form, so as to be understood by the hon. Solicitor General?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Denis requested—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member can put his question when the orders of the day are called.

74726—261

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The hon. member wanted to know if this bill has been printed in French.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It will be printed in due time according to the rules; it is just being introduced.

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill is only introduced to-day.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WHITE BEAR INDIAN RESERVE AGENT

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia):

1. On what date did the agent on the White Bear Indian reserve in Saskatchewan resign his position?
2. Did the department give notice to the farm labourer on the reserve, H. R. Bush, that his services were no longer required after April 1, 1934; if so, why?
3. Has either or both of these positions been filled; if so, why?
4. Is it true that there is only a farm instructor resident on the reserve at the present time, and that an agent living some eighty miles distant is acting as agent on the reserve?
5. Was a report reecived last winter by the Department that some twenty or more families were in dire want and that the acting agent found this condition to exist when he visited the reserve?
6. Did the acting agent at that time authorize flour to be loaned to these families, which was later to be repaid out of the proceeds of the rental from the lake resort on the reserve?
7. Were the Indians also asked to give orders on their treaty money for seed potatoes and food?
8. How much money is to the credit of the Indians on this reserve from the surrender of two reserves in the Moose Mountain area some thirty-two years ago?
9. How much is the yearly rental of the lake resort on the reserve?
10. How is this money distributed?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. December 1, 1933.
2. Yes. It was considered his services were no longer required.
3. No.
4. A farming instructor is resident on the Moose Mountain reserve: the Indian agent lives at Broadview, Sask., a distance of approximately 55 miles from the centre of the reserve.
5. The inspector of Indian agencies reported January 9, 1934, that the Indians of the Moose Mountain reserve were in need of food and that he had purchased 30 sacks of flour for them.

6. At that time the department instructed the inspector to purchase food supplies to the value of $800 if necessary; payment was made as follows: $540 from band funds and $266.87 from parliamentary appropriation.

7. So far as is known the Indians were not asked to give orders on their treaty money for seed potatoes and food.

8. Capital $22,725.41; interest $1,089.09.

9. $800.

10. Credited to band funds.

MINGAN INDIAN AGENT

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Who is the present acting Indian agent at Mingan, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river?
2. Who appointed such acting agent?
3. By whom was he recommended?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Maxwell George Hamilton.
2. The Civil Service Commission.
3. Answered by No. 2.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MR. J. BTE. PAINCHAUD

Mr. POWER:

1. Was Mr. J. Bte. Painchaud in the employ of the marine department, signal service, Crane island, during the navigation seasons of 1931, 1932, and 1933?
2. Were his services retained for the navigation season of 1934?
3. If not, what were the reasons for his dismissal?
4. Did the said gentleman pass the examinations required by the department?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

MR. DANCAUSE

Mr. POWER:

1. Was Mr. Dancause in the employ of the marine department, signal service, Crane island, during the navigation seasons of 1931, 1932,and 1933?
2. Was he employed during the navigation season of 1934?
3. If this man was not employed during any of the aforesaid navigation seasons, why was he not employed?
4. Did the said gentleman pass the examinations required by the department?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

MR. CHARLES N. ROY

Mr. POWER:

1. Was Mr. Charles N. Roy in the employ of the marine department, signal service, Crane island, during the navigation seasons of 1931, 1932, and 1933?
2. Was he employed during the navigation season of 1934?

[Mr. Murphy.]

3. If he was not employed during any of the aforesaid navigation seasons, why was he not employed?
4. Did the said gentleman pass the examinations required by the department?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

SEIZURES OF LOBSTER GEAR

Mr. MacLEAN:

1. How many seizures of lobster gear were made by patrol boat No. 2 in Malpeque bay and vicinity, during the season of 1933?
2. How many seizures of lobster gear were made at Tignish and Hardy's channel, Prince Edward Island, during the season of 1933?
3. What quantity of traps, rope and gear was seized in each case and how was same disposed of?
4. What amount of money was realized from the sales?

DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the results of the elections yesterday in Ontario and Saskatchewan and the participation in the campaign of so many hon. members of the government, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett); also in view of the fact that this is the fifth session of this parliament and that the results in federal by-elections during the past few years have been what they were, might I ask the Prime Minister if he does not consider that the time has come when he should announce that at the conclusion of this session there will be an immediate dissolution of parliament?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the question of the right hon. leader of the opposition. If a reply were needed, the categorical answer would be no. The government will advise His Excellency as to dissolution when in the opinion of the government dissolution is desirable in the interests of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about the opinion of the people?

PRICE OF COAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the government is surely aware that coal companies have raised the price of coal from $2 to $2.50 per ton, within the last days. Such action on the part of coal companies must be looked upon as a challenge to public opinion and especially to the judgment delivered by the Superior Court of Quebec. I wish to inquire whether it is the intention of the government to take any steps to prevent these companies exploiting the public and scorning the authorities and laws of this country?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. gentleman is referring to the increase in the price of coal in certain sections of the country. As far as my department has anything to do with that, we have made inquiries. There is some reason for the increase in the price of imported coal—that is what he refers to: Welsh coal—because of the difference in exchange this year as compared with last. There is a difference of 75 cents or $1 a ton. But there is no particular duty resting upon the department over which I preside or upon the government as a whole in regard to the matter, apart from the general interest that might be taken in the subject.

FIRST NARROWS BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Has the Minister of Public Works any further announcement to make with respect to the progress of negotiations affecting the building of the First Narrows bridge at Vancouver?

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): I have nothing to say in addition to what has already been stated by myself and the Prime Minister. I understand that further representations are to be made, and those opposed have asked an opportunity to make further representations.

Mr. McINTOSH: So it is not in the public works program.

DREDGING AT TRACADIE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Has the Department of Public Works issued an order for the removal of the dredge boat at Tracadie which has been there the last two years?

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): I understand my hon. friend from Gloucester is asking whether instructions have been given for its removal. No.

Mr. VENIOT: I have another question to ask. Are repairs being made to the dredge boat at Tracadie at the present time?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am not sure; I will make inquiries and advise my hon. friend.

74726—261½

WHEAT SALES IN THE ORIENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I regret very much the necessity of once more calling attention to the fact that a certain return I asked for away back in February has not yet been tabled, unless it was done to-day. Possibly, if it has been tabled to-day, the Secretary of State will so inform me and I shall require to say no more.

Mr. CAHAN: What is the return?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I wish to direct the attention of the house to the fact that apart from some comparatively unimportant communications which were apparently obtained by the Department of External Affairs, the order that was passed by this house has not been complied with, nor has there been any valid or indeed any kind of excuse for non-compliance with this order. I wish to read the order and I shall endeavour not to depart from the strict letter of my duty in speaking to a question of privilege. The order reads:

> Return to an order of the House of Commons, dated 12th February, 1934, showing:
> A copy of all correspondence, cables and other documents, exchanged between the Hon. Herbert Marler, Canadian representative in Tokyo, Japan, or the representative of any other country, and any member of the federal government, with respect to the possibility and practicability of disposing of more Canadian farm products, especially wheat and wheat flour, either in Japan or China, during the past three and a half years.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that in this day of stirring events this is a comparatively unimportant return; but that depends, I may say, on what it may contain. I think there is prospect of something very important being in it if I can only get the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), in whose possession it is, to table it. I have waited long and patiently, as I think you will agree, for this return. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether we can get a little order; I cannot hear myself talking. I know that we will have to forgive them under the circumstances and events of yesterday.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The days that it should have taken to comply with the order have extended into weeks and the weeks into months—four months and nine or ten days; yet the order has not made its appearance. Since the events of yesterday have passed, it occurred to me that this would be the psychological time, when the government is in particularly good humour, to come across with this return. I have done nearly everything an hon. member can do. I cannot go across the aisle and commit some act of violence, especially when I know the report is not there or it would have been tabled to-day; and it might not be a safe performance to indulge in anyway. Seriously, I feel that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, according to his own officers, has a report from the Hon. Mr. Marler on the question of selling more wheat to China or Japan, and he simply has not tabled it. He has flouted the command of the house; he has refused to obey, without giving any kind of excuse I have heard yet. I will now give the minister an opportunity of either saying that he will table it or giving a valid reason why he cannot or won't.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. gentleman is not quite fair in his attitude to-day, and on reflection I think he will recognize that he is not. As a matter of fact, everything which it is proper to file has been filed. Certain documents may pass between one department and another or between the minister representing this government in Japan, as in this case, and the Department of External Affairs, which it is not proper or competent for the government to bring down. Such documents as we could bring down we have brought down I went further, in my desire to assist the hon. member, and asked my officers to go over matters with me so that we might try to bring before him anything which it was within our power to bring down. Furthermore, I asked the head of the commercial intelligence branch to look over the files to see whether he could find any interesting or helpful information or documents there, and these are now in process of being prepared, as I am informed by my officers, and will be forwarded to the hon. member. But he had not asked for such documents; that is done purely as an act of courtesy to him. So far as the technical obligations of the government are concerned, they have been fully complied with.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think I can speak a second time on a question of privilege, can I? All I say is that four months of courtesy is delightful, but four minutes of action would be better.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

SASKATCHEWAN ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As we have the pleasure of seeing the Minister of Agriculture back in the house, perhaps he will satisfy my curiosity if I ask him whether the marketing act was an issue in the campaign in Saskatchewan.

Mr. POULIOT: It was in Ontario.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Hon. members will agree that, in view of the size of the question, it requires no answer—

Mr. POULIOT: There is never an answer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —but I have no hesitation in saying this, that had it been a major issue the results might not have been so satisfactory from his point of view.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria, Ont.) moved:

That the recommendations contained in the ninth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills respecting the refund of the private bill fee of $200 in connection with Bill No. 9 be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent of the house.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Friday, June 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 99, to amend the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Rhodes —Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

On section 14—Non-residents deemed to be carrying on business.

Mr. RALSTON: While the bill is before committee I presume the Prime Minister is in charge of it. I want to point out that the other day clause 8 was passed along with a number of other clauses without any discussion. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could give the committee an explanation if he would permit me to refer to clause 8, subclause 6.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us first dispose of the clause before the committee. This clause stood at the instance of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: Had it not stood, the necessity of preparing a large amount of information which I thought the hon. member wanted with respect to it would have been obviated. I am very glad to dispense with the reading of the information.

Mr. HANBURY: I have in the meantime received some of the information and I am quite satisfied.

Section agreed to.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the Prime Minister kindly allow me to refer to clause 8, subclause 6, and to direct his attention to the particular point I have in mind? This subclause seems to be a provision against non-residents. It has been, I understand, a principle in income tax legislation that non-residents shall not be taxed in view of the fact that our residents do not expect to be taxed in a foreign country. After all, the matter works out pretty fairly. If you tax a non-resident he receives exemption from his tax in his own country, and if a foreign country taxes our residents they get an exemption here, so by and large, the matter works out evenly. But I submit to my right hon. friend that this particular clause invades an entirely new field of taxation, and with all due deference I think there is considerable objection to it. Perhaps the Prime Minister would indicate whether there is some particular case—and by that I mean not a particular individual case but class of cases—which has been dealt with, which justifies a departure from the general rule.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman is aware quite as well as I am, that there has been a tendency on the part of all countries during recent years to make more drastic provisions in their income tax laws. In Great Britain, the United States and other countries it has been the practice in recent years to secure so far as possible a tax from any corporation or individual making an income in the particular country. It will be remembered that in the United States for a time they required a certificate that all taxes had been paid before a person was allowed to board a ship at New York to go abroad, and similar provisions have been made with respect to receipts for money received by artists and even by prizefighters in cities of the United States. In this country we have been endeavouring slowly to develop our income tax law. For instance, clause 14 that stood goes back as a matter of fact to 1924, it being put upon the statute books then.

Mr. HANBURY: Has that clause ever been operative?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, perhaps $56,000 were secured under it last year.

With respect to clause 8, subclause 6, although it has been passed, I am making this explanation which is given without my attention being directed to it with care. It will be observed that subclause 6 reads:

> The income for any taxation period of a non-resident beneficiary of any estate or trust shall be deemed to include all income accruing to the credit of the non-resident beneficiary, whether received by him or not during such taxation period, and such non-resident beneficiary shall be liable to taxation in respect of such incomes as in the case of an unmarried person resident in Canada: provided that he shall not be entitled to the exemptions provided by paragraphs (e) and (i) of subsection one of section five of this act. The tax payable hereunder shall be deducted by the trustee from any amount otherwise payable to such beneficiary and remitted to the receiver general of Canada.

The family corporation we have wiped out. The personal corporation still exists; that is, if John Smith desires to incorporate his estate and call it John Smith, Limited, he may do so. He may not disburse all the revenues coming from that estate in any particular year; what he may do is retain the income during the year and reinvest it, but under the law as it now stands he is liable for tax. There was some difficulty about this point but it has been cleared up and the practice now is to tax the income regardless as to whether it has been disbursed. The income tax branch advises the Department of Finance that in this country there are large numbers of trusts created by non-residents, and these trusts have been, shall I say, profitable inasmuch as they have substantial incomes which in some instances are not disbursed and are reinvested for those who own the fund, that is, those who created the trust. This proposes that the income thus derived from the operations of a trust in Canada shall pay tax in the same way as a personal corporation would do. I am not unaware of the fact that this matter has been discussed on previous occasions—and I am now speaking, as I say, without having carefully gone into it—and the suggestion has been made that the effect of taxing the income of such trusts would be to militate against money coming into this country for investment. But any tax thus paid by a beneficiary under the trust would in most cases be free from taxation at least in the country in which the creator, or the settler, if you will, resides. Either in Great Britain or the United States that would be a taxable deduction from his income for the current year; that is, assuming that the income of the trust in this country was sufficient to create a tax of $500, he would be entitled in Great Britain or the United States, on production of evidence that that tax was paid here, to set that up as a deduction against his income tax. In Great Britain they tax such trust incomes in the manner I have just indicated. I know the income tax branch have given a great deal of attention to this matter and they have concluded there is no reason why a trust set up by non-residents and producing substantial income should be treated differently from a personal corporation established in this country by one of our own citizens in his lifetime. The enforcement of this provision with respect to trusts has been limited to those originated, shall I say, by persons who resided in countries where a deduction is allowed from the income tax payable by them of the amount paid on the income from the trust here. I think that is as clear a statement as I can make from my understanding of the provision.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not catch the numbers the Prime Minister gave last night as to the bills that were coming up for discussion to-day, and although I made inquiries I did not know this one was coming up. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would allow the bill to stand in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I had intended to move the bill forward to-day. Frankly, I do not think the government is prepared to abandon the provision.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not talking about abandoning it. I want to mention just one matter.

Mr. BENNETT: This clause has been passed.

Mr. RALSTON: In committee.

Mr. BENNETT: The bill stood for one purpose only, that is in regard to clause 14, and the hon. gentleman who asked that that clause stand now says that he is satisfied about it because it was put into the statutes of 1924. But I always like to accommodate hon. gentlemen opposite. The bill has to go to the Senate, but if he desires it to stand I will not press it to-day.

Mr. RALSTON: I telephoned this afternoon to the commissioner of taxation and I found he was at the house. The point I have in mind is, the Prime Minister's explanation indicated that the bill is directed towards the income of Canadian trusts.

Mr. BENNETT: Of trusts established in Canada.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. RALSTON: I point out that the bill does not seem to provide for that. I wanted to look at the bill and see if that amendment should not be made, if the government has decided upon the policy of taxing non-residents, as to the advisability of which I have some doubts. I think the bill should, as the Prime Minister's explanation indicates, be confined to estates or trusts established in Canada. Perhaps the Prime Minister would allow it to stand for an hour or two—

Mr. BENNETT: But I desire to point out that our taxing arm does not reach to other than Canadian trusts.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the Prime Minister forgets that we have lengthened our taxing arm by directing that taxes shall be deducted at the source. Therefore you may have a trust established in Great Britain or France or somewhere with regard to Canadian securities, and your taxing arm will reach there because you deduct the tax where the bond interest or the dividend is paid.

Mr. BENNETT: But not the source in the sense in which the hon. gentleman used the word a moment ago. Our taxing arm cannot compel any corporation in Great Britain or France to do anything. What we can tax is the income here from the Canadian investment. But our taxing arm does not touch the corporation in Great Britain or France, but only the income in this country.

I desire further to point out that subsection 6 does not tax non-residents. Let us get that out of our head. What we are taxing is the income in this country that may belong to people not in this country. That is an altogether different thing. What we are taxing is income, not individuals.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not see that distinction.

Mr. BENNETT: Well I think most people will agree that there is a very clear distinction between saying that you are taxing an income accruing outside of the country and taxing an income in this country that belongs to a person not residing in it. Surely if the money is earned in this country it is not unfair to do what they do in Great Britain and France, namely tax it here, although the person in receipt of it may be in China or India. In the United States very large sums are being collected on just such trusts set up there. I suppose it is known to the hon. gentleman from his reading that very large sums of money have been invested in the United States in that form by those who reside in many countries of Europe. In that country they have stretched out their arm not against the individual but against the money. It is not a non-resident tax, it is a tax against money made under the protection of the institutions of the country. The contribution that is made by those who have thus obtained the income comes out of the money so secured. I know the argument against it, that it discourages the coming in of funds from abroad; that the trusts will no longer continue. That has always been the argument. I find that in other countries where that argument has been disregarded there has been no such result. People continue to invest where they think it safe and where they can secure under reasonably sound conditions the largest income. Out of that income we take something because the protection of our laws and the institutions of our country have enabled the profit to be obtained.

However I move that the committee rise and ask leave to sit again this day in order to meet the hon. gentleman's view, although as a matter of fact I have not moved that we reconsider the section. But we can carry on the discussion without doing that.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 72, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: It is proposed to amend this legislation in very important particulars. The bill has passed the Senate and comes to us from that chamber. As it stands it is intended to secure to life insurance companies carrying on business in Canada the right to obtain a licence from the insurance department of this country. Companies other than life insurance companies of course are also involved. I need hardly point out to this house what is very well known, that the last judgment of the privy council made it clear beyond peradventure that the business of insurance is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. Nevertheless there are certain features of insurance business, life insurance business in particular, that require to be considered from the standpoint of insolvency, from the standpoint of interest and other standpoints that fall solely within the jurisdiction of this parliament. Eminent counsel have been engaged from time to time by those who are greatly concerned, because I need hardly point out to this house how anxious companies carrying on life insurance business are to have a licence from the Dominion of Canada, especially when carrying on business in foreign jurisdictions; they have found it valuable to have the actuarial experience of this dominion under the direction of the superintendent of insurance—

If hon. gentlemen in the rear will be good enough to go into the lobbies to talk there rather than here, I suggest it would be better.

The effect of securing the licence, of course, is to indicate that the actuarial department under the direction of the superintendent of insurance have satisfied themselves of the solvency of the company securing the licence. The benefits that have accrued to Canadian companies doing business abroad by having that licence have been very great. I think I indicated in this house on one occasion that a Canadian company has at risk in the United States of America over a billion dollars of insurance in all forms, and many millions are at risk in other countries, as well as in Canada. So this bill was prepared on the assumption that this comes within the legislative competence of parliament.

There are certain sections to which attention was specifically directed the other day, that is it is proposed to withdraw certain insurance companies or organizations or associations from the operation of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Lloyds?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. So that the principle of the bill may be explained in a single sentence, as being that jurisdiction should be established for the parliament of Canada, if possible, in the manner indicated, for companies that desire to secure licences under our act to enable them to have the benefit of such expression of approval in the carrying on of their business in other countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want to congratulate the government on withdrawing from this bill the clause affecting Lloyds. I may say that I read with great interest the debate that occurred on this subject in another place and I was not impressed by the learned legal argument of the leader of the Senate in regard to the question of bankruptcy and insolvency as affecting Lloyds. His argument was that the privy council would be influenced on this question because the suggestion of bankruptcy or insolvency could not be thought of in connection with such a wonderful company as Lloyds. I think the opinion of any member of this house would be that Lloyds or any company doing business in this country should have the same and no better treatment than our own Canadian companies. I am sure that the Prime Minister is aware of the history concerning the legislative jurisdiction of the dominion parliament in regard to the question of insurance. First the appeal of 1916 by the province of Alberta, then the appeal of 1924 when the dominion endeavoured to solve these matters under the guise of criminal jurisdiction. Again there was the question of taxation in 1931. Now they are proceeding under the inherent jurisdiction of this parliament as to bankruptcy and insolvency, and so far as I am concerned I have no objection whatever to the general provisions of this measure. If the objectionable clause had not been withdrawn, however, I would have had very serious and sustained objection.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): All I want to say, Mr. Speaker, is that I think the government have been wise in coming to this decision. Further I think they have shortened the session considerably, because I am sure we would have heard a number of lengthy, earnest speeches as to this clause, which was very objectionable to all parts of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to correct just one statement; I shall do so more fully when the bill is in committee, but I think it desirable to mention the matter now. Lloyds were not the applicants in the first instance in regard to this matter. I think in fairness to that great organization I should state that they were not seeking these benefits. However, they said that under their charter and the relevant legislation they could not put up a deposit; I understand that in one state of the American union some of their insured made the deposit for them. I mention this in order that there may be no animadversions cast against that organization under the circumstances to which I shall refer presently.

Mr. JACOBS: May I ask if this was a government measure?

Mr. BENNETT: It was explained by the leader of the government in the Senate, who introduced it, that it was introduced for reasons that were obvious, and it was left to the free action of the Senate to determine what should be done.

Mr. JACOBS: I see that the minds of the members of the government were not at one on this measure.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, they were.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

On section 1.

Mr. BENNETT: This section deals with the preamble of another statute, and I think it might very well stand for the moment. I propose to substitute a preamble that will read as follows:

> Whereas it is desirable to provide for the registration of such companies and of British insurance companies which may desire to carry on the business of insurance in Canada, and for the voluntary registration of provincial companies; and

That is a frank recognition, as will be observed, of the provincial jurisdiction.

> Whereas it is contrary to the public interest that insurance companies which are unable to discharge their liabilities to policyholders in Canada as they become due, or are otherwise insolvent, should be permitted to carry on the business of insurance in Canada; and

That is in order to make it perfectly clear that there is no desire to trench upon the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces but to remain within the jurisdiction of the dominion with respect to insolvency and bankruptcy. I may point out that recently, when a foreign company registered here went into a receivership in the United States and did not pay its policyholders promptly, but paid them in instalments, solely by reason of the deposit here we were able to have those claims in Canada adjusted without delay, in view of the judgment of the courts that the deposits in Canada might be available for Canadian losses. Then there is the further declaration:

> Whereas it is desirable to provide by a system of returns and inspection against such companies engaging in, or continuing to carry on, business in Canada while unable to discharge their liabilities to such policyholders as they become due or while otherwise insolvent, and to declare the conditions upon which such companies shall be deemed to be insolvent and be subject to be wound up under the provisions of the Winding-up Act;

I think hon. members of the house who are also members of the legal profession will realize that once we found jurisdiction upon insolvency it follows that returns should be made to provide for continuing solvency in order that claims might be met as they come due. I will not ask the house to pass this preamble until we finish the bill; then we may come back to it. Or I will make the motion for the amendment of section 1 now if it is thought desirable. That seems to be the general consensus of opinion, so I would move that paragraph 2, 6 and 7 of the preamble to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, chapter 46 of the statutes of Canada, 1932, be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

1. Paragraphs two, six and seven of the preamble to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, chapter forty-six of the statutes of Canada, 1932, are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Whereas it is desirable to provide for the registration of such companies and of British insurance companies which may desire to carry on the business of insurance in Canada, and for the voluntary registration of provincial companies; and

Whereas it is contrary to the public interest that insurance companies which are unable to discharge their liabilities to policyholders in Canada as they become due, or are otherwise insolvent, should be permitted to carry on the business of insurance in Canada; and

Whereas it is desirable to provide by a system of returns and inspection against such companies engaging in, or continuing to carry on, business in Canada while unable to discharge their liabilities to such policyholders as they become due or while otherwise insolvent, and to declare the conditions upon which such companies shall be deemed to be insolvent and be subject to be wound up under the provisions of the Winding-up Act;

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—"Association."

Mr. BENNETT: Now, in order to meet the difficulty, section 2 will have to be amended. It is proposed that section 2 as it now stands be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

2. Section two of the said act is amended as follows:

(1) By striking out paragraphs (b) and (c) thereof and substituting therefor the following:

(b) "British company" means any corporation incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland or any British dominion or possession other than Canada or a province of Canada for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance.

(2) By relettering paragraphs (d) to (p) thereof (c) to (o) respectively.

That makes it perfectly clear that provincial companies are not affected.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 3 to 35 inclusive agreed to.

On section 36—Documents required to be filed.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this section it will be observed that certain documents are required from companies other than Lloyds. I think I should avail myself of this opportunity to indicate what I cannot too strongly urge, that there is no reflection in any sense upon the great association known as Lloyds by reason of this action being taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was none intended from this side.

Mr. BENNETT: Those who are interested in the history of Lloyds and who desire to be fully informed may consult the articles in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, where they will find a very full history of its operations. The magnitude of its operations now is almost beyond our comprehension. In every part of the world they transact business. They have had risks in Canada for many, many years, and they have very large risks in this country at the present time, and in fact are authorized in the province of Quebec to carry on business. Provisions have been specifically made, and if the committee so desire I might indicate what they are, with respect to this company carrying on business in various parts of Canada. The organization of the company is such that they are not in a position to withdraw from their funds the deposit that is required by our law without amending their own legislation, and they have indicated that as they have grown up more or less under the aegis of the board of trade in England they do not desire to take that course. During the war their risks were enormous and in every part of the world.

I make this statement in order that there might be no misapprehension or doubt on the part of anyone in this parliament or in Canada as to the solvency of the company or as to its ability to discharge its obligations. Lloyds is an accepted and recognized authority in matters maritime in almost every part of the world. Lloyds register indeed is the last word to which those who seek information in respect to maritime matters refer. Their captains' room in London is resorted to by men from every part of the world, and their means of information with respect to the whereabouts of every ship on the registers of the various countries of the world is really most remarkable. If any hon. members of this house happen to look up the shipping columns of the morning papers in London and notice the whereabouts of different ships in all parts of the world, they will find that if there is a casualty even to a very small ship it is always recorded there. I mention that matter in passing in order that there might be no misapprehension.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that section 36 be amended as follows:

(1) By striking out the words "other than a member of Lloyds" in the first and second lines of new section one hundred and eighteen.

(2) By striking out sub-paragraph (i) of paragraph (a) of said new section one hundred and eighteen and substituting therefor the following:

(i) A copy of the charter, act of incorporation or articles of association of the British company, certified by the proper officer in charge of the original thereof.

(3) By striking out new sections one hundred and nineteen and one hundred and twenty.

(4) By renumbering new section one hundred and twenty-one one hundred and nineteen.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I assure the Prime Minister that any remarks directed from this side of the house were not intended in any way as an attack on this unique and illustrious organization known as Lloyds; indeed, very much to the contrary. Our objections were based on the fact that we do not desire special privileges to be given to any organization, no matter what, in this country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I desire to endorse what the Prime Minister has said with regard to Lloyds. If I am not mistaken, all their funds are already pledged for the security of those who have insurance in that organization to meet claims from all over the world, and that is one of the reasons why it cannot divert any of its funds for deposit in other countries. There is no doubt in the world that any insurance at Lloyds is a safer investment than any other thing.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, nothing is to be gained by prolonging the debate on this bill since the Prime Minister has announced that he is withdrawing from the bill the clause which was so objectionable to a good many Canadians, and to insurance companies in particular. I had a very strong objection to it for the reasons already given, that it constituted discrimination against Canadian companies, and secondly I thought that perhaps after all it was unfair to exempt Lloyds from having a deposit in Canada. If any action had to be brought for the collection of any sum the case might have had to go to the courts in England. Further, I think I am correct in saying that although the clause is being modified it does not preclude Lloyds from doing business in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: They are doing business here now.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. EULER: And they can continue to do business here. I am quite in accord with those who have commended the government for the action they have taken in striking out the clause.

Mr. GEARY: A great many people throughout Ontario, insurance companies and others, were interested in this matter and they urged the objection to the bill which has led to the clause in question being dropped. Very many of us on this side of the house are thoroughly in accord with the change that has been made and were desirous of seeing it made, and we made such representations as we were able to in order to bring this change about.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 37—Name of company.

Mr. BENNETT: I move, Mr. Chairman, that section 37 be amended by substituting for the figures "122" in the third line thereof the figures "120."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 38.

Mr. BENNETT: I move, Mr. Chairman, that section 38 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

38. Section one hundred and twenty-four of the said act is amended by striking out the proviso to subsection one thereof and by renumbering the said section one hundred and twenty-one.

On section 39,—Assets to be maintained in Canada by other companies.

Mr. BENNETT: This section has to be amended, Mr. Chairman. If hon. gentlemen will follow me it will expedite matters. I move that section 39 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

39. Section one hundred and twenty-five of the said act is renumbered one hundred and twenty-two; and section one hundred and twenty-six of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

123. Every British company registered under this act to transact any class of insurance business, other than life insurance, shall at all times maintain assets in Canada in respect of any such class of business of an amount at least equal to the liabilities of the company in Canada including the liabilities of the company in respect of its outstanding unmatured policies in Canada computed in accordance with the provisions of section one hundred and thirty-seven of this act;

Provided, however, that the assets in Canada of a British company which is a purely mutual fire insurance company shall continue to form part of the general assets of such company, available pari passu to all its policyholders in or out of Canada in the same manner as its other funds; but no such company shall, except with the consent of the treasury board, and upon such terms and conditions as the treasury board may determine, reduce the amount of its assets in Canada below the amount otherwise required by this act to be maintained in Canada.

(2) The proviso to subsection one of this section shall not apply to any such company which files with the minister in a form approved by him, a declaration that the assets in Canada of such company are held for the protection of the policyholders in Canada, exclusively, of such company.

That is a mere statement of the law in the first part; that is, that the assets in Canada are available for Canadian policyholders; but with respect to mutual companies, obviously the very nature of the class of business carried on involves the principle that all the assets are available for all the policy liabilities; and thirdly, there is no necessity to file a specific form of return if they file a declaration and show in their declaration that all the assets in Canada are available solely for Canadian business.

On section 52—Application of sections in Part III to a British company other than a member of Lloyd's.

Mr. BENNETT: There is some little change necessary here because Lloyd's appears. The amendment reads:

Section 52 of Bill 72 shall be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

Section one hundred and forty-three of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

140. The provisions of sections one hundred and five, one hundred and six, one hundred and seven and one hundred and ten of this act shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to every British company registered under this act to the same extent as such provisions are applicable to a company registered to transact the same class or classes of insurance business under Part III of this act.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 53—Withdrawal of certificate for non-compliance.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the amendment this section will read:

If any British company registered under this act fails to deposit in the department annual statements pursuant to the provisions of sections one hundred and twenty-five and one hundred and twenty-six of this act, or declines to permit the examination authorized by section one hundred and twenty-seven or by section one hundred and thirty of this act, or refuses to give any information desired for such purpose in its possession or control, its certificate of registree may be withdrawn by the minister.

These are the same terms that apply with respect to the other companies.

SUPPLY BILL

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister, for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 109, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1935.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—$128,617,254.36 granted for 1934-35.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was not here when the supplementary estimates were passed the other day. There was an item in connection with the disarmament conference, and I should like to know from the Prime Minister whether Canada has representation at the present time at the conference or on the committees which sit in connection with the disarmament conference; also who this representative is or these representatives are.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is probably aware of the fact that since the formal adjournment of the committee on disarmament no action has been taken other than the endeavour by the great powers, if I might use that word in the broad sense, to secure some form of agreement with respect to disarmament. The hon. gentleman, who follows these matters with great care, will remember the proposals put forward by various countries and finally the effort made by the British government to secure some form of acquiescence on the part of all—or agreement, which is the word I should use—and that the Lord Privy Seal visited various capitals looking towards that end. The result has not been very satisfactory. The speech made a few days ago by the foreign secretary of the United Kingdom indicated the great differences of opinion that prevail among the great powers with respect to this matter. The effort that is now being made to secure, through membership in the League of Nations of all the powers, the opportunity to enable one body to deal with the subject is still going forward. The hon. gentleman is perhaps more familiar with what has been done in that regard than I am. Our position is being constantly watched, and that position is communicated to us by dispatches which come in from the foreign office. We are kept advised of what is going on from that source, and our permanent representative at Geneva, Doctor Riddell, is constantly informed as to what is transpiring there; and when occasion necessitates we have representation from the Paris office of the dominion to proceed to Geneva for the purpose of discussion. But until matters reach what I might very properly describe as a somewhat nearer approach to unity on the great principles that have to be considered, I should think it is not at all probable that we shall endeavour to make representations other than in the manner I have indicated. We are willing to make, and are desirious of making, any contribution we can; but the contribution that we can make, in the very nature of things, is very limited until the moment comes when by agreement between the great powers we are able at least to throw the weight of our vote and influence towards the acceptance of a plan of disarmament that will bring about the result aimed at. And that, as I say, is not at the moment as promising as one would like. I do not think I can usefully say more than that.

Mr. JACOBS: What has Canada got to disarm? We have nothing to disarm in this country. The fact that we talk about disarmament implies armament.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It should not be necessary for us to go to Europe for the purpose of bringing about disarmament, but we want to cooperate and try to get other nations to disarm.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) will agree that while a country may not find itself so situated as to have to disarm, because it is in the happy position of having nothing to disarm, its moral influence and the weight of its example, especially having regard to its geographical position, is a matter of great importance. While it is true that we are but ten and a half millions, and while it is true that we have no armament to destroy or to scrap, nevertheless we have, as a member of the league, a voice and a vote; and to the extent that they may be available for the purpose of promoting the cause of peace, I regard them as being of importance at this particular time. It is not necessary of course, as the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) says, to send a delegation or to maintain them in Europe for that purpose; but at any moment when voice and vote become important we have the facilities through our Paris office of exercising such influence as can be brought to bear by both our vote and our voice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do I understand then that the amount which is being voted in connection with the disarmament conference is to be used in case the government finds it necessary to send somebody in addition to Doctor Riddell to take part in the proceedings?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is quite right in that assumption. If, for instance, a situation should develop in which those charged with larger responsibilities than we have think it desirable that there should be a general meeting, and we should have to send someone from this country, the vote is to be available for that purpose; and in addition to that it is only fair to say that we cannot charge against the Paris office the expense of going to Geneva out of their meagre surplus, and a proper charge against that $5,000 would be expenses incurred for that purpose.

Mr. JACOBS: What does it cost this country to be a member of the League of Nations? I do not know whether the Prime Minister has the figures before him, but it would be interesting to know.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will remember that a return was filed in answer to a question, and on the records of Hansard there is a full statement of what this cost has been during the years we have been a member. I will not endeavour to charge my memory with any statement because it might not be quite accurate, but the hon. gentleman will find it in Hansard. This I will say, however. I should think that our annual expenditure for the League of Nations and everything connected with it might amount to perhaps what we spent in eight or ten hours during the war—something of that sort.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. JACOBS: It is not for the purpose of comparison that I wish to know; but generally speaking I understand it is $300,000 or $400,000 a year. I am not criticizing the figure nor the action of our government in being a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. BENNETT: It is set out in detail in Hansard, from the inception. Between four and five weeks ago I filed the statement.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is an insurance premium against war.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On schedule A.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, may I request the government to specify in the contracts which will be awarded for the erection of public buildings, that all stone cutting, instead of being done by machines, which replace 25 men at a very heavy cost, should be done by stone cutters who are unemployed, at present. I think that the buildings themselves would be better finished because experience has taught us that the quality of stone cut by workers is much superior to that of machines. Machine work will not allow distinguishing the rock that has been damaged in the quarries by explosives and, after a number of years, because of humidity, rain and climatic changes, one may notice, that the stones are cracked at certain places, which naturally endangers the safety of the building itself. I would request the government in order to find work for those who are out of jobs to employ stone cutters and not machinery to shape or transform the stones.

Mr. BENNETT: I assume that what the hon. gentleman desires to deal with may more properly be considered when the public works bill is before the house for consideration. In the meantime the difficulties are quite manifest to anyone who gives the matter thought. When tenders are called for public works or undertakings and it is stipulated that they shall be done by hand, you have an added cost that sometimes increases it to such an extent as to make it impossible to do the work within the appropriation. In other cases the complaint is that not only has it added cost to the undertaking, but it renders it impossible to make any reasonable estimate having regard to the differences that are manifest in the work that may be done by individuals from time to time. I can only say this, that part of the work to which reference has been made was done under agreement between the city, the province and the dominion, under which agreement the dominion made certain contributions to the entire cost of the work which was carried on by the city at the Lachine canal, as the hon. gentleman knows, and which I believe was not stone but concrete. The contribution was made by the dominion, the amount being covered in an estimate which we passed the other evening. When the public works bill is under consideration the representations of the hon. gentleman can be renewed and borne in mind by the Minister of Public Works when he considers the matter.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder whether under schedule A I might ask the Prime Minister with reference to the Canada Year Book which I am told is not to be published this year. As I was not in the chamber when the estimates of the bureau of statistics were being considered, I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman could say whether that is the case.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that I had not heard and I would be very loath to believe it is not to be published. I say frankly I had not even heard that suggested. I shall make inquiries and let the hon. gentleman know. The minister is sitting in a committee or I would ascertain at this moment.

Mr. COOTE: I did not know whether I would have another opportunity to ask the question.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Am I in order in asking the Prime Minister this question: When an order is given to a manufacturer of cloth, would it be possible to induce him to use more Canadian wool in orders for cloth when contracts are awarded by the government?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Kamouraska may be amazed to know a few days ago I was discussing with representatives of the woollen industry the possibility of the utilization of our wool, and I was surprised to learn the extent to which it has been and is being used at the present time in local mills throughout the country. But it would be very difficult in contracts to do more than suggest that the wool be of Canadian manufacture. I do not know how we could very well go beyond that, because the cloth that is standardized for some requirements of the public service is standardized on the basis of there being utilized with Canadian wool, wool that is imported sometimes from Australia, sometimes from Australia by way of England and sometimes from New Zealand, as the hon. gentleman knows.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Since the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) mentioned the matter he did this afternoon with respect to clause 8 of Bill 99, a slip has been placed in my hands stating that a delegation is arriving here to-morrow morning and desires to make representations with reference to the Income War Tax Act. I will therefore let the matter stand until to-morrow, although the clause has been passed, if that meets with the convenience of the hon. gentleman. A telegram to the same effect has just been received, so I take it that we can let the matter stand.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I was just telephoning the commissioner and suggesting a possible amendment he might submit to the Prime Minister. I did not know anything about the delegation. I am only too glad if the bill is allowed to stand.

FINANCE ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 111, to repeal the Finance Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

On section 1—Finance Act repealed.

Mr. COOTE: I would just like to suggest to the Prime Minister that although we have not had very much time to consider this bill, perhaps it might be a good idea to leave the Finance Act on the statute book. We are going to set up a privately owned Bank of Canada, which is to have the sole right of note issue. If there should ever be a conflict of opinion between the government and that bank as to whether there were enough currency issued and available in Canada the government of the day might be very glad to have the Finance Act on the statute book. I do not see what harm it would do. I make that suggestion.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the hon. gentleman is serious in making that suggestion. If that act were to remain and the Bank of Canada Act were to come into force it would mean absolute chaos. The hon. gentleman always refers to the Bank of Canada as a privately owned bank. That matter, I believe, is to be discussed in the committee later.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is why they want it.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I am just coming to that. The profits that are earned by the Bank of Canada are for the people of Canada, with the exception of four and a half per cent interest on the capital, which it would probably cost even if the money were borrowed. As to maintaining the Finance Act and the Bank of Canada Act in force at the same time, it would create financial chaos; it would be destructive of the whole system as we maintain it, and public confidence would disappear.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the Prime Minister anticipate that there will be any hiatus between the coming into force of the Bank of Canada Act and the repeal of the Finance Act? I was going to ask whether the action on each could not be concurrent, one to come into force when the other is repealed.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has asked a question which I asked myself when this statute was being prepared. The banks have loans under the Finance Act. Matters will have to be cleaned up, so to speak, and under the act as it now stands it is contemplated that for certain obligations the central bank shall receive certain forms of securities from the dominion.

Mr. RALSTON: There will perhaps be some overlapping?

Mr. BENNETT: This seems to be the safer method to pursue in view of the possibilities of overlapping in the operation of the act. As a matter of fact the course suggested was that which was originally being pursued, but on looking into the matter I thought this the safer method, to set up the institution so that it may function successfully, and repeal this act whenever the overlapping, if there be any, has been ended; or it may be that it can be arranged to have it done at the same time.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. COOTE: Even if the Finance Act is not repealed, as long as the central bank is carrying on I anticipate no attempt would be made to use the Finance Act. I simply suggest it might be left so that it could be used at any time if the government so desired.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to be discourteous to the hon. gentleman, but I think if he will take a few moments to consider he will realize that an application might be made by a chartered bank to the government for advances under that act, and the government no longer having any money with which to make the advance because the engraving and issuing of dominion notes would have ceased, a situation would be created which in my humble judgment would be more or less ridiculous.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

REPEAL OF STATUTE OF 1915

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 112, to repeal chapter 4 of the statutes of 1915.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. BENNETT moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the relation of this bill to the one introduced yesterday to amend the Dominion Notes Act?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the act under which in 1915 Dominion of Canada notes or bills were issued on the security of (a) certain railway bonds—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was it $26,000,000?

Mr. BENNETT: No, not $26,000,000, but $16,000,000 and $10,000,000. The $16,000,000 was on railway securities and the $10,000,000 on the general credit of the country. Obviously this liability must be taken care of when the new bank begins to function under the provisions set forth in the bill incorporating the bank. The act itself provides how that liability shall be discharged. In order that there shall be no difficulty about the matter this bill repeals that act on proclamation when the other act comes into force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Were these $26,000,000 included in the total of $171,000,000 given yesterday?

Mr. EULER: I recall that last session the Prime Minister in making a statement told the house that during the war an issue of something like sixty or sixty-five million dollars of currency was made for which no coverage was supplied. Under what act was that done? I should also like to ask whether the announcement made yesterday with regard to the changed standards will take care of that old inflation, if I might call it so.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no. Under the provisions of the War Measures Act certain issues were made. They were retired and disposed of except those covered by this statute, which are of a permanent character. The $16,000,000 is secured now by railway securities; the other $10,000,000 is on the general credit of the country. Both of them are to be taken care of under the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act that I referred to yesterday, and the changed coverage provisions that are set forth in the amendment to the statute that appears upon the order paper as Bill No. 110.

Mr. EULER: That is the $60,000,000 odd?

Mr. BENNETT: No, only $26,000,000.

Mr. EULER: But last year I can remember that $60,000,000 was spoken of. That has been reduced to the sum mentioned here, I take it?

Mr. BENNETT: I think that should be made clear. I did not quite follow what the hon. gentleman was referring to; I thought he was referring to some expansions of the currency that took place during the war which were of a temporary character. What I was referring to was the sum total of three issues: (a) that secured by railway securities—I shall presently read the statute; (b) that issued on the general credit, and (c) the issues under the Finance Act, which of course had no coverage. As soon as parliament met after the declaration of war we made special provision, by amending the Dominion Notes Act, to meet that situation, as the hon. gentleman perhaps recalls. Under the War Measures Act orders in council were issued from time to time, and since the hon. gentleman has asked I think perhaps the only way I can answer him intelligently is to read the preamble to the statute:

Whereas for the purposes set forth in orders in council of date the fifth day of September, 1914 (P.C. 2325), the twenty-sixth day of September, 1914 (P.C. 2450), the twenty-fourth day of October, 1914 (P.C. 2670), the twentieth day of November, 1914 (P.C. 2921), and the sixteenth day of December, 1914 (P.C. 3170), and pursuant to said orders, advances to the amount of ten million dollars ($10,000,000) in the form of an issue of dominion notes were made to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, against a pledge by the company of its guaranteed securities issued in pursuance of the provisions of The Canadian Northern Railway Guarantee Act, 1914, by placing the sums so advanced to the credit of the Minister of Finance for payment out under the provisions of the trust deed securing the issue of these securities;

And whereas for the purposes set forth in orders in council of date the fifth day of September, 1914 (P.C. 2326), the twenty-sixth day of September, 1914 (P.C. 2451), the twenty-fourth day of October, 1914 (P.C. 2671), and the twentieth day of November, 1914 (P.C. 2922), and pursuant to said orders, advances to the amount of six million dollars ($6,000,000) in the form of an issue of dominion notes were made to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, against a pledge by the company of its guaranteed securities issued in pursuance of the provisions of The Grand Trunk Pacific Guarantee Act, 1914, by placing the sums so advanced to the credit of the Minister of Finance for payment out under the provisions of the deed of trust securing the issue of these securities;

And whereas pursuant to an order in council of date the second day of November, 1914 (P.C. 2750), dominion notes to the amount of ten million dollars ($10,000,000) were issued, in order that certain obligations of Canada might be met as they matured;

And whereas with respect to the greater part of these issues of dominion notes security in the form required by section 5 of The Dominion Notes Act, 1914, was not held;

Mr. EULER: That would mean gold was not held?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, under the provision requiring dollar for dollar above the stipulated amount.

And whereas it is expedient that such issues, and the making of such advances and the taking of security therefor, and the agreements with regard to repayment of such advances be severally confirmed:

Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. The issues of dominion notes and the advances made in pursuance of the orders in council cited in the preamble, and all things done under the provisions of the said orders in council, are hereby confirmed and shall be deemed to have been duly authorized.

2. The agreements referred to in the preamble are hereby declared to be and shall be deemed to have been valid agreements and binding on the respective railway companies parties thereto.

That is the authority for the issue of the $26,000,000, $16,000,000 being covered by the securities of the railways guaranteed by the dominion, and the $10,000,000 being uncovered.

Mr. EULER: My memory must be very badly at fault—

Mr. BENNETT: I had not finished. In addition to that there are advances under the Finance Act from time to time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): $38,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I think they amount to $38,644,000 at the present time. At the time I was speaking I had the Gazette before me, if the hon. gentleman will recall, and I read the figures from the Gazette. They indicated the position at the end of the month prior to the month in which I was speaking, because advances under the Finance Act vary from time to time in accordance with the demands of the banks in order to meet their credit requirements, and their deposit of securities to meet the obligation is in accordance with the provisions of the Finance Act.

Mr. EULER: What was the total of that?

Mr. BENNETT: I think at the time I was speaking my memory is that it was something over $70,000,000, but that was retired. I suppose it is unnecessary for me to say this, but when the credit demands of the country become less and less the borrowings under the Finance Act become less and less. It will be recalled—it has been discussed in this house—that $35,000,000 was loaned to the banks under conditions that need not be gone into at length, for the purpose of extending credit and doing something to reduce interest rates by increasing the demand for securities. That sum, together with some additional sums making a total of some $38,000,000, represents the total now outstanding. But that total now outstanding includes the $35,000,000, so the amount advanced under the provisions of the act in the ordinary operations of commerce is something less than $4,000,000. There was a time, after the depression began, when I think there were no advances at all under the Finance Act, and that condition continued for months. On the other hand the advances under the Finance Act ran into very substantial sums of money in days when the credit requirements of industry, and especially when the crop was being moved, required the banks to have a larger volume of credit than they otherwise had.

Mr. EULER: I merely wanted to satisfy myself that this amount of $65,000,000 or $70,000,000 referred to by the Prime Minister last session, and for which he stated at that time there was no gold coverage whatever, is now provided for under the new arrangements that are being made with regard to the standard of gold coverage that is to be observed in future. I take it that is the case?

Mr. BENNETT: This might more properly come under the bill I was going to take next, but I can mention it now. Under the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act it will be essential for the bank at all times to maintain at least a twenty-five per cent gold coverage for all its issues and for its deposits as well. It must keep this in gold, and of course gold coinage—I am not speaking as a prophet—is a thing of the past, I would say. Gold bullion redemption, I believe, will be resumed by the nations of the world, since apparently it is the only basis upon which we can have any stability. I think the figure in the United States is 400 ounces or $14,000 worth of gold; that is the minimum that can be obtained. I believe there is a somewhat similar figure in Great Britain and France. That is a gold bullion redemption, not a gold coinage redemption. That is why the eagles and double eagles go out of circulation. I speak subject to correction when I have not the figures before me, but relying solely upon my memory I believe in the United States the minimum block of bullion that will be utilized for purposes of redemption is 400 ounces, which at $35 an ounce would be $14,000. That would appear to be the basis of any system of gold bullion redemption that may be relied upon in the future.

That is for the future; that has to do with the Bank of Canada Act. For the interval between now and then, that is between this time and when the new act comes into force, the provisions of Bill 110 will apply. I think I covered the situation fairly well yesterday when we were dealing with that bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Prime Minister gave us a total note issue of $176,000,000, of which $26,000,000 was issued under the 1915 act and $38,000,000 under the Finance Act. Do I understand that the remainder, $16,000,000, would be issued from time to time?

Mr. BENNETT: It is outstanding. The $106,000,000 to which I referred yesterday is covered by gold to the extent of twenty-five per cent up to $50,000,000, and dollar for dollar with regard to the balance.

Mr. EULER: That is at the old valuation?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. There has been no new valuation imposed on any of this gold in the computation of the twenty-five per cent metal coverage for issues; we have relied upon the old valuation, but by reason of what I said yesterday the increased value of gold enables us to carry forward money for other things such as the program I mentioned yesterday.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE—APPOINTMENT OF FRANCHISE COMMISSIONER—PRINTING OF VOTERS' LISTS

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 101, respecting the franchise of electors at elections of members of the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I understood that this measure would not come up to-day. It was not mentioned last night.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that we would take any second readings on the order paper.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The idea is in the one hour remaining to take only the non-contentious clauses.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are one or two matters with respect to the bill itself on which some of us would like to say something, and the minister has only to-day introduced the bills which are interrelated with this one. I think we ought to have the opportunity of at least looking at those bills before going on with the second reading of this measure. Of course if the government insists—

Mr. BENNETT: No. If the right hon. gentleman desires time to consider the bill further, I shall not press it, but I said last night that we would take any second readings on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to look at the bills that are related to this one before we pass the second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: All right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then as a matter of procedure I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman need not do that. We will simply not call this order to-day. We will take it to-morrow.

74726—262½

Order for second reading stands.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 5.05 p.m.

Thursday, June 21, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from two members notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, viz:

Of William Spankie, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Frontenac-Addington.

I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

PRIVATE BILLS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria) presented the tenth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, as follows:

Your committee has had under consideration the following bills and has agreed to report the said bills without amendment, viz:—

Bill No. 12, respecting patents on certain inventions of which Duplate Safety Glass Company of Canada, Limited, is entitled to benefit.

Bill No. 102, for the relief of Edward Headley Acland.

Bill No. 103, for the relief of Ella Gertrude Bush Adamson.

Bill No. 104, for the relief of Helen Cohen Levine.

Bill No. 105, for the relief of Annie Rosner.

Bill No. 106, for the relief of Grayse Irene Westlake MacLaren.

Bill No. 107, for the relief of Naomi Willard Lyman Robertson.

Your committee also has considered Bill No. 30, an Act respecting a certain patent of the American Dairy Supply Company, and has agreed to report that the preamble of the said bill has not been proven to the satisfaction of your committee, and it is the opinion of your committee that in the public interest it should not be passed.

Your committee recommends that the private bills fee of $200 paid on Bill No. 30, an Act respecting a certain patent of the American Dairy Supply Company, be refunded.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS OF SENATE BILLS

Mr. STINSON moved:

That pursuant to resolution of the house of the 19th instant the said bills be now read a first time and a second time and referred to their respective committees as follows:—

To the select standing committee on banking and commerce:—

Bill No. 117, to incorporate Security National Insurance Company.

To the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills (together with evidence, etc., taken before the standing committee of the Senate on divorce, to whom were referred the petitions on which the said bills were founded), viz:—

Bill No. 118, for the relief of Eugenie Margaret O'Reilly Stavert.

Bill No. 119, for the relief of George Harold Allen.

Bill No. 120, for the relief of Ena Beatrice Duclos Boyd.

Bill No. 121, for the relief of Paul Herbert Addy.

Motion agreed to.

REFUND OF FEE

Mr. STINSON moved:

That the recommendation contained in the tenth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, with respect to refund of private bills fee in connection with Bill No. 30, an Act respecting a certain patent of the American Dairy Supply Company, be concurred in, except as to cost of printing.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN RAILWAY EXPRESS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): I beg leave to introduce a bill to incorporate the Canadian Railway Express Company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MANION: The object of this bill is to incorporate an express company for the purpose of enabling the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway to effect economies and to provide more remunerative operation with respect to their respective express services, pursuant to the provisions of Part II of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1933, if, as and when the trustees and directors of the two railways respectively determine that this should be done.

The only reason I should like to have the privilege of introducing this bill to-day, and a similar bill with respect to telegraphs, is to afford many hon. members, who have asked for copies of the bills, an opportunity of seeing them. The bill, for leave to introduce which I am now asking, commits no one to anything; it is simply an enabling bill the purpose of which is to permit the companies, if finally they come to an agreement, to carry out this measure. They have not yet come to such agreement and there is no certainty that they will; but both railways, through Mr. Beatty and Mr. Fullerton respectively, have written to me asking me to introduce these two bills and to endeavour to have them adopted by the house.

[Mr. Stinson.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the minister advise the house as to why it is that this particular bill has been held until this time? Why was notice not given earlier in the session? The house has had no notice of the intention of the minister to introduce such a bill this session.

Mr. MANION: The government had no information in regard to the matter, because the railway companies did not request us until very recently to introduce these bills. Apparently they had not arrived at the position of discussing an agreement of this kind until quite recently, when they wrote to me, and naturally I preferred that they should submit the bills themselves. They could have done so except for want of time, and they have asked us to deal with the matter. There is also a bill with respect to telegraph service along exactly the same lines, and if I am permitted to introduce at the present time the bill with respect to the Canadian Railway Express Company I shall ask for leave to introduce the other.

Mr. GRAY: Is this bill a first step towards the amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. MANION: This is not a step towards the amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I shall explain the matter when it is before the house, but I may say that what is contemplated here is permitted under the act of last year with respect to subsidiary companies. It has nothing at all to do with the amalgamation of the railways; it deals entirely with the proposed express company in this case, and, in the other, with telegraphs.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been in force in the United States for the last four years.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall leave be granted?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, Mr. Speaker. I do not think we should be asked to give consent. May I say to the minister that it is a surprise to everyone that the government should be introducing further legislation at this stage. We have repeatedly received assurances from the Prime Minister that practically all the measures were before the house except those that were to come from committees, and I must say that so far as we are concerned the feeling on this side is that the government should not introduce further legislation of any kind until the people of the country have had an opportunity to express their views.

Mr. MANION: As this bill, as well as the other bill which it is intended to introduce, requires unanimous consent, I will introduce them to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: Consent is not given to the introduction of the bill to-day.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Interest Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall leave be granted?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. COOTE: The purpose is to amend the Interest Act so that after the first day of September no interest in excess of 5 per cent may be charged on any mortgage on real estate executed after that date.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Those in favour of the motion will say aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the motion is lost.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member supporting the bill desires to divide the house?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Certainly.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it not the custom, Mr. Speaker, for leave to be granted for the introduction of bills when nobody objects?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Not a sufficient number of members have demanded a recorded vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then we will all stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Coote) which was agreed to on the following division:

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AIR MAIL STAMPS

On the question:

Mr. McINTOSH:

1. When the postage rate on air mail was made 6 cents instead of 5 cents, were the 5 cent stamps then on hand utilized by printing the surchage on such stamps?
2. If so, who did the work?
3. Were any of such surcharged stamps found to be irregular by having the surcharge printed in an inverted position?
4. If so, were the stamps containing such inverted surcharge called in, or were they allowed to be used in the regular way?

Mr. McINTOSH: The information required in this connection has been given by the department.

Question dropped.

[Mr. Speaker.]

SILLARSVILLE, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Was the post office at Sillarsville, Quebec, ever taken away from Mrs. J. G. Sillars and given to Hudson Adams in 1933; if so, was contract entered into with Mrs. Sillars to perform the mail service?
2. What was the amount of this contract; was the amount subsequently reduced by one-half; if so, why?
3. Did Mrs. Sillars offer to perform the mail service after July 1, 1933, when the contract expired?
4. Has the contract been given to another party; if so, to whom and at what price?
5. Who are the bondsmen and for what amount?
6. Is the department aware that Mrs. Sillars was the widow of a returned soldier?
7. Is the new contractor a returned soldier?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. (a) Yes, but Mrs. Sillars was only in temporary charge following the death of the postmaster.

(b) At the death of the contractor, Hugh Sillars, the mail service was placed in hands of Mrs. Margueret Gordon Duncan Sillars, for the balance of contract term, viz., to 30th June, 1934.

2. $150 per annum. Yes, distance reduced from one-half to one-quarter mile at pro rata.
3. Mrs. Sillars offered to perform the service after the expiration of present contract, viz., from 1st July, 1934.
4. Yes. Contract was awarded to Hudson Adams at $75 per annum.
5. Alexander Pratt and J. H. MacDonald. $100.
6. No.
7. Department has no information.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

RIVIÈRE DES ILOTS, NEWPORT, QUE., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. DUGUAY:

1. Who was the superintendent in charge of works done at Riviere des Ilots, or Newport Islands river, Newport, county of Gaspe, from June, 1928, to January 1, 1930?
2. Who supplied the materials in connection with such works and what was the cost of same?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Return tabled herewith.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Before we come to the second reading of the Dominion Franchise bill I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would consider referring the bill to a select committee of the house as has been customary in connection with other election measures. I make this suggestion because I feel quite sure that if the bill comes into committee of the whole house there will be a protracted discussion on some of the clauses and that might be avoided if the measure were considered by a committee in the first instance.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is not intended to move the second reading until to-morrow. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) will not be here to-day. The suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman might be conducive to expediting the bill and I shall so represent to the Minister of Justice.

AUSTRALIAN WHEAT AND FLOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), but I am sorry he has left his seat so I shall direct my question to the Prime Minister. On three occasions during this session I have asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce for full information as to the importation of Australian flour and wheat via eastern ports, this vitally affecting Ontario farmers and millers. My reason for not pressing my question before because the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not give me a decided answer was that I did not want to embarrass the government before the Ontario election, but that is now past and gone and so I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would be good enough to give to the house and the country a full statement in regard to the importation of Australian wheat and flour. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was not quite decided in regard to whether Australian wheat and flour—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Speech!

Mr. SANDERSON: I am under the orders of the Speaker and not of my hon. friends across the way.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. SANDERSON: In answer to the question I directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding whether the Australian government subsidized wheat and flour coming into Canada he said that he thought the answer was in the negative but he was not quite sure. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the wheat and flour that are coming into Canada from Australia are subsidized by the Australian government and what the Canadian government intends to do in regard to the matter?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I am not fully aware of all the details of the matter to which the hon. member for South Perth has referred. My information is that the Department of Trade and Commerce has communicated with Australia for the purpose of asking whether subsidies are being paid on the wheat from which the flour has been produced that has been shipped to Canada or on the flour itself. It is known of course to the hon. gentleman that quantities of wheat from Australia have for a long time been imported on the west coast of this country. The quantities that have been imported into the east have until recently been negligible. There have been communications maintained between the Australian authorities and the Departments of Trade and Commerce and of External Affairs. The matter is under consideration and advisement by both departments. I shall ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make a statement to-morrow on the orders of the day.

PRINTING OF BILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the constantly increasing delay in getting bills after their introduction in this house. It used to be that we could get them in half an hour. Yesterday the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) introduced Bill No. 115, dealing with the Representation Act and the election of members, and it has a distinct bearing on the consideration of Bill No. 101, which we would be considering to-day if the Minister of Justice did not happen to be absent. It is not available now and will not be received until to-morrow. The bill will be up to-morrow, and we shall not get the printed copy perhaps before three o'clock. We cannot be expected to consider bills received as late as that.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The question of the availability of bills is governed by the rules of the house. When a bill is introduced it is sent to the printer. It has been the custom to have bills that were settled long in advance of their introduction printed before they were introduced. In some instances that is not possible.

For instance the bill introduced to-day was introduced in typewritten form. There is perhaps a little more time taken in the printing bureau because of the rush of work at the end of the session than is the case at the early part. I shall inquire, but I have no reason to believe that they are not doing their very best to expedite the printing of bills.

SALES OF WHEAT IN THE ORIENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): May I ask the absentee Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) through the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when I may expect that return for which I asked yesterday regarding the probability of selling more wheat or wheat flour to China?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension. I explained to him as clearly as I could that it was not the intention of the government to produce here the reports that have been received from the minister in Japan by the Department of External Affairs. Certain reports that have been received by the Minister of Trade and Commerce were not reports which can be produced. But in addition to those which were included in the return made a few days ago the minister has asked the officers of his department to go over the appropriate files for the purpose of ascertaining what information, not of a confidential nature and therefore producible, could be afforded to the hon. gentleman. I understood the minister to say yesterday that that information was being communicated to the hon. member for Melville. If it has not been it will be as soon as it is completed. But all the relevant and properly producible documents on his file have been produced, and for the reasons I have indicated the documents on the file of the Department of External Affairs are not producible.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My question was: When may I expect to get it—this year or next?

Mr. BENNETT: It has been brought down.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You are not going to get it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, I shall ask for it every day until the end of the session.

[Mr. Bennett.]

GERMAN MORATORIUM

BILL INTRODUCED BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT TO AUTHORIZE SEIZURE OF GERMAN FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). A United Press dispatch announces this morning that Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer for Great Britain, obtained first reading of a bill to authorize an exchange clearing house in Great Britain to seize German funds to compensate those who are affected by the moratorium in connection with the Young and Dawes plans. A few days ago an item appeared in the Berlin press stating that if Great Britain were to resort to any such action the German government would feel compelled to seize funds belonging not only to Great Britain and to her colonies, but to the self-governing dominions, including of course, Canada. Is the Prime Minister able to give us some official intimation with regard to this momentous situation?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It has not been the custom of this government to interfere with or offer gratuitous advice to the British government in the conduct of their business. We have no information that affects this country at this time.

Mr. JACOBS: It is in regard to the statement from Berlin.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I said; we have no information.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Minister of Pensions (Mr. MacLaren) if it is his intention to introduce any amendment to the Pension Act this year?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I have no statement to make at the present time.

TARIFF BOARD REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the matter of the tariff board reports. The acting Minister of Finance (Sir George Perley) has laid on the table of the house to-day three reports by the tariff board. As hon. members know, the only copy of these reports which is available for members is the copy that is filed with the clerk. I should like to urge on the government consideration of the matter of providing for the printing of these reports. I think they are of interest to members of the house as well as the country.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I may say that these reports tabled to-day call for no action whatever. The question of expense of printing all these reports would be quite an important one. However, I shall bring it to the attention of the Finance minister.

Mr. RALSTON: They are equally important whether they call for action or not.

DREDGING AT TRACADIE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) inquired about dredge No. 12, which had been at Tracadie. I promised that I would secure some additional information to-day. In some respects my answer yesterday was not absolutely correct. I understood the hon. member to inquire whether the dredge was being moved for the purpose of engaging in work elsewhere. In that sense my answer was correct. I find that this dredge was in need of substantial repairs, and advantage was taken of the high spring tide to take it out of the position which it occupied, and it is now in deeper water ready to be taken to Chatham for the overhaul which it requires.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Is that Chatham, Ontario, or Chatham, New Brunswick?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds) You may take it either place. As to the program for that dredge, it will be settled when parliamentary appropriations for the session are completed and the program drawn up.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Bank of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the Prime Minister if he would consider discussing immediately section 17, to which I intend to move an amendment, with regard to the vital principle of the bill, public ownership as against the proposed system. If that subject were disposed of I think it would expedite the discussion of the rest of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is no precedent for proceeding in that way, but if there are any disputatious sections preceding section 17 I would try to dispense with the discussion of them and proceed to section 17. But I think we must take them in sequence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out that I think the principle of the amendment would affect practically every section.

Mr. BENNETT: That is taken for granted when we reach it. If that be disposed of adversely to the government's view of course the bill falls and the government resigns.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But I wish to point out to the Prime Minister that what my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has in mind is that the principle of public ownership affects nearly every preceding section. Therefore it would perhaps be better to dispose of it immediately rather than discuss the whole question on every section prior to the vital one.

Mr. BENNETT: I think in any event we would have to call these sections and have them stand. But, as I understand there is no dispute, if the principle is adopted, why could we not adopt these sections as we go along, then if section 17 carries that is the end as far as we are concerned. Any motion which might be made to reconsider any of these sections would of course be considered. I believe it is not the practice of parliament to proceed with a section in the middle of a bill before dealing with the sections that precede it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My only idea was to expedite the progress of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand the position; my hon. friends think they might be charged with agreeing to the principle itself if they pass any of the other sections. I will at once make it perfectly clear that the acceptance of these sections is predicated on the assumption that section 17 passes as it is. I think that will get over the difficulty.

Mr. RALSTON: I am in the same position; I have an amendment to move to section 9, but it will be only necessary to consider it after the proposed motion of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has been disposed of. In order that we might get right to the heart of the matter I would suggest to the Prime Minister that sections 1 to 16 inclusive be called and allowed to stand, so that we may come directly to section 17.

Mr. BENNETT: It is very unusual.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan): We cannot do it except by unanimous consent.

Section stands.

Sections 2 to 16 inclusive stand.

On section 17—Capital.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to move that this section be amended by deleting all the words after the word "be" in line 29 of the reprinted bill, and substituting therefor the following:

—held by the minister, who shall subscribe for such shares, and payment for the same shall be made out of the consolidated revenue fund.

The section then will read:

The capital shall be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, represented by share certificates, which shall be held by the minister—and then the amendment proceeds. The object of this amendment, very briefly, is to provide that the Bank of Canada shall be publicly owned by the government on behalf of the people of Canada. After looking over the various sections of the bill I decided that this was the appropriate section and these were the appropriate words in which to move this amendment. It is not my intention to repeat at length the arguments which I submitted to the banking and commerce committee in regard to this principle. I do submit, however, that to-day the sentiment of the people of Canada is in favour of absolute public ownership of the greatest asset, the greatest monopoly there is in the Dominion of Canada to-day, namely our national credit and currency. Here, under this bill, we are transferring $14,000,000 of gold from the private chartered banks to another private or quasi-private corporation. Under this bill we are transferring to this private corporation, on the day it opens for business, assets totalling about $300,000,000, including $63,000,000 of new, interest bearing securities, which will cost the taxpayers of the Dominion of Canada $1,800,000 a year.

I submit to this committee, and I intend to enlarge upon my argument at a later date, that at the present time the sentiment of the people of Canada is not in favour of transferring these assets of gold, securities and credit to any private or quasi-private corporation. I do submit that the sentiments expressed by Sir Thomas White, which may be found at page 1322 of Hansard for the present session, in regard to public ownership, are abundantly justified, and I desire to impress upon this committee the absolute necessity of revising the entire principle of this bill, vesting the assets of this great new institution, the Bank of Canada, in the government of Canada on behalf of the people of Canada, instead of transferring these tremendous assets to any private corporation.

I read with great care the very able address made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) when he introduced this measure in the house. He spoke of sectional pressure, of political pressure and of all kinds of influences which might be brought to bear upon the administration of the day in regard to this bank. May I suggest to the Prime Minister and the government that Sir Thomas White met that argument in the report of the Macmillan commission. He said that we had had a quasi-public ownership of financial administration under the Finance Act, which we are now repealing, since 1914, and he said that never once in his experience as Minister of Finance or as a member of this house had he witnessed or experienced the slightest sign of sectional or political pressure. I submit to the Prime Minister and the government that the arguments that applied in regard to the administration of the Finance Act apply with equal weight and authority to the administration of this Bank of Canada Act. I submit, in no spirit of criticism at all—because I think under the principle of private ownership this bill contains a great deal of merit—that I am opposed to the principle of private ownership. I am conscientiously opposed to it; I know that western Canada is strongly opposed to it, and I believe a great many interests in eastern Canada are equally opposed to it. Therefore I offer this amendment to the Prime Minister, which will vest the ownership of this new institution in the government on behalf of the people of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. COOTE: My sentiments in regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) are very well known; I stated them to the house very emphatically in connection with the second reading of the bill, so at this time I shall content myself with saying that after listening to all the arguments advanced in the banking committee I am still convinced that this institution should be under public ownership. The power to be granted to this institution will be greater than the power of the government itself so far as the economic conditions of Canada are concerned. To-day monetary policy should be a matter of government responsibility, and I do not see why the power of deciding monetary policies should be handed over to an institution which is not owned by the government. The time has arrived when cooperation between the institution that is going to determine the monetary policy of Canada and the government should be just as close as the cooperation between the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Finance. I can see no good reason why this institution should be set up under any but public ownership. I consider it a retrograde step at this time to establish a privately owned institution with the great powers conferred by this bill, and for that reason I support very heartily the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. BENNETT: There are three reasons why the government is not prepared to accept this amendment. First, the experience of the world indicates that such a proposal would be bad. Second, it is essential that the bank should be free from political control. Third, all profits of the bank except $225,000 accrue to the people, to the country, and to all intents and purposes the bank itself is a publicly owned bank, for (a) the provisional directors are named in the bill, and (b) the governor, the deputy governor and the by-laws must be approved by the government of the day. In other words the operation of the bank must be subject to the approval of the government of the day, as to the personnel of its officers and the laws under which it operates.

Dealing very briefly with the matter—because it has been dealt with at such length that I do not propose to cover the ground again—I shall take the first point, namely, the question of the experience of the world. Central banks are either privately owned or bank owned, or partly privately and partly state owned. I think that is a fair way to put it. The countries in which the central banks are wholly owned by the public are, as I said in the committee, six in number, namely Australia, Bulgaria, Finland, Latvia, Russia and Sweden. The conditions under which the central bank of the Commonwealth of Australia became publicly owned were set out at length in the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance.

Those wholly privately owned are Albania, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Danzig, Esthonia —the government owns a few shares, and is disposing of them—France, India, Germany, Hungaria, Italy, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain and Switzerland. In those countries the central banks are privately owned, without limitations such as are imposed here with respect to either returns to the shareholders, or the restricting and supervising power exercised over the institution by the government of the country. That does not apply to all. In some instances the supervision is much the same as it is here. The wholly bank owned central authority is, of course, found in the United States of America. Technically it is not probably correct to say that the reserve banks of the United States could be described as central banks, but the banks are members of the central reserve body and therefore own the central reserve banks in the various parts of the United States.

Those which are part publicly and part privately owned are found in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Greece—where there is a limitation upon the amount of stock which may be owned by the government—and in Japan, where the same provision prevails, Lithuania, and Roumania. In Czechoslovakia and Roumania there is a limitation in the extent to which stock may be held in the central bank.

Public, private and bank owned are found in Chile, Colombia, and Peru. And there is private and bank ownership in South Africa. That is the position as indicated by the experience of the world. While, as I said the other day, it is not always desirable to rely upon the experience of other countries in arriving at conclusions in your own country—because conditions are so very different—nevertheless the fact remains that the functions of a central bank have been found to be best discharged, apparently, in the countries to which I have referred by recourse to the method indicated for the purpose of creating and owning the bank.

I shall not dwell longer upon that point. I am not unmindful of what Sir Thomas White said, but it is only fair to say that Sir Thomas White was opposed to the central bank, and he relied upon the Finance Act as being ample security for the protection of the credit of this country. This is neither the time nor the place to discuss at length a matter which has already been carefully considered in committee. Suffice it to say that the Finance Act, in itself, was an extraordinary expedient to meet an extraordinary circumstance. And with the country off the gold standard, as this country has been since a former Minister of Finance shipped $40,000,000 in gold to the United States—since that time the utilization of the Finance Act offered opportunities for chartered banks such as were not to be found in any other part of the world, and which need not be here discussed more than to say that any reliance placed upon the observations of the former Minister of Finance to support the proposal in the amendment I believe must be considered in the light of his attitude of mind towards the whole proposal, and cannot be taken as an indication of opinion and separate from the view which he held with respect to the whole matter, as indicated by the report which he made following the proceedings of the Macmillan commission.

My second ground, as I explained to the committee, is I believe of the utmost importance. We had ample evidence during the progress of the discussion in the committee that considerations which govern in the appointment and discharging of the duties and obligations of the bank must have, from the very necessity of things, political consequence. And to make a political football out of a central bank is something which I do not think parliament should ask any body or any government to do. No one who has studied the conditions in this country, and understands them as thoroughly as many hon. gentlemen opposite understand them, will deny that instead of giving the people the broad base for their choice of directors, which they would have if the shareholders as provided by this act were to elect the directors, a proposal looking to a government-selected body of directors, some of whom would hold office during a term necessarily longer than the life of the government, involves considerations in the appointments of a character not conducive to the well-being of the bank. Shall men be appointed to the bank because they reside in a particular locality? Shall men be appointed to the bank because of their occupations? Shall men be appointed to the bank because of their religion? Shall men be appointed to the bank because of their politics? Shall men be appointed to the bank because of their race? Every one of those questions I have put to this committee this afternoon will be asked by every government having the responsibility for the appointment of directors. All you have to do is to look at the commissions and committees set up in this country during the last twenty-five years to realize the soundness of what I have said. Shall a man be appointed as a director of this bank simply to find for him a place because he no longer has a position in his own province? There have been cases in which, in order to find resting places for men no longer useful in their own provinces appointments have been made to important commissions. That is a well known fact. Shall political considerations of that kind prevail, or not? That is the issue. Which is better? Is it better under democratic institutions where you have shares of small value being issued—in this instance shares of $50 each, and where in the selection of shareholders it is intended that there shall be the widest distribution of shares to those who will subscribe for small numbers of shares—which is better, that with the ballot sent to them after nominations have been made they should select the directors for this institution, or shall the considerations to which I have referred be given due weight? Those are considerations which as every hon. member knows provoke effective questions when appointments are to be made by a government. I speak feelingly, and with some small experience. There are hon. members in this house with larger experience. But there is no hon. member who does not know about the pressure which is always exercised with respect to the necessity for finding a place for some man who—and I am not speaking offensively—is worn out, tired out or, shall we say, some politician or person who no longer has the opportunity to exercise his powers. These are the facts. I do not wish to mention names, but if I were driven to it I could. All you have to do is to look at the commissions which during the past twenty-five years have been appointed in this country. I am not speaking about one party; I have been very careful not to do that. You will find that the considerations to which I have referred are the considerations which have governed in making appointments.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Not always.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say always; I just simply said that those are the considerations which have governed. There is not an hon. member of this committee within sound of my voice who does not know that that is so.

Mr. HANBURY: Might I ask the Prime Minister whether that consideration governed in connection with the appointment of the trustees of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. BENNETT: I explained to the committee the difficulties which were incident to that. The hon. gentleman knows very well what they were. I shall be perfectly frank. The criticism against one gentleman who is serving without salary was that it was not a good thing to have two men of one religion on a committee. That is what was said.

Mr. HANBURY: Evidently the Prime Minister did not permit that criticism to influence his judgment, and quite properly so.

Mr. BENNETT: It did not, but he has been violently criticized because he did not. There are other criticisms which I could mention which were made with respect to other commissions. I am being perfectly frank about this matter of commissions and appointments. I have no hesitation in saying that I should have liked to have approached this question under the conditions that obtain in other countries where there are not the vast areas which we have here in Canada and which have not our scattered population. But I realized that I was confronted with facts and not theories and the only method by which this matter could be dealt with as an actual condition in this body politic is the manner in which I have indicated it can be controlled satisfactorily.

I go a step further. How do we propose to elect the directors? Is this to be done by a few gentlemen sitting around a table in the east block? Are they to select them and appoint them? There is to be circulation of ballot papers to every shareholder. These ballot papers will contain the names of the persons nominated and the shareholders, accepting their responsibility, will select seven directors with as much wisdom as they are capable of exercising. That wisdom is good enough to select the hon. members of this parliament who reflect the genius of the Canadian people and it should be sufficiently great to select these directors.

I should like to give an experience I have had in this matter. In the early days of the Northwest Territories we established a law society which was perpetuated by legislation in Alberta and Saskatchewan. When it came to the election of the benchers we provided in the first bill that the benchers should be elected without nomination. Ballot papers were circulated to every member of the profession and he was asked to vote for nine benchers, with the proviso that not more than two should reside in any one judicial district. Strange as it may seem the result was that those who were most prominent at the bar were selected. Later on we provided in Alberta and Saskatchewan that there should be nominations by any three members of the profession. The names of the nominees were printed on a ballot paper, which was sent to each lawyer in the province. An addressed envelope was enclosed, upon the back of which was the statement that the ballot was to be returned to the secretary. Again, strangely enough, the leaders of the senior and junior bars were almost in every instance selected by election to fill the positions of benchers, the administrative officers of the law society. We propose to do just that thing. We propose to put the selection of these directors upon the broadest democratic basis possible. It is not to be put upon the basis of a few gentlemen sitting around a table in the east block to determine who these gentlemen shall be.

Mr. HANBURY: Who are the gentlemen to whom the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is referring?

Mr. BENNETT: The government of the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are responsible to parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, but under the parliamentary institution as we understand it, we know perfectly well that the government must have a majority or it does not exist. That majority sustains the action of the government. I am adopting the broadest democratic basis in permitting the shareholders themselves to select the directors.

Mr. HANBURY: The shareholders do not appoint members of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the broadest basis of democracy. They select by their ballots those who shall be the directors of the bank. That is the method that will be pursued. Nominations will be made and ballots will be distributed and the shareholders of the bank, with a sense of their individual responsibility, will be called upon to vote for seven directors. Each shareholder will be instructed that the directors must not be confined to any one part of the country, that they should represent as many sections of the country and occupations as is possible.

I am not going to follow the argument any further because it has been done at such great length already. I say that it is not correct to describe this bank as a privately owned bank. It is true that there will be shareholders who will pay $50 each for their shares; they will have the right to vote for directors in the manner indicated, but where will rest the control of the bank? Shall the executive officer who must determine its policies be subject to the direction of government? Shall he be forced, as he would be forced in the case of a publicly owned institution, to do what he is told to do by the government of the day? In a moment of political crisis when it is desirable to do a particular thing for party reasons, shall he be subject to that control or shall he be free from such control? He is appointed by the governor in council for a term of years and he knows that his tenure of office depends, not upon the government but upon the extent to which he discharges his duties in a manner satisfactory to the people of this country and to the shareholders of the bank. The governor and the deputy governor are to be the executive officers.

Then there is the question of administration. Banks like other institutions are governed by by-laws. By-laws are the rules and regulations under which a concern functions and these will have to be approved by the governor in council. That is an indication that the government does not undertake to deal with details or with political patronage; it deals with the question only to the extent of approving the governor, the deputy governor and the by-laws that govern. Beyond that the government simply sees that the institution functions and it gives it such assistance as it can give to that end. In order that there shall be close communication and continuity of policy, having regard to the changes of administration in a country such as this, it is provided that the deputy minister shall be a member of the board. He is to have no vote but he is to be there for the purpose of seeing that the government is thoroughly informed as to the conduct and policies of the institution. That is the position there.

I am not going to dwell upon this any longer. In this country there have been many striking illustrations of a commission desiring to do what the government wanted done. There have been many such illustrations during the past fifty years and I think it is desirable that an institution such as this should be freed from such possible criticism.

Lastly, all the profits that are made by this bank, with the exception of $225,000 per year, shall accrue to this country. If the money were found by the Minister of Finance through the consolidated revenue fund it is not improbable that it would cost four per cent, and perhaps more depending upon where it was secured. However, we will say four per cent. Four per cent means $200,000 and the difference between $200,000 and $225,000 is $25,000. I think it will be admitted that that is a very small price to pay for the security which is obtained for the people of this country.

As I said, I shall not traverse the arguments which have been made by the Minister of Finance and myself before the standing committee. In approaching this problem, and it is a very important one in which great responsibility had to be taken by the government of the day, at first blush any hon. member would say: Yes, a publicly-owned bank, a bank owned by the country. But when I gave my best attention to the matter, without going again in detail into the reasons that influenced my judgment, I could not ask this house to vote for that purpose, and I am not doing so because I believe that if I did I should not be doing what I conceive to be right with respect to the institution which we are now creating and which will play so large a part in shaping the monetary policy of this country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before the members of the committee reach a decision as to which way they will vote on this motion—of course, they have already done so—I would suggest to every one a careful reading of the preamble of this bill. The preamble states quite definitely what will be the functions of the institution which we are creating to-day: Those functions will be to:

> —regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion.

In other words, we are entrusting the national life of Canada to the body of men who will guide, dominate and control these various functions which are enumerated in the preamble of this bill. Under these circumstances I cannot but agree with the views of Sir Thomas White, who was at one time a distinguished Minister of Finance in this country, who was one of the commissioners appointed by the government to study this question of banking and monetary matters in Canada, who himself stated that he was opposed to the establishment of a central bank and reported against the establishment of such a bank, but who stated emphatically that if there was to be a central bank it should surely be publicly-owned, a bank owned by the people of Canada.

My right hon. friend's argument, if he will allow me to say so, will militate against representative government, at least representative government elected by universal franchise. He asks, "How can a few gentlemen in the east block, instead of the shareholders, control this bank?" Well, the few gentlemen in the east block are the representatives of the people of Canada; they are supposed to be. They are elected by the people of Canada to voice their views and to represent those views in legislation, in administration and otherwise; and when the people of Canada are not satisfied with the representatives whom they have elected, the constitution provides a way to change them.

Mr. BENNETT: But their successors cannot change the board.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I beg your pardon. They have the confidence of the people of the country, and I have more confidence in my right hon. friend than he has himself. As against these gentlemen in the east block representing the people of Canada my right hon. friend says that we should prefer the shareholders who select the administrators of that bank. Now, the shareholders cannot be more than 2,000, with the capital which is going to be subscribed and the number of shares which everyone is allowed to own; so that 2,000 people in Canada instead of the government are going to control the economic and national life of the country. Against that principle I will certainly vote. I believe that under the circumstances the central bank, being given the powers which this parliament is giving it, must be publicly-owned. We are taking away from all the private banks which are being operated in Canada the gold which they have in their possession. This institution is going to possess all the gold in Canada, and it will be a privately-owned institution.

I think that if you consider these various elements in connection with this matter you will agree that the motion of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre ought to be accepted by the committee. I am free to admit that I would rather have held the opinion that this should be a privately-owned institution publicly controlled, before I read the bill as it is and heard the discussion and knew all the functions that are going to be those of this public institution. Under the circumstances, the central bank being what it is going to be, I think I should be derelict in my duty if I did not support the principle of public ownership.

Mr. EULER: When the Prime Minister announced early in the session that we were to have a central bank I had hoped for two things; one was that the central bank would be given the power to issue all the currency. That is being partially carried out, and my regret is that it is not being carried out 100 per cent. The second was that the bank would be publicly-owned, a bank owned by the people of Canada. Now, I hope I do not prejudice my argument by a fact which is perhaps fairly well known, that in many instances, so far as public services are concerned, I favour public ownership; and I will freely admit that public ownership presents a good many drawbacks. I am not arguing that public ownership is perfect, but I do believe that in many instances public ownership has nothing to regret when it is compared with the results that have flowed from private ownership. I think the committee and parliament should consider the advantages and disadvantages which may flow from the two separate propositions, private ownership as proposed in the bill, or public ownership as proposed in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

My reason for saying that this should be a publicly-owned bank is this. I think that entirely too much power is being given to an institution which is not publicly-owned. I do not suppose I need to review these powers. Some of them have already been referred to; perhaps not all. In the first place the bank will be given the power of issuing currency, a great power. Again, it will have possession of all the gold in the country, amounting to $107,000,000. Again it will have in its possession five per cent of all the deposits in the chartered banks; it will have the reserves which have been put aside for certain purposes in the banks; it will have the repayment of advances made under the Finance Act and it will—and this is perhaps more important than any of the other features—have control of the credit of Canada. I was going to say—and this is more or less by the way—that this bank, especially if it were privately owned might be given some additional powers; it might have control of the reserves, for instance, of insurance companies and of trust funds in various organizations, pension funds, and perhaps later on, when we establish, if we do an unemployment insurance scheme those funds might also very well be administered by this bank.

I may be wrong but I am credibly informed that this central bank will actually have in its control and possession funds amounting to the stupendous sum of between $300,000,000 and $500,000,000. That is a tremendous power to give to a privately owned institution. I cannot quite agree with the Prime Minister when he says that it is not correct to describe this bank as a privately owned one. After all it is a privately owned bank and although the number of shareholders will be comparatively small, some 2,000 and no one of them—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member's mathematics is bad. It is 20,000.

Mr. EULER: I was repeating for the moment what the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) had said. Let us, however, say 20,000 persons. I am not going to dwell on this to any great extent but I believe it is possible to concentrate, by way of having the shares held in trust, a great deal of power in a few hands in the ownership of the shares of this bank.

Something was said also—and this was said in the committee—that ownership of the bank by private persons might lead to a great deal of external influence being exercised upon it. I need only read what Sir Thomas White, one of the commissioners, said. This is what he said:

> It is also my view that a central bank of Canada should not be empowered except with the approval of parliament, to enter into agreements with other central banks which would undoubtedly, on account of their greater experience and wide sources of information, possess decided advantage in the negotiation of such agreements.

More than that—and I think this is important—Mr. Beaudry Leman, also one of the commissioners—and I do not think he can be accused of being a great advocate of public ownership—had this to say:

> Measures calculated to develop intra-imperial cooperation, as set forth in paragraph number 211, should not be developed beyond the scope of providing ample facilities for the interchange of goods and services, unless the people of Canada understand and decide, in full knowledge of the consequences, that close monetary cooperation may lead to close economic association which in turn is a step towards common political action.

I am not attributing any sinister motives whatever to the Prime Minister or to the government in deciding finally that the bank shall be privately owned. The Prime Minister stated—and I believe he is quite sincere—that at first blush, as he put it, he was in favour of having this a publicly owned bank. I wish he had adhered to that view, because I believe it to be true that there would be greater public confidence in a publicly owned than in a privately owned bank, restricted though it may be in its powers. The other day the Minister of Finance, in explaining this bill and the Prime Minister again to-day, made reference to central banks in other countries and in most instances those are privately owned. Banks like the Bank of England and the Bank of France are the growth of perhaps a number of centuries and those are older countries. I am afraid, unlike some of my friends the lawyers, I am not necessarily a great believer in precedents. Someone once said: We make our own precedents, and I believe we can make progress in all things and need not necessarily look to older countries for the course we ought to adopt. For example, in the United States, one of the newer countries if you like, this year there was introduced into congress a bill which provided for a number of things. This bill was sponsored by the two senior members of the committee, Congressmen Stegall and Goldsborough, two prominent members of the United States congress. This is the kind of bank they proposed:

> It would set up a federal monetary authority which would have sole custody of the nation's metallic currency reserves, power to regulate credit and, at the end of three years, the exclusive right to issue currency in the United States. As stated in details these powers correspond identically with the essential functions of any central bank.

This proposed institution was to supersede the federal reserve bank system as they now have it in the United States. The article goes on:

> The "authority" itself would consist of seven directors to be appointed by the president with Senate approval. They would be representative of agriculture, industry and banking, and would be headed by a governor and deputy governors after the manner of a central bank. They would be subject to removal from office only by the president or by congress, but would be debarred from any private interest in finance, manufacturing or foreign trade.
> The authority would thus be free from any control except that of the government; and any profits from its operations would, after deductions for reserves, go to the treasury.

I cite that merely as an argument against accepting the theory, if you like, that we must necessarily follow the practice of the older banks in the older countries.

There has been only one real objection advanced to having this bank publicly owned and that is the danger or supposed danger referred to by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that in the appointment of directors and in the conduct of the bank itself especially—and I think the Minister of Finance said this—if an election were in prospect, political influence would be brought to bear upon the conduct of the bank. I have said before in the house and also in the committee on banking and commerce that I am surprised and disappointed that the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister himself should have so little confidence in the public men and the democracy of this country. Public men are constantly being criticized more I think in jest than in earnest that they are out to serve their own ends as members of parliament. I do not think that is borne out by the fact but certainly if we, the government of this country, say that we are not to be trusted, what can we expect from those who elected us? The Prime Minister has referred to the difficulties in making appointments, to the fact that certain interests have to be considered, such as language, religion, geography and all the rest. He spoke a moment ago about the criticism which he received because he appointed two members of a certain faith to the national railway board. My answer to that is this: Surely a government has backbone enough, as it had in that case, to resist any unjust demands that are made upon it. Therefore in the final analysis these would be my reasons for wanting the bank publicly owned. In the first place, it is entirely too great a power to be placed in the hands of private individuals; in the second, a central bank will have the confidence of the people of Canada to a much greater degree if it is publicly rather than privately owned, especially in view of the facts which have been disclosed before various committees of the house. For these reasons I am going to support the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD: I wish to express in a few words my sentiments on this, to my mind, very important departure in Canadian history. May I say first that I am a private ownership man. As far as possible I believe in private ownership. But having regard to the preamble, which after all is the guiding principle of the whole bill, I cannot help but tell this house the reason I am supporting one hundred per cent the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). I was surprised to hear the arguments of the Prime Minister concerning the method of electing directors, and I wish to say a few words on that. Is there any man in this house who thinks that a cabinet representing all the people of Canada—not only those who are able to subscribe $2,500—and having the confidence, as they should have, of the people of Canada as a whole, are not in a better position to select the men who are to control the financial policy and the national credit of Canada than 2,000 shareholders whose only qualification is that they were able to put up $2,500? I am sure that there is not any serious-minded person who will say that the men in the first category are not much better able to select proper directors to manage that institution than the shareholders as provided under the act.

Then I wish to say a word in connection with the gold situation. This institution is to have the control of all the gold of Canada. Furthermore it is to confiscate the gold of the private banks of Canada. I know that legal justification may be asserted for this, but I do not believe it is the proper thing to confiscate the property of any citizen and to hand that property over to another citizen. If we are going to have confiscation let us have it for the benefit of the state and no one else.

Then this institution is to have, progressively I will admit, but eventually, the entire control of the issue of money in Canada. In view of the Prime Minister's changed attitude as to the money policy of this government as expressed in this house yesterday I begin to think it is most important that we should have a governmentally owned institution, or at least an institution controlled by the government, to manage safely the national credit in the interests of all the people of Canada. Then I submit another suggestion. Under the present legislation we have a treasury board acting under the Finance Act. With conditions as they are to-day I do not think any member of parliament should vote in favour of a system which in any way will lessen the present powers of the treasury board under the Finance Act. I believe that by this new institution we are lessening the powers of the treasury board. Then there is another argument as to the selection of the officers of the institution. I support the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) in his statement. When I want land surveyed, although I cannot run a line I can hire a man to do the job for me and can tell him where I want it run. I do not think this parliament has any reason to take second place to the business men of this country. The managements of our privately owned banks in Canada have been able to select men to manage their institutions, not perhaps in the interest of all the people of Canada, but at least in the interest of their shareholders. In spite of the fact that some of the directors, in fact many of them, are not at all qualified to manage those institutions, they are able to hire such men as Mr. Wilson, Mr. Logan and many others who have been successful in conducting banks for the benefit of their shareholders. Surely eighteen selected men—selected men, I say—out of a population of over ten million, are competent to hire officers who can manage this institution, especially when it is to be charged with responsibility—and I want to read it into Hansard because I think it is most important——to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion.

Furthermore, at present we have a privately owned system of note issue, which is covered at all times by assets to a varying degree. Under this new legislation we are handing over to the Bank of Canada, the absolute power of note issue for the whole Dominion of Canada. In view of these considerations, and after listening to the argument of the Prime Minister, I cannot see how any hon.

member on either side of the house—I am not speaking politically—can take any other stand than that the control of the national credit of Canada should be in the hands of people representing Canada or in the hands of the government of the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had not intended to take any part in this discussion, but in view of what has been said I think a few remarks would not be out of place, giving my own views and the views of those with whom I am associated. First I should like to say that every view that has been presented here this afternoon was presented with force and power by gentlemen who I have no doubt honestly held the views they expressed. I give them credit for honest and honourable intentions, and they are quite justified in expressing their views. I must confess that I am rather surprised to find the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) in the role of a supporter of public ownership. I have never heard that heretofore he has been included in that category. But there is always time for repentance. Personally, I am not a proponent of public ownership; I am not doing any violence to my conscience when I vote for private ownership in the sense in which it is restricted and limited by this bill. But certain statements have been made here to-day which I do not think are quite borne out by the facts. In the first place the hon. member for Quebec East said that the board of directors of this bank would be elected by 2,000 shareholders. That would be true if only 2,000 people should become shareholders of the bank, which would be possible having regard to the limitations imposed by the bill. But it is equally possible that there will be 100,000 shareholders, having regard to the announced policy of the government that the shares shall be distributed as widely as possible. So I suggest to my hon. friend that while his mathematics may be technically correct they are not practically correct.

Public ownership of any great and important utility is a great idea. But I have never seen a country yet where it worked out one hundred per cent, not even in the great province of Ontario.

Mr. EULER: You cannot expect one hundred per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly it has not worked out in connection with the railways of this country. For the reasons which have been alleged already I am going to support the principle of private ownership of this bank, as I think the committee would be well advised to do.

[Mr. Howard.]

It has been stated here to-day that pressure would be brought to bear upon the government of the day in regard to creeds and sections throughout the country. I can show you a file of correspondence in my office coming from various parts of the country demanding that a certain number of the directors of this bank shall be chosen from one race in this country. There are many resolutions couched in exactly the same language, showing the propaganda that is going on. That is one evidence. I will not mention the race; hon. gentlemen can draw their own conclusions. This indicates that the moment anything of this sort is set up there is a reaction of this kind in the minds of some people. Does that tend to strengthen the position of the institution? I humbly submit that it does not. Then there is the question of sectionalism. Did we ever set up a board of directors for the national railways when sectionalism was not a paramount consideration? I put that to hon. gentlemen opposite. They know it and we know it, and that does not make for the best cooperation possible. I think it is one of the great weaknesses of Canada that we are governed by sectionalism. We are bound to consider the different sections of the country; otherwise we would not have a maritime position on one question, a central Canada position on another and a western position on another. This is an embarrassment and a detriment to the proper government of the country. We must admit that the principle of governing the country according to sectionalism is wrong, and surely the same principle should apply to the bank.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend referred to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. Is he contending now that the present board was appointed with the idea of giving expression to the wishes of these various factions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I do not say that, but I say that the board set up in 1922 or 1923, which went out of office in 1930, and the board set up in lieu thereof in 1930 or 1931 gave expression to this sectionalism in Canada, and it was very hard to operate the board because of the diverse interests that were represented.

Mr. EULER: But that does not apply to the present board?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, it does not, because, as I understand it, that principle was discarded in the appointment of the trustees, of whom there are only three under the statute.

Surely the experience of other countries is of value; surely it is not a crime to follow the example of England, although in the minds of some members of this house it may be so considered. They have had a privately owned central bank, the Bank of England, ever since they have had a central bank. It has performed exactly the functions that are intended to be performed by this bank. More than that, in the great majority of cases where central banks have been set up in other countries, invariably and with very minor and few exceptions those banks have been privately owned in the same sense that this bank is to be privately owned. Why is that? Hon. gentlemen in this house should pause and query why that has been the case. In Canada we have reason to know why there might be interference with a bank if it were publicly owned. I can visualize what might happen, and it is to guard against that sort of thing that this institution has been set up in this way.

I should like to pay some attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) with respect to the gold question. Very incorrectly, in my judgment, he said there would be confiscation of the gold of the private banks. If I understand the word in its proper meaning, confiscation is taking without compensation. There is no such intention or underlying principle in this bill. The gold of the chartered banks is to be taken over, save and except that portion of it required for the external obligations of the banks, and due compensation is to be made. I did not understand that the banks as such objected to the taking over of their gold, because they admitted that gold was no longer necessary as part of their reserves. What they did seek, however, in the brief filed for them, was to be allowed a great unearned increment which the possession and ownership of the gold at the present moment brings about. They thought this ought to accrue to them. This legislation does not recognize that principle. It recognizes the principle of full compensation to the banks at the statutory rate, and the profit goes to the state. What other principle could be followed by this house and by the country? I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to bring in an amendment which would have the effect of paying the chartered banks of this country the full premium on gold to-day. I am sure they would not do so, so there is nothing in the argument that this will bring about confiscation. There is no confiscation; there is expropriation with due regard to compensation. Any government has that right; it has been exercised by this government ever since we set up legislation having that effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it not a fact that $70,000,000 of Finance Act gold is being transferred to a private corporation?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The gold will be in the custody of the central bank and the private institutions will not reap the benefit of the unearned increment. Perhaps theoretically the ownership of the gold will be in the new bank, but the unearned increment is the thing that bothered the chartered banks, who wanted to be paid at the rate of $35 per ounce. I wonder what government, or what party, would dare pay the chartered banks of this country that unearned increment on a commodity in which they were not dealers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No one said so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the only point in the remarks of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, the taking of the gold because gold is worth so much more than the statutory price.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He never said that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think the hon. member for Sherbrooke had anything else in the back of his mind when he used the term "confiscation." If he did not mean that there was no point in bringing up the matter at all. Either he meant the confiscation of a commodity on which there was a large premium or his argument meant nothing at all. I suggest to the committee and to the country that this matter was given the very fullest and frankest consideration by the banking committee over a long period of time, and that this provision should have the support of the people of Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: Just before you put the question, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this subject which has been discussed a good deal in this house, in connection with the bill now before us and at other times. I do not think I can add to the discussion anything that has not been brought forward by someone else or mentioned on previous occasions by myself, but I do desire to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) upon having offered this amendment, and I am very glad to note the enthusiasm of those who support him. As one who has always believed in the public ownership of financial institutions I am very glad to welcome these gentlemen to the ranks of public ownership.

I do not care, of course, whether the job is done by the present government or by some other government; I want to see it done, and I am ready to vote for the men who are going to do it. Let me point out to my hon. friends that there are no new powers in this bill which have not been exercised by the private banks of Canada ever since their organization. Certainly up to the time of the Finance Act they had entire and absolute control of the financial institutions, just as it is proposed now to give control to the central bank. And while of course I am going to vote for the amendment, because I believe in the principle involved therein, and while I am going to vote for every amendment which makes towards that principle, nevertheless I wish to take this opportunity to say that the central bank, as a private institution, as pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, is a very excellent idea. There are some fine advances made in the measure now before us, and even if I cannot have all the amendments I should like, I certainly will vote for the bill when it comes up for third reading.

For a moment or two let me remark upon the arguments advanced by the Prime Minister. He set forth three arguments, the first being that the experience of the world would lead us to adopt the present form of private ownership of banks. In that connection may I observe that the experience of the world has been very meagre, in the matter of public ownership of banks, and secondly that all the experience of private ownership of banks has not been attractive. The methods adopted in financing, in other countries of the world, and especially during the period of and since the great war, as I say has not been attractive. Indeed, the mismanagement of the financial institutions by private corporations in various countries of the world has led to the necessity for the legislation now before the committee. I do not think we can draw our inspiration even from the historic old Bank of England in handling the financial affairs of the British nation, especially during the past decade or so.

Then, the second point made by the Prime Minister was that of having freedom from political control. I do not believe there is anything under heaven free from political control. I do not believe we can have anything free from political control. While I agree with what the Prime Minister said—and I state that so far as it went his argument in that connection was very forceful, indeed—I think his argument was more of an indictment of the present parliamentary system than an argument against the public ownership of banks. I would say that there is only too much truth in what he said. So far as the party system is concerned—and perhaps we will not get the full working of the social ownership of banks until the C.C.F. comes into power—nevertheless, as I have said on many occasions, I would rather have bank governors and directors appointed by the Prime Minister or by the leader of the opposition than by any group of private bankers we might find anywhere.

The third point was that the presently proposed bank is really, in fact, a public institution, inasmuch as the government has the appointment of the governor and certain functionaries of the institution. Of course, there is truth in this, that the private control of the banks is in many respects very strictly limited, and that those features of the bill are of course acceptable as a bill providing for a private institution. But the fact remains that the entire control of the central financial institution of this country is being reposed in a private concern. In my opinion that is not a wise thing to do and I would urge that the Prime Minister who, as he says himself, believes or had the opinion at the outset that the proper thing to do was to make this a government bank in reality, would give further consideration to the arguments which have been put forward this afternoon, and that he will make this bank wholly and entirely a socially owned, nationally owned, publicly owned—whichever term you desire to use—institution, so that we may control, and so that the financial policies of the country may be in the hands of the representatives of the Canadian people. I would point out to the Prime Minister that if under government control poor governors were appointed, governors who were incapable of carrying out their duties, we certainly would have direct recourse and ultimately, at least, could effect the necessary improvements by removing the incapable officials and appointing others in their places. But under a private institution we will have no such power. They will find their own governors and their own directors who will do business in the way they want them to do it. I urge that further consideration be given, and that the amendment be accepted.

Mr. SPENCER: Before the vote is put, and without wishing to take up the time of the committee, I should like to place myself on record in support of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). I happen to be paired with the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Davies), who has had to leave the chamber this afternoon. For that reason I should like to state my position as probably a vote may take place shortly. I agree entirely with what has been said in support of the necessity for making this a publicly owned bank. The matter was thoroughly discussed in the committee on banking and commerce, and there can be no advantage in repeating it here. May I place myself on record as being entirely in favour of the amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Don't be so anxious. Hon. gentlemen opposite are quite free to express their opinions, and I claim the right to express mine. I am opposed to the amendment for the very reason advanced for its adoption by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), namely the provisions in the preamble of the bill under which the Bank of Canada can control the credit and currency, meaning the commercial credit and currency, necessary for carrying on the ordinary business of the country. As between a privately owned and controlled institution, with all the safeguards thrown around it by this bill, and a politically controlled institution which would govern the credit provided the business interests of this country, I must favour the privately controlled, or privately owned, publicly controlled and, if you like, privately managed institution for which there is provision in this bill. As a matter of fact, I would go farther than the bill has gone, and in addition to setting up a stock issue of $5,000,000 in shares of $50 each, or whatever they may be when the bill has passed, I would in addition make an issue of common shares representing a small proportion of the total capital of the bank, with the provision that the persons who purchased those shares, whether or not they be the same persons who purchased the preferred shares, would have an added interest in the success of the institution by the further possibility of sharing with the state the profits accruing to the state. Under the provisions of this bill the profits, such as they are, or whatever they may be, accrue one hundred per cent to the state, and when hon. members talk about the institution being managed, and talk about confiscation being effected to the advantage of private individuals they overlook entirely the fact that as now provided all of the profits arising out of the operation of this bank accrue to the state. When we look at the experience which this country has had and is now having with publicly owned and directly parliamentary controlled institutions, we cannot hope to have an independent institution so long as it remains within the hands of any government, no matter what side of politics it may be on. A politically controlled bank could destroy the industry of this country in six months through unwise actions. That possibility rests within the provisions of the bill.

What has been our experience with our national railways? The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has left the chamber but he knows what that experience has been. The first board of directors of the Canadian National Railways were still holding office when the government was changed in 1922. When the new government came into office the president and the entire board were dismissed and a new political board appointed. As was testified to by the then president, Sir Henry Thornton, that board continued to operate in a political manner. The commission which investigated the whole situation used the term, "the thin red line of political activity." We have a similar situation to-day in the province of Ontario. The management of one of the greatest publicly owned institutions are to be dismissed and political appointees put in their places. What guarantee have we that the same thing would not happen in the case of this bank? Should there be a change of government, the governor, the deputy governor and the board of directors who controlled this great central bank would be automatically dismissed.

Mr. EULER: Will not the hon. gentleman admit that the hydro commission of Ontario, a publicly owned institution, has saved the people of that province hundreds of millions of dollars when it is considered what they would have had to pay for power had it been owned by private parties?

Mr. NICHOLSON: At the moment I am not discussing the merits of hydro electric in Ontario; I am discussing the management. The governor, the deputy governor and the directors of a bank such as the central bank of Canada is to be should not be subject to political dismissal. I grant that a government may be trusted to find the best men available for these positions, but there can be no continuity of policy or that direction which is required in the managing of an institution of this kind when the governor and all the officers are subject to dismissal when a political change occurs. My hon. friend knows that the whole organization of the hydro electric in Ontario is to be subject to political dismissals.

Mr. EULER: Even if that were true, which I do not admit, has it not been advantageous to the people of Ontario to have the hydro publicly owned?

Mr. NICHOLSON: It may have been up to the present, but there are arguments both ways. Is the central bank of Canada, the monetary policy and the credit of this country to be subject to political control?

Mr. EULER: That does not necessarily follow.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That follows the moment you adopt the principle that those who control are to be political appointments. That principle was put into practice by my hon. friend himself as a member of the government.

Mr. EULER: I never did that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What happened to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways in 1922?

Mr. EULER: I was not a member of that government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You supported that government and you supported that action. My hon. friend is supporting the action which is going to be taken with regard to the hydro in Ontario.

Mr. EULER: That remark is entirely uncalled for.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just one last word. As a business man whose business will be directly affected by the control of credit in this country—this bank is to have rediscounting privileges—I am not going to risk my business nor am I going to risk the business of any other man and put it in a position where it can be destroyed by political actions. That is what a politically-controlled bank could do.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, I am rather surprised at the statement of the last speaker that there is to be no political control. Surely the governor and the deputy governor are going to run this bank, and they are to be appointed by the government for a definite period. If that is not political control and political appointments, I do not know what it is. Those two gentlemen are going to have the most control over this institution, and they are to be appointed by the government. Every hon. gentleman who has had to do with boards of directors knows how much influence such a board exercises. I am not very much concerned about the influence they will exercise.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

We are being asked to give up two controls which parliament has exercised over the private institutions of this country. We are being asked to give up every vestige of control and the inspection of banks which has been carried on in recent years under the Finance Act.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. That becomes a function of this so-called private institution, using my hon. friend's description. It becomes a function of that institution to regulate other private institutions.

Mr. BENNETT: The inspector general still continues.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Of course he does, but he will operate under the Minister of Finance. I want to be corrected if I am wrong in that.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, he does.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then the gold reserve of the government is taken by this private institution and the gold reserves not required by the private banks are also taken. What particular power has this private institution? My hon. friend is worrying for fear his business will be injured with a change of government, but the fact is that he will not be able to borrow a sou from this bank. The only corporations that can borrow are the governments of the day. I do not see anything very drastic or striking in that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has not this bank the power to rediscount the bills of commercial organizations?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, it has.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have never discovered that in the bill. It is to have power to do business with the federal and provincial governments and the banks. I am speaking without full information because the bill has been amended since I gave it some considerable attention.

Mr. EULER: This bank will not directly rediscount any commercial bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then it takes the place of the Bank Act in regulating the private institutions.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member should read paragraph (h) of section 21.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is to have complete control of the note issues. I am not quarreling about that; I am merely mentioning these things in passing. My own position is that this institution should not lend to any government, federal or provincial; it should do its business with the private banks so long as they remain private banks and carry on the commercial business of the country. This view is not shared by many of the hon. members with whom I am associated, but I think such a safeguard could well be thrown around this institution. It would avoid what my hon. friend is complaining of. In the functioning of the central bank, as provided for in this bill, I cannot see why it should not be under government control. The Finance Act has functioned fairly successfully under the Minister of Finance and the government, and I cannot see any radical difference from the point of view of administration. Certainly I have never heard of politics being played in connection with it.

My hon. friends have had a good deal to say lately—and I hope that we shall have some occasion to discuss the matter—with regard to the political control of the national railways. I would point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that there is one thing that is lost sight of entirely in the discussion of railway matters and that is that in Canada at the present time, as well as over a considerable period in the past, practically from the inception of the control of the national railways by the government of the day, lower freight and passenger rates have prevailed in Canada than in the United States, and we have had the benefit of that. But you never hear a single individual voicing that opinion or saying anything about it; yet no one can estimate what that has meant to the people of this country. I should deplore political control of the national railways, but I do not think it seriously interferes with the national railways to change administration, to change the directors on a change of government so long as you have in charge men who are capable of managing that institution. I do not think there is anything very serious in a change of directors and therefore I do not view with alarm that aspect of the matter. But if we are to trade away the control we now have by setting up an institution which will perform these functions, then I am entirely opposed to putting it in any measure at all under private control—and not only private control but private ownership. I say this because I am convinced that the operation of the Finance Act has been carried out to the benefit of the whole country. It has functioned very acceptably, and if we are to set up another institution, even with additional powers, it should still be under the control of the government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Hon. gentlemen have questioned my statement that the central bank will have authority with regard to the rediscounting of commercial documents. Section 21 provides, in paragraph (h) of subsection 1 that the bank may buy and sell for rediscount bills of exchange and promissory notes endorsed by a chartered bank, and so on.

Mr. HOWARD: Endorsed, and who can rediscount them?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The central bank can rediscount them.

An hon. MEMBER: Through the chartered banks.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If this institution, as provided for in the preamble, is going to control the credit of the country, what does rediscounting mean? Suppose the bank, for political reasons refused to rediscount, as it would have the right to do.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is not that function performed by the Department of Finance at the present time?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No. The Department of Finance has no right and never has had to rediscount paper used in the production of agricultural commodities, lumber and timber and everything else. I confess that the banks to-day have, from firms with which I am connected, notes that may be rediscounted in this bank, and as far as I am concerned I am not going to risk the business of this country by having the rediscounting privilege granted this bank subject to political control.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver) negatived: yeas, 27; nays, 53.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan): Shall section 17 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Section agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER: I have an amendment to section 17.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan): Section 17 is carried.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No one heard it.

Mr. SPENCER: In the event of any difference arising, after the establishment of the central bank, between the government of the day and the bank, it should be possible for the government to step in and get control, and I wish to move as 17 (a) the following:

The minister may at any time call in the shares of stock held by the several shareholders on paying therefor the price at which such shares were issued by the minister, together with three months' interest.

I move that with the object of making it quite safe and acceptable for the bank to be taken over in case of need.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan): There is no seconder.

Mr. IRVINE: I second it.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this to be added as a new clause?

Mr. SPENCER: Clause 17(a).

Mr. BENNETT: Clause 17 has been properly declared to be carried and therefore this is a new clause not an amendment to clause 17. We are reverting to clause 2 and when clause 17 is again reached the proper course to take would be to move that this be added as clause 17(a).

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Governor and deputy governor.

Mr. RAYMOND: I desire to move an amendment to clause 6, subclause 2, by substituting in paragraph (a) the words "Canadian national" in place of "British subject." This amendment is seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dubuc).

In order to avoid any misunderstanding as to the meaning of "Canadian national," I wish to refer first to an act of parliament passed in 1921 defining a Canadian national. In that year Mr. Doherty, then Minister of Justice, thought it advisable to define by statute what constituted a Canadian national, and it was defined as follows:

The following persons are Canadian nationals, viz:—(a) any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act.

That is to say, who has Canadian domicile; and a Canadian domicile is acquired by having in Canada for at least five years a residence as his permanent abode.

I want to call the attention of members of the committee to the difference between clause 10, which deals with the qualification of the directors of the bank, and clause 6, which deals with the qualifications of the governor, the deputy governor and the assistant deputy governor. To be a director of the bank, one must be necessarily a British subject ordinarily resident in Canada, while in the case of the governor, the deputy governor and the assistant deputy governor, one need only be a British subject. In view of this difference it is obvious that the government had it in mind to select the three last mentioned officers from outside Canada and when the Prime Minister was attending the committee on banking and commerce he made no secret of it. To this I am opposed, and the purpose of my amendment is to ensure the appointment of a Canadian. Why should it be otherwise?

Mr. McINTOSH: Canada first.

Mr. RAYMOND: Clause 6 states that the governor and deputy governor shall be men of proven banking experience; under the bill, this is the only qualification required, so far as competency is concerned. Have we not in Canada men of proven banking experience? What are the facts? Not so long ago, while in the United States we had the alarming situation of every bank temporarily suspending payment, ours stood firm. While during the last ten years, more than 9,000 banks in the United States failed, is it not a significant fact that in Canada, during the last twenty years only one bank went into liquidation? Do not these facts sufficiently prove the ability and efficiency which have characterized the administration of our banks?

What took place in England from 1928 to 1931? The bankers of England and of the United States borrowed money from the bankers of France and made loans to Germany. Subsequently Germany repudiated her debts and the consequence is that large sums of money were lost by those bankers of England and the United States. No such thing has happened in Canada, and the least I can say is that we have no lesson to learn from those bankers.

More than that, Lord Macmillan, the head of the royal commission which conducted the investigation into our banking system, is reported as having expressed the view that Canadian bankers were men of integrity, high character and high efficiency. Why should we now question the capability of their management? The Prime Minister while before the committee on banking and commerce said: We have no Canadian with the necessary knowledge to operate a central bank.

Mr. BENNETT: Experience.

Mr. RAYMOND: I accept the correction of the Prime Minister. Let us deal with experience. I will refer him to the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada and read what those two prominent bankers, Lord Macmillan and Sir Charles Addis, have to say about the financial experience of our Canadian bankers. At page 67, sections 227 and 228, they say:

Regarding the vital importance to such an institution of the quality of the governors and directorate. Experience, skill and integrity are required in the highest degree, and that, not only to ensure that the operations of the bank shall be wisely conducted, but also that the institution should win and maintain the confidence alike of the government, the people and the commercial banks.

I ask the Prime Minister to follow this:

228. We have no reason to suppose from our discussions with leaders in Canadian finance and industry that these qualities are lacking in Canada.

They continue:

On the contrary, we are convinced that there are resources of intelligence combined with experience—

Do not forget that.

—and public spirit fully adequate to ensure the successful management of a central bank. It is true that the conduct of central banking operations requires a technique and an outlook somewhat removed from those of commercial banking; but this fact has had to be faced in every country which in recent years has established a central bank, and Canada appears to us not less well but better equipped than many other countries have been to provide the necessary administrative talent.

I ask the Prime Minister, why this lack of confidence in his fellow citizens? Why does he not follow the opinion of those two prominent bankers that he borrowed from England to advise him? With those facts and those opinions, are we going to say officially, and by an act of parliament, that we have no Canadians with the necessary experience to manage a central bank? If in spite of the opinion of Lord Macmillan and Sir Charles Addis, the Prime Minister thinks we have no men in Canada with the necessary experience to manage a central bank, I shall ask why he appointed three Canadians on the royal commission for the special purpose of considering the advisability of establishing a central banking institution in Canada? If they did not know about central banking, if they had no experience, they were not competent advisers. And with respect to special experience for specific matters, when the Prime Minister was called to form a cabinet what experience had he as prime minister? Yet our hon. friends opposite have been boasting that he is the best prime minister we ever had in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RAYMOND: There is a man here who although modest does not disagree, and that is the Prime Minister himself. What experience had the present deputy minister of finance before he was appointed? He was a good professor in a university, but he had no experience as deputy minister. What experience in railway management had Hon. Mr. Fullerton, who was on the high court bench for many years, and who is now chairman of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways? And I could cite many other examples.

I shall go a step further. Having in mind the very purpose of this act which according to its preamble is:

—to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation... and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion;

—having in mind the absolute powers granted by this act to the governor, who, referring to section 7:

—shall on behalf of the board have the direction and control of the business of the bank;

—having also in mind the constitution of the executive committee, which according to section 13:

—shall be competent to deal with any matter within the competence of the board ...

—and considering that the executive committee is composed of the governor, the deputy governor and one director; having in mind all those facts, I do not hesitate to say that if we want to achieve the end proposed by this bill, we should appoint a Canadian to manage this bank. To act in the best interests of a nation one must know those interests thoroughly. To promote, as expressed in the preamble, the economic and financial welfare of the dominion, one must know the economic conditions of this country. As the Prime Minister said, conditions vary from one country to another. They are not the same here as they are in England. And there are many other factors which have to be taken into consideration.

If this bank is to operate for the benefit of Canada and no other country, it is essential that those who manage it should know best what is good for Canada, that they should be persons who know the domestic and industrial requirements of the country. Canadian financial men are more competent to deal with such matters than any distinguished gentlemen from outside who do not know our local conditions. We want directors and officers who always have in mind the welfare of the dominion, rather than of someone else or the interests of some other country. We have read the letter written by Lord Beaverbrook in which he said that the charters of the banks should not be renewed unless advances were made by them to some private enterprise in which he is interested. Is this Bank of Canada going to be run from London? Is it going to be a branch of the Bank of England, dominated by the Bank of England? Is it to be at the mercy of some group or individual who will dictate its policy for purposes quite foreign to our own interests? The determination of our credit and financial policy should be vested in the hands of Canadians, who are best acquainted with the needs of Canada. We have in Canada distinguished Canadian bankers, thoroughly versed in the economic and banking conditions of the country, who have intimate knowledge of our needs, and it will be not only to the detriment of Canada but an insult to Canadian citizens if we appoint officers from outside Canada to manage this bank.

Mr. DUBUC: In supporting this motion I shall add but one word, directing the attention of the committee to the important fact that the economic control of the country means unquestionably the political control. Canadians certainly can buy the experience that it has been said in the committee that possibly none of us possess. The board of directors of all our banks, which have had the success mentioned here to-day, have found general managers and men to administer those banks who had experience which the directors did not have. Surely this central bank, which is to be the foundation of the entire fabric of our economic life, should be controlled nationally and not privately. The management is to be in the hands of the committee of three; the board of directors will only give them advice. If those three gentlemen, or two of them, are from another country, surely the danger is great. Canadians should always preserve autonomy in and keep control of our economic affairs, because to fail to do so would also mean the abandonment and loss of our political autonomy. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important fact to which I invite the attention of this parliament and of the public of Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: I have listened with some interest to the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite. At the moment we are not appointing gentlemen to fill any offices. There is a limitation placed by the bill upon the nationality of the person or persons who may be appointed to such offices. I think the only desire that animated those who prepared the bill was to provide this country with the best possible officers in the first years of the bank's operation. Not many years ago, when the city of Paris installed electric tramways, it sent to Montreal for a man skilled in the operation of electric railways, one Duncan McDonald, who went to Paris and there carried out in a thoroughly satisfactory way the organization of that system. We have frequently had to go beyond our own frontiers to find skilled and experienced men to guide our enterprises in their infancy. Hon. gentlemen will recall that when the Canadian Pacific Railway was founded those who were interested in its management sent to the United States and brought here Mr. Van Horne and Mr. Shaughnessy, afterwards Lord Shaughnessy. They will also recall that just a few years ago, when the best man available was being sought to coordinate the Canadian National railways, hon. gentlemen opposite, despite the fact that in Canada we had great experience in railway matters, deemed it wise to go to Great Britain to find Sir Henry Thornton.

Mr. RAYMOND: Do you consider that was a success?

Mr. HACKETT: That may have depended upon the quality of judgment which was exercised by those who were in office, but it by no means undermines the principle by which that selection was made. That principle is all that is at stake here. We are seeking to get people who have experience in the administration of an organization of this kind, and for that reason it has not been restricted to Canada where such an organization never has been operated, and where it may be said no one, however skilled he may be in commercial banking, has ever had the duty of operating a central bank. These, I think, are some reasons which might well be considered by the committee when determining what form this section should take.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I intend to say only a few words. I do deprecate the introduction into this discussion on every occasion of matters such as that raised by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond). When it is not the Bank of England it is something else, always something savouring of nationalism.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Canada first.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, and I shall presently point out exactly what that means. It is so evident that this is done in a desire to obscure discussion by appeals to prejudice, which I think is to be very much deprecated. The red thread runs through this whole discussion, and I see it with dismay and regret.

I have listened to this discussion with regard tc Canadians. I think probably I have as high regard for Canadian ability as any man in this committee, and I have acted upon that opinion. But occasionally governments desire to have a dispassionate view of a situation. That was in the mind of the right hon. leader of the opposition when Sir Andrew Rae Duncan was brought here for the purpose of making a report on matters of transcendent importance to three provinces. He was chairman; his recommendations involved this country in very large annual expenditures. The successful effort to bring him here was not criticized, I am bound to say, and when the right hon. gentleman chose Sir Henry Thornton as head of the railways that choice met with the approval of at least one member of this chamber in addition to himself; that was myself. Sir Henry Thornton was a naturalized British subject, but not a resident of Canada. But I have higher authority than that, which I am sure will appeal to the hon. member for Beauharnois. I hold in my hand a speech made on the lottery issue by Premier Taschereau of Quebec, and in the next to last paragraph I find these words:

> I do not know how we would organize if allowed to have a lottery. We could perhaps have a man attached to the French national lottery come here and advise us as to the organization work here.

Mr. HANBURY: He would not necessarily leave him in control for many years.

Mr. BENNETT: If those who are now speaking will permit the hon. member for Beauharnois to ask his question I should be glad to answer it.

Mr. RAYMOND: I did not know that Premier Taschereau had taken the trouble of going to someone else for advice, as the Prime Minister did in this case, when he asked the advice of Lord Macmillan as to the experience of our Canadian financial men.

Mr. BENNETT: I am just about to finish the quotation; I have not read the part of it in which I am particularly interested:

> That was the procedure that we adopted when we created our system of provincial statistics, which is the best in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: To get advice.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly the basis of what I am endeavouring to say. The hon. gentleman has said that we have bankers in Canada who are equal to any bankers in the world. Yet there is not one general manager of a bank in Canada who would undertake this position. I put it to them in the committee; I asked them right then and there, and what is more I know it, not from hearsay but from definite statements. They are of the opinion that we have no one in this country yet trained in central bank experience, and if Mr. Taschereau found it necessary to send to Paris to get someone to teach him how to gather statistics, with all the men we have in this country trained in audits and statistics, with all the magnificent brains we have and the certificates they have obtained from various parts of the country; if the premier of Quebec found it necessary to establish his system by bringing in someone from France, would it be a violation of sound judgment if someone assisted these men to establish the central bank?

Mr. HANBURY: Is that the reason—

Mr. BENNETT: The jumping jacks might sit down; I was not pushing the button at that moment.

Now just one further word. This act contemplates a successful central bank; this act contemplates the central bank being placed, in the first instance, in charge of someone who has some knowledge or experience in that regard. I should like to know what experience any banker in Canada has had with regard to central banks. I have asked every general manager who has had to do with the management of these banks, and not one of them has had any experience nor yet understands and realizes all that is involved in central banks. In commercial banking our bankers are equal to any in the world; in fact the large United States banks draw from the personnel of our chartered banks from time to time because of their high qualities, their experience and their training. But when it comes down to the question of a central bank we have no one that can lead. Whoever undertakes the responsibility as head of this central bank must have some knowledge in the first instance in order to give whatever Canadian is appointed the necessary and requisite experience to carry on his job. Just as Mr. Taschereau had to send to France to get someone to teach him statistics so it is proposed, by this government at least, that someone shall teach Canadians how to carry on with respect to central banks.

It is intended that this bank shall be managed, controlled and operated by Canadians; it has no more relation to the Bank of England than any other central bank in the world has to that bank. It will have to do business with the Bank of England; to hon. gentlemen opposite that is an offence. It will have to do business with the Bank of France, with the Bank of Germany, with the Bank of Austria and with the central banks of all the countries of the world with which the trade and commerce of Canada is carried on. Without anticipating the appointment I can only say that whoever undertakes this work, whoever is appointed, must get experience. He will have to spend some time after his appointment in studying central bank conditions throughout the world. He will have to learn what is to be done and how it is to be done. There is no contact between the management of the central bank and the individual except as he is affected by the policies of the central bank. If hon. gentlemen opposite had taken the trouble to inquire into the relations between the Bank of France and the provincial and city banks of France and between the Bank of England and the chartered banks of that country, as I have, I think they would realize that the qualities required in the governor of a central bank are just as far removed from the qualities required of the successful general manager of a commercial bank as are the qualities that fit a lawyer, for instance, to give legal advice as compared with one who has had no experience or training in the law at all. Why do we seek technicians? Why do we ask the assistance of technicians—not brain trusts, but technicians? Why do we do that? Because their training fits them to give advice which may be of assistance. I say to this committee, frankly, that this bank could not successfully be established without some training and assistance being given, training derived by the gentleman who is appointed spending his time in securing it, or assistance given for a limited time by someone who has knowledge of it. It could not otherwise successfully be created or set up. About that fact bankers have no doubt—none of them. And these same bankers to whom the hon. member for Beauharnois referred, tell me that there are not in this country the trained minds to set up a central bank. And there is not one of them, I challenge the hon. gentleman—not a general manager in this country—but who will say that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Rough on our bankers.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit of it.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before this amendment is put to a vote I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymand) not only upon his proposal but upon the argument he put forth in its support. I might say that the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) at the opening of his speech do not lessen in any way the value of the proposal and argument of the hon. member for Beauharnois. It is unfortunate that an hon. member cannot suggest something of this kind without being charged with arousing prejudices. As far as I am concerned, I intend to support this proposal in spite of the charges made.

What is wrong with the proposal? The bill provides that the directors of this bank must be Canadians; the shareholders must be Canadians, and the hon. member for Beauharnois is simply asking that the same principle should apply to the governor and deputy governor. Section 14 of the bill gives supreme authority to the governor. No decision of the board of directors can have any value unless it is approved by the governor; he is the supreme master. Surely when such powers are being given to an institution, powers such as were mentioned this afternon and are enumerated in the preamble, it should not be considered as extraordinary to ask that these officers should be Canadians. Is there anything new in this proposal? My right hon. friend referred to nationalism in connection with this matter, but I should like to refer him to a book entitled Central Banks by Kisch and Elkin. In looking through this publication I find that the charter of the national bank of Yugoslavia provides that the governor and deputy governors must be subjects of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia and reside in Belgrade. In Italy, all the members of the board, the general manager and his deputy must be Italian subjects. In Germany, the president and the members of the managing board must be Germans. The same provision will be found in the charters of other central banks, and such a provision is not unreasonable in connection with this bank.

We are vesting in this institution powers which concern the economic life of our country. It is to look after credit, currency, employment and practically everything concerning our economic life. We are even giving to the bank certain powers which are now in the hands of the government. We are taking from the government certain powers which are very important and placing them in the hands of this institution. Under these circumstances, I think that any self-respecting people would see that the men who are to have supreme control over such an institution should be citizens of their own country. Anyone who makes such a proposal to the House of Commons of Canada should not be charged with arousing prejudices. I do not think my right hon. friend was serious when he compared this matter with the fact that Mr. Taschereau of Quebec had stated that before a lottery was set up he would have someone in France acquainted with the operation of lotteries come over and advise him. I have no objection to the governor or the board of directors of this bank calling for expert advice from England or anywhere else, but I do object to the governor or the deputy governor of this bank not being Canadians. When my right hon. friend stated that this central bank probably would have to do business with the Bank of England, the Bank of France, the Bank of Italy and other banks, he was offering a strong argument for the appointment of a Canadian and not someone from the Bank of England. As the bill now stands, I assume it would have to be a gentleman from the Bank of England because he must be a British subject. I do not see where my right hon. friend could get a governor with sufficient experience except from the Bank of England, but I still contend that the governor and deputy governor should be Canadians. There are Canadians who are qualified for these positions just as they are qualified to be prime minister of Canada.

Mr. RINFRET: I am sorry to have to prolong this debate, but in a few words I desire to place myself on record as being in favour of this amendment. May I say in all sincerity that I was amazed to find out this afternoon that at least some part of a speech of Mr. Taschereau had convinced the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). Apparently the speech as a whole did not mean much to him, but he took a few sentences which suited his purpose in connection with this bill. I agree with the opinion of the Minister of Justice—

An hon. MEMBER: The former Minister of Justice.

Mr. RINFRET: —the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and the future Minister of Justice, that there is no comparison to be made between the organization of a lottery in Canada and this very important institution. It might as well be said that because we import coaches to teach cricket to the sportsmen of this country, or, as has been the habit lately, American coaches for rugby, this would be an argument in favour of the governor of the central bank being a British subject. He would probably be from England and this bank would be an annex of the Bank of England.

In a further section it is provided that the governor, the deputy governor and the assistant deputy governor are to be appointed for seven years. It is true there is a reservation that the first governor may be appointed by the government for a shorter period; but if I am to judge by the remarks made this afternoon by the Prime Minister, and if we are remiss in anything connected with central banking operations in Canada, I am very much afraid that what the Prime Minister has in mind is not only to appoint a man from Great Britain to be governor, but that very likely he will allow his term to run the full period of seven years, as provided in the bill. This concerns not only the governor but also the deputy governor and the assistant deputy governor. So that this is not going to be a central bank of Canada but rather a branch in Canada of the Bank of England.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Bank of England in Canada.

Mr. RINFRET: If we deal with banks in other countries we shall therefore be in a very humiliating position when it is found that the representatives of this country on the central bank of Canada had to be imported from somewhere else because we have no one in Canada who could undertake the duties.

The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond) has quoted from the commission which led to the establishment of this bank. I am quite convinced that we have in Canada bankers who are fully equipped to undertake the work. They might be advised by experts, as suggested, but it is not so much the technique of central banking that is important as it is the influence that will be vested in these gentlemen; and I think that influence should remain wholly Canadian. The Prime Minister has said that the bankers themselves have suggested that there is no one able to take the position.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is no evidence of that.

Mr. RINFRET: Well, I know of many bankers in Montreal who would advise the Prime Minister to drop the bill altogether. But he will take the advice of such bankers as suits his purpose, in the same way as he has culled a few sentences from Mr. Taschereau's speech because they happen to suit him. He will not pay any attention, however, to anyone except those who advise him to do the very things that he has defied them to do before taking their advice. We are taking the proper stand to-night and I congratulate my good friend from Beauharnois on his amendment. If there is any institution in Canada that should be Canadian, that institution in my opinion is the proposed Bank of Canada; otherwise Bank of Canada is a misnomer and will lead us nowhere. Personally, owing probably to my environment in Montreal, I have no strong faith in this institution, but that faith will be weakened if I find that it is not a Canadian bank at all but merely a branch of a bank in some other part of the empire.

May I point this out further without any desire to offer personal criticism. I think that if this amendment had not been moved the house would not have been aware that the Prime Minister had already decided not to appoint a Canadian to the position. That is very much the case with this government in many other instances; unless they are pressed by our opposition we are not told what certain measures actually involve. In this instance, if it were only that it brought out a clear statement from the Prime Minister that he would not appoint a Canadian banker to the position of governor, I think the amendment was worth while and I hope that the committee will vote affirmatively on it. Indeed, it deserves exactly the same vote as the one we had this afternoon on the introduction of another bill; we should be unanimous in our desire that the governor of the central bank should be a Canadian.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The four speakers on this side who have previously spoken in favour of the amendment are all from the province of Quebec. I assure the committee that, coming from British Columbia, I am in full accord with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond). And I speak not only as a western Canadian but as a Scottish-born Canadian when I say I have no desire to tie up the Bank of Canada as an apanage of the Bank of England.

Mr. McINTOSH: You are no colonial.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were two gentlemen of the Bank of England —Messrs. Kershaw and Fisher—who accompanied the Macmillan commission on its travels throughout Canada. After the mission was completed a dinner was given for Lord Macmillan in Canada House in England and very significant statements were made there in regard to the future governance of the Bank of Canada and the dominance of Bank of England policies in our Canadian bank.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not correct. Just read what was said.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am quoting from Hansard, page 1319.

Mr. BENNETT: From what?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): From Hansard, to which reference had been made.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman made a statement in regard to what was said in Canada House. I ask him to read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to produce the press extract on a future occasion for the benefit of the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman's statement is not correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): These two gentlemen, I say, accompanied the commission throughout Canada. They were never mentioned in the press nor were their activities heralded, and so far as I am concerned I want this Bank of Canada to be a Canadian-controlled bank and Canadian-directed, by a Canadian. My right hon. friend made the cry of Canada first ring from shore to shore in this dominion in 1930. So far as this Bank of Canada is concerned, I say Canada only and all for Canada. The right hon. gentleman this afternoon mentioned some statement of Premier Taschereau in regard to lotteries.

Mr. BENNETT: With regard to statistics.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Statistics—

Mr. BENNETT: And lotteries.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I took down the Prime Minister's statement as he spoke and I shall be borne out by Hansard, that he used the word "lotteries" in connection with the quotation he made in this house. He said that Premier Taschereau had imported someone from another country to advise him.

An hon. MEMBER: Would import.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would import. Now, I agree with the Prime Minister in this, that if there is necessity for technical experts in connection with the Bank of Canada expert advice should be given, and we will support him to the limit in getting from the Bank of England or the Bank of France or any other central bank all the technical advisers, at good salaries, who are necessary for the inauguration of the Bank of Canada. But we do say that a bank that is going to control $107,000,000 of the people's gold; a bank that is going to take over $40,000,000 from the private banks of Canada; a bank that is going to have securities amounting to $63,000,000, on which the taxpayers of Canada are going to pay $1,800,000 a year in interest; a bank that is going to take over deposits of chartered banks at five per cent; a bank that will have a total asset value on the day it opens its doors of over $300,000,000, is an institution over which no Englishman or Scotchman or anyone else but a Canadian should be in control.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am an English Canadian and proud of the fact, but I do not think that nationality should enter into the question. I think the soundest approach is the practical approach. I do not care where we get the first governor of the Bank of Canada so long as he knows his business. I would like to know where civilization would have been were it not for a good Frenchman by the name of Pasteur. I have kicked around this world quite a bit. I remember a Scotchman who was chief of a dockyard in Singapore out in the East Indies. If I recall correctly, on one or two previous occasions the late Sir Henry Thornton was criticized because he was a naturalized British subject. He was brought from Great Britain to this country because it was considered that he was one of the greatest railroad men in the world, and I believe the former Liberal government was absolutely sound in that appointment no matter what opinions there may be to the contrary.

I would like to point out to the committee that one of the directors of the Bank of England at the moment is a good Canadian by the name of Peacock, and the people of this country should be proud of him. I am not unmindful of the possibility that there may be an effort by the Bank of England to dominate this country financially, but that problem lies squarely upon the doorstep of the Canadian people and we should not permit any such thing to happen. In our approach to this problem on the basis of high policy, might I say, we should get the best man procurable, and if it is necessary to go to Great Britain, let us go there just the same as we did in connection with the Canadian National Railways.

I have heard in debates in this house criticisms of the national railways of this country, but I think it has been one of the fundamental driving forces that has placed Canada in the position in which it is to-day. I am not inclined to agree with those who say that we have overbuilt in the matter of railways.

If you read the history of the situation of European countries to-day, you will find that the fact that they are infinitely worse off than we are has been brought about largely by lack of transportation. I make that observation because I think we should approach this problem on a high plane, having in mind the fact that the bank is being established and if it is necessary to go to England for the first governor I do not see any objection to doing so.

Mr. BENNETT: I feel I must make one or two observations. In the first place I did not say to-day that a Canadian would not be appointed governor; I said that there was no Canadian among the bankers of Canada at present qualified to be appointed governor, and I was so informed by the bankers themselves. It does not follow from that that a Canadian will not be appointed and will so acquire knowledge to carry on the functions of his office. It is unfortunate that we should be asked to accept an amendment which would prevent the appointment to that position of a man like Mr. Peacock, assuming that he would be available, a man who went from Canada, trained in London, became a director of the Bank of England, and yet under the amendment moved by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond) could not be appointed. In the same way nobody else who had been born in Canada and gone elsewhere to acquire his training would be available. This would be the same as saying that you cannot take as president of a university of this country any person other than someone who lives here, the same as saying that your doctor, the man you consult with respect to your own physical condition, must necessarily be a Canadian and nothing else.

Perhaps I have as high an opinion of Canadians as have most men, and I know as much of their attainments and qualifications. When I made the observations I did this afternoon I made them in the light of exact knowledge of qualifications and attainments of members of the banking fraternity who would be available for the position. I endeavoured to make it clear to the committee it well might be that a Canadian might be appointed if he had sufficient time to acquire the necessary knowledge and information to discharge the duties of governor of this bank, but in any event he would have to be assisted by someone who had knowledge.

It seems to me that it is not an edifying spectacle in dealing with a situation of this kind to have the suggestion that we should by law enact that men of the type I mention should not be available for the position and that willy-nilly, fit or unfit, failure or success, we should take for this position men whose residence in Canada would be the sole determining factor if they were good bankers although they knew nothing of central banks. In other words, you do not consult a doctor when you desire to be advised on a question of law, and you do not consult a lawyer when you desire to improve your physical condition. When it is necessary to appoint someone for the purpose of discharging the duties of governor I can only assure the committee that the appointment will be a man who will be well able to discharge those functions, and he must necessarily have knowledge in the first instance. It is no good talking about technical assistance and advice, because there must be under those circumstances one with knowledge with the deputy governor and the assistant deputy governor to enable the business of the bank to be carried on. Every sentence that has been uttered here during the last few minutes magnifying the importance of the office is at the same time a striking illustration of the necessity of having the best man possible available.

I mentioned in the committee what has been reported to have been said by the late J. P. Morgan when he came back from Europe when it was suggested that New York should become the money centre of the world. He said that first of all it was necessary for them to get the men to do the job. They speak of the Bank of England and the advice given to it. Who is one of its advisers? A distinguished American who advised the United States on the matter of the federal reserve bank and things of that kind. There were English and French advisers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Advice—we agree with that.

Mr. BENNETT: You cannot advise a man who knows nothing of a matter; he has first to learn something of the rudiments of central banking. You do not appoint a doctor to the bench; you appoint a lawyer; you do not appoint to the position of professor of physiology an eminent lawyer. Banking is a special branch of human endeavour; it is disposed of very simply under two heads. First, we have the commercial banker and, second, the man who has knowledge of central banking. That knowledge can be derived only from countries where there are central banks. I resent very bitterly the observation made in the house that this bank is being created to be an adjunct to the Bank of England. Why is that statement made? There is not the slightest evidence upon which to found it. Why do they say it? Why is that statement being made in this country? Show me a shred of evidence upon which to found it? Why did the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), a former mayor of Montreal, say in this chamber that this bank is to be a branch of the Bank of England? What is the purpose of saying that without a shred of evidence? Why did he say it? I ask him why he said it. The country wants to know why he said it. Why do other hon. gentlemen say it? Why did the hon. member for Vancouver Centre say it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Because these two gentlemen travelled on the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, the fact that these two gentlemen were members of a commission appointed to study the banking situation in this country and to assist in digesting the evidence taken, is evidence that this bank is to be a branch of the Bank of England. Imagine a member of the legal profession saying that. When the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was asked by the Rockefeller Institute to go to the United States to advise in certain matters, was there any question about that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We heard about it many times.

Mr. CASGRAIN: During the election they played politics with it.

Mr. BENNETT: That might well be, and it is quite obvious then why this is now being said with respect to this other matter. After Lord Macmillan returned to the old country a dinner was given to him by the Canada Club. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre said, in Canada House; it was not in Canada House. That is mistake number one. Secondly he said that the speeches made at that dinner indicated that this bank was subject to the domination of the Bank of England.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister said I was asked to advise by the Rockefeller Institute; it was the Rockefeller Foundation, not the institute.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Another mistake.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, as long as it was something that bore the name Rockefeller that is sufficient. I corrected that statement only for the purpose of directing attention to the fact that on the return of the chairman of that commission a dinner was tendered to him by the members of the Canada Club, the oldest of the Canadian clubs in England, and the speeches there, as reported in the London Times, did not indicate that there was any suggestion on the part of anyone that there was domination of the situation by the Bank of England. And Mr. Fisher and Mr. Kershaw, to whom reference has been made, were men not sent by the Bank of England but men whom Sir Charles Addis and Lord Macmillan asked to accompany them to act as digesters of the evidence. That is all. There was no secret about it; I saw them here. They were present at the final dinner given to Lord Macmillan by myself. I asked other hon. gentlemen to be present and they were there; they know the speeches that were made on that occasion. I say to this committee that I regard it as a terrible thing to think that this country cannot put on the statute book provision for a central bank without having members rise in this house and say that it is intended to be an adjunct to the Bank of England. Is that an economic argument or just a political argument? Is it intended to serve any useful purpose or to create prejudice? Does it advance anything, does it serve any purpose except to create prejudice in the minds of the people, to say that this bank is to be a branch of the Bank of England?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister, when throughout the general election he spoke continuously of Canada first, was he appealing to prejudice or to patriotism?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is very simple; he acted upon what he spoke. What is more, the report of the speech made by the right hon. gentleman in Barrie, Ontario, when for the sake of appealing to the few descendants of British settlers in that community he said that Mr. Bennett was talking Canada first, was that calculated to advance the relation between communities?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Half a dozen times that misstatement has been corrected in this house and yet it is repeated. Why does the Prime Minister continue to thresh old straw?

Mr. BENNETT: But I say I do stand for Canada first, on all occasions. And what is more, in the centre of the empire I made my position clear. About that there need be no uncertainty, because I believe I can best serve the British Empire by serving that dominion of it in which I live, namely Canada. I believe that is the best way it can be done. I said this afternoon, and I repeat it, that I left with the then Prime Minister a memorandum saying that I believed that Sir Henry Thornton was eminently well qualified to be the head of our Canadian railways. Without hesitancy I say that. I had just returned from London and I left that memorandum with the then Prime Minister. That does not in any sense indicate that I have not full confidence in Canadians. I think it was the right hon. gentleman himself who once said that at least on a question of brains there was no boundary line between countries.

An hon. MEMBER: Internationalism.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a question of internationalism, it is a question of countries requiring the services of men specially qualified. Sir William Osler did much to establish Johns Hopkins; other eminent Canadians have done much in the realm of medicine in other lands. Canadian lawyers have made great places for themselves on the bench in other countries. Men from Great Britain have attained to high places in the banking world, and we are now told that these men should not be selected for any position here because they do not live here.

Now the distinction between directors and governors is so simple that it does not require much discussion. The directors, from the very nature of things, have to be Canadians, for this is a Canadian bank. It might well be that the qualification as a British subject will be the only qualification that will ensure either one of the three positions being filled by some person with the requisite experience to give this bank a start. How about the great banks established in this country in the early days; how many of them were started by men born outside of this country, the men who founded and established them and made them what they are? If the law now proposed had been in force they could not have held their positions.

Mr. POWER: They had their interests in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: No, they were brought here to take the positions.

Mr. POWER: The Bank of Montreal?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say the Bank of Montreal; I said great banks established here in the early days. I could name great Scotsmen—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the colonial period.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not the colonial period by any means. And as we make progress we have to call upon those who are British subjects. The hon. member for Quebec East referred to Italian subjects, German subjects, we say British subjects. Since when has it been an offence to be a British subject? Since when is it an offence for any Canadian institution to be able to draw upon the great reservoir of knowledge that is in the centre of this empire with respect to international banking?

Mr. SANDERSON: That was not the policy of the Prime Minister in the election of 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: No man in this committee can point to any utterance of mine that favoured placing any embargo upon brains being utilized from any country.

I continue to point out that section 6 is essential for this bank to function. I desire in the most unequivocal terms to say that no relation, direct or indirect, understood or otherwise, by implication or in any other way, between the Bank of England and the proposed Bank of Canada, is possible. The Bank of England is a great central bank and it discharges great functions with all the banks of the world. It will have to do business with the Dominion of Canada, but there is no question of suzerainty, no question of subordination, no question of control. I just want to ask this committee one question: Having heard the ex-mayor of Montreal (Mr. Rinfret) say he was opposed to a central bank and that if I asked the opinion of those who were bankers in Montreal I would not proceed with the establishment of a central bank, is he unmindful of the fact that his own party was committed to that policy? The difficulty is that he cannot understand any party preparing a bill and submitting it to this parliament that involves just what is involved in this bill for the good of the Canadian people regardless of what the great financial interests of this country may say. That is the real difficulty. All you have to do is to read the first few pages of the book by Kisch and Elkin to find exactly why this afternoon I put it to this committee that a government controlled bank does involve political intrigue, as they point out, and one of them at least is regarded as one of the most outstanding authorities in the world on the subject. Such influences lead to chaos and disaster. That is the way he puts it. We have seen an example in this house since three o'clock of what would happen if this had been a publicly owned bank.

Mr. RINFRET: Inasmuch as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has directed some remarks—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RINFRET: Possibly I may be allowed to reply right away to what the Prime Minister has said; as the right hon. gentleman made reference to me, I think it is only proper that I should reply.

I will say in the first place that the very heat displayed by the Prime Minister shows that he at last realizes the importance of the question raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond), because I have noticed from past performances that the less secure the Prime Minister feels about some attitude or measure the more likely he is to try to drown us under the waters of his indignation. When he points to me and wants to put questions to me because I took the stand in this house—I did it very briefly—that we might perhaps have a Canadian governor for a Canadian bank, and thinks he is going to embarrass me by having me explain to the country why I feel that way, well, my reply is that when we get to the country—and we would like to go there very soon—he will have to explain much more than I shall about this very measure.

I did say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not feel very strongly myself in favour of a central bank, and that in Montreal quite a proportion of the people feel the same way. But my right hon. friend did not understand my argument properly. He said he was following the advice of bankers in not appointing a Canadian governor of this bank.

Mr. BENNETT: I made no such statement.

Mr. RINFRET: The great embarrassment, in replying to the Prime Minister, is that we can never stop him at a certain point. I appeal to the committee if the Prime Minister did not state that on the advice of bankers he was aware that there was no Canadian able to fill this position, and my retort was that if he followed the advice of certain bankers he would not have this bill at all. That was all. There is no reason to get up in the air because of that; it is a well known fact.

My right hon. friend seemed to be under the impression that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and myself were the only ones to have any suspicion that this bank might be regarded as we suggested. Let me tell him that in Montreal it is current rumour on St. James and Notre Dame streets that this bank is intended to be an adjunct of the Bank of England. I am not speaking for myself; I am saying that this is the common opinion expressed on the streets of the city of Montreal. I want to be kind to the Prime Minister, because I have a very high regard for him. The best way to dispel that suspicion which exists not only in the minds of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and myself but also in the minds of a great number of people in this country, would be to appoint a Canadian governor. If my right hon. friend will do that he will wipe out that suspicion. I am not raising any prejudice; I am being kind enough to bring that prejudice to the attention of the Prime Minister. I am giving him a chance to make good before this bill is adopted. Really I think the Prime Minister is ungrateful for the very kind advice we are giving him to-night.

Mr. MacINNIS: As a native-born Canadian and I assure the committee it was an accident as far as I was concerned—I think it is very poor statesmanship to take up the time of the committee with a question of this kind. This afternoon we were discussing whether the central bank should be owned nationally or privately, and the question came to a vote. One of the arguments against public ownership and control was that politics might enter into it. I do not hold with that argument, but I believe those who brought it forward could exhibit this discussion as proof that the argument was good.

What is the purpose of the national bank? I think the intention is to use it to improve the economic life of this country. Then if by importing, if you like, a governor and a deputy governor from somewhere else, we can do the job better than we can do it ourselves —I am not saying that would be necessary— for goodness sake let us leave it open to the government to take advantage of that opportunity if it does become necessary. We want the very best administrator it is possible to get; if we have to get that administrator from somewhere else, let us bring him here to help us out. Many of us have gone to Rochester and consulted the Mayo Brothers when we were ill. Surely if we have done that we should not protest against getting the best advice possible in a matter of this kind. My only fear is that the bank may be used for the further exploitation of the people of Canada, as the private banks are used already, and if I am going to be exploited I am not particular whether the exploiter lives in Montreal or in London, England. From the evidence that has been given before the price spreads committee I notice that they can exploit the people in Montreal and Quebec as well as they can in London.

Arts and sciences are international, and to-day the science of banking is as exact as many of the other sciences. We should get the best and most efficient management possible regardless of where it comes from. The only thing on which we should be definite is that when these people come here they should be our servants and do what we tell them to do.

Mr. BOURASSA: It is to be regretted that on a matter of this importance and after practically the whole house has committed itself to the principle of this bill, a tone of passion should be introduced in dealing with this particular section. I suppose one must remember that we are very close to various provincial elections that have raised passions and the temper of parliament, and perhaps this debate is a forerunner of future speeches to be made in the federal arena. Being altogether disinterested, however, I venture to express an opinion entirely foreign to party considerations and, may I add, to racial considerations as well. I will deal immediately with the argument advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis), which to a certain extent coincided with the argument of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), that we should look first and exclusively to the matter of competence, and that national considerations should not be considered.

If that is the case, Mr. Chairman, why limit this to British subjects? If we substitute imperial nationalism for Canadian nationalism I do not see that we have reached our objective, because we may find in the United States, in Germany, in Italy or in Japan a man more competent to organize a central bank than any British subject at our disposal. If we confine it to British subjects it is because we consider that from a British point of view we should exclude the foreigner. But in order to maintain this institution in its proper character, as an intermediary between Canada and Great Britain and between Canada and the United States in financial matters, I think it is highly important that the directing head should be a Canadian. So far as technical advice is concerned I agree with the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). No one would blame the government for looking for the best experts to be found. I would go this length with the Prime Minister, that probably he would find in the Bank of England or the Bank of France, or perhaps even in the United States, some experts already familiar with the technical business with which this bank will have to deal.

But there is another aspect of the question. This bank will have practically supreme control over the economic activities of Canada. If it is important that the head of such an institution should be familiar with affairs in England or the United States or elsewhere, it is at least equally important that the same head should be very familiar with the affairs of Canada and should know the situation of the various classes in Canada. What is the present economic situation of agriculture, of industry, of trade in Canada? What are the present needs of the various classes of producers in Canada, in their dealings with the foreign world? I think the first duty of the governing body of this institution will be, in the very words of the Prime Minister,—words which I applauded when he uttered them and which in my heart to-day I still applaud—that the first duty of this governor and his board of directors will be to think of Canada first.

I can quite imagine, and it is even plausible, that if you borrow a gentleman from the Bank of England who has the traditional competency and sense of honour that those great English bankers have, most likely he would endeavour to consider his first duty was to Canada. But human nature is there. It has been well said that all the men who have been in the employ of such institutions as the Bank of England or, in the old days, the Hudson's Bay Company, or, in France, the Bank of France, are so imbued with the spirit and traditions of those great institutions that if they go out and serve other institutions they transport with them the spirit of the Bank of England or the spirit of the Bank of France. That is a well known fact, and it is to the great honour of those institutions, that they have instilled such a spirit in the minds and habits of their servants. But I repeat, from our Canadian point of view, in order to establish a proper kind of relationship either with the Bank of England or with the great financial institutions of the United States, is it best for us—is it even best for Great Britain—that an Englishman should be appointed governor to stand at the head of this Canadian institution? I do not think it is. I repeat, I do not think it is. I think that by force of influence, even with the most honest intention on his part to consider himself, at least for the time being, a servant of Canada, instinctively he would continue to have at heart the interests of the country he left, his country of origin, and of the great institution in that country of which he may have been a servant. Because if we want to borrow the most competent men in England we must take them from where they have acquired that competency for the managing of a central bank, and that means from the Bank of England.

To show that this was not out of the mind of Lord Macmillan and his English associates I shall point out one part of the Macmillan report. In the appendix to the report, in which there is drafted a skeleton of what the central bank should be, there is a short paragraph which struck me at once, innocent as I am of all technical knowledge in those matters, as a very dangerous one. Paragraph 13 stated:

> The bank should maintain a proportion of twenty-five per cent in gold and foreign exchange against its outstanding note issue and sight liabilities.

It immediately struck me that if the bill to be introduced by the government contained such a disposition with regard to the reserve, it would have enabled our central bank to export the whole of our gold either to London or to New York in exchange for foreign values. Everybody knows that the great struggle in the last fifteen years,—during the war first, but especially in the last fifteen years—has been between the Bank of England, the Bank of France and the Federal Reserve bank of the United States to control gold, to exchange for gold foreign issues or the issues of their own countries in order to accumulate as much gold as possible and thereby to dominate the financial situation of the world. Under a clause such as the one I have quoted, a board of directors, under the direction of an English governor, may well have been tempted, and perhaps for excellent reasons from the governor's point of view, to export the whole of our gold to London in order to strengthen the hand of the Bank of England and the British government, because in national matters the Bank of England and the British government mean the same thing. Although it is not officially a state owned bank, yet, with its old traditions of patriotism, and of service to the state, the Bank of England is as much, and perhaps more, a national institution than would be, in a country like this, a bank with a board of directors chosen by the government. So far as that is concerned, I do not know how I would have voted, but I think I should have been inclined to vote with the government against the appointment of directors by the government.

It will be the governor and the deputy governor who will rule this institution; let there be no mistake about that. The directors will be the advisers and will probably give a small portion of their time, but they will be devoted to other enterprises. The governor and the deputy governor will be the soul and body of this institution. Therefore, under those circumstances, I insist on what I have said, and I do not speak from a narrow nationalistic viewpoint which, in matters of this kind, should be set aside. The world is suffering too much from extreme and narrow nationalism. I might say that I for one, who for years and years have preached nationalism, have renounced it. I have not renounced the basic principles of nationalism, but I deprecate the practice of nationalism as it is propounded to-day in almost every country in the world. But, as between an extreme and narrow nationalism and the abandonment of all safeguards in the interests of the nation, of its economic life, of its policy,—because, unfortunately in these days economics dominate policy—we should not lay down the principle, first, that Canada is not capable of producing men to put at the head of an institution like this, and secondly that we have to go outside of this country but remain within the circle of the empire to find men to rule an institution which will have to deal—I hope always in friendship and amity—with the Bank of England or with the financial institutions of the other portions of the empire.

We know history and we know human nature. Occasions may present themselves whereby it may become the duty of this institution to resist the influence of the Bank of England, and perhaps to come to terms—I will not say an alliance—but to terms of understanding with other foreign institutions in order to resist the domination of the Bank of England, just as the Prime Minister himself and just as some of his predecessors, including Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to name only two of them, at times had to refer to outside influences to counteract the influence of the British government which wanted to impose upon them certain tenets of policies or certain measures of practical administration, especially in dealings with the foreign world. The so-called civilized world is dying from the fact that questions of money, questions of trade and questions of industry are at the forefront. The so-called civilized humanity and christianity have forgotten all the great principles which should govern national as well as international relations. But taking facts as they are, we must at the present time acknowledge the predominating influence of money, of national and international trade, of relations between consumers and producers, of balance of trade between countries. If by a closer understanding with Great Britain and the other British dominions we can better the financial and economic conditions of this country, and help them to better their own conditions, well and good. But surely it is not by putting a Canadian at the head of this institution that we could endanger our good relations with Great Britain. I agreed with the Prime Minister when he stated in London that he stood for Canada first. I do not say I agreed with the concrete proposals he put before the English people; but with the pronouncement he made at that time I fully agreed, and I applauded him as I applauded when his illustrious predecessor Sir Wilfrid Laurier made the same statement. I applauded him as I applauded his more immediate predecessor, Mr. Meighen, when on the question of the Japanese treaty he told the English government that he would not consent to a renewal of that treaty because it would be against the interests of Canada. It is the duty of every prime minister of Canada to stand for Canada first, as against England, against France or any other foreign country, provided he does not do that in a narrow spirit of selfish nationalism.

We are now creating the most important instrument in our economic life. We are endeavouring to centralize the forces of money and to bring our private banks under such discipline as will make them serve the interests of the country in preference to the interests of their shareholders or clients. Now that we are endeavouring—I do not say in a perfect way—to give some form of cohesion to our economic life, are we going to lay down the principle that the positions at the head of this most important part of our administrative machinery and organization are to be excluded to Canadians because a few bankers have stated that they do not think there is a Canadian competent enough? I do not ask the Prime Minister to betray any secrets, but it may be that the suggestion arose from the fact that the majority of the bankers do not want to see one of themselves at the head of this institution, because he would know too much about their trade. Perhaps that had something to do with the suggestion made. I believe that if all the directorships of all the private banks of Canada were abolished, many of those bankers would find themselves quite competent to direct the only bank that would remain. I do believe that this was the thought in the minds of the banking advisers of the Prime Minister; but I do not think he should give way to that advice.

As far as the technical advice is concerned, he is quite right. He would receive the approval of every true Canadian if he secured the best possible expert advice, either from England or elsewhere. If on that account he were attacked by French Canadians for not giving them enough positions in the bank, or by Ontario, British Columbia or any other section of the country, I should be the first to defend him. This is probably one of the reasons why the Prime Minister refused to make this a politically governed body. Let this board, with the approval and help of the government, import or invite from England —preferably from England because of the similarity between that country and Canada— or from elsewhere, the best advice obtainable. From a Canadian point of view, from a broad British point of view, from a sensible point of view in the interests of the Canadian people, I cannot agree with the idea expressed by the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. MacInnis) that this is similar to a consultation of the Rockefeller Institute by a sick man who wants advice. Neither do I think that the Prime Minister was true to himself when he quoted a portion of Mr. Taschereau's speech. Mr. Taschereau is an extremely clever man. I think the two ablest men we have in Canada at the present time, even with all their defects, are the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec. I really believe that, but should they begin to take arguments from one another, then I would distrust them. I would be in great disquietude about Canada if that were to happen. It is a good thing that they are opposed to one another.

We have Frenchmen, we have Germans, we have Norwegians in the public service of Canada. In the Department of the Secretary of State it has been necessary to employ foreigners in connection with naturalization matters; but would the Prime Minister appoint a foreigner or an Englishman in Doctor Skelton's place? Would the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) appoint an English lawyer in the place of his deputy? No, they would not, because in matters of this nature, apart altogether from a man's ability, he must know the real conditions of the country in which he lives and for which he exercises his powers. The responsibility of the governor and the deputy governor of this bank will be to Canada, and they should know first the conditions which prevail in Canada. They should have a sufficient knowledge of financial conditions the world over; they should take the best advice possible to obtain, but their main responsibility is to the Canadian people.

Amendment (Mr. Raymond) negatived: yeas, 37; nays, 79.

Section 6, paragraph (a), agreed to.

Paragraphs (b), (c), (d) and (e) agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Tenure of office.

Mr. COOTE: I have an amendment to propose to subsection 2. As it stands, this subsection reads:

> The first governor, deputy governor and assistant deputy governor shall be appointed and their salaries shall be fixed by the governor in council and thereafter appointments shall be made by the directors with the approval of the governor in council.

It seems to me that not only should the first governor and deputy governor be appointed by the governor in council but that their successors should also be so appointed. My reason for urging this, even though the committee has decided against public ownership, is that a certain section of the bill provides, as nearly as I can remember, that no resolution of the directors shall have any force or effect until approved by the governor of the bank. That gives the governor very great power, and this bank being in the nature of a national institution, I think the governor in council should appoint the governor and deputy governor. I move therefore that section 8 be amended by striking out the present subsection 2 and substituting therefor the following:

> The governor, deputy governor and assistant deputy governor shall be appointed and their salaries shall be fixed by the governor in council.

As amended, it provides simply for government appointment.

[Mr. Johnstone.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry we cannot accept the amendment. The proposal by which the deputy minister becomes a member of the board without a vote meets, I think, the situation to which the hon. gentleman refers, and the relationship between the government and the bank is sufficiently established to enable the bank to veto if it does not agree with the selection of the directors, and it would then select someone else. I rather disagree with what the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) this afternoon suggested, that directors do not exercise a great deal of influence. The fact is that directors do select the president and the executive officers in all the various corporations of the country. I am sure the hon. gentleman as a director takes part in all matters that affect the wellbeing of western Canadian loans in connection with the affairs of the Canada Life. I am sure he is not unheard; he must be. And so far as this is concerned, it is proposed that the directors shall exercise the same power and select their own governor, but it must be subject to the approval of the governor in council in order that there shall be observed that measure of continuity indicated this afternoon, without impairing the control of the directors over the executive officers of the bank. I was glad when it was arranged that the deputy minister should become a member without a vote, and this amendment would serve no useful purpose. It cannot therefore be accepted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What particular control would the governor in council have? If they exercised it, it would be against the decision of the board. After having delegated to the board all those powers which in my opinion should be retained by the governor in council, they would be in an unhappy position if they refused to accept the decision of the board.

Mr. BENNETT: It is for that reason that the arrangement contemplates the deputy minister being a member of the board.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Without a vote.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, without a vote; so that there would be a clear understanding in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred as to what action the board might propose to take.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am sorry I cannot agree with the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: In my happier days I never saw an occasion on which the question of the appointment of executive officers was determined by directors, when the matter was not well understood before the vote was actually taken. Yet I never saw any surprise manifested by anyone in respect of a matter of that kind. I have never known a board to propose that I should be president unless I knew about it and had expressed my willingness. The appointment of the deputy minister leaves no room for any possible difference, shall I say, between the government and the directors which would make for trouble. Having given the matter some little thought, I think the happy suggestion that the deputy minister should be a continuing member of the board without a vote overcomes the difficulty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I mention an incident that occurred in the government of Sir Oliver Mowat, who appointed a certain minister without portfolio. This minister was a Frenchman and he called on one of his supporters, who was a Highland Scotchman, and said, "The county has conferred a great honour upon me; I have been appointed a minister without portfolio." The Scotchman replied; "Yes, that is very true. You have been invited to the table but you have no plate."

Amendment (Mr. Coote) negatived on division.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): An amendment has been proposed by Mr. Howard, seconded by Mr. Hanbury, in the following terms:

That the following section be inserted after section 8 in Bill No. 19, and that the sections of the bill be numbered accordingly:

"The minister may at any time give notice by mail to the registered holders of the capital stock of the bank, or their legal personal representatives as the case may be, of his intention to acquire all outstanding shares of such capital stock not then held by the minister; and upon a date to be specified in such notice and to be not less than two months after such mailing the minister shall, upon receipt of the certificate or certificates of such shares, duly endorsed for transfer to the minister, pay to each such holder the amount then paid up on such stock plus any cumulated dividends thereon apportioned up to such date together with a premium of ten per cent on such amount so paid up. Concurrently with such mailing or in the next issue of the Canada Gazette thereafter, the minister shall publish in the Canada Gazette a copy of such notice addressed to all such registered holders and from and after such publication all the rights of the registered holders of such stock, except the right to receive such payment, shall be vested in the minister."

Mr. HOWARD: I might say just a word in explanation of this. I have already expressed my opinion on the subject, but I hope the Prime Minister will accept this amendment and I say so for this reason: it does not in any way change the principle of the bill; it provides simply a means without using force, if at any future date it is decided by parliament that it would be better to have a government-owned than a privately owned bank as is provided at present, whereby to call in the shares. I am placing the premium at ten per cent. If the stock was fully paid up, this means in the case of a shareholder who has subscribed for the stock and paid up $100, if the government so decided the minister would be authorized to take in the stock and pay him $110 a share and he would be obliged to surrender the certificates. There is not any change. This will not violate any of the Prime Minister's principles as I see them, and I trust he will accept the amendment. If it is never used, all well and good, but if at any time in the future the necessity should be seen of taking in the stock, this amendment provides a legitimate decent way of taking it in, and the people will know this when they are subscribing for the stock.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman, you have before you an amendment I suggested covering somewhat similar ground. It was rather shorter and I should like to read it for the consideration of the committee. It reads:

The minister may at any time call in the shares of stock held by the several shareholders on paying therefor the price at which such shares were issued by the minister, together with three months' interest.

It seems to me that these two might be discussed at the same time because they cover the same subject. I am prepared to support the amendment of the hon. member for Sherbrooke.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The amendment before the committee is the one moved by Mr. Howard.

Mr. BENNETT: The government cannot accept the amendment of the hon. member. It would be fatal to put into the hands of the minister any such power as this. It may be that parliament in its wisdom may decide otherwise, but the policy as it now is has been decided, and in that regard my hon. friend was referring this afternoon to the opinion of Kisch and Elkin. In their book entitled Central Banks it seems to me they put the matter very concisely. They say:

Monetary policy should be independent of political contingencies and the surest way to secure this result is to place the control of the note issue in the hands of a bank. . . . Central banks have more and more come to be looked upon as analogous to large public trusts and less and less as departments of state.

Then there is a chapter in which they deal with the matter at some length and give the reason why the conclusion which I mentioned to the committee this afternoon should be adopted by central banks. I take it that this is the reason most central banks are based upon the principle to which I alluded. This is another way of overcoming that principle and placing in the hands of the minister a power which it may well be this parliament might conclude should be exercised. When it does so, well and good. To exercise it in that manner, it might be, just as is said by these authors, that exigencies of political circumstances might bring about that condition and the minister might take the action indicated. I suggest that the hon. member realizes that, if the bank were functioning in the manner indicated in the bill and suddenly this action were taken, the dislocation that might follow might be very great.

Mr. HANBURY: To the shareholders only.

Mr. BENNETT: Not to the shareholders. There would be no dislocation to them; on a four per cent investment most of them would be very happy to get $110. I am speaking about the dislocation of the business of the country when a banking institution which is founded upon one set of principles has them suddenly changed in the midst of a year at the caprice of any government, whatever that government might be, with all the results that might follow to the credit of the country. The government regrets it cannot accept the amendment. I shall not discuss the matter further because it was discussed in the committee at great length and voted down there, and I trust the same action will follow here.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I rather dislike the suggestion of the Prime Minister that all the wisdom lies within the ranks of the Conservative party. They are responsible for this bill; they are putting it over by a majority which they possess at the present time; minorities apparently count for nothing here, and if we are any judge of what the people in this country are thinking the government does not represent public opinion in Canada to-day. To say that because they happen to be in authority at the present time and can by their majority impose upon the minority that at present exists here their opinion which will be perpetuated by a majority in another house, creates an embarrassing situation. In 1921 I had some experience of having to face an adverse majority in another chamber that had control so far as legislation is concerned, and I rather resent the statement made just now by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: What statement is that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The statement that we must beware of sudden fluctuations in political thought in regard to legislation that is now being imposed upon the people of Canada. That is what I resent. It seems to me that we are drifting a long way from democracy when one parliament cannot change the opinion of another when public opinion decides that it has lost confidence in the particular party as it did in 1930. In that case did we attempt to perpetuate our opinions? We did not. Hon. gentlemen opposite have had the opportunity and not only in this but in many instances they are seeking to fasten upon Canada the opinions they possess without any chance of the elected representatives of the people being in a position to change those opinions. That is what I object to and I object to the statement of the Prime Minister in regard to this particular clause as I have objected in many other cases. Surely the people of Canada are entitled by their voice, by their votes, to change any legislation which in their opinion is not in their best interest. To say that because you happen to be in power and possess a majority you are going to perpetuate for at least seven years or until such time as another chamber will have changed its complexion in conformity with public opinion—

Mr. MORAND: You should have abolished the Senate while you were in.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am willing to take my chance, but in the light of my experience I must speak my mind on this occasion. It is not fair for this government, as they have done on many occasions, to make it impossible to change legislation except by a vote of both houses of parliament, thus perpetuating policies that we object to very strenuously. In my opinion when the public do have an opportunity to deal with them they will speak with no uncertain voice.

Mr. COOTE: The bill as it stands now certainly leaves every possibility of a deadlock between the government and the authorities of the central bank if there should be a difference of opinion in regard to the monetary policy to be followed. It seems to me that this amendment is simply to safeguard the supremacy of parliament. In case of a difference of opinion parliament must be supreme. I think the suggestion is a very fair compromise on the question of public ownership, because it leaves it in such a position that at any time parliament or the government is satisfied that the policy of the central bank is not in the best interests of the country the government can then secure control of the bank simply by exercising the right to buy up the shares, and no harm is done to the shareholders if a fair price is fixed. I think this may be regarded as a reasonable compromise between those who believe in public ownership and those who think that the central bank should be a private institution.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: yeas, 40; nays, 61.

Mr. SPENCER: I was paired with the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Davies). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. RALSTON: I was paired with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD: I was paired with the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was paired with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was paired with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. IRVINE: I was paired with the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McGillis). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Thauvette). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. DESROCHERS (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Robinson). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SPENCER: As we have been informed that the amendment just negatived gives too much authority to the Minister of Finance, and as the Prime Minister says it is up to parliament to do what in its wisdom it sees fit, I am going to move the following amendment:

That section 17 of Bill No. 19 be amended by inserting the following as subsection 17 (a):—

The minister may at any time with the authority of parliament call in the shares of stocks held by the several shareholders on paying therefor the price at which such shares were issued by the minister, together with three months' interest.

This puts it up to parliament—the Minister of Finance with the authority of parliament behind him.

Mr. MORAND: Parliament has always had that authority.

Mr. JACOBS: We do not need that; parliament always has the authority.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that amendment is out of order because it implies something which is always the prerogative and right of parliament, namely to take such action as it may think desirable in the premises.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): I call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he is proposing to deal with section 17 and we are dealing now with section 9.

Mr. SPENCER: I think we are on section 8. It goes to section 8.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): Do I understand the hon. member to wish this to be an amendment to section 8?

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand it the hon. member is suggesting this as section 8 (a).

Mr. SPENCER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I raised the question whether it is in order, because it says, "with the authority of parliament" the minister shall do something, and tries to indicate how he shall do it. That power is incidental to parliamentary institutions. If the minister is so authorized by parliament in the future, that action will be taken. This only anticipates that parliament may hereafter take action which it always has the right to take in any event.

Mr. HANBURY: If the hon. gentleman will make his amendment to read that the House of Commons may do so, I will support it.

Mr. IRVINE: While it may be perfectly true that parliament may at any time take such action as the amendment provides, it is surely clear that parliament at some future time cannot take action that will fix the conditions under which public ownership might be effected. In other words if and when parliament should decide to have public ownership, it will probably be argued very forcibly that it would be taking advantage of the shareholders who bought stock in this bank in good faith to take it out of their hands. But if we include now the condition provided by the proposed amendment, no shareholder could at any time object to the taking over of the institution when parliament may see fit. I can understand hon. members being opposed to public ownership at the present time, but I do not see why we should take the attitude that public ownership is going to be forever an impossibility. If the time should come that parliament desires to take control of this institution, the proposed amendment would make it easier for that to be effected. I think that is the real purpose of the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Coote) negatived on division.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Provisional directors.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to propose an amendment to this section, which provides for the appointment of the board of directors. I think in view of what was said this afternoon by some hon. gentlemen that it should be understood clearly that any statement to the effect that as the bill stands, this is to be a publicly controlled bank is not strictly in accordance with the facts. This bank, as this act stands at present, is not publicly controlled. There have been repeated statements in the press to that effect; some such statements have been made in this chamber this afternoon. Under this act every dollar's worth of shares of this bank may be owned by individuals in Canada. Its directors are ten in number, seven of whom, according to section 9 to which we are now directing our attention, are appointed by the shareholders, the people who get together $5,000,000 with which to buy shares and who have no public responsibility of any kind or description. The remainder of the board is made up of the governor, the deputy governor and the deputy minister of finance. The governor in the first instance is appointed by the governor in council, and after the expiration of his first term is appointed by the directors subject only to the approval of the governor in council. The deputy governor in the first instance is appointed by the governor in council, and after the expiration of his first term is appointed by the directors subject to the approval of the governor in council. The tenth director is the deputy minister of finance, who is entitled to attend the meetings of the board but not to vote. Let me say that the provision with regard to the deputy minister of finance was moved in committee by those of us on this side of the house who felt that there was no attempt whatever by the government to have any supervision over the actions of the board of directors. It now appears as subsection 2 of section 5. To summarize: Seven directors are to be appointed by the shareholders; two are to be appointed or subject to the approval of the governor in council, and the tenth is to be the deputy minister of finance, who has no vote at all. The amendment I am now proposing is a considerable modification of that provision, and in view of the fact that the committee have refused the amendment providing for government ownership this amendment is designed to endeavour to do the next best thing, and ensure governmental or public control. The provision is an exceedingly modest one, but it is along the line of central bank charters in other countries, to some of which the Prime Minister referred this afternoon. In effect the amendment proposes that four of the seven directors may be elected by the shareholders but that three of the directors must be appointed by the governor in council. These three, along with the governor and deputy governor, who in the first instance are appointed by the governor in council and who after that time are subject to the approval of the governor in council, thereby form a majority of the board. Under the amendment as proposed the seven directors are appointed for what I might call staggered terms; that is to say, so many are retired each year and so many appointed in their place. This provides for continuity of administration and it also provides against the possibility of one government or one party perpetuating the board. This is a sincere endeavour to provide that, along with the directors appointed by the private interests there shall be a public interest majority in the directors' room. As I have said, Mr. Chairman, this is only proposed as the next best thing to government ownership.

This afternoon, in making the references he did, the Prime Minister seemed entirely to miss the point as to the importance of the functions of this institution which is being constituted by this bill. He seemed to think of this as some sort of little department of government which was being established; or, less than that, some sort of private institution, something which would carry on business for the purpose of profit. In his remarks my right hon. friend indicated that it was exceedingly difficult for a government to make appointments. Therefore, forsooth, because it was difficult and disagreeable, and because my right hon. friend or whoever occupied that position had to take into consideration certain matters which are always constant in Canada and which exist in connection with any public appointments made by any government anywhere, my right hon. friend asked to be rid of the responsibility entirely.

I do not think the house has ever listened to a more complete abdication of the job of prime minister and of governing this country than this house listened to this afternoon from the right hon. gentleman. He might just as well have suggested that because it is difficult to appoint postmasters, deputy postmaster generals, superintendents of post offices and so on, therefore we ought to hand over the post offices to private shareholders, let them run the post office department and let us just take a share of the profits. He might as well have suggested that the Department of National Revenue be farmed out to some board or some private individuals who would subscribe for stock; that they be given the power to tax, that this country receive a certain percentage of the receipts and that the remainder should go to the private institution. Why? Because it is difficult to make appointments and because one has to consider so many things in connection with making appointments to the public service. That is nothing new; it has existed since the day sixty or seventy years ago when Joe Howe said, "Take away patronage and I will stay in power for fifty years." There always will be difficulties in making public appointments, but that does not excuse my right hon. friend in the slightest for declining the responsibility which I submit is his and the responsibility which rests on this government to see to it that the currency and credit system of this country is preserved under the control of the people of this country, and administered by the government.

Some members of the committee suggested a little while ago that the board of directors has not much power anyway. As my right hon. friend quite properly apprehended, and as he said in answer to that hon. gentleman, the board of directors has more power than perhaps hon. gentlemen think. It is true that the governor and the deputy governor, with one director, form the executive, but it is also true that the executive submits its actions to the board of directors. Further than that it is true that under the act itself there are many important powers vested in the board, and hon. gentlemen must remember that as section 9 of the act stands at present seven of the nine directors who are to perform the functions to which I shall refer are appointed or elected by the private shareholders. The board of directors appoints the governor, the deputy governor and the chairman of the board, subject to the approval of the governor in council. In other words the governor in council is powerless to appoint a governor or deputy governor, after the first appointment, without having such appointments initiated by the board of directors. That is a rather important power to invest in private shareholders. In the second place the board of directors, and nobody else—not the governor—initiates the increase of capital. In other words, unless parliament changes this provision, there can be no increase in capital without first the action of the board of directors. In the third place, and perhaps the most important, the suspension of the twenty-five per cent gold backing, which is laid down here as the basis for the note issue of this central bank of Canada—the initiation of the suspension of that requirement for that ratio is left with the board of directors of the central bank, seven of whom are selected, as the Prime Minister is pleased to portray, by private interests, who are not influenced by racial prejudice, sectional differences, the colour of a man's hair, or anything of that kind—seven men nominated by people who have no other interest in this bank than the fact that they are getting four and one-half per cent. They are the ones who elect the seven out of the nine on the board who will decide as to the ratio of gold backing for note issue of the Bank of Canada, which may go up to over $400,000,000. They are the ones who make that decision, or at least who initiate that decision. Nothing can be done by the governor in council or by the minister until that decision has been first made by the board of directors.

Further than that, they initiate the extension of the suspension. They may initiate an extension of suspension of that ratio to extend for a period of one year, and without their initiation there can be no such suspension. Further than that—and this also is most important—when the question comes up as to what amount shall be paid to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada they are the ones who decide what provision is to be made for all debts, what provision is to be made for depreciation. They are the ones to decide what is left for the purpose of paying over to the consolidated revenue fund, or to put to rest. Those are the rather important functions of the board of directors, and the amendment which I propose is to provide that a majority of that board shall be at least under the control of or subject to the approval of the governor in council.

What are the functions of the bank? The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) went over them this afternoon as they appear in the preamble to the bill. But the functions are these—and they are set out not only in the preamble to the bill but in the report of the royal commission. They are to provide for the maintenance of national sovereignty over credit and currency. Paragraph 206 of the Macmillan report is as follows:

> In the first place, from a national point of view, the central bank, within the limits imposed by law and by its capacities, should endeavour to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation and should so far as possible control and defend the external value of the national monetary unit. In the second place, from the international point of view, the central bank by wise and timely cooperation with similar institutions in other countries, should seek, so far as may lie within the scope of monetary action, to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of economic activity. . . .

Then, paragraph 207—and imagine giving this power to a board of directors seven out of nine of whom are appointed by private shareholders:

> A central bank is at the same time an instrument and a force. As an instrument it is the means by which the state—which must necessarily retain ultimate sovereignty in matters affecting the currency—can give effect to the national policy. . . .

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister and whoever drafted this legislation, and, with all due deference, some of the commissioners who made the suggestions which appear as a schedule, have for a moment forgotten that after all this is a state function, that the control of credit and currency is the biggest and most important public utility in the economic activities of the Dominion of Canada. I am not one who necessarily champions public ownership at all times and in all places, but I say there are certain things which should be under public ownership, or public control and certainly the very first and most important of those is the institution which controls, which guides and which directs the whole economic life of the dominion.

The function with regard to credit and currency is exercised, as has been said repeatedly, by making advances under the section of the bill which provides that this bank may make advances to banks by way of loans, is entitled to purchase securities, and, to a large extent, the quantity of credit available in Canada, ought to, if this bank is properly regulated and properly run, depend on the rediscount rate and operation of the bank. That is the first method of controlling credit. The second way in which it is done is by open market operation whereby the bank may go out into the market and purchase securities, if it is found that it is necessary, in order to regulate the market, to control the price of money, or to go through the reverse process, and sell them. Those things require people who are first imbued with the point of view of the state, with the point of view of the national interest, with the point of view of public service, and not the control of seven out of nine men who are simply elected as ordinary directors by private shareholders. That board of directors must act as the trustees for the nation, and they are by no means a board of directors in the ordinary sense of the term.

And then we come to the other function, which is just as important, and perhaps more important—and I know the Prime Minister is particularly cognizant of this—the function of endeavouring to maintain the value of our currency internationally, the function of seeing how our gold and currency holdings shall be regulated—because after all, these are the most important things if we are going to have exchange stabilization, and heaven knows that this country needs exchange stabilization in view of our hoped for export trade. I say those things are vital and I say that this power should not be vested in a board of directors seven out of nine of whom are elected by private shareholders.

My right hon. friend has mentioned precedents. Let me give him a list of countries—

Mr. BENNETT: They are already on Hansard.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me give him a list of countries—and with all due respect, as I understand it, this list was not put on Hansard. I am giving a list of the countries where there is all government control or government control by a majority. I refer to Australia and Finland. My right hon. friend did not mention the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: He did mention it afterwards.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my right hon. friend permit me to continue? He did not mention it as a government controlled system, but he mentioned it as a privately owned system. The United States reserve bank is a bank owned bank, but it is controlled by a reserve board which is appointed by the United States government. They are the ones who determine the matter of advances.

Let me go further. The United States, Sweden—another one which is all government controlled—Latvia and Norway. Russia is controlled through the public commissioner, and then there is Spain. Then we have those where there is a mixed board, but with government control, such as in Bulgaria, Italy, Japan, Switzerland and New Zealand. My right hon. friend has said that we can take some lessons from the rest of the world. These are rather important countries who have felt that government control wholly or by a majority was desirable on their boards. And this brings me to the Dominion of New Zealand, which was the last country to adopt a central bank, and whose legislation has at least to some extent been copied in the bill before us to-night. Let me ask my right hon. friend to bear in mind that New Zealand has exactly the system of control which I propose here. New Zealand has privately owned shares, but New Zealand at the same time has a majority of government control on the board. In New Zealand there is a governor and a deputy governor appointed by the state on the recommendation of the board. There are four directors appointed by the shareholders, two to be actually engaged in farming and two in industrial or commercial pursuits; another three are appointed by the state, and the secretary of the treasury is a member of the board without voting power. As the Prime Minister has said to-day, it would be worth while for us to consider the experience of other countries. New Zealand is well known to be a country which studies economics pretty carefully. New Zealand has gone into the matter thoroughly and has come to the conclusion that government control is the proper thing. I think we would be well advised, outside of the arguments I have endeavoured to put forward, in following the example of New Zealand.

Let me come back again to the argument of my right hon. friend with regard to political control. He heard an address delivered the other day by the Right Hon. Stanley Bruce. We enjoyed his hospitality although he was not present in person. An address was delivered by the Right Hon. Stanley Bruce in connection with the Commonwealth bank of Australia and the work which had been done there. That bank is owned by the people and there is no suggestion of political interference of any kind. The governor stood up to his work and I think it is largely due to his efforts that Australia now finds herself in the situation of being on the right side of economic recovery. That is what a government controlled bank did. No doubt the government of Australia feared the same difficulties which the right hon. gentleman fears and apprehends in connection with appointments, but that institution has carried on successfully. After all, I think these are largely imaginary lions in the path. The right hon. gentleman has never had very much difficulty in making appointments when he had to make them. We did not approve of them all but he has always taken the responsibility for them and I think he should be quite prepared to again take responsibility. While it may have appeared to be frankness on the part of the right hon. gentleman to discuss this matter of control, let me say here that I challenge him and I challenge any hon. member to find a single case, either in a Liberal or a Conservative administration, where the treasury board of Canada, which has practically as much power as this central bank will have, has shown the slightest evidence of partisan or political control or has been influenced by political considerations in administering the Finance Act. There has been no suggestion of that kind; party politics have played no part.

I submit to my right hon. friend that he might well accept the amendment which I suggest. As I said a minute ago, it is a very modest approach towards what I think there should be in this country, a government owned bank. If we cannot have a government owned bank, let us have government control in the way I have suggested. I submit that it is vital in the interests of this country that the monetary financial and currency systems should be under such control. This bank will have $117,000,000 worth of gold when it is revalued and it will be able to authorize the issue of $468,000,000 in currency. I submit that that is too much power to give to a little group of men who are to be elected by the citizens all over the Dominion of Canada who are able to scrape together $5,000,000, with which to purchase shares in this bank. I submit that this is abrogating the sovereign rights of this dominion and it is practically flying in the face of the principles laid down in the Macmillan report, the recommendations of which we are trying to follow here. I repeat that this is a public utility of the greatest magnitude and importance, and the citizens of Canada should not relinquish control of its administration to any group of private citizens.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the arguments made by the hon. gentleman are the same as those he made in the committee except that he has been pleased to make certain observations with respect to myself which he did not make in the committee because I was not there. The fact is that it was not on the grounds of difficulties that I stated that this bank should be one of the character it is; I put it on the grounds of efficiency and effectiveness. I indicated the difficulties which stood in the way of its being efficient if it were publicly owned. I explained to the best of my ability just what those considerations were, but when the hon. gentleman quotes from the report of Lord Macmillan and Sir Charles Addis, I think he should say also that they recommended this type of bank.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my right hon. friend is wrong about that. I have heard it repeatedly stated in committee by hon. members on the other side, as well as outside the committee, that the supplement to this report was merely by way of suggestion and was not in any sense a recommendation. We have been told that repeatedly when we relied on some of the suggestions made there for the arguments which we put forward. If my right hon. friend says that it is otherwise, we accept his word.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be very glad to substitute "suggested" for "recommended." The suggestion was made that it should be a bank of the character I have indicated.

Mr. RALSTON: With this exception, that both Mr. Brownlee and Sir Thomas White dissented. There were three to two.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that Lord Macmillan and Sir Charles Addis had suggested this form of bank. At first I said "recommended" but I now use the word "suggested."

The hon. gentleman has now drawn an acute distinction between ownership and control. This afternoon I gave to the committee a list of the central banks in the world, whether privately owned, publicly owned or partly privately and publicly owned. I now observe that the hon. gentleman draws a sharp distinction between ownership and control. The question of ownership has been settled, as we have voted upon that. The next question is that of control, and I venture to say that there is no bank among all those I have indicated in which there is such complete public control of any privately owned organization as there is in this. I shall try to substantiate that by tracing the exact situation as it will be. First, there will be a board of directors representing the shareholders and involving private ownership. Second, of that board of directors, seven will be elected by the shareholders while three, the governor, the deputy governor and the deputy minister of finance, will represent the crown. The deputy minister of finance will have no vote. Third, the governor will be appointed by the governor in council; he will be the nominee and appointee of the crown, of the people. Fourth, when his term of office expires, his successor cannot be appointed unless he is acceptable to the crown.

Mr. RALSTON: Or unless the seven directors—

Mr. BENNETT: Unless he is acceptable to the crown. The statute says that he must be approved by the governor in council. There can be no appointment by the seven directors that is not approved by the crown. Let there be no doubt about that.

Mr. RALSTON: And the reverse; there can be no appointment by the crown unless approved by the seven directors.

Mr. BENNETT: I need hardly mention that the cardinals elect the Pope, but under a former dispensation, Austria had the power of veto. That power has been exercised twice within a century and there was no election. That is this case. There is no election until the crown approves.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely my right hon. friend is not arguing that the governor in council can go against the selection of the board?

Mr. BENNETT: I state distinctly and positively that the power of veto rests with the governor in council. Let there be no misapprehension on that. We have that power and there can be no governor who is not acceptable to the people as represented by the government of the day. What is the next point? There can be no by-laws or resolutions passed by the board of directors which are not acceptable to the governor. Section 14 provides for that.

Mr. RALSTON: The governor cannot make any without the approval of the board of directors.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman would listen instead of just engaging in talk it might perhaps be better. I listened to his remarks without making any observations. I am going to express the whole case and not make a special plea, as was done a few moments ago, on a particular part, leaving some matter of substance out. If the committee will take the trouble to read section 14 they will find these words:

> No action or decision of the board of directors, or of the executive committee, shall have any effect unless the same is concurred in by the governor, or in his absence or incapacity, by the deputy governor.

Mr. RALSTON: That is an amendment which I moved; it was not in the original bill.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was to be in the original bill. I will state quite frankly that those responsible for the bill had some hesitancy in believing that the committee would accept it. I cannot be too grateful to my hon. friend for suggesting it, and I say that to him frankly, because it was endeavoured to be brought about, namely, a control by the crown as representing the people. I have traced now, up to the final act, that there can be no by-laws, no resolutions, no decisions with respect to all these matters mentioned. Think of it—depreciation, profits, matters of that kind. Why could not this committee have been told that they are subject entirely to the governor in council through the governor? The governor, notwithstanding what may be said, is to be the supreme power; he is manager of this institution. In the very nature of things he is charged with responsibility, and when it is said that these seven men can issue any amount of paper money they like, I say, they cannot do it without the approval of the governor, and the governor is the man who is approved by the governor in council. Therefore the governor in council's man must be satisfied before any question can arise as to the twenty-five per cent coverage, or any question as to gold, any question as to depreciation, or any question as to profits. No conclusions can be arrived at unless the governor of the bank approves; and that governor, as I pointed out, is only such person as the government of the day approves, and no one else.

Under those circumstances, looking through the volume of Kisch and Elkin that deals with central banks, I find no statute in any country that gives such complete and absolute control, as distinguished from ownership, of any central bank as this one does—complete and absolute, regarding which there can be not the slightest doubt.

The hon. gentleman said I treated this transaction as one of a little state department dealing with a few dollars. Well, I make no boast, but I think I know as much about this central bank bill as any member of this committee; and, what is more, I say that, but for the determination of this government, the pressure from sources indicated by the hon. member for St. James, the ex-Mayor of Montreal (Mr. Rinfret), and from other parts of this country, would have seen to it that there was no central bank that was a real central bank. And when he suggests, as he did, that I do not know what this bill means or contains, I am perfectly content that he should make the suggestion that I was trying to treat this as a little picayune side-wind of the government.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend will find no such expressions of any kind or description. As usual, he is setting up a straw man to knock him down.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not suggest that he used those words, but he said this afternoon that he was amazed at the way the Prime Minister had treated the measure, that he had regarded it apparently as some little branch of government and not a great institution that will deal with all these important matters that so greatly concern the country. Well, I am always willing to learn, but I have nothing to learn from that quarter with respect to this bill. I have given more time and attention to this matter than the hon. gentleman has done, great though his attention to it has been. But, as I said a moment ago, both the government and I are deeply grateful that section 14 is there in the terms in which it is, for I could indicate to him the discussion and the efforts to place the question of public control beyond peradventure, to maintain the principle of all great countries whose experience indicates private ownership and public control. I ask any member of this committee who has studied the matter to point to any country in the world in which public control is so absolute in terms, so clear in ensuring the application of the principle of the people controlling the institution.

I will not trespass longer upon the time of the committee because the arguments were answered by the Minister of Finance in the committee. At times one wonders whether or not any good purpose is served by discussions that take three months in committee. All these suggestions have been made, all these amendments we have had this afternoon have been considered—that is, in terms, not in detail—and conclusions arrived at by recorded votes which appear in the minutes of the committee. I will therefore do no more than point out, as I have done, that the supreme power, so far as it is possible to have supreme power and free it from political control, is vested in the governor in council; and the dangers and difficulties which were pointed out by others, all those peculiar difficulties, we have endeavoured to escape in the manner I have indicated, following the principles laid down by various countries in dealing with the situation.

New Zealand, it is true, has established a central bank. When I was in London at the economic conference last year I gave much attention to this central bank question and discussed it with representatives of the various countries. New Zealand was then discussing the establishment of a central bank, and they were good enough to show us the statute they proposed to enact, and told us of the difficulties they had to encounter. Now New Zealand has launched its bank. It has a capital of half a million pounds divided into shares of five pounds each, and control of the bank with regard to directors is as the hon. gentleman has indicated. The first governor has in point of fact been named and the bank has begun to function. The islands of New Zealand, with a population which is either more or less, I am not sure, than that of the island of Montreal, are dealing with problems that are somewhat different from ours, though there is some essential likeness between the two. And as regards Australia, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman has for the moment forgotten the acute difficulties between the bank and the government with respect to currency matters. Does he realize that it was not the directors of the bank that did it but the governor, Gibson, who made possible the achievement of the supremacy of the governor over the forces that were against him? Now, adjustments, compromises and readjustments have taken place in connection with that matter. The bank came into being as a public bank, owned by the state.

Mr. RALSTON: A commercial bank.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, under a Labour government, for the purpose of competing with the chartered banks as it did and as, to some extent, it still does in certain branches of its activities. It became a central bank at a later date, but there was no change of ownership, naturally, by reason of that fact. They have been extremely fortunate in connection with the appointment of governors, and those who have read its history, or heard it as a matter of fact from the distinguished former Prime Minister of Australia, who was here the other day, know something of the difficulties which they experienced and the way in which those difficulties were overcome. Those who know all this will realize the importance that attaches to the office of governor.

If I have learned anything from the discussions that I have had and the inquiries I have made, it is as to the desirability of clothing the governor of the bank with the widest possible power. There must always be somewhere some authority who speaks with absolute certainty on problems connected with central banks, and the governor is that person. The governor, in the very nature of things, is clothed with authority not customary in the case of any chairman or any executive officer. For instance, none of our chartered banks, in the persons of their presidents, exercise any such authority or power as may be exercised by the governor of the bank. It is well known that the presidents of our chartered institutions could not for a single moment be permitted to have conferred upon them the power that rests with the governor of the bank. It is related that during his lifetime the late Mr. Harriman secured that the by-laws of the Union Pacific were in such terms that all powers not required by law to be exercised by the shareholders should be exercised by the directors and all powers not required by law to be exercised by the directors in meeting were to be exercised by the president—and he was president. Something of that character may be said about the governor of this bank, the governors of all central banks. All the powers that the shareholders have in general meeting are practically conferred upon the directors, and all powers that the directors have are in terms, unless by law required, vested in the executive committee.

We have further the provision in clause 14 that notwithstanding all the actions that may be taken by the board of directors, all the resolutions they may pass, all the conclusions at which they may arrive, they have no possible effect unless they are approved by the government. I would therefore submit that to the extent of my reading there is no other bank in which you find wider powers of public control conferred, absolute control by governor in council, than there is in this particular case.

There is only one further observation I think I should make. The hon. gentleman said that the Finance Act had practically all the powers of a central bank. I am certain he did not mean that; I am certain no one knows better than he how contrary to experience and fact that is. It was indicated, I think in evidence, that under the Finance Act what happened is that the treasury board once or twice a year, usually once a year, authorizes the extent to which borrowings under that act may be made by chartered banks and determines the values to be placed upon securities deposited for the purpose of securing that credit. The maximum of the line of credit was, so to speak, indicated in respect of each bank. I remember reading in the house in answer to a question the line of credit the various banks could secure under the provisions of the Finance Act by reason of a minute of the treasury board fixing that amount and the values to be placed upon the securities lodged for the purpose of enabling currency to be obtained. I hardly think the hon. gentleman would suggest that that is at all comparable with the powers of a central bank

He says that there was never any political interference. In the nature of things the way in which this power was exercised brought about the very conditions that necessitated a central bank. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman has studied closely the operations of the Finance Act. In the light of the experience of this country from the time that act first came into being as an emergency measure to the present time there is just this outstanding fact: there never was in a time of great speculation when there was an enormous volume of currency in this country any effort on the part of the treasury board, because it did not deal with that side of the matter, to control credit and stop speculation. All you have to do is to look at the borrowings and the relation of the Finance Act to the circulation of the country to realize the necessity of a central bank, and I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman said that the rate of rediscount becomes of tremendous importance. When the Bank of England and the Bank of France ran their discount rate up to as high as eight per cent, this was to try to put the brakes on speculation, and I am using the word in a broad sense. The Finance Act and the operations of it under the treasury board were never in the world used for the purpose of endeavouring to deal with that phase of the situation. I speak now subject to correction, but I think if the minutes of the treasury board are looked at, it will be found that not more than twice, and usually once a year from 1915 to date, there was nothing more than an authorization of credit and of the values at which securities were to be taken for the purpose of securing the credit when the applications were made.

This afternoon I was looking at a list in the appendix to the Macmillan report showing the extent to which those borrowings went. It is amazing to learn what happened, for instance, at the time Great Britain went off the gold standard. At this point I should like to correct a statement attributed to me the other day that I said that this country was not off the gold standard long after it was and I would not admit it was. I say to the committee that this country went off the gold standard on the day following the day that the late Mr. Robb sent $40,000,000 in gold to New York. I was in opposition at the time and because of certain complications I asked my colleagues in the opposition to say nothing of the matter because I thought to do so might have an injurious effect upon the country. We were off the gold standard from that time, but our gold coverage for our currency never changed since the statute was not amended. We maintained the statute in its integrity until I proposed to make certain amendments to it the other day.

Let me go a step further. Shortly after England went off the gold standard in September, 1931, I met the bankers; I was then in the Finance department and I reduced the rate to three per cent in order if possible to expand credit and meet the difficulties of a situation which then existed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We were never off the gold standard so far as metallic coverage for our currency is concerned; we were off it only for the export of gold.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. There was no free market for gold, as the books put it, and there was no coverage from that standpoint, but so far as metallic coverage for currency is concerned there was never a change.

The effect of that reduction may or may not have been beneficial; I am not expressing any opinion on that point, but the reduction in the price paid for the accommodation received under the Finance Act was for the purpose of meeting that situation. In October the high level of borrowing under the Finance Act was $24,500,000; the low being $9,000,000. In November the high level was $66,500,000, the low being $17,500,000. That indicates quite clearly that while there was an expansion or contraction of credit there was no supervision by the treasury board of that contraction or expansion. They never purported or undertook to do so; there was nobody there for that purpose. Anyone who knows the circumstances knows the chairman of the treasury board was the Minister of Finance, and there never was any effort made to deal with those problems of expansion and contraction of credit and all the questions allied to the credit problem to which the hon. gentleman referred that must be dealt with by an efficient central bank. I do not think he intended to convey what his words, literally taken, would mean, that is, that the powers under a central bank were those which might be found in the provisions of the Finance Act. That is too far-reaching a statement to make, because there was no supervision and no control at any time with respect to matters of that kind.

We believe that by the methods we have adopted we have met the situation, and clause 14, which the hon. gentleman is entitled to credit for having suggested in the committee, concerns a matter which has given considerable thought to those responsible for the legislation. It has been said to-day that somebody must take the responsibility for it. This government takes the responsibility for this legislation. When we went into the committee we explained that as regards any constructive suggestions that might be made, if we could reconcile them to our view of what we were seeking to do we would gladly accept them. The rapidity with which the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman was embodied in clause 14 is an indication that the government wanted a supervision of that character, but we knew if we undertook to insert it when the bill was prepared what condemnation we would have received for having done so.

Mr. HANBURY: That is a very high plane.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the fact with respect to this legislation. I do not look upon this as being legislation regarding which a government must have views for the purpose of enforcing them—not at all. I have never in all my little experience with legislation approached any problem with a greater sense of individual responsibility, and I have never endeavoured to obtain information from so many sources to enable me to arrive at sound conclusions. If I have arrived at conclusions which are at variance with those of my hon. friends opposite I trust they will credit me with sincerity in my convictions, as I do them, except when they endeavour to interject politics into it. I think this far transcends purely political views. Every action that has been taken in connection with this measure has been first of all to maintain the sense of a great public trust on the part of the shareholders, to relieve this bank from any possible interference with its operations through political intrigue, to use the language of the volume to which I have already referred; secondly to ensure that there shall be continuity of policy by having one of the permanent members of the civil service, the deputy minister of finance, a permanent member of the board, so that there shall be continuous knowledge on the part of the minister, and that means the government of the day, of the operations of the bank. And thirdly, to ensure that the governor of the bank, who is responsible for its operation in the large true sense of the term, should be one who represents the government of the day. He is appointed in the first instance by the government, and there can be no appointment made thereafter that is not acceptable to the government. And no resolution or action of the board of directors of any kind, shape or form, or of the executive committee, can become effective unless the governor approves. Therefore I submit frankly, and as fully as I can from the knowledge that I possess, what little it may be, that there is no central bank to which reference can be made in a country such as this, with conditions as they are, where public control has been so clearly defined and can be easily exercised as in this bill, and at the same time maintaining what Kisch and Elkin think should be maintained, the sense of private ownership of shares, vesting in those who have them the sense of a great public trust.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? If the government parts with both public ownership and public control of a great financial institution such as the Bank of Canada will be, is there not a possibility that at a time of crisis a situation might arise in which the power of this bank will be greater than that of the government itself? Might not the bank be in a position to defy the government if it so desired? I use the word "government" rather than the word "parliament" because I know the Prime Minister will say that parliament can always alter any law that has been made. But I am assuming a moment of crisis at some time of financial stress in the affairs of the country or of the world when this bank would be operating. The government has parted with ownership of the bank; it has parted with the control of the bank. It has a limited control but not the final control. Both the ownership and the control will be in private hands. This will be the great banking power of the nation. Under those circumstances is there not a possibility, assuming the government may wish to act in such an emergency, of a situation arising where the government would be less powerful in dealing with it than the corporation which it has created?

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, if the right hon. gentleman has read the history of what recently took place in Australia, he will have observed there was a moment when the attitude of the government was at variance with that taken by the governor of the bank. Had the view of the government prevailed in that particular instance I think it is now generally conceded that the results would have been ruinous. The fact that the governor of the bank was a man of such firmness of character and determination that he carried out the plans that were made they believe was largely responsible for the success following the efforts that were made for rehabilitation at a time when the situation became acute.

To admit that there is a possibility of differences of opinion between the government and the governor of the bank is but to admit that there is always the possibility of differences of opinion. That I think may be taken for granted. That is, there might be a moment when the view of the governor of the bank and that of the Minister of Finance of the country might be at variance. That might happen. But I cannot conceive of that happening as a practical question, because with the continuous communication betwen the government and the bank, the government of the day doing what it thought desirable as conditions changed from time to time, the governor of the bank, with his wide knowledge of international conditions, his wide experience in the bank and knowledge of conditions in his own country, I should say would be perfectly willing to accommodate his views to those of the government if no question such as arose in Australia was to be considered. In Australia at one time the question involved the movement of the gold itself. It will be recalled that substantially the gold reserve was moved to Great Britain, if my memory serves me, and deposited in the branch of the bank there, to save the credit of the commonwealth at that particular moment. I speak subject to correction. Then subsequently the differences of opinion were adjusted; the governor did succeed in having his views prevail, with the result that Australia emerged from the situation. But that was a case in which it was thought at the time that the government took a rather extreme view, because of the attitude of some people with respect to certain questions of interest and other matters of that character, involving, I should say—although perhaps Australians would not like me to use the word—possible repudiation. Perhaps if I put it that way I am fair to the right hon. gentleman. I do not conceive that in this country, as I know it, that need give us such concern as would necessitate any change being made in the proposals submitted to the committee. If I did I would say so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to enlarge a little on what I have in mind. In the world of finance the money power, as it is termed, is of course the all important factor, a factor that many people believe is greater than the power of government itself. What I am anxious to be perfectly sure of is that the government of the day, in parting with some of the ownership of money power, as it is doing, and so completely with the control that it has of money power, to a privately owned and controlled institution which will be allied to all of the banks of the country and through them to all the financial interests of the country, is not bringing about a situation in which at some critical time should a question arise as between the financial interests in a large way and the interests of the public as represented by the government in a large way, the two might clash, and the government find itself powerless, at least until parliament could be called together, to deal with the situation. In the meantime in such a case the financial interests may have had their way in the furthering of their own interests, albeit their action might be against the public interest. I do not say they will act that way; I am quite prepared to believe that those who may be appointed will be honourable men and will seek to do what as they see it is the right thing. But with affairs as they are in the world to-day the point of view of those who think that a certain thing is right may differ very much, depending upon whether it is to the financial end of things they are looking, or to social and public ends.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and I think that what the right hon. gentleman has said is dealt with by Kisch and Elkin in the volume to which the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred, commencing at chapter 2. There is recognition of the very fact to which the right hon. gentleman has referred, namely the power of the money interest, and it is for that reason that the conclusion seems to have been arrived at that it is safer to have the central bank a privately owned and government controlled organization than otherwise. I will not take time to read more than this:

> The tendency of the nineteenth century, particularly as regards actual statutory provisions, was somewhat to stress the control of the state over the central bank. The case of the Reichsbank may be cited as an instance of a general disposition to regard a state or semi-state bank as analogous to a state railway system or a state tobacco monopoly. The war period exhibited in extreme terms the danger of this system. Since then the tide has set strongly against granting the state power to interfere with the functioning of a central bank.

Then follow statements about it, and the writer continues:

Central banks have more and more come to be looked upon as analogous to large public trusts and less and less as departments of state.

Then he goes on to discuss the matter with respect to many central banks. At page 18 he says:

The case for the direct intrusion of the state into the actual workings of a nicely balanced economic machine loses its force as soon as the public responsibilities and public objects of the institution are fully recognized by those responsible for its management and in the code of legal provisions or established tradition by which they are guided.

Then he inserts this paragraph:

Thus in times of crisis the bank, like many other normally independent organizations, is likely to find itself to a large extent under the influence of the government. At all other times, however, its independence is secure and unassailed. The inner history of the Bank of England is known only to those in authority, but it is probably safe to assume that the relations of that institution with the government present few difficulties that are not capable of amicable solution. The bank has in the course of years built up a body of tradition and experience directed to the public service which is unrivalled, and it may be fairly surmised that no government in this country would seriously attempt to intervene in its administration.

Then he refers to the German bank, the opening sentence of its charter being:

The Reichsbank is a bank independent of government control.

We have gone much further than that. The discussion that follows, at pages 22 and 23, with respect to banks might be worth looking at, without taking up too much time:

As long as convertibility is maintained the worst evils resulting from government intervention in banking and currency control are avoided. Doubtless the governments which have laboriously dragged themselves out of the morass of inflation will not readily slip back; nevertheless, if the control of the operations of the central bank lies directly or indirectly with the government, it becomes fatally easy for the government to finance itself for a time by means of book entries and short loans from the bank, a course which is the first step towards currency depreciation and inconvertibility.

Even apart from such risks there are other serious dangers from a government controlled bank. The network of financial and commercial life is so intricate, and the decisions of the bank on important points have such widespread results, that all interests are not affected in the same way. A change in the rate of discount, for example, which benefits some may be unwelcome to others. But if the government has a controlling influence over the bank, there are obvious ways by which the more powerful interests in the country can try to enforce their wishes. The road is open for political intrigue, and there can be no safeguard that the policy of the bank will be carried on without bias as national interests require. It seems a paradox that when the object is to secure the execution of a national policy, this should not most readily be achieved by the creation of a state bank under official control; but even in the countries where the capital of the bank is held by the state, steps have been taken in certain instances to remove its administration from political influences and to give it a measure of independence from the government.

I will not take time to quote more than those observations. I really do not think there is any more danger here than there is with respect to the relations of the Bank of England with the government of that country. That is an old institution, with established traditions. It will take many years for us to establish like traditions, but I believe that can be done more effectively and efficiently by the means provided in the bill, particularly—I say again—section 14, which in its present form we owe to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). I believed something of that sort was essential in this bill, and I say again I think that is one of the most powerful of the provisions of the bill to ensure the efficiency and effectiveness of government control as against government ownership.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one other question I should like to ask the Prime Minister. Is there not a danger, if the government parts with both ownership and control of the central bank, of some government being seriously embarrassed in the matter of carrying out its trade and fiscal policies? Let me instance what I have in mind. Assume that private interests in control of the central bank are favourable to a policy of trade within the empire; let us say, are in favour of promoting trade within the empire to the exclusion if need be of trade by Canada with other countries throughout the world. Is it not possible, through the control of credit which this central banking institution will possess, that its officers may be in a position to cause their policy to be made to prevail rather than that the government should be in a position to have its policies prevail? It seems to me that unless the government has some control or some ownership of this central institution there will be that danger at all times. Where you have an administration whose policies as to trade harmonize with the policies of the bank as to finance; assume for example, that both have imperial policies in trade and finance, there everything might work very smoothly. But assume that the bank once established is determined on certain imperial policies, and it is likely to have such as a guiding principle if the governor of the bank is to be chosen from the old country and assume that the government of the day should seek to promote world trade even if such a policy should happen to some extent to be at the expense of trade within the empire itself, is there not a danger of this institution being in a position to make it very difficult, if not impossible, for the government, representing the people, in its policies to carry out those policies as effectively as it otherwise would be able to do?

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say, Mr. Chairman, that the very organization of this bank in this form is calculated to prevent that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In what way?

Mr. BENNETT: I will try to explain. If the government were in complete control of the bank it would mean that if you had one government succeeded by another the bank would naturally change its policy, assuming that the policy was as the right hon. gentleman suggested. Then you would have governments controlling policies without continuity. What we wish to secure is a policy based upon the economic conditions of the country, not a policy of the bank based upon policies of a government. That is what the right hon. gentleman desires.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have always felt that the government represented parliament. If a government or a political party has placed certain policies before the people and the people have endorsed those policies, returning the party to power in order to enforce them, it seems to me that no institution should be created by the state which could interfere with the will of the people as thus expressed through their representatives in parliament. It is that danger that I confess I see in this institution as it is to be constituted under this measure. That, just as the Prime Minister says, you may have the bankers desiring continuity in their banking policy, and determined to have it even if it runs counter to what may be the trade policy or the fiscal policy of the government of the day. You will almost certainly, sooner or later, have a conflict between financial and fiscal policies, the former in the control of private interests the latter in the control of the government. If there is a conflict anywhere my feeling is that the view that ought to prevail is the view of the administration of the day, not the view of any institution privately owned and controlled that may originally have been given power by the state.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course the only difficulty about that is the fact that it is always so difficult to say that a particular policy has been approved by the people. That is always the difficulty where you have no direct referendum upon a particular matter. That is why that on the continent of Europe they contend so vigorously for the submission of questions in order that there may be a direct determination by the people. I need not remind the hon. gentleman, with his wider knowledge than mine, of what that has led to, but that is a fact. There can be no policy of the central bank, as related to the chartered banks and the country, that is not similar to all. The deputy minister of finance is familiar with the transactions of the central bank and its relation to the chartered banks. The chartered banks continue to establish credit for the industrialists and the agriculturists, just as they do now. The only difference is that the central bank supplies the requested credit to the individual chartered banks to carry on, where formerly under the provisions of the Finance Act reliance was placed upon that measure.

Let us assume that the government of the day is apprehensive of the continued evidence of speculation on the part of the people, and it has made up its mind that something must be done to curb their activity. The government discusses the matter, and the Minister of Finance says to the deputy minister, "You may indicate to your board and to the bank the desirability of raising the discount rate for the purpose of enabling that to be done." The Minister of Finance sends for the governor, and discusses the matter with him. It is common, of course, in countries like France and continental Europe, for the minister of finance to be constantly in communication with the governor of the bank. He says, "We must raise the discount rate." The discount rate is raised from four per cent to six per cent. Still the speculation continues on the stock exchanges, and last year the rate was raised to seven per cent. I think, if my memory serves me correctly, that it went as high as eight per cent at one time.

Mr. YOUNG: Did that stop speculation?

Mr. BENNETT: It had a very great effect upon it, yes. And it will be recalled that the central reserve bank of the United States made some effort in that direction. It is also within the memory of this committee and those who have read the report of the Macmillan commission that in the opinion of Sir Charles Addis there is no central bank in the United States. I fancy, as a matter of fact, there is not any central bank of the United States. There are, of course, twelve central reserve areas or regions in which there are what I think they call regional banks. The member banks are the banks within that region, and the control of the government is as was indicated by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. But there is no contral bank dealing with the question of credit and rediscount rates in the manner in which we have been dealing with those matters.

I will say this to the right hon. gentleman: if between now and to-morrow any thought that may be given to this measure by hon. members opposite would result in indicating wherein they see the possibility of that danger, I shall endeavour by appropriate terms to remove it. But I see no likelihood of there being any such exercise of that power. I did look into something which was said in this house on a former occasion, and as the bill stands I cannot see that it would be possible for that result to follow. If there is any member of the committee who has any suggestion to make which would indicate that that is a possibility, I should certainly be very glad to have it, and the government would welcome any suggestion in that direction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to make clearer what I have in mind. In a word it is this: Taking matters as they are at present, it seems to me that so far as this House of Commons is concerned, as respects the banking and financial institutions of the country, it makes very little difference what particular trade policy we may have. We feel an absolute security in our ability to give effect to our own trade policy. But under this measure the government is parting with some measure of ownership—what in this bank will become privately owned. It is parting to a certain extent with the control it now has over the regulation of credit. It is not merely creating an institution which will be privately owned and controlled, but it is parting with a certain control by government which it has to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: In what way?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This bank will have the issue of currency and it will have the control of credit, which at least to some extent, through the Department of Finance, the government itself is able to exercise to-day. During and since the war the government exercised this control, the Finance Act having been amended at the time of the war for that very purpose. The powers which the government there had are now being transferred to this privately owned institution. If you alter the situation by taking away from the government the power that it has to-day; and the banks are to be allowed to control the central bank—for that is what it really amounts to, the banking interests are all to be one, the central bank being in private hands let us put it that way—there is, it seems to me, a real danger of the financial control which may thus be exercised by the bank being exercised against what may be the fiscal policy of the government of the day.

Mr. BENNETT: I should be glad to give the matter such reasonable attention as I can between now and to-morrow, and if the right hon. gentleman or any other member of the committee sees that danger, and indicates to me where it is to be found in the bill, I shall certainly consider it and try to provide a remedy against it, because I realize there is no desire to place the question of the fiscal policies of governments in the hands of the banks of the country, either the central bank or any other bank. I cannot conceive that it is possible under this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The line of remedy will lie in the matter of control; the government ought certainly to have a very large measure of control over this institution, I would say "the" control of the institution. The question of ownership, is, I think debatable.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 22, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Eleventh report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Stinson.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY LOAN

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I lay on the table a certified copy of the order in council passed on June 20, 1934, consenting to the Canadian Pacific paying off $12,000,000 of the $60,000,000 borrowed from the chartered banks of Canada, releasing one-fifth of the security on which such loan was obtained.

AUSTRALIAN WHEAT AND FLOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday on the orders of the day I had unfortunately to leave for the sittings of a committee and I was not present when the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) asked a further question regarding importations of Australian flour. The direct answer to the question, which was answered once previously, though not with complete assurance, is as follows. The question is as to whether or not Australian wheat or flour coming to Canada is subsidized. We cabled the Canadian trade commissioner in Australia and recently received from him a reply in which he states that there is no bounty in force on wheat or flour. The Wheat Growers' Relief Act passed on December 12 last was a purely temporary measure, and it will be recalled that I explained the nature of that on a former occasion, on June 7 last, as appears in Hansard. I do not think I need to repeat that; it does not involve anything in the nature of subsidizing wheat or flour. May I add to what I said then a brief statement regarding the situation in connection with the winter wheat supply and the winter wheat crop of Ontario. There were 630,000 acres of fall wheat seeded last autumn, and it is estimated that there were about 246,000 acres winter killed. The condition of the balance of the wheat crop is not up to last year; in the early part of June, I think, it was estimated at around 45 or 50 per cent. So that the winter wheat crop is certainly behind that of a year ago. In estimating the supplies of winter wheat available for flour—soft wheat flour—consideration must be given to stocks in hand; and upon careful examination and inquiry it is ascertained that on March 31, 1934, a total of some 3,140,000 bushels of winter wheat was considered to be in the hands of the farmers. There is reason to believe that stocks of wheat on the farms in Ontario at the end of July, 1934, will approximate 1,000,000 bushels which, together with the new crop, will of course supply the requirements. Furthermore, while I have under my hand the exact figures, it must be remembered that a comparatively small proportion of winter wheat grown is used for flour. When I say a small proportion, if my memory serves me aright, it is less than 30 per cent. Therefore there should be ample Canadian wheat for soft wheat flour purposes.

I might make a further statement to the house as to the steps taken by the government in connection with the importation of flour from Australia. It will be recalled that in the Canadian-Australian trade agreement provision was made under article IX for giving notice and I shall read just briefly from the article so that the exact language may appear on Hansard. It reads:

> If at any time either party to this agreement gives notice in writing to the other party that, in consequence of the importation of goods of a kind specified in the notice, being the produce or manufacture of the exporting country, intc the other country, the sale of similar goods produced in that other country is being prejudicially or injuriously affected—

And so forth. Then three months' notice may be given by the importing country to the exporting country. If within that period satisfactory remedial measures are not arranged, the article complained of goes under the general tariff.

In respect to the agreement I may say that we have always had the heartiest and most genuine cooperation from the Australian government; in this instance all that has been necessary is to give notice and we are assured that the importation of Australian flour under present conditions is not likely to be of any magnitude. Furthermore, such quantities as are already en route are not sufficient to give any alarm; in fact, there is a certain small quantity that regularly comes in to the Pacific coast and the quantity coming in to the eastern seaboard is comparatively small. The officials of my department as well as other officials of the government, after giving the matter the most careful study, are quite satisfied that nothing will occur that need in any sense give alarm, and I believe from recent advices from the trade the same opinion is shared by it.

Mr. SANDERSON: I take it from the remarks of the minister the government are still going to permit the importation of Australian flour.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the hon. member is wrong; he is not even approaching the fact. We have given notice and the importation of Australian flour has been stopped. I would suggest to my hon. friend that it is not necessary for Canada to be rude to Australia. I repeat that Australia and the Australian government and officials have cooperated with us in the most cordial spirit in this and in other matters. We have had no trouble and further importation of Australian flour will not occur.

Mr. SANDERSON: If I misunderstood the minister I am very sorry. Now I understand him to say that importations of Australian flour will be stopped. Am I right in that?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, quite right, with one point which I think any reasonable person will recognize. There was a small quantity en route and naturally we are not under present circumstances going to reject that. But let me make it clear to the house—and I trust the house will accept this and be satisfied with it—the normal imports of Australian flour are not large but there is a considerable quantity; we could not reject flour that was already en route but it is a very small quantity. There is nothing whatever to be perturbed about.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Speaking for the maritime provinces, may I say to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) that if Australia can send to Canada as good wheat as that produced in this country and at a lower price I want to say on behalf of the consumers of the maritime provinces that they desire that wheat to come in.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I should like to inform the Minister of Justice now that he is in his seat that Bill No. 115 that he introduced on Wednesday has not yet been printed. We are told that it will not be available to-day so that it will not be in the house until Monday and at this stage of the session that is rather a long time to wait for an important bill.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The bill is not important in this way that, as I mentioned before, there is only one real change in it. It is the Elections Act which is to-day on the statute book with, taken out of it, those clauses which refer to the preparation of the election lists. The only change of any importance is the one as to the appointment of returning officers. While I am mentioning the matter, it will be the intention of the government to refer both the elections bill and the franchise bill to a special committee. When they are called to-day I would be obliged if the house would give its consent to the reference of those bills to a committee in order to expedite business.

[Mr. Stevens.]

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE—APPOINTMENT OF FRANCHISE COMMISSIONER—PRINTING VOTERS' LISTS

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 101, respecting the franchise of electors at elections of members of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I understand from what the Minister of Justice said a moment ago it is his intention to ask the house to refer this bill to a special committee. That course is in accord with the suggestion that was made yesterday from this side of the house. It is a step which should help to expedite the consideration of the measure and avoid protracted discussion. In this particular so far as the official opposition is concerned, we are wholly in accord with the course the government proposes. It will be understood, of course, if the second reading is passed at the moment, this is without prejudice to the fullest discussion of all features of the measure when the bill returns from the committee.

I should like to say just a word before the motion for second reading passes. In discussing the resolution at the time of introducing the measure the Minister of Justice made it clear that the present elections act was really three acts in one: a franchise act, an act relating to the preparation and revision of voters lists, and an act relating to the machinery of elections. As I understood at the time the franchise phase was one which it was not intended to alter except possibly in one particular that would be considered and that is the one that relates to the Doukhobors in British Columbia. If that is strictly adhered to, I imagine there will be little difficulty in reaching agreement on the measure. I should like to stress the importance of it being seen to that the bill when it comes back to the house is not a measure that because of its provisions may serve to disfranchise any persons who at present enjoy the franchise but one that will ensure a continuance of the enjoyment of the franchise by all who at the present time enjoy that right.

The bill as originally drafted—and for that the government says it takes no responsibility—would have disfranchised large numbers of persons; it would have disfranchised those who are not able to read and write English or French, Doukhobors and others. However, the government has disclaimed, and rightly, I think, any intention of having had that object in view. But the bill as it was presented lacked certain features that are in the present Dominion Elections Act, and this, I believe, would have materially affected the enjoyment of the rights of many of those whose names should appear upon the list. As a consequence they would really have been disfranchised. There was the provision that limited the preparation of the lists to a single enumerator. If that provision had not been altered, and the government had not agreed to double enumerators in the preparation of the basic list, I believe that numbers of names would have been left off the list which under the act as it now stands would have been on it. The measure in such circumstances would have been in reality a disfranchising measure. The arguments urged in support of the employment of double enumerators in connection with the preparation of the basic list are equally applicable with respect to the annual revisions that are to take place. It does not follow that because a revision is to take place every year, the amount of work in connection with a revision will be anything like that required for the preparation of the original list. Double enumerators might very easily go from house to house and check up on the basic list in a way which would avoid the omission of large numbers of names or the possible inclusion of names that should not appear. That is a requirement which I think should be considered by the committee.

Then, as the bill was introduced, there would have been deleted another provision which appears in the Dominion Elections Act at the present time, namely, the right to appeal to a county court judge. The removal of that right would, I believe, have served to disfranchise a certain number of persons. But the government has conceded the restoration of that feature, and to that extent as far as the rights of electors are concerned their chances of having their names appear upon the lists will continue to be what they are under the present act.

There still, however, remain in the bill certain provisions which are new and which if not altered will, I believe, lead to the virtual disfranchisement of a large number of persons. One of these is the provision which obliges those who wish to exercise the franchise to make application and sign a document which will have to be witnessed, and which will state that the signatory has read over certain sections of the act and certain regulations that will appear upon the document itself, and that they are thoroughly understood by him. May I say that, knowing human nature as I think all hon. members of this house know it, there is reason to believe that if many of the electors are to be obliged to sign documents, no matter how understandable they may be, or how genuine their purpose, they will refuse to sign altogether, and will be disfranchised as a consequence. In this country the franchise—manhood franchise—ought to be considered an inherent right of the citizen. If a man or woman is twenty-one years of age and qualifies in regard to the conditions that have been generally set forth and the requirements that have been generally accepted, citizenship in and of itself should include the right to vote, without any preliminaries or accessories of a kind that are at all likely to threaten or impinge upon that right. It ought to be and is a duty of parliament to see that this inherent right is protected above everything else, and that anything which will tend to take away from an individual who is a qualified citizen absolute freedom in the matter of the exercise of his vote at the time of an election is not countenanced. The fairness of that general statement will I am sure appeal to all hon. gentlemen.

With the alleged objects of the bill, as stated by the government, we are as I have said, in complete sympathy. With the object of shortening the time necessary for an election, the object of reducing expenses, the object of having a clear, clean list which will help to prevent impersonation or what is called "plugging" and "telegraphing" at the time of election—with all those objects we are in complete accord, and they are the objects as set forth by the government. If however they are to be attained in this measure only at the expense of other provisions which will have the effect of disfranchising a large number of electors, then the price to be paid will be too great and the measure should not be permitted to pass. I would think it should be possible for the government to attain the objects it has in view without imposing on the electorate conditions which will involve the possibility of a large proportion of its numbers not having the right to record their votes at the time of an election. I might say that one of the reasons I had for expressing the hope that the government in the first instance would consider this measure by a special committee was that I believed it would take up a great deal of the time of the house to set forth the variety of instances in which it could be clearly shown that under the machinery as at present provided in the bill the voting might be so blocked on the day of election, or electors themselves so terrified or discouraged or nonplussed with respect to preliminary requirements that there would be a very large number who on election day would be deprived of the right of having their votes recorded. I am prepared to accept, and I am sure the house will accept the statement of the government that it really has in view only the objects which have been alleged, and that any measure that we shall be asked to accept after consideration by the committee will not be one which because of provisions not existing at the present time will obviously limit the numbers of those who on election day will be in a position to exercise their right of the franchise. There are other features of the bill which have to be carefully examined, and to which as they stand we would wish to take exception. With these few remarks, however, I am quite agreeable that the bill should pass the second reading and be sent to a special committee.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): With some of the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), so far as safeguarding the franchise of the people is concerned, I am in agreement. I am sure that on all sides of this house the same desire prevails. I am not very fearful that anything will be done in the special committee that is to be appointed to consider this measure which will tend to disfranchise any of the people of Canada who are entitled to vote. There is one point, however, on which I wish to make a few remarks, that is in regard to the proposal for double enumerators, or the appointment of two enumerators for each poll. I believe that we have men and women in Canada, who, if they are appointed to enumerate a polling division, will do it expeditiously and well and satisfactorily to all concerned. In my judgment the statement of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), both to-day and on the former day when this bill was introduced, does not augur well for the political situation in this country. It almost takes it for granted that we have not got people in Canada who are honest enough to give an honest enumeration. I protest against that idea. Personally I believe that we can get all the enumerators we require who would do the work honestly and well and see that everyone entitled to vote is placed upon the list.

We are supposed both in the House of Commons and in our provincial legislatures to have proper representation of the wishes of the people. Last Tuesday there were two provincial elections held. The results have given some heart to a certain portion of the members of this house—and they are entitled to take what satisfaction they can on that score—yet when we look over the returns we realize the fact that after all we have not representative institutions in this country. In the province of Ontario for instance according to press reports this morning it required only 8,500 votes to elect a Liberal candidate while it required something over 28,000 votes to elect a Conservative candidate and 94,000 votes to elect one C.C.F. candidate.

Mr. McINTOSH: It serves them right.

Mr. GARDINER: Taking those figures we find that the Liberals elected sixty-five members, the Conservatives seventeen and the C.C.F. one. In the final analysis, so far as the votes of the people of the province of Ontario are concerned, we are going to have a minority government notwithstanding the fact that 65 members were elected to support the Liberal government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend a question? He has referred to the seventeen Conservative members elected in Ontario. Is it not a fact that if the votes that went to the C.C.F. candidates had gone to the Liberal candidates there would have been only seven Conservatives elected instead of seventeen?

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid that question is beyond me for the moment. Now let me refer to the situation in Saskatchewan, where fifty-four members were elected last Tuesday. According to the latest returns the Liberals elected forty-nine members.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I suppose my hon. friends feel quite satisfied about it. The Conservatives did not elect any members while the C.C.F. elected five. Now let us look at the actual figures. According to press reports —and I must admit, of course, that the returns are not complete as yet—the Liberals received approximately 178,000 votes, which elected forty-nine members out of fifty-four. The Conservatives received 103,000 votes but obtained no representation at all. The C.C.F. received 84,000 votes and elected five representatives. I submit that the time has come when we should consider the idea of securing a more representative house than we have at present or than resulted in the two provincial elections. May I suggest to the government that they refer to the committee the questions of proportional representation and the single transferable vote in single member constituencies. After all is said and done, if we are going to boast about our representative institutions those institutions should be truly representative of the ideas of the people of this country.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): With regard to the last remarks of my hon. friend I should like to remind the house that a few years ago, when I was Minister of Justice, I introduced a bill for the purpose of having the alternative vote in this country, in order to remedy the ill my hon. friend has just represented as existing. At that time we were told that if we insisted on proceeding with the bill the session would last all year, and we had to postpone the matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will my hon. friend say whether he would support such a bill now, if it were introduced?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I certainly would, so far as I am concerned, because it is a Liberal measure.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Justice will conclude the debate if he speaks now. If any other member wishes to speak he should do so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have just a word of reassurance for my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I must confess that I experienced at least some mild degree of surprise when I heard his remarks this afternoon. As I stated when this bill was introduced we had some preliminary discussions, not only upon the principle but upon practically every detail of the bill. My right hon. friend and the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) were present at those discussions; I was present, as was the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), and I came away from those discussions with the idea that they had been eminently satisfactory to all concerned. I think there were only three questions left upon which we did not agree. One was the question of double enumerators; another was the question of an appeal from the revising officer, and the third was the question as to the appointment of the chief officer. No agreement was reached on those points. Apart from that, however, I came away with the impression that we were all thoroughly agreed and satisfied. The impression I received today from my right hon. friend's remarks was that someone has been interfering. I am inclined to think an enemy hath done this thing, that someone hath been sowing tares among the wheat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend at the moment, but perhaps he will allow me to do so later.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps it would be better after I have concluded. The bill as introduced has remedied two of the questions upon which we failed to agree. With regard to the language qualification we agreed absolutely; that was struck out. That was the first action of the conference. We agreed in regard to the disqualification of Doukhobors, and the clause in the present bill is an adaptation of the British Columbia act which has been in force for many years. The bill as introduced provides for the appeal which we discussed at that conference, and I was under the impression that we had met all objections.

I do not think my right hon. friend need have any apprehension as to what either a committee of the house or a committee of the whole may do in regard to this bill. The question of the signed statement was thoroughly discussed at the conference, and when the bill was before the house previously I remember the language of my right hon. friend when he pointed out how satisfactory it would be if two enumerators should sign as witnesses to this statement, what intense satisfaction that would give everyone. I thought that matter was practically settled. Again that is the British Columbia system, adopted by a Liberal government in that province and commended from every side by people in the west as being the best cure for the evils of personation and telegraphing as we know them in other parts of Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to ask my hon. friend a question with regard to one particular. So far as I was concerned form 7 as provided in the original bill was entirely new; while we did discuss it at some length it was entirely new to us and we asked for some time in which to think over the matter. As to the rest of it my hon. friend is correct.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The form attached to the bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The principle of registration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The principle of registration, if I understood it aright, was approved by everyone. There may be details in connection with the matter which we did not discover or discuss. In a bill of this kind there are always new ideas.

Mr. DUFF: May I ask a question? How is an absentee fisherman or sailor—and there are thousands of those in the country—to sign a questionnaire or have his name witnessed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If they are absent there is provision in the bill to have someone else do it for them. If they are not broad enough they can be broadened, but I think they are broad enough in the bill now.

Mr. ERNST: The hon. gentleman need not worry; I have most of them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In regard to this bill, and in regard to the other bill appearing on the order paper, namely Bill 115, I propose to make this motion. I shall make it now in regard to Bill 101.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I answer the minister before he makes his motion. If the house will look at the statement which I made, and which the Minister of Justice and other hon. members accepted at the time it was given, they will see I stated that my understanding of the conference which the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) and myself had with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) was that it was to be without prejudice in any particular as to the rights of all hon. members in the house to discuss any and every phase of the measure. We were not agreeing, on behalf of the opposition party, to anything. The conference was to see how near we could bring our minds to meet, and to have eliminated from the bill as largely as might be possible those provisions on which we could not agree. But beyond that there was no understanding whatever.

May I recall to the mind of the Minister of Justice exactly what took place at the first conference, seeing that he has referred to that matter himself. When we began to discuss the matter there were certain features to which my colleague and I took exception. The Minister of Justice said, "I think it is all right that exception should be taken to those matters; we will reserve them for consideration," or words to that effect. We got no farther than that. Later he told us that having considered with the Prime Minister certain provisions it had been agreed to eliminate them. When other features were mentioned the Minister of Justice said, "That is a matter we cannot consider. The government has its policy on this phase of the matter, and it is not open for discussion." He will recall that that position was taken with regard to the very matter of obliging the electors to sign applications. I spent some little time pointing out the extent to which I believed the electors would be disfranchised, if they were obliged to sign a declaration, and particularly one in which they were called upon to assert that they had read what was on the back of the declaration, and had understood its meaning and consequence. I dwelt particularly upon the extent to which women who for the first time were exercising their franchise would hesitate to sign such a document, and I pointed out the extent to which workingmen would also hesitate. The minister at each turn indicated that so far as that matter was concerned the mind of the government was made up on what he called a closed list and that we could not consider any further that aspect of the closed list. It was after that position was taken that I said, "If that is the government's decision in the matter, it makes stronger than ever the need for double enumerators." I did not acquiesce at all in the provisions which required applications to be made and signed. But, from the discussion which took place there I assumed that the government's mind was no longer open on the point, and that if we wished to consider anything that would make that feature of the bill more acceptable we were only at liberty to make representations. I think the Minister of Justice himself made perfectly clear to the house in his own statement that we were not—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the right hon. gentleman, but he is making a second speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that much to my surprise the Minister of Justice began to discuss what took place at the conference.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the right hon. gentleman but—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Your Honour may not wish to interrupt, but you are succeeding admirably in so doing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then I now call the right hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think there are some rights which belong to the members of the opposition in this house and also some rights due the leader of a political party, and I am going to assert those rights.

Mr. SPEAKER: With all due deference to the right hon. gentleman and not wishing in any respect to slight him as leader of his party, I merely remarked that each member has a right to speak once on this resolution. I called the attention of the house to the fact that in speaking as he began to do the Minister of Justice would close the debate. No other hon. member, even the right hon. leader of the opposition, has a right to speak twice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suppose that applies to the right hon. leader of the government, too?

Mr. SPEAKER: It certainly does.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly it does.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He has never been called.

Mr. BENNETT: Dealing with the point of order may I suggest that I think perhaps the right hon. gentleman, in annoyance, went rather farther than he would wish any leader of a political party to go. The question it seems to me might easily be solved by the right hon. gentleman making his observations on the motion to appoint the committee, and then there would be no question of him being out of order. He would have a perfect right then to make the statement he is now making, but he was speaking in contravention of the rules of the house, and when the right hon. gentleman suggested he might make the statement he was launching into a discussion which would necessitate further discussion. I think he would be the first to say that the Speaker was within his rights and his duty to suggest to the house that this debate constituted a violation of the rules. I did endeavour to make myself heard, but I did not succeed. I think the former Minister of Justice did hear me suggest that the observations which the right hon. gentleman desired to make might be made on the motion for the appointment of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Have I, Mr. Speaker, the same right as the Prime Minister has to talk at the present time?

Mr. BENNETT: I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then, on a point of order may I also say something? The Prime Minister has told me that my remarks were occasioned by annoyance. May I tell him they were occasioned by nothing of the kind. They were occasioned by the sense that it was right and proper and justifiable to make the statements I did in the present discussion. Before His Honour spoke, the Minister of Justice undertook to say what he had understood at the conference. That conference was understood to be private and without prejudice to anyone. Surely when the Minister of Justice states what his position was at the conference I have the same right to make absolutely clear to this house the position which was taken by my colleague and myself. That is all I did.

Mr. HACKETT: Why bring out what was in a confidential memorandum then.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me always assumes that he is a member of the ministry. He talks about what "we" mean by this and what "we" mean by that, as if he were a member of the government. May I say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that if the government has any desire to ask me questions I shall answer them, but I do not propose, when I am replying to a minister of the crown, to be interrupted by the hon. member who is not a member of the ministry, and is not likely ever to be a member.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. GUTHRIE moved:

That Bill No. 101 be referred to a special committee of this house to consist of Messrs. Guthrie, Duranleau, Hanson (York-Sunbury), Willis, Stirling, Lapointe, Stewart (Edmonton), Power and Irvine to inquire into and report said bill to this house.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to remove from the minds of any hon. members any misapprehension as to what document was before those engaged in what the right hon. leader of the opposition has described as a confidential discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was it or was it not a confidential discussion?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I thought, but the right hon. gentleman only a moment ago left the opposite impression.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was replying only to aspects of it which the Minister of Justice had discussed.

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand it, the Minister of Justice discussed the conference when he introduced the bill, and I listened to the right hon. gentleman who stood in his place and said that the statement made by the Minister of Justice was an accurate statement. I am using broad terms. After that I made a few observations and I thought it was a very excellent thing that a conference of this kind had been held and that all those present who had spoken were agreed as to what had transpired. That is what took place in this chamber when the Minister of Justice introduced the bill.

What I desired to point out was that the bill introduced was not the document that the members of the conference had before them. There was no bill that had then been introduced. It was merely a memorandum which had been prepared by the draftsman of the measure and was never introduced into this house as a bill although it was so treated by some, and I did make some complaint with respect to that although I have never made any complaint in this house with respect to it because I thought one could rely upon the ordinary amenities of life so that what was a memorandum would not be described as a bill. It was not for circulation. Two copies of it had been placed in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Minister of Justice made a statement indicating where the five copies were.

I notice that during the discussion to-day frequent reference was made to that document as a bill. It never was a bill. It was printed in the form of a bill by the draftsman who prepared it, but the only bill that has ever been before this house or submitted by council to this house was the bill which was introduced a few days ago by the Minister of Justice, and the second reading of which he moved to-day. I mention that because of the effect upon the institutions of the country of the very circumstances which have been referred to to-day. Democracy sometimes is laughed at by those who regard it as a very unsound form of government, but if the ordinary amenities of life were observed by some—I am not referring in this instance to the members of the conference themselves—certainly the statement sent abroad from this city would not have been made, for there was no bill introduced or submitted except the bill that is now before the house. I find that the right hon. gentleman in his remarks the other day, at page 3942 of Hansard, said:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: Mr. Chairman, since the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has made reference to the conference which took place between himself and the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and myself and my colleague the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), perhaps I should say a word with regard to the minister's representations in that particular. In a word, though speaking generally, I may say that so far as my recollection of the entire proceedings is concerned, the Minister of Justice has stated the matter accurately.

He referred again to the matter in the same sense. It would take too long to read it all, but he indicates at page 3943 of Hansard that the recollection of the Minister of Justice was correct, and he speaks of his desire then for a closed list.

It is unfortunate perhaps that there should be any misunderstanding now after both parties to the conference have indicated that the expressions by the Minister of Justice of what transpired correctly indicated what had in fact transpired, and the right hon. leader of the opposition agreed that that was an accurate statement of it.

I desire again to repeat to this house that when an effort is made to induce people to believe that the government introduced a bill to disfranchise people, the government introduced no such bill. The government had a number of points put down for consideration and they discussed them at a conference with the leader of the opposition, and after that conference the only bill that was presented was the bill now before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has just said that there never was a bill before the conference committee, that there was only a memorandum. I would remind the Prime Minister that time and again I asked him when we might expect to have the franchise bill, and in all the answers which my right hon. friend made to me he intimated that the bill would be ready, that it was being printed, that the government was going to consider it, that we would have it before us in a short time. When I went to see, my hon. friend, at his request, he spoke to me of a bill and said his colleagues would have a bill, and would I manage to have one of my colleagues go with me and consider all phases of it in order to see how far we might be in agreement.

Speaking in this house on June 13 I made the remarks to which my right hon. friend has just referred, and I repeatedly used the expression "bill" and no exception was taken to the word "bill," it was accepted by the Prime Minister. This is the first time we have had any talk of a memorandum instead of a bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I read what I said in this house on June 13?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Read what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. members will kindly listen to this, they will see that the Prime Minister in his own mind was thinking of a bill just as much as we were. The only question at issue was whether the government itself had finally passed upon the bill or not. It was a draft bill we had before us, and it was a bill that was—

Mr. BENNETT: A draft measure, the right hon. gentleman called it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I read what I said in this house on June 13?

As the house will remember, I frequently asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr.

Bennett) when we might expect to have this new electoral measure brought down. Finally, towards the end of April, the Prime Minister stated that very shortly a bill would be printed and that he would see that, as leader of the opposition, I was supplied with a copy. When the bill was printed the Prime Minister had a copy sent to my office, and on the day the copy arrived he stated in the house that it had been so sent. Later in the day, the Prime Minister said to me that he would be pleased if I, together with one of my colleagues, would confer with the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State concerning the measure. The Prime Minister was careful to state at the time that the purpose of the conference was solely that of considering a draft measure—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A bill is a draft measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of course a bill is a draft measure. Every bill is a draft measure.

Mr. BENNETT: Go on, read the rest of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I went on to say:

> The Prime Minister was careful to state at the time that the purpose of the conference was solely that of considering a draft measure with a view to seeing how much in the way of possible agreement might be arrived at in the introduction of a measure of this kind, and that our conference was to be entirely without prejudice in any direction.

There was no exception taken at that time by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice to my use of the word "bill." There was no reference to any memorandum that had been prepared, but when a question came up about the original measure as it was drafted, concerning certain very objectionable provisions, the Minister of Justice stated to the house that those provisions were merely in the draft and that they had not been finally accepted by the government.

In order to make perfectly clear to the house, from a chivalrous motive, that the government was not responsible for those particular objectionable features I stated that what the Minister of Justice had said, "speaking generally," was correct, and the thanks I now get for it apparently is that the government are seeking to hold me to a position which when we were in conference was never for one minute asserted by the Minister of Justice. May I read the words I used in the house on June 13, and which I have just quoted:

> Since the Minister of Justice has made reference to the conference which took place between himself and the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and myself and my colleague the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart,), perhaps I should say a word with regard to the minister's representations in that particular.

That is, representations as to the nature of the conference and as to these particular objectionable clauses. They were the ones he stressed especially. I went on:

> In a word, though speaking generally, I may say that so far as my recollection of the entire proceedings is concerned, the Minister of Justice has stated the matter accurately.

Reading the statement which the Minister of Justice made at that time and comparing it with the statement he has made this afternoon, hon. members will see that there is a great difference between the two. The Minister of Justice did not say, speaking on June 13, that that conference was at all in the nature of a conference which was to arrive at a final agreement between the parties.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not say so now. I never alleged it or even hinted it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will ask the Minister of Justice, was it ever understood at any time that with respect to all the provisions my colleagues and myself were not to be free to suggest amendments to them?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Certainly it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, was it not true that I took very strong exception to persons being asked to fill out an application form and to affix their signatures? The Minister of Justice knows such to be true.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I thought the right hon. gentleman gave strong approbation to the proposal, provided there were two enumerators; he undoubtedly did, in my judgment, on the occasion of the first reading of the bill, when he said we could have the witness of two enumerators, and what satisfaction that would give. I thought at that time he was perfectly satisfied.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Justice knows very well that there was no approbation at all. I took the strongest exception from the beginning, as I do now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am talking about the first reading of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought my hon. friend was referring to the conference. Let me make it perfectly clear—and I hope my hon. friend will bear me out—that so far as the conference was concerned I took strong exception there, and the only reason I did not continue that exception was that I was given to understand by him that that was not a phase of the bill we could have considered further. When speaking in this house on the resolution, what I stated was in relation to what the Minister of Justice had said to me about the government's determination to retain that phase of the measure. I was making clear that, if that phase was to be kept, there would have to be double enumerators. But I wish to repeat now, as emphatically as I can, that any provision of that kind will serve to disfranchise hundreds of thousands of the voters of the country, and if the bill comes back with that provision in it, so far as it is possible to avoid its passing this house, hon. gentlemen opposite may expect to see that that will be done.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I think the discussion that is now taking place illustrates very well the dangers which this house gets into when it undertakes to do things outside this chamber and when there is a secret arrangement between two parties.

An hon. MEMBER: There was no secret.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You may call it what you like; but whether secret or not the fact is that although there is a third group represented in this house—that is very well understood and recognized when it comes to the appointment of committees, and so forth—we find here a discussion of a private conference a discussion of proceedings that took place where a part of the house had no idea at all of what was occurring.

Mr. GRAY: What is the name of the third group?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is anything but fair to the third group in this house that the government and the leader of the official opposition should get together with respect to a public bill of this kind, and reach a conclusion which as it turns out is not satisfactory, and then bring it before the house, and that we should be listening here to a discussion, back and forth, of what was understood in a private conference. I think a protest has already been lodged in this corner against a practice of that kind, and I want to take this opportunity of emphasizing that position.

Mr. GRAY: The hon. member should have been here to protest.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman says I should have been here to protest. The protest was made, but I suggest that there were a number of members from the Liberal side who were away a considerable time—

Mr. GRAY: And we made a good job of it.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —and a large number of members on the Conservative side as well, including cabinet ministers. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is a rather ridiculous situation when members of the Liberal party will seek to deny to others privileges they claim for themselves. It is characteristic of them.

Now, with regard to one phase of this legislation, that, I do not think, can be at all justified. It is an adaptation, we are told, of the act now in force with respect to elections in British Columbia. I protest very decidedly against dominion legislation following the lines of some one particular province. It seems to me that if we are acting here on behalf of the dominion at large our legislation should be uniform, and there should be no exception of any kind for the prejudices of some one particular province. I have felt that way for quite a long time with regard to the practical disfranchisement of orientals on the coast. If an oriental in Alberta or Saskatchewan may vote, I think the oriental ought to be able to vote in British Columbia. The issues at stake are very considerable, especially when we think of international affairs, and I do not think that the attitude of one particular province towards a certain matter—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the hon. member in favour of enfranchising orientals in British Columbia?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am in favour of enfranchising orientals in British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: Did you say that during the late election in British Columbia?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did.

Mr. NEILL: I did not hear of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the C.C.F. in favour of it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; there is no doubt about that. I will go into your riding and tell them so; there is no doubt about it. I say that, especially in view of the international situation, it is perfectly absurd that the narrow prejudices of one particular little group in one province should imperil the good relationship between Canada and other countries. It is a ridiculous situation. If we are to have exceptions, and if dominion legislation is to follow provincial lines, I presume that in the province of Quebec we ought to refuse to give the vote to women.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Simply because women there have not the vote in provincial elections. Why not follow provincial lines in that respect also? If we are to follow that principle it is perfectly logical that we should refuse to give the women in Quebec the vote. But if we are to give the women in Quebec the right to vote in dominion elections, even though they have not the vote in provincial matters, then we have every right to extend the principle and give Asiatics and others in British Columbia the vote if they have it in other parts of the dominion.

With regard to the particular group which is to be disfranchised now, the Doukhobors, I am not sure how far the act may go. I know perfectly well that there are at least three fairly well defined sections of Doukhobors. If it means that those people who have been convicted of crime are the only ones to come under the ban, I suppose something may be said in favour of this legislation. If it means that it may be extended to include not merely those but also another section, and a very large section embracing a fine type of people indeed, then I think it is an outrage, and it is merely playing upon this difficult question of constitutional rights in order to accomplish the purpose which apparently the government has in view of disfranchising an important section of the community. I understand that in the original draft of the bill the ground of disfranchisement was very largely the refusal to bear arms, but that same refusal might disfranchise another great section of the community, the Mennonites, of whom there are large numbers not only in the west but also in Ontario. Further than that, it seems to me that the willingness to bear arms ought not to be made a condition of citizenship in this country. We are living in a time when we are talking peace, and to certain people who have long conscientiously regarded this matter as one of the fundamental tenets of their belief, it seems to me we should accord the fullest right to live in accordance with their convictions of duty. If even at Oxford university a debating team can declare that they are not going to bear arms for king and country, it is ridiculous that we should seek to disfranchise an obscure religious sect in our own country because they take a somewhat similar position. For many years conscientious objectors such as Quakers have been freely accorded their rights along those lines and I cannot see that we are advancing the cause either of patriotism or of high Christian citizenship if we enact legislation of this kind.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer in this connection. Suggestions are being made as to how various abuses could be prevented. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) takes high ground when he says that every citizen should have a perfect right to cast his vote without hindrance of any kind whatever. I should like to see this committee bring in some sort of clause that would prevent the will of the people being thwarted. I hold in my hand a paper which was published a few days ago in Ontario. It is called The Commonwealth, a weekly review in the interests of the Cooperative Commonwealth for Canadian people. It is volume one, number eighteen and is said to be published weekly by the Commonwealth Guild, 146 King street west, Toronto, Ontario; on sale at all news stands, five cents a copy; annual subscriptions, $2; Great Britain and foreign, $2.50.

This paper, I may say, is entirely faked. It is not the publication of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I see in the centre of this eight-page publication on one side an almost full page photograph of J. S. Woodsworth, "our federally minded leader." There is a part that has been inked out under which inking we can read:

Mr. Woodsworth says:

Then follows:

"Ottawa our Goal." The provincial field is not our "natural element." We must aim higher—

Ottawa Our Goal

On the opposite page there is a photograph of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Agnes Macphail), with this caption:

We must win the nation.

Then underneath:

Miss Macphail knows, as well as anyone, that the federal field is where the C.C.F. should concentrate.

Organize, therefore, for the approaching federal election. Don't waste your ammunition on the provincial "sprat" to lose the federal "mackerel."

I think the following short article might be taken as fairly typical of the eight pages:

On to Ottawa

Are we then barking up the wrong tree? Could we not render much greater loyalty and service to our cause by joining hands with the Liberal candidates in ridings where we know quite well that split voting amongst government opposition will assure Conservative victories and a hopeless outlook for the C.C.F. in Ontario and the dominion for years. Thousands of loyal C.C.F. followers know that the answer to this is "yes." The defeat of the Conservative party in Ontario is assured if this split vote trick does not fool us.

In contributing, therefore, to the ousting of Toryism in Ontario, the C.C.F. will have accomplished a great deal towards the realizing of our aims and ideals in this province and particularly in the Dominion of Canada. The defeat of the Conservative regime in Ontario will so blast the hopes of the Ottawa government and so impress the electorate throughout the dominion that the federal election field next year will provide the C.C.F. with a far better and greater opportunity to become a real force in the dominion.

Mr. Mitchell Hepburn immediately before the election—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Liberal members may cheer. Mr. Mitchell Hepburn immediately before the election proceeded to appeal to the electors of Ontario and especially to the C.C.F. electors to support the Liberal party. He quoted from what he said was the official organ of the C.C.F. The Commonwealth, and he read a paragraph from the paper which I hold in my hand. He made that the ground of appeal—the official organ of the C.C.F.; this is what the C.C.F. says; this is what Woodsworth says, and so on. There is no indication on this document as to who the printers are and I suppose that in itself makes it illegal. I am not in a position to say whether Mr. Hepburn knew it was a fake; I can hardly think Mr. Hepburn who sat in this house for some years and knew the position we had taken could be so innocent as to believe this was a genuine publication but he used it on the eve of an election when there was no chance whatever for us to answer. If the Liberals cheer and rejoice in this thing, I want to say to them that I would rather our party should go down to defeat than that they should win an election by methods such as this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to a question of privilege. It relates to the point as to whether the understanding at the time of this conference was not that we were considering a draft bill or a draft act and not a memorandum. On page 3001 of Hansard of May 14, the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister): Resolutions have been sent to the clerk of the house with respect to, first the public works bill, second, the elections bill, third, the bill providing for arrangements between farmers and their creditors, fourth, the bill amending the Farm Loan Act.

Then on page 3002, under the heading "Dominion Elections Act" we find this:

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister was kind enough to say he would send me a draft of the election act.

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister): I sent it over Saturday.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

The Prime Minister did not say he had sent me a memorandum; he said that he had sent me a draft of the act. That was the only term used in all our discussions. Sometimes it was referred to as an act or bill, sometimes as the elections act, sometimes as the franchise act or bill. There was no mention at any time of any memorandum until this afternoon. With regard to what was said in conversation while in conference in reply to my hon. friend the other day I was careful to draw the attention of the house to the fact that I was referring, in my reply to him, only to the representations which he had made on the floor of the house; that I regarded myself as precluded from saying anything about what had actually taken place in the conversation, other than to indicate in general terms, that the representations that the Minister of Justice had made in the particulars I had mentioned were correct.

On page 3943 of Hansard it will be seen that I spoke as follows:

In what I have now to say, Mr. Chairman, I presume I must confine myself, not to my remembrance of the draft bill, but rather to what the Minister of Justice has just said in regard to the proposed measure.

Then a little further on:

As to the franchise, may I say that I do not believe there is a necessity for altering in any particular the franchise as it now stands. I noticed that in his remarks this afternoon the Minister of Justice has not indicated any changes to be made in that respect.

Mr. Bennett: Except the difficulty in British Columbia.

Mr. Mackenzie King: The Prime Minister mentions the difficulty in British Columbia; I presume he means the difficulty with respect to the Doukhobors in that province.

Mr. Bennett: Yes.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Yes, that is the only possible change in regard to the franchise, and it is a matter which may easily be considered when we have the clause before us. If we leave that matter out of account, and it is understood that so far as the franchise is concerned the new measure will be in all particulars the same as the present act, that will be entirely satisfactory.

Now what I really had in mind and actually thought when I made that statement and said that I believed the measure would be satisfactory was that the government had listened to the representations which had been made by my colleague and myself as to the strong objection that would be taken on this side to retaining the provisions requiring electors to sign an application, and had decided to drop them. I had pointed out clearly in the conference that if the signing of applications was to be required there would be a large number of persons who would not sign and who would therefore be disqualified from voting. That is what I meant when I said I would be perfectly satisfied if in this bill, which I had not seen, but which the minister was introducing, the franchise was left as it is at the present time. The words are as plain as the English language can make them.

Mr. HACKETT: With the permission of the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition may I say a few words? I might ask him to pursue the explanation he has given. He has found it convenient this afternoon to vent his spleen both upon the Speaker and upon one—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I ask if that is in order? I ask that the hon. member be obliged to retract that statement. I say that the language used by the hon. member in reference to myself is unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not accuse the right hon. leader of the opposition of venting spleen.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the term and say that he has found it convenient this afternoon to address language to the chair which seemed questionable in the minds of most hon. members. Furthermore, carrying on in the temper in which he had addressed the chair, he has found it convenient to address certain words to a newly arrived member and one who occupies a very inconspicuous position in the party to the right of the speaker. As the right hon. gentleman is in a mood to explain, and as he is an adept at explanations, I ask the right hon. gentleman to tell this house how a memorandum which he has called a confidential memorandum, discussed in what he called a confidential conference, found its way into the press, when he and he only was in possession of that memorandum.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HACKETT: When the right hon. gentleman has given this explanation to the house, then and not until then may he use the terms of chivalry and justice and decency which so frequently fall from his lips.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the first place may I say that I think the remarks of the hon. member are in the nature of an insinuation which he should be obliged to withdraw, and I ask that they be withdrawn. I say to the house, as the house will well remember, that before any conference took place whatever between the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and myself, the press of this country had a very full and fairly accurate statement of much that appeared in the so-called draft measure. Any information that was obtained throughout the country with regard to the measure came from that source. I said the other day in this house, and this statement was accepted by the Prime Minister and hon. gentlemen, that I had not in any way disclosed any matter of confidence with respect to the conference. I think my word will be accepted by everyone, even the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. If he is not prepared to accept it, of course, I must just allow him to pursue the course that he thinks proper. But he rather prides himself as being one who understands the amenities of parliamentary life, so I hope he will now show that he is capable of appreciating the obligations of a gentleman by withdrawing the insinuation which neither he nor anyone else had the right to make.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw any insinuation, that I may give to the right hon. gentleman an example which I trust he will follow.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, purely on a question of privilege, I do regret, especially in view of the observations made by the right hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, that he was not quite fair either to the house or to myself. These were his words, not in the heat of passion, not in the midst of discussion but immediately after he commenced speaking, as found on page 3942 of Hansard:

> As the house will remember, I frequently asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when we might expect to have this new electoral measure brought down. Finally, towards the end of April, the Prime Minister stated that very shortly a bill would be printed and that he would see that, as leader of the opposition, I was supplied with a copy. When the bill was printed the Prime Minister had a copy sent to my office, and on the day the copy arrived he stated in the house that it had been so sent. Later in the day, the Prime Minister said to me that he would be pleased if I, together with one of my colleagues, would confer with the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State concerning the measure. The Prime Minister was careful to state at the time that the purpose of the conference was solely that of considering a draft measure with a view to seeing how much in the way of possible agreement might be arrived at in the introduction of a measure of this kind, and that our conference was to be entirely without prejudice in any direction. That is to say, anything that was said at the conference would not necessarily bind the government with respect to its rights in the matter of the final form of the bill and would not in any way limit the opposition or other parties in the house with respect to proposals and criticisms they might wish to make.
> When the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) and myself met with the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, we were again advised that the measure before us was a draft measure and that neither side would be committed with respect to any suggestions that might be made or with respect, as I understood it, to any conclusions that might be reached. We were simply to endeavour to see how far our minds might be brought to be as one with respect to the measure as drafted. As the Minister of Justice has stated, the draftsman, Mr. O'Connor, was present at the two conferences that took place, and was consulted with respect to the intent and meaning of different clauses.

On these matters I think there is no point of difference between us. If I have omitted to refer to any phase of either of the interviews which either the Secretary of State or the Minister of Justice would expect me to mention I should be glad to be reminded of it and to say what may seem necessary by way of comment.

Now, I do submit to this house that what I said this afternoon is borne out by what I have just read; that the purpose of the conference was solely that of considering a draft measure with a view to seeing how much in the way of possible agreement might be arrived at in the introduction of a measure of this kind. That is all. There was no bill.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There was a bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me, there was no bill; it was in the form of a bill, and there are many of them in the privy council office, as I said before. The draft had not even been considered by the cabinet. That draft had been given to the right hon. gentleman in order to see what parts of it we might agree on for the introduction of a bill. The bill now before the house represents the only bill which was considered by the council and approved for the consideration of this house. I mention that only as a matter of privilege, because I think there was no doubt in the mind of the right hon. gentleman at that time that what was before him was a draft submitted to him for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion.

As far as the rest of it is concerned, I think it is very much to be deprecated that difficulties have arisen as to recollection, in view of the statement made by the right hon. gentleman in the opening of his observations. The endeavour to describe a draft that has not been submitted to this house as a bill which represented the mind of the government is as unfair and ungenerous as the right hon. gentleman a few moments ago said were certain observations of other hon. members of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no difference between the statements I made this afternoon and what my right hon. friend has read.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh dear, dear. Just read them.

Mr. HACKETT: On a question of privilege, I am going to ask the right hon. leader of the opposition whether or not he thinks he should withdraw the words he addressed to me this afternoon, having attributed to me words which I did not utter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the hon. gentleman tell me what words I attributed to him that he did not utter?

Mr. HACKETT: The right hon. gentleman said I had addressed him and his former ministry in terms of "we" and "us" as if I were speaking for His Majesty's government. That is an inaccuracy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member has just stated that I used the word: "me" and "my ministry." I have no ministry.

An hon. MEMBER: And you never will.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We shall see; do not be too sure. I was referring to the ministry which my hon. friend follows, of which I said, by the expression he used, he seemed to think he was a member.

Mr. HACKETT: Apparently the right hon. gentleman wishes to miss the point. He has declined to make the amende honorable, and I cannot say that I am entirely astonished.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is referred to the special committee appointed to either sanction or amend the elections act. I wish to make a few suggestions in order that members of that committee be not deceived by some of the speeches delivered by our friends opposite with the intention of disguising the object which the government have in view in introducing this bill, in the last days of the session. To my mind, this bill is but a gilded pill which leaves me quite indifferent. Like the former act passed previous to the 1917 campaign, its object is simply to steal elections. Members opposite wish to sanction this bill at this session because of their fear of being put out of power and having to remain at home. I see no necessity for introducing this bill when all are aware that the two official parties were quite satisfied with the former act, at the last election. The Conservatives took office thanks to this act; however, it is obvious, to-day, more than ever, that their victory was not due to that act, but rather to their lies and pledges, they therefore fear now that their promises might not have the same result.

I have serious doubts, sir, as to the government's intentions in introducing this measure. The following is a proof of their lack of sincerity: after accepting the suggestions of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to appoint two enumerators, whose names would be suggested by the former candidates, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) forgets to include the suggestion in the bill, in order to be better prepared to again set aside his promise and appoint two enumerators of his own choice.

With reference to the signing of a form by the electors in what way will the object of the bill be attained, if the enumerators do not often call at each home to ascertain the names of the voters? If these enumerators simply make one call and find the people absent, the latter will have to go to the trouble of leaving their residence so as to sign a new form in the presence of the receiving officer.

If the government were in earnest, and wished to extend the franchise, thus allowing all persons duly qualified to register their vote, it would introduce a measure compelling such persons to exercise their franchise. It would thereby dispel many doubts as to its intentions.

I have little to add, sir; however, I wish to state that this conflict of opinions with reference to this new act should be settled by the people instead of by the house. The government is aware that it does not command, to-day, the confidence of the people. It is high time to appeal to the people, so as to get rid of a government which, for the last four years, is dying from inertia, has done nothing to help the people of this country and, thereby, realizes, to-day, what responsibility weighs on its shoulders.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I followed the hon. member's remarks. May I put forth a suggestion. It would be more practical for him to repeat his suggestions before the committee when the latter meets. Thus, the hon. member will discover that his fears and charges are ill-founded and, furthermore, it will give the committee an opportunity of taking advantage of his experience and suggestions.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri). I should like to add a few words to what has been said by the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), and to offer a suggestion with regard to rules 1 and 2 of schedule A to section 17, which has to do with the preparing of lists of electors.

I humbly submit that if this provision is not changed many people entitled to vote will not have their names on the list, and this will work to the disadvantage of all candidates in the next general election. I suggest that these enumerators—of whom I hope there will be two—when going from house to house should be allowed to register all those residing in that house who are over twenty-one years of age and entitled to vote, according to the Franchise Act. That was the practice followed in the 1930 election. The legislation was amended to meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen opposite, who were then on this side of the house; one more enumerator was given them, and that law was accepted as being as nearly perfect as possible. Now we wish the same privilege we granted them in 1930; we want these two enumerators to prepare the list as it was prepared then, when hon. gentlemen opposite were returned to power. Surely they can offer no objection to that law, because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has said that he wants to extend the franchise to all those entitled to vote. I humbly submit that it should be done in this way. If you just leave a form at the house to be signed by each voter, during the day the husband, the son and the daughter will be away, and if there are boarders in the house they will be at work also. If we wish to give the franchise to all those who are entitled to it, and to act on a basis of giving British fair play we will have to have the enumerators inscribe on their lists the names of those who have the right to vote. They could do that when they go from house to house preparing their lists. I humbly suggest that this system was approved in the past and those who were entitled to be on the lists were on the lists. Perhaps if the enumerators would leave a few applications at the houses, according to the number of voters, those people might sign the applications. They would be obliged to return them to the enumerators who would be the only judges to say whether or not those people were entitled to vote.

May I say that one must read the form appearing in the schedule. Let us consider the case of a woman who has never signed anything in the absence of her husband. Husbands tell their wives not to sign this or that document without authorization. Does any hon. member think that a woman would sign these blanks? I say most of them would refuse, because they do not know why they are signing; they do not know the purpose of it. They would not sign, and especially when they must swear that they have taken cognizance of the forms and all matters and things printed on the back thereof. Such procedure would be unjust on the face of it, and does not have the effect of granting the franchise to those who would like to have it. I humbly submit to the Minister of Justice, who is so anxious to give the freedom of the franchise to everyone entitled to vote, that he should see that this list is prepared on the basis and as a result of the instructions given when the preparation was made in 1930.

Another suggestion is this, that if we are to accept the signatures of all these persons their duty must be made very simple. We cannot, by a long written document make the plan operative, in the judicial sense. The applications should certainly be taken by the enumerators. I know of one district in Montreal with a population of 97,000 and a voting population of 65,000, and I am wondering why those people should be obliged to find a registrar or to go here and there on behalf of a revision. That would be the burden imposed on the people of that district, and I suggest it is not the proper way to give the franchise to Canadians. They are entitled to vote, and they must not be stampeded by legislation or by putting obstacles in their way in the matter of getting their names on the lists. Let them have their names on the lists in as free a manner as possible, so that they will be given justice, and may attain their rights easily and according to British fair play. Let us have a system so that all voters will be on the lists and will be accorded the best and easiest way of having their votes inscribed.

I say again that the system in 1930 was satisfactory. The Conservative party then sitting to the left of Mr. Speaker, appeared before the committee on privileges and elections, asking for some amendments to the law. Strange to say, in 1930 we had a change in the Elections Act. In 1917 the law was changed by hon. members now sitting to the right. In 1921 another change came into effect at the request of the Conservative party. When the Liberal party assumed office amendments were asked, and were given. Then, in 1930 the Conservative party took the reins of office and, in 1934 when an election cannot be far distant, when we may expect one either now or next year, that party comes along and changes the act. When it has been in power the Conservative party has always changed the Elections Act and when the Liberal party has been in power they have offered changes.

In my humble view the 1930 legislation should be accepted as a fair basis upon which any party could prepare new voters' lists. Voters should be given ample facility to register and should have the facility to which under British justice they are entitled.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr Speaker, I should like to refer to the statement made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). In his remarks he referred to the publication of a paper entitled The Commonwealth, a weekly review in the interests of a cooperative commonwealth for Canadian people. He mentioned that this was advertised as being printed at 146 King Street West, Toronto. He omitted to say—and I am saying it for him—that this address is the head office of the C.C.F. in Toronto, and it is an absolute falsehood to say that this paper is printed at that address. The address given on the publication is given intentionally to mislead people, which apparently it did. I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the address is entirely wrong, that the place indicated is the head office of the C.C.F. in Toronto, and that the paper was not printed at that place.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I listened to what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). He said that Mr. Hepburn, the premier-elect of Ontario, appealed to the C.C.F. voters in the Ontario campaign. His appeal was not absolutely that. He appealed to all men of good will, and all the men of good will in the good old province of Ontario have answered his call.

I have very little to say about this bill. I made the suggestion that section 4 should be amended. It disqualifies the Esquimaux and the Indians. I suggest that also those who make extravagant promises during election campaigns should be disqualified. This is a very humble suggestion I make to the committee. Then, there is another suggestion I would offer to the government. I have not read the bill, but I shall read it before the election. My impression is that the Prime Minister wants to leave something behind him in the shape of books, statute books. Why does he not publish a telephone directory of all the cities of Canada as a statute in order to make a still larger book? All the legislation that has been enacted by this government since 1930 is economically unsound, useless and futile. The only sensible legislation which has been passed by this government is the act relating to the statute of Westminster, which had been decided upon by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the British government before this government came into power in 1930, and all that this government did in the matter was simply to repeat what had been decided upon by the previous Liberal administration.

Sir, there are hard things done at times during an election, and there are hard times, but it is not on account of Liberal policies. But it is hard when the Tories try to steal our votes. During one campaign when the shadow government was appealing to the country a man went about from house to house and door to door asking people to give him their names so that they could be registered, and after they had given him their names this man gave to the registrar the names of the good Tories of the constituency and left off the names of the Liberals. I have made this same statement in my home town of Riviere du Loup, to the shame of that man. Last year I asked the government if that man had been employed by them in the election, and the answer of the Secretary of State was no.

In this legislation, Mr. Speaker, I notice that the government is trying to have the least possible number of votes cast in the next election. That is my personal opinion. What happened last year? We had a Redistribution Act.

Mr. McINTOSH: The first steal.

Mr. POULIOT: It was the first steal after the Liberal victory in Huron which brought us a message of cheer from the good old province of Ontario. Now that the Conservatives have been swept out of office or defeated at the polls by popular indignation in provincial elections in Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Quebec, Manitoba, Ontario and Saskatchewan, the Tories are like flies on fly-paper. The Tories here are trying to stick to office, but they will not stick to it against the will of the people. They will be blown away just as Conservative governments have been blown away in Nova Scotia, Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

Mr. E. C. ST-PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, within the last few years, sociologists and all those who take an interest in public matters have endeavoured to create throughout the country a stronger civic spirit. One delights in repeating, here and there, that nations have the governments they deserve and, one even extols compulsory vote, in order to oblige citizens to fulfil the most important duty of all those which fall to their lot—after the one rendered to God—to all exercise their franchise, on election day, both provincial and federal.

The bill which bears the number 101 is far from promoting such a civic spirit and I note that far from pointing out to our people this spirit which is proclaimed everywhere, such a measure would close all avenues, not only as regards compulsory vote but also as to the one that all citizens are morally called upon to give at election time.

In my opinion the first provision of the bill, that of the preparation of the lists of electors in our large cities, will disfranchise three quarters of the electors at the next election. What do we find in reading over this provision? That the enumerator will have one single form signed by the only person present at the residence when he calls, disregarding entirely those who are away from the house. Our friends opposite will contend that those absent will have, as a last resort, the office of the revising officer. I appeal to their good faith and their practical knowledge of how the vote is to be cast in our large cities. I cannot recognize or approve by my vote a measure which would deprive of their franchise the three quarters of the electors of my constituency. During this crisis when people leave their home daily to seek work, here and there, can one reasonably suppose that an enumerator calling at a house, at any hour of the day, will find there every one who is entitled to vote on polling day?

Let us closely examine this famous rule, No. 1. What more do we find? An enumerator, twenty years old or even older will be the sole judge to decide of the right of vote of an elector having signed a form.

I cannot subscribe to such a regulation which would deprive my electors of their right to exercise their franchise. Why close to the elector, by such a bill, all avenues which lead, as I previously stated, to the fulfilment of this important duty of casting his vote on election day?

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) pointed out the other day that such a measure would purge election morals. I am perhaps a pessimist, however, I always recall this advice of Jean Jacques Rousseau to his son: My son, beware of mens honour when the sun has set!

Without attributing any bad intention to those who are, at present, the sponsors of this bill, I state that this piece of legislation such as drafted will receive not only my disapproval as to the various provisions embodied but I shall cast my vote against the bill, unless it is amended.

The right hon. Prime Minister pointed out to us—Oh! the fear of those greatly frightened —that an election may be won by telegraphing, by plugging, an expression used in Western Canada. A candidate must consider himself not very popular to resort to telegraphing or plugging organization on election day.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): You are not guilty of such a practice.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): For my part I have always fought my opponents sir, without resorting to such means; however, I shall submit a system that the best of the candidates may against his will, see applied in his own constituency. This bill might, perhaps, prevent plugging or telegraphing, but there is one thing which it will certainly bring about, namely, the most dangerous system of stealing an election. On voting day, in large cities, between 4 p.m. and 7 p.m. when voters crowd the polls, these will be blocked, and a deputy returning officer, who without being the least partial will be called upon to apply all the provisions of this new election act.

One, ten, twenty or forty workmen are at the polls in order to vote. Even if the deputy returning officer had the best intentions in the world, he must refer first to the alphabetical list to see that the elector is inscribed, secondly examine the geographical list which is the poll list, moreover he must also verify the famous signature of the elector. If the latter is somewhat nervous, somewhat irritated for having waited so long at the door of the poll, he may sign with a shaky hand, perhaps, a little different from what appears on his form. The deputy returning officer may then declare on the spot that this elector cannot vote. Forty voters at the door of the poll, an average of seven minutes for each voter! The most popular candidate of a county, may find himself, when the votes are counted in the evening, defeated by a large majority.

The delays at the polls are more to be feared than the great apprehension of telegraphers and pluggers. When telegraphing organizations are at work, there is to be found sometimes a person conscientious enough to inform the day before the candidate who he knows to be an upright man in election matters, that, in such and such a place of his constituency there exists an organization to rob him of his election.

I shall mention no date, but in the course of my election campaigns one of my opponents who had organized a similar system, was greatly disappointed on election day, when at nine thirty a.m., thanks to the information given by an honest Conservative, I had thirty-eight of these telegraphers arrested whom he had organized the previous day.

These are the bugbears which one wishes to utilize to justify this election bill which is, properly speaking, not a measure to grant the franchise, but really to eliminate three-quarters of city voters. Perhaps one may contend, to use an English idiom—for English it seems is more "telling" in matters practical—"that will work both ways." To my mind, in large constituencies, whether the majority be Liberal or Conservative, such a bill has no common sense. In no way will it contribute to uplift the level of electoral ethics.

Now, sir, could my hon. friends opposite define what constitutes an illiterate person? An illiterate person, Larousse says, is a person who neither can read nor write. In the province I represent—and it is not inferior from an intellectual viewpoint to the other provinces of this dominion—there are a number of people who can read but cannot write. All such persons shall apply to the revising officer who, alone, shall have the right to inscribe them on the electoral list. Can you imagine, sir, in large constituencies like Hochelaga, St. Denis, St. Henri, etc., old people walking long distances to call on the revising officers?

One may contend that the object of the law is to protect the people against their own acts, that is, to instil in them a civic spirit; however, this measure of expediency has a political end in view and for an entirely different purpose. This bill is the outcome of a selfish design, it is the clear manifestation of a will not so much to create a better act but to disfranchise in large cities voters, the majority of whom are favourable to the candidates of the Liberal party.

I appeal, sir, to the sense of fair play of my friends opposite. I do not state that they are responsible for the drafting of this bill; however it is a current rumour in Ottawa, that the author of such a measure, is the person who had the boldness of drafting the elections act during the war. These facts are known by all and that is the principal reason which forces me to protest against the adoption of this bill. This measure is intended to help the Conservative party. Why should the Conservatives resort to such a measure, as a matter of mere expediency, considering they were hoisted to power in 1930, by this franchise act which has governed us heretofore? If the policy of our friends opposite was so beneficial to the country, they surely have no fear to proclaim it to the people at the next dominion election. If the measures they passed this year, such as the marketing board and other similar ones, are destined to spread, among our people a prosperity unknown to us since the beginning of the crisis, they should carry out their next election under the shield of the elections act which raised them to power in 1930, and to which no one objected heretofore.

The mechanism, sir, of the bill introduced will be a source of further expenditure to the country. When so many workmen are suffering in our cities, when our small property owners are faced with bankruptcy, is the time well chosen for a government which, from the moment it took office, has advocated thrift everywhere, is it opportune to make further outlays by creating new positions: revising officers, franchise commissioners whose salaries will certainly not be that earned by a poor unemployed, at present. Why further burden the Treasury of our country?

I shall only support this bill if it improves the 1930 act. To use a well known expression: I am from Missouri and you have got to show me. As long as you do not prove to the Liberals that this measure will be a great improvement, I shall oppose it. I take this stand to protect the electors whom I represent against all encroachments of their franchise. One cannot be too prudent in these days of various changes. Bill No. 101, such as submitted to Parliament, deserves the disapproval of the champion of the dearest rights of the people: the voter.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): To my mind this bill deals with a subject of transcendent importance, an importance far beyond that of any party consideration, of any consideration of racial origin or of creed, because its object is or should be to secure to every qualified citizen of Canada, no matter what their ideals or beliefs, the opportunity of recording their vote, and to suppress to the degree that is possible fraud in connection with elections, in order that when an election does take place it shall reflect the real voice of those in Canada who have a right to speak. Because of this fact I was delighted when the Minister of Justice moved to have this bill referred to a committee. But I find myself wondering whether I was mistaken in my conception of the reasons why this bill was thus referred.

In listening to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he made the suggestion, in which I fully concur, that the bill should be sent to a committee, I understood that it was to avoid protracted and contentious debate in this house, contentious debate upon a subject which, as I have stated, should be beyond political considerations because it is a subject upon which rests not the fate alone of one party but the fate and the proper functioning of all of our democratic institutions in this country, of parliament itself, and of any government which is returned to power. I have begun to wonder of late, however, as the debate proceeded, whether I was mistaken in that conception of the purpose, for it seems to me that in the form which the debate has taken—and I make no reference to any one in particular of the three sides in the house—that purpose is being defeated, and those passions are being roused which it should be our object to obviate. To my mind, though I may be mistaken, as I have been accused of being a visionary in these matters, this is one subject which essentially should be treated dispassionately, calmly and wisely; and in a reference to a committee it would be made possible for the discussion to be carried on free from this passion, for an agreement to be arrived at based on the suggestions and ideas of all sides of the house, so that when it did come before the house, after the committee had finished with its work, it might be a bill which might be presented to the country as the united voice of parliament seeking to bestow on the people an opportunity of speaking and registering their views, politically speaking, no matter what those views might be.

Might I make this suggestion, that in this committee itself, all differences of opinion might well be threshed out to better effect than in the house; and if agreement is then not reached, when it has become obvious that agreement cannot be arrived at and that strong differences prevail, then after the committee had reported would be time for any real fight to be carried on. I am not speaking merely because, like everyone else, I should like to get home; I am speaking in the interests of the bill and of every party in this house, and I think I express the opinion of most people in this country.

Mr. JOSEPH A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): It is not my intention to take up much of the time of the house after the lengthy discussion we have had, because I intend to appear before the special committee named this afternoon and submit to that committee my views in reference to this bill. But as so much has been said by members from the city of Montreal in reference to the bill, I think it is my duty to add a word or two to what has already been stated.

In the first place, I believe that in 1930 the electors of Canada were more than satisfied with the electoral lists as submitted to them.

At that time, you will remember, enumeration was made by a visit from house to house. The list was prepared and submitted to the electors and to the candidates, and the utmost satisfaction was expressed with regard to that list. The difference with the present bill is that the two enumerators to be named by the registrar will likewise make a house to house visit with application forms for registration on the voters list, but of necessity it will happen, in places like Montreal, in the division which I represent, that these visits will be made in the day time. During the hours of these calls most likely the only person to be found in the family residence will be the mother. The application form will be presented to that lady and she alone will have the right to have her name placed on the list because the application forms when signed, are returned to the enumerators who give a receipt stating whether they accept the application of the person who is the signatory to the form. In cities like Montreal and, as a matter of fact, in most cities throughout Canada with the enlarged franchise that we have now, there are in some families as many as twelve persons who are entitled to vote and the result will be that only the mother of the household being present when the enumerators make their calls, she alone out of the large number of persons in that family entitled to vote, will have her name placed on the list.

What will the other members of the household do? The law does not seem to be clear or, at any rate, it is not clear to me on that point; but the enumerators will possibly leave other application forms there because the law provides for the signing of these forms apart from the presence of the enumerators. If we assume that such a condition exists, if the other members of the family desire their names to appear on the voters' list, they will have to sign these forms and take them to the office established either by the registrar or by the revising officer. For the reason I have just given there will be a large number of persons who, if they desire to have their names on the voters' list, will have to go before that official and the result will be that they will have to wait a long time outside his office. They will have to suffer loss of time and inconvenience in waiting at that office and in many cases such people will not go to that trouble with the result that out of a family of several persons entitled to vote the only one whose name, according to the preliminary arrangements made upon the visit of the enumerators, will be found upon the voters' list, will be that of the mother.

I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), in explaining this measure when he introduced it in the house in the beginning of the week, said that the main idea of the government in presenting a new franchise measure was to shorten the period during which an election could take place. It is quite true that under the 1930 act six weeks passed during which the election campaign was carried on and the present idea of shortening that period is in itself good, but it seems to me—and I shall submit this to the special committee named this afternoon—that if these enumerators were empowered to make a second and perhaps a third visit to the family in order to pick up the application forms which might have been signed in the interval by the other members of the household, the period during which the election could take place would not be changed and elections could be brought about in the same manner in a period of one month or five weeks. The enumerators would pick up the applications signed by the other members of the family who were absent on the first call; those applications would be submitted to the registrar; the registrar would draw up the list and once it was drawn up in that manner it would become a closed list just as it is the intention of the government to have it. If the election comes on, as we hope it will, within twelve months after the making up of the lists, no revision will take place, but in case of a revision of the lists during the revising period fixed by the law the same difficulties will be encountered; a man who moves from one district to another in a city and whose name is not on the list will have to go to the same trouble as he would have had to do in the case of the drawing up of the basic list. This means a period of disturbance for all the electors of Canada every twelve months when these lists are being revised.

In addition, I would like to draw attention to one clause in the bill which says that the revising officer may direct an elector who has made application under the revision to have his name put on the list, to go to another district than the one in which he resides. That is an additional burden upon electors. If we take the matter as a whole, if it were possible for these enumerators by making several house to house visitations to draw up a list which would be closed and would resemble the list of 1930, the people of Canada would be amply satisfied with such a list.

I understand there is a question of expense which has to be taken into consideration in this matter. The sum of $600,000 has been placed in the supplementary estimates to put this legislation into working form but it would not be a matter of great additional expense if these enumerators followed up their first visit, went back to the households in which were persons entitled to vote who were not present on the first call, get their applications and submit these to the registrar. In this way a competent, efficient and just list could be drawn up and the election carried on in such a manner as to satisfy the people of Canada.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

On the order for the second reading of Bill No. 115, respecting the election of members of the House of Commons:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Before the motion is made in this case I shall have to ask the unanimous consent of the house as this bill has not been printed. It is cognate to the bill we have just sent to a committee and I propose to move that it be sent to the same committee. If that committee is to meet early in the week it might consider both bills at the same time and in that way avoid delay. If the house agrees I will move that this bill be read a second time and be referred to that committee.

Right Hon. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I assume the Minister of Justice will undertake to say that in no way will we be committing ourselves to any phase of the measure.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No committal at all.

The SPEAKER: Mr. Guthrie moves that Bill No. 115, respecting the election of members of the House of Commons, be read a second time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. GUTHRIE moved:

That Bill No. 115 be referred to a special committee of this house to consist of Messrs. Guthrie, Duranleau, Hanson (York-Sunbury), Willis, Stirling, Lapointe, Stewart (Edmonton), Power and Irvine to inquire into and report said bill to this house.

Motion agreed to.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

The house resumed from Thursday, June 21, consideration in committee of Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Bank of Canada—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Rowe in the chair.

On section 9—Directors.

Mr. RALSTON: The committee was discussing last evening an amendment which I was proposing to section 9. I placed the amendment in the hands of the chairman, but it has not actually been read. The amendment is:

That section 9 be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

9. (1) In addition to the governor and the deputy governor as members of the board, and notwithstanding anything contained in section ten of this act, the following members of the civil service of Canada shall be provisional directors of the bank, namely, the deputy minister of finance; the counsellor of the Department of External Affairs; the comptroller government guarantee branch; the comptroller of the treasury; the comptroller of currency; the director of estimates and assistant secretary to the treasury board, and the solicitor to the treasury, and shall remain in office until replaced by directors duly elected or appointed in their stead, as hereinafter provided. The said provisional directors shall serve without remuneration.

(2) To replace the provisional directors designated in subsection (1) hereof, four directors (hereinafter referred to as "shareholder directors") shall be elected by the shareholders and three directors (hereinafter referred to as "federal directors") shall be appointed by the governor in council, as provided for in subsection (3) hereof;

(3) (a) At the first general meeting of shareholders, four shareholder directors shall be elected for terms to run as follows: one until the third annual general meeting, one until the fourth annual general meeting, one until the fifth annual general meeting, and one until the sixth annual general meeting, respectively.

(b) As of the date of the first general meeting of shareholders, three federal directors shall be appointed for terms to run as follows: one until the date of the fourth annual general meeting, one until the date of the fifth annual general meeting, and one until the date of the sixth annual general meeting, respectively.

(4) From time to time, on the expiration of the terms of office of the respective directors, the successors to shareholder directors shall be elected by the shareholders, and the successors to federal directors shall be appointed by the governor in council and each of such successors shall hold office until the date of the fifth annual general meeting after such election or appointment.

(5) In the event of a vacancy amongst the directors, if the director whose place has become vacant is a shareholder director, the board shall appoint a qualified person to fill the vacancy and to hold office until the next annual meeting when the shareholders shall elect a person to fill the vacancy for the remainder of the term of such director; and if the director whose place has become vacant is a federal director, the governor in council shall appoint a qualified person to fill the vacancy and to hold office for the remainder of the term of such director.

(6) Directors shall be eligible for reelection and reappointment.

I have already indicated to the committee the purpose of the amendment, which is to substitute for seven directors appointed by private interests as represented by the shareholders of this bank four directors to be appointed by the shareholders and three by the governor in council.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in replying to what I said last evening, mentioned two or three points which I should like to recall to the committee. In the first place he rather took issue with what I said as to the powers of the treasury board under the Finance Act. He is quite right in this, that the treasury board has not the full powers as provided for the central bank in this bill. But the point I was making is this; the Prime Minister indicated that his reason for not having the government take a prominent part in the control of this bank was that he did not want the bank made a political football. My point was that ever since the Finance Act passed the treasury board, which is admittedly and wholly a political body, consisting of five members of the government of the day, have had all the powers under the Finance Act, which powers include almost every power provided for in the central bank bill. I think the only two powers omitted, speaking generally, are the power to deal in gold bullion, which after all is a power which the government has in a general way under our present financial structure, and the power to make advances in certain cases on commercial paper.

Mr. BENNETT: And a third power, open market operations.

Mr. RALSTON: If the committee will permit me to withdraw and correct that last statement; I should have said that the second power which the central bank has which the treasury board has not is the power to conduct open market operations. Under the Finance Act the treasury board have power to make advances on:

(a) treasury bills, bonds, debentures or stocks of the Dominion of Canada, Great Britain, any province of Canada, and of any British possession;

(b) public securities of the government of the United States;

(c) Canadian municipal securities;

(d) promissory notes and bills of exchange—

And I commend this to some hon. gentleman who suggested that there was no such power.

—secured by documentary title to wheat, oats, rye, barley, corn, buckwheat, flax, or other commodity;

(e) promissory notes and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes and which have been used or are to be used for such purposes.

[Mr. Ralston.]

And then section 7.

The minister may permit bills of lading or other documents of title, covering such grain or other commodity while in transit, to go forward under the control of the bank to the point at which delivery is made and payment therefor is received, and the bank shall be a trustee for the minister, to the extent of the advances, of the proceeds received for such grain or commodity.

Those powers are pretty wide. They were administered by a political body, and there never was and never has been any suggestion made, and no suggestion can be made that in any sense the powers of the ministry and the treasury board under the Finance Act permitted the financial system of this country to be made a political football.

That is the point that I was endeavouring to make. And my attention is called to what Sir Thomas White said with regard to it:

It was suggested during the course of our hearings that political influence might possibly affect unfavourably the administration of the Finance Act because the treasury board which authorizes advances and fixes rates of interest payable thereon is composed of members of the government. With regard to this I have only to say that if by "political influence" is meant partisan or improper influence not a shred of evidence has been adduced before the commission in support of such a suggestion.

That is why I was referring to the Finance Act. The fact that the central bank has a little more power, that is power to conduct open market operations, which merely means the buying and selling of securities, and power to deal a little more freely in gold, I do not think detracts in the slightest from the point that I was endeavouring to make, that even under direct political control the administration of the Finance Act has never been made a political football. So I think we can put that suggestion aside; I think it is not justified at this period in our history. Even in the financial publications, for instance in the Financial Post, I noticed not long ago a statement in regard to this very matter indicating that political considerations had not entered into the administration of the Finance Act and it was not believed that they would enter into the administration of a central bank. That is one reason that my right hon. friend gave for not accepting the amendment for government ownership.

What has my right hon. friend brought out in connection with the proposal for government control? He has said, and I see the statement appearing prominently in the press this morning, that in no country is there so large a measure of control in the hands of the government as there is under the bill which is at present before this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me; the hon. gentleman might look at Hansard and see what I did say.

Mr. RALSTON: I am stating what the papers say.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not fair.

Mr. RALSTON: I intend to be perfectly fair.

Mr. BENNETT: The press is not the official record.

Mr. RALSTON: I quite understand that, but I say that is the effect which the press is taking from what was said.

Mr. BENNETT: But unfortunately that is not what I said.

Mr. RALSTON: All right. Let us deal with the degree of control which is exercised. My right hon. friend made quite a point of the degree of control found in this bill. The three points which my right hon. friend stressed were: Number one that the governor of the bank is appointed by the governor in council, or his appointment is subject to the approval of the governor in council. Number two: the Prime Minister said the deputy minister of finance under this bill is made a member of the board, although he has not a vote; therefore the government has communication as to what is going on in the board room and general supervision, without any power so far as the deputy minister is concerned, over what is being done by the directors. Number three: the Prime Minister said nothing can be done by this board of directors without the consent or the sanction of the governor, who is appointed by the governor in council in the first instance and whose appointment must be approved thereafter.

My right hon. friend rather laid strong emphasis on the fact that he knew a good deal more about this bill than anyone else knew.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not fair, either. The hon. gentleman said that I treated it in a cavalier sort of way, and I said I thought I knew as much about it as any other member of the committee, but I did not pride myself on knowing any more.

Mr. RALSTON: If I may suggest, I think the Prime Minister did this: he compared what he knew about the bill with what little I knew about the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, Hansard will bear me out in that; that was the substance of it, and then my right hon. friend said he did not want to boast about it, but at the same time he felt that he knew as much about the bill as anyone else did.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I do.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not boast about it at all, but if there is anything to be said with regard to those features in the bill on which my right hon. friend lays so much emphasis, I think it might be fairly said that two of the three points on which my right hon. friend relies as being the sheet anchor of government control were introduced in the committee and included in the bill at the suggestion of those sitting on this side of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: So I do not think my right hon. friend can suggest that there is any monopoly of knowledge with regard to this measure, or with regard to the appreciation of what the measure contains, on the government side of the house. That means that as this bill was introduced it contained no provision for control at all; it only provided that the governor should be appointed by the governor in council, or that his appointment should be subject to the approval of the governor in council. Once appointed the governor is a member of the board of directors and of the executive, and the executive submit their decisions—it does not say for approval—to the board of directors.

There was no provision that the consent or approval of the governor was needed with regard to any action of the board of directors or any action of the executive; that provision was inserted in committee, and not at the instance of the government. There was no provision that the deputy minister of finance should be a member of the board of directors; that also was inserted in committee, and not at the instance of the government. What does my right hon. friend say was the reason for this provision not being inserted as to the approval of the governor being necessary before any action of the executive or the board of directors might become effective? He says the reason is that they were sort of fearful and apprehensive that the committee would not accept a proposal of that kind. That is a strange doctrine to hear in this house from my right hon. friend, with a majority of forty behind him. He says the government were fearful that the provision would not be acceptable. So I think perhaps we are entitled to credit for this, that in the midst of my right hon. friend's timidity, fearfulness and apprehension at least we were able to take him by the hand, pat him on the back and say, "Don't worry. Have courage. We will stand by you in enacting this particular legislation." I am sure my right hon. friend will give us credit for that.

I do not know what the right hon. gentleman meant when he gave that explanation. If when he introduced this bill be believed that the governor's control was necessary and that this was a proper provision to put in the bill, why was it not put in the bill? Why was it left to be introduced in committee by those sitting on this side of the house? If it was advisable to make the deputy minister of finance a member of the board, why was that not put in the bill by the government? Those are the two points on which my right hon. friend relies in alleging that there is a very large measure of government control in this bill.

My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has given me the quotation of what the Prime Minister said regarding the extent of control which the bill as amended in committee provides. These are the words used by my right hon. friend last night:

> I would therefore submit that to the extent of my reading there is no other bank in which you find wider powers of public control conferred, absolute control by government in council, than there is in this particular case.

In support of that statement my right hon. friend relies on two provisions which were inserted in the bill from this side of the house. I wish I could be as sure about those two provisions as my right hon. friend is. I am pleased that they have been put in; I am glad they have been accepted, but in connection with those provisions my right hon. friend missed the point entirely. He knows perfectly well, if he will just think for a moment—and I have no doubt he has thought of it already—that those provisions only permit of a veto of the action of the board of directors or the executive. The provision with regard to the deputy minister gives no power at all; he simply holds a watching brief, and is simply permitted to sit in the board room. The provision with regard to the governor's consent being necessary means nothing more than this, that if the board of directors take positive action then the governor may say, "No, you cannot do that thing." But it gives the governor no power of initiative of any kind or description. If the board of directors decided to do nothing, nothing could be done by the governor or by the executive. In other words this provision simply means that the governor may put on a brake, but if positive action were needed; if action were needed to suspend the twenty-five per cent ratio, for example, and the board of directors simply did nothing at all, what would be the good of having a provision that the governor may veto any action taken, or that his approval is necessary before any action of the board of directors shall become effective? There would be no action of the board of directors to become effective and to be vetoed. My point, and I have made it repeatedly in this committee, is that the initiative in connection with every one of the matters I mentioned last night is with the board of directors, and if the board of directors does not see fit to take the initiative the governor and the governor in council are powerless.

My right hon. friend went on to say that the governor can work through the executive, which is formed of the governor, the deputy governor and another director. They act as an executive, but after all they are an executive and not the board of directors, and there are certain things expressly provided by this act to be done by the board. The acts of the executive must be submitted to the board of directors. I feel satisfied that this must be the legal construction of that provision, that the board of directors may take such action as they think proper with regard to the actions of the executive. So I say the control on which my right hon. friend insists and as to which he speaks so positively, so dogmatically and broadly, only means the power of veto, the power of putting on the brakes. It gives no power to the government or to the directors appointed by the government to take such positive action as they may think is necessary in connection with the economic activities of this country.

That is the point my right hon. friend has missed entirely, and by this amendment I am endeavouring to place power in the board of directors so that five of the nine directors shall be either appointed by the governor in council or their appointments shall be approved by the governor in council and so that positive action may be taken in a time of national crisis or whenever the national interest may make it advisable. I submit that this is a proper provision in an act which has to do with what I referred to last night as the greatest public utility in this country.

I want to point out further that if my hon. friend wants a brake, a safeguard, a balance wheel, a safety valve or something of the sort he has it in the fact that there are four directors representing private interest and five directors representing national interest. There will not be very much danger of the political football being trotted out; it seems to me there will not be very much danger of the five government directors going wild in connection with these matters, with the safety valve, the balance wheel of the other four directors sitting beside them. I submit that this is the most modest provision it is possible to make if we are to preserve our national economic and financial autonomy. I submit that the Prime Minister, with all his power of special pleading and after taking up a considerable portion of the time of this committee, has not submitted any valid reason emerging from the clouds of all that he said last night as to why there should not be government control of this bank. He read Kisch and Elkin. He knows perfectly well that the work of Kisch and Elkin is only one of many authorities, and after all is but a recital of the provisions connected with the establishment of central banks in all parts of the world. But Kisch and Elkin state definitely that at times of national crisis, whether the bank is controlled privately or otherwise, the government are going to step in and make it serve a national purpose. I say that the bill should provide in the first instance that the bank shall do what it will have to do in the end, namely serve in a national emergency, and generally serve the interests of this country whenever financial conditions make it necessary.

I do not think the statement by the right hon. Prime Minister fairly met the resolution proposed to the committee. He traversed a great deal of ground. The one point is this: Shall this committee of the whole leave to the directors appointed by the people, who have invested the comparatively paltry sum of $5,000,000 in the shares of this enterprise, the control of the affairs of this great national institution? It would have a note issue of $400,000,000 or $500,000,000, all the advances to the banks, all the gold resources of the country, the whole credit and economic life of the country, including that to which I particularly referred last night, namely, the regulating—if regulating is possible—of the value of our currency externally. Those are matters of immense importance.

In connection with the last point let me read one reference contained in the report of the commission concerning the importance of the external situation. I believe we miss that entirely when we put the enterprise in the hands of private individuals. Section 230 of the report of the Macmillan commission states:

> Canada is a country with a relatively large volume of external trade and a heavy external indebtedness and is, therefore, especially interested in the international value of her currency. The holding of gold and foreign exchange by the central bank should and could become a factor of the first importance in carrying out the national policy in regard to the external value of the currency. It is no part of the functions of a central bank to monopolize the exchange markets. Here, as in the case of credit control, its function is to impart or counteract a trend as circumstances require, and this task, even from an early date, would be within the capacity of a Canadian central bank.

And when my right hon. friend suggests that it is sufficient that the control of this bank is placed in the hands of a governor, who has the right to veto the actions of the board of directors or the executive committee, I say to him that that provision was put in there in the hope and in the belief that he would accept what was suggested by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond) last night, namely, a Canadian as first governor. It seems to me when he comes to think of it he will realize that no one outside Canada, no matter how high he might stand in the confidence of the Canadian people, would be able to discern the trend of events in this country, to understand our situation with regard to export markets, to understand the nature of our products and our channels of trade, to be able to understand the economic signs of the times, to be able to say when it is best to extend credit and when it is best to restrict credit under conditions which are peculiarly Canadian. It seems to me that decisions in those matters ought to be vested finally in the hands of a Canadian. After that my right hon. friend may have any advisers or technical assistants he desires. I do submit however, with all due deference to him and with all due deference to the judgment, if judgment it is, of the Canadian bankers, which may have been expressed in an offhand manner in the committee room, that he is wrong in this respect. I have serious doubts as to the opinion they may have expressed, because I believe that the bankers in Canada are as capable as any bankers in the world to deal with our Canadian difficulties, and to cope with the financial conditions in which we may find ourselves. They are equipped by experience and first hand knowledge to regulate, so far as it is possible, our economic and monetary situation for the good of Canadian trade. Notwithstanding the statement made by the Canadian bankers to which my right hon. friend has referred, I find in the Macmillan commission report a statement to which reference was made by the hon. member for Beauharnois and one which, in my view, cannot be over-emphasized. This is the statement made by the commission which consisted of two Canadian bankers and three other gentlemen who had the opportunity of meeting and knowing Canadian bankers and Canadian financial men. They said:

Experience, skill and integrity are required in the highest degree, and that, not only to ensure that the operations of the bank shall be wisely conducted, but also that the institution should win and maintain the confidence alike of the government, the people and the commercial banks.

We have no reason to suppose from our discussions with leaders in Canadian finance and industry that these qualities are lacking in Canada. On the contrary, we are convinced that there are resources of intelligence combined with experience and public spirit fully adequate to ensure the successful management of a central bank.

I leave that last word with the Prime Minister, and I say that when I proposed that the approval of the governor of the bank should be necessary to the effectiveness of any act of the executive committee or board of directors, I believed and I still believe that there could be found within the confines of Canada a Canadian who could properly handle the management of the central bank. The governor at least to an extent would have the direction of the destiny and policies of the bank. I have said that he should be a Canadian, and I still think so.

Mr. Chairman, I have submitted this amendment with some confidence, because I believe it will meet with the approval generally of the Canadian people.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

PERSONAL FINANCE CORPORATION

On the order:

The house in committee on Bill No. 43, to incorporate Personal Finance Corporation—Mr. Hackett.

Mr. HANBURY: In connection with the Small Loan Company bill, the Prime Minister some time ago indicated that he would bring down a bill to regulate small loan companies. I notice a bill on the order paper but I do not know whether the Prime Minister can give any information in respect to what he proposes to do in that regard. If he could do so I would be very pleased to hear it.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing before the chair, Mr. Speaker. The bill stands.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Bank of Canada—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 9—Provisional directors.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not propose to traverse the arguments adduced by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) rather I intend to make a few observations with respect to the matter discussed by the leader of the opposition yesterday. I should like however to make this observation, with which I think every member of the committee will agree. There is about as much resemblance between the operations of the Finance Act and the central bank as between a lot of steel plates lying in a yard and a finished ship. There is no organization under the Finance Act. The committee that constitutes the treasury board is a variable committee of the cabinet. They have never had an opportunity to consider, and since the war never have considered, the question of rediscounting commercial paper. The only securities they ever dealt with were bonds and securities of that character, federal and provincial, upon which advances were made; and there was never any consideration, from the beginning of the year until the end,—sometimes there was in the middle of the year—of the amount that should be advanced. For instance, the City and District Savings bank had a line of credit, say, for $15,000,000 and all they did was to notify the receiver general at Montreal that they required one or two millions, having lodged their securities antecedently to requiring the money, and got it from day to day, and paid it off sometimes within two or three days so as to escape the payment of interest.

The central bank is of course an organization, a corporation, an entity which the treasury board is not in that sense. I do not intend to do more than mention one matter in connection with the final observations of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. I think, when he was reading section 230 of the report of the royal commission, he must have realized the implication of these words:

> The holding of gold and foreign exchange by the central bank should and could become a factor of the first importance in carrying out the national policy in regard to the external value of the currency.

The national policy is the policy of the government of the day, and a central bank serves the government, that is, the policy which it enunciates. It is their duty to serve the community, that is, the country, the dominion; and the national purposes mentioned are national purposes as they may be from time to time indicated by the policies of the administration of the day.

I shall presently refer in detail to some of the observations made last evening by the leader of the opposition, but this I should like to say now in respect of the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. Surely it must be within the memory of every member of this committee that when the bill was introduced by the Minister of Finance he pointed out that it was the very earnest desire of the government that suggestions in the way of constructive amendments should be offered as the bill proceeded through committee. I may say to the hon. gentleman that the question of the control of the bank is the one that was given most consideration. His suggestion, in section 14, that the bank be controlled through the governor as representing the government was a suggestion that was accepted by the government in the committee. There was for instance a discussion as to whether or not the end might be better accomplished by asking the Minister of Finance to become, ex officio, a member of the board. We canvassed that idea at some length. We canvassed at some length the idea as to whether or not the government might be given more direct control over the operations, and when the hon. gentleman made the proposal that he did I thought it was a fair one; and as I said last night, I am glad he made it. But it seems to be difficult for the hon. gentleman to realize that we did not look upon this measure as one in which the government should lay down a fixed policy in detail antecedently to discussion, but rather that we should, indicating the general principles upon which we proposed to proceed, ask for constructive suggestions from every member of the committee. The reason for that was twofold: first, that it was a measure that was espoused by all parties in the house, by those who sit to the extreme right and opposite me and those who sit directly opposite, as well as the government of the day. So that all parties being agreed that a central bank was desirable, and that opinion having been expressed, it became of first importance that if possible we should secure the good will and commendation of all parties in the house.

When the minister asked, before the bill was submitted to the committee at all, that constructive suggestions should be offered from all quarters, I can only say that suggestions that were made that did not conflict with the principles which we believe are inherent in the legislation as we suggested it, and which were possible of acceptance, were accepted; and although the hon. gentleman finds it difficult to believe that this party would accept suggestions from those not associated with it, in the very nature of things the purpose was to secure their suggestions. Finally, the suggestion embodied in section 14 and the suggestion that the deputy minister should be a member without a vote, were a modification of the extreme view I have expressed, on the one hand of the minister himself being a member, and the provision that the governor in council should have the final say with respect to matters that are now left absolutely in the hands of the government.

This brings up the last question in the observations of the hon. gentleman to which I wish to refer. He has kept on reiterating that I have said a Canadian would not be appointed to the position of governor. I said no such thing. I was very careful in what I said yesterday, to indicate that no Canadian, without acquiring certain experience, was available for the position.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure my hon. friend will not find such a statement of mine in Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: I am obliged to my hon. friend, but this afternoon I certainly listened with great care and my hearing was that the hon. gentleman thought I said that a Canadian would not be appointed.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I am very glad of that, because I noticed yesterday the observation that I had made that statement. The purpose of the government was to appoint a Canadian to that position but not to do so unless we could appoint him several months before his duties would commence in order that he might go abroad into countries where central banks existed so that he might be able to obtain the requisite experience to enable him to discharge the duties and functions of his position. It is idle to say that he can secure the information on this side of the water, for the central bank system as practised in the United States would not be of assistance for one undertaking the duties of governor of a central bank as indicated in the measure.

I leave this thought in the minds of the committee. It has been pointed out on many occasions in the committee on banking and commerce and in this committee of the whole house that the bankers of this country have vigorously opposed this legislation. In fact, in their annual meetings you will find speeches directed against this central bank. I ask this committee whether they think any government would have a free hand if it had to appoint to such positions those whose object would be unfavourable to and who in fact tried to destroy the central bank. That is the question, and that phase of the matter must be considered. The government therefore have sought a free hand in dealing with that question. If we can obtain in Canada any person qualified by experience in commercial banking and able to leave this country for the purpose of obtaining at least a few months' experience by observation in connection with matters concerned with a central bank, one who is not opposed to a central bank, then of course he will be appointed. But the important thing is that we must not appoint to that position anyone who is unsympathetic and who desires to destroy the venture and to make it a failure, and we do not propose to do so. Therefore we must have a free hand in dealing with the matter. It is equally probable that if we can secure a suitable person as assistant who has had a lifelong experience as a central bank authority to assist a general manager or governor experienced as I have indicated, we would desire and I believe any government would desire to do so.

In view of the observations made this afternoon I want to repeat what I said yesterday. You will not find in any records of central banks, that is banks similar to this—I am not talking about publicly owned banks; I am talking about banks whose shares are held by private individuals and the control of which is vested in the government as I indicated last night—any case in which the control is more certain and in which the inducement to those who are directors as representing shareholders will be greater to discharge an important public trust in a manner befitting the obligation that is imposed upon them. Why? Because they know they will receive nothing more than four and a half per cent upon their money; that no effort upon their part can increase this; that it merely adds to the sum total of the profits that go to the Dominion of Canada and in their patriotic zeal to serve a great public trust with fidelity I am quite certain there will be found in this country those who will be not only willing but anxious to discharge so great an obligation in a manner befitting the magnitude of the work they will have to undertake. This is not a case in which they are seeking profit as it is in that of some of the central banks that are privately owned in the older countries. There their dividends may vary from six to eight, ten and twelve per cent and, as is known, in older countries the dividends of the bank run eighteen, twenty, twenty-three per cent. Here there is merely a modest return of four and a half per cent fixed upon the capital invested, and as I have pointed out I may misjudge, but I think I do not and I believe the zeal of those who are charged with this responsibility to do something to discharge a great public trust in a fitting manner will be manifested by the success which will attend their efforts. In the selection of officials, in the selection of governor, deputy governor and assistant, that object will be constantly in mind whether it be on the part of the governor in council or of the shareholders.

Last evening the leader of the opposition made an observation which I thought I heard correctly but which I verified in Hansard at page 4196 where he is reported as saying:

> If you alter the situation by taking away from the government the power that it has to-day; and the banks are to be allowed to control the central bank—for that is what it really amounts to, the banking interest are all to be one, the central bank being in private hands; let us put it that way—there is, it seems to me, a real danger of the financial control which may thus be exercised by the bank being exercised against what may be the fiscal policy of the government of the day.

It is difficult for me to find in the same number of words a more inept conception of the real policy of the statute itself. Not only do the banks not own or control the central bank, but the statute in terms prohibits banks or bankers from owning shares in the central bank. It was that fear that the right hon. gentleman has expressed that is at the bottom of the provisions in the statute to prevent the bankers from exercising control over the central bank. I cannot conceive of any clearer statement being made than that contained in the bill in the clauses that will be dealt with this evening where there is a prohibition against any directing officer, clerk or employee of any bank being interested directly or indirectly or through the medium of anyone else, in this central bank. The restricted control by any individual or group of individuals is further indicated by the limitation imposed upon the shareholders: no one can hold in the institution more than fifty shares. I mention that because possibly the right hon. gentleman overlooked the provisions of the statute in that regard.

When it is indicated that the government is parting to a certain extent with the control it has over the regulation of credit I only desire to point out that for the first time in the history of Canada we are setting up an organization in which the control of the government over credit is real. I know the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth did not overlook the fact that in all the advances made to the banks under the Finance Act, there is no coverage of the money advanced; under the Finance Act all the money advanced was without coverage.

Mr. RALSTON: Without gold backing.

Mr. BENNETT: Without gold backing or metal coverage. The only support it had was the security of bonds or other securities mentioned in the Finance Act itself.

Mr. RALSTON: Without the requirement for gold coverage because as a matter of fact it did have gold coverage; for, as I understand it, there is about forty per cent gold backing for all the notes issued.

Mr. BENNETT: There was not until the borrowings under the Finance Act became very much restricted. When the borrowings under that act went to $66,000,000 in 1931, there was no metal or gold coverage that would approximate forty per cent. But the point is this—and I think it has been overlooked—this bank when it begins to function must maintain twenty-five per cent gold coverage for all of its note issue. Whether it be by way of loans or advances to those who come into the bank seeking them, or whether it be for the deposits or other business of the bank, it is compelled under the statute to hold twenty-five per cent gold coverage. That differentiates it from the conditions that exist under the Finance Act. I am not going to do more than say that heretofore in this country the members of this house, both those opposite and those to my extreme right, were always insistent, and I have never controverted the soundness of their statement, that the chartered banks really exercise control over credit, and under the Finance Act as it now stands their control over credit became more and more apparent as they relied more and more upon the provisions of the Finance Act. Under this bill the control of credit in truth and fact rests with the central bank, as it could not under the Finance Act.

I have looked through the provisions of the bill to determine whether or not there is any that I could see under which the bank could operate to the detriment of any policy, fiscal or otherwise, which the government of the day might have. My judgment, for what it may be worth, and I offer it after having looked over the bill again, is that the Bank of Canada cannot control the mechanism used by the government for the purposes of its policy under any circumstances whatever.

The government promulgates its policies, whatever they may be; the central bank, an instrumentality of the government, assists in giving effect to those policies, carries them out in every way in its power; but surely it could have no jurisdiction under this or any other statute that I can conceive of with respect to a central bank that would enable it to interfere with or work at cross purposes with the government of the day in effecting its policies, whatever they may be. The ideas of the bank in regard to carrying on open market operations might conceivably be different from what an individual in the government might at the moment think, but I do not see how it could be said for a moment that they would in any way interfere with the general policies of administration. I have not been able by any process that I can rely upon to arrive at any such conclusion.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the Prime Minister permit me to interrupt here?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. RALSTON: This is one point I have in mind: suppose the government of the day considered it advisable that the requirement of twenty-five per cent gold backing should be suspended, let us say for six months, in order that the issue of currency might increase, would it not be necessary for the privately appointed board first to pass a resolution providing for the suspension before the government could secure it?

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt that as the law stands the directors would take the initiative. But if it were a publicly owned bank with a board of directors the same course would have to be pursued.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, but there would be government directors on the board.

Mr. BENNETT: But what assurance have you that the directors would discharge a public trust any more carefully because they are appointed by the government than if they are elected in the manner I have indicated?

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, if you take that position there is no use in arguing.

Mr. BENNETT: And with the four and a half per cent limitation.

Mr. RALSTON: One has a good deal more assurance than if they are appointed by private shareholders.

Mr. BENNETT: Have we? One has only to look at the history of one great publicly owned enterprise that we have had in this country to see. Certainly the evidence is against that view. All you have to do is go down to the West Indies, and follow up from there to this country.

Mr. RALSTON: That has nothing to do with the point.

Mr. BENNETT: The point is that the directors would have to take the action in any event. Suspending the twenty-five per cent provision would be an act of the directors in the first instance. Under our provisions it would have to be approved by the government. If it were publicly owned the same procedure would follow, presumably, from what the hon. gentleman has said. He has not suggested that if it were a publicly owned bank and the directors were appointed by the government there would be any change in that part as far as the governor is concerned. Assuming that is as it is now, where would be the difference?

Mr. RALSTON: I think it is obvious, even if my right hon. friend cannot see it. If the directors were appointed by the government it would seem that they would be more likely to carry out the wishes of the government by whom they were appointed than would directors appointed by private shareholders.

Mr. BENNETT: What the hon. gentleman suggests proves what I have contended from the start. This view is that the directors are not to think for themselves, that they are to be thought for and to be told what they are to do, without regard to their own views; whereas in the other instance we imply some intelligent consideration of the questions at issue. There is no doubt that in both cases the initiative must come from the directors, acting in both instances on the request of the government of the day, and if they suggest the suspension of the twenty-five per cent gold coverage merely because a political group said it should be done, as against what their reason told them should be done in the interests of the nation as a whole, they would be reflecting a political judgment on the one hand as against a business judgment on the other. That is the whole story. That is what we have endeavoured to set our face against. The discussions that have taken place here indicate how readily the situation would become charged with danger for the bank itself, even as the situation would become charged with danger with directors who merely carried out the will of either one man or a group of men. That is the position. I am not going to traverse it further except to say that by no process of reasoning which I can apply to the facts and in no case of which I can conceive would it be possible for this bank in any sense to balk or stand in the way of policies of a government being made effective in any manner that the government of the day thought in the public interest, whether fiscal or otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has not really answered my point beyond giving it as his individual opinion that there would be no possibility of conflict between this bank and the government. He has not given us reasons why such conflict of opinion might not arise. As members of the committee will recall, my point was that, in the absence of any directors appointed by the government, and with all directors being appointed by the shareholders, there might on occasions be no means of bringing about the necessary harmony between the government and the bank with respect to a course of procedure that might vitally affect some great national policy. I pointed out that I thought a case might arise where the bank, being a privately owned institution and privately controlled, and being associated with private banks in other parts of the empire, might come to have one financial policy to which it would adhere very strongly, but that the government of the day, for very obvious national reasons, might desire to follow another policy, or to alter in some particular, essential to the national interest, the policy of the bank. The government might have a policy with respect to trade or shipping or some other great national service which would require the co-operation in a friendly way of the bank, and that would not be possible unless the government as well as the shareholders, was represented on the board of directors of the bank. The Prime Minister did say last night that there was the possibility that in time of crisis there might be a moment when there would appear to be conflict, but he thought it would work out all right. I wish I could be as sanguine as he is about everything working out all right. I can understand my right hon. friend having the feelings he has at this time about this phase of the situation; he is going to appoint the governor, he is going to appoint the deputy governor. The shareholders of this bank will appoint the directors, but the real control of the bank's affairs will be in the hands of his own appointee. The governor will be a gentleman, unquestionably, of the same point of view on financial and economic affairs as the right hon. Prime Minister himself. I know the Prime Minister is sincere in the views that he holds as regards both trade and finance, but, with all respect and deference, I say to him that there are those who believe that his policies are wrong, and that the best interests of this country and of the empire would be furthered by policies wholly different from those which he cherishes at the moment. That is where I see the possibility some day of conflict between what may be the policies of this bank and the policies of the administration that may be in office.

I want to make this fact clear: no one could have had the responsibility of being the head of an administration for any time without realizing all that is meant when one speaks of political pressure. I think I would be the first to sympathize with the Prime Minister in his desire so to frame an act that what is termed political pressure would not be permitted to interfere with the successful and independent working of a great financial institution. May I say we may give a wholly wrong meaning to the word "political" in speaking of political pressure. A political influence or point of view is not necessarily something that is contrary to the national interest; a political point of view is one which arises from an endeavour to give expression to public feeling and public opinion, and I submit that in all democratic countries public opinion is the one great factor for which all governments must have consideration. There are times when it is necessary and vital that every institution in the land should be subject to the public opinion of the nation, and this is always the case when it is expressed in a constitutional way in parliament. I do not believe powers should be given any institution that would enable it to put itself in a position of opposition to a government that has been entrusted with great responsibilities of enforcing particular policies.

In order to be perfectly clear, I should like to assert the two definite sets of circumstances I have in mind. The first relates to a conflict which might arise between the government and the bank at any time of crisis regardless of what administration may be in office, a crisis which might arise from unforeseen economic conditions in the country itself. You would then have two powers that would come into conflict with each other; and unless there is some way of harmonizing them great mischief may be done. You have the money power represented by the central bank and you have the political power represented by the government. I am not one of those who is given to indulging in the extravagant language which is used in these times about money power and the terrors of international banking and finance, but no one can live in this day and age without realizing that we have in the money power of the world an invisible force which is all-powerful in different countries at the present time. What is being proposed under this legislation is that the government shall part with its control over the issue of currency and over national credit to a private corporation which is a great banking institution and which to a certain extent is to regulate the affairs of all other banks. When I say that the banking institutions are to be all one, I do not mean that the central bank will be controlled by the chartered banks of the country. What I do mean to say is that all questions relating to currency and national credit will hereafter be in the hands of the central bank and other banks throughout the country and no longer in the hands of the government. They will be in the hands of the banking interests, which means in the hands of the financial interests, and parliament will have parted altogether with any control it has over the issue of currency or over credit. There are those who hold that when a nation parts with its control over currency and national credit, it does not matter very much who makes the laws of that nation. The power that controls the currency and the credit of the country is a power that, if there is such a thing at all as political influence of the kind referred to by the Prime Minister, can make itself felt upon governments.

I say that power of influence of governments and defiance of governments by the money power is being created by this act in the form in which it is at present, and the only way in which that possibility can be avoided is for the government to see to it that, on the board of directors who are to direct this institution, there are representatives of the government, who will not own any of the shares, but who will be the appointees of the government placed there solely to watch and safe guard the public interest. I think my right hon. friend must agree that in these matters of large finance, check and counter check is wholly advisable. It is advisable in financial transactions of a limited size, and it is more necessary as well as advisable in those of considerable size. But here are financial transactions of the greatest magnitude conceivable, and check and counter check are imperative. I do think the directorate of the bank ought to be so formed that, whether the pressure is upon the bank from the government on the one side, or upon the government from the financial interests and through the bank on the other, there should be on the board of directors some one or more persons who will be quick to sense the situation, give the danger signal, and arouse the country to the pressure which is being brought to bear. There is the danger of a government bringing too much in the way of pressure to bear on a central bank. On the other hand, there is equal danger of the financial interests that are allied with the banks bringing influence to bear upon a government. There will be both these dangers always, and the only way in which that possibility can be lessened is by making sure that both powers, the money power and the power of government, are represented on a common board so that one or the other will be in a position to direct the attention of the people at large to the dangers which they may see developing in the affairs of an institution which is or ought to be a great national trust.

May I now direct attention to the other set of circumstances I have in mind, namely, the difficulties that I see which may arise in carrying out national policies when there is a change of administration. Here I want to differ absolutely from and to take issue with the Prime Minister in what he said last night. In order that I may not misinterpret what he said after I had asked for an explanation as to a certain point, I shall quote the words of my right hon. friend as they appear at page 4195 of Hansard:

> If the government were in complete control of the bank it would mean that if you had one government succeeded by another the bank would naturally change its policy, assuming that the policy was as the right hon. gentleman suggested. Then you would have governments controlling policies without continuity. What we wish to secure is a policy based upon the economic conditions of the country, not a policy of the bank based upon policies of a government. That is what the right hon. gentleman desires.

What I should like to ask is: Are the institutions created by governments themselves to be made by their very constitutions so powerful that in the matter of national policies they can regard themselves as wholly beyond the direction of a government, where those policies are the result of the will of the people as expressed by their representatives in parliament? In no way could it be possible to have more clearly defined the difference between the right hon. gentleman opposite and myself. The Prime Minister will notice that at the moment, I am not suggesting the government should own the bank. I am not at the moment discussing the question of ownership, at all. As I said last night, I think the question of ownership is debatable. I am however discussing the question of control of policy, and I do say that with respect to policies, whether they relate to trade, to shipping, to marketing, to finance, to defence, or to any other phase of a country's economy, those policies, if they are the expression of view of a government representative of the people, should be capable of being carried out without interference from any institution whatever, but rather with the sympathetic cooperation of all institutions. That is the only way in which in a country we can have either democratic or responsible government.

I should like to be very frank and concrete in what I am saying, and in order that the Prime Minister will not think I am in any way seeking to misinterpret his point of view or the point of view of any hon. gentleman opposite, I should like first of all to present the matter as I think he sees it. He knows that he will have the appointment of the governor and of the deputy governor of the bank, and he knows also that those who are likely to be appointed as directors will be governed very largely by the point of view of the governor of the bank. He has asserted —although I believe this evening there has been some modification—that the governor would in all probability be some one who would come from the old country.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I have not modified any statement with respect to the governor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I have said I believe still stands. I think to-night my right hon. friend did go as far as to say that possibly a Canadian could be found for the position.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that yesterday, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg your pardon?

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman did not follow me. My statement is in Hansard. What I said was that without experience which could be gained by giving him an opportunity, there was no one in Canada who I thought at the moment could be appointed. I said if there were an appointment made tomorrow it would have to be made under circumstances which would enable the appointee to have five or six months' experience in England, or elsewhere.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not discuss the question whether or not the one to be appointed governor is to be one whose residence has been in England or in Canada. For the purposes of my argument it is sufficient to say that the Prime Minister will appoint the governor, and that he will appoint someone who, he believes, holds sound views on economic and financial questions, and views which are sound because in accordance with his own. I believe that is a reasonable assumption.

A few evenings ago, I spoke about an imperial trade policy, and the Prime Minister took strong exception to the use of the word "imperial." He said that I was seeking through the use of that word to create some prejudice. I used it because it is the word in common use to signify what is meant. I notice the right hon. gentleman said he had not used it, but I looked up his language in the particular address he delivered, and—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not use it that night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not that night. I find what he did use in the address I refer to was the expression "common policy," and by a common policy he meant a policy for all parts of the empire. To my way of thinking a common policy for all parts of the empire is what is meant when we speak of an imperial policy. The word "imperial" expresses in a very short, concise and complete manner what is meant by the expression "a common policy for all parts of the British Empire." I believe the Prime Minister—and he has never denied it—believes in his heart of hearts that in the matter of trade a common policy for all parts of the British Empire would be in the best interests of the peoples of the British Empire, and I believe further that his tariff policies have been designed towards the end of bringing about a common trade policy throughout the different parts of the empire. That is his point of view, and he is entitled to it. I wish he would debate the matter openly, and let us argue the question as to whether or not that policy would be as good for Canada as what we describe as a world trade policy. A world trade policy, not an empire trade policy, represents the point of view held by hon. gentlemen on this side of the house. We do not believe that the interests of the British Empire, and those of Canada in particular, are going to be furthered by any common trade policies for all parts of the empire, whether they be called imperial or common policies, or by any other name. We believe in a policy of trading with any and every nation that will trade with us, as best for the empire and best for Canada as a part of the empire. Let us assume that the appointee to the position of governor of the bank would be a gentleman holding the same point of view as is held by the Prime Minister, honestly believing that the right thing to do is to encourage trade within the British Empire and to develop channels of trade throughout the different parts of the empire so that for the most part trade would necessarily flow in empire channels rather than between this country and countries, generally, throughout the world. Is it not altogether probable that the governor of the central bank would find it possible to further that common or imperial trade policy by the opportunities which would be afforded him and his institution, as for example, in dealing with matters of exchange? Would he not, by artificial means, through the manipulation of exchange, be in a position to further the policy which the government has in view, and which, in matters of trade, he and the Prime Minister would hold in common? I am perfectly sure that an institution of the character of a central bank which has to do with a nation's credit, which has to do with the issuing of the nation's currency, which has to do with the regulation of exchange and with great problems of international exchange, could, by artificial means, direct the trade of this country through particular channels and away from other channels.

Mr. BENNETT: May I say to the right hon. gentleman that that could be done only by parliament giving them the money with which to do it. The stabilization of exchange could not be done without the aid of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister may seek to answer in that way. I believe he is beginning to see the force of what I am saying. In connection with imperial policies of trade or finance may I observe that both are clearly and closely interlocked. No one knows better than the Prime Minister that the facilities which banks afford to importers and exporters determine very largely in what direction and from what sources trade is to flow. Look at the picture as it is beginning to disclose itself. We have, first of all the Bank of England, which stands at the centre. Then there are the central banking institutions already in existence in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. I believe it is a fact that at the head of each one of these central banks is a gentleman associated with the Bank of England, or one who has had previous associations with the bank of England. If in Canada we have at the head of our central bank another gentleman who has been trained by the Bank of England, and whose associations are with that bank, what would be more natural than that these central banks within the British empire, all trained from the London point of view, and all embued with the idea that a great imperial or intraempire trade is the thing to be fostered, should do their utmost further to develop trade in that way to the exclusion of every other? As I say, so long as the Prime Minister, himself, is in office, I can see how he may well entertain the view that there is not likely to be any danger experienced of a character which would lead to any conflict between his government and this new banking institution. But let us assume for a moment that there is a change of administration, and let us assume that a government is in office in Canada which wishes to develop trade throughout the world, trade by Canada, with all the nations of the world, foreign as well as British nations, and does not believe it to be restricted by artificial means in the interests either of Canada or of the empire to have trade so as to confine it mostly to channels within the British Empire. Then according to the Prime Minister's reasoning, and the grounds he adduced for giving this bank the constitution he is giving to it, we are face to face with this following situation: The bank is to maintain continuity in its financial policy—an imperial financial policy to support an imperial trade policy—and is not on any account to change its policy because there has come into office a government with other policies which have been approved by the people. The words are as plain as the English language can make them. The Prime Minister said:

> What we wish to secure is a policy based on the economic conditions of the country, not a bank based on the policies of the government.

The policies that any government would have would be policies based on the economic conditions of the country, especially where they were policies that had been presented to the people, and which the people had approved, and which as a consequence the people would have a right to expect that every institution which exists in the land would harmoniously help to further to the largest possible extent. I see there a very great danger. Possibly the Prime Minister will come back with this reply, that parliament can always alter the statute which it has made. But, as he himself is so fond of saying, we are obliged to deal with conditions and not with theories, and we know that parliament consists of two houses and that the approval of both houses is necessary to the amendment of any statute. We know that at the present time the other house of parliament is one which represents very strongly the point of view of the Prime Minister of the day, and it will probably be many years to come before the other house on some of these matters of trade and finance, is at all likely to be in sympathy with a House of Commons which might be differently constituted from the present one.

In such circumstances what will the position be? If there are no directors of the bank who are appointed by the government itself and whose duty it is to protect the national interest from the point of view of the government, an incoming administration which has trade policies different from those of the present administration, unless it were so fortunate as to find in the governor of the bank a gentleman who would be quite prepared to accept the policies of the government on important national matters and seek to further them, would find itself in a position where it might not be able to carry out the very policies which the country had sent it into office to further. This is the time to mention that possibility. It is the point I brought to the Prime Minister's attention last night. I do not think he has given a satisfactory reply to it.

The obvious thing to be done in these circumstances is to provide that at least a certain number of directors shall be appointed by the government of the day, and that these directors, who will not own shares, should sit on the board to cooperate in shaping the policies of the bank and to see that at all times, with respect to great national policies, those of the bank and those of the country are brought as much as possible into common accord.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the right hon. gentleman permit a question in order that laymen in the house may get a clear idea of what he has in his mind? Will he suggest that the governor and deputy governor and even the directors representing the public should be changed with a change of government in this country, in other words be made political appointments? His argument suggests to me as a layman that he feels that the governor, the deputy governor and a majority of the board of directors should be changed or dismissed with each change of government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have said nothing about the governor and nothing about the deputy governor, so my hon. friend may set his mind at rest in that regard. It is admitted that the present Prime Minister will appoint a governor and I assume he will be a person who is sympathetic with the prime minister's fiscal and other policies. I have said nothing about the governor or the deputy governor.

As to the directors, the present proposal is that they shall all be appointed by the shareholders. No one of the directors is to be an appointee of the government. My first point is that, regardless of which party may be in office, it is advisable that the government itself should appoint some of the directors, that some of the directors should feel that their appointment is made by the government, just as other directors will feel that their appointment is made by the shareholders. The persons appointed as directors by the shareholders will doubless feel that they have a special obligation to the shareholders. Surely it might be considered just as honourable that a number of directors to be named by the government should feel that they owed a special obligation to the government of the country which has appointed them. I am suggesting that the board of directors should be divided as between those nominated by the shareholders and those nominated by the government. I suggest that course as a means of avoiding a possible conflict between the bank and the government, or between what I may describe as the money power on the one hand and the political power on the other. I say that, if we ever come to one of those great issues into which the world is all too quickly heading, of a conflict between money power on the one hand and political power on the other, there can be but one answer to a conflict of that kind, and that is the ultimate control by the political power and not by the money power. By the provisions of this bill we are placing pretty much all control in the hands of the money power.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does the right hon. gentleman suggest that the directors he refers to should be political directors in the sense that they should be appointed and dismissed politically

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The answer is in the terms of the amendment.

Mr. IRVINE: I believe there are real grounds for the fears of financial domination which have just been expressed by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) but I think that the fears he expressed in regard to financial imperialism might better be discussed when we are dealing with that clause of the bill which empowers the Bank of Canada to affiliate or have relationships with the Bank of International Settlements.

As to the possibility, or likelihood—I think that is a better way to put it—of the financial powers seeking control of the central bank, in my opinion there is every likelihood that they will do so, and in trying to prevent that I have already joined with hon. gentlemen to my right in endeavouring to get this institution established on a publicly owned basis. But for reasons which the government have given in regard to a different viewpoint and a different policy they have refused to grant that, so I am not sure that the amendment now before the house would be of very much advantage. For instance, this is a private bank and there is no attempt to camouflage it as being anything else. As such the bill provides the means which are in keeping with private ownership as to how the directors and the officials shall be appointed. The amendment seeks to depart from the principle of private ownership, which is the basis of the legislation before us, and to make appointments on an entirely different basis so that if the amendment carried we would have a directors' board one-half viewing themselves from the point of view of the banking business and the other half perhaps from an entirely different viewpoint. It is just possible that in that way we would have more confusion than we would have by allowing the board of directors to be appointed as the bill assumes, on a proper private ownership basis. I can conceive that there would be times when if a clash did arise the members of the board would take advantage of that situation and blame each other instead of frankly accepting the responsibility which belonged to them as directors of the institution.

With regard to financial policy I would submit to the committee that this parliament has control of the financial policy and has stated that policy in section 25. I think that is the important feature controlling the policy of the central bank. And that is in the power of this parliament. We have not come to that section yet, however. It is not left to the governors or directors of the bank to say what principle shall direct the financial policy which the central bank is to follow. Section 25 of the act takes care of that.

I pointed out yesterday, and I think it is necessary to emphasize it again, that the central bank grants no new powers to the financiers but rather takes some of their powers away. There can be no doubt that up to this time the chartered banks and the chartered banks' bankers have had control of both credit and currency in Canada and have exercised any control that has been manifest over all these years. Now this bill before the committee takes a good deal of that control out of their hands and places it in the hands of the government, and to that extent the bill is so much better than anything we have had so far in the dominion.

Let me call the attention of the committee to the number of instances provided in this bill where powers have been taken which once were exercised by the chartered banks, powers which private institutions have been deprived of. First, the provisional board of directors must be appointed by the government. Now there was no such proviso in regard to the directors of the chartered banks when they controlled the credit of Canada. Then there are three of the permanent board of directors who are to be appointed by the government. I do not think anyone will argue that that is not an advance on what used to be the situation. Next, the first governor of the bank is to be appointed by the governor in council, and subsequent governors have to be approved by the governor in council.

I do not know whether it is proper to say what I am about to say, and if it is not I shall take it back; but the only way to find out whether it is proper or not is to say it. I think that if the government make as good appointments in connection with the governor and other officials of the bank whom they will have to appoint as they have made in the appointment of the deputy minister of finance, we shall have no cause to complain about the management of the bank.

The next provision is that the governor, the appointee of the government, has power to veto any by-laws. Next, all action of the board and the executive must be concurred in by the governor. Next, the deputy minister or a substitute for the deputy minister will be a member of the board without voting power. If it is merely desired that we should have someone there to give warning I am certain that warning will be forthcoming. The next provision is that complete regulations governing the bank have been laid down by parliament, as I have emphasized; and the most important principle in the direction of financial policy is section 25 to which I have referred. That is really the principle which will largely direct the policy the bank will follow. Then all profits except four and one-half per cent on capital invested go to the receiver general. There is another restriction which we did not find when the bankers were controlling the policy of the country; under the chartered banks they went off with all the profits they could make and therefore had only one incentive in every enterprise, namely, to make more profits. Moreover, the commercial banks are not allowed to have financial interest in the capital stock of the present bank, and that is also a restriction of their financial control of the country. Again, parliament's consent must be obtained before there can be an increase in the capital of the central bank, and the Minister of Finance has full control of the share personnel. Finally, no person other than the minister shall vote for more than fifty shares. These are all restrictions and curtailments of financial power which heretofore had absolutely no existence in financial legislation in Canada.

While therefore, as I have said, I wanted to see this a publicly owned bank, nevertheless I must say that my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his following to the right have not had anything to say hitherto in regard to the control of the financial interests of Canada, though up to this time financiers have exercised authority, without any restriction, over the whole financial structure of the country.

Amendment (Mr. Ralston) negatived: yeas, 35; nays, 60.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—All action must be concurred in by governor or deputy.

Mr. RALSTON: Before we proceed with section 14 I wish to propose an amendment, to insert a new section, 13 (a). This is an amendment which I proposed in the committee on banking and commerce. It was considered by that committee for some time and the Minister of Finance asked that it stand and that consideration be given to it after the bill had been reported from that committee to the house. Accordingly, I will now move the amendment:

13-A. The deputy minister of finance, or in case of his absence or incapacity at any time, such other representative of the Department of Finance as the minister may name for the time being, shall, by virtue of his office or of such nomination as the case may be, have the right to protest against any act or decision of the board or of the executive committee (except a decision nominating a commissioner as hereinafter provided for) which he may consider to be contrary to law or against the interests of the state, by filing such protest in writing with the board or the executive committee as the case may be, and with the minister, and any such protest, unless the same is not concurred in by the minister within two days shall have the force of a suspensive veto so that nothing shall be done under the authority of or pursuant to such act or decision until the merits of the protest shall have been decided upon by a commission of three persons constituted as follows: one person to be named by the board and one person to be named by the minister within seven days after such protest, and one person, to be the chairman to be chosen jointly by the minister and the bank, and in default of agreement on such last mentioned person within seven days after such protest, such chairman shall be the chief justice or acting chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada; the decision of such commission to be made within seven days after the commission has been constituted or within such further time as the minister and the bank may agree upon and the decision of the commission shall have the full force and effect of a decision of the board of directors in respect of which no protest has been filed.

The effect of the new clause is to incorporate in this bill a provision which is found in a large number of charters constituting central banks. I shall read the list that I have before me. It includes Austria, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Esthonia, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Poland, Portugal, South Africa, Jugoslavia. The provision is intended for the purpose primarily of preserving state interests. One could conceive of a situation in which even the governor might vote to take a certain action and the provision is that the deputy minister, who is by this bill made a non-voting member of the board, may if he considers such action to be against the interests of the state or contrary to law, that is contrary to the constitution of the bank, file a suspensive veto or protest with the board, and unless the suspensive veto is not concurred in by the minister within two days, that shall operate to suspend the action of the board until the difference is composed between the government and the directors of the bank.

If, of course, the provision had been carried with regard to public ownership or if the provision had been carried whereby a majority of the board were government appointed, this would not be necessary, but I am endeavouring in every way possible to have the national interests as opposed to what my right hon. leader speaks of as the money power, made dominant in connection with this organization. Therefore, if we cannot have provision whereby the national interests may take the initiative and positive action, I believe this provision helps at least to some extent to provide that the national interests may be asserted in order to prevent action which may be regarded as detrimental to the interests of the state.

As I said, this is not by any means a new provision. The Prime Minister and those who are familiar with central bank organizations will know it is contained already in a large number of acts. It seems to me that I cannot emphasize again too strongly what has already been emphasized from this side of the house, namely, that the control of the currency and credit of our dominion and the stabilization of the value of our currency are matters which should after all be under the direct control of the state and of the government as representing the people of Canada. I therefore beg leave to move the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not intend to say anything because the matter has been fully discussed in the committee. The illustrations to which reference has been made are illustrations under conditions which are so different from ours I do not think the matter calls for any discussion, and the conclusion arrived at in the committee reflected the mind of the majority. If the deputy minister and the government in a country and democracy such as this do not take steps to protect the public interest I entirely lose my appreciation of the situation.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think my right hon. friend ought to dismiss the matter as quickly as that. The point is that the deputy minister is the one who has power to assert and protest. I do not think he is going to need it, but this is giving him power which he does not have under the bank as constituted by the legislation. At the moment he has no power except to sit in the board of directors and hold a watching brief. This gives him power to assert the interests of the state by registering a protest which has the effect of a suspensive veto in any matter which is regarded as prejudicial to the national interests.

My right hon. friend says that if the deputy minister is not sufficiently seized of the importance of the state's interests he does not see any possibility of protecting the interests of the state. The purpose of this amendment is for that very reason, to give the deputy minister power to assert the state interests as predominant over the interests of a private bank.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question: When the bank is set up and the deputy minister is taking his seat on the executive of the bank—

Mr. RALSTON: He is not a member of the executive.

Mr. SPENCER: He takes his seat without a vote. If something comes up with which he disagrees and he advises the government through the Minister of Finance, in what way is the government in a position to exercise influence on the governor to get the board to change their mind?

Mr. BENNETT: In practice there has never been any difficulty so far as the Bank of England is concerned, for instance, nor so far as the Bank of France is concerned. I can only give those two illustrations. The financial policy in general of France the Bank of France has carried out from time to time except where there have been grave doubts as to government at all and matters of that sort, but the bank continued to carry out the general policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Bank of England very often decided government policy.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre suggests that the Bank of England frequently decides the policy of the government in Great Britain. I suppose by that he means to indicate that the experience of those who are the directors of that bank and of the governor is so great and ripe that the government are glad to avail themselves of it. I cannot think of anything other than that that he can have in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Morley's Life of Gladstone has several references to that.

Mr. BENNETT: One can get something more recent than that if the hon. member so desires.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Ramsay MacDonald.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; between 1914 and 1921 there were many cases in which it is recorded that the view at first of the officials and directors of the bank was not the same as that of the government, but in most cases the records indicate that the government after discussion accepted the view of the bank. As is pointed out in the book to which reference is made, there was no collision; there may have been differences and sometimes they were acute, but they were always adjusted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was there not a situation that arose when the right hon. Ramsay MacDonald was head of the government, which resulted in the resignation of his government?

Mr. BENNETT: No; his government resigned on account of the Campbell case in connection with the prosecution. His government, as the right hon. gentleman will remember, resigned in consequence of the Campbell matter. That is what brought about the difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I mean the resignation of the Labour government just before the formation of the present national government.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the right hon. gentleman referred to the first resignation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: As to the last resignation, this is my information: the balance of trade was running so strongly against that country it became necessary in the opinion of the then chancellor of the exchequer, now Lord Snowden, that immediate action should be taken. My information, for what it may be worth—and the reminiscences so indicate—is that the bank entirely agreed as to the necessity of immediate action being taken. It will be recalled that there was a discussion that went on well into the night between the chancellor, the governor and, shall I say the city men, because the heads of some of the great banks were also consulted. In the end immediate action was thought desirable, and as is well known, Mr. MacDonald formed the national government. I do not think there was any difference of opinion; it was because of entire agreement between the bank and the then chancellor of the exchequer as to the seriousness of the situation, if my information is correct. I think probably no factor was more potent in bringing about the result than the broadcast speech of the chancellor of the exchequer, Lord Snowden, with respect to the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was there not at the outset a question of the bank indicating pretty directly the terms upon which credit could be obtained, and of what was taken to mean the only terms, and so really forcing the hands of the government in the matter?

Mr. BENNETT: I dare say the sources of information of the right hon. gentleman are perhaps as full as mine, but my information is that when the situation became acute and the demand upon the bank's gold supply became very great the chancellor of the exchequer was of the opinion that something drastic should be done, and that an effort should be made to adjust balances and bring about, shall I say, a surplus in the budget. The bank pressed their position very strongly, but I think those of us who know Lord Snowden do not believe for a moment that he became acquiescent to anything other than conviction that he was doing what was right; and the speech that he made, which most people think was the determining factor in the election,—I think I can recall the matter now, although I must speak subject to correction, for I have not looked it up recently—the speech he then made over the wireless indicated that the savings of the people, the money derived from their savings certificates, was being utilized by the administration borrowing it for the purpose of supporting the so-called dole. He pointed out that it was absolutely essential that there should be a readjustment with respect to all the public services to bring about equilibrium between income and outgo. I have been told and read, but probably the right hon. gentleman has read and been told also, that that was a more decisive factor than any other in bringing about the result, in the sense that those who suffered voted for a national government, a most amazing spectacle. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman remembers the speech made about it by Mr. Churchill in which he referred to their having said, "We voted for England," and the speech made by the then Mr. Philip Snowden in which he quoted the famous lines from Swinburne.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was his last budget speech?

Mr. BENNETT: His last budget speech, yes. I do know that there is no doubt that the bank, the bank officials, do exercise a very considerable influence on the financial policy of England. But it must also be remembered that the bank is utilized as the fiscal agent of the government, and the relations between them are the relations of a government and its fiscal agent, which of course must be very intimate. This bill contemplates that this bank will act without fee as the fiscal agent of the Dominion of Canada. Therefore the relations between the bank and the Minister of Finance will necessarily be very close. This bill is predicated upon the assumption that the bank is an instrumentality of government, and that it will use its best efforts to forward the interests of whatever government there is. I think if the right hon. gentleman would pause for a moment he would realize that the argument he made a few minutes ago is destructive of his own theory; for assuming, as he says, that I appoint the governor for a term of years and he is not of the same financial school as the right hon. gentleman, and that he succeeded to office, then he would find a governor who was not in accord with his general views. The right hon. gentleman therefore suggests that the government should appoint the directors. So I appoint the directors. Where is he then? They also reflect my mind. The result is that instead of having a board of directors that may be for all I know entirely friendly to the views of the right hon. gentleman, it is not improbable that on a cross section of the shareholders throughout the country, with whom fifty shares is the maximum holding, there will be as many people of the viewpoint of the right hon. gentleman as there would be of mine, for instance. If you take it on the balance of probability there are perhaps those who would say there would be more. Therefore it seems to me that I have done a greater service to the right hon. gentleman by providing for this position than if I provided that the directors should be appointed by the government and be there for a term of years. The change of administration would then find not only the governor but the board of directors set in their ways, making it much more difficult for the right hon. gentleman to deal with the situation than otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not the act provide that the directors retire in rotation?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the shortest term is two years, then three, four and five years. This one further point I think may be useful in that regard. It is true that the directors retire in rotation, and they are elected from the whole body of shareholders. I have no reason to believe that they will all be of one political viewpoint, any more than the right hon. gentleman has. I think that is one of his best assurances.

Just one word more. It is erroneous to say that we are taking control away from parliament. Any parliament can be called together and do anything it pleases to this bank. The contingency that the right hon. gentleman has suggested, that the Senate might interfere, will only leave wider scope and greater opportunity for the right hon. gentleman, if the time ever comes, to exercise those reforming qualities with respect to that body that were interfered with by providence on a previous occasion.

Amendment (Mr. Ralston) negatived on division.

Section agreed to.

Sections 15 and 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Capital and shares.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On division.

Section agreed to on division.

Sections 18 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

On section 21—Business and powers of the bank.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to move an amendment to section 21 to make it accord with the provisions of the Bank Act, thereby enabling the Bank of Canada to deal with securities issued by a school corporation or parish trustees or securities issued pursuant to the statutes of a province. It is the same provision that we added to the Bank Act to meet the situation in the province of Quebec, having regard to the designation they give to their form of security. The effect of the amendment is to provide uniformity between the Bank of Canada Act and the Bank Act. I move:

That paragraph (i) of subsection 1 of section 21 of Bill No. 19 be struck out and the following substituted:—

"(i) make loans or advances for periods not exceeding six months to chartered banks on the pledge or hypothecation of the foregoing classes of securities, bills of exchange or promissory notes, or of Canadian municipal securities, or of securities issued by a school corporation or parish trustees, or of securities issued pursuant to the statutes of a province making provision for the payment thereof and the interest thereon by the province, or of gold or silver coin or bullion, or documents of title relating thereto;"

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Then there is a word to be added in paragraph (m), after the word "bank" in the third line. I move:

That clause (m) of subsection one of section twenty of Bill 19 be amended by inserting after the word "bank" in the third line of the said clause the words "or from any bank incorporated under the Quebec Savings Banks Act."

It will be recalled that there are two banks in the country to which this applies, one the saving bank in Quebec and the other the savings bank in Montreal, and the amendment proposed brings these two banks within the provisions of that subsection as far as deposits are concerned.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 22 and 23 agreed to.

On section 24—Sole right of note issue.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have an amendment to move to this section, Mr. Chairman. I desire to move that section 24 be amended by striking out subsection 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

(4) The form and material of the notes shall be subject to approval by the minister: Provided that said notes shall be printed in both the English and French languages.

Mr. BENNETT: That would not be an amendment; that is the present provision.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, it is quite different.

Mr. BENNETT: I raise the point of order. The section reads:

Provided that notes in either the English or the French language shall be available as required.

The proposed amendment is that the notes shall be printed in both languages, but that is provided for here. There can be no question about it. An amendment cannot be in the terms of the section itself.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The amendment is that the English and French shall appear on the same note.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what it says; that is the point exactly. It is clear that it does not say that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Everyone in the committee understood what was meant.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only raising the point; that is not what it says.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite willing to change it.

Mr. BENNETT: I wish the hon. gentleman would make that clear, because as the amendment stands it is what is here already.

Mr. LAPOINTE: To meet the wishes of the Prime Minister I will substitute the words, "provided that each said note shall be printed in both the English and the French language."

My remarks in support of this amendment will be very brief. It is needless to argue either the legal or the constitutional issue, since, after I moved a similar amendment in the banking committee, the Minister of Finance moved the proviso that now appears in subsection 4. I am quite willing to admit that this is a recognition of the principle, and my only reason for proposing the amendment has to do with the question of method, of better policy, perhaps even of better taste. It has been recognized by the provision inserted in the bill that since there are banks in this country issuing notes in both English and French, now that the Bank of Canada will have the exclusive privilege of issuing notes it is only fair that the notes should be issued in French as well as in English. I hardly need to refer to the fact that these notes are legal tender; they are so described in this very section. Under section 133 of the British North America Act both English and French are used in the courts, not only those of the province of Quebec but also in all the federal courts. There are federal courts in Canada; the exchequer court sits everywhere. So these documents, being legal tender, certainly should be issued in both languages.

As I said before, it is a question as to the best method to be followed. Everywhere in the world where a similar situation exists, in order to show the duality of language in such countries both languages, and in certain countries three languages, are used on the notes issued by the banks. For instance, in Belgium they have both French and Flemish on the notes. In Switzerland, where there are three official languages, French, German and Italian, the notes are issued with the three languages appearing thereon, and the same thing happens wherever a similar situation exists. It is so in South Africa, in the Irish Free State and in all the other countries of the world. Canada would be the only country whose national currency would be issued in two languages but not on the same note; there would be a portion of the notes printed in English and a portion of the notes printed in French. I do not think that is a good way to do it. What would be the result? There are many in Canada who did not speak the other language until after they had reached a certain age, when they took the trouble to learn it; these would like to have both languages. So far as I am concerned I would prefer to have both languages. The French notes will be circulated largely in the province of Quebec while the English notes will be circulated principally in the other provinces. Will it be a good thing to emphasize that situation, to make Quebec more French and the rest of Canada more English? I do not think it will. With regard to other countries, do you think it would be a good thing to have notes printed exclusively in French circulated in some European countries where the people do not know the conditions here, and where it might be thought that Canada is an entirely French country?

From whatever point of view you consider it I do not think the method adopted by the government is the best method. Let us admit that it may become a cause of friction in some places; if notes are offered to some people who do not like the language in which the notes are issued there may be disagreeable incidents. There may be something said or done which would not be conducive to peace and harmony in the country. Why should we take that risk? I must apologize for showing that I have a ten dollar bill in my pocket, but I have one which I am holding in my hand. Who will suffer if the notes of the Bank of Canada are issued in the same way as the notes of the Banque Canadienne Nationale or the Banque Provinciale du Canada, whereon appear the words "ten" and "dix," and "will pay to bearer" and "paiera au porteur"?

Mr. VALLANCE: Give it to Hansard.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No thanks. Who would suffer if that suggestion were accepted? I cannot understand how anyone could object to the issue of notes being made with both languages on the same notes, instead of having a parcel of English notes in one place and a parcel of French notes in another. The other system is that provided through the amendment suggested by the banking and commerce committee. It is merely the matter of choice between two methods, and I plead with you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the members of the committee, to adopt the only fair and reasonable choice, and the one which will not cause friction among Canadians.

Mr. BENNETT: It is perhaps unnecessary to say that I am not unmindful of the discussions which have taken place in the public press with respect to this matter. I am not unaware, and I fancy very few members in this chamber can be unaware, of the acute feeling which has developed through those discussions. Those in the province of Quebec who have not agreed with the views put forward by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) to the effect that the notes of the Bank of Canada should each be engraved in two languages, have been denounced publicly as traitors to their race, and have been subjected to attacks of a character which I very greatly deprecate. I therefore am not unaware of the seriousness of this situation, nor do I propose to hesitate for a single moment in directing the attention of this committee to every phase of the matter, and the reasons which now necessitate a review of the constitutional situation.

When the government was called upon to frame that section of the bill which deals with note issue it will be observed that subsection 4 of section 23 read as follows:

> The form and material of the notes shall be subject to approval by the minister.

It was hoped by the use of those words to avoid any discussions such as those which have been going on during the last few weeks in the newspapers published in this country. It was further proposed that when the section was reached the minister would indicate it was the intention of the government to follow the constitution and to provide that notes should be available engraved in both the English and French languages. Therefore it was with some degree of, shall I say regret, that one observed that on March 15 last the hon. member for Quebec East gave notice of his intention to move an amendment in terms similar to the amendment moved to-night.

That matter came up for consideration at the meeting of the select standing committee on banking and commerce held on June 5, 1934. And in No. 16 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence, at page xiv these words appear:

> Consideration of amendment proposed by Mr. Lapointe on March 15, last, viz:—
> That section twenty-three of Bill 19 be amended by striking out subsection (4) and substituting therefor the following:
> (4) The notes shall be printed in the English and French languages and their form and material shall be subject to approval by the minister.
> Motion to amend declared lost.
> The names being called for, they were recorded as follows: Yeas: Messieurs Casgrain, Howard, Lapointe, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Ralston, Raymond.—6. Nays: Messieurs Baker, Chaplin, Coote, Ernst, Fraser (Cariboo), Hackett, Irvine, MacMillan (Saskatoon), Robinson, Smoke, Spencer, Stanley, White (London), White (Mount Royal).—14. Messrs. Dorion and Gagnon announced that had they not been paired they would have voted against the amendment.
> The motion to amend was again declared passed in the negative.
> Consideration of amendment proposed by Mr. Rhodes on May 31 last, viz:—
> That subsection (4) of section twenty-three of Bill 19 be amended by adding thereto the following: Provided that notes in either the English or the French language shall be available as required.
> Motion to amend declared carried.
> The names being called for they were taken down as follows: Yeas: Messieurs Baker, Casgrain, Chaplin, Coote, Ernst, Fraser (Cariboo), Hackett, Howard, Irvine, Lapointe, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), MacMillan (Saskatoon), Ralston, Raymond, Robinson, Smoke, Spencer, Stanley, White (London), White (Mount Royal).—20. Nays: 0. Messrs. Dorion, Gagnon and Jacobs announced that they were paired and that if they had voted they would have voted in favour of the amendment.

The amendment, therefore, as it now appears in the bill was unanimously adopted by the committee. That is the position. To-night a motion has been moved which, in its original terms was exactly similar to that provided by subsection 4 of section 23. The amendment as moved was:

> The notes shall be printed in the English and French languages, and their form and material shall be subject to approval by the minister.

The amendment has since been amended, and as it now appears for the consideration of this committee it states that each note shall be printed in both languages. The choice therefore is between notes printed in English and notes printed in French, or each note being engraved in English and French. This raises a question of very serious moment, and is one which has engaged the attention of this house on previous occasions. As I said a moment ago it is a question which has involved many, many hard words being spoken and written. Section 133 of the British North America Act is as follows:

Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

The interpretation of that section, so far as I know, has not been a matter for judicial consideration, but by common consent those who are members of this parliament have always been enabled on request to secure the proceedings of this parliament, whether in the form of debates, bluebooks or otherwise, in the French language, and equally in the English language. There was therefore an equality so far as these things were concerned. I shall refer to one debate in particular that engaged the attention of the house, that of the twenty-fifth of February, 1907, when a motion was moved by the gentleman who is now the Deputy Speaker, and there participated in that debate the hon. member for Labelle. It is a matter of satisfaction to know that twenty-seven years after that resolution was moved in this house on another matter the question now raised is being considered and the gentlemen to whom I refer, who were present twenty-seven years ago, are present this evening. The motion read as follows:

That it is in the interest and for the well-being of the dominion, and in accord with the spirit of the confederation agreement of 1867, that the French language, which in virtue of the constitution is official, be placed on a footing of equality with the English language in all public matters—for instance, in the coinage of moneys and in the administration of postal affairs.

The words, it will be observed, are, "be placed on a footing of equality with the English language." To that on the twenty-fifth of February Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved in amendment:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following be substituted in place thereof:

"The French language is, in fact, as well as by the constitution, on a footing of equality with the English language.

In the course of the debate Sir Wilfrid Laurier used these words:

Of course, there are some great occasions in which it—

The French language.

—must be spoken, there are occasions of a public character when it ought to be spoken. But to affirm, as he does, that the French language should be used upon every occasion, and that every public document should be printed on one side in French and the other side in English is, I think, going a little too far. For instance, I understand that my hon. friend wants bank notes to be printed either in French or in English.

Note the words, "either in French or in English":

For my part I never yet saw an occasion where a bank note printed in English was not properly understood by the French people; and I am quite sure that a bank note printed in French would be understood by the English people to be exactly what it means. But I see no reason why a bank note should not be printed in French. Since we have been in office we have not had occasion to issue a new form of bank notes, we have taken the old form as we found it, we have continued the form of the old bank notes. I do not see any reason why, if we were to issue a new form, we should issue it in one language rather than another. But I would say to my hon. friend that it is far better that we should be conservative in these matters and not to change our forms every now and then.

For nine years the hon. gentleman who has just spoken occupied high office, and in 1930 just before leaving office a contract was entered into between the government and the bank note company that engraves Canadian bank notes, and provision was made for the engraving of all the notes that this country requires for a period of five years, the notes of the Dominion of Canada, notes for $50, $100, $500, $1,000, for all the notes that were legal tender in Canada and are the notes of the Dominion of Canada, including also the one dollar bills, the banks not having any power to issue such; also the two dollar bills and the four dollar bills, and of course the five dollar bills as well, although the banks have power to issue bills from five dollars upwards. Was any such provision as is now mentioned in this amendment contained in that contract?

Mr. DUPUIS: There was no Bank of Canada then.

Mr. BENNETT: There was the Dominion of Canada whose notes were the same as the Bank of Canada's notes. Was any such effort made to do that then? No. Therefore, sir, is it unfair to say that it is quite apparent that this has nothing to do with a question of business but it is a political issue pure and simple?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I deny that. I throw that back in your teeth.

Mr. BENNETT: I make it perfectly clear, Mr. Chairman, that if after nine years in office the hon. gentleman raised no such question in this house, did not assert for a single moment the desirability of following the course which is now being adopted by this government, did not even approach the matter, why is it other than a political question when now, after the government has indicated it proposes to follow the constitution and engrave the notes in English and in French, we should be met by a motion that each note must be engraved in both languages?

It is a very serious matter. It is one of the most serious that this country has had to consider for a long time in view of the discussions that have been taking place in the public press of Quebec. Shall those who sit on one side of the house and follow the constitution be branded as traitors in the Liberal press? That is what has been going on in this country, and confronted with that situation this government, desiring to follow the course which I mapped out for myself when I was elected leader of this party—when I went to the old province of Quebec in the first speech that I made there I said "I propose to follow the constitution. With respect to your rights and your privileges, everything that the constitution affords to you as a minority or as a majority I propose to observe."

Nothing is more fatal than a departure from a constitutional right. Nothing is more fatal than an effort to impose upon a majority the will of a minority if the rights are established by law. Since when has it become the law of Canada that the will of a minority shall prevail over that of the majority? Since when did it become conducive to the rights of minorities that they should insist that the constitution should be disregarded and the rights of majorities taken from them? That is the question. It was that that was in the mind of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he said, "I see no reason why one language should be preferred over the other." It was that that was in the mind of that great French Canadian when he said that equality was guaranteed by the constitution. As I intimated in my first address in the province of Quebec, by that I stand; by that this government stands or falls. Equality under the law. Equal rights. The notes in French, the notes in English; engraved in French, engraved in English, even as Sir Wilfrid Laurier said.

On July 1 next this country will celebrate the sixty-seventh anniversary of our confederation. Successive governments have come and gone; successive prime ministers have come and gone; successive parliaments have been elected and have disappeared; but for the first time in a statute of this country dealing with the question of the issue of dominion notes this government has placed a minority on the basis of equality under the law. And what is more, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat intimated in the committee that in the amendment moved by the Minister of Finance there was a fulfilment of the constitution, and he nods his head now in acquiescence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He said so to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: He not only asks this committee to afford equality under the law by concurring in the amendment proposed by the government, which was their original intention under the section as it reads, so that there would be no controversy or discussion, but having projected the question into the debate he has admitted that the proposals of the government met the constitutional obligation. Who says nay to that? No one. Then, sir, my statement to this house is that no man is doing justice to his own people and to the future who suggests that there should be inequality under the law. Equality is provided for by statute; equality is provided for by the government—equality under the law, the engraving of a French note, of an English note: equality. But the hon. member for Quebec East says: No, no; not that, not equality. I now demand that the constitution shall be amended, disregarded, flouted, and that this committee shall, instead of following it, maintaining the rights of minorities in all their strength and vigor under the law, substitute therefor disobedience to the constitution, disregard for it in any event, and that equality, as established by law, shall be departed from.

That is what we are asked to do; that is what my fellow Canadians from Quebec are asked to do. But the history of the world in dealing with the rights of minorities is clear—that when you invite any parliament to disregard the rights of majorities by pressing for rights which are not granted by the constitutions, you thereby invite a departure from the rights granted by the constitution. That is what you do. And to-night we are asked to vote for a resolution which is an invitation to take action subversive of the rights of minorities as granted by the constitution. I will not do it. My promise was clear and it will be observed. This government stands or falls by the maintenance under the law of equality to those to whom the constitution has granted equality under the terms of section 133. By that we stand; by that we fall. And, as the years go by, when we think of the agitation now being carried on for amendments to the British North America Act, and the manner in which we have steadily stood by the rights of minorities as guaranteed by the constitution, when we recollect the statements made as to the contractual obligations of the constitution, how are the members of this committee to go out and say to the people of this country that we asked parliament to disregard these contractual rights, if they be such? That is the question; that is the question stripped of everything.

Our statutes for years have been published in separate volumes; our order paper every day appears in the English and French languages; our Hansard appears in the English and French languages; all documents which any member has a right to see, to read, to possess, he may receive in either language. And having regard to that provision, I suggest that hon. members should think carefully before they disregard the provision of the law, so clear, which for sixty-seven years has been observed—observed, mark you. In 1896 I supported the remedial measure and I have never offered apologies for having done so, because under the constitution it was provided that this parliament should take action in the event of certain contingencies. When the privy council said that those contingencies had arisen, when they so declared and this action was taken, I supported it. And in the old province of Quebec to-day the proceedings of the legislature are printed in separate volumes. I go into the library and receive statutes in English and in French. I receive reports from day to day of various departments, and some of them are so beautiful—illustrations and typography—that one values them apart altogether from the information they contain. Moreover, in that legislature bills are printed in English and in French.

I do not propose to labour the question. I have endeavoured to intimate to the committee the principles that have governed us in our approach to this matter. It has not been lightly done; it has not been done in caprice nor for political reward nor hope of reward. It has been done because we thought and still believe that under the section I have read, the minister approving of the form and material, these notes should be issued. When this amendment seeks to impose, as it does, not equality under the law but a certain form by which, however small the bill, there shall be engraved upon it two languages and not that the bill may be available in either, the committee, I do submit, has a very serious responsibility.

I am not going to dwell further upon the matter. My duty is to discharge my obligations to my fellow citizens under the constitution, and that I will do. And when I see my fellow citizens from Quebec, who have been subjected to these attacks in the daily press, so vicious in character, so uncalled for, denounced as traitors to their race because they dare to assert their constitutional rights as members, rather than endeavour to obtain for themselves other than the equality which the law provides, I ask—is it fair, is it right, is it just? When we have observed the constitution—observed it, mark you, for the hon. member for Quebec East admits that—then why project this question into the discussion if not for political reasons? Why do it? That having been done, I cannot but think that the responsibility for it is one which those who have created and must accept it will live long enough some day to regret.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After what we have listened to from the Prime Minister, I think it might be well to remind the committee of the section which is under consideration, and of the exact nature of the amendment which has been moved. The subsection under discussion reads:

> The form and material of the notes shall be subject to approval by the minister: Provided that notes in either the English or the French language shall be available as required.

The words, "that notes in either the English or the French language shall be available as required," are words which were put there by the government of the day. The Prime Minister himself has stated to us this evening that his government is responsible for that provision. The provision is that there shall be notes in English and in French. In so doing the Prime Minister says that he has followed the constitution.

Mr. BENNETT: That is admitted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He has said repeatedly that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) in the amendment he has moved has admitted that the right hon. gentleman as Prime Minister has in what he is doing followed the constitution and observed all constitutional obligations. My right hon. friend has, however, gone on to say that the hon. member for Quebec East now demands that the constitution should be amended. Can my right hon. friend substantiate that statement?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for Quebec East makes and has made no demand for any amendment of the constitution.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all. Nothing is further from the mind of the hon. member for Quebec East; he has made no request for any amendment of the constitution. The amendment that is before the committee at the present moment is one which relates to the method by which the requirements of the constitution may be carried out so as best to serve the convenience of the public and best to make for harmony and good-will between the different elements of the country. The Prime Minister's method of complying with the constitution is to issue two sets of notes, some in French and some in English; that is what the provision of this bill now under consideration requires. The method which the hon. member for Quebec East proposes is that the notes should bear on the face of them as to their denomination the French as well as the English language. The question is simply one of the method which will best serve the convenience of the people of the country and make for harmony; there is no question of the constitution in the matter. It must be a relief to the Prime Minister to find that I am not arguing for adherence to the constitution at present. He is the one who is asserting that particular aspect. But it is quite clear that what is involved here is simply a difference of method in issuing notes, having regard to what will best serve the public convenience and national unity.

May I ask hon. members: What, apart from all other considerations, would, as a matter of fact to most of us who are English speaking, be the most convenient method to have followed as respects moneys that are to issue from this central bank assuming, as is to be the case, that it is going to issue all the currency? Will it be more convenient for us to receive our payments in bills, some wholly in French and others wholly in English, or will it be more convenient, whenever a bill is received, to find that its denomination is in both languages? That is the whole question. These bills will circulate from one end of Canada to the other; when payments are made in different localities, bills in French must be accepted equally with bills in English, because each are legal tender. Is it not going to make for greater convenience all round that, when moneys are sent from one part of Canada to another, there should be no possibility of any question arising when a bill is received, because of its being in one language rather than in another, because having the two languages on its face it will be readily understood by all, than rather, as will otherwise frequently happen, sometimes understood by some and often not understood by large numbers of persons. Think too of the inconvenience to local banks all over Canada which will have two sets of notes, one set in French and one in English. That is the whole question.

The Prime Minister said—and I resent very strongly the statement he made—that the hon. member for Quebec East was trying to raise a political issue.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is an infamous lie.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman's language will have to be altered. He is not holding a meeting somewhere. He said that something is an infamous lie. He must withdraw that language.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BENNETT: I am raising a point of order and I must press it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been a great deal of talk—

Mr. BENNETT: He is trying to get away from it but this is something he cannot get away from. He must withdraw those words.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I said that anyone who said I am doing this from a political point of view utters an infamous lie. I said that. I did not mention anybody in particular, but I will withdraw the statement if it is against the rules of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was saying, when I was interrupted by the Prime Minister, that he stated that the hon. member for Quebec East was seeking to raise a political issue. May I say that the one who is seeking to raise a political issue is the Prime Minister himself and that his whole speech this evening was an effort to raise a political issue.

In order that the committee may get back again to the real point, which is the one involved in the amendment, the question of public convenience, of what is the best method and what is likely to serve the interests of good will and harmony as between all parts and all races of this country, may I refer to what has taken place with respect to the postage of Canada. Unlike my hon. friend the member for Quebec East, I do not happen to have a ten dollar bill in my pocket; but I have a two cent stamp.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not a five?

Some hon. MEMBERS: A five cent piece.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I have not a five cent piece, but I have a two cent stamp and I notice that the wording upon it appears in both English and French. I happen to have a three cent stamp as well, so that we are getting to the five cents by degrees. This is not a postage, but a national revenue stamp a three cent excise stamp, and I find that it also is in both English and French. Both of these, the excise stamp and the postage stamp, are issued by the present administration. As I understand it, all the postage stamps and also all the excise stamps of Canada also the postal notes and money orders are at present being issued by the government in both languages. This is being done for what reason? Because of a belief in equality. I wish to ask hon. members, if they are interested in equality, and what is the most obvious manner of asserting equality, whether the evidence of equality is not greater in a document or token that on its face is printed in the two languages rather than in what is proposed by this measure, namely, two sets of documents or tokens, one in one language and the other in the other postage or revenue stamps or money orders or postal notes or bank notes issued as is proposed in the amendment rather than as is proposed in the provision of this bill as drafted by the government. I do not think it is necessary to say more than that. I have no desire to indulge in heroics. If one wished to follow the Prime Minister it would not be difficult in a discussion on this subject to rouse very quickly many racial passions. The hon. member for Quebec East in his remarks made it very clear that what he was seeking to do was not to raise a political issue but to avoid political issues being raised.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members should take the trouble to read in Hansard tomorrow what the hon. member for Quebec East said, as they could not possibly have heard him or they would not be jeering at the moment. He said that in the event, in some parts of Canada, of notes in French being handed to someone unable to speak the French language, difficulties and unpleasantnesses might arise between the party tendering the notes and the one asked to receive them. In directing attention to that, was my hon. colleague trying to create a political issue or was he trying to prevent political issues from arising? That was and is his sole purpose. These notes are going to be circulated in largest numbers, may I point out, in the largest financial and urban centre we have in this country, the city of Montreal. Out of that city to other parts of Canada will flow a larger number of the notes of the Bank of Canada than from any other centre in Canada. Is it not probable that a very large proportion of those notes from the city of Montreal will be notes printed in French? I should like to know whether good will and harmony between the two races and all parts of the country, and that good understanding which is at the basis of everything previous in our national life, will not be better preserved by having these notes go out bearing on their face the denomination in both languages, rather than large quantities going out in French and other large quantities in English. That sums up pretty much the whole question that is before us.

In conclusion I submit it is extraordinary that the Prime Minister of this country should seek to make a political issue out of a matter of this kind and that in so doing he should direct a personal attack upon the hon. member for Quebec East. I wish to say that there is no man in Canada, I do not care to which side of the house we look, who has done more in the course of his life to further good will as between all races and classes in this country than my hon. colleague the former Minister of Justice. And I say further that there is not an hon. member of the parliament of Canada, either of the present or any previous parliament, who has done as much in his life to further international good will as has my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice. It ill becomes the Prime Minister to try to attribute to one so experienced and so honoured in our public life a motive as low and base as that which the Prime Minister has put forward, a motive which the member for Quebec East is incapable of thinking of, let alone acting upon, in any personal or public matter.

Mr. BOURASSA: It seems to me that in this heated debate we are losing sight of what I might call the broad, practical aspect of this question. As a political issue—well let us be frank about it, all political leaders and all politicians are endeavouring to make the best they can out of every question. In my experience, it has always been done, and provided it is done honestly and honourably nobody can find fault with that, and no party should throw stones at the other. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), in all sincerity—in that regard I entirely endorse what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said—in his sincere desire to present the question in the least passionate manner has somewhat minimized the issue. But I am afraid that on the other side the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) disquieted as he rightly is, from appearance at least, by the tone of some of the papers in the province of Quebec, has rather exaggerated what I would call the electoral or racial aspect of this question. I have known the province of Quebec for a long while. I do not believe that the exalted tone of some of the papers in the province of Quebec represents the feelings of the sensible mass of the people.

Mr. QUINN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA: The average French Canadian farmer or artisan or business man is prepared to take all the dollars he can earn and make the best use of them, especially at the present time, whether they are printed in French or English or Chinese or any other language. I also believe that some of those staunch supporters of British rights—"this is an English country, nothing but English"—would not spit on a bill printed in French if it helped them in buying a bottle of Scotch whisky. So I do not take very seriously that aspect of the question.

But there are serious aspects. I shall not discuss the constitutional issue. If I ventured to express an opinion on what I might call the legal aspect, I am afraid the Prime Minister is absolutely right. I think the amendment as framed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) conforms strictly to the letter of article 133 of the British North America Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We all agree to that.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course the ex-Minister of Justice, with his knowledge of law, admits it. That does away with three-quarters of those extravagant and heated expressions of opinion which appeared in the irresponsible papers of the province of Quebec; and in the province of Quebec, as elsewhere, most of the papers are irresponsible. It was stated that this amendment of the Minister of Finance is a step backward. Of course I have a very simple mind and a limited experience both in reading law and in parliamentary government, but I cannot get it into my head that this legislation, declaring for the first time that bills and money shall be printed in French, is a backward step in the acknowledgment of the French language. But I leave that aside also. I simply ask the members of this committee, on both sides of the house, to think of a broader aspect which relates to the principle of the issuing of currency. For centuries past as well as in present times, in every country, the issue of currency, the means of exchange between individuals, is an exercise of the right of sovereignty. Therefore the bills or coins which represent that means of exchange should first bear the stamp of the sovereign. In this respect it will be a great advantage to do away with those bills that are at present going right and left having on them pictures of many gentlemen, some of them good, honest people, some of them—

Mr. POWER: Less honest.

Mr. BOURASSA: —high-class crooks who should be in peniteniaries, but whose pictures occupy the place of that of the sovereign on these bills of exchange which we call money. Therefore I hope the next bills will bear the stamp of the king—not the king of England, not the emperor of the British Empire, but the king of Canada, as we acknowledge him.

Mr. QUINN: Who is that?

Mr. BOURASSA: It is King George for the time being. Where is the hon. member from? So long—I say it for my hon. friend's satisfaction—as we think proper to consider King George as our king. Now the other more modern significance of coins and money bills is to express nationality. In our day sovereignty and nationality are supposed to work together, and money bills, as postage stamps, which circulate the world over, which the nationals of any country carry with them when they travel abroad, are supposed to signify that the country from which those postage stamps or bills come is governed by this or that sovereign, or this or that institution, if it is a republic, and that it is peopled by individuals speaking a certain language. Now, whether we like it or not, this country was for a century and a half a French speaking country. After the conquest and cession it continued to be French speaking under a foreign government. The rulers of Great Britain, at a period when racial and religious prejudices were much stronger than they are to-day, were nevertheless convinced that it was impossible for a conquering power to rule a foreign nation composed of civilized beings according to the tenets and with the use of the language of the conquering nation. So that even under that old, stubborn king, George III, they acknowledged the French language as the language of civil life and even of legal life in Canada. And, with a slight interruption in 1840, when the French language was suppressed by an act of the British parliament, the French language has remained one of the official languages of Canada.

In Belgium, as the hon. member for Quebec East pointed out, both the Flemish and the French languages are official. The language of the majority is Flemish, but the right of the Walloon minority to speak its language has been observed. There, curiously enough, it is the majority that has had to fight for the expression of its rights in various matters of administration which I need not relate to-night. In Switzerland there is a large majority of German speaking people; about one-third of the population is French speaking and there is an extremely small minority of Italian speaking people. Do not imagine that those people always agreed on language or racial matters. I happened to be in Switzerland just about a week before the war broke out. In French Switzerland the sympathy for France was just as strongly expressed as the sympathy for Germany was expressed in German Switzerland. There have been quarrels, quibblings and difficulties in the use of languages in Switzerland, as we have had them here. Nevertheless, belonging to an old civilization and having old traditions, they realized that it must not be a matter of oppression by one as against the other, and they have settled once for all that those documents expressing the broad nationality of the people should bear testimony to the understanding which has existed between them for centuries. Therefore their money bears all three languages. That is not the case with their postage stamps, because it would be too complicated to have three languages on postage stamps. So they agreed on one word, the Latin word Helvetia, which expresses the name of the country for the three nationalities. On all other documents the three languages are used.

Now let us come back to our present situation in Canada. When I have discussed this issue—and I have discussed it often in the last thirty years, not only in parliament but still more frequently before English speaking audiences in Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and even British Columbia—I have never presented the question as a constitutional matter or as a question of right on the part of French Canadians. That is where I think most of our fellow citizens in the province of Quebec, especially in those heated expressions of opinion appearing in the press or occurring during speeches, are wrong. Why put it on the basis of law? Why put it on the basis of a right exacted by the minority, if possible, from the majority, instead of basing it on common sense, in the general interests of Canada? In all those matters which express in material fashion the characteristics of the Canadian nation there has been the constant thought in my mind that if we want to preserve this confederation of ours for the generations to come, whether they speak French or English, German or Polish or any other language; or whether we consider it primarily from a British point of view as one of the essential elements of the British Empire, let us not forget that the everlasting obstacle to that preservation is the constant and tremendous penetration of American thought, American civilization, American language and American influences of all sorts. I have always considered that everything which tends to differentiate the Canadian nationality from the American nationality, and show to the outside world, to the passer-by, to the traveller, whether he is of English, German or French origin, that we want to express the difference of our civilization and its component elements from that of the United States, should be encouraged.

What is the main difference between Canada and the United States? Is it climate? Is it production? Is it social habits? Is it literature? That may be the case to a large extent in the province of Quebec, though I am sorry to say that it becomes less so from day to day. As regards English speaking Canada, however, let my good friends on all sides of the house make what we call in Catholic theology their examination in conscience. Do they realize to what extent from year to year their children are becoming more and more American? Do they realize that the so-called American literature of the cheapest kind is being circulated in Canada to a degree to which the circulation of English literature cannot be compared? I admit that in connection with a small measure of this nature we cannot counteract that influence, but I repeat that everything should be encouraged which will remind the children of Ontario, of Quebec, of New Brunswick or of Saskatchewan that Canada is something different from the United States, that in Canada there are elements of ethnical, culture and social civilization which differentiates the Canadian nation as a whole from the great American nation to the south. Do you not think that is the best permanent service we can render not only to ourselves and not only to Canada but, I repeat, to the British Empire?

It is not by the strength of arms, by the influence of money or by diplomacy that Great Britain has kept Canada within her great empire. We have remained a part of the British Empire because, after many years of misunderstandings, England succeeded in gaining the confidence of that portion of the Canadian nation which is of French origin, which speaks French and which desires, not in a spirit of arrogance but on the contrary in a spirit of confraternity, to stamp its character on the nation with its language, not to the detriment of the English language or of English culture but rather in unison with English culture. We do not desire to do what the Norman conquerors did in England. They imposed the French language on the great English nation for five centuries, but that did not prevent English civilization from emerging out of that conquest and developing that magnificent policy with which we are all proud to be associated. In this country of ours, principles of liberty and cooperation should prevail over any idea of the imposition of the will of a majority on the minority or the arrogant demand of a minority from an unwilling majority. Whether we belong to the majority or the minority, let us all consider these things from a broad Canadian point of view, from a broad British point of view and from a broad international point of view.

I repeat that in a small matter of this kind we cannot do a great deal, but by this means every Canadian, wherever he may travel, will show that under the sovereignty of King George, which we freely acknowledge —not because he is the king of England but because he is our king and because we wish to keep him our king—we have freedom to express ourselves in French or in English, and that our civilization is the result of the unison, the amity and the cooperation of those two great races. Do you not think it is better to have that expressed every time and everywhere than to leave it to the narrow interpretation of the French speaking Canadian or the narrow interpretation of the English speaking Canadian to say, on one side, "we are French" and on the other "we are English"? Let us say, "we are all Canadians," and we make use of those two great instruments of civilization, those two great expressions of human thought, the French language and the English language, to prove to the world that two races can live in amity, can understand each other, can make concessions to each other without always quibbling about legal texts or endeavouring to show that a majority is oppressing a minority or that a minority is endeavouring to wrest, through political squabbles and intrigues, privileges for which it should not ask. It is in that spirit, Mr. Chairman, that twenty-seven years ago, as the Prime Minister has reminded us, I upheld with quite the same degree of fervour the request of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne). It is in the same spirit that all through my somewhat agitated life I have always endeavoured to bring the French Canadian to understand the English and the English to understand the French Canadian, because so long as we do not understand each other we will not accomplish anything good, but if we do understand each other we can accomplish wonders.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The question is on the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Lapointe) negatived: yeas 42; nays 69.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. POWER: I was paired with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was paired with the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. RALSTON: I was paired with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. MURPHY: I was paired with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. TURNBULL: I was paired with the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD: I was paired with the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. DUBUC: I was paired with the hon. member for Halifax. Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I was paired with the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Goulet): Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. CHARTERS: I was paired with the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Blair). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I was paired with the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. CANTLEY: I was paired with the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. SAUVE: I was paired with the hon. member for l'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Séguin). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith Cumberland): Section carried.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, beginning with section 26.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What will be the other business?

Mr. SPENCER: Is section 25 carried? We could not hear you.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): It is carried.

Mr. BENNETT: Let it stand, then, Mr. Chairman.

Section 25 stands.

CIVIL SERVICE

FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO ADMINISTRATION AND OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin) presented the fourth report of the select special committee on the Civil Service Act, as follows:

House of Commons,
Monday, June 25, 1934.

Fourth Report:

The select special committee appointed to inquire into and report upon the administration and operation of the Civil Service Act as amended, with instructions to inquire into and report concerning the repeal or amendment of any of the provisions of the said act or the substitution therefor or addition thereto of other provisions as the committee may deem advisable, begs leave to present the following as its fourth report:

(1) Representations have been made to your committee urging that certain temporary employees who have for long periods been occupying positions of a permanent nature should now be accorded permanent status.

Your committee find that by orders in council, P.C. 2958, dated the 16th day of December, 1920, and P.C. 3895, dated October 22, 1921, passed pursuant to the Civil Service Amendment Act, October, 1919, 4060 temporary employees who had been continuously employed in positions of a permanent character since November 10, 1919 (the date on which the Civil Service Act became law) were, during the period 1920-27, given permanent status. In 1927, however, the enabling orders in council were rescinded. The representations which have been made to your committee urge that any other temporary employees (approximately 300 in number) who were eligible to benefit under this section of the act and the said orders in council but whose permanency was not at the time effected should now be granted permanent status, in order that they may enjoy the benefits attached thereto. These benefits include the right to contribute to the Civil Service Superannuation Act, the right to receive statutory increases when these are again allowed, the right to compete for promotions when promotions are again authorized, and the right to receive retiring leave on separation from the service. A large number of the employees in question have already been permitted to contribute to the Civil Service Superannuation Act, so that the additional burden on that fund will be small, and as all statutory increases and the great majority of promotions are at present prohibited, there will be little, if any, additional cost in this connection nor in connection with the question of compensation, as employees will continue to receive the salaries which they are now paid.

Your committee believes that there is justification for the granting of permanent status to the employees in question, and recommends that the civil service commission be instructed to prepare the necessary regulations for submission to the governor in council to give effect thereto.

(2) Representations have also been made to your committee that permanent status should be conferred upon the staff of the soldier settlement board, which has since 1918 been operating almost entirely on a temporary basis.

It is represented that as a result of reorganization the staff has now reached a permanent basis, having been reduced from a peak figure of 1,595 to a present figure of 343. The great majority of the members of the staff are returned soldiers and have been employed continuously for long periods of service—in many cases up to fifteen years. Your committee finds that in 1928 action in this respect was taken in connection with the staff of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment.

Your committee is of opinion that the action requested is in the public interest, and recommends that the Soldier Settlement Act be amended to provide that:

"Such members of the staff of the soldier settlement board as may be designated by the governor in council shall, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, be regarded as permanent employees, provided that their positions are certified by the civil service commission, upon the recommendation of the minister based upon the report, in writing of the deputy minister, to be of indeterminate duration, and shall thereafter become subject in all respects to the Civil Service Act."

(3) Representations have been made to your committee on behalf of employees receiving prevailing rates of pay, urging that they be allowed to contribute to the civil service superannuation fund.

Section 2 of The Civil Service Superannuation Act limits the benefits of that act to permanent full time employees "who are in receipt of a stated annual salary of at least $600." The employees on whose behalf representations have been made could accordingly secure the benefits of the superannuation act only by having their salary rate changed from a prevailing rate basis to a state annual salary, or by amending the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act in this regard.

With respect to this and other matters relative to the application of the superannuation act the factors involved are of so complicated a nature that your committee was unable to obtain sufficiently definite or comprehensive information to warrant a recommendation. Moreover the committee is of opinion that the question is one that does not properly come within its terms of reference. In any case it is understood that these matters are under consideration by the advisory committee on the superannuation act to which body your committee suggests the representations above specified be referred.

(4) Your committee has been pleased to note that since the reorganization of the civil service commission substantial progress has been made in carrying out the recommendations of the special committee of 1932, and that action is being taken in connection with overlapping and the reorganization of certain services. Your committee particularly urges that the progress which has already been made in absorbing surplus personnel and thus obviating the necessity of filling vacancies with new personnel, be extended to the greatest degree possible.

(5) Attention has been drawn to recommendation No. 21 contained in the report of the civil service committee of 1932, recommending the setting up of a board to adjudicate upon complaints of civil servants.

It has been alleged that this board has not functioned due to the fact that no person has been designated to convene the board.

Your committee finds that the civil service commission has been dealing with complaints of civil servants by means of conferences with representatives of civil servant organizations and with representatives of the departments concerned.

Your committee recommends that the civil servant organization, of which the complainant is a member, should notify the civil service commission of its desire to have a complaint considered and that the commission then take the necessary steps to have such board convened.

[Mr. Bowman.]

(6) Your committee has had placed before it numerous other representations containing much useful information regarding conditions in the public service in connection with all of which careful consideration has been given. It has not, however, been practicable to deal definitely with all the matters submitted and it is accordingly recommended that such matters appearing on the record not dealt with specifically by this report be investigated by the civil service commission so that where possible the necessary action may be taken. And furthermore that the commission submit a full report upon the matters involved to such select committee on civil service matters as may be set up at a subsequent session.

(7) Your committee finds itself in sympathy with the representations made to it that the full restoration of promotions and increases and compensations in the service would be in the public interest and recommends that such steps be taken as soon as financial conditions warrant.

(8) Your committee has been greatly assisted by the evidence and information placed before it by the several civil servants' associations, and has been impressed with the high efficiency and morale of the public service as indicated thereby.

A copy of the printed proceedings and evidence is submitted herewith.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. L. Bowman,
Acting Chairman.

FRANCHISE AND ELECTION ACTS

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON BILLS NUMBERS 101 AND 115

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) presented the first report of the special committee to which was referred Bill No. 101, respecting the franchise of electors at elections of members of the House of Commons and Bill No. 115, respecting the election of members of the House of Commons as follows:

The special committee of the house to which was referred Bill No. 101, an act respecting the franchise of electors at elections of members of the House of Commons, and Bill No. 115, an act respecting the election of members of the House of Commons, recommends that it be given leave to sit while the house is sitting.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

H. Guthrie,
Chairman.

Mr. GUTHRIE moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

STOTLAND DIVORCE BILL

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa) moved:

That Bill Q2 of the Senate for the relief of Hyman Stotland, the preamble of which has been reported not proven by the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, be placed on the order paper, under standing order No. 111, for consideration in committee of the whole at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion please say "aye."

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Under standing order 45, as this is a private bill, no notice is required. The rule reads as follows:

Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper, but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills. . . .

Standing order No. 111 reads:

When the committee on any private bill report to the house that they have made any material change in the preamble of a bill, the reasons for making such change shall be stated in their report; and if they report that the preamble of a bill has not been proved to their satisfaction, they must also state the grounds upon which they have arrived at such a decision; and no bill, the preamble of which has been reported as not proven, shall be placed upon the orders of the day unless by special order of the house.

But I submit that under standing order 45 that does not apply.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not had an opportunity to look into this motion. I should like it to stand in order that the government may have an opportunity to see what it involves.

Motion stands.

EXPRESS AND COMMUNICATIONS

On the order for the introduction of bills to incorporate Canadian Railway Express Company and Canadian Communications Company!

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): Regarding these two bills, the government was asked by the two railway companies to introduce them, as they regarded it as essential that enabling legislation should be made available to expedite whatever measures for unified operation the two companies might decide jointly to adopt with respect to the two subsidiary services referred to. However, latest information intimates that no agreement has as yet been reached or is in prospect of being reached at an early date, if at all. Therefore the matter cannot be said to be one of immediate urgency. For this reason the government does not intend to proceed with these bills.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister, for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 123, to amend the Loan Companies Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Explain.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be within the memory of the house that a few weeks ago I intimated that we would endeavour to prepare legislation which would deal with a question raised by the hon. members for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and Battle River (Mr. Spencer) respecting the charges made by these personal loan corporations. This bill proposes to deal with the matter in the only way we believe we may be able to deal with it through federal legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does it apply to all companies, may I ask?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, heretofore incorporated by act of this parliament or hereafter incorporated. In other words it is proposed that any legislation shall apply generally to all such corporations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CANADIAN NATIONAL TELEGRAPHS—SALARIES

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. What salary do the officials of the Canadian-National Telegraphs receive?
2. What salary does each such official receive?
3. What sum is paid for the rental of each office?
4. What salary does each official of the Canadian-National Express Company receive?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this question it may be difficult to obtain the information requested for a very considerable length of time. It involves the securing of information from sources over which the government has no immediate control.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question dropped.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

TADOUSSAC, QUEBEC—WHARF

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is any work being done on the wharf at Tadoussac at the present time?
2. If so, upon whose request is such work being carried out?
3. Who is the foreman in charge?
4. What are the names of the persons employed in connection with such work?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Return tabled herewith.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

DISMISSAL OF EUGENE BAULAC

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont):

For copy of all correspondence, telegrams, letters, petitions, recommendations, requests, memoranda and other documents, respecting the dismissal in 1930 or 1931 of Eugene Baulac, then returning officer of the electoral division of Laurier-Outremont, and the present incumbent of the position.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER PROPOSED LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if the house now has before it notice of all the legislation that is likely to be introduced at this session?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The report of the radio committee has not been received, but apart from that I think there is on the order paper notice of all the legislation except possibly an amendment to a bill that went from here to the Senate. Other than that I know of nothing further at the moment.

UNITED STATES TRADE ZONES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his capacity as Minister of External Affairs, and I regret that I did not have an opportunity of giving notice of the question. Has the right hon. gentleman been advised that the President of the United States recently signed a bill known as the Free Trade Zone Act which, according to press dispatches, purports to provide for the establishment, operation and maintenance of foreign trade zones in ports of entry for the United States, and which undertakes to expedite and encourage foreign commerce? In view of the effect this may have upon trade through Canadian ports, both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, would the right hon. gentleman make a statement in regard to the situation within the next day or two?

PRIVILEGE—MR. MOTHERWELL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct attention to a report appearing on page 12 of the Toronto Globe of June 21, as follows:

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

House is Jumpy After Elections

... When the marketing bill was mentioned, Hon. William R. Motherwell fired at Hon. Robert Weir, Minister of Agriculture, who has just returned from the Saskatchewan campaign, a sarcastic query as to whether the marketing bill had been a factor in that campaign.

To use an historic illustration I may say that this reporter "must have got the wrong sow by the ear", as I decidedly never did make such a statement.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think, as a matter affecting the privileges of the house, the question was asked by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe).

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 18, to amend the Bank Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill extending the charters of the banks has been considered by the Senate and returned to this house with certain amendments. I propose to indicate very briefly what the suggested amendments are before making any motion with respect to them. The first section is 53, in which subsection (10) was stricken out. That subsection dealt with matters that were to be covered by the return made by the banks to the minister, and it was requested by the Commons that the return should provide for a statement being made as to the managers and assistant managers and other employees of the banks, with a statement of the salaries which they were receiving. The Senate took the view that this was not a proposal cognate to the other matters dealt with by the return and that, as such information was available through the statistical branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, it was not really a necessary part of any such return. The government is of the opinion that the view of the Senate in that regard is well taken, especially that part of their contention in which they suggest that if this were to apply to the banks it should apply equally to all other corporations created by this parliament and should be general in its character rather than special. In the committee the matter was moved by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Morand).

The next section dealt with was section 75, which deals with the business and powers of the bank. It will be within the memory of the house that when the bill was before the committee, as well as when it was before the committee of the whole house, a discussion took place as to the limitations upon loans made to directors and the special provision that they should not be present or vote at any meeting of the board when loans or advances were made to a director or any firm or company in which he was interested. After the bill left the committee the banks pointed out that several of the Canadian institutions have branches abroad, in France particularly, for which they have separate acts of incorporation. These are known as the Bank of Montreal (France), the Banque Canadienne Nationale (France), the Royal Bank of Canada (France), and so on, and that as the directors have to deal with the position of these branches with respect to the bank as a whole it would be very improvident, to say the least, to prevent them from being able to vote when loans or advances were being made to these branches. It is proposed to amend the section by adding these words:

but this subsection shall not apply to the consideration of loans or advances to corporations controlled by the bank, the shares of which, except for qualifying shares, are owned by the bank.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would that not apply to other corporations owned by any chartered bank within the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: The bank is prohibited from carrying on any business except the banking business.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But the trust companies with which they are associated?

Mr. BENNETT: The banks do not own trust companies; there is no case in which a bank owns a trust company.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not directly.

Mr. BENNETT: But this deals with the question of the directors voting with respect to the maintenance of subsidiary companies owned by the bank.

The next section dealt with was section 88. It will be within the memory of the committee that this section provides for loans being made to wholesale dealers, and that the subsections immediately dealt with were (8), (9) and (10), which deal with the authority of the banks to make loans upon warehouse receipts and so on. It will be remembered that in the Bank Act there is a provision permitting the banks to advance money for the purchase of seed grain upon the security of the crop to be grown. The members of the Senate representing agricultural communities represented that fertilizer was becoming almost as important as seed grain, and they amended the subsection to provide that fertilizer and seed grain should be on the same basis. The government see no reason why that view should not prevail.

The next section dealt with was section 151. Perhaps it will be recalled by the house that this section deals with prohibited business of the banks and also provides penalties for the bank engaging in prohibited business. Among others there were provisions in a previous section that prohibited the bank from using its name for advertising purposes on prospectuses and similar documents. This amendment provides that the penalty shall apply where the bank permits its name to appear upon any prospectus or advertisement in connection with the issue of securities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I thoroughly approve of that.

Mr. BENNETT: That makes it unanimous. The next section dealt with was section 160. It will be recalled, perhaps, that this section deals with the question of returns and matters of that kind, but no penalty was prescribed for failure to make such returns. It is therefore proposed to add the following subsection:

"(4) Every bank which neglects to transmit or deliver to the minister within the time prescribed by the treasury board a certified return showing, as to deposits by the public in Canada payable on demand and also deposits payable after notice, the number and aggregate amount of such deposits in each of the classifications by this act required, at a date to be specified by the treasury board, shall incur a penalty of fifty dollars for each and every day during which such neglect continues."

In other words, while we made a new provision for returns of this character being made no provision was made for the penalty which would follow from noncompliance with the affirmative provision of the section. The next change is to subsection 3 of the same section, where they have added the words "to the minister" after the word "deliver" in line twenty-one. That is, there was no indication, by oversight I take it, as to whom the return should be delivered. The amendment provides that it shall be transmitted or delivered to the minister, and the added words are " to the minister".

The next matter, however, may call for some extended explanation. It has to do with schedule A to the bill. Schedule A names the banks to which the act applies, namely the Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Bank of Toronto, La Banque Provinciale du Canada, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, The Royal Bank of Canada, The Dominion Bank, Banque Canadienne Nationale, Imperial Bank of Canada and Barclays Bank (Canada). Now, under the provisions of the law as applied the banks which I have just named carrying on business in Quebec may utilize the equivalent of the English name for the purpose of maintaining actions, or for placing upon their cheques or otherwise. La Banque Provinciale du Canada has the power, by its charter, to use the words "Provincial Bank of Canada". When the Banque Canadienne Nationale was incorporated by this parliament there was great difficulty in securing the name. It was felt by many at that time that the effect would be to leave the impression that that was the central bank of Canada, and that therefore probably great difficulty would be experienced, or that there would be confusion in the future if a central bank were created. The matter has stood in that way since that time, but it is quite clear from reading Hansard of that day that the charter was granted and the favourable report of the committee secured on the basis of the name being what I have indicated, namely that of La Banque Canadienne Nationale. But in view of the fact that a central bank is now being established, and that all the other chartered banks are not averse to this change being made, because they are really all directly concerned—for it might be that a wrong impression would prevail in the minds of depositors who might select such a bank as being a national bank—it is felt that there might be added to the schedule these words:

> La Banque Provinciale du Canada and Banque Canadienne Nationale hereinbefore named may respectively carry on business pursuant to the provisions of this act, under the respective names "The Provincial Bank of Canada" and "National Canadian Bank."

It would not be "Canadian National Bank" but "National Canadian Bank". That constitutes the only other amendment which has been suggested.

The history of the Provincial Bank is well known, probably because it was incorporated more recently than the old Banque Canadienne Nationale. The Banque Canadienne Nationale came into existence before confederation; in fact, it came into existence in 1859. It was first called the Bank of Hochelaga and in 1924 obtained from this parliament the right to the name Banque Canadienne Nationale. It was made clear at that time, for the reasons which I have indicated, that it should use that name and none other. But I think the changed conditions, namely the creation of the central bank, and the removal of any objections on the part of the other chartered banks to the same privileges accorded to the Banque Canadienne Nationale as is accorded to them in the province of Quebec, meets the situation. Subject to the attitude of this house, the government sees no reason why the amendment should not be adopted.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I still think that the amendment moved by the other house to section 75 of the bill is dangerously vague. Subsection 3 in the bill reads as follows:

> In no case shall a director of the bank be present or vote at a meeting of the board during the time when loans or advances to himself or any firm, company or corporation of which he is a partner or director are under consideration.

The proposed amendment is to add the following:

> But this subsection shall not apply to the consideration of loans or advances to corporations controlled by the bank, the shares of which, except for qualifying shares, are owned by the bank.

I appreciate the situation the Prime Minister outlined which this amendment is intended to meet, but I still submit the amendment is not in accordance with the sentiment expressed before the banking and commerce committee.

The other reservation I wish to make is in regard to the last words of the Prime Minister. I submit that we should not have in the Dominion of Canada to-day any bank with the appellation "National Canadian Bank" when we are just now setting up another financial institution to be known as the Bank of Canada. I believe these two names are bound to lead to a very extensive degree of confusion in future operation. I appreciate what the Prime Minister has said, that possibly as a matter of right these organizations should be entitled to use the English equivalents of their French names, but I still say that so far as observers are concerned, when they see the title: "National Canadian Bank" they will be confused, and they will not be in a position to distinguish this bank from the Bank of Canada we are now setting up. So far as I am concerned, and speaking only for myself, I wish to make these two reservations to the amendments submitted by the Prime Minister.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): Mr. Speaker, I concur in the amendments to the bill. I can see no objection to the Banque Canadienne Nationale being called, as indicated by the Senate, the National Canadian Bank. As a matter of fact, there are several translations of the names of Canadian banks. We have, for instance, La Banque Royale du Canada, which is the French translation of The Royal Bank of Canada. I do not see why we should refuse a similar translation, such as suggested by the Senate, to the name of La Banque Canadienne Nationale, so that it may be known as the National Canadian Bank. Then, there is the further suggestion that La Banque Provinciale du Canada be known as the Provincial Bank of Canada. That is a correct translation of the name, and one could not translate the name of that bank into English by using any other words. Those words, in English, indicate the title of the bank as it was incorporated by an act of parliament. Then, La Banque Nationale of Quebec and the Bank of Hochelaga were merged under the name La Banque Canadienne Nationale. That name does not indicate that La Banque Canadienne Nationale is the bank of the Canadian National Railways, and it does not mean that it is the Bank of Canada. The words "National Canadian Bank" are simply a translation of the words "Banque Canadienne Nationale." It certainly does not mean that this is a state bank. We are now considering a bill to create a state bank, to be known as the Bank of Canada, and which will operate as a central bank. I can see no reason why the name "National Canadian Bank" should not be granted, because it is a correct translation. I humbly suggest that the amendment by the Senate to Bill 18 does not lead to confusion with the name of some other bank. I do not believe that when people deal with La Banque Canadienne Nationale or the National Canadian Bank they will think they are doing business with the Bank of Canada; absolutely not.

I humbly pray that the amendment be accepted, and I shall so vote.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, may I add a few words, in passing, in connection with the amendments made by the Senate? I quite agree with the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) who has just spoken. May I point out that for a long time before we had La Banque Canadienne Nationale this same bank before its amalgamation was called La Banque Nationale, which may be translated into the words "The National Bank." In my estimation that was almost as comprehensive a name as is the term Bank of Canada. For instance, at the present time we have the ringing name of the Royal Bank of Canada, and in my opinion the name of that bank is just as big and just as ringing as the name Bank of Canada. Since all the other banks, such as the Bank of Montreal, have translated their names —in this instance it is La Banque de Montreal —and other banks have the same right, I do not see why La Banque Canadienne Nationale should be denied that right.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): This controversy is by no means new. In 1924 or 1925—

Mr. BENNETT: 1924.

Mr. POWER: —when the old Banque Nationale was amalgamated with the Banque d'Hochelaga, the bill permitting this amalgamation came before this house and was referred to the committee on banking and commerce. In that committee, after considerable discussion, a vote was taken and I have a very clear recollection that those who opposed granting to the new bank permission to translate the name—I think it was to be called the Canadian National Bank; the petition was to the effect that it should be called in English the Canadian National Bank—carried the day by one vote. The chairman of the committee on banking and commerce afterwards brought the matter to the attention of the house, and I am under the impression that a vote was taken in this chamber and that once more permission was refused the bank to call itself the Canadian National Bank. At that time I opposed the request of the bank and I see no reason why I should change my attitude to-day. There is no doubt whatever in my mind that confusion may arise and that people outside Canada may come to the conclusion that this bank is in some respects a national bank and has the backing of the government of Canada. It is I think within the memory of hon. gentlemen in this house that only two or three years ago in the United states there was a bank called either the Bank of the United States or the United States Bank, which failed with rather disastrous results; and at that time it was I think conclusively shown that a large number of people, foreigners and others who were not aware of the true significance of the name of the bank, had invested moneys in it or had made deposits in the belief that the bank was in some way connected with the American government. We have in our statutes a prohibition against the use of the word "royal," and I think at one time, many years ago, the late Sir Rodolphe Forget wished to incorporate a bank called La Banque du Canada, or La Banque Nationale—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is quite right. He did propose to call it the Bank of Canada, and that was refused.

Mr. POWER: He did propose to call it the Bank of Canada or La Banque du Canada, and that permission was refused by the House of Commons. Afterwards I believe he was permitted to use the name La Banque Nationale du Canada or something of that sort. I believe that the same reasons still exist against permitting any private bank to use a name which might in any way confuse depositors or investors and lead them to believe that the people of Canada or the government of Canada are in some way supporting any such institution.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to the amendment made by the other house in connection with subsection 3 of section 75 I submit that this is a very proper amendment to make and one which was not visualized by the banking and commerce committee. Had our attention been directed to the necessity for such an amendment I have no doubt the amendment would have been freely granted by the committee. I see no objection whatever to the amendment and I am prepared to support it. With respect to the amendment to schedule A at page 87, granting the Banque Canadienne Nationale, the English equivalent, I recall very well the incident brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). There was a good deal of difference of opinion in the banking committee and also in the House of Commons at that time in 1924. I do not recall how I voted on that occasion, but I do believe now that a very distinct mistake was made at that time. Just how you are going to remedy it at this stage I do not know, and I do not think it carries the mistake further by giving the bank the English equivalent. But that is the only justification there can be for giving the bank at the present time the English equivalent. They have the French nomenclature now and perhaps they are entitled to retain it. I doubt very much however whether this house ought ever to have given the bank the name which it then sought and obtained.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The question of the advisability of having given that name to this particular bank does not present itself to-day, I submit.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is too late.

Mr. LAPOINTE: La Banque Nationale was incorporated many years ago.

Mr. CAHAN: Before confederation.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. When there was a fusion of La Banque Nationale and the Hochelaga bank the name was changed into La Banque Canadienne Nationale, which was no worse, if there is anything wrong about the appellation, than the first one. Now it is decided to give also the English name. Well, what is the difference? If the French name is legal, why not the English name as well? I am one of those who are not afraid of having both languages on anything in this country.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): I remember quite well the discussion to which the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has referred. I sponsored the bill in question. As regards the contention that a mistake was made in giving the bank the name which it then received, inasmuch as there is to be a central bank now I see no objection.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I certainly think this house should not agree to the Senate amendment which provides that one bank may use the name National Canadian Bank, because I am sure that name is very misleading to the general public. The name national attached to a bank conveys a wrong impression so far as our chartered banks are concerned. It is not national in any sense. I cannot see anything analogous between the use of the word royal and the use of the word national. The word national conveys in a very distinct way the idea that this is a national institution, that the nation has some financial responsibility; and in connection with a bank I think it is very improper for the House of Commons to allow this name to be used by the Banque Canadienne Nationale. I do not remember in detail the discussions that took place on this matter ten years ago, but I do remember distinctly that a majority of the House of Commons were absolutely opposed to granting to the bank the use of this term National Canadian Bank. It was pointed out that Canada would probably at some future time wish to establish a bank which would be truly national in the real sense of the word. The Bank of Canada in a sense is to be a national bank and I think the House of Commons would be ill advised to allow this change to be made.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I am glad the Senate has seen fit to amend this bill so that loans can be given to farmers to purchase fertilizer the same as they have been given heretofore to purchase seed grain and binder twine. The difficulty has been that a farmer in the maritimes who wanted to get a loan from an organization with which to buy fertilizer was compelled to mortgage his product to that organization. He was not free to sell to any one else. That may not have been a great disadvantage to him but I think the present arrangement will be better. If he can borrow from a bank he will be free to sell his product on the market and he will not be tied up to any organization and compelled to sell to them. I am glad the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has indicated that the government is ready and willing to accept this amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: In moving that these amendments be now read a second time and concurred in I desire to make only one observation which I trust will not be misunderstood. If the government thought that there was the slightest likelihood of there being any confusion in the minds of either depositors or investors in connection with this bank and the Bank of Canada, it would take appropriate steps to provide against such confusion. I have been reminded by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) of something which I saw myself only a few years ago in the city of Dublin. There are two banks carrying on business in that city. One bank is a joint stock company and its name is the National Bank of Ireland. The other bank is the Bank of Ireland. The one institution which has been in existence for a long time is the central bank of the Free State and has fulfilled those functions as far as united Ireland is concerned the same as the Bank of England fulfilled its functions in connection with the United Kingdom before the recent treaty. This change is being made at the end of schedule A and if it is found that difficulties or confusion arises, parliament will always be in a position to deal with them. I am sure that those who are responsible for the bank will be quite reasonable in the position which they take in the matter. It must be realized that there was a Banque Nationale in this country prior to 1924. This bank and the Bank of Hochelaga united and desired to call themselves the National Bank. That was changed and the name as it now stands is Banque Canadienne Nationale, the Canadian National Bank.

Mr. POWER: Canadian national would be a poor translation.

Mr. BENNETT: That name was thought to be undesirable as it might be thought to be a branch of the railways or the steamships. What convinced me more than anything else that there would be no difficulty about this matter was the fact that those banks which had been antagonistic to the proposal in 1924 because they felt that there might be misunderstanding with respect to deposits are not antagonistic at the present time. The secretary of the association communicated that fact to me when I asked him definitely about the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Because the new bank is known as the Bank of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: Because they felt that there would be no confusion in connection with the Bank of Canada. Had there been no Bank of Canada they would not have withdrawn from their position. That is what I have been advised, and it looks quite reasonable. The question at issue now is not that of the name given to the bank in 1924. That was limited to the name in French but in view of what has transpired by the creation of the other bank, it seems to me to be unfair to say that while all other banks can use the French equivalent of their names, this bank cannot use the English equivalent of its name. The government accepts these amendments and I now move that they be read a second time and concurred in.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): There is another bank called the Provincial Bank of Canada. I take it that the Bank of Canada will have branches in all the provinces in due time and I should like to know if there will not be a possibility of a misunderstanding as to the provincial branches of the Bank of Canada and the Provincial Bank of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think so.

Motion agreed to on division.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

The house resumed from Friday, June 22, consideration in committee of Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Bank of Canada—Mr. Rhodes —Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 25—Payment in gold.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) intended to move an amendment to this section which has been permitted to stand. He found it necessary to attend a committee this afternoon and has asked me to move his amendment. This section refers to the redemption of dominion notes in gold and as the hon. member and others with him do not believe in the gold basis or in having to redeem our dominion notes in gold, he has asked me to move:

That section 25 be amended by striking out subsection 1 and subsection 2.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to say a few words in support of the amendment which has just been moved. Subsection 1 imposes upon the bank the necessity of selling gold to any person who makes a demand therefor. The bank is compelled to redeem its notes in gold, to pay to anyone who presents sufficient notes approximately four hundred ounces of fine gold. I understand that there is no intention to compel the bank to redeem its notes in gold coin, but anyone outside of Canada who is able to secure sufficient Bank of Canada notes can go to the bank and demand gold. I think we are very foolish to impose this upon the bank when the preamble states that the purpose for which the bank is being set up is to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation. If this bank is to have a chance of doing that it seems to me that we should not impose upon it the necessity of redeeming its notes in gold. The terrific depression which has been upon us for the last few years is due chiefly to the financial deflation which occurred in the gold countries. Canada, being on the gold standard, had to follow the same financial policy and deflate her financial structure. Had we not been upon the gold standard and had we had an institution capable of managing credit and currency, such as I understand this Bank of Canada is to do, in my humble opinion the depression in Canada would not have affected us to one half the extent it has. Undoubtedly certain countries that have not been on the gold standard during the past four years are in a better position and their producers are in a better position because of this. For that reason I regret very much the present measure contemplates that the bank, the moment it is set up, is going to be under the liability of redeeming its notes in gold. It is true subclause 2 gives the governor in council power from time to time to suspend this subclause. But the bill as drafted makes it almost impossible for the bank to conduct its operations because it is faced with the necessity of redeeming its notes in gold. There is a distinct difference between compelling a bank to redeem its notes in gold as provided for in subclause 1 and having a gold reserve against notes. While at this time I am not opposing very strongly this clause which imposes upon the banks the necessity of carrying 25 per cent gold reserve for its notes, I think we are very unwise to have a clause inserted in the bill compelling the bank to redeem its notes in gold, because this places our whole price structure, our whole internal economy at the mercy of countries which are on the gold basis and which may at any time start deflation.

In a recent article in the Christian Science Monitor I notice an article stating that the Midland Bank and Gustav Cassel, one of the leading economists of Europe, agree on gold dispensability—that is, the ability to dispense with gold as a basis for currency. I do not at the moment suggest that we should dispense entirely with gold because I do not think the house would accept such an amendment, but I think we might leave out of this measure subclauses 1 and 2 of clause 25. Under clause 20, subclause 1, the bank has power to buy and sell gold and I think that is all that is necessary. Let us leave it to the bank to sell gold at whatever price they think is in the best interests of the nation. I hope the government will consider leaving it in the hands of the bank as to when they should buy and sell gold and at what price it should be sold, because under the clause with which we are at present dealing the bank will be under the liability of redeeming its notes in gold unless the government of the day sees fit to suspend this clause. It would be far better to leave it to the bank to decide at what price they will sell gold.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall not trespass upon the time of the committee at any length; I shall merely point out that subclause 2 provides of course for the present status being maintained, and it is not likely that until the other nations of the world have taken a forward step, the situation in this country will be other than it now is; that is, the condition prevailing in Great Britain and the United States will prevail here. But if we are going to have any form of stability in international exchange, it is quite obvious there must be some common yardstick for measurement, and apparently the only one that has presented itself for serious consideration so far is the gold standard because it has a universal value. I shall not amplify the matter because as it has been discussed so often, it would be very unfair to do so, but the notes are not to be exchanged now in terms of coinage as they were under the existing law. For instance, I can no longer get sovereigns in London. It is within the memory of most of us that in London the sovereign was a common coin to carry in one's pocket, with which one bought and sold goods and did one's business. It is no longer so because the only redemption you could make in London before the gold standard was suspended and after Mr. Churchill passed the law providing for the resumption of the gold standard was in terms of four hundred ounce gold bars.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): About $14,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, you had to have $14,000 before you could get gold. That is the case in many countries in the world. It is called the bullion standard because gold coins are no longer necessary for the transaction of domestic business. You do not require $10 or $20 gold pieces to transact business in this country; it is only for external purposes that the gold standard is essential as providing a yardstick which is of universal length or a commodity which for a given quantity of it has a universal value, if I might use those words.

It will be observed that in this bill we have made some reference to the Bank for International Settlements. Canada has a small investment in that bank. It was felt that that bank might be of great service to all the countries of the world, and as a matter of fact it has been very useful. The president of it recently made this statement and I suppose, instead of going into this matter at length I might merely read his statement because it is put with much more authority than my observations would have. He says:

The gold standard is not an end in itself. It is a machinery and a medium for permitting facilitating and enhancing the exchange of goods, capital and services, internally and externally. Hence those who seek the reestablishment of a common standard are not seeking some fetish or intellectual abstraction, but are searching for the better economic welfare which inevitably flows from the increasing movement of goods, services and funds, which presupposes, in turn, some trustworthy measure and medium of value and exchange to enable them to move. There should be no doubt about a general return to gold as the basis for the monetary system. The real question is whether definite steps will be adjourned for some time to come, or whether by common effort or as a result of the patent necessities disclosed by the failure of common effort an early attempt will be made to achieve a general settlement in the monetary and financial fields, thus leading the way to a restoration of the monetary system and to completing economic recovery.

The technique of the gold standard requires and is capable of improvement in its domestic and in its international operation, particularly through the medium of continuous collaboration between the monetary authorities acting to the extent possible through a central agency. Collaboration may be an abstract noun, but it has proved in practice to be a concrete thing when central banks are faced with a specific problem in the financial or monetary field. The endeavour of the Bank for International Settlements shall be to contribute to the restoration of more orderly monetary and financial conditions in the international realm.

That is the position which we take in this new and young country in dealing with problems that older countries have found can best be dealt with in the manner I have indicated. While in my judgment the gold standard is a sine qua non to the restoration of stabilized exchange, it is not an end in itself; it is merely the means by which the end is to be achieved. I trust the committee will realize, as the matter has been discussed so fully in the standing committee as well as in the house on several occasions, the summary which I have given from so eminent an authority as Mr. Fraser is much more valuable than any lengthy explanations that I might offer.

Mr. COOTE: I do not wish to delay the committee, but I think hon. members might be interested in the first two paragraphs of the article to which I referred a moment or two ago; they put the matter in a much more concise way than I could do. This article is sent from London and the first paragraph reads:

The Midland Bank, one of Britain's "big five" banking institutions, and Professor Gustav Cassel, Swedish economist, have issued here two entirely independent statements, which, when taken in conjunction with one another constitute a scathing indictment of the theory still dear to old-fashioned bankers of the indispensability of the gold standard.

The Midland Bank finds that the almost universal resort to currency devaluation since the war has so changed world monetary conditions as to have dethroned gold as a stable measure of value. The conclusion is suggested that for practical purposes a currency off the gold standard is just as capable of being reliable as one that is on.

The concluding paragraph of the article reads:

The arguments of the Midland Bank and of Professor Cassel thus click with one another. The gold standard, the one says, has become unreliable. Germany, says the other, cannot recover until it frees its currency from impossible limitations which that standard has imposed.

Mr. BENNETT: What year was that?

Mr. COOTE: This is very recent, it was in the Monitor just last week. In regard to the statement the Prime Minister read from the Bank for International Settlements, I think those who manage the Bank for International Settlements are interested in continuing the gold standard, because if they cannot the bank might have to undergo a great change if it is to continue as an institution. So perhaps they have an interest to serve. I am not saying that they are not sincere, but it may be that they are influenced by their own interest in making the statement they did in regard to returning to the gold standard. At any rate I think that a young country like Canada, with very great natural resources, a producer and exporter of primary products to the extent we are, would be foolish to contemplate a return to the gold standard under which our price level and our whole internal economy would be at the mercy of those who manage the world's monetary gold reserves.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish to make just one observation in regard to the amendment moved by my hon. friend on the left. I think we must differentiate between the gold standard or gold exchange basis for international settlements and for our internal currency. I think the best economic opinion in the world in recent years, confirmed by various conferences, certainly by the English Macmillan committee, is that a gold basis is not required for internal currency. I do not think that even the twenty-five per cent coverage which was advocated last year by the British Empire section of the world monetary conference—

Mr. BENNETT: No, by the whole conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):—I do not believe it is necessary. I believe, in the words of the English Macmillan committee, quoting them just from memory, that the world should now gravitate towards a managed currency, managed by men of unchallenged independence. That in my opinion does not require a metallic basis as far as internal currency is concerned. The difficulty is to dissociate our internal currency from our credit in international transactions. Although I am personally and sentimentally in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), I am afraid that the situation concerning it is just like that concerning our tariffs. I am in favour of reduced tariffs all over the world, but I recognize that it may be very difficult for us alone to reduce tariffs when all other nations are maintaining theirs.

Mr. BENNETT: Good! At last!

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are discussing this in a very frank way. So in the same way I do not believe it is feasible for Canada at the present time to get away from gold as a standard of international exchange, although I do believe it is possible for Canada to abolish any metallic coverage whatsoever for her internal currency. The Prime Minister took me to task once when I used that argument; he said it was all a matter of confidence, that if we do away with metallic coverage for our internal currency, thereby we lessen the confidence of other nations in our external credit. I think the proper conclusion is that gold as a basis for internal currency is only justifiable so far as it may assist that mistaken confidence which seems to be associated with gold by other nations of the world. I believe that the day is coming when gold will not be so highly valued as it is to-day as coverage for international currency. I believe that the national credit far transcends gold as a basis for the security of international currency. But I am not prepared at the present time to go the length of the hon. member who moved the amendment, although I do believe that in time gold coverage for internal currency will disappear.

Mr. COOTE: So that there may be no misunderstanding I would like to make it clear that I do not think there is any necessity for gold backing our internal currency. I think gold should be kept for the settlement of our international balances. What we object to is that this bank is to be put under the liability of selling gold at a fixed price to any person applying. That may have the effect at any time of hampering the bank, because too many of its notes may be presented for redemption in gold. I would point out that under section 21 it is provided that:

(1) The bank may
(a) buy and sell gold, silver, nickel and bronze coin and gold and silver bullion;

They have the power to sell gold. We are going to turn over to them all the gold. I think the bank should use that gold to the best advantage for the settlement of our international balances. It should be free to do that, but it should not be compelled to sell it at a fixed price. That would have the effect of placing our whole internal price level at the mercy of the gold-holding countries. That is what I object to, and that is why we are moving this amendment. We think gold should be used for the settlement of international balances, but we do not think that anyone who may be able to secure $14.000 of Bank of Canada note should be able to come and demand from the bank gold at a certain fixed price. We think that is too great a limitation to place upon the bank, if we intend that it should carry out the ideals laid down in the preamble of the bill. It may make it impossible for them to do the very thing that the bank is set up to do, that is to control credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation. They may have to control it in such a way as to conform to the gold policy of the United States and France, or the United States, France and Great Britain. That is something that we should avoid. If we are to learn anything from the depression I think one lesson is that we cannot afford to place our internal price structure at the mercy of the gold countries. And we do it through section 25. It is true that the government can from time to time relieve the bank from the necessity of redeeming notes at all, but I say that as the section is drawn it makes the bank liable to redeem its notes in gold the very day it is set up. It seems to me that immediately the bank is set up and commences business the government would have to pass an order in council suspending subsection 1 of this section.

Mr. BENNETT: Just one word, because I should not like the hon. gentleman to leave a false impression on the mind of the committee. In the first place this country is not under the gold standard. Second, this section can only apply when the country is on the gold standard. Third, it will not be on the gold standard until other countries in the world have taken appropriate action in the same sense. Fourth, parliament will have to deal with the question of the value to be given to gold. At the present time the value fixed by statute is $20.67 an ounce, and until such time as parliament takes other action my hon. friend need not worry. There is no chance of any country or any syndicate accumulating notes of the bank and taking away the gold reserve of this country until such time as the nations of the world have arrived at some understanding with respect to the stability of exchange. How can I put the matter more clearly than to say that if a Canadian dollar has behind it 10 cents in gold and a Dutch guilder has behind it 96 cents in gold it is difficult to talk about the free exchange of goods until some stability has been arranged between the currencies of the two countries. And that applies to all the nations of the world. In my judgment the most essential matter to be dealt with at the moment to restore the world to its former prosperity is the stabilization of exchange;—perhaps not the most important but one of the most important of matters. I mention that because it is not intended that this section shall ever become operative until such time as the nations of the world take appropriate action.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it not true, at the same time, that if I have $14,000 or the equivalent in notes of the value of gold and decide to purchase a bar of 400 ounces of fine gold, I can get such gold in Bank of Canada notes?

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, in Bank of Canada notes.

Amendment lost on division.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Before the section carries I should like to ask another question, in regard to paragraph (c) of subsection (3) of section 25. My computation is that there will be about $63,000,000 of securities bearing interest at three per cent per annum, payable half yearly, which will be given as assets to the Bank of Canada on the day it opens for business. The section says:

> to the amount of dominion notes outstanding on that day, except notes issued under the authority of the Finance Act.

I quite realize that we cannot make a computation for six months from now, but as at the present time what would be the amount of securities bearing interest at three per cent which would be given to the bank?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will recall what I said to the house the other day. The present law requires a gold coverage of twenty-five per cent on $50,000,000, which is $12,500,000 of gold. Under the statute of 1915 there were $26,000,000 of notes issued which, with the $12,500,000 totals $38,500,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That $26,000,000 was covered by railway securities.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows what they are. Taking the difference between $50,000,000 and $12,500,000, which is $37,500,000, with the $26,000,000, we have a total of $63,500,000 outstanding. Of course that will be increased by the enactment of the legislation I submitted to the house the other day, which contemplates an increase in the issue of dominion notes pending the coming into operation of this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let us assume that the figure would be roughly $63,000,000 of securities bearing interest at three per cent. Roughly speaking the annual interest would amount to $1,800,000. How would that be charged? Would it be charged against the profits of the Bank of Canada or would it be paid out of the ordinary consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course as a matter of bookkeeping the hon. gentleman realizes it will be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, but will come back to the Dominion of Canada under this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But that should be charged against the bank before any dividends are paid. The taxpayer should not be asked to pay an interest charge of $1,800,000. My own opinion is that the value of the securities will appreciate so rapidly that any charge of this kind should be a charge against the operations of the bank for that year.

Mr. BENNETT: The question can only arise as a matter of bookkeeping, because unless the bank earned $225,000, which is a very small sum in view of the operations of the bank, I should think no directors would be disposed to pass the necessary resolution and no governor would be disposed to give it his approval unless the earnings were beyond the interest on the securities to which the hon. gentleman has referred. It is a matter about which we have had some discussion, but I think the hon. gentleman will realize that it would be rather difficult adequately to express the suggestion he has made in terms of a bill. I think we will have to depend largely upon the sound business sense of those in charge of the affairs of the bank who, I am sure, would not be disposed to pay four and a half per cent to the shareholders until such time as the earnings of the bank were equivalent to such sum exclusive of the matters to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then I have one further question. It should, perhaps, come up under section 30, but I might discuss it under paragraph (a) of subsection (3), which refers to gold held by the minister for redemption of dominion notes. Under this legislation we are transferring from the banks to the Bank of Canada $40,000,000 of gold, roughly speaking. Under section 30 there is a provision whereby the increased valuation may be given the banks in regard to an unspecified proportion of the $40,000,000 if the governor in council is satisfied that the said gold at the time of the transfer was being held by a chartered bank against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada. In such case the said profit is to belong to the chartered bank. We are taking the $40,000,000 from the chartered banks at the present valuation of $20.67 per ounce. An unstated proportion of that amount of gold will be reimbursed to the chartered banks at the present valuation if the governor in council is satisfied that this proportion is required for external obligations.

My point is this: I think it is practically an impossibility for the governor in council or any other body to determine what that percentage is going to be. I remember asking some of the bankers, in the committee on banking and commerce, if they could predetermine any definite percentage, and they said they could not do so. I think it places a very dangerous responsibility upon any governor in council who happen to be in power to have to determine, by just one stroke of the pen, how much of the difference between $35 an ounce and $20.67 an ounce the chartered banks should receive as a result of a portion of their gold reserves being used for external obligations. I think in the interests of the governor in council, whoever they may be, this is a very far-reaching power, and the discretion might become dangerous. I do not know what the remedy is. The banks say they cannot decide; they say they need the whole $40,000,000 for external purposes. I do not agree with that for a moment, but I do submit that the Prime Minister is going to find it very difficult indeed, and possibly fraught with very grave consequences, to have to determine the amount of gold used for external obligations and the amount used for internal purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: When we reach section 30 I will discuss that point.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to ask a question with regard to subsections (1) and (2). When the act is declared will not this act override the order in council which now relieves the receiver general from the responsibility of redeeming notes in gold, and will a further order in council be passed immediately as provided for under subsection (2)?

Mr. BENNETT: Undoubtedly the hon. gentleman is quite correct. When the act is proclaimed, at the same time an order in council will be passed continuing the order in council now applying to dominion notes, under the provisions of this particular section.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Reserves.

Mr. REID: I have a few remarks to make in regard to subsection (4). At this time it is not my intention to cover all the ground that has been covered already with regard to silver, but I cannot allow this subsection to pass without comment while it includes the word "never". So I have an amendment to propose. I think it was generally understood on this side of the house the other evening that once the central bank is set up the initiative will come from the bank itself and not from the government. Here, in subsection 4, we have a mandatory clause which prohibits the bank from purchasing more than 1,671,802 ounces of silver in any year. I will send a copy of my amendment across to the Prime Minister. It is interesting to draw the attention of the committee to what transpired in July, 1933, at the London monetary and economic conference. The question of gold and the practical return to gold came up at that time. The lead in connection with silver was taken by the United States and, as was stated by Senator King of the United States, upon his return they were side-tracked, and their resolution was gerrymandered and split in two.

At the present time the President of the United States is in my opinion making an attempt to redistribute gold. I have for my authority the words of Sir Arthur Salter who says in effect that that might be the effect of the United States purchasing so much silver. At the present time we have in Canada no gold coverage for domestic currency. As everyone knows, we have at the present time fiat money. It is true that probably a world agreement would be necessary before we could adopt bimetalism, and at the present time I am not advocating a return to bimetalism. At the monetary conference in London Canada agreed to purchase 1,671,802 ounces per year. The United States agreed to purchase 24,000,000 ounces per year, but she has now gone farther and has agreed to purchase up to 25 per cent of her monetary reserves, which will mean probably an increased purchase of one and a half to two billion ounces of silver. In spite of the covenant with the United States in this regard we are placing in this bill a mandatory clause saying that the bank shall never purchase more than our allotment agreed to in London. Personally I think this is a slap in the face so far as the United States is concerned.

I am not asking that we should go on to bimetalism at the present time. We took a step in the right direction when we agreed to purchase over one million ounces yearly, but to prohibit the banks from purchasing more is a slap in the face so far as the United States is concerned. We are saying to that country, "You can do what you like about your monetary affairs and your plan to distribute gold." I would ask the Prime Minister this question: How is it possible to redistribute the present gold reserves of the world? No one can tell. No economist or financier can tell how the stock of gold, three-quarters of the world's supply of which is held by France and the United States, can again be redistributed. It is the consensus of opinion of those who have studied the matter that President Roosevelt is at least making some effort towards this end, and it may be that through his efforts gold will again be redistributed. We could very well use silver in this country as coverage for our domestic uses. No country would stand to gain more than Canada by such a use of silver. We produce annually between 18,000,000 and 24,000,000 ounces of silver. In the late years the price has been too low to further the production of silver, but if it goes to sixty cents an ounce, as it shows every likelihood of doing, the industry will give employment to thousands of citizens, and especially would that be true in British Columbia.

I think the Prime Minister should consider taking out the word "never"; it should not be there. It is not fair to have that word in the act. The amendment which I have sent to you, Mr. Chairman, would make the clause read as follows:

> The bank shall during the years 1935, 1936 and 1937 purchase and hold of newly-mined Canadian silver, as agreed to by Canada at the London monetary and economic conference, all such silver as the minister shall require.

I think that is a fair amendment. It is not mandatory and at least it carries out the agreement made at the conference. If the government were so minded instructions could be issued to the bank to purchase more silver.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman makes the mistake which is not unusual even to those who have given as much study as he has to this matter. He is confusing the bank with the government. The United States government is doing the purchasing of silver. There is nothing in this legislation to prevent our government from buying silver. This bill deals only with the bank. If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to differentiate between the two he would not have made the error he has now made.

When the other day I introduced the bill dealing with the issue of dominion notes I pointed out that we proposed to buy in the year 1934 a supply of silver in the manner indicated in that measure. For the years 1935, 1936 and 1937 we have placed the responsibility for the purchase of it upon the central bank. As the bank succeeds to the custody of the gold and silver now held by the government, and I may point out that we have five or six years' silver now in hand for ordinary monetary purposes, we did not feel we would be fair to the bank if we required it to purchase beyond 1,671,802 fine ounces in any of the years I have indicated. If, as a matter of national policy, the government decides to buy silver, as congress has authorized the president to do, that is a matter for the future. The purchases, I should think it is only fair to say, will proceed in the United States by the government of the United States. The total purchases under the proposals before congress would amount to something less than 1,700,000,000 ounces. But the whole situation in connection with silver turns not upon the action of the government of the United States nor of the government of Canada. India holds the key to the silver situation. This is a matter which was discussed at some length in London and the agreement arrived at was not easy of conclusion. It represents the best arrangement the nations of the world were prepared to make, having regard to the conditions with respect to silver and the very large quantities of silver held by India. Those quantities are administered, really, by one commissioner, and are tremendous. They are so great that if the price of silver were to rise, as has been suggested, the effort to sell on the part of India would be so great as inevitably to produce a very great reduction in the price.

Mr. REID: I think I am right when I say that India has agreed to sell not more than so many million ounces.

Mr. BENNETT: Under this agreement; that is the reason it is here.

Mr. REID: She has agreed not to sell it?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. REID: And in regard to the stocks held in Canada, it is a matter of comment, and rather strange that we hold the smallest stock of silver. Our whole stock amounts to only 2,000,000 ounces. That is all that the stock of silver in Canada amounts to, despite the fact that we are the third largest silver producing country in the world. Yet we are holding only one year's agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: One what?

Mr. REID: The information given me is at the present time we are holding 2,254,000 ounces of silver, and that the silver we have been using during the past three years has come from worn out coins. We have taken the pure silver from the worn out coins, after melting them down, and have debased them from 900 to 800 fine. Why was the word "never" put in the clause? Why was such a restriction put in there, in order to keep the bank from purchasing more silver?

Mr. BENNETT: The word "never" is probably an undesirable word to use in a statute, but it was put in this bill for a definite purpose, namely to prevent false hopes being created in the hearts of those who might be concerned. During the currency of the world's agreement it will be observed by the hon. gentleman that everything depends upon the agreement being kept. And India, being the key to the situation and having agreed as she did agree, we have added these words to indicate what our position will be, because we will have more silver than we will know just what to do with. That is the position. We have 2,000,000 ounces now, and we are buying substantially about 1,700,000 ounces a year. We have transferred that obligation to the bank. That is for the reason that we cannot contemplate this bank loading itself up with that silver. The government might do it; we might pass a statute to do it, but we are not going to place the bank in that false position. It will be observed that the legislation does not contemplate the central reserve bank buying the silver; it is the government that buys it; and if this parliament in its wisdom desires at a later date to pass a statute providing for the government purchasing silver, this will not stand in the way of it. If the time ever comes when the word "never" should be removed in respect to the bank, of course it will be a simple thing to do that.

Amendment negatived, on division.

Section agreed to.

On section 27—Reserve to be maintained by chartered banks.

Mr. COOTE: There is an important amendment in subsection 1 of section 27. As originally brought down the section, then numbered 26, provided:

> Every chartered bank shall on and after the day when the bank is authorized to commence business, maintain deposits with the bank which shall always be equal to five per centum of its deposit liabilities within Canada.

Subsection 1 of section 27 now reads:

> Every chartered bank shall on and after the day on which the bank is authorized to commence business maintain a reserve of not less than five per centum of its deposit liabilities within Canada ...

The words to which I wish to call attention particularly are the following, which appear in italics:

> ... and such reserve consist of a deposit with the bank and of notes of the bank held by such bank.

The change made would allow the five per cent to be composed partly of notes of the Bank of Canada held by the chartered banks and the balance held on deposit. It seems to me that if there is any necessity of requiring the chartered banks to hold a deposit with the Bank of Canada, the central bank, certainly five per cent is small enough, and I submit that this change that has been made in the bill is in a sense destroying the value of the section. It is through the operation of this subsection, or partly through it, that the central bank can control to some extent the amount of credit issued. It is one of those measures which give the central bank control.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the hon. member explain how the chartered banks could thus control credit?

Mr. COOTE: When the chartered banks are extending credit, because of that they increase their deposits and as their deposit liabilities increase—their own liabilities—they must increase their deposit with the central bank. I do not know what amount of notes the banks will carry, but after their own note issue privilege is practically discontinued, after a period of years, they might carry practically the whole of the five per cent in notes of the Bank of Canada. I think the change made weakens the position of the central bank, and that the original provision which required the chartered banks to carry five per cent on deposit is not too much. In order to bring the matter properly before the committee I move that section 27 be amended by striking out subsection 1 and substituting therefor the following:

Some students with whom I have discussed the matter think that five per cent is too small, that the banks might be required to carry even more than that. I do not think the bill as it stood originally required too large a deposit from the chartered banks. The present provision is really not adequate and I think we ought to substitute for it the section contained in the original bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I thoroughly agree with the hon. member for Macleod. He may recall that I drew the attention of the banking and commerce committee to this very section, and the protest I made was that it was moved practically at the eleventh hour of the proceedings of the committee, and without notice. We are all aware that the chartered banks were very much opposed to this provision for a five per cent deposit. It is a matter of judgment as between two principles, which are these. The first question is: Does the Bank of Canada require a five per cent deposit from the chartered banks of Canada for its proper and adequate functioning? The second question is: Will the deposit of five per cent work such an injury on any one of the chartered banks that it cannot function or carry on? I am rather inclined to agree with the hon. member, that the Bank of Canada will need a five per cent deposit from the chartered banks to enable it to function as it should. On the other hand, my information has been that in the case of one or two of the chartered banks the section as previously worded might work a very distinct hardship, and in considering the proposed amendment it is a matter of judgment as between these two principles. Personally I am in favour of the amendment. I believe the banks can deposit their five per cent without taking into consideration notes of the Bank of Canada, which will be in the various tills of the chartered banks as they continue to operate and function.

Mr. BENNETT: The provisions of the section to which the hon. member for Macleod has directed attention are of course very important. May I point out that this section compels the banks of Canada to deposit with the central bank, as the hon. gentleman says, approximately five per cent of their deposit liabilities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): One hundred millions altogether.

Mr. BENNETT: That means that the banks in Canada will pay into the central bank about one hundred million dollars. That money may represent in part money on which they are paying interest. They are getting nothing for it; they get no interest on this one hundred millions, which is held by the central bank as a depository for the reserve liability of the chartered banks. When the matter came under consideration by the minister, on the state of facts disclosed from an examination of the returns, it was found that the chartered banks of Canada had been maintaining large quantities of money as till money, that is, bank notes which were held in their vaults but which were not in use—their own notes which were not in use until such time as they were put across the counter. The till money of some of the banks amounted to as high as $15,000,000. The law requires the banks to hold forty per cent of whatever cash reserves they have in Dominion of Canada bills. The other day on inquiry I found that one of the chartered banks had $40,000,000 of Dominion of Canada notes; another had, if I remember correctly, $38,000,000; and—I speak subject to correction—another had $21,000,000. It has always been of the utmost importance, so far as we are concerned, that the position of the chartered banks with relation to Dominion of Canada notes should be such as would ensure the circulation of this form of national credit. I will put it that way. Confronted with this situation the banks say: No other central bank bill undertook to impose upon us an absolute percentage which we had to maintain. They contended that in this country there had been averages which indicated that five per cent was reasonable. They do not complain of that but they say: If you put us in default if we drop below five per cent for a day, it will have a very serious effect upon our general position. Therefore, we have arrived at the conclusion which is indicated in this bill by which five per cent is to be maintained by the banks in Bank of Canada notes as a reserve for their deposits, but part of that money is to be on deposit with the central bank as a working balance which they may change from day to day by additions and deductions and by deposits and cheques against the balance. This is a great convenience to the banks and it cannot be said to be detrimental to this country at the moment. It enables a condition which is new to this country to be met by a method which will not be harmful to the principle or be a serious departure from the principle that the reserves of the chartered banks shall be held in deposits in the central bank or by the notes of the central bank. The regulations will take proper care of this situation. I quite appreciate the criticism made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) but it must not be forgotten that the banks feel that this section added to the provisions of another section treats them very cruelly. I think this is an accommodation to meet the difficulties and they will not have the same complaint as they previously had in connection with the unfair treatment accorded by this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the Prime Minister feel the section as now drawn gives ample security to the Bank of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: I am satisfied that for the transition period between the old and new regime, it will be ample. I might say to the hon. gentleman who is a Scotchman that the chartered banks of England maintain about ten or ten and a half per cent but it may amaze him to know that on the average the holdings are only six per cent of Bank of England notes, the balance being on deposit with the Bank of England. It seems to me that we are meeting the situation in the way which the larger experience of Great Britain has enabled them to meet a similar situation.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. SPENCER: The banks must hold some forty per cent of their reserve in dominion notes but I do not believe there is anything in the Bank Act to say what that reserve should be. Do I understand that the five per cent which the banks must have with the Bank of Canada or in their tills must be in Bank of Canada notes?

Mr. BENNETT: No. As the hon. gentleman will note from the section there will be a determination by the banks from time to time. The banks may buy notes and hold them apart from what is held in their tills, but the deposits they will have to make will be deposits in ordinary business. They must have working balances and they cannot have working balances unless there are accretions of fresh deposits to meet withdrawals. They must have working balances to meet the varied demands of business from day to day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Just like deposits under the Bank Act?

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, over and above the minimum. In matters of this kind it has been found in practice that the working balances and the deposits are usually well above the statutory minimum.

Mr. COOTE: Would the amount of dominion notes now carried by the banks be more than five per cent of their deposit liabilities? If that is so we are really not compelling them to hold any greater reserve than what they hold at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: The figures for April 30, 1934, show the dominion notes held by all banks as totalling $128,540,497 against assets of $2,831,000,000 and total deposits of about $2,000,000,000. The latter figure is not given in a separate column and it would be necessary to add the four columns.

Mr. COOTE: At any rate their holding of dominion notes is more than five per cent of the deposits?

Mr. BENNETT: Slightly more.

Mr. SPENCER: I take it that most of the Dominion notes now held by the banks are in the form of large legals which are used for settling accounts between themselves. Under this bill they will not use those but will simply give cheques on the Bank of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the hon. gentleman for directing attention to that fact. A great proportion of the Dominion of Canada notes held by the banks is not a medium of circulation, it consists of counters for the purpose of making transactions between the banks through the clearing house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In large denominations.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact they are just counters of $50,000 or $100,000. In view of the fact that this bill contemplates the steady diminution of the power of issue by the chartered banks and the placing in circulation of increasing quantities of Bank of Canada notes, I think the hon. gentleman will see that in practice it will work out much more satisfactorily for credit purposes.

Mr. POULIOT: I have listened with a great deal of attention to what was said by hon. members who have spoken and by the Prime Minister himself. I have received the impression that this is an academic debate on banking as everyone has spoken about the theory of banking. This section refers to the deposit liabilities of the chartered banks. If hon. members will look at the reports published monthly in the Canada Gazette they will see that the deposits in the chartered banks have been increasing since 1930. There is no lack of money, in fact there is more than there was in 1930. The trouble is the lack of circulation of that money. People who have money in the banks keep it there. They feel secure and they will not invest it in different concerns. The confidence of this country has not been restored and people are still keeping their deposits in the banks. What is needed now is the circulation of money; the people should be taught to put their money to other uses and to invest it in order to give work to people. There is a phrase used in a drama known to many hon. members to the effect that business is other people's money. I cannot find anything in this bill which will increase the circulation of money. The role of this central bank should be to activate the circulation of money. It should be like a policeman trying to get people to move on in a jammed street. I cannot find that this bill is going to do that, and I cannot see what use it will be. It is simply another complication; it is simply some more legislation, the same as the amalgamation of railways which is coming shortly. There is amalgamation of everything; everything is centralized and I do not see the use of this bill if it is not to activate the circulation of money which is deposited in huge quantities in the chartered banks of Canada. Trade can be restored and money will circulate when there is more confidence throughout this country, but as long as people are afraid to make any investments the money will stay in the banks and there will be no improvement of trade. Therefore this legislation should be considered from not only a theoretical but a practical point of view. This is the main point. What is the use of having immense numbers, libraries, of statute books? What does this mean to the common people? They want work and to be paid for the work they do. They want the money to go around from one to another and come to the banks in smaller deposits. When this is done it will be a great benefit to the country, but I do not see anything practical in this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to say a word with regard to one of the points brought forward by my hon. friend. I am not at all agreeing with his general statement. There is a tremendous possibility in this legislation for expansion of credit. In the first place it will take over the gold held by the Minister of Finance for redemption of dominion notes and amounting to about $70,000,000. The appreciated value of this as taken over by this legislation will amount to about $117,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Roughly $120,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the second place, we are taking over that portion of the chartered banks' gold which is not required for external obligations, and that will amount to another $60,000,000, so that provided the present value keeps up, the bank will have a gold value of about $177,000,000. Under the flexible provision of twenty-five per cent metallic coverage, one can imagine the power for expansion given thereby. We did not have any such power under the previous legislation, even under the Finance Act.

Mr. POULIOT: I admire the learning of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, but it is not illuminating. I know no more now than I did before and I have been listening to him very carefully. He speaks about a tremendous value of millions of dollars and all that sort of thing. That is not the point; it is that a man should have an opportunity to be paid for some work at three, four or five dollars a day. That would mean more for him than hearing about millions of dollars. My hon. friend spoke in a very learned manner and I am always pleased to listen to him, but as I said, I know no more now than I did before he spoke.

Amendment (Mr. Coote) negatived on division.

Section agreed to on division.

Sections 28 and 29 agreed to.

On section 30—Disposition of profits from sales.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has directed attention to the difficulty that will arise in making a division under this clause of profits resulting from the sale by the bank of gold coin and bullion transferred to it pursuant to the provisions of clauses 25 and 28. I do not for a single minute minimize the difficulty, but to state in this bill an exact figure would be unfair to this bank as it would be unfair to the chartered banks. Some of the banks have external liabilities that are still liabilities in terms of gold. The banks have some foreign liabilities which it is unnecessary to say to this committee have, by the action of the legislatures of those countries, no longer to be met in terms of gold. For instance, the decision of the House of Lords in one case greatly increases the liabilities as it was indicated by a decision of the court of appeal when we were discussing the matter here in the early months of the year. The question whether certain liabilities in the United States in terms of securities are to be met in a particular way or by what would be the equivalent of the value of the gold at the time is still unsettled. Then of course we do not disguise the fact that we have in this country a few questions in that regard that are not yet settled, for instance in connection with some few people who in 1933 declined to accept other payment of their bonds that fell due and demanded that they should be paid in gold. There are very few of them, but now and then we have seen such cases in the newspapers; the amount is not large. That, however, does not touch the external side of the matter. I appreciate that this places upon the governor in council a substantial responsibility, but it is one that must be taken with respect to many of these matters. I should say, speaking antecedent to the occasion arising, it must be the subject matter of discussion, agreement and arrangement based upon such expert knowledge applied to the facts as will enable a reasonable disposition to be made of the matter in the light of the monetary value attaching to the external liabilities in terms of gold. That is all that can reasonably be said about the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This places a tremendous responsibility upon the governor in council. I would suggest the insertion of some provision such as "upon report by the deputy minister" or "upon report by the inspector general," to get somebody responsible for the disposition.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. BENNETT: No action on such a clause as this is taken by council except on a report of the Minister of Finance, and usually it has been the custom, grown up in recent years, that the Minister of Finance makes the submission and he says that this course is recommended by—indicating, as the hon. gentleman has said, the deputy minister and sometimes others as well. I can assure the hon. member that so far as the present governor in council is concerned, the responsibility will not be lightly exercised or too readily undertaken without having clear knowledge of what is involved as a result of it.

On the preamble.

Mr. BENNETT: The preamble did not carry; there was some discussion on it before.

Mr. SPENCER: Before the preamble passes I wish to move an amendment. I appreciate that the preamble as it stands is nearly all-embracing, but not quite. It is drawn with considerable care but I do not think it fully covers our needs. I wish to remind the committee that since the war we have paid out, I think, about $1,900,000,000 in interest in this country; our interest burden has increased eleven times during the last twenty years. For that reason I wish to move the following amendment to the preamble:

That the preamble of Bill No. 19 be amended by inserting after the word "Canada" in the second line the words: "to make use of the national credit at cost and."

The preamble will then read as follows:

Whereas it is desirable to establish a central bank in Canada to make use of the national credit at cost and to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the Dominion: Therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

I trust the committee will give this their best consideration, as it is in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, before you submit this amendment, may I say that while those debts are spoken of only as liabilities, in fact they are also assets. As has already been said here, if the Dominion of Canada owes $2,500,000,000 that is its national debt, but that debt is an asset of those who hold Canadian bonds; therefore it must be considered in both aspects. When we speak of the debt we must have in mind also that the bonds representing it are assets of the people who hold them and constitute a large part of the wealth of this country. The matter must not be considered from the passive angle only, but also from the active. I shall not enlarge any further upon it; I merely wish to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that in this matter there is on one side a debtor and on the other side a creditor. Large amounts of Canadian bonds, national, provincial and municipal, are held by Canadians, and they are the wealth of those people, who live on the income derived from them. The matter must be considered from that angle as well.

Bill reported.

Mr. BENNETT: If the house would agree, as the Senate meets to-morrow I should like to move the third reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am sorry, but it is our intention to move an amendment on the third reading of this measure; I think the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) is to move it to-morrow.

DOMINION NOTES ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 110, to amend the Dominion Notes Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Amount held as security for redemption.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The second section of the bill provides for repeal of the Dominion Notes Act on a day to be proclaimed, and the first section for repeal of section 5 of the old Dominion Notes Act, which provided for a note issue of $50,000,000, and increases the amount to $120,000,000. It is not necessary to add much to the very comprehensive review of the dominion notes situation given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) the other day. Briefly, before confederation the provinces of Canada then in existence had their several note issues. These were taken over by the dominion authority in 1867. The principle underlying our dominion note issue and also those of the provinces was that there should be a partial gold coverage up to a certain amount, and beyond that limit the coverage should be one hundred cents on the dollar. The other day the Prime Minister referred to the fact that under this legislation there would be a possible total note issue of $223,000,000 odd. I presume that was made up as follows: Total notes $120,000,000; twenty-five per cent of gold $30,000,000, and the total gold left of the $117,000,000 at the appreciated valuation, $87,000,000 odd; this would be $120,000,000 plus $87,000,000, or $207,000,000, and with the $16,000,000 odd already covered by securities makes the total of $223,000,000.

Speaking for myself, I am pleased indeed that the Prime Minister has introduced this legislation. I can only regret that it was not introduced over three years ago. Hon. gentlemen opposite may recall that at least a few of us on this side did advocate three or four years ago the introduction of precisely such legislation. They may recall that when the Dominion Notes Act was passed in the first place the amount issued was not $50,000,000 but $30,000,000, which was subsequently increased to $50,000,000 and in 1915 by a further $26,000,000. In two years there was a total increase in the note issue of Canada of $46,000,000. Now under this legislation according to the Prime Minister there is a possible increase of $52,000.000 odd, the difference between the present note issue of $171,000,000 and what he calls the possible note issue under this legislation, of $223,000,000. I do not agree exactly with the Prime Minister that this legislation is made possible by the appreciation in the value of gold. According to his own figures, taking our present Finance Act, $69,000,000 in gold at a valuation of $20.67 an ounce would give a coverage of thirty-one per cent even for the contingent note issue of $223,000,000. In my judgment thirty-one per cent is more than ample to cover our internal note issue circulation. I think twenty-five per cent was fixed last year as a sufficient coverage. Under the increased valuation of the Finance Act, according to the figures given the other day the gold which will then be available during the transition period before the Bank of Canada commences business will be 52½ per cent of this note issue of $223,000,000. My only complaint in that regard, Mr. Chairman, is that the increase should be far greater than it is. Instead of increasing it from $50,000,000 to $120,000,000 I think on any scientific basis the Prime Minister or any government would be entitled to increase the note issue of Canada to-day much more than is being done at the present time. I think an increase of $100,000,000 or more would be absolutely justified. I recall that three or four years ago the English Macmillan committee established a different scientific basis. They said it was a safe basis for any nation to issue notes to the extent of one-fifth the total bank deposits, which in Canada would result in a note issue of about $400,000,000 as against $171,000,000 at the present time. On the other hand I think that when the Bank of Canada is constituted, with its more elastic and flexible provisions, with the appreciated gold taken from the banks and from the Finance department totalling perhaps $177,000,000, the note issue powers of the bank are going to be simply tremendous.

I am not criticizing the details of this bill; I am criticizing two particulars of it. In the first place I am complaining because this was not done three or four years ago, and my second complaint is that the note issue is not more substantial. With regard to financing public works by the issue of credit, I am entirely in favour of that so long as that issue of credit is made on the basis of security, so long as it is not uncontrolled inflation. The Prime Minister mentioned the appreciated value of gold, and he also mentioned the resolution of the London conference of last year. In my judgment neither of these arguments is required to justify this present legislation.

Another submission I want to make to the right hon. gentleman is this: When we come to receive the appreciated value of the gold which we are taking over from the banks we should consider that an asset which belongs to the people of Canada. It should not be used for the temporary financing of public works or anything of the kind; it should be used only for the reduction of our national debt. I am in favour of these two principles, first applying the appreciation in the value of gold to the reduction of the national debt, and second the principle of financing public works by the direct issue of currency instead of placing great interest obligations upon our shoulders for years to come. With these reservations, Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the legislation introduced by the Prime Minister.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have always been greatly interested in this question of note issue or, as we sometimes call it, controlled inflation. I have never been able to get at the bottom of the difference between the advocacy of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and that of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), and the present attitude of the government. Until last year the hon. member for Macleod advocated inflation without the significant word "controlled" before it, according to my memory. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre seemed to want it about what it is in this bill—a certain measure of controlled inflation. As a beginner in these matters economic and financial I want to know why the government can do this thing now, with the apparent approval of almost everyone, when the government could not do it when we needed it so badly, three years ago.

The economic conference seems to have given its O.K. to this. What had they to do with our business? Could we not have done it without waiting these interminable two or three years? As a farmer I know what it meant to us two or three years ago and less in promoting low farm prices. I do not pretend to be any authority on monetary matters, but I know what hurts and what does not hurt, what helps and what does not help the farmer to get a proper price for his product. Without knowing a quarter as much as he does I feel as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre feels, but I want to know why this measure was delayed so long and why we had to wait until the economic conference told us to go ahead. This is about the only thing they did tell us, so far as I recall, except the wheat agreement, which is not much good, if any. Why did we wait so long, and what circumstances prevail now which justify this measure to-day but which did not justify it previously? That is what I should like to get at.

Mr. COOTE: Since the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has mentioned my name I must say, almost as a matter of privilege, that I have never, in this house or any other place, advocated uncontrolled inflation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You did not mention "uncontrolled."

Mr. COOTE: I should like to make that very plain. If the hon. gentleman doubts that he can look at any speech I have made in this house.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not want to do my hon. friend any injustice at all, because

I think he was the pioneer in advocating inflation. But I never detected the word "controlled" in his remarks, though last year he went out of his way to shove it right to the front. If I am wrong I should be delighted to have my hon. friend correct me.

Mr. COOTE: If the hon. gentleman would do me the honour of reading the first speech on the subject I made in this house he would see that the word "inflation" does not occur in it at all. I protested against the deflation which has taken place, and I suggested that Canada should abandon the gold standard and allow her dollar to depreciate in outside countries. In other words I suggested that we should devalue our dollar, and I should like to make that plain. I have never advocated uncontrolled inflation; I believe in controlling the economic forces that we use in our daily life. When I protest against deflation someone always reads into my remarks that I want uncontrolled inflation. Of course I have been accused of wanting to use the printing press, but I suggest that this is what the Prime Minister is going to do. He is going to print more dominion notes with practically the same amount of gold we have had in the treasury for the last few years. We might as well have had these notes printed three or four years ago; we might even have had a few more. It would not have been more dangerous then than it is now, and it would have been a great deal of help. That $40,000,000 might have been working all these years at the increased velocity suggested this afternoon by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), because unfortunately in studying economics we find that when the quantity of money is reduced the velocity of its circulation always slows down.

Mr. POULIOT: Since my name has been mentioned I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. He has said that he favours controlled inflation. Would he be good enough to tell the house what is the limit of controlled inflation?

Mr. COOTE: At the moment I was not even advocating controlled inflation. I would suggest to the hon. member that what we are getting now is a little bit of inflation. The quantity of money which is moving about and serving the public is greatly restricted, and I congratulate the Prime Minister on taking this step to put more money into circulation. I want to congratulate the Prime Minister for using this money to construct public works in order to provide employment, instead of giving people the dole. May I say that I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre when he says this measure is several years late. We are now in the fourth year of deflation, and we should have taken steps of this kind long ago, though it is better late than never. This is a very feeble, short step. As I remember it, speaking from memory and using approximate figures, the gold held by the government itself is in the neighbourhood of $70,000,000. Using the very basis which the Prime Minister says was suggested by the world conference as quite adequate, the twenty-five per cent gold reserve, we could issue $280,000,000 of dominion notes. That would be quite safe and quite in keeping with the canons of sound finance, whatever that may be. I understand we have about $170,000,000 in dominion notes now outstanding, so we might safely issue another $110,000,000. If we are going to issue $40,000,000, and if we have decided it is quite proper to adopt this new basis of gold coverage, I should like to suggest to the Prime Minister that he could go at least to the extent of $100,000,000. May I also point out to the house that gold now commands a much higher value. I think it is about seventy per cent higher than it is valued under our currency act. So we could increase by seventy per cent the gold basis for the issue of notes, which would bring the amount of gold at the new valuation to about $119,000,000. And if you used that as a basis for an issue with twenty-five per cent gold coverage you could issue notes up to $470,000,000, and still be financially sound.

Mr. MORAND: How would you control your coincident increase in credit which naturally follows from putting this much into circulation?

Mr. COOTE: Control it through the central bank. If the central bank is given adequate powers it could control the situation. As I suggested this afternoon, the reserves which the banks must carry are not sufficient. The central bank could easily control if we gave it the power to require the chartered banks to carry with it a certain percentage of their deposit liabilities, as a deposit in the central bank, give the central bank power to vary the percentage of such deposit and they can prevent too great inflation of bank credit. At the moment there is no danger of that, because there are not enough people whose credit is good who will assume the responsibility of borrowing from the bank. So we are not liable to have any inflation of bank credit from that.

I do not wish to speak at length, except to say that I believe the Prime Minister is taking a step in the right direction and that I regret he has not gone farther. I suggest that he should go farther. I am not suggesting that he must go as far as is possible under the new valuation of gold, but let us have enough of these dominion notes issued to finance a worth while program of public works. Public works may be considered as an asset and not a liability, and they are a very good asset on which we could issue new money. That is, there is an asset which justifies the issue of new money, as well as having twenty-five per cent gold reserve behind it. But so far as the other seventy-five per cent is concerned, we would have useful public works behind it, and I believe that would be a very good basis on which to issue money.

I am very glad the Prime Minister has taken this step, but I should be pleased if before the legislation is finally passed he would consent to go a little farther.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before the Prime Minister answers I should like to state some of my dilemmas. It was always contended two or three years ago that by issuing these additional notes with the same coverage we would have given that much more currency to put into circulation for business requirements—not for a building program, but just so that we might have it available so that any of us might get it for the ordinary running of our businesses. I never could see that. I have no brief for the Prime Minister. It was, I repeat, a matter of issuing such additional notes so that notes would be available for all and sundry businesses, when there was all kinds of money already available in the banks. It certainly was not a question of the availability of larger amounts of currency in order to do a larger business. The money was there in abundance in the bank all the time. We did not need any more currency then to do our business. It needed even less currency then because there was less business being done; therefore less currency would have been sufficient. The banks were filled with currency waiting for investment, and waiting to make loans where they could obtain what they considered proper security. Why is it needed now? Why has the conference to tell us when to do it? This is all a great mystery to me, and I am sure the Prime Minister will do some unravelling in connection with this enigma, and will throw some new light upon it. I know there is a difference between ordinary currency and an investment in public works. What this new note issue really does is to get away from going on the market and borrowing money. It averts borrowing more money, and increasing our national debt. If we did not do this as outlined in the bill we would have to borrow money abroad; we would have to add to our national debt, an objectionable procedure just now and one which should be avoided if possible. If there is anything in the suggestion that this is just being done now before an election I must say that would be a most unworthy purpose.

Mr. POULIOT: What is the limit of controlled inflation? No answer.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to say that although I intended to, I did not answer the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). He asked my opinion as to where we would stop controlled inflation, or how far it should go. The determining factor in that case would be the average commodity price level in Canada. I think that is generally agreed upon by economists as being the factor which determines when the controlled inflation should stop. There should be no further inflation after we get to a certain agreed price level. That point would be agreed upon before a policy was commenced. I believe that is what the central bank may do. They should set, as their objective, a certain commodity price level. We have chosen the price level of 1926. We would take the index price of all commodities in that year, the index figure representing the average commodity price. Let us have a policy of controlled inflation or reflation—and I believe the latter is a much better word—let us raise the index figures of commodity prices to a point as near as possible to the figures obtaining in 1926. That would make it possible for producers to meet their liabilities. But while the price level is perhaps only sixty per cent of what it was when we incurred debts in 1926, we have to produce forty per cent more commodities to get the same amount of money to pay our debts. When we produce the extra forty per cent—and if we do succeed in doing so—then we drive the price level down because we have overproduced. We must have a certain price for our products, if we are going to meet our liabilities. The hon. member for Témiscouata says that our bonds are not only liabilities, that they are assets. They are assets only if those who must pay taxes out of which this interest comes, can meet their payments. If the price levels go too low, that becomes impossible for the producers, and when enough producers get into that position the interest on the bonds cannot be met, except from new borrowings, a condition which cannot go on indefinitely.

So I say the matter of getting a certain price level for producers is a fundamental matter for this house to determine when we are discussing monetary policies.

I think the Prime Minister will agree with me as to the importance of having a certain price level for our products, and if it is necessary for our producers it is necessary for Canada to have it so that the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities may meet their liabilities. The interest can be paid only out of production. If the price of our products goes too low the payment of interest becomes impossible—just as impossible as taking four gallons of water out of a one gallon can. It is for that reason that for the last three or four years I have urged monetary action to raise price levels.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the effect of it in the United States?

Mr. COOTE: I do not think anything can be gained by discussing that point, but at the moment we are discussing the question of increasing the amount of dominion notes issued. Great Britain has obtained an increased price level from monetary action, and certainly the United States have.

Mr. BENNETT: To what extent?

Mr. COOTE: Not to the extent it was hoped, and possibly not to the extent desired.

Mr. BENNETT: Not any more than in this country, or as great in many instances.

Mr. COOTE: We have it here because it came to the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought you would say that.

Mr. COOTE: When the United States took action to devalue their dollar in relation to the pound sterling, making the pound worth more than five dollars, the pound became worth more than five dollars in Canada, and that was the reason for most of the rise in the price of wheat and other exportable commodities. I do not think it is because of any action we have taken here up to date; rather, I think it is because of the action of the United States in revaluing gold.

Mr. POULIOT: I had asked certain questions of the government, and the answer came from the hon. member for Macleod after he had said that he did not desire to reply to my question.

Mr. COOTE: I said that I intended to answer it but I forgot, and that is why I rose to make reply. I did not wish to interrupt the Prime Minister.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not saying that at all. What I am saying is that when I asked the question of the hon. member for Macleod he said that he was not discussing the matter at the moment, but he did not tell me that he would be good enough to rise afterwards and give a lengthy explanation of the matter. Now I am a layman; I am not a banker. I have here a dollar bill and if through inflation it were converted into a two dollar bill or a three dollar bill it would mean that instead of one dollar I should have three dollars. But if the increase were general the result would be that I would not be able to buy any more with that three dollars than I can with this dollar bill. Therefore what is the use of inflation? I remember well that last year, during a debate on the very same subject, I asked the hon. member for Macleod some questions along the same lines. I asked him: If we have normal trade what is the use of inflation? I have not the text of his answer but I remember distinctly what he said; he said that if trade were normal, if we had the same trade now that we had in 1930 there would be no necessity for inflation. He said it twice, and the third time I asked the same question and he told me that if he had said it previously it was because he had not properly understood what I had asked him before.

Now, I do not see what relation there can be between the central bank and the average figured value of goods. I do not see how the Bank of Canada can increase the price of butter from twenty cents, as it is now, to fifty or sixty cents as was promised before the election. I do not see how the Bank of Canada can do that, but if my hon. friend can explain it to me I should like him to explain it in very plain language which can be understood by a layman like myself. I am not a banker as he is. I am not a technician; but I do not believe in all this artificial, superficial, fictitious business. There must be something real; there must be something that exists not only in the imagination but in reality. Consider all that has been inspired by the economists who have written books upon books to describe their dreams. First of all, we remember Plato who lived a long time ago. He described the ideal city. Walking with other philosophers he described his dreams, and he gave them to us in books that are immortal. But the ideal city as seen by Plato in one of his dreams has never existed in reality. And now we have all sorts of economists who are preaching cures for every national trouble. They are writing books. Some of them live in England some in the United States, and others in France and Germany; and here in this House of Commons we have listened to the opinions of Sir Arthur Salter and of Schacht, the president of the Reichsbank. All these people have beautiful theories which will make everyone rich. Well, they may be sincere, but they are not serious, and these experiments cannot be carried on on any large scale. Take a chemist like Pasteur; take a man like Claude Bernard; take Lord Lister. These men confined their experiments within a narrow field. They tried first to discover the truth by experimenting on a very small scale and then, when they saw that that limited experiment was successful, they extended it and carried it on on a larger scale. This I submit is what should be done. It is very dangerous to venture into the unknown on the word of men who, though they may be scientists or men with keen legal minds, have no practical experience. I am sure, for instance, that my hon. friend from Macleod, who I am sorry has just gone out, has more practical experience in banking than any economist who is not himself a banker. He has probably more experience than Sir Arthur Salter, and so said Sir Herbert Holt when he called the hon. gentleman one of his colleagues. "You are a banker yourself," Sir Herbert said to the hon. member. He admired the hon. gentleman's great experience in banking. But I am wondering how the central bank through inflation could increase the price of butter from twenty cents to sixty cents, how it could increase the price of cheese to twenty-five cents. How will the central bank through inflation restore the prices of commodities to what they were in 1930? And even if it did, it would not be the same, because the money would have less value; the currency would be less valuable. That is the point of view of a humble layman, a man in the street, looking at the theories put forward by hon. members in the extreme corner. They have been preaching these theories for a long time now and they may be sincere, but they are not practical; and what they tell us is a mere mirage. It is nothing but castles in the air, and it is a shame to tell the farmers that through inflation they will be richer than they are now. We must have a normal exchange of goods and we must come to that as soon as possible. In the meantime I hope that when hon. members in the far corner preach inflation they will be more convincing. I do not doubt their sincerity, but I say that they are preaching utopia, and it will make no one richer than he is now. I hope they will understand that it is much better to read the blue-books and get acquainted with facts than to spend their nights reading the publications of economists of the old world and the United States, those dreams in books which always put one to sleep.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I suppose I am expected to make at least a few observations. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Pouliot) has referred to our having to listen to Salter and Schact. There are some of us who read Hansard who were not present to listen to him who may regard that as almost as great a trial as listening to Salter and Schact. I daresay there is a difference of opinion on that point. I do not think it would be fitting that I should waste the time of this committee, in view of the discussion that has taken place, in getting back to the rudiments of this matter. All nations provide a coverage for currency so that it may have some value in the eyes of the people of the world outside of their own particular country. I shall put it as broadly as that. There cannot be much difficulty about that. To the extent to which a currency meets that universal requirement, to that extent it may be regarded as having some stabilized value. One of the reasons why we are able to do what we are going to do and could not have done it before is that the world has agreed upon a basis of what it regards as sufficient metal coverage for the purpose of enabling a country to issue currency. Compliance with that universal agreement means that we have behind us the sanction of universal opinion, and the sanction of universal opinion in monetary matters is all important. As I said in this house on a previous occasion, confidence is the basis of the value of money. Why is it that the Canadian dollar to-day is worth more than the American dollar? Why is it that there is a premium on the Canadian dollar as against the American? Why was it that we did not, as the hon. gentleman says, do this thing years ago? All he has to do is to look to see what the Canadian dollar was then. It was then eighty cents, eighty-four cents, eighty-five cents up to ninety cents; to-day it is worth $$1.01\frac{3}{16}$. How has that value been established? It has been established by the creation of a favourable trade balance, both visible and invisible. Commodity balances and invisible balances gave us last year a favourable trade balance of over $40,000,000. That means that some people in order to meet their obligations in Canada had to purchase our securities or otherwise to the value of forty million Canadian dollars. In order to get a Canadian dollar they had to pay $1.01 or whatever the amount might be. That is why Canadian dollars are worth more than they were a few short years ago or even a few short months ago.

The second reason is that the great republic to the south has followed the monetary policy it has. No doubt that policy has had a very direct effect upon the monetary position of this country. These two things have brought about a rate of exchange between Canada and the United States on a basis favourable to this country. I am not discussing the wisdom or unwisdom of this; I am only pointing out what is a fact. It should be remembered what it meant to this country, to the provinces, to the municipalities, to large corporations and to individuals that had to pay their debts in New York under the terms of their contracts. A tremendous task was imposed upon the Canadian people in meeting those obligations.

Perhaps hon. gentlemen will realize why this country did not engage in inflation. There is no doubt about what would have happened had I driven the Canadian dollar down to fifty cents. We now have the confidence of the world behind us, and we have the sanction, not only of public opinion in Canada and the United States but of public opinion of the world expressed in the terms of a resolution agreed to by sixty-four countries of the world. The extent of the metal coverage of our currency is in the terms of that agreement. We still have a thirty-one per cent coverage based on the old value of gold at $20.67 per ounce. We have that metal coverage behind $120,000,000 of currency. Under the action of the world in placing a new value upon gold, as indicated by the markets to-day in London or New York, we have a coverage of over fifty-two per cent.

Let me make it clear that this bill is only to meet a transition period. Let me answer the question of the hon. gentleman as to why we did not do this before. When I tried it with $35,000,000, what was the result? We issued $35,000,000 of money under the provisions of the Finance Act, and what happened? Exchange dropped eight per cent. That demonstrated that we were not ready to do this, that confidence had not been created and that the foreign balances of this country were not sufficient to sustain our position. Confidence has returned, and with our foreign balances as I have indicated, this country finds itself in a position where the bill as brought down the other day in this house was received with approval in the money centres of the world, whereas my little effort to deal with the situation a couple of years ago met with a fall in exchange of eight per cent. I put these facts before the committee in order that it may realize that the action now taken is taken for the transition period between the present and the days of the central bank, at which time we will adopt in full the provisions of the recommendations of the world conference and provide for currency to an extent which cannot possibly be required. The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) was quite right when he said that at no time during the past few years has there been any shortage of currency. The banks were unable to lend the money they had. During the past few weeks there has been some evidence of stiffening of credit. The amount mentioned in this bill, $120,000,000, is, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) said, to meet that transition period until the central bank is functioning. I need hardly point out to this committee that when the bank functions the effect will be, on the application of the terms provided for with respect to coverage, the issue of several hundred millions of currency if required. That will be the result achieved with the aid of the gold of the banks and the gold from the Department of Finance. Politics has nothing to do with this. Although much condemned and criticized, I think we have vindicated the soundness of the position which we took, which was that sound money must be maintained for this country. This is not inflation in the sense in which that term is used in this chamber; it is the application of a principle agreed upon by the nations of the world to the conditions in this country during the transition period between the present and the time when the central bank is established.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand we are discussing clause 1 of Bill No. 110. In the last number of the Commercial Intelligence Journal, the issue of June 23, 1934, at page 1090 I see a table giving exchange quotations for the weeks ending June 11 and June 18, comparing the par value of the currency of each nation with nominal quotations in Montreal for the two weeks. I will not take both weeks, but let me take the week ending June 18, as follows:

Country—	Unit	Present or former gold parity	Nominal quotations in Montreal week ending June 18
Austria	Schilling	.1407	.1872

This means that Austria is much more above par than Canada.

Belgium	Belga	.1390	.2305

This means that the value of Belgian currency is much more in Canada than when it was at par.

Bulgaria	Lev	.0072	.0118
Czechoslovakia	Krone	.0296	.0411

In Denmark and Finland their currencies are a little less than par.

France	Franc	.0392	.0651

This means that the franc is worth about fifty per cent more than it was before, according to what the Prime Minister said as to our money being above par, that means it must be above par in all the other countries. How, then, can he explain that the value of the French franc is now fifty per cent more than it was before?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. What I said was in reference to New York. That is what I spoke of, and the French franc is still on the gold standard.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right. It means that the nations that are standing by the gold standard have currencies that are worth much more than those of the nations that have left the gold standard. That is common sense and everyone knows it. It is superfluous of the Prime Minister to teach me that, because it is a matter that is known by the man in the street. But let us take the other nations:

Country—	Unit	Present or former gold parity	Nominal quotations in Montreal week ending June 18
Germany	Reichsmark	.2382	.3758

This means an increase of about twelve cents for each mark, a formidable increase compared with the one and a fraction per cent of the Canadian dollar. It means that the German mark is worth about fifty per cent more in our own money. In Greece the drachma is lower.

Holland	Guilder	.4020	.6685

This is also an increase of over fifty per cent for the Holland guilder.

Hungary	Pengo	.1749	.2956

Much above Canadian money. Canadian money is much below par.

Italy	Lira	.0526	.0849

Also a great increase over par.

Jugoslavia	Dinar	.0176	.0224

Also an increase. In Norway there is a small decrease. In Portugal there is a small increase over par.

Roumania	Leu	.0060	.0100

An increase of about forty per cent. In Sweden there is a small decrease and also in Spain there is a small decrease.

Country—	Unit	Present or former gold parity	Nominal quotations in Montreal week ending June 18
Switzerland	Franc	.1930	.3204

An increase of about fifty per cent.

United States	Dollar	1.0000	.9850

This means a decrease. What is meant by that inflation? It is not that Canadian money is above par but that Canadian money is a little less inflated than United States money; that is all, but Canadian money is much lower than par. It is the same thing with regard to the currencies of Egypt and South Africa.

Great Britain	Pound	4.8666	4.9740

It means, sir, that Canadian money is not above par. We speak of it so but it is not in accordance with the facts; Canadian money is below par. When you go to England or most of the other countries of the world you see the depreciation of our currency. Therefore there is no reason to rejoice. If you go to France you need $150 to buy $100 worth of francs at the value they had before depreciation started. I put these figures on record in order to show the real value of our currency in the currency of other countries. The Commercial Intelligence Journal is published by the Department of Trade and Commerce and the figures it contains cannot be denied by the government.

With regard to the favourable balance of trade of which the Prime Minister spoke, let me tell him that the balance of trade now cannot be compared with the amount of trade in 1930. I wrote to the bureau of statistics to ask them for a comparison with the years 1930 and 1931. The comparison supplied is made between the years 1932 and 1933. It is most unfair, because the comparison should be made between 1930 and 1931 and the other years. If the comparison is made between 1933 and 1932 the showing is not so bad, but the government cannot say that it is better than before, because the point of comparison must be the year 1930, the year that the leader of the government and his ministers found so bad. It was the last year of the Mackenzie King government, therefore the comparison should be with that year. In comparison with that year we see that the decrease of trade is something fearful. Our external trade is only one-third of what it was in 1930.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. 99, to amend the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) brought to the attention of the committee subsection 6 of section 8. A deputation representing the various institutions that are holders of trusts met with the representative of the income branch of the Department of National Revenue and myself and they arrived at the conclusion that the present tax of five per cent is undoubtedly applicable against this, and that this section should be stricken out. I therefore move:

That the house proceed to reconsideration of section 8 of the bill.

The committee will recall that section 6 was passed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I now move:

That subsection 6 of section 8 of the bill be stricken out.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: In section 5 of the bill it is proposed to meet the five per cent tax by the following amendment:

That section 5 of Bill No. 99 be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"(d) All income for any taxation period received from any Canadian estate or trust, which income shall be deemed to include all income accruing to the credit of non-resident beneficiaries whether received by them or not during such taxation period. The tax payable by virtue of this paragraph shall be deducted by the trustee from the amount paid or credited to such beneficiary at the time of paying or crediting and shall be remitted to the Receiver General of Canada."

That provides for the taxation of the income from the trusts but prevents double taxation and imposes only the tax of five per cent. I think that is the effect of it; that is what I am advised. At any rate it prevents double taxation and meets the difficulty to which the hon. member referred.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the Prime Minister think that it applies to anything more than the income derived from Canadian sources "from any Canadian estate or trust"?

Mr. BENNETT: The idea of designating it as a Canadian estate or trust is that it is a trust set up in this country, as I tried to explain the other day. If the benefits accrue to an estate set up in this country I think it is only fair they should contribute to the revenues of the country. But I agree with what was said the other day that it should not be double taxation. The representatives of the institutions that hold these trusts, both in Toronto and in Montreal, were agreed that the beneficiaries should make a contribution, and I think this section covers that clearly. I wish the hon. gentleman would look at it and see if he thinks it does.

Mr. RALSTON: My only thought was that there might be a Canadian estate or trust in the sense of one established in Canada which would hold not only Canadian but foreign securities. I thought it was intended that the tax should apply to the portion of income derived from Canadian sources only. The Prime Minister's point the other day was that if money was earned under our Canadian institutions, even though that money went to non-residents it should be taxed. I am wondering if this goes further and really brings the whole income of the estate, whether from Canadian or foreign sources, under the purview of the tax.

Mr. BENNETT: I think if the hon. gentleman will look at it he will see that any income disbursed to a beneficiary from a Canadian trust is taxable.

Mr. RALSTON: That would include income from foreign securities?

Mr. BENNETT: Beyond question I think, that was the intention and that is my understanding. That would be the amendment to section 5 which takes the place of subsection 6 of section 8.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: That was the only section that was allowed to stand, unless the hon. gentleman has any observations to make with respect to any of the other sections. I think they have all been passed.

Mr. RALSTON: An inquiry came to one of my colleagues with regard to section 10. I think there is no doubt about the answer to the inquiry which was made; that is, as I understand it, section 10, which is a reenactment of section 19 of the Income War Tax Act, applies only from the date of assent and is not made retroactive. That was the information I got. I looked over the bill as passed and there did not seem to be any provision making that particular section retroactive.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not mentioned in section 18.

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. gentleman knows, I am only here by reason of the absence of the minister, who put through these sections. As a matter of fact I was not in the house, but according to my understanding that section was not to be retroactive. I will just look at it now, if the hon. gentleman will pardon me. I do not think there is any question that it is not retroactive.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Mr. Bennett moves that section 19 be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

19. Subsection 6 of section 9B of the said act is repealed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RALSTON: There is just one thing more. On the second reading of the bill the Minister of Finance made some reference to section 10, which reenacts section 19. I do not know whether the Prime Minister was in the house at the time, but I thought the minister rather left the impression that legislation had been passed in 1930 which widened the position of the taxpayer and made him less liable than before to pay taxes. As I understand it section 19, as enacted in 1930, provided for the taxation of the accumulated income on the winding up, discontinuance or reorganization of a business, and that was passed for the purpose of restricting the rights of the taxpayer. Though those funds were not taxable at all previously, they became taxable as from January 1, 1930. I looked up the debates of that time and I find that on May 24, 1930, at page 2505 of Hansard, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said:

But the present act provides that dividends paid to an incorporated company by a company incorporated in Canada, the profits of which have been taxed under the act, are not liable to taxation.

Then the hon. gentleman went on to point out that this provision made them liable to taxation; he took some objection to the act being made retroactive to January 1, 1930, and suggested that the act should be made to apply only from July 1, 1930. Then at page 2506 he said:

It may be said that by that method the shareholders of the selling company escape payment of income tax on undistributed and earned surplus or income; but it is a perfectly legal transaction, and to make this provision that we are now dealing with retroactive is, I submit, wholly unfair.

I can say for the minister's benefit and assistance that I have taken occasion to discuss this matter with the income tax authorities, and while they admit that it bears the construction which I have indicated, they say that it was not the intention of the department to go that far, but to go back only to the 1st day of January, 1930. But unless the bill is properly worded, to provide against the contingency I have mentioned, there will be very grave injustice done.

Further on he said:

Even to go back to the beginning of 1930 is, in my opinion, not quite fair because that too has this retroactive feature. I would suggest to the minister that instead of making this retroactive to the beginning of the 1930 taxation period, he provide in the bill that it take effect from the beginning of the next taxation period, the beginning of the 1931 period, or the end of the 1930 taxation period. In that way the government and the department will not be open to the charge of passing retroactive legislation, which on principle is always bad, and which may bear hardly in a given case.

I am not objecting to the principle of the amendment to the act, because in principle an undistributed income has as much right to pay taxation as distributed income, but it has not been made taxable in the past and it has been perfectly legal to do what I have indicated has been done. . . .

I refer to that only in order that there may be no doubt on this point, that in 1930 the act which was the predecessor of this section now being amended, was passed, whereby a distinct advance was made in the way of taxation; undistributed income was taxed which had not been taxed previously, and that provision was made applicable back to January 1, 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman has not before him the statute as it was passed. The statute is chapter 24 of the statutes of 1930 assented to on May 30. It exempted first of all dividends paid by one incorporated company to another. Then it dealt with cooperative companies and associations; it amended subsection 1 of section 5 by adding a description of dependent relatives; it exempted ten per cent of the net taxable income in regard to donations and also exempted $5,000 of an annuity. Then, on page 233, section 19 was repealed and the following substituted:

19. (1) On the winding-up, discontinuance or reorganization of the business of any incorporated company, the distribution in any form of the property of the company shall be deemed to be the payment of a dividend to the extent that the company has on hand undistributed income earned in the taxation period 1930 and subsequent periods.

What happened? Just as soon as this was passed they proceeded to distribute all the income earned prior to that time. That was the joker in the whole statute; it applied only to 1930 and subsequent periods, and they proceeded immediately to distribute the income earned prior to 1930. Many members of the house thought that was not what the statute meant at all, but that was what it did mean in practice. That was the situation dealt with by the amendment passed last year, which is being further dealt with here. If the hon. gentleman will look at the language he will see how that construction could be put upon it. As a matter of fact the hon. member for York-Sunbury was arguing that there should be no payment of income tax on the distribution of undistributed profits. That should apply to the payment of a dividend to the extent that the company has on hand undistributed income earned in the taxation period 1930 and subsequent periods. The ones antecedent to 1930 got off free, and it is certain they took advantage of that provision.

Mr. RALSTON: All hon. members in the house at the time agreed that this legislation was imposing an extra burden on the taxpayer. It may have been that in practice someone ingeniously worked out the other situation. But everybody had his eyes open when the act was passed. It certainly did impose taxes which were not imposed before, and imposed them back to January 1, 1930, instead of, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury mentioned, July 1, 1930. The hon. member said:

I do not see that it can make very much difference to the department in the matter of taxation. You are establishing a new principle that for thirty years has not been resorted to. You are foregoing all the unearned and undistributed incomes of companies of this character down to the first day of January. Why not go a little further and make it the first of July or the thirtieth of June, 1930? I do not see any reason in the objection urged by the minister that you cannot have a broken period. The amount of tax can be ascertained.

Mr. BENNETT: It is unnecessary to say that the hon. gentleman is not the interpreter of the statute; he did not interpret the statute. Here is the form in which it passed.

Mr. RALSTON: The only objection was that it went back too far.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was for another reason altogether.

Mr. RALSTON: The objection was that it went back too far, and taxed funds which up to that time had not been taxable.

Mr. BENNETT: But as I say now, in practice what happened was it enabled those who had accumulated vast surpluses which they had not distributed, to escape taxation. It began to operate for the 1930 period and thereafter, but not antecedently to it. Large accumulations had taken place prior to that time. The statute which passed freed from taxation all moneys accumulated as surplus, and not distributed to shareholders prior to January 1, 1930, and thereafter.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 50, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the house to one clause of this bill which, it seems to me, should not pass. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has had his attention directed to it—I refer to that clause making one provision of the legislation retroactive. I shall state frankly that my attention was drawn to it by the solicitor of a party to an action now pending in the supreme court. I refer to section 6 of the bill which reenacts section 9 of the original legislation but with a very important amendment. Section 9 as reenacted provides for certain proceedings in the case of companies proposing to register where their names conflict or are liable to be objectionable on account of conflict with the names of companies already registered.

Section 9 of the old legislation provided that if the name of any company applying to be registered was in the opinion of the superintendent objectionable on the ground that the name of the company was that of a company registered under this act, or a name liable to be confounded with the name of any such company, then the superintendent might refuse to register. The amendment provides that the superintendent may refuse to register not only if the name of the company is in conflict with the name of another company registered under this act, but also if the name is one which conflicts with that of a company registered under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932. The objectionable feature is that by subsection 6 of section 9 it is provided:

> (6) This section shall be deemed to have come into force, and shall be construed and applied as if it had come into force, on the twenty-sixth day of May, 1932; and any appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada which any company has since the said date taken from the refusal of the minister to grant the application of the company for registry under this act on the ground of an objection to the name of the company, whether finally disposed of or not, shall be reconsidered and determined on the merits under and in accordance with the provisions of this section."

There is only one case in point, but it raises a question of principle concerning which I have spoken before in this house, and in connection with which I have very definite ideas. My general position is that retroactive legislation is objectionable, and I submit that retroactive legislation which interferes with legal proceedings now pending is doubly objectionable. The situation in this particular case is that the Continental Assurance Company incorporated in Illinois applied two years ago to be registered in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the Continental Life Insurance Company.

Mr. RALSTON: No, I believe it is the Continental Assurance Company. It applied to be registered, and the superintendent of insurance refused registration. After discussions lasting about two years the solicitor took the matter to the Exchequer Court of Canada, to which court there is an appeal from the superintendent, with the result that His Lordship the President of the Exchequer Court of Canada allowed the registration, and that is the situation at the present time. The appeal to the exchequer court was allowed on February 22, 1934.

The crown was a party to that litigation. The Continental Life Insurance Company, a company in Canada, were the respondents in the case, and the crown intervened. Judgment was given allowing registration of the Continental Assurance Company in Canada. Costs were reserved. There was no appeal by the Canadian company, but the crown appealed. The appeal by the crown from that judgment is now pending before the Supreme Court of Canada. As I understand the circumstances of the case, there is no suggestion that the Continental Assurance Company is not eminently worthy of registration in Canada. It has been said that the judge of the exchequer court suggested that perhaps retroactive legislation might be passed. I understand that suggestion is denied. Only a few days ago in a letter from the solicitor of the Continental Assurance Company I was referred to the fact that the judgment of the learned exchequer court judge as published in the reports and as it appears officially contains no reference whatever to retroactive legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: That is hardly correct.

Mr. RALSTON: My argument is that even if the court had suggested retroactive legislation it would have been quite outside its jurisdiction and quite outside its functions, because after all the question as to the advisability or otherwise of legislation is for the government and this House of Commons. The second point is that there are hundreds of cases in which decisions of courts have been given on statutes. I submit that if, after a decision has been given on a statute in a certain form, we attempt to pass legislation amending the statute and providing that the amendment shall be retroactive, we are creating a very dangerous precedent indeed, and I do not think that there is anyone who will more quickly agree with that on general principles than the Prime Minister himself.

In the second place, the suggestion was that counsel had offered to waive the statute and to try the matter as if the statute had been amended. As counsel pointed out, he may have offered long before the litigation started at all to have the matter dealt with on the merits, but the department refused absolutely to take that position. It refused to have the statute amended but preferred to go to the exchequer court and have the matter decided on the statute as it stood. Now decision has been given against the crown and it is proposed that this house shall amend the statute and take away from the Continental Assurance Company the fruits of its litigation. I say, first, on the ground that the matter is sub judice, that we should not pass subsection 6 but that the appeal should be allowed to take its course in the Supreme Court of Canada to which it has been taken—by whom? by the crown itself—and, secondly, I say that retroactive legislation is highly objectionable. The government has decided to appeal to the courts and the litigants have accepted the courts as the tribunal before whom that appeal is to be heard. The crown even intervened in this action to get into the case, and now, having intervened and got into the case, it has appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada; but instead of going on with the appeal it comes to this house now and asks the house to amend the legislation in order that the litigant may be robbed of the fruits of his success. This section changes the law and it makes this change govern a case which has already been disposed of by the established institutions of the country, and it sends the litigant back to the exchequer court under a law entirely different from the law as it stood when he began his litigation. It is bad enough for a private litigant to ask parliament to amend a law while litigation is in progress, but it is a good deal worse when the crown does so. If there is any party that should abide by the decisions of the courts of the country it is the crown and those representing the crown by whom the king's judges are appointed in the first instance. I think this will appeal to hon. members of this house who believe in fair play. The game has been played, and the crown has lost; and what is now proposed is this. The crown says, "True, we have lost the game, but we propose now to revise the rules and have the game played over again."

I need hardly say that I have not the slightest interest in this matter except that I have had a good deal of correspondence from Mr. Gray who was representing the Continental Assurance Company, and I told him I would bring the matter to the attention of the house. I am doing so in view of that promise, but I am doing it also because I believe that it is a sound principle that we should not interfere with litigation, and particularly should we not put in an act a provision which gives the crown a right which it had not, a right which will defeat the objects of the litigation and rob the litigant of the fruits of his success, sending him back to the exchequer court.

What about the merits?—because after all the house is interested in that question. This Continental Assurance Company which is applying for registration in Canada is incorporated under the law of Illinois. It is licensed in thirty-five states and has been doing business since 1911. As a matter of fact it is much larger in assets and business than the Continental Life Insurance Company, which is the Canadian concern. It is, I understand, a reputable and substantial company. Mr. Gray offered, I believe, to add the words "of Illinois" to the name of the company to make sure that there would be no possible conflict, or to add the words "Head office in Chicago, Illinois," or something of that sort to distinguish it clearly from the Continental Life Insurance Company; and the assurance was given further to employ no agent associated with the other company. These offers were not accepted; they were delayed two years in registration, and what do we find now in connection with the registration of insurance companies in this country? There are a number of companies with very similar names. For instance, you have the Mutual Life Insurance Company of Canada and the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, as well as the Mutual Life and Citizens Insurance Company, Limited, all registered; the Union Assurance Society Limited and the Union Insurance Society of Canton, both registered; The Phoenix Assurance Company Limited and the Phoenix Insurance Company, the Prudential Assurance Company Limited and the Prudential Insurance Company of America; the Imperial Assurance Company and the Imperial Insurance Office, all registered under acts of Canada. Yet refusal is given when application is made to register the Continental Assurance Company because there is another company called the Continental Life Insurance Company, notwithstanding that the Continental Assurance Company offers to have itself known as the Continental Assurance Company of Illinois, so that there may be no question about it.

I do not know what the real reason is why the suggestion was not accepted that the act should be amended, but evidently it was not accepted and we are here attempting to reverse the decision made by the exchequer court by a judge appointed by the crown, and we are proposing to pass this legislation at the instance of the crown. It offends against the rules of fair play, and I say that on the merits there does not seem to be reason for it. We should pass this act, amend it for the future, but allow the litigation to take its course and the crown should carry its appeal to the supreme court and abide by the result.

I move therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe):

That Bill B of the Senate, being Bill No. 50 of this house, be not now read a third time, but that same be referred back to the committee of the whole house with direction to amend said bill by striking out subsection 6 of section 6 of said bill.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Some days ago I laid on the table of the house a petition addressed by the Continental Assurance Company to this house, setting out the facts in more detail than I have given them, and dated May 31, 1934. To that petition I would refer hon. members.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): I have some slight knowledge of this matter though perhaps not full or accurate enough to enable me to add very much to the discussion. The decision of the exchequer court has been on a technicality and in no wise on the merits. All parties, including the applicants, were willing to have the application treated as an application on the merits of the proposal. That has not been dealt with in the judgment of the exchequer court. As a matter of fact what happened was this. By reason of a fault in the statute, conceded by all parties, the judge of the exchequer court was unable to hear the application on and did not go into the merits, and the Continental Assurance Company is not prejudiced in the slightest. It has been willing, and is willing now I should imagine, that the matter should be discussed on the merits. If the statute is amended the road will be clear for that discussion. I am not dealing with that phase because I know nothing about it; but this is not a case of retroactive legislation in the sense in which that term is usually used. Nothing has been done under the act; the company has never done business in Canada; and while its road is clear to some extent under the judgment of the exchequer court, it will have got no further on its way by reason of that judgment, nor will it be prejudiced by reason of what has occurred up to the moment if the bill is passed and the parties present the case on the merits.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was placed in charge of this bill when it came from the Senate. It was read the second time in this house, the house went into committee thereon and the bill was passed without any objection. Later the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) intimated that Mr. Gray desired to be heard. He filed a petition which has been laid on the table of the house. The statements which the hon. gentleman has just made were the statements presented to the government in Mr. Gray's brief. However, even as Mr. Gray failed to make the matter clear upon the facts in his petition to the government, so has he not quite accurately stated the matter to the hon. gentleman. In order that there may be no misunderstanding and that the position of the government be made perfectly clear, I propose to quote from the judgment of the president of the exchequer court. What has been said by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) indicates clearly that this is not retroactive legislation in the ordinary sense; it is merely legislation to put the parties in the position in which it was always intended they should be and in which Mr. Gray himself asked on more than one occasion that they be put in until after he got judgment from the exchequer court.

Mr. RALSTON: That was before the litigation.

Mr. BENNETT: I quote:

Maclean, J.:

Judgment rendered February 22, 1934.

The Continental Assurance Company, which for the sake of brevity and clarity will hereafter be referred to as the applicant, made application in October, 1932, to the superintendent of insurance, for its registration under the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932. The applicant is a United States corporation, incorporated under the laws of the state of Illinois, and has carried on a life insurance business in a substantial way in that country since 1911, and presently is licensed to carry on such business in thirty-five different states. The applicant, it is said, is associated, through share ownership with the Continental Casualty Company which is licensed to carry on business in Canada, and in fact does so, but that does not appear to have any relevancy to the issue to be determined here.

The applicant complied with all the requirements of the statute, and of the Department of Insurance, in its application for registration. After a hearing by the Superintendent of Insurance at which the applicant, and the Continental Life Insurance Company as an objecting party, appeared, the superintendent made a report to the Minister of Finance recommending that the registration of the applicant be refused on the ground that its name was liable to be confounded with the name of the Continental Life Insurance Company, a Canadian corporation licensed to carry on the business of life insurance in Canada under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, and thus "on public grounds objectionable"; thereupon the minister accordingly refused to register the applicant.

From the report of the Superintendent of Insurance and the refusal of the minister, the applicant appealed, and the right of appeal being questioned by the Superintendent of Insurance, the applicant applied to Angers, J. for an order requiring the Superintendent of Insurance to deliver to the applicant a certificate in writing setting forth his ruling in the matter of the applicant's application for registration and the reasons therefor, with which order the Superintendent of Insurance in due course complied. In the facts of this case, I think, there was the right of appeal under the statute.

Coming now to the real question for decision in this matter. The issue seems to me to be one of the interpretations of a statutory provision, and that is section 9 of the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932, and it reads thus:

"If the name of any company applying to be registered is that of any company registered under this act, or, in the opinion of the superintendent, any name liable to be confounded therewith, or otherwise on public grounds objectionable, the superintendent shall so report to the minister, and the minister may refuse to register the company."

"(2) Such report, if based upon the objection that the name of the company applying to be registered is that of any company registered under this act or any name liable to be confounded therewith, shall be deemed to be a ruling of the superintendent from which an appeal shall lie under and subject to the provisions of section thirty-four of this act."

The Superintendent of Insurance, and the applicant, agree that the language of section 9 (1) is defective and through inadvertance does not express fully what was intended, that is to say, it was never intended by the legislature to limit the application of this statutory provision to companies registered under the Foreign Insurance Companies Act but should have included companies registered under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. The applicant, it is said, through the appropriate avenue, requested that this defect be cured by amending legislation. All parties to the controversy therefore agreed that something was omitted from the section of the act.

I direct the attention of the house to this:

Mr. Gray, for the applicant, agreed that I might construe this section of the act as if the omission had been supplied, and that I might deal with the appeal upon the merits if I felt inclined to do so. He, however, urged that upon a fair construction of the section as it stands the ruling of the Superintendent of Insurance was in error.

There can be no doubt, I think, as to the construction to be put on section 9. It means that a registration may be refused if the name of the applicant company is so similar to the name of a company already registered under the same act, as to cause confusion. The first clause of the section enables the superintendent to report adversely to an application of a foreign company for registration under the Foreign Insurance Companies Act on account of the similarity of its name to another foreign company already registered under the same act.

To attempt to sustain the refusal to register the applicant under the words "or otherwise on public grounds objectionable" is untenable, in my opinion. These words have no reference to the situation produced by an applicant company seeking registration under a name so similar to a name already registered as to be calculated to cause confusion. The words "or otherwise on public grounds objectionable," as here used, mean something other than the question of confusion arising out of the similarity of names and in such a case there is no appeal from the report or decision of the superintendent of insurance, while in the other case there is an appeal and an applicant is entitled to a judicial decision as to whether its name is liable to be confounded with another name. The words "or otherwise on public grounds objectionable" exclude an objection grounded on a possible confusion of names.

These are the important paragraphs:

Mr. Gray for the applicant, as I have already stated, expressed his willingness that I dispose of the appeal upon the merits if I so cared to do, and that I might assume that the alleged missing words were supplied in section 9 of the act in question. I do not think this is a case where the court would be justified in reading into the section the words said to have been inadvertently omitted. I think I am bound to assume that the legislature meant precisely what it said notwithstanding counsel for the applicant, and the superintendent of insurance, believe it to be a causus omissus. This is not a case where the imperfect wording of a section of a statute creates some doubt as to its meaning but where the intent of the legislature may be resolved with confidence from other provisions found in the same statute.

It seems to me that the appeal should be allowed and it should be declared that the applicant is entitled to registration. The statute, as it stands, authorizes a refusal of registration of a foreign insurance company under the act in question here when its name is liable to be confounded with the name of another foreign company already on the registry,—

This is not a foreign company already on the registry; that is really the gist of it. The judgment continues:

—and any attempt to base the refusal upon the words "otherwise on public grounds objectionable," does not appear tenable to me.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth is quite correct in saying that the following paragraph does not appear in the supreme court and exchequer court reports. It does not appear because it has nothing to do with the reasons in the case; it has reference only to this particular case and, therefore, is not important. In the certified case before the court this paragraph was included, as it should be, at page 57. It reads:

I cannot see any useful purpose now to be served in a discussion of the appeal upon the merits of the case. If the legislature amends the statute, the matter may, if desired by the parties interested, be brought before the court upon the merits upon the present record and without further argument; and, if I may properly do so, that aspect of the appeal is for the present reserved as is also the question of the costs of this appeal.

That is as clear a statement of this case as it is possible to conceive. That paragraph is not in the published law reports of the country because it has reference to this particular company and not to jurisprudence. But in the formal order settled by the court which can be changed only by the appeal are these words:

In the Exchequer Court of Canada
Thursday, the 22nd day of February, A.D. 1934.

Present:
The Honourable the President

Then it recites the case and the name.

The appeal of the above named applicant coming on for hearing at the city of Ottawa, on the twenty-first day of November, A.D. 1933, before this court, in the presence of counsel for the applicant, for the Attorney General of Canada and for The Continental Life Insurance Company, intervenant, whereupon and upon hearing what was alleged by counsel aforesaid this court was pleased to direct that this appeal should stand over for judgment and the same coming on this day for judgment.

1. This court doth order that the appeal from the ruling of the superintendent of insurance be allowed.

2. And this court doth make no order as to costs of this appeal, but reserves this question—

The word "to" is left out.

—be dealt with upon the further proceedings, if any, in this court.

If that is not a clear indication and almost invitation to pass this legislation I cannot conceive of anything clearer. What is more, in the formal judgment of the court provision is made for it. So, when this statute is enacted, the merits of the case will then be considered in accordance with the recommendations made by the learned judge as well in his reason for judgment as in the order which is based on those reasons. I cannot under the circumstances think the hon. gentleman is correct in describing this as retroactive legislation. It is legislation which counsel for the parties contemplate might be passed.

Mr. RALSTON: Not after litigation.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only reading from the judgment of the judge who says that counsel said to him: Give us judgment as though you were on the merits. He said: I cannot do that, but if the legislature intervenes, I will do it. The legislature is now going to intervene.

Mr. RALSTON: He has to give two judgments.

Mr. BENNETT: The judge said: I will not give judgment on the merits because it is clear I cannot read into the statute, even by consent, something that is not there. In other words, jurisprudence cannot be determined by a private arrangement. That being so, the learned judge contemplated that the statute would be passed. When it is passed, what happens? Have we taken away any man's rights? What we have done is to say to him: Let us hear the case on the merits, it not having been heard on the merits because the statute contemplated confusion with respect to another foreign company and not a domestic company and the domestic company is urging the confusion with respect to its position. For instance, in the daily papers the other evening it was reported that another continental insurance company had gone into the hands of the receiver. I asked my hon. friend if he knew anything about it. I did not know about it so I made inquiries and it was a company of a somewhat similar name in another state in the United States. That has nothing to do with this particular question which is purely and simply whether all parties having agreed during the trial that there should be a decision in the merits, this statute affords an opportunity for that decision to be made upon the merits of the case.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I believe with the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) that this bill contains a provision which is certainly unprecedented and the like of which cannot be found in any statute of this country. Let me read subclause 6 of clause 6 of this bill:

> This section shall be deemed to have come into force, and shall be construed and applied as if it had come into force, on the twenty-sixth day of May, 1932; and any appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada which any company has since the said date taken from the refusal of the minister to grant the application of the company for registry under this act on the ground of an objection to the name of the company, whether finally disposed of or not, shall be reconsidered and determined on the merits under and in accordance with the provisions of this section.

This is retroactive in two features; it is retroactive with regard to paragraph (a) of subclause 1 of clause 6 in which it is stated:

> If the name of any company applying to be registered is in the opinion of the superintendent objectionable on the grounds that the name of the company is either—
> (a) that of any company registered under this act or of any corporation registered under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

The act of 1932 said:

> If the name of any company applying to be registered is that of any company registered under this act, or, in the opinion of the superintendent, any name liable to be confounded therewith.

By paragraph (a), this is added:

> Or of any corporation registered under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

This widens the scope of this provision, making it applicable to something which was not in the act of 1932. Then subclause 5 provides that there shall be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from any judgment of the exchequer court under this measure. This was not in the act of 1932 and it comes after there has been litigation. There has been a legal action which has been decided by the exchequer court and which is actually pending before the Supreme Court of Canada. The Prime Minister quoted the notes of judgment of the justice of the exchequer court and he admitted that the last two sentences, which are the most important to support his side of the present debate, are not in the official reports. Not only are they not in the official reports, but those sentences have been struck out from the official record. After inquiry was made in the office of the exchequer court it was found that the learned judge of that court had removed from the official record those two sentences.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to read that?—because I should be glad to know of a judge doing so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is it not in the official report?

Mr. BENNETT: No, this is the certified copy.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am advised by the representatives of the Continental Assurance Company that after inquiring at the office of the exchequer court they found out that those words had been removed there too.

Mr. BENNETT: That makes the situation worse.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It makes it worse for the case of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the former Minister of Justice say that a judge of a court, after a case has been passed for review in the supreme court, has changed his judgment?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those are merely notes.

Mr. BENNETT: I gave the formal judgment, as certified.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those are reasons for judgment. I am merely asserting what my information is; I have not seen it myself, but the solicitor for the company informed me that what I have stated is so. Does it not, however, look extraordinary that such a clause should be in this bill and that there is no provision for costs or anything in it?

Mr. BENNETT: But the judgment has reserved costs.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They will have to go there and apply for them. By this bill if it becomes law the parties are put out of court altogether; they have no case left. They have been awarded judgment under the statute of 1932, and in 1934 we are enacting a law which says that this clause of the bill shall be deemed to have been in force since 1932; it is retroactive. This is certainly a vicious principle, however you look at it, and I shall support the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston).

Amendment negatived on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Penitentiaries—Amount required to carry out agreement between His Majesty and the municipality of the village of St. Vincent de Paul for extension of the present water and sewer system connected with St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, $3,000.

Mr. REID: The Minister of Justice stated that when the estimates came up again he would have a report in connection with the hours of labour worked in the penitentiaries. I wonder if he has the statement now.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Yes, I have a memorandum in regard to the hours of labour of guards.

Under the present arrangement in all penitentiaries there are three shifts of guards of two as formerly. The time of the various shifts is as follows: The first shift is on from 7 a.m. to 6.15 p.m. Another shift comes on in the afternoon at 4.30 p.m. and remains on until 1 a.m. The third shift comes on at 12 midnight and remains on duty until 8.30 a.m. These are now known under present penitentiary regulations as the night watch, the morning watch, and day duty. It will be observed that day duty, from 7 a.m. to 6.15 p.m. is the long shift.

Mr. REID: Has that been put into effect in all the penitentiaries, and if so how many extra men have been put on the payroll?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is now in effect in British Columbia, in Saskatchewan, at the Kingston penitentiaries and at Dorchester; and arrangements are now being made for Stoney Mountain and St. Vincent de Paul.

Mr. REID: Did it necessitate the addition of any further employees?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Throughout all penitentiaries it will require sixty-six additional guards.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Would the minister give some particulars regarding this item of $3,000?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This item is for the purpose of enabling us to construct an extension of a water main in the village of St. Vincent de Paul in connection with the penitentiary there. Part of the village of St. Vincent de Paul is on the penitentiary reserve. For a considerable number of years residents of that village have under agreement been entitled to take water from the water mains, paying a reasonable rental for the service. Now it is proposed to extend that water main along another street in the village, and an agreement has been entered into that the residents on that street shall pay a rental for the water. The cost of the work is $3,000, and the rental to be received will make it a reasonably good investment.

Mr. REID: Has the minister any information regarding Piers island, how many Doukhobors are there now and what it costs?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The total cost of the Piers island penitentiary was:

For the year 1932-33.. .. .. $170,783 82
For the year 1933-34.. .. .. 170,461 78

The number of prisoners confined in this prison at the present time is 570.

Mr. MacINNIS: Referring again to the hours of work in the penitentiaries, if I heard the minister aright he said they are now having three shifts instead of two, but I notice that the day shift is still eleven hours and fifteen minutes. Could the minister tell us why the day shift is so long in view of the fact that they have three shifts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are more guards on the day shift than on the night shift. The reason for that is that the men are out at work and the guards have to be with them in the various departments, and then they have to be there at seven in the morning for the opening of the cells and the serving of breakfast, and are kept on until supper has been served in the evening and the cells finally locked for the night. The shift that comes on at 4.30 in the afternoon assists the day shift until 6.15 and continues on until 1 a.m. So far the arrangement has proved very satisfactory from every standpoint, and I believe the guards themselves approve of it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder if the minister could say if the full day staff works the eleven hour shift.

Mr. GUTHRIE: All on the day shift are supposed to work all day, and all on the other shifts are supposed to be on duty during the hours I have mentioned. There is supposed to be work for all.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was wondering whether, because of the overlapping of some of the staffs, it might be possible that they were not all working, that some of them might get off earlier.

Miss MACPHAIL: I would ask the minister if he would care to give the house a statement concerning the death of Sam Behan. I should like to know if convict Behan, who died recently, was paddled a few days previous to his death. I should like to know whether he was suffering from a heart condition and was under the doctor's care, and whether he had been given stimulants for some ten days before his death.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The late convict Behan was a life prisoner who had a very long criminal record. Originally he was confined in the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary; he was considered of that class of prisoners who are rather dangerous, and that prison was not considered strong enough to restrain him if he made an attempt to escape. Consequently he was transferred to Kingston in the summer or spring of 1932. In the beginning of May—if my memory serves me, on May 3 last—he created a disturbance in his cell in Kingston penitentiary of rather a noisy character. He smashed all the furniture in his cell, including his wash basin, dishes and the like, and turned on the water, flooding the cell. Some days later he was tried at the warden's court and awarded punishment, to consist of twenty strokes with a leather strap. On May 14 the punishment was carried out in the presence of the doctor, the warden and other officials, but only four strokes of the strap were administered. He asked to be relieved of the other strokes, and the warden granted his request. He thanked the warden and said that was the only good break he had ever had since coming to the institution. The other sixteen strokes were suspended; in that case they would not be adminstered unless the conduct of the prisoner in the future warranted it.

On May 26, early in the morning, it was reported in the office by one of the guards that Behan was complaining of being sick; that would be some time between six and seven o'clock in the morning. To keep myself accurate perhaps I might read some of the statement made at an inquest which was held into the death of convict Behan. The first statement I will read is that of keeper Robinson, who was questioned by the crown attorney. He said:

Q. I understand you were on duty this morning when your attention was attracted to this prisoner?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What hour would that be?

A. I would judge it would be between 6.30 and—

Q. Between six and seven o'clock?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long had you been on duty there?

A. From 12.30 in the evening.

Q. How was your attention attracted to the prisoner?

A. By the grating of a cup by one of the other inmates confined in the cells.

Q. Where were you at that time?

A. I was directly above, in the keepers' hall.

Q. Were you alone?

A. No, sir.

Q. What connection, if any, is there between the keepers' hall and the cells in which this man was confined?

A. If I can explain it in this way. Here is the keepers' hall, and the cells are directly beneath the keepers' hall.

Q. How are they reached?

A. There is a door at this end. You go down for four or five stairs, and then turn to your left, and down to the cells.

Q. What kind of door guards the exit from the keepers' hall when you step out of it?

A. The keepers' hall door is a steel barrier, sir.

Q. There is a steel barrier separating the keepers' hall from the outer world, through which you had to pass in going down to these cells?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you went out of the keepers' hall you passed through this steel barrier?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then you descended four or five steps?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then you turned to your left, and walked along—

A. You turn to your left, and go down three or four steps.

Q. Then what do you do?

A. Then there is a light wooden door.

Q. What is the name of those cells?

A. They are generally spoken of as P.C., keepers' hall. Punishment cells.

Q. Then we are to understand that there is a light wooden door leading to the punishment cells below the keepers' hall?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that door closed when you reached there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And was there any other door except that wooden door on the punishment cells?

A. Inside, as you go through the wooden door, there is a barrier which screens this block off.

Q. What do you mean by a barrier?

A. A steel gate, sir.

Q. So that we have a wooden door, and beyond the wooden door there is a steel gate?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And your attention was attracted, as you told us, by some noise that you heard. Was that first thing?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you heard any previous noise?

A. No, sir.

Q. What did you do upon hearing that noise?

A. I immediately inspected, sir.

Q. What did you do?

A. I left the keepers' hall. Perhaps I might explain, sir. On taking charge at 12.30, it is customary for the keeper and the officer in charge, the assistant officer, to make alternate visits to the P.C. for safety, and as regards the welfare of the inmates, the last night, if I am not mistaken, we made nine visits from 12.30 to seven o'clock.

Q. What visits did you make yourself?

A. I was down and visited the P.C. at 12.40, 1.35, 2.15 and 6.30.

Q. The 6.30 visit, I surmise, being the one you made on hearing this noise?

A. No, sir. On my visit at 6.30 I was talking to convict Behan. He said, "Good morning, Keeper Robinson." I said, "Good morning, Behan." I said, "It's a little warmer this morning" and he said "Yes, it is," and that's all that was said.

Q. And where were you when you were talking to him?

A. Directly in front of his cell.

Q. When you went in there, did you open this wooden door?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you open the steel gate?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you went along the corridor?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And when you say you were standing in front of the cell that Behan was in, where was that?

A. As we go through the steel gate, we go right down to the end of the corridor where the cells are, and there is an electric clock. There are five cells in that corridor, and the electric clock is down at the end. Behan was in the third cell as I went in through the door.

Q. Was he in the left hand tier of cells?

A. On the west side. That would be my right hand.

Q. He was in the third cell from the door that you entered?

A. The steel gate.

Q. And there were five on each side?

A. There were five on this particular side.

Q. So that he was in the middle cell?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you say that when you went in and were talking to him, where were you?

A. Directly in front of his cell.

Q. Was he at that time lying down?

A. Yes sir, he was in bed.

Q. Was there any further conversation that occurred?

A. No, sir.

Q. And you fix that time as being 6.30?

A. I would say between 6.30 and 6.35.

Q. Did you have to punch any time clock?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you consult the clock since to find the time that you were there, to check up your time?

A. The idea is this. The time that is registered there, or any time clock throughout the prison, goes on a sheet.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Q. Do you mean to say that when you punched the clock there, it would not be recorded there but would be recorded some place else?

A. It is recorded on the clock, and likewise recorded on a sheet.

Q. Then did you examine the record on that clock to find out whether it was 6.30, or do you fix the time from your own recollection?

A. No, sir. I make it my business to go down there between 6.30 and 6.35 every morning, before I leave.

Q. But I am asking you, did you check the time against the clock, or did you not?

A. No, sir, I am positive.

Q. I don't understand you. Are you positive that you did not check the time, or are you positive that it was 6.30, or what are you positive of?

A. I am positive that it was between 6.30 and 6.35 that I was in the hall downstairs.

Q. That is not based upon an inspection of the record, but it is based upon your recollection of the hour?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you continue, please. You were last telling us of this conversation. Then where did you go?

A. After the conversation I went back to the keepers' hall.

Q. And I suppose in doing so you locked the steel gate and closed the outer door?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And would you then be alone in the keepers' hall?

A. No, sir.

Q. Who else was there?

A. Keeper Donoghue, and, if I am not mistaken, keeper Nolan was there.

Q. You think they would be there when you returned from this visit to the cells?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that there were three of you there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then how long after you heard this grating on the cup on the bars did you go back?

A. I went immediately, sir.

Q. About what time had elapsed since you had made your last visit?

A. I think it was about ten minutes from the time I had made my final visit until this grating was heard.

Q. And how long did it take you to go down to the cells?

A. A matter of a minute, sir.

Q. So you had been there ten minutes before?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you find when you entered the cells this time?

A. As I entered the wooden door, one of the convicts said that Behan was sick.

Q. We are to understand that Behan was not the sole occupant of the cells?

A. No, there were three others on the east side.

Q. Was Behan the only one on the west side?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then you started to tell us that when you went in the door one of these—do you know which one it was?

A. No, sir, I couldn't say for sure.

Q. What did he say?

A. That Behan was sick. They could hear him moaning.

Q. He said that Behan was sick, and he also said they could hear him moaning?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you make any reply to that?
A. No, sir. I immediately went to Behan's cell.
Q. What did you find on arriving there?
A. Just as I have already stated, Behan was in bed, moaning, and he asked to see the doctor.
Q. What did you do?
A. I immediately returned to the keepers' hall, and in this time the deputy warden had arrived. I would judge it would be about 6.50. I reported the same to the deputy warden.
Q. What about the other men that were in the keepers' hall before the deputy warden?
A. They were still there.
Q. Didn't you see them before you saw the deputy warden—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you have any conversation with them?
A. I was speaking to them before I went down.
Q. What were you saying to them?
A. In connection with what, sir?
Q. In connection with what you saw downstairs?
A. I hadn't been down, sir. You misunderstand me.
Q. When you found Behan was in this condition in his cell, you told this jury that you came back to the keepers' hall?—A. I did.
Q. Who did you find there?
A. The deputy warden had arrived in the keepers' hall.
Q. The intelligent answer would be that the deputy warden was there, together with the men whom you left there, wouldn't it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You found the deputy warden in addition to the guards in the keepers' hall when you returned?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Then what happened?
A. I reported it to the deputy warden.
Q. What followed that?
A. The deputy warden asked to have the hospital overseer notified, and to report to the keepers' hall immediately.
Q. Was that done?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who came?
A. Overseer McConnell.
Q. Where was he summoned from, do you know?
A. From the prison hospital.
Q. That would be another wing of the same building?
A. After you go through the main dome in "A" corridor, it is on the west side of the main dome.
Q. It is all enclosed under the one roof, isn't it?
A. Practically, sir.
Q. Did the hospital attendant McConnell arrive on the scene?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What followed that?
A. I was waiting for him at the main barrier leading from the keepers' hall into the main dome. I escorted him downstairs to Behan's cell, and I opened Behan's cell to admit the hospital overseer. He examined Convict Behan, and stated that the case was too serious for him, and to have the doctor notified.
Q. Did you hear any conversation between Behan and McConnell?
A. No, sir.

Q. What followed that?
A. I immediately returned to the keepers' hall and had the doctor notified.
Q. Was that Dr. Platt?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. I suppose he came from his home, did he?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How long after that did he arrive?
A. I think he was at the prison at about 7.10.
Q. Did you accompany the doctor down to the cell?
A. No, sir.
Q. That is the end of your connection with it?
A. Yes.

Perhaps from that point I should give the doctor's statement.

I find the following in the evidence of Doctor G. A. Platt:

Q. Have you got the hospital record of this man?
A. He has never been a hospital patient, so there is no hospital file.
Q. Has he been receiving any medical attention at your hands?
A. Yes, he has.
Q. I am speaking of the last month?
A. Yes.
Q. What was it?
A. He complained of being unable to sleep. Said he was nervous, and wasn't sleeping well.
Q. When would this be?
A. This was particularly in the last seven or eight days—the last ten days. I have taken him over myself a tablet of veronal dissolved in water.
Q. Would it be correct to say that you saw him yesterday?
A. Yes. I was with him sixteen minutes.
Q. What time would that be?
A. When I came out from speaking to him it was 7.20 by the clock in the keepers' hall.
Q. Morning or evening?
A. In the evening.
Q. So that you saw him last before you were called this morning was about 7.20 last evening?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you prescribe for him then?
A. Yes, the same thing.
Q. How did you happen to go there this morning?
A. I was called from the prison.
Q. About what time?
A. Seven o'clock.
Q. And you arrived there approximately—
A. I think it was thirteen minutes after seven, or twelve, when I arrived.
Q. Did you go at once to see him?
A. Yes.
Q. Will you describe to the jury in what condition you found him?
A. He was lying on the bed in his cell. I picked up his wrist and could feel no pulse. I then asked him what was the matter. He made no answer. I couldn't feel any pulse. I looked at his eyes, tried to listen to his heart. There was no heart action audible, and he had no reflexes in his eyes. He did breathe twice in the next minute or two. I suppose it was just the last action of the blood and the respiratory centres and then he was dead.

Q. The man was practically dead when you reached there?

A. Yes, he was.

Q. In your daily treatment and visits to him, had you any knowledge of any heart affliction?

A. None.

Q. Was there anything indicative of it?

A. No, no symptom to suggest heart trouble, nor was there any heart trouble that I could detect by stethoscope. I have used that many times.

Q. When?

A. I think I spent more time with him than with any convict in the institution. In the last week I had no occasion to examine his heart at all.

Q. When did you last examine his heart?

A. I think the last time would be a little over two weeks ago.

Q. As the result of complaints received from him?

A. No. Part of my professional duty.

Q. Just in the ordinary course of duty?

A. Yes, it was in the course of duty.

Then there is the evidence of Doctor Hay, assistant professor of pathology at Queen's university, who performed the autopsy. Without reading all his evidence I shall read the following:

I examined the body of Samuel Behan. He was a man about forty-nine years of age, well developed and well nourished. There were no marks on his body of recent occurrence, but he had some old scars, on the cheek, on his chin, one on each knee, and some tattoo marks on each forearm. There were no recent marks of any kind whatever. I then examined the body internally. I found the right lung showed some evidences of slight tuberculosis, well healed now. His left lung was free of any previous disease. The heart was about normal in size. The right side was filled with blood. The left side was more or less contracted. I found that the artery which supplies the left side of the heart, one of the most important arteries, was rather badly diseased, a condition which we know as atheroma. In common language you speak of hardening of the arteries. The artery supplying the left side of the heart is extremely important, and if it be plugged by disease a blood clot may form, which cuts off the nourishment of the left side of the heart, that is the muscle itself, and this intereferes with the working of the heart, and frequently brings about immediate death. I found this artery in very bad condition indeed.

Coroner: Doctor, is there any physical way of diagnosing it during life? Might that have happened to a private individual in ordinary life without him even having suspected it or consulting a doctor?

A. Coronary thrombosis is in many cases an extremely difficult condition to diagnose previous to death, previous to an inspection of the body. In some cases it is almost impossible. The heart sounds may be normal. If anything does show, it sometimes shows by a little difference in the rhythm, the regularity of the heart, but a doctor might examine a man's pulse for quite a long time and not notice it. In some cases it is detected by a delicate electrical instrument, but even that might fail. I have known cases where a man died very suddenly, and he had been sick before, and it could not be detected. In some of the more chronic types they do complain of pain—that is angina pectoris. But sometimes they die very suddenly without complaining at all.

Q. Would it have been possible, by any chance, for any treatment to have saved him?

A. Nothing can be done whatever to change the condition of this artery. We are absolutely helpless.

Q. You mentioned a clot, doctor, I think?

A. Yes, perhaps I might explain. When the inside of the artery becomes diseased a clot of blood is very apt to form on the surface of this diseased area. It is liable to form more especially at night, when a man is resting, and as soon as he is disturbed in the morning he is liable to break this clot up, and it plugs a small branch of this artery, and that means the end. If the artery is very fine he has what we call a heart attack, and takes care of himself, but if it is a big one then, of course the attack is severe enough that it kills him immediately.

The other guards who were there give practically the same evidence as Robinson. After hearing the evidence the jury brought in this verdict:

We find that convict Samuel Behan came to his death from natural causes, namely, coronary thrombosis, a condition which it is not possible to previously detect, and that nothing further could have been done, in the opinion of the jury, to save his life.

That was the finding on the evidence taken at the coroners inquest which was held in connection with the death of this convict.

Miss MACPHAIL: I want to be sure of the dates. The paddling of Behan took place on May 4?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, May 14.

Miss MACPHAIL: And when did he die?

Mr. GUTHRIE: May 26.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is it usual for wardens to be so lenient? After they have pronounced sentence of twenty strokes, is it usual for the paddling to cease after the fourth stroke?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. I have known a great many instances that have come before me where, after two, three, four or five strokes the remaining strokes have been held in suspense, and as a rule they are not given afterwards because good behaviour usually follows. In this instance it was at the end of the fourth stroke.

Miss MACPHAIL: According to the new regulations, commented upon very favourably by the minister the last time we were debating this question, paddling is no longer allowed on command of the warden but only after consultation with the Department of Justice. Was convict Behan paddled before or after consultation with Ottawa?

Mr. GUTHRIE: After. All cases are now submitted to headquarters before paddling or strapping can take place. The evidence is also submitted.

Miss MACPHAIL: After May 15 and until May 26, the day on which he died, was he confined to the isolation cell in which he slept on the floor or was he in his own cell?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He was in the punishment cell under the keeper's hall.

Miss MACPHAIL: That was between those two dates. Had he been in the punishment cell prior to the fifteenth?

Mr. GUTHRIE: From the night of the third he was in there.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am sure the minister must have felt the death of Sam Behan under the circumstances. The report is elaborate but it does not convince me that Sam Behan was known to be a perfectly healthy man. We know all about the clergymen who went through the penitentiary and said that everything was all right; but the conduct of the penitentiary since that time has shown clearly that everything was not all right so that the jury's report does not mean as much as it might have meant before that occurrence. In the judgment of Judge Deroche in the case of Rex versus Kirkland, Behan was spoken of rather well in connection with the riot. On page 7 we find the following:

> Two men, Garceau and Behan, addressed the crowd and told them to do no violence or injury to property.

That was brought out at least twice. It may be that Behan's death came unexpectedly and that nothing could have been done to save him, but as a member of this house I do not feel comfortable about it, when we know that he was paddled very shortly before his death, that he was in an isolation cell at the time of his death and that he did not have attendance, which might of course have happened to anyone. Coming as it does after the very real difficulty in both Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul, it seems to me to be one more strong argument in favour of a careful and impartial investigation into the conduct of our penitentiaries.

There were several other things I wanted to ask the minister. I understand that a very large number of men, thirty-six, I believe, were paddled just after the visit of the governor general to Kingston. There was some sort of demonstration in the penitentiary, a flooding of the whole ground floor, due I believe to an incident within the penitentiary; but possibly the official mind, which works in a peculiar way, may have associated this with the official visit. From the information I have I should judge that the visit of His Excellency had nothing to do with it, but afterwards thirty-six men were paddled. Things may have gone very badly at the penitentiary, discipline may have broken down entirely, but I am not at all convinced that the paddling of thirty-six men, wholesale punishment in this way, will accomplish very much. Did consent for the paddling of these thirty-six men come from Ottawa or was it done on the warden's initiative?

Mr. GUTHRIE: On the date in question the governor general happened to be at the military college in Kingston, and word in some way was received amongst the prisoners that His Excellency was in Kingston and a communication was passed around, a copy of which was obtained, informing certain of the prisoners that this would be a good day to put on a demonstration. On the evening of that particular day, which I believe was the beginning of May or the end of April, a very noisy outbreak took place. It started with the rattling of trays or aluminum dishes and the flooding of as many cells as they could possibly flood in certain tiers of the building. It was a very noisy demonstration indeed. I do not want to give the names of the various prisoners, but twenty-two were awarded corporal punishment. The doctor pronounced two of them unfit and the rest were sentenced to various numbers of strokes. The first one was sentenced to twenty strokes and eleven were administered; the second was sentenced to twenty strokes and twelve were administered; the third was sentenced to twenty strokes and twelve were administered. The next was sentenced to twenty, twelve strokes administered; the next to twenty; fifteen strokes administered; the next to twenty, seven strokes administered; the next to twenty, fourteen strokes administered; two were pronounced medically unfit; the next to twenty, six strokes administered; the next to twenty, twelve strokes administered; the next to twenty, nine administered; the next to twenty, five administered; the next to twenty, twelve administered; the next to twenty, eight administered; the next to twenty, twelve administered; the next to twenty, fifteen administered; the next to twenty, twelve administered, and the next to twenty, fifteen administered. That concludes the list, but I notice there were five pronounced medically unfit and the strokes were not administered.

Miss MACPHAIL: Was the department in Ottawa consulted?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, and the evidence was submitted before the administration of the strokes.

Miss MACPHAIL: I read in the daily press, I think it was the Toronto Daily Star, of an incident which occurred a week or two ago and which seemed to me to be rather absurd. This article stated that the Reverend Major W. E. Kidd, the Protestant chaplain, had been protected with guards while preaching to the convicts. That struck me as being very peculiar. I cannot conceive of anyone preaching the gospel of love under the protection of armed guards. I cannot see that that would do the prisoners much good, I cannot see that it would do the preacher any good and it causes a lot of trouble for the guards. I was wondering if we could not do something about it, either not have a sermon or else have one preached by a man who believes in love to the extent that he is willing to stand upon the power of love without any other protection. I do not know how much of this report is true, and perhaps the minister would like to make a statement. I was very much interested in reading that the Reverend Father Kingsley refused similar protection. A sermon by such a man might do the men some good, but unless we intend to make our penitentiaries simply whipping institutions and places of vengeance, we should try to get these things in harmony. It is not possible to bring people to an understanding of the gospel or philosophy of love at the point of a gun. If a minister preaching the gospel of love believes in it he will not need any protection; if he needs protection as badly as that, he had better not be exposed to danger.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I am correct in stating that from time immemorial in the penitentiaries of Canada, Great Britain and the United States guards have been present in the chapels at both the Protestant and Roman Catholic services. They are very necessary. No one should go away with the idea that we just have a crowd of children and innocents in these places. There are two opinions in connection with attendance at chapel. Many prominent people, including ministers of the gospel, have written to me that they think the religious services in the penitentiaries might well be dispensed with. Some suggest that at all events attendance should be optional. At the present time attendance at chapel is compulsory and there is no doubt that many of the prisoners resent this. As one divine told me, they must accept it as part of the punishment. There is an element of danger in the chapel. It is about the only time the prisoners congregate in large numbers. Many of the disturbances which have occurred in penitentiaries in Great Britain and the United States and some that have occurred in Canada have been hatched or concocted in the chapels. You have five or six hundred men, many of whom are desperate characters, congregated together with thirty or forty guards. It would not be a very hard thing for such a number of men suddenly to overpower the guards. Reverend Mr. Kidd is a returned man. He is an estimable chaplain and one of the outstanding men in the service. He is a fearless man; he was decorated in the war and I do not think for one moment that the guards were placed there at his request. The guards are there whether or not he likes them, for the protection of the institution.

Miss MACPHAIL: Was there not a particular instance recently?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not that I am aware of.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is it not true that part of the wall between the chapel and the room adjoining was broken down and a heavy guard put behind this opening, quite observable by everyone in the room? I am given to understand that that is true.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There was an extra number of guards placed at that particular point on May 11. This was the time when we were anticipating trouble which unfortunately came.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like the minister to say something about the fire and the resignation of Warden Megloughlin.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The fire at Kingston penitentiary took place on May 15. It was discovered between 4.35 and 5 o'clock, at the closing of the prison. An incipient fire had been discovered in the kitchen three days before, but it did not amount to much. When discovered it was easily put out. Punk had been ignited and placed in oiled paper and put away at five o'clock, but it was discovered in time and no real damage occurred. On May 15 a fire occurred in the change room. This is part of the prison where the men's wearing apparel and extra clothing is kept. The fire broke out between 4.40 and 4.50 in the afternoon. At the same time another fire broke out in the carpenter shop, some distance, about seventy or seventy-five feet away from the change room. The fire in the carpenter shop was discovered by one of the guards and without any very great difficulty and with an extinguisher was put out. The fire in the change room had become a serious blaze before it was discovered. The men had been marched out of the change room about twenty minutes before the fire was actually discovered; the door had been locked and the men marched out to their cells. When this fire was noticed through the smoke occasioned by it, the door was opened and there was a great conflagration in the room at that time.

Unfortunately, at that hour of the day, five o'clock, when the men are returned to their cells, it would be a natural thing for them to wash, but the effect of that on the water supply was very serious, reducing the supply to about fifty per cent of the normal pressure and interfering very greatly with the extinguishing of the fire. That may have been a coincidence. If you take one thousand faucets and start them all running at the same time you may seriously reduce the water pressure; at all events, the water pressure was seriously reduced. It became necessary to send for the Kingston fire brigade which came to the scene as rapidly as possible and after a considerable amount of difficulty the fire was extinguished. The loss on this occasion has been serious. The loss in the riot of two years ago which was looked upon as a serious one was only about $3,000. I regret to say that the loss by fire has reached about $35,284 including loss of machinery and of buildings, but the largest item is the loss of clothing and equipment for prisoners.

A very full investigation was held, but according to the report that has been placed before me, the inspector who conducted the investigation is unable to say who started the fires. He has reported that the fires were of an incendiary nature. They started at approximately the same time in the two buildings just as the men had been marched from the different buildings to their cells. It is supposed that the fires were started either by mechanical cigarette lighters called "punk" lighters or what the prisoners refer to as "the works," operating with a bit of flint and a bit of punk, or else by a piece of candle which may have been stolen from the chapel and which could have been placed under the tables at the end of the change room and well concealed and which probably in fifteen or twenty minutes would result in a blaze. But there is no conclusive evidence so far as to who actually set fire to those premises. The damage, as I say, is considerable, but we have not been able to fix guilt on the culprit.

Miss MACPHAIL: The minister has not answered my second question: Why did Warden Megloughlin resign?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, he resigned. Perhaps we might find out more if we asked him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Coincidence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I shall, however, state the case quite frankly. Warden Megloughlin was appointed temporary warden at the time of the riot in the institution in October, 1932. There is power in the Penitentiary Act in an emergency to appoint a temporary warden, and he was appointed temporary warden by the superintendent. Subsequently his position as warden was confirmed and he was formally appointed by the civil service commission. He has now served in the institution from October, 1932, to the fifteenth of the present month of June and I must say that he has had a rather desperate experience in that penitentiary. He has had a very difficult crowd of convicts to deal with: insurrections and riots have from time to time been planned; some of them to a small extent have been carried out and I do not believe during all that period there was a moment of time when he could say that he was safe or that his life was not in actual danger. But he is a fearless man and probably did his best to conduct that institution according to the rules and regulations and to run it as a prison or penitentiary should be run. But after an experience of, say eighteen months, I am sorry to say that the condition was not satisfactory; quiet had not been restored; outbreaks or threatened outbreaks became of almost monthly occurrence. Letters and communications were intercepted occasionally showing the plans that were to be undertaken, naming some outside sympathizers as ready to applaud another insurrection and stating that some of the newspapers were behind them.

According to the best estimate we can form there are not more than one hundred insurrectionary spirits, pretty desperate men, in that institution; from the reports I gather, out of the 1,000 in the institution, about one hundred may be considered dangerous insurrectionists. There is still quite a proportion who live in fear and trembling and who are willing to join in any insurrection, who are afraid to stay out. There have been assaults of a very vicious kind on some of the prisoners who had not thrown in their lot with the more noisy and dangerous element, but by far the largest proportion are peaceable, well-meaning prisoners and the situation for those people is very inconvenient, very unpleasant and, to some extent, perhaps dangerous also. Those prisoners must be controlled and there is an element there which will not obey. If they are ordered to do work of certain kinds; ordered to any kind of duty, they positively refuse. Their language is bad, disgraceful, but their refusal to obey orders must be attended to.

In the last analysis there is only one course you can take and that is the application of physical force, otherwise your penitentiary is out of control. I am sorry to say that since the first of January prisoners who had been accorded in the last two years very many favours as compared with those enjoyed in the penitentiary for forty or fifty years, continued to demand more and more, and the noisy or the dangerous element continued to make plans to have another rebellion or insurrection of some kind. A year and a half, or nearly two years ago, we gave them certain liberties which they had not theretofore enjoyed; one of them was outdoor exercise. This developed into baseball, handball. It developed into Sunday games; schedules were arranged for games for prisoners' teams to take place on Sunday afternoon. This spring the matter was greatly to the annoyance of certain residents in the neighbourhood of the penitentiary, and complaints were made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What sort of complaints?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Of the noise on the Lord's day when church service was going on. Baseball was being played, and the people did not know it was baseball; the noise and the shouting were so great that they thought it was another riot. Smoking was another privilege not originally given in 1932 but extended in regard to the smoking of cigarettes. But there is a very positive regulation that no smoking shall be allowed in any place where there is any combustible material. That regulation I found was being very largely disregarded by the prisoners. It has been suggested that perhaps some of the fires may have been started by cigarettes, but I do not know what the truth is in regard to that. But smoking in the shops where there was combustible material was becoming very prevalent, and it became apparent to me and to others who reported to me that the prisoners were rapidly getting out of control. Under these circumstances I sent for the warden and had considerable discussion with him on the morning of the fourteenth instant. I explained to him the situation. I cannot say that I could blame him very much under the circumstances, because as I said he has had a very trying experience there for eighteen months.

Mr. SANDERSON: Did the minister ask for his resignation?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suggested to him that I was determined upon making a change. He immediately said that he would like to consider the question of tendering his resignation. "Well," I said, "you must understand that I am determined to make the change." He asked for two or three hours to consult friends in the city, and he came back at half past three and said that he had thought the matter over and discussed it with his friends and had decided that he would tender his resignation. But I had intimated to him in the morning that I was determined to make a change.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has he asked for an investigation since then?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, there has been no request for an investigation. He discussed that question with me briefly, and I received a letter from him yesterday intimating that perhaps some investigation should be held, but he is to see me again to-morrow or some time when I can conveniently see him and discuss the matter further.

Mr. SANDERSON: Before the warden came to see the minister at his request was there a report from the superintendent in regard to the warden?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, and from others.

Mr. SANDERSON: Did the superintendent recommend his resignation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The superintendent made no recommendation, only a statement of facts. The chief complaint was the failure to enforce the regulations of the penitentiary. I could name a good many instances in which that failure took place. I do not know that it was a very easy task for anyone, or that anyone could have performed it. In the meantime I have placed in temporary charge of that prison a man who has had considerable prison experience, the warden of Collins Bay.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who is in charge now?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Allan, the warden at Collins Bay, has been transferred to Kingston.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister make a statement regarding the assertion made at the trial at Toronto that Tim Buck was shot at while in his cell?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I can absolutely deny that Tim Buck was shot at. But I must admit that a number of shots were fired in his cell. That occurred during what we called the great riot of October, 1932, at a time when there was general confusion in the institution, when the military had been called in for the purpose of quelling it, when the larger number of prisoners amongst whom was Tim Buck, had been marched to their cells. The guards were armed and the military were armed. The situation was exceedingly serious, and Tim Buck was one of those who were encouraging the disorder. At the door of his cell he was making speeches and encouraging the rioters, and for the purpose of frightening him, I suppose, or cowing him, certain guards fired into the ceiling in his cell. There can be no doubt that if any man had wanted to shoot Tim Buck he could have done so. The very fact that ten or eleven shots were fired and there was no harm to Tim Buck shows that they were not trying to hit him. He was there for anybody to shoot. But he was one of those who were encouraging the riot and aiding and abetting the rioters, and was one of those who were convicted for it by the county court judge when he was tried at Kingston. He was not injured by any shots, but shots were fired into his cell, and the reason for it was that he was taking an active part in encouraging the rioters.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has made an appeal that there should be an independent and very impartial investigation. It seems to me that that is a reasonable request. I think that people from all sections of Ontario and from outside of Ontario have felt that the time has come when a departmental investigation is not sufficient. I myself have no personal knowledge of conditions in Kingston penitentiary, but there was sent to me a few months ago a copy of the Chronicle-Telegraph of Quebec of July 17, 1933, in which I find a report of a sermon preached from the pulpit of St. Matthew's church by the Venerable F. G. Scott, C.M.G., D.S.O., archdeacon of Quebec, in which he called earnestly upon the federal government to name a royal commission to investigate Canadian prison methods and particularly the conditions which recently provoked rioting in Kingston penitentiary. He declared in the course of his sermon that the brand of shame rests upon the Department of Justice, and because of this he had been forced to raise his voice from his pulpit against this public scandal. According to the report, much of the archdeacon's sermon consisted of the reading of a letter written by Major W. M. Nickle, of Kingston, Ontario, who was defence counsel for one of the rioters at Kingston, in which startling allegations of ill treatment were made. The report includes the text of the letter written by Major Nickle of Nickle and Farrell, barristers, of Kingston, Ontario. This firm had undertaken the defence of Murray Kirkland, accused of rioting in the penitentiary last October.

I understand that certain minor changes have been made since that time, but I am informed that no fundamental changes have been made. So it does seem to me that it is obligatory upon the Department of Justice to make a categorical denial, if such can be made, of any of these charges of Major Nickle. In any case the obligation rests upon the department to show reason why there should not be a thorough-going investigation by an impartial commission.

This is the letter, which I should like to read:

Kingston, July 12, 1933.

My Dear Colonel Scott:

I remember meeting you on a number of occasions in London after my appointment in March, 1918, as private secretary to our mutual friend, Sir Richard Turner.

I was associated with my father in the trial of Rex v. Murray Kirkland who was charged with rioting in the Kingston penitentiary, October, 1932. The trial judge was His Honour George E. Desroche of Belleville. The trial lasted nine days, when the whole history of the Kingston penitentiary was thoroughly gone into to ascertain the cause of the disturbance of October 17, 1932. Having read your article in the Toronto Star, a copy of which is enclosed herewith for your information, I thought you might be interested in getting a little further information about the Kingston penitentiary.

At the Kirkland trial we proved, on behalf of the defence, and our allegations were not contradicted by anyone, the following facts:

(1) Underneath the keepers' hall at the Kingston penitentiary below the level of the ground there is what is called the "hole," a little place with eight cells where at certain periods men have their hands raised above their heads and are shackled to the bars, and are confined for seven or fourteen days and fed on bread and water. Outside of each cell gate is a heavy wooden door with four or five holes for air about the size of your thumb. When these doors are shut there is no other ventilation. As there are no proper sanitary arrangements, it follows without detailed comment that the air is foul to a degree. The time that men are shackled to the bars is 8 a.m. to 11.45 a.m. and from 1 p.m. to 4.30 p.m.

Let me pause for a moment to say that these are very definite charges made by a reputable man who has intimate knowledge of the facts whereof he speaks.

(2) For the most trivial offences, such as talking in the cell range men were paddled or spanked with a leather strap 3½ feet long, 3 inches wide, ¼ inch thick, and in the strap there were 30 holes. If you were not particularly liked by any guard, the custom was to soak the strap in water over night and then paddle the man in the morning. The man's ankles before being paddled were shackled to a table, like a kitchen table, after his feet had been strapped apart, and his ankles made fast with straps. The inmate was then bent over the table, his arms stretched out, his clothes removed and he was blindfolded. The soft flesh would go in the holes in the strap, and if the strap was pulled the least little bit, bits of the flesh would be torn out of the body and when the strapper had finished his work, the inmate still bleeding, would be sent to the "hole," sometimes to be shackled to the bars, and sometimes just to be fed on bread and water. Inmates gave evidence and showed scars on their body from paddling which took place months ago.

To-night we have heard that this punishment is still in vogue, that men were sentenced to twenty strokes of the paddle, with some of them receiving as high as fifteen strokes. We also heard that one of the reasons for paddling, for this form of cruelty—I think we call it nothing else—was simply disobedience to certain discipline, with no great moral crime involved. I quite recognize that it may be necessary to have discipline in any institution, but I do submit that cruelty of this kind savours more of medieval inquisition days than it does of modern life.

(3) Syphilitic inmates with running sores and other such patients are admitted to the hospital. These dangerous cases and all other patients bathe in the same wash tub, the same tub being also used to wash the dishes of the patients in the hospital three times a day.

Mr. MULLINS: That is not correct. I looked into that very carefully, and the hon. member has no right to read that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit that, however estimable my good friend from Marquette may be, the writer of this letter knows the conditions in Kingston penitentiary a great deal better than he does.

Mr. MULLINS: For your information I may say that I spent some time there with a prominent clergyman from the city of Toronto, who went with me. There was no window dressing: I looked into all those conditions which the hon. member is taking up the time of the house reading about, and what he says is absolutely untrue.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to finish reading this letter, which I say came from Major Nickle, who was present at the time of this trial. I take it that he knows the conditions whereof he speaks.

Can you imagine anything more disgusting and shocking?

(4) Two or three boys who were sent to penitentiary at the age of fifteen for three to seven years were put to work with "lifers," in other words, men who had been charged with murder or some other very serious offence and had been given life imprisonment. We can imagine the result of such contact upon the character of the boys.

(5) It was proved conclusively that there are only three shops that are any good at all at the Kingston penitentiary from the point of view of teaching an inmate a trade—the machine, engineering and carpentry. These three shops can only look after 125 men, there are over 900 inmates in the penitentiary. The result is that about 800 men are doing time and not learning a trade. At the end of their sentence, they are turned loose in society, and find themselves as many years backward as they were in the Kingston penitentiary. The inevitable happens and they go back to the penitentiary.

There is an inmate by the name of John O'Brien who was suspected of conspiring to escape on the poor allegation of a letter sent by one inmate to a warden, implicating O'Brien. O'Brien has been in solitary confinement in the prison of isolation since August, 1931, and has never been charged or tried on the charge of conspiracy to escape.

I pause for a moment, Mr. Chairman. It seems almost inconceivable that such a situation could develop, with this man O'Brien in solitary confinement in the prison, isolated, since August, 1932, yet he has never been charged or tried on a charge of conspiracy to escape.

O'Brien had on each side of him two raving inmates, one completely crazy and the other a drug addict. I subpoenaed the crazy man to try to show to the court what was going on, but the Department of Justice got rid of him three or four days before the trial.

Mr. CANTLEY: I rise to a point of order. I have always understood that it was contrary to the rules of the house to read extensively from newspapers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is nothing in the rules to prevent my reading some facts.

Mr. DONNELLY: Would the hon. member say what he is reading from?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph of July 17, 1933. This is not newspaper comment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let him go on; go ahead.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I continue to read:

When I became interested in the convict trials, I realized that every man was entitled to a fair trial. I attach a clipping from the Whig-Standard which will prove to you conclusively that the Department of Justice did not want a fair trial, and certainly did not want the disclosures made public which have since come to light.

Prior to October 17, there was a silent rule for convicts which read as follows: "Every convict shall observe silence and shall not hold communication with another convict. He shall not look at a visitor or speak to him. He shall only hold communication with the officer in charge of him 'on matters connected with his work'." Let me say here, while it occurs to me, that the inmates were only given 20 minutes' exercise a day, walking in a circle round the bull ring. All the complaints, brutality and treatment complained of in the Kirkland trial were made known to the authorities at Ottawa in September last year. No action was taken until after the disturbance. This is what has happened since. The men are allowed to speak to one another. They are allowed to play baseball and laugh for half an hour a day. They are given cigarette papers for their tobacco instead of using makeshifts. No man is shackled to the bars now and no man is paddled without the approval of Ottawa. The hospital conditions remain the same.

John O'Brien is still in solitary confinement and has not yet been tried.

I went to the war as a private in 1915. I happened to come back a major. I was wounded three times. I had several operations as the result of wounds. I fought for the best tradition of the British Empire and I am frank to say to you that, within one mile of this office is the dominion penal institution known as the "Kingston penitentiary." It reeks with discontent and rottenness. It is an institution that is a disgrace to this country and I am glad that citizens like yourself are beginning to realize that the inmate of to-day is the citizen of to-morrow and entitled to be treated as a human being.

Christ is not a living power in the life of the inmate at the Kingston penitentiary to-day. What is needed is a royal commission to investigate the hideous cruelty suffered by the helpless individual, a ward of this country, confined behind the silent walls of the Kingston penitentiary. The authorities, as far as I can learn, are taking no action to better these conditions. What is needed on the commission are outstanding Canadians of a broad mind and a courageous character to look into the situation which has stirred up decent thinking Canadians as a result of the shocking disclosures.

In closing let me say that, in my judgment, it is ridiculous to try men for what they did and punish them further when you take into consideration the fact that things after the disturbance, to a small degree, from the point of view of privileges were made better.

The people who should be prosecuted are those in authority.

I have written you at great length; I trust you will find time to read this letter, and I hope that you will raise your voice to see if something cannot be done for the inmates of our penal institutions. Because I realize that, if you do speak, the men of the Canadian corps, the soldiers of yesterday, the citizens of to-day, will take heed of your words, and perhaps something will come of your efforts.

Believe me,

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) W. M. Nickle.

Some hon. gentlemen seek to interrupt by banging their desks and calling "carried."

Mr. DUPUIS: Why do you not impose the penalty of the paddle?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some seem to think that this matter is a great joke.

Mr. CANTLEY: It is an outrage.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit that this situation as it exists to-day is, as the hon. member for Pictou has said, an outrage.

Mr. CANTLEY: It is, on your part.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say that when a man of the standing of Mr. Nickle writes in this way—

An hon. MEMBER: Sorehead.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —and when his letter is read during the course of a sermon in St. Matthew's church by a man respected by all Canadians, The Venerable Archdeacon Scott, and when it is published in a newspaper with the standing of the Chronicle-Telegraph of Quebec, it is time that the situation came before the House of Commons. I have not much further to say, but I could not do better than to continue the plea made by Archdeacon Scott. He states:

At the end of September, 1930, we had 11,223 persons in prison in various jails and penitentiaries. On September 30, 1931, we had 12,441 prisoners, an increase of 1,218 persons in one year. The numbers since have gone up and are still going up.

If we look upon crime as a moral disease, we must feel that there is some centre of evil in our national life which has to be seriously attacked, and if possible eradicated. If a bodily disease breaks out among our people, all best medical minds and skill that the nation can command are called upon to combat it. Whence has come the failure in our fight against the moral disease of crime?

And one further sentence only:

Broken lives, immortal souls, whom the church has failed to reach, are broken further and humiliated, in their last chance given them for reform.

I have said that I have no personal knowledge of the conditions in Kingston penitentiary. The great majority of the public cannot have any personal knowledge, but I do believe that the general public is entitled to have firsthand knowledge from a competent and impartial board of investigation. The fact that we have had these troubles, as the minister himself has admitted, extending over years, and that within recent months there have been very serious troubles, are evidence sufficient to warrant our asking for an impartial investigation. Further than that, I think we must admit when we have so many of these men coming back again and again to the penitentiaries that there is something wrong in the treatment which we are giving them.

An hon. MEMBER: They must like it

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And so I simply pass on the appeal by Archdeacon Scott, one which I know is echoed by a great many Canadians throughout this country, asking that the government give us this impartial investigation.

Mr. ROSS: I am not so much interested in the particular matters to which the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) has just referred. I regret that I missed the opportunity some time ago to continue my remarks, which were cut short by my engagement in the election campaign of the last two weeks. I must thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) for the opportunity to complete what I began on a former date. On that occasion I spent most of the time in showing that the reforms which had been obtained were obtained through outside interference. That was principally in answer to newspapers who had been decrying the matter of outside interference in penitentiary affairs. It was also an answer to the selected visitors who had gone through the penitentiaries, and had made favourable reports. I am not very much concerned with the internal administration, because I think the department should be able to obtain a man who would bring order out of what the minister has now described as a state of great disorder. In the face of a certain amount of criticism opposed to a certain amount of whitewash we get nowhere. The remarks which have been made through the medium of the press and by visitors to the effect that those of us who have some criticism of the system, and not particularly against the administration by this or that official, are preaching leniency does not in any way affect me. I am for punishment and I am also for control of these institutions.

I should like to deal with basic conditions, the conditions which lie at the bottom and foundation of our penal system. The Prime Minister has well described the functions of the penitentiary as being threefold, first that they have to do with detention, for the safety of the state; secondly, detention to deter crime in others and, third, for reformation. These are the three concise and concrete functions outlined by the Prime Minister, and I believe they express adequately what should be the functions of penitentiaries. If those are the functions, I can conclude only this, that the system is ancient, that it is antique and bewhiskered with age. I say that it has failed in this threefold function. It is quite true that we have detention, there is no doubt about that. But as to the features of deterrence from crime and reformation, the system has failed absolutely.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to some statistics, because in matters of importance we have to go outside the reports. I believe the last report was about the poorest one which has been made by a superintendent. My figures are those for the year 1933, and I should like the house for a few moments to take note of what the system has accomplished. We find that of the 4,800 prisoners the first offenders amount to 37 per cent, second offenders 21 per cent, third offenders 14 per cent and those with four or more offences 22 per cent. In other words, the oftener a man goes to penitentiary the greater is the likelihood that he will continue going, and to my way of thinking if that is the conclusion which must be drawn after all these years of administration the system has failed. The superintendent states that there have been ten years of maladministration, and I leave that to the former and the present Minister of Justice to explain. I think however it is a pretty hard crack to say that there have been ten years of maladministration and inefficiency. I would point this out, however. When you analyze the population of the penitentiary and find that only thirty-seven per cent of that population are first offenders and that twenty-two per cent are fourth commitments, then I say that the system is not showing results. It has been said that those who go to the penitentiaries are the unemployed. Again, I have not time to take you into statistics, but you will find that even that criticism is not borne out.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): If it is a failure, what do you suggest?

Mr. ROSS: If the hon. member will listen long enough I will come to my suggestion; let him be a little patient. The unemployed are not by any means the great mass of the population of the penitentiaries, because most of these men have been in employment of some kind or other. Then we come to the boys and the youth. There are about 109 boys in the penitentiaries, and 44 per cent of these are first offenders. Of boys between the ages of 18 and 21 there are 730, and about 40 per cent are first offenders. It has been claimed that the boys in there come from homes. Again, the statistics do not bear that out. The smallest percentage of these boys in the penitentiaries are from foster homes, and the great percentage are from homes where there are father and mother. The conclusion I leave to hon. gentlemen.

My hon. friend asks what I propose. I will ask the committee to bear with me patiently in this matter. I speak only for myself but I am speaking after years of close study of the penitentiaries. In the first place, for years the superintendent's report has suggested that there should be segregation, and that suggestion has been ridden to death. But there are one or two respects in which there should undoubtedly be segregation, and the minister's statement to-night will lead us to a few conclusions in this matter. First of all, there should be segregation of mental cases. The one official who is absolutely necessary to this system is the psychiatrist, but when you read down this list of officials you will find that the two important ones are left out. There are superintendents, wardens, inspectors, chaplains, but there is no psychiatrist at all in connection with these institutions. The study of the mental condition should begin away back in these cases. Boys are taken there without examination, and after the last trial a very vigorous campaign was put on to weed out a lot of the mental cases. The situation in regard to mental cases has been a very bad one for years. Whenever a crisis occurred cases would be examined and they would be sent over to the provincial asylums. Now, the provincial asylums are not prepared to deal with the mental criminal, and as a result he very often escaped and was at large. But I want it to be understood that a large percentage of the population of the penitentiaries to-day is attributable to the mental condition of the inmates, and there has been no scientific, no advanced method of dealing with them. The man who should be able to take charge in this respect and make recommendations cannot be found on the staff.

Let me pass on to the second phase of this matter, and that is in regard to the boys. I have been engaged on this for some time. I think it is a crime that a boy should be in a penitentiary, and yet if you study the law as it stands you will fail to understand why it is that white men should have on their statute books any law which permits the incarceration of boys. I am opposed to the incarceration of the boy if it can be prevented, as I think it can, and I will make a suggestion or two in that regard before I am through; because when the boy is released from the institution, no matter whether it be a reformatory or a penitentiary or a prison, there is no place for him in society. There is no way in which he can obtain a position and be restored to a place in society. I leave that statement to the house and the public and ask whether there is any way in which the boy, once he is marked by incarceration, can be returned to society. Visitors have gone through the penitentiaries and made reports on the food and on the conditions, but they fail to tell you of the food that the boy is feeding on in these institutions. I will give you an example without mentioning any names—convict No. so and so, an inmate of Kingston penitentiary. This man was sentenced for life to that institution for assaulting a little girl of nine, and when he could not accomplish his purpose he tied the girl and then cut her. That man was in the institution, and was paroled after nine years, and he is back to-day on a similar charge. Imagine a boy sitting beside this kind of animal, feeding on the sort of food that is given to him by moral perverts. I could give you similar cases. How can that boy, after years of such confinement, find a place in society? Since I took this matter up in regard to the incarceration of boys in these institutions, I must say that within the last year we have made some advance. The Minister of Public Welfare in Ontario has stated that the age should certainly be raised from sixteen to eighteen. With that we cannot agree. A boy of eighteen has yet to be defined from the point of view of mental condition; he may be a boy of ten years mentality, whereas a boy of thirteen or fourteen might have the matured mentality of a man of twenty-five. I have been in correspondence with many magistrates on this phase of the subject, discussing this difficulty. Listen to some of the statements made by some of these magistrates:

> As I have often pointed out to you, a boy under sixteen is met with the arbitrary provisions of the prison and reformatory act.

You will see, Mr. Chairman, that this matter is complicated. It is not only a federal but a provincial matter. I am trying to get down to basic facts and arrive at something of a corrective nature with regard to these institutions. The letter continues:

> If section 30 of this act means what it says, the magistrate is at times faced with the heartbreaking alternative of sending a boy of tender years to the penitentiary or of ignoring the act and sending the culprit to some other institution.

The law as it stands to-day is that a boy under sixteen years who commits certain crimes must necessarily be sent to the penitentiary, while if he is over sixteen years of age the magistrate has the alternative of sending him to the reformatory. Is that law one which we want to stay upon our statutes? Since this matter was last up the magistrates now have another alternative and they may send the boys to the reformatory. The letter continues:

> This is the age of the automobile with all the opportunities for pleasure and the resulting temptation never before experienced. He himself is like a high powered car with unbounded energy and a not too great sense of responsibility. Like the auto he has unbounded opportunities for good if properly controlled but unlimited opportunities for evil if not controlled. When the magistrate has to act he is like a surgeon who has to perform a delicate operation with inadequate instruments. The problem is very great and I am afraid I cannot see the advantage of raising the juvenile age from sixteen to eighteen. In the first place, an increase in the age would not affect the duty of the magistrate to try them of any age for indictable offences if he were so charged. When the institution for the juvenile is the industrial school and you have children as young as eleven and eighteen year boys together, the evil influence on the tender boy by the older and more experienced one would be anything but good for the former.

He concludes with this important suggestion:

There is no doubt that all criminals should be classified and every criminal should be subject to careful physical and mental examination and should be dealt with in accordance with those. I am sorry that magistrates are not allowed wider discretion in the use of the strap. I cannot understand why the perforated paddle with its possibilities for serious injury should be allowed.

A boy may be committed for six months to a reformatory or industrial school. If he runs away, as most boys will, the arbitrary sentence is two years in the penitentiary. We have to-day in Kingston boys who have served six years for a six months' commitment. I think the boy should be treated provincially and by his own institution; he should not be incarcerated in a penitentiary for running away. When a boy had done two years you would think that that was sufficient punishment, but he is returned through the gaol to the reformatory to complete his six months' commitment. This is a serious matter. Since I have taken up this problem I have had the most interesting correspondence with many magistrates. I heard from one who had dealt with thirty-two cases concerning boys and of those thirty-two cases, sixteen were for offences under the highway traffic act. The magistrates have been following the letter of the law and these boys are in the penitentiary at the present time. They are in touch with murderers, moral perverts and other prisoners of the type to which I have referred already. The only result is injury to the boys. Last year I referred to a boy named Bill who had been committed when only fifteen years of age. He knew nothing about law breaking and he was not a bad boy in the sense of the word. However, as a result of being once committed to the penitentiary he is now serving his seventh commitment in that institution. I am opposed to boys being sent to the penitentiary. I may be asked what I am going to do with these boys. Last year the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said that they were very bad boys, but as a result of the system and the treatment they have received they have become much worse. Many of these boys become recidivists even although their parents stuck to them during their confinement. My suggestion is that the boys should not be placed in the institution. This problem became serious in England and they took many of these boys and put them in the navy. The result was that many of them came out very fine men.

[Mr. Ross.]

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 26, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fifth report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Senn.

Ninth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury).

First report of the joint committee on printing of parliament.—Mr. McLure.

STOTLAND DIVORCE BILL

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa) moved:

That Bill Q2 of the Senate for the relief of Hyman Stotland, the preamble of which has been reported not proven by the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, be placed on the order paper, under standing order No. 111 for consideration in committee of the whole of this house at eight o'clock p.m. this day.

Motion negatived.

DOMINION NOTES ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 110, to amend the Dominion Notes Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC WORKS CONSTRUCTION ACT

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 113, to provide for the construction and improvement of certain public works and undertakings throughout Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the general principle of this bill will, I think, prove acceptable to the house. It is introduced in answer to a general demand from various sources for the inauguration of a program of public works throughout the Dominion of Canada. The bill has the threefold purpose of providing employment over a considerable period of time for those engaged in all lines of trade and activity connected with the construction business; of providing useful public services in the way of buildings and other structures, and of stimulating others to go and do likewise in connection with the building trades.

There is attached to the bill a schedule which sets out in detail the works that are proposed, with a general item which is calculated to enable the departments to put every public building in the Dominion of Canada in first class repair, including painting, plumbing, heating, wiring and so on. Then there is a similar vote for improvements to wharves and other structures in the harbours. It has been found that some of these wharves are not adequate for present needs. Some of them require strengthening, owing to the increasing use of trucks which has resulted in heavier loads passing over the wharves, and a survey is being made with a view to bringing them up to present requirements. In addition recent storms on the Atlantic have made repairs necessary in many instances, and this vote will provide funds for these purposes.

I hope the general principle of the bill will meet with the approval of the house. I can understand that there may be some discussion as to the details and as to some of the items in the schedule, but I submit the bill for the approval of the house with the hope that we may get into the schedule as soon as possible.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have looked over the various sections and the schedule of this bill with some care, and I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of the principle of getting away from the policy of unemployment relief which the government has been following, against the wishes of hon. members on this side of the house, for practically the last four years, and adopting a principle which at any rate is an improvement on what they have been doing.

First of all may I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that at the special session of 1930 the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) proposed two methods for relieving unemployment. One was to raise the tariffs and the other was to vote $20,000,000 to assist in unemployment relief. The right hon. gentleman will bear in mind, as I am sure other hon. members of the house will, that at that time it was urged by my right hon. leader and by many other members from this side of the house that so far as the expenditure of public money on public works was concerned, it was not proper to do that without submitting estimates to the house by way of a supply bill. That was the argument advanced at the special session of 1930, and while I am on that point I might read what was said by the Prime Minister at that time. When reference was made to the fact that we were getting away from the usual practice of calling for tenders and having the minister explain the different items in the house, the Prime Minister said:

> I think the safeguards of the Public Service Act with regard to tenders are sufficient guarantee as to the money being expended.

I regret to find that these safeguards are being taken away to a large extent under the present bill.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend says not, but I think I can convince him in this regard as I was able to convince him once before, I think, when he contradicted me as to the relative proportion of the amounts going to the different ridings. I think I can show him once more that he is mistaken and that I am correct.

That was what the Prime Minister said at that time. Now I am going to endeavour to show that in this bill we are getting away from one of the greatest safeguards that the taxpayers of this country have had in regard to public expenditures. Ever since confederation there has been a provision that it shall be the duty of the minister to invite tenders by public advertisement. I regret to see that in this bill the words "by public advertisement" have been omitted. The minister says we are not getting away from the old principle. I should be very glad if he would assure me now that we will get back to that principle and that he will have inserted in this bill the words "by public advertisement," because after all, that is the first objection to the bill as presented to the house.

What does that mean? The wording of the bill is very neat; it says:

> —the minister or department of the government entrusted with the administration, management and execution of any of the works set forth in schedule A to this act shall invite tenders for the construction and execution of such works, and contracts for all such works and undertakings shall be awarded under the direction of the governor in council.

I ask the minister the reason for including the words "shall invite tenders" instead of using the clause that has been in the Public Works Act, the Public Service Act and the marine act ever since confederation, that it shall be the duty of the minister to invite tenders by public advertisement. That is the first objection to this bill, and I think it is a very serious objection. What is the advantage of doing it by public advertisement? I remember that a year or so ago the minister gave the house a long list of the newspapers in which these contracts were advertised. Everyone from one end of the country to the other who desired to tender on any of these works had an opportunity to do so when public advertisements of that kind were circulated. The result is different when private tenders are called for. I believe the minister will agree with me, and I believe that when I refer the Prime Minister to his words uttered in 1930 he will agree with me, when I state that public advertisement is the proper way in which to govern expenditures of this kind.

I submit there are sufficient safeguards in the act to enable certain work of a pressing nature to be carried on. Under the Public Works Act, as it now stands, public tenders shall be invited by public advertisement, except in certain specified cases. The first exception is that of a pressing emergency, where any delay would be injurious to the public interest. Under this heading would come any damage occasioned by a severe storm. We will suppose that part of a wharf had been washed away. Perhaps it would not be in the public interest to wait until the department could advertise for tenders. Steps would have to be taken immediately to protect the part remaining, and to repair the parts injured. Then, in the second place are those works which, from their very nature, may be more expeditiously and more economically executed by the officers and servants of the department. There are certain types of work which may always be done to greater advantage and more cheaply by the officers and servants of the department. I refer particularly to the repairing of old structures. For instance, in the work of resurfacing or recovering a bridge one cannot tell, until the work is opened up, in just what condition the timbers may be. The probability is that such work could be done more expeditiously and more economically by day labour.

I object strenuously to the repeal of that clause of the present law which states that where the estimated cost of any work is less than $5,000, and in the opinion of the minister in view of the nature of the work it is not advisable to invite tenders, he need not do so. That has been the practice for over fifty years in the Department of Public Works. The amendment to the effect I have indicated was made in 1903 as the result of a practice which had been in vogue for the previous twenty years. Under those circumstances, for a work the estimated cost of which would be $5,000, one had to call for tenders. That was the rule, except in the case of an emergency or in connection with a work which could be done more economically and expeditiously by day labour or in some other way.

But what is the change now proposed? My greatest objection to the bill is that it contains these words:

> Provided that no one work or undertaking certified by the chief engineer of the Public Works department to involve an expenditure in excess of $25,000 shall be authorized by the governor in council except on contract based on tenders.

What is the change? All the works ranging from $5,000 to $25,000 may now be let without tender. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and through you this House of Commons if hon. members think such a change is in the best interests either of the government, the parliament or the people of this country who must pay the bills. What can happen under that change? May I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that while in the schedule appear large contracts for which tenders will have to be invited, over one-third of the items appearing therein range between $5,000 and $25,000. I repeat that over a third of the items come in that class, and it means that we are increasing five times over the value of the works which may be done without calling for tenders.

As I pointed out previously all the leeway the minister requires is that provided in cases of emergency and in cases where in his opinion or in the opinion of the governor in council the work could be done more expeditiously and economically by day labour. To make a change as sweeping as I have indicated at a time like this is, I submit, not in the interests of the people concerned. I say to the minister that the greatest protection he can have is the protection given him through being compelled to call for tenders between $5,000 and $25,000, as obtains at the present time. He knows as well as anybody who has been associated with the Department of Public Works that where works are let without tenders and in cases where the minister in charge is not obliged to let contracts to the lowest tenderers, he is subjected to all the influences of urgent friends, and some who are not such good friends, who are trying to obtain contracts by private tender instead of by public advertisement.

I urge upon the Prime Minister who introduced the bill and upon the minister now in charge of it the necessity of going back to the old rule which for over fifty years has been in force and has given satisfactory service. To make a change of this kind under present conditions is not advisable—and I make that statement altogether apart from certain clauses and general votes contained in the schedule. There are some large amounts mentioned in the schedule. For instance, there is the amount of $500,000 to supplement where necessary specific amounts hereinbefore provided, upon the authority of the governor in council. I say the item should not be put in that way. Then, there is another item of $2,000,000 for public buildings generally, improvements, additions, fittings and so on. Then, there is the vote for $2,000,000 coming under the Department of the Interior. These moneys are to provide for the construction and development of public buildings, camp sites, electric light and telephone systems, highways, trails, water and sewer systems, recreational areas, wharves, river protection works, and so on. The lump sum of $2,000,000 is indicated in the schedule, but there are no definite items stating where the moneys will be expended.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Another blank cheque.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Such an arrangement is not, I submit, in the interests of the people, it is not in the interests of the department and will cause great inconvenience to the minister. Perhaps the minister will remember the objections made by hon. members on this side of the house who urged that the moneys being spent should be authorized by way of a supply bill. In 1932 we had the rather remarkable spectacle of having items tabled for harbours and rivers. While the expenditures there involved did not run into sums as large as the ones now under discussion, the fact remains that apparently no hon. member knew about those items until the session was over. Those schedules were prepared as part of the unemployment relief scheme. When you came to look over the bill, while in the recital it was mentioned that there was no political significance in it, yet when you examined the amounts you found that they were about six times as large in the ridings represented by government representatives as in the ridings not so represented. The same characteristic applies to this schedule.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are not complaining about that surely, after eight and a half years of the same treatment.
